PRIVILEGE

MR. GEORGE—REFERENCE IN DEBATE TO HON. MEMBER FOR WESTMORLAND

Mr. E. W. George (Westmorland): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I want to deal with the personal attack made against me by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Nickle) in this house on the evening of January 15. He asked for an explanation regarding the matters he then raised, and I am glad to give him the explanation for which he asked. I make this explanation out of a strong sense of responsibility as a member of this house.

When I heard of the nature of the hon. member's speech, I naturally wished to take time to read it in Hansard and put myself in a position where I could verify properly all the factual references made in that speech and the one which I am making this afternoon. I am, therefore, taking the very first opportunity which has been open to me to rise in this house and reply to the hon. member for Calgary West. I propose to deal with this matter simply by laying the facts of the situation before this house.

On a matter of this kind involving the privileges of the house, and myself as a member, I recognize that it is for the house to decide whether my actions, as a member of this house and as a commanding officer of a reserve unit, have been proper or not. It is in the sense of one being concerned not only with the charge that has been made against me but with the broad principles which ought to govern the conduct of members of this house that I make these remarks today.

When I assumed command of my regiment, the 8th Princess Louise's (New Brunswick) Hussars, in January, 1951, on the death of the former commanding officer, we had an excellent unit, and it was rated as the best reserve army regiment in Canada by Mr. Ross Munro in the Edmonton Journal on the 17th February, 1951. In 1950 we won the Leonard trophy, emblematic of the best reserve armoured regiment in Canada.

The death of the former commanding officer created a real problem as to what would happen to the regiment, and how and by whom it would be led in the future. As second in command, in order to maintain continuity within the regiment, I felt that I was under a strong moral obligation to the unit, and to the army itself, to contribute what I could to the maintenance of the unit's excellent reputation.

The former commanding officer did an excellent job, by his initiative and application to the heavy task. I, as second in command, in Ottawa a large part of the years 1949 and 1950, was not completely in the picture when I took over the regiment. Naturally, on assuming command, I had to devote a large amount of time to the task of familiarizing myself with all the details of the unit's operations and in addition as a consequence of the change of command certain organizational changes within the unit occurred. I mention this so that hon. members will appreciate the problems with which I was faced in 1951, as a result of having assumed command.

I think that many hon. members are familiar with the difficulties faced in the administration of reserve units in a rural area. As an example I might give some details about the organization of my own regiment, and the large territory in which it carries on its operations. Our regimental area is spread over a radius of 85 miles; regimental headquarters and "B" squadron are at Sussex; headquarters squadron at Hampton and St. Martins; "A" squadron at Petitcodiac, Havelock and Salisbury; and "C" squadron at Dorchester, Sackville and Port Elgin. This is a slight change from the regimental areas of 1951, as in that year we were training in both Saint John and Moncton, but we did not have the Petitcodiac-Salisbury area.

In order to familiarize myself with the affairs of the regiment, as well as looking after the day-to-day affairs I spent most of my spare time working for the reserve army. I took no holidays, and spent any time I had, including every week end, in the interests of the reserve.

The training program for 1951 included one evening at local headquarters, and one week end per month at Sussex on corps training; three Sundays per month were used by the squadrons, one or two of them at a time, depending upon their number of personnel and on the fourth Sunday the officers, W.O.'s and N.C.O.'s trained on the equipment. If there was a fifth Sunday, this too was often used. During the Easter and Christmas recesses tradesmen courses were conducted with about one hundred personnel attending each course. This extensive training program was carried on over the regiment's large territory; and it will be understood that, in addition to the training time, a large amount of time had to be spent in administration by the senior officers of the unit in organizing these activities.

As commanding officer of the regiment, I also have under my command the army camp at Sussex which has sufficient accommodation for a regiment, in addition to a former R.C.E.M.E. workshop which we use as a tank hangar and for stores. In addition, I have on charge the Sussex armouries, which is used by "B" squadron. I also have on my charge accommodation at Hampton, St. Martins, Petitcodiac, Havelock, Salisbury and Sackville, the tank driving range at Camp Sussex and the Sussex rifle range. Altogether, I have on my personal charge over three million dollars' worth of buildings, tanks, training equipment, clothing, et cetera. While I have not seen all the training areas in Canada, I am sure that our reserve army training facilities are among the best in the country.

No hon. member would expect that the great responsibility of administering these extensive training facilities could be properly undertaken without the devotion of a large amount of time to it. I felt and continue to feel a real responsibility for the proper use of this property and equipment, and consider it to be a necessity to spare no time or pains in this task.

Unlike the situation under active service conditions, when one had a complete establishment of fully trained personnel and when the troops were always in camp, we as a reserve unit have to make all these administrative arrangements ourselves and to provide for the transport of our troops on Saturday evening from their homes to Sussex, feed, sleep and train them, and then transport them to their homes on Sunday evening.

In May, 1951, the regiment supplied its quota to the Panda recruiting program for the 27th brigade in Germany. Teams were entered in all rifle shooting competitions. During the year I attended many unit and area conferences on training and administration. Summer camp was conducted under unit arrangements at Camp Sussex with the tank shoot being held at Camp Tracadie in the northern part of the province.

One who has not commanded an active reserve force unit has little idea of the amount of work required by the commanding officer and his staff. Naturally, the more training that is done, the more problems arise and the more personal supervision is required. As I think any other commanding officer who tries sincerely to run a truly good unit would find, I have found that running a modern reserve armoured unit absorbs virtually every bit of his spare time.

The days when commanding officers could satisfy themselves with relatively few weeks' work a year are, I believe, over. If our reserve army units are to be kept in a state of readiness to face potential wartime mobilization, then the job of the commanding officer is a big one indeed. My predecessor found it necessary in 1950 to expend the equivalent of 214 army days as commanding officer of our unit.

Regardless of whether I was in Ottawa, Sussex or at home, my officers continued to provide me with hours and hours of detailed work which I had to handle.

Whether I want to or not—and I do not want to—I cannot divorce myself from my unit during the half-year I am in Ottawa. I spend a good many hours every week doing army work such as reviews of boards of inquiry, endless correspondence, keeping in touch with my scattered sub units, and in general keeping my finger on the pulse of the regiment; all these things absorb hours of time.

For that portion of my reserve army work which I have done in Ottawa I have received the remuneration provided for by the regulations. I say that without shame or without apology. Many members of parliament, in these years when parliament has come to absorb so much time, find it necessary to conduct their affairs from Ottawa. I, too, found myself in this position in respect to my responsibilities toward the reserve army.

Like all armoured corps units in Canada, our regiment is a member of the Royal Canadian Armoured Corps association. This association annually puts up trophies for competition and there are five which may be won by an armoured regiment. As I said before, in 1950, we won the Leonard trophy. In 1951, the year under discussion, my regiment won four of the five trophies and, in 1952, we won all five of them. Here I want to pay tribute to the officers, W.O.'s, N.C.O.'s and men of my regiment for their loyal and wholehearted support. Without them, and their untiring efforts and sacrifice, the regiment would not have reached this present high position in the reserve forces of Canada.

It is said that figures do not lie, but they often can be used for a specific purpose. Certain figures were given by the hon. member for Calgary West as reported at page 1055 of Hansard. He suggests that during the year 1951 I was paid for 204 days of service in the army, while at the same time this house was in session for 224 days. He then makes the allegation that I was paid for services performed for more days than there were in the year 1951. In passing, I might mention that, in fact, my pay was for 202½ days' service with the reserve forces. The important point, however, is one which will be appreciated by every hon. member, namely, that the actual sitting days of this house are much fewer than the length of the parliamentary session would indicate. For example, in 1951, parliament was in session 363 calendar days, not 224 as the hon. member stated. In the first session there were actually 105 sitting days, and in the second session there were 56 sitting days, making a total of 161 sitting days.

In addition, as all hon. members are aware, during each session a member of this house is permitted 15 days of absence. In 1951, therefore, I was entitled—as was every other hon. member—to absent myself from this house for 30 days; so that in actual fact, had I claimed the full privilege of being absent for 30 days, I would have been required to sit in this chamber for only 131 days. The mere recitation of these figures will indicate the inconsistency of maintaining that I drew pay for more days than there were in the year.

My constituents and the regiment know that, as is the case with a good many other members, my family and personal business affairs suffered because of the time I have spent on my parliamentary and regimental duties. However, I can assure hon. members that I have never neglected the duties and responsibilities which are mine as a member of parliament.

As hon. members know, I am not a lawyer, but I have read the statutes and discussed this matter with my friends, and I am convinced that a person can be a member of the reserve army and receive pay for the work he does without disqualifying himself as a member of the House of Commons. I also recognize that service in the reserve forces does not change the rule regarding attendance in the house except for camps and courses, and during 1951 I complied with the house rules regarding attendance. Having done so, I felt that there was nothing to prevent my service in the reserve army, whether that service occurred in Sussex, Sackville, Tracadie or Ottawa.

That 1951 was an exceptional year for the regiment is obvious from what I have said. The death of the commanding officer, and the reorganization to which I referred, combined to create difficulties additional to the ordinary responsibilities of the commanding officer of the unit. Results of that work I have briefly mentioned. That the year was exceptional is indicated by the fact that the number of days required to conduct the affairs of the regiment was reduced from 202½ in 1951 to 133½ in 1952, and I am proud to say that the regiment won all the five trophies available to it.

I have been concerned in this address simply to lay all the facts before the hon. members. In making this explanation, I have endeavoured to keep my personal feeling out of it, but I resent deeply the imputation that I am in the reserve army for what I can get out of it financially. All these charges, implied or directly stated, I deny with indignation and with clear conscience.

I have devoted every hour I could spare to my unit, both in New Brunswick and here. The unit, I feel, reflects this. This required many, many hours of work. For that work I have been paid. For nothing else but that work have I been paid.

I have acted in the sincere belief that there is no ethical, moral or legal taint to what I have done in performing my duty as a member of this house and as a member of the reserve forces.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to lay on the table two copies of the report of the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan project, and to inform the house that copies are available for immediate distribution to all members of parliament.

CURRIE REPORT

TABLING OF FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Last Tuesday, I referred to correspondence regarding the Currie report, and the correspondence I referred to was entered as an appendix to Hansard. In order to bring the house up to date I should like to table copies of a telegram from Mr. Currie to myself dated January 10, 1953; a letter from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) to myself dated January 17, 1953, reporting on the result of the investigation of the R.C.M.P.; and a letter from me to Mr. Currie dated January 17, 1953, sending him a copy of the letter of the Minister of Justice. Since the other correspondence was printed as an appendix to Hansard, perhaps it would be the wish of hon. members that this correspondence be likewise printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

QUESTIONS

URANIUM REFINERY—UNITED STATES CONSULTANTS

Mr. Hodgson:

1. Has any effort been made by any department of government to secure the services of any firm of United States consultants, in connection with the construction of a new Canadian uranium refinery?
2. If so, when?
3. Were the services of any firm secured?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Yes.

2 and 3. Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited has employed the services of several United States consulting firms from time to time over the past three years, in connection with certain phases of its refining operation. The firms consulted were: Podbielniak Incorporated; Pittsburgh Lectromelt Corporation; Catalytic Construction Company; Chemical Construction Company; M. J. Udy; Komarek Greaves Ltd.; Williams Patent Crusher and Pulverizer Company; Otto H. York.

CAMP SHILO, MAN.—WATER SOFTENING EQUIPMENT

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. What firm was awarded contract No. G39-3A-494 (G23-515-67) for the installation of water softening equipment at Camp Shilo, Manitoba?
2. What was the figure for the successful tender?
3. What other tenders were submitted?
4. Is the successful firm supplying fully automatic equipment as specified in the original contract?
5. Have tenders been called for a secondary contract in connection with the Camp Shilo water softener project?
6. If so, has any secondary contract been awarded for this project?
7. Are contracts No. G39-3A-494 and No. G23-515-67 identical?
8. If so, what were the reasons for the change in designation?

Mr. Dickey:

1. The contract was awarded by Defence Construction Limited to W. J. Westaway Company Limited, Hamilton, Ontario.

2. Amount of contract—$33,931.

3. Five other tenders were received as follows: (a) International Water Supply Limited, London, Ontario—$27,597. (Tender specifications not acceptable to the Department of National Defence); (b) Stanley Brock Limited, Winnipeg, Manitoba—$36,008; (c) Power and Mine Supply Company Ltd., Winnipeg, Manitoba—$39,995; (d) Cotter Bros. Limited, Winnipeg, Manitoba—$65,500; (e) Oshkosh Filter & Softener Canada Ltd., Brandon, Manitoba—$76,204.10.

4. Yes.

5. No.

6. Answered by No. 5.

7. Yes.

8. It is standard procedure on such contracts to assign one designation while in the inquiry stage and a different designation when purchase action is started.

RADAR STATION, ST. MARGARETS, N.B.—CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Brooks:

1. How much money has been spent, on a cost plus basis, on the construction and development of the radar station at St. Margarets, New Brunswick, from its beginning until the present time?
2. By whom was the work done, and how much was paid in each case?

Mr. Dickey:

1. $3,223,688.73, on a "cost plus fixed fee" basis.

2. Diamond Construction Company Limited, Fredericton, New Brunswick.

Construction of all buildings and utilities required, $3,233,688.73.

FIRST WAR VETERANS—PENSIONS, ETC.

Mr. White (Middlesex East):

1. How many veterans of the first world war, 1914-1918, are in receipt of disability pensions?
2. How many veterans of the first world war were under twenty-one years of age at the time of their enlistment?
3. How many of these veterans were (a) Canadian born; (b) naturalized citizens; (c) from other countries?
4. Of those veterans enlisted from other countries, how many are receiving Canadian pensions?

Mr. Mutch:

1. 62,394 veterans of the first world war, 1914-18, were in receipt of disability pensions as at December 31, 1952.

2. 134,906 veterans of the first world war were under the age of twenty-one at the time of their enlistment, according to attestation.

3. (a) 318,728 veterans of the first world war were Canadian born; (b) there is no record to show the number of veterans who were naturalized citizens; (c) 300,908 veterans of the first world war were born in countries other than Canada.

4. Of the 62,394 disability pensions in payment as at December 31, 1952 in respect of veterans of the first world war, 53,651 were payable in Canada; 5,277 were payable in the U.S.A.; and 3,466 were payable in other countries.

LETTER CARRIER SERVICE, SOUTH PEEL, ONT.

Mr. Graydon:

1. What progress has been made by the Postmaster General's department in providing letter carrier service for the citizens of Port Credit, Lakeview and other sections of South Peel?
2. When will door-to-door delivery commence?
3. What steps will be taken to ensure that every residence in each of the said areas will be provided with this service?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

1. All necessary preliminary arrangements have been made.

2. Service will be established as soon as possible after 90 per cent of the residences and business places have been equipped with suitable mail receptacles.

3. All residences falling within the scope of letter carrier delivery requirements and conforming to conditions set forth in paragraph 2 will receive delivery when service is established in the area.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD—PURCHASE OF LAND

Mr. Shaw:

1. Under what date did the soldier settlement board of Canada acquire, by purchase, certain lands situated in township 44, range 25, west of the 5th meridian?
2. From whom was the above land purchased by the soldier settlement board?
3. Were mines and minerals on the said lands acquired by the soldier settlement board at the time of the land purchase?
4. Are such mines and minerals now held in the name of any department of the federal government?
5. Has consideration been given to the transferring of the mineral rights to those veterans who purchased land in township 44, range 25, from the soldier settlement board?

He said: Mr. Speaker, since there is an error in the first part of this question, may I ask that a change be made as follows: "west of the fifth meridian" should read "west of the fourth meridian".

Mr. Mutch: Subject to that correction, I should like the question to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

STE. ANNE DU LAC WHARF—PAY CHEQUES

Mr. Courtemanche:

For a copy of the original pay cheques in connection with construction or repair work to the wharf at Ste. Anne du Lac, county of Labelle, between June, 1949, and November, 1952.

STE. ANNE DU LAC WHARF—PAYROLLS AND STATEMENT OF MATERIALS

Mr. Courtemanche:

For a copy of the payrolls and a statement of materials purchased for the work done to the wharf at Ste. Anne du Lac, county of Labelle, from June, 1949, to November, 1952.

OIL—EXPLORATION AND PRODUCTION, NORMAN WELLS

Mr. Wright:

For a copy of agreements entered into by the government of Canada and the Imperial Oil Company regarding exploration for oil or unit operation and production of oil in the vicinity of Norman Wells.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT

PROPOSAL TO INCREASE AMOUNTS PAID TO COMPENSATE FOR INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of introducing legislation increasing the amounts paid under the Family Allowances Act to the extent necessary to compensate for the increase in the cost of living since the said act was first enacted.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure this afternoon again to have an opportunity to move a resolution similar to the one I moved at the last session of parliament, asking that family allowances be increased to an extent necessary to compensate for the increase in the cost of living since August 1944, when the Family Allowances Act was first passed.

I believe it is in the interest of Canada both at this time and in future years to see increased family allowances, and in this way help to provide better food, better clothing, better educational opportunities and better medical care for growing Canadian children.

I would hope that in the discussion of this resolution the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) will not do as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) did a week ago in discussing a resolution offered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) wherein the hon. member asked that all medical expenses be allowed as a deduction from income tax, upon which occasion the Minister of Finance adjourned the debate, thus providing the guillotine, so far as the discussion of that resolution was concerned.

I hope we have a fair discussion of the resolution now before the house. I hope, too, that members supporting the government will allow a vote to be taken, and will not talk the resolution out, so that by having a vote we may test the opinion of the people's elected representatives on this important matter.

The Family Allowances Act was passed in August 1944, and went into effect on July 1, 1945. During the last year family allowances were paid on behalf of 4,500,000 Canadian children, and to almost two million families. Payments for the year ended March 31, 1952, amounted to $320 million. I believe those payments have resulted in some improvement in nutritional standards, in better clothing, and in better educational and medical care and facilities for Canadian children.

An increase in the family allowance at this time is an investment in the future. It will mean that our children, who reach manhood and womanhood in better health, will have the opportunity of receiving better education. It will mean that when they take their places as adults in our national life they will make a greater contribution to the production of our country because of their improved health standards and better educational qualifications. This increase in our national production will bring with it an improvement in our standard of living.

When introducing the measure in 1944, the late Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, the then prime minister, pointed out that of the persons presenting themselves for enlistment in the armed services, 39·3 per cent were rejected for medical reasons. He went on to point out that if a family allowances act had been in effect in previous years it was his belief that the rate of rejection would not have been as high.

Not only will an increase in family allowances contribute to a greater production of wealth in Canada in years to come, but if this country in the future is again called upon to face a national emergency such as we had between 1939 and 1945, I believe our young citizens would be better able to come to the defence of our way of life.

When I introduced the resolution a year ago the Minister of National Health and Welfare said that perhaps I had missed a more important point, that I should have been advocating that the age limit be increased from 16 to 18 years. All I say to the minister on that point is that if the government thinks that is a better way to improve family allowances, than by increasing by some 60 per cent the basic rates, as I now advocate, I shall be perfectly happy to accept such an amendment, and shall agree that such action would constitute a reasonable improvement in family allowances for the time being.

I do feel however it is not right or fair for any government in any year to pass a social security measure and then, in years following, by permitting a condition of inflation to prevail, take away a large part of the social security effected by the measure.

The increase in the cost of living has reduced by at least 40 per cent the effectiveness of amounts received for family allowances since August, 1944. If we are to restore to the family allowance cheque the 1945 value, then the present dollar value of those cheques needs to be increased by 60 per cent. This would increase minimum payments from $5 to $8 per child per month, and maximum payments from $8 to $13 per child per month.

The cost of living index in August, 1944, was 118·9, while in November 1952 it had risen to 184·8, or an increase in that period of time of more than 55 per cent. If one looks at the main items on which family allowance payments are spent one finds that while the clothing index was 121·5 in August, 1944, in November of last year it stood at 205·5, or an increase of 69 per cent. In that same period of time the food index increased from 131·5 to 229, or an increase of 74 per cent.

I say that in view of these increases of 69 and 74 per cent on clothing and food, respectively, the suggestion I make that family allowance payments should now be increased to the extent of 60 per cent is a modest one, and something the government should implement immediately.

If one looks over some of the important food items he will find that the increase in cost is considerably greater than the general cost of living increase. For example, we realize that milk is the most important single item of diet in the life of every child, and we find that the price of milk has increased from 10·4 cents a quart in January 1944 to 21·1 cents in October 1952. This increase was brought about mainly by general inflation, and a general increase in the cost of production and distribution. But, in part, the increase was brought about by the fact that the government removed the subsidy that at one time it paid on milk.

The price of stewing beef, one of the cheaper cuts of meat, increased from 22·7 cents per pound in January of 1944 to 59·5 cents in October, 1952. Meat is a high protein food which is one of the essentials in the diet of children. I am sure that any medical man will tell you that it is necessary to good health. As I have pointed out, the cost of stewing beef increased by some 150 per cent.

The general effect of the increase in the cost of living has been a decrease in the consumption of milk. In 1946 the consumption of milk in Canada was some 60 million hundredweight; the consumption of milk in 1951 had decreased to 58,650,000 hundredweight, or approximately 2 per cent. From 1941 to 1951 the population of Canada increased 18·6 per cent. In other words, in the period from 1944 to 1952, although the consumption of milk was going down, on the other hand our population was increasing rapidly. From the figures that I have already given I estimate that from 1944 to 1952 the per capita consumption of milk in Canada went down 10 per cent.

I think part of the reason for the reduction in the consumption of milk can be attributed to the fact that the family allowance cheque was steadily losing its purchasing power. There is no one in this house who can say that Canada cannot produce all the milk that our people can consume if they have the finances with which to purchase it. As a matter of fact the dairy industry is looking today for increased markets. That industry in the face of a United States embargo on cheese and other milk products is finding it most difficult to continue efficient production. I believe that an increase in family allowances at this time would be followed by an increase in the consumption of milk and that in turn would react to the benefit of our dairy industry. The same could be said in relation to our poultry industry and in relation to our textile industry.

We have lost our overseas markets for many agricultural products. Because of inflation, because of the decrease in the purchasing power of the family allowance cheques, the mothers of Canada are finding considerable difficulty in maintaining purchases of the very commodities that are in surplus supply in this country. I advocate an increase in family allowances at this time because I think it is essential to the welfare of our children.

As I have stated, another argument that might be used in favour of an increase in family allowances is that it would provide a greater home market for our poultry, dairy and textile industries at a time when they are losing many of their former markets. The present family allowance cheque is pretty small. Five dollars per month will not buy many quarts of milk. Five dollars per month will not contribute very much toward the cost of providing for a new child coming into the home. During the debate last year I quoted an article from Life magazine which stated that in New York city it cost approximately $400 to provide all the things necessary for the well-being of a newly-born child. The article went on to state that the various items of equipment, the utensils and clothing necessary, might be purchased for as low as $275, but that was considered to be the rock bottom price. It would take a great many family allowance cheques to pay the cost of the things necessary to provide for the care of a newly-born child even at that lower price.

Speaking in this debate last year the Minister of National Health and Welfare pointed out that we have a large defence program. It is true that we have a large defence program, but each year, even with our defence program, the real production of Canada keeps going up. The defence program is not going to continually take up that increase in real production. In recent weeks the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has stated that in his opinion the danger of war is decreasing. I believe the Prime Minister is right. I look for at least a levelling off—if not a decrease—in our defence expenditures.

While our defence expenditures may level off or decrease, I hope for a continued increase in the real production of wealth in this country. In recent years our wealth has been increasing at the rate of between 4 and 5 per cent annually. That annual increase of between 4 and 5 per cent in our gross national production is sufficient to cover all our social security payments including family allowances, old age and blind pensions and those made under other measures.

So we now have an opportunity to provide an increase in family allowances, partially because our defence program is likely to level off before too many months go by and because the real production of wealth in Canada is likely to continue to increase. Even if that were not so I would still advocate an increase in family allowances. In advocating an increase in family allowances I would point out that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair), formerly parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, in a well-delivered speech in this house before Christmas argued that social security payments were transfer payments, that they were not for the provision of materials and labour for the use of the government. In other words, an increase in family allowances does not increase the burden upon the Canadian people; an increase in family allowances merely transfers purchasing power from the more well-to-do to those less well-to-do, in this instance to Canadian parents.

I say that there is a glaring need at the present time for a redistribution of purchasing power. I was amazed to read a publication put out by the dominion bureau of statistics based on the census of 1951 and entitled "Labour Force Wage Earners". That publication showed that in 1951 there were in Canada a total of 4,085,000 wage earners. Of that number some 2,088,000 or 53 per cent received less than $2,000 a year. In my opinion an annual earning of less than $2,000 a year by a married man with two or three children is insufficient to properly clothe, to properly feed and to properly educate his children.

The same publication shows that, in 1951, of that total number of 4,085,000 wage earners, approximately 1,500,000 or 37 per cent earned less than $1,500 per year.

Going on, this official publication shows that of the four million wage earners approximately 900,000 or 22 per cent earn less than $1,000 a year. Let us take the million and a half wage earners in Canada who in 1951 earned less than $1,500 a year. Does the Minister of National Health and Welfare contend that the present family allowance cheque is sufficient to help adequately heads of families who earn less than $1,500 a year to clothe and feed their growing children. It is nearly impossible for those parents in that 37 per cent of working Canadians to feed and clothe their children adequately. I know that even the increase I suggest would not guarantee proper food and clothing for all children for whom family allowances are paid, but it would be a substantial contribution to that end.

Over the years that family allowances have been paid I feel that the mothers of Canada have spent the money as it was meant to be spent, for the betterment of their children. I think that is borne out by the fact that, according to the last annual report, since May, 1947, only 136 prosecutions were successfully completed. When one bears in mind that there are some two million families receiving the family allowance, I think it is clear that almost without exception the family allowance cheque is used for the purposes for which it was intended. Therefore if it is used for the purposes for which it was intended and if, as is correct, a million and a half wage earners in Canada earned less than $1,500 in 1951, surely it is time for the government to give sympathetic consideration to increasing the family allowance, and I suggest to the minister and the government that legislation should be introduced at this session of parliament to increase the family allowance by not less than 60 per cent.

The question needs to be answered as to whether Canada can afford such an increase. I believe we can. I admit it is a considerable amount of money but I believe it can be paid, as I have said, out of our increased wealth production. I estimate that a 60 per cent increase in the family allowance would cost $192 million. Our gross national product for the year ended March 31, 1952—

Mr. Martin: Will the hon. member permit a question? The figure of $192 million was for what?

Mr. Argue: I am sorry, I did not hear the minister.

Mr. Martin: I should like to ask my friend whether, when he quoted a figure of $192 million, it had relation to what the increased expenditure resulting from this proposal would be.

Mr. Argue: Yes. That is my estimate based on the cost for the year ended March 31, 1952, which was listed in the annual report as $320 million. The minister may have some figures that are more up to date, but I do not think the estimate would be far out in any event.

Mr. Gibson: Barnyard economics.

Mr. Argue: What kind do you follow, rule of thumb?

Mr. Gibson: Just the opposite to yours.

Mr. Argue: I wonder what the hon. member would say about the motion. I hope he is not suggesting that he opposes it.

Mr. Gibson: I think so.

Mr. Argue: I estimate that an increase of 60 per cent in the family allowance would cost the national treasury an additional $192 million in any one year. Our gross national production for the year ended March 31, 1952, was some $21·2 billion. The 60 per cent increase in the family allowance that I am advocating represents less than 1 per cent of the gross national production. Let us take a look at what has been happening to the share of the gross national production that is being used for family allowances. In the fiscal year 1946-47 $245 million was spent on family allowances. Our national wealth production in that year was some $12 billion. In other words, 2 per cent was paid out of our production in 1946-47 for the purpose of family allowances.

For the year ended March 31, 1952, the amount paid for family allowances had increased to $320 million but our national production had increased to $21·2 billion, and family allowances in 1951-52 represented only 1½ per cent of our national production compared with 2 per cent in 1946-47. The suggestion I make is that the percentage of our national production that is used to provide family allowance payments should not be allowed to decrease, and most certainly not to the extent of 25 per cent over a five-year period. Instead of the government marching forward with improved social security measures, it has allowed our social security program, so far as family allowances are concerned, to go backward rather than forward.

As I have already said, the Minister of Fisheries put the payment of family allowances in proper perspective when he said it was not taxation on materials and labour for use by the government but was a transfer payment. It was taking certain moneys from well-to-do Canadians and helping to redistribute and reallocate our purchasing power so that mothers, especially those in the lower income groups, might be better able to provide for their families. Such a redistribution in purchasing power might mean for a few people a reduced number of trips to Bermuda, Florida and California. Perhaps they could make one trip fewer in a lifetime without any serious result. A redistribution in purchasing power might mean fewer mink coats but it would mean more children's snowsuits. It might mean fewer Cadillacs driven in Canada but it would mean that mothers would be better able to afford baby carriages and children's go-carts. A redistribution of purchasing power so as to bring about an increase in family allowances might result in the use of less champagne but more milk.

In my opinion such a redistribution in purchasing power for the benefit of Canadian children is long overdue. I recommend this resolution to the house for serious consideration. I believe that in our democracy we dare not allow our social security measures to stand still. Democracy is on trial throughout the world, and if we are to prove to our Canadian citizens and to the world at large that democracy is the best type of political system anywhere in the world, as we all believe it to be, then it is essential that year after year we add to and improve our social security measures.

I do not expect that I shall live to see the day when, in my opinion, social security measures are adequate. It is something you must work at year in and year out. I believe the year 1953 is the time when this government should bring before parliament legislation which would provide an increase, as I have said, of at least 60 per cent in family allowances. It would not increase the real purchasing power above that prevailing in 1944, but would merely restore to the family allowances cheque the purchasing power that was represented by such an amount when the act was first enacted in 1944. If we do that, as I hope we shall, then the time may not be too far distant when there should be an increase in the real purchasing power of the family allowances cheque. I feel this legislation has proven to be of value, and that an improvement in the legislation by way of increasing the purchasing power of the family allowances cheque will result in our Canadian children being better fed, better clothed, better educated, and will give them an opportunity of more adequate medical services.

I believe that such a program is an investment in Canada's future. It will not cost anything in the way of reduced production of the nation but is, in fact, merely a transfer of purchasing power from the well-to-do to those who need it most, namely, the mothers of families in the low wage group, particularly the group to which I have referred, the 37 per cent of all wage earners in Canada who in 1951 earned less than $1,500.

Mr. F. H. Larson (Kindersley): I could not take very serious issue with the hon. member when he feels that family allowances should be continued and increased as we can pay for them. He has made an impassioned appeal to many classes in this country, including labour, the textile industry and the dairy industry. There is only one particular class to whom he did not make a very serious appeal, and that is the taxpayer. It is not the man who drives the Cadillac or the lady who wears the mink coat who pays the largest amount of taxes in this country, but the ordinary person like the hon. member and myself. We pay indirect taxes on practically everything we use. Most of the revenue of this country comes from that source.

Another matter I should like to discuss is the fact that the family allowances were never expected to cure all the economic ills of this country. In other words, people were raising families in this country long before family allowances were conceived, and the head of the family was expected to provide what the family needed. Children were born, grew up and were educated, and the head of the family provided for their education and their maintenance.

Several years ago the former leader of the Liberal party in Canada, who was prime minister at the time, felt that our greatest investment should be in the future, in the children of the country who would grow up to be the men and women who would govern the nation and produce what the country required. I understand that when he mentioned family allowances to his cabinet they were an unheard-of thing. The cabinet did not know what he was talking about, and did not believe that that was the part of government at all, to give money to parents for any purpose without its being earned. Finally, he impressed on the people of this country that they had a duty to the children and future of the nation, just as much as they had a duty to grant a pension to the people of the country who had passed their ability to earn. The idea of giving money to young families was an unheard-of thing. The subject was not brought up on the floor of the house or any other place except there. It was an idea that originated right in that place.

As a result the Liberal party, which was in power at the time, passed the family allowances bill, so that the people of this country now have something that very few countries in the world have. The money that is paying for this measure is coming out of the taxpayers. We are a step in advance of practically every country in this world by reason of this legislation. Like the hon. member, I feel that all this social legislation should be advanced just as quickly as it is possible to advance it. I feel also, and very strongly, that there are countries in the world that have gone overboard for social legislation. They have brought themselves into a position where they are financially embarrassed by the amount of money they are paying out in social legislation. We must remember that if the economy of this country is working at top speed, it can produce jobs which enable the heads of families to make money to raise their children.

I recall that during the thirties young people were going together for years and years, but were unable to get married and raise families because they could not get jobs that would pay enough to allow them to do so. Today we find that young people going together can afford to get married while they are young because we have a sound economy which will allow them to get jobs, to go into farming or industry, and thus set up homes. Let us consider a country which would be loaded down by taxes in order to pay for excessive social services. Practically everything that was produced would go to the government, and the government would dole out these various social services like family allowances, medical services and the others. We would find that the economy of the country would become tighter because people could not earn the money they needed.

I feel that family allowances are very important, and I feel that as soon as we can collect enough money from the taxpayers to increase those allowances we should do so. But I believe that our one great aim should be to see that everyone in this country has an opportunity to get a job that will pay enough money to keep a family. Then our family allowances program, as it goes forward, could supplement the income that the father earned. As I say, I am not greatly opposed to the measure the hon. member has brought forward. I am in favour of family allowances, because I certainly support wholeheartedly the government that conceived them, introduced them and is paying them now. As soon as it is felt that we can afford to increase those allowances, then I shall be in favour of that.

One thing we must remember is that we cannot burden the country by these transfer payments as they are called, to the point where a person who is trying to get ahead and expand his business finds himself under a load of taxes which will not allow him to do that. For that reason I feel we should go carefully. Once again I want to say that I am not opposed to the proposal, but at the moment I feel that we have gone about as far as we can in that particular direction. I believe that our biggest job is to provide the young parent with a good job at an adequate income, and do the other things necessary to keep our economy sound. Whatever we can do, in addition, to give increased family allowances, I feel we should do.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I am going to take about two minutes to speak in support of the motion. The family allowance was introduced to fill a gap in the earning power of many of the family wage earners in this country. At the present time it is insufficient to fill that gap and to serve the purpose for which it was designed. I believe, however, that there are one or two other considerations which the government should take into account at the present time. The first is that, in my opinion, a larger income tax exemption should be allowed for those who are receiving the family allowance. At the present time the exemption is pretty much of a joke. But more important than that point is this one. Before any increase is given, I believe that consideration should first be given to the extension of the age limit beyond 16 for those children who are carrying on with their education. In many cases, among the lower income families, we find that the children have to quit school after 16. As a result of that fact their productive capacity in later life is restricted.

As I say, we agree that the family allowance is inadequate at the present time and we should like to see an increase in it. But at the same time I think that consideration should first be given to those children over the age of 16 who wish to continue their education. What the age limit would be is something I would leave to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). But in many cases the children are forced to quit school immediately upon reaching the age of 16 because the family income just does not allow them to go on.

As for the hon. member who has just taken his seat, and his saying that it was something unheard of when the federal government proposed this particular piece of legislation, I am not going to say too much except that it is an application of the dividend that has been advocated by the Social Credit members of this house since 1935. It does not go as far as we should like to see it go. The money does not come from the same place that we should like to see it come from. Nevertheless, we dislike the idea of the government's getting the credit for adopting something that we have been advocating for years.

Mr. A. F. Macdonald (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I would have had little to say on this resolution had it not been for the contribution of the sponsor of it and that of the hon. member who has just spoken, namely, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Thomas). Some months ago, being intensely interested in the over-all picture of social security, particularly as it applied in the province of Alberta, I took the time to examine and to inquire with regard to family allowances and other social security measures such as health care and pensions for the aged. I learned that every month there flows into the province of Alberta an amount of $1,800,000. This amount goes into 140 thousand homes and provides a better opportunity for more than 300,000 children in that province. We all know that this means that the mothers and fathers in the province of Alberta have each year $21 million extra to spend on the care of their children. All of this $21 million is paid out of the federal treasury. It is paid entirely by the dominion government.

Mr. Johnston: Where do they get the money from?

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): It can only come out of the pockets of the taxpayers; it can come only out of the taxpayers who work hard to put it into their pockets.

Mr. Johnston: It comes out of the people of Alberta in taxes. Why does the hon. member not say it plainly?

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): Because of these allowances, the children are able to get better food than they ever before had, and certainly more than they received eight years previously, before this good social measure was adopted. They are able to get better medical, dental and optical care than they ever before received. In every part of Alberta, as in every part of Canada, because of the allowances there has been a great improvement in school attendance. In fact, someone has said that family allowances are Canada's best truant officer. Because of family allowances, thousands of our children are now able to get the equipment they need in order to take part in sports and other recreational and cultural activities. These opportunities were not always open to them before the introduction of family allowances. By helping to relieve the fear of want that presses on every home where family incomes fall short of family needs, family allowances have given new hope and new faith in the future to a great many thousands of the parents of these 300,000 children who were recipients of family allowances in Alberta last year.

I have heard some suggest that the introduction of family allowances was a dangerous thing. Those people had little faith in the integrity and the sense of responsibility of the mothers and the fathers of this nation. After eight years' experience with this program we all know that the federal government's trust in the parents of this country was well placed. Experience has clearly shown that, in every part of the country, the allowances are being spent wisely and well to provide better food, clothing, health care and education for our nation's future citizens.

However, in the discussion of family allowances I believe that we are being insular when we think that it is the one form of social security to which the people expect us to give particular consideration. Family allowances are good, but there are other matters that we must consider. In 1951 the federal government enacted a vast new program of old age security. That program, in the generosity of its provisions and in the breadth of its coverage, is unequalled anywhere else in the world. Under our federal old age security program no less than 37,250 —and I am speaking of Alberta citizens only —receive more than $1,500,000 every month, which is paid entirely—every last cent of it—by the federal government, and without a means test of any kind.

Mr. Johnston: Out of the taxes of Alberta.

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): Federal expenditures on old age security alone in Alberta amount to something more than $18 million a year, and this is in addition to the federal share of the old age assistance payments to those in need between the ages of 65 and 69. Through this self-respecting pay-as-you-go pension program the federal government has extended responsibility for the care of our senior citizens beyond the family circle, to take in the community and the whole nation. This program finds its purpose in the neighbourly instincts of an entire people and its fulfilment in their unselfish resolve to provide a better, more secure life for those who have grown old.

Every one of us can take pride in the fact that Canada is the first nation to pay a full scale universal old age pension without a means test. In looking at this whole picture of social security, of which a very important part is family allowances, may I say that family allowances and old age pensions help provide for the needs of the young and the old. But we have something else in addition in this nation, partly promoted by the federal administration, namely, our national health program.

Mr. Johnston: Where is that?

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): That provides for better health care for everyone in Canada. Since the hon. member who has just interrupted me comes from Alberta—

Mr. Johnston: I did not say "what is it?" I said "where is it?"

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): —I welcome his interruptions, and probably for his enlightenment I should tell him what the national health program means to the province of which he represents an important constituency in this chamber. Under the national health program, Mr. Speaker, more than $3½ million was available to the province of Alberta last year to help provincial authorities increase our hospital accommodation and improve our general health services. This program of national health grants, established a little over four years ago, is without question the greatest single event in the health history of this country. Since the program began, more than $11 million has been made available to improve health standards throughout Alberta.

Federal grants have been used for a thorough survey of the provinces' met and unmet health needs. The report of the health survey committee contains important recommendations regarding hospitals, nursing services, dental services, public health services, the care of crippled children, cancer control, mental illness, the control of tuberculosis, and many other matters vitally affecting the health of the people of the province of Alberta. Other federal health grants will be used to help implement these recommendations.

Moreover, I should like to tell the hon. member who interrupted me that for hospital construction alone in the province of Alberta more than $2 million in federal grants have been given to thirty-five individual hospital construction projects to help provide more than 2,000 additional hospital beds. Through the federal grants, additional training has been given to 400 physicians, nurses, social workers, psychiatrists and other health workers throughout Alberta. Grants have also been used to help establish Alberta's nursing aides school in Calgary where more than 700 nursing aides have already received training.

Substantial numbers of trained health personnel have been employed with the aid of federal funds to keep health services united throughout the province of Alberta. Other grants have been used to establish and operate new health units. In Calgary and Edmonton, federal grants have been used for the purchase of equipment and for the establishment of cerebral palsy clinics, well-baby clinics, and the development of immunization programs.

I would not have gone into this and other matters in such detail if the question had not been asked by the hon. member for Bow River as to what the federal government were doing with the money that they were collecting in taxes from Alberta. I say that through these and other responsible social measures, administered by the Department of National Health and Welfare and other federal agencies, effective steps are being taken to safeguard the health and welfare of the citizens of Alberta and of all Canada. I know that everyone will agree with me that each of these measures has been developed to meet a real need, but always within our capacity to afford.

Family allowances, old age pensions and the national health program are good in themselves, and I support them; but there is one thing that we should never forget, that our responsibilities as members elected from the constituencies are to give the kind of leadership that our constituents require from members attending sittings in this chamber. We should never forget that this social security program is built upon our system of free enterprise. The success of every social measure depends on the encouragement given to individual initiative because, in the long run, it is the hard work of the Canadian people, of whom I am one, that makes these measures for social security possible.

Just this week I had the opportunity and the privilege of being present when representations were made by representatives of the sightless people of Canada. They too have a problem that must be reviewed; they too have something that the minister, I hope, will give every consideration to and resolve in the way in which they wish it resolved. I have told the minister that, if he resolves it in the way they suggest, it will have my blessing as one member of this house.

Mr. Johnston: That ought to help a lot.

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): The hon. member will have an opportunity to make his own speech.

This proposed resolution to increase family allowance payments by $192 million is something that takes more than just a moment's consideration on my part. We have a fine system of social security in this country. In addition to having the basis of the family allowances established as it was eight years ago at the amounts that are now payable, we have made it possible for the largest working force in Canada's history to be employed and earning fair wages, good wages compared with those paid a few years ago. There is room for improvement in the wages that are being paid to the people who are working; but the hon. member for Bow River well knows that in the province of Alberta we have never enjoyed such prosperity as has been brought to the citizens of that province by the manner in which the affairs of this country have been conducted by the federal administration.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Did they put the oil there?

Mr. Ferrie: No, but they sold the wheat, and wheat has got more to do with it than the oil.

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): I hope that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) will use his usual good judgment. He is in his seat, and listening attentively to the remarks of hon. members on this resolution. I would ask him to make sure that it is within our ability at the present time to pay another $192 million a year to increase by 60 per cent the family allowance figure set out by the hon. member who proposed the resolution.

This is one form of social security I wish to see retained on the statute books; and if it is ever going to be increased I want it to be increased to an amount we can sustain for all time to come.

I would hope that when the minister speaks he would take into consideration the amount of money involved, and that he would consider the resolution and, in the light of the amount of money available from the taxpayers of this country, consider the possibility of supporting an increase in this form of social legislation.

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity provided by the resolution to speak briefly on one aspect of the family allowances question which is of particular concern to me. Before doing that however may I say that I most certainly welcome anything which would place more money at the disposal of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) to be spent for the benefit of the people of Canada. I feel confident he would enjoy spending it for that purpose, and that he would spend it wisely. What I do not know, however, is whether, if he had an additional $192 million at his disposal at the moment, he would decide that this particular method of spending it is the best one, or whether there may be other even more pressing social problems now facing us.

The aspect of the problem with which I am more particularly concerned and of which I am more appreciative is the payment of family allowances to our native Indian population. I feel sure that interest in the mental, physical and moral welfare of our Indian population is not confined to any one political party, and in these observations I am not trying to play politics. Indeed, I would give due credit to hon. members on the opposite side of the house, just as I would to those on this side who have shown clearly that, irrespective of political affiliations, they have the interests of the Indians at heart.

I believe there is no hon. member who speaks as the official spokesman for the Indian population, and there are only a few of us who represent ridings in which the Indians are a major factor. In my constituency they form a large percentage of the population. I have had some opportunity to see how family allowance cheques have influenced and affected the lives of the Indians.

The annual report of the Department of National Health and Welfare for the year ended March 31, 1951, states that there were 57,587 Indian children in 20,014 families receiving allowances as of December 31, 1950. I regret to say that in the departmental report for the following year there is no comparable statistical figure; the actual figures for the Indians have not been set out. May I suggest incidentally to the minister that in next year's report those figures should be included.

I have no doubt however that the figures, if they were shown, would indicate an increase comparable with or greater than the proportion of increase among the rest of the population in Canada. At page 93 of the departmental report which I have indicated I find this:

> It is the opinion of the Indian affairs branch that family allowances have been a very important factor in the continued improvement noted in school attendance and enrolment records. Reports from the Indian affairs field staff continue to indicate that the payment of family allowances is making a substantial contribution to the better health of Indian children generally.

There is no doubt whatever that, even in districts as far away from centres of civilization as that which I represent, there has been a very general improvement in conditions among the Indians. God knows, and I trust the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) will note, that there is still ample room for improvement. At the same time we are gradually improving the lot of those people whom, for many years, we failed to help to any great extent. During the last fifteen or twenty years, I believe, we have developed a social conscience which has extended to our Indians as well as to our other countrymen.

I do not know to what extent the improvement among the Indians is due to family allowances, but there can be no doubt that they are a contributing factor. There are of course other contributing factors this government has brought into operation, and there are other things for which perhaps the government cannot take a great deal of credit.

After all, there has been an extension of civilization westward and northward. As I said before, there has been a development of our social conscience, apparent not only among politicians but among others as well.

Coming to the resolution, I would point out that there is a point which may or may not be profitable or advantageous at election time, but which in my view should now be emphasized by someone. In Canada the prime responsibility for the children still rests with the parents. If we should reach a stage when the first responsibility for bringing up children passes from the parents to the state, we will have come dangerously close to the moral, or immoral, system adopted in Russia.

At the same time it is only right that we should consider the basic reasons for the inauguration of family allowances. Put briefly, as I understand it, the situation is this: A single man may work side by side with a married man who has three children. They may be doing exactly the same kind of work and, under our industrial system, both will draw the same pay. Yet one has far greater responsibilities than the other.

So in our governmental system we have endeavoured to assist in equalizing the burden.

The family allowance cheque is not the only assistance given. A far greater assistance, proportionately, is given by income tax deduction allowances for children. There are other and less important forms of assistance, such as medical deductions permitted in respect of members of a family. At the same time I think we are in danger of overlooking what I consider a basic and important fact, that family allowances were not introduced for the purpose of having the state bring up or assume the responsibility for feeding and clothing our children; they were brought in, as was the dependents' deduction for income tax purposes, in order to bring about a levelling of burdens and responsibilities.

In so far as the actual proposition put forward in the resolution is concerned, I suppose it is a tying of the family allowances to the cost of living. The resolution does not say so in so many words and I do not want to distort the resolution, but it reads in part:

> —increasing the amounts paid under the Family Allowances Act to the extent necessary to compensate for the increase in the cost of living . . .

To all intents and purposes I think that is tying the family allowance cheque to the cost of living. Should a catastrophe occur and a depression of major proportion engulf us, and as a result the cost of living be reduced to one-half of what it is now, I assume the hon. member would not be able to object to reducing family allowances to the same extent.

I would be strongly against a fluctuating family allowance cheque, one which would go up a few cents, down a dollar, up a few cents and down a few cents as the cost of living varied. I speak of this with knowledge as I have discussed it with heads of families. They tell me that they are able to budget better with a fixed dollar income than they would be with a fluctuating cheque, even though prices might vary. I do not know why that should be. Perhaps it indicates one of the shortcomings of human nature, but I am told that a steady income is easier to spend in advance, to budget, than is a fluctuating cheque which might always be a little behind the variations in prices.

There is another aspect of this matter which I think the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has inadvertently overlooked. No one can argue that there has not been a tremendous increase in the cost of living, but that has been accompanied by an increase in prosperity, that is, by an increase in the funds in the hands of our people. The higher cost of living is, at least to some extent, the result of wages being higher, of the prices paid for the produce of primary producers being higher than they were at the time the act was first brought in. Parents have more money; they have more dollars today than they had when the cost of living was 100. That may not be the whole answer to the problem which the hon. member is trying to solve, but I think it must be taken into consideration as being quite a factor.

The example I am about to give is taken out of thin air and may not be entirely tied to facts. Let us assume that the cost of living is up 100 per cent and at the same time that the income in dollars of a family is up 75 per cent. You cannot maintain exactly the balance that you had at the base period by raising the family allowance to take care of the cost of living index unless at the same time you make some allowance for the income increase. I do not know how that formula can be worked out, but I do say that the assumption that people earn no more in current dollars than they did in 1939 dollars while the cost of living has gone up by approximately 100 per cent is surely not correct.

In his speech, more than in his resolution, I regret to say that the hon. member for Assiniboia gave me the impression he was rather pounding upon what I am afraid has been the theme of his party for recent years, that is—give, give, give. They have advocated, doubtless at times quite justifiably, increased family allowances, increased old age pensions, disablement pensions, health insurance, relief for the needy and so on and so on. I favour them all; we all do. But unfortunately the same opposition—it is all opposition—which day after day hounds us on this side to approve resolutions advocating the expenditure of millions of dollars are continuing to needle, perhaps not me but the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and others to reduce the tax burden.

I do not think anyone wants to take a hard and fast line and say that nothing can be increased or that no tax can be reduced, but, my goodness, we have to use some judgment. We have to decide what are the important things that we want to increase before we can decide what there is going to be in the way of reductions. I think it was the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Thomas) who stated that greater assistance can be given to the heads of families by increasing the income tax deductions for children than by a 60 per cent increase in family allowances.

Unfortunately the situation is that if we are going to carry out all the requests which have been made by my hon. friends of the C.C.F. we will eventually land in one position only: the government will take the whole of the pay cheque in taxes and then undertake to feed, clothe and shelter the people of Canada. I do not think that we want that. I have pointed out that danger and we are getting closer to it all the time.

That does not mean for one minute that anybody on this side is suggesting that we have not a continuing duty to correct inequalities which involve hardship for certain classifications of our people. Sometimes the groups upon which these hardships are inflicted are fairly small in number and not very vocal. We must not overlook that there may be some of them who are far less in number than are the heads of families. I should think that to ensure that those inequalities and hardships are removed is a more pressing problem at the moment, with the Canadian economy as it is, than to increase family allowances.

So far as an increase in family allowances is concerned, I feel that, as long as we have the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), as soon as an increase in family allowances is feasible and desirable, we will get it.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on this resolution. I had no intention whatever of saying anything but some remarks that have been made make it necessary for me to say a word or two on this occasion. The hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald) went out of his way to make certain remarks to which I want to refer.

An hon. Member: Facts.

Mr. Johnston: For the most part he read from a prepared speech, although he said that he would not have spoken if it had not been for certain references made by the hon. member who moved the motion and the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Thomas).

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Johnston: The greater proportion of his speech was prepared, and outside of a few interjections—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): I should like to make it clear that I was not reading from a prepared speech. I spoke extemporaneously from a wide knowledge of the question of social security that I gained from a particular study I made recently of the provisions—

Mr. Johnston: What is the privilege?

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): —of the federal health program and other social security measures as they pertain to the province of Alberta. I would not have spoken at some length upon this matter if it had not been for a question by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston), who is now speaking.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, I suppose because there is likelihood of an election in the offing that my hon. friend was a little more persuaded to make the speech he did. That thought particularly runs in my mind, having listened to the way he praised the federal government for all the money they were spending not only in other parts of Canada but in Alberta. Of course the hon. member is going to be re-elected in Alberta, he hopes.

An hon. Member: Sure he will.

Mr. Johnston: I could not help but be impressed that the whole emphasis of his speech was on the amount of money that the federal government had spent in Alberta and how little the provincial government had spent. As a matter of fact the hon. member should have gone on to point out that the federal government has not spent any money in Alberta other than that which they got from the province, and they got much more than they gave back in the form of services. I was amazed at the hon. member for Edmonton East when he said that we really could not afford at this time to provide another $192 million for family allowances for the needy people of Canada. I think that is the amount he stated would be involved in this increase. For the last two or three weeks, Mr. Speaker, the house has been discussing thefts in the armed forces which probably amount to a great deal more than that and yet members on the government side have said: Oh well, you have got to expect such thefts. What is a few million dollars here and there when the thefts are by members of the armed forces including those of higher ranks or, indeed, by people in other positions? Yet we cannot afford $192 million for people who are in dire need of assistance. My, we must be a poverty-stricken nation if $192 million will bankrupt us.

The hon. member spoke about $1½ million being given to Alberta for family allowances alone. That may be true. I have not got the figures with me. I do not have a prepared speech before me as did the hon. member. It must not be forgotten, however, that the 1½ million was taken from the province of Alberta by the federal government in the form of taxes before they gave back this paltry amount. As the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) says, they are giving back somebody else's money. Nobody is trying to belittle what the federal government has done toward inaugurating a national health plan, but there again let me remind hon. members that it was a Liberal government that promised in 1919 to do something about a national health plan, and that after all these years we would not have got to the place where we are now if it had not been for constant prodding by the members of the opposition.

I do not hesitate for a moment to give the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) all the credit that is due him for providing such assistance to the people of Canada in the form of health services as he has made available. I do not say this to flatter him—I do not often flatter anybody on that side of the house—but I think he would have gone much further if he had been permitted to do so. The hon. member for Edmonton East spoke about $2 million being provided for hospitals in Alberta under the national health plan. I suppose the figure of $2 million is correct, but that only goes to show how much the province of Alberta has done on its own, and that province is only one out of ten. When the federal government gave $2 million for hospitalization that was also the amount that the province of Alberta put up because it was on a fifty-fifty basis.

I am glad that the hon. member for Edmonton East used the province of Alberta for purposes of comparison because it stands far ahead of any other province in the Dominion of Canada so far as health services are concerned, and Saskatchewan of course follows along closely behind. Alberta has taken the lead in the field of health services, so it is no wonder that the hon. member for Edmonton East can boast of what the province has done for the health of its people. It has not only done that but it has paved the way for all the rest of Canada. You know, Mr. Speaker, it is a peculiar thing to me when I hear some members on the government side get up and make excuses as to why we cannot increase the family allowance. They point out that the federal government is giving old age pensions of $40 a month without a means test. I would not be too proud of that. The other day I was speaking to old age pensioners in Calgary and they were asking for increased pensions. One old fellow got up and said, "We hardly have enough to eat". It seemed rather peculiar that there should be people in that audience who were actually hungry.

Mr. Whiteside: Give them some Social Credit money.

Mr. Johnston: I am coming to that. Don't worry. It seemed rather peculiar that there should be people getting up and asking for another loaf of bread and yet the Liberal government and those who support it say that we cannot give another loaf of bread when we have millions and millions of bushels of wheat in this country that we do not know what to do with. Last year we had the largest crop in the history of Canada by over 100 million bushels. We had no place to put it and yet we cannot give the old age pensioners another loaf of bread. Why? Because, as my hon. friend interjected, we have not got any Social Credit money. Just because we cannot find that little piece of paper to distribute purchasing power to our people we have to deprive them of a loaf of bread when we have millions of bushels of wheat that we do not know what to do with. What kind of thinking is that? Of course, I suppose that is what you would expect from people who have never stopped to discuss or think about the matter.

My hon. friends take some pride in saying that family allowances were introduced by a Liberal government. One of them went on to point out how the family allowance increased the purchasing power of the people receiving it and thereby helped all the people of Canada. Yes, that is true. I remember when the then prime minister introduced the bill years ago. When speaking on this very subject he pointed out that by giving people the family allowance, money, mind you, that was never worked for, it would increase their purchasing power. He said it would not only raise their standard of living but would raise the standard of living of everybody in the country because it would provide a greater market. Those words are the very words that have been used by Social Crediters ever since we have been coming to the House of Commons, and even before that out on the hustings.

In 1935 when we were advocating the issuance of a national dividend, not the printing of money wholesale but based on our production alone, every one of the members on the other side criticized us. They said, "How are you going to give money to people unless they go out and earn it?" They said it could not be done, that it was silly. My hon. friend wanted to know something about Social Credit money. The people are now getting this national dividend, and they do not have to go out and work at a job to receive it. It has added to the purchasing power and is raising the standard of living. It is increasing the prosperity of everybody in Canada. I should like to have a Liberal member get up now to deny that point. The Liberals did lots of denying before the Prime Minister of that day brought in the legislation. Now they sit silent. They do not speak about a national dividend because, to a degree, that is exactly what it is.

One of the last speakers indicated that there were other ways of giving this assistance to these people. One means was through an income tax deduction to married people with families. Family allowances were not given to assist those in the higher brackets who can pay income taxes; they were given for the primary purpose of assisting those who had not sufficient earning power to pay income taxes. How does he arrive at the idea that an income tax deduction would assist these people when they have not sufficient income to pay income taxes? Surely we have not come to such a financially depraved condition, when we live in such a prosperous country as we say Canada is, that we cannot afford to give these people a little added purchasing power to afford them a better standard of living than they now have. You do not have to go to the province of Alberta to find that condition. Let me tell you that there are such conditions in both Quebec and Ontario, as well as the city of Ottawa.

Then another hon. member spoke about how inflation had assisted the people who are receiving family allowances; how it had increased the number of dollars in their pocket. It has, to a degree; but it has not greatly increased the number of dollars in the pockets of those people who really need family allowances or old age pensions. They are on a fixed income, and it is very low indeed. They can hardly eke out an existence, let alone live in any semblance of prosperity. It must not be forgotten either, Mr. Speaker, that it was under this administration that our dollar has been depreciated to the point where it is now worth only about 50 cents. Inflation has been a help to those people who have increased the number of dollars in their pockets, but it has hit at the very root of this problem of family allowances. It has hit those people the hardest who need the assistance, and has not increased the number of dollars in their pockets. Their lot has been made much worse.

How is the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald) going to assist the people who really need this help? Surely he would be the last person to say that there are not a great many families in Canada who need it. The question we should ask ourselves, Mr. Speaker, is not whether or not we have sufficient money to increase these family allowances. We should ask ourselves, can Canada afford it? I believe that is a different problem. If this country could produce the goods and services to increase the standard of living of these people who are in dire need, then there should be no question as to whether or not they will get it. It should be forthcoming.

From the agricultural point of view and the industrial standpoint, this country is richer by far than it ever has been. In fact we have come to the point where our agricultural production is increasing so rapidly that the farmers are saying we shall have to control production because we have not an export market. Those people who speak that way, and those people who say that we cannot afford family allowances are forgetting that when you export you must import, unless you want to give the goods away. When you import goods you must make provision for consumption in this country. The only way you can do that is by increasing our standard of living. Accordingly, it would seem that the best market for everything we can produce, either in the primary or secondary industries, lies right in Canada. We can help ourselves by helping those people to get an increase in family allowances.

Can we afford it? Last year our production was close to $22 billion. Just before Christmas the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) stated that this country was more prosperous than it had ever been before.

Mr. Dupuis: True.

Mr. Johnston: Then why do we refuse to give a little bit more in family allowances?

Mr. Dupuis: We do not mind allowing a little more if we can afford to give it.

Mr. Johnston: I have just been trying to tell you that we can afford it.

Mr. Dupuis: This is just election talk.

Mr. Johnston: That has been the trend of Liberal thinking, that we have not enough dollars. It is not a case of whether we can produce the goods and services. It is time we got out of that line of thinking, and then we would not have these poor indigents coming up here and asking for a loaf of bread. We have members of the government standing up and saying that we cannot afford it.

We have not come to the point yet in our thinking where we can say that children are an asset in this country instead of a liability. They are the greatest asset we have; yet we are not making it possible for people to raise the families they would desire. We have to bring in immigrants from other countries in order to build up our population. We should not forget that there are needy people in this country. They are not confined to the group receiving family allowances, but may be found in the different classes that already have been mentioned, the old age pensioners and those who are physically not fit to work, the incurables. Surely in a country as prosperous as Canada it should never be said that we cannot adequately take care of these people who are in such dire need.

When I think of the waste in this country, especially as it has been revealed in the last few weeks, with government members standing up and trying to defend that extravagance and waste which runs into hundreds of thousands of dollars—the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Thomas) says millions and Mr. Currie said it will never be estimated—

Mr. Dupuis: Well, don't mention a figure then.

Mr. Johnston: —it is difficult to understand why some members in this house say we cannot afford to increase these family allowances. They say we will do it when we can afford it, that is if the children have not starved to death beforehand. One of our first concerns should be to take care of the needy now and not wait for another ten, twenty or thirty years.

Mr. Speaker, I would not have spoken on this occasion in support of this resolution if I were convinced that Canada could not afford it. But from the facts and figures that have been given by the Prime Minister himself, other ministers in the cabinet and other hon. members in this house, I know that we can well afford to increase the family allowance, to increase the old age pension and to help those who are unable to help themselves. By helping those people we are helping ourselves to greater prosperity because we are providing a greater market right here where it is needed.

Let us judge whether or not these people need this assistance, Mr. Speaker. If we come to the conclusion that they need it, the next point we should look at is: Can Canada produce it, and is she producing it now? Those are the only two things we need to ask ourselves. Once those two questions are answered to our satisfaction, we should say: We will get the money to do it.

(Translation):

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, it will come as no surprise that a member for a constituency which swarms with large families should rise to give his opinion on this matter. There will be no need for me to speak very long to assure my hon. colleagues that I am favourable to any measure calculated to improve the living conditions of our large families.

Having been a frequent visitor at the various welfare centres in my constituency, I believe I may say that I am aware of the situation in which the families of the constituency I have the honour to represent happen to find themselves at this time. Comparing it to that which I knew between 1930 and 1935, under a Conservative government, when I was a member of the municipal council of the city of Montreal as well as of the executive council, I believe I am in a position to say that there is absolutely no comparison between the two situations. What we saw at that time, in fact, was the worst possible plight in which a human being could find himself whereas nowadays we enjoy relative prosperity, a prosperity which is not entirely due to such and such a set of circumstances but which is the result of sound administration. This administration, mindful of its responsibilities, goes neither too rapidly nor too slowly in the preparation of its legislation where it is faced with the necessity of deciding how to meet any particular situation.

Before admitting that our hon. friends of the Social Credit party have the monopoly of compassion, pity and solicitude for the people—since that appears to be their idea—we must remember that even before the existence of that party in Canada, there were two great parties, two great parties which were diametrically opposed to each other on certain principles, particularly on social matters, when it came to being more liberal—that is generous—toward society. We then heard the Tories protest that it was bad policy to socialize the country, to which the Liberals replied that we had to allow for circumstances and progress in all directions.

The party to which we belong is not one which goes on harping upon the heroic deeds of the past. We must face the new situation brought about by changing times not only in our country but in the whole world, and rise to it. The Liberal party is the one which has managed to create and establish on a permanent basis the various social laws which make it possible for the people in general to hope for at least easier if not much happier days than those they have known, before the existence of these social measures.

Such was the situation as far as allowances are concerned in all fields of social security where the state is called upon to grant some measure of assistance. The government has provided for the new needs of the people as they occurred and has enacted adequate legislation to meet any situation.

Such a policy indicates that the government had at heart the welfare of those who asked not pity but help to go successfully through difficult times. On the other hand, we heard Conservative leaders say, especially when mention was made of family allowances, that they were more or less a bribe to get votes, more particularly in the province of Quebec. They accused the government of the day, in a sly way that I would have trouble to describe, of trying to buy the votes of the people of Quebec by giving them a measure of social security to alleviate their misery. Well, the government had understood the situation. It was not a matter of political expediency, but rather of sound comprehension and of wise administration. As long as the Liberal party will keep pace with times and conditions which bring about a change in the complexion of the various problems in this country, they may rely on the support not only of the member now addressing the house, but also of all the right-minded people in Canada.

This is the reason why we see, on the eve of an election—since there is to be one this year—our friends from the left, especially those from the Social Credit group, continuously getting up to suggest increases of all kind, which we also favour, because we have favoured them in the past and because we are as kindhearted as our Social Credit friends can be.

We would like, of course, to lighten the burden of the mothers in particular who look after most of these problems arising in the home. We, from the government side, are in favour of these things. But we can see how inconsistent our opponents are when, on the one hand, they are asking the government to reduce taxes, that is its own source of revenues, and, on the other hand, they are asking increase after increase on behalf of those whom we have been assisting long before being requested to do so by the hon. members from the Social Credit group.

Well, Mr. Speaker, though I am favourable to every possible increase, in every field of social welfare, as I have demonstrated by favouring an increase in the old age pensions, for example, in spite of what we have done in the past, as well as in supporting all those measures we have so far adopted, maybe the government should levy two distinct taxes. I am not saying that I would be for or against such a step, but at any rate it would be the measure of our leaders' sincerity. I might favour a general social welfare tax plus the present income tax, modified of course to take care of the changes brought about by the new tax. I do not wish to leave the impression that I am suggesting this particular levy but I do wish to point out the importance of making a difference between the income tax proper and that part of it which goes to welfare purposes.

It seems to me that it would be wise and advantageous to introduce a motion along that line, in order that the government might be allowed to consider the advisability of such a measure. I am not prepared, however, to commit myself upon the value of such a motion.

Going back to what I emphasized a moment ago, it should after all be realized that we cannot adopt, without some reservation, this resolution in its present form, before the minister concerned has given us his opinion on the matter. I have much more confidence —and it is not by way of flattery, nor in the hope of receiving anything in return that I say this—in the hon. minister at the head of the Department of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) than I have in those people who preach a certain policy in their province but who find it wiser, later on, not to implement it. I shall fall in therefore with the explanations of the minister.

On the other hand, it must be recognized that there is a difference between parliament and a city council. With your permission, Mr. Speaker—and I think I am keeping within the rules of the house in so doing—I will show the difference which exists between moving a resolution in this parliament and moving a similar resolution before a city council, that of Montreal for instance.

Formerly, we would move a motion as follows: "It is moved by alderman so-and-so, seconded by alderman so-and-so, that the executive committee consider the advisability of adopting this or that measure". That did not necessarily mean that the executive committee was bound to carry the motion, but it meant that we were all agreed that the proposed resolution deserved the attention of the executive committee, which was in that case, if I may be permitted such a comparison, like the municipal cabinet of the day.

Then, when we came back before the city council, we could not be accused of having ignored the unanimous stand of the council members, for we simply admitted that such and such a measure was excellent, but that the executive committee had simply decided to postpone any further study of the matter. Thus the executive committee was never upbraided for not taking into consideration the unanimous opinion of the members, who had presented a motion asking the executive committee to consider the advisability of presenting a particular piece of legislation.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) vented his discontent, the other day, against a government which took no notice of his motion concerning the Income Tax Act and the abolition of the 4 per cent floor in connection with medical expenses. The hon. member voiced his protest in the name of sound democracy; he accused the government of taking no heed of a unanimous vote in the Commons, nor of the judgment of their own supporters, and asserted that they were anxious about one thing only: the possibility of doing just what they pleased.

I would not like to be caught in the same position. If I decided to vote in favour of the motion, I would have to blame the government for not having respected the unanimous opinion of the House of Commons.

On the other hand, following certain explanations supplied by the government I might find that it could not grant wishes expressed in this motion.

I believe that there is a very great difference between a motion calling for consideration of the advisability of adopting such and such a measure and the enforcement of that same measure.

To sum up I want to say this: considering all the things done so far by the government which for many years now has been at the helm in our country; considering the happy disposition of the hon. the Minister of National Health and Welfare; considering all that the government has accomplished in the social field, I do not hesitate, for one moment, to rely on the Prime Minister and his colleagues to decide whether it is possible, under the circumstances, to grant the increase asked for in the motion. I say once more that this motion thus presented on the eve of an election is nothing but eyewash. I am sure that if I asked for the opinion of my colleagues, they would say one after the other: Certainly, we also have feelings. We know that many families cannot afford to live as we would like them to live and we are eager to help the needy wherever they may be. However, we take into account the responsibility which our government must assume. We know that they must find the necessary funds in order to give what is asked for. We realize that the opposition would take advantage of the opportunity to claim that we were illogical if, on the one hand, we were pleased to raise the benefits already granted by the government, while asking, on the other, for substantial tax reductions in the budget prepared by the same government.

I had to state these facts in order to make the situation clear. Inasmuch as we are concerned, I do not wish—although I could accept such a responsibility—to put my hon. friends and especially my constituents under the impression that I am not always willing to ask the government to consider measures which would be beneficial to my constituents. Nor do I wish it to be charged that we, on this side of the house, refuse to face these problems when, on the contrary, it is this very government that has found the best remedy to apply in the circumstances.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is five o'clock. Before concluding I wish to voice all the confidence I have in the present government leadership, in the cabinet itself and more particularly in the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I do not doubt in the least that, as we have done in the past, we will, whenever circumstances allow, whenever we are in a position to help those who depend on us, prepare and implement measures calculated to relieve those who, socially, look up to the government.

Mr. Speaker, is it five o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I wish to point out to the hon. member that today we go on until six. We are not interrupting the present debate to study public or private bills; we are going on until six o'clock.

Mr. Dupuis: In any case, Mr. Speaker, I now close my remarks. I merely wanted to know whether my time had expired. After all, the member for St. Mary can be fair in his own good time. I do not want to depart from the rules of the house.

I wish to thank the government for all it has done up to now in order to help those who are in need, and I am confident that it will manage to settle this question of family allowances to the satisfaction of all concerned.

(Text):

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the house reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of introducing legislation increasing the amounts paid under the Family Allowances Act to the extent necessary to compensate for the increase in the cost of living since the said act was first enacted.

No one has suggested, and I am sure no one will suggest, that the government takes issue with the principle of the suggestion involved. Certainly to oppose this resolution, as I shall, for the reasons I shall give, will not justify anyone in saying that the administration or the supporters of the government in the house do not believe in the principle of family allowances.

The principle of family allowances, embodied in an act introduced by the present government of Canada, has been referred to by a number of important individuals, such as Miss Kathleen F. Lenroot, chief of the United States children's bureau, as one of the greatest social acts of its kind; by Dr. Evelyn Burns, of the New York school of social work, as a magnificent measure; by R. E. G. Davis, executive director of the Canadian Welfare Council, as the cornerstone of Canada's social security program, and by Dorothy Thompson, who referred to the act as the most significant social legislation in the Americas.

This was legislation introduced by this government, without any suggestion of a parliamentary committee; and, in spite of all that may be said by some opposite who claim some credit, the fact is that the first suggestion for family allowances was made in this country by a Liberal member sitting on this side of the house at least eighteen years ago.

I make this reference lest anyone who should read Hansard, or the report of this debate, and who is not familiar with the earlier history, should conclude that we were not sympathetic to family allowances. This may not be the moment, but we will not fail to recall that when family allowances were introduced nine years ago there was certainly strong opposition from certain sections of the opposition. Not only was there opposition in the house, but there was strong opposition elsewhere against the measure, in other parts of Canada, and by political leaders of parties not represented by those who support the government of the day.

It is true that at the present time everyone in the house seems to be strongly in favour of the Family Allowances Act. That confirms perhaps not only the wisdom of the act, but also the good judgment of the government of the day which, in the face of strong opposition, decided to introduce the measure. And I should like to say at this juncture—and perhaps it should have been said long ago—that the name of the late Dr. Clark, deputy minister of finance, who passed away a few weeks ago, must always be associated with this project; for in the preparatory stages, in advising the government of the day, he contributed richly to this measure that has brought so much relief to those segments of our population whom we refer to as Canada's greatest resource, its children.

The hon. member who introduced the resolution, I am sure, spoke for his party. But I would point out to him that the only opposition to family allowances that I have heard in the house within recent times came from a member of his own party, the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher). I am not for one moment suggesting that the latter was not sincere when he complained about the expenditures involved in family allowances, but I wish simply to point out to the hon. member who proposed the resolution that everyone in the house now is in favour of the measure, with the single exception of one of his own colleagues.

The proposal put forward by my hon. friend is naturally one that captures and encourages the support of anyone who wants to see our children receive increasing opportunities. There is no one who could legitimately oppose that measure. But it is one thing to propose, and then it is another thing to be able to find responsible and practicable means of carrying out that proposal. And I suggest with vigour and sincerity to the hon. member who proposed this resolution that his suggestion is not practicable.

Mr. Herridge: Nor accepted by this group.

Mr. Martin: "Nor accepted by this group" —I would point out to the hon. member who interjected those words, that, beside the proposition put forward by the hon. member who moved the resolution, that is a very interesting interruption.

Mr. Herridge: I thought the minister was referring to the views of the hon. member for Moose Jaw, when I said that.

Mr. Martin: I am glad to note this intervention. Those things will have to stand side by side, and we will have to see whom we believe, in the context of things, deserves the greater approbation.

The significant thing, in answering the suggestion that the government should commit the people of Canada to an expenditure of $192 million in addition to what has already been spent for family allowances, is that it is important to note the history of the administration of the measure. This would include not only its present total cost, but also all those related factors which would enable a responsible man to come to a conclusion as to whether or not at this time, in the light of overriding obligations in regard to health, or other obligations of the government, this is the moment to embark upon such a proposal.

We have paid out in nine years in family allowances some $2,131 million. That is the amount up to December 31, 1952. The expenditure on family allowances for the fiscal year 1951-52 is to be found at pages 140 and 141 of the report of the Department of National Health and Welfare, which I tabled last Thursday. That report indicates that the estimated cost of family allowance payments in the fiscal year 1951-52 will total $320,880,854.

That in itself represents a substantial sum of money. There is only one source from which that money can come—indeed, there is only one source from which any expenditure of this or any other government can come—and that is from the hard work of the people of the country.

That fact cannot be emphasized too often; because it is one thing to suggest that there should be more social services—and I take second place to no hon. member in pressing for that objective—but, at the same time, if one wants to be responsible in his protagonism of legitimate social reform, there should constantly be brought home to the people a reminder as to the only source of all government expenditures.

May I say to the hon. member who at the moment, perhaps for another reason, is enjoying himself—perhaps I misunderstood him, and I will not go on to say what I was going to say, that he was laughing; I hope I am wrong in that—that the question before us is whether or not, in the face of the expenditure of $320 million for family allowances, apart altogether from what other expenditures are maintained in the field of health and welfare on federal account, we can honourably impose upon the people of Canada at this time a further expenditure of $190 million in connection with this one particular matter.

When you add to that the fact that we are spending over $300 million on old age security payments, let alone the other expenditures which I am going to detail before I resume my seat, I question very much whether the people of Canada would agree that this is the moment to embark upon this particular proposal. Not only do I question that; I would say to the hon. gentleman that my correspondence and contacts as Minister of National Health and Welfare lead me to suggest that if there is any reform in connection with family allowances that is being put forward with greater vigour than any other, it is the suggestion made by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Thomas), who said that he would prefer to see the age qualification increased from 16 years to at least 18 years. I would certainly agree with him that there seems to be greater justification and greater demand for that kind of reform than there is for the reform put forward in the motion now before us.

Then there is the further argument made by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite), that there is great danger to any social benefit when you apply the principle of movable benefits. That is a most dangerous thing to do. I do not think that as long as I am holding this post I would recommend to my colleagues in the government or to the people of Canada that that principle be adopted. The dangers are precisely as related by the hon. member for Skeena.

I have given the estimated expenditures in family allowances for the fiscal year 1951-52. The figures for the calendar year 1952 are very interesting indeed. They show a total of $330,827,545, with an average monthly payment from January 1952 to October 1952 of roughly $27 million. November and December of 1952 show an increase in family allowance payments, with the result that the average for those two months was a little over $28 million. In January 1952 we paid out in family allowances $27,400,000 to 1,956,183 families representing 4,496,739 children. In December, when the average monthly payment rose from $27 million to $28 million, payments were made to 2,021,745 families representing 4,668,987 children.

Is it any wonder that writers like Dorothy Thompson and others have admired this program because of the far-reaching distributive effect on the children of the nation, and indeed on the nation itself? When one looks at the various amounts paid to all the provinces one will appreciate what that means to the children at the present time as well as what it meant to them in 1945 when the act was introduced. If I have any criticism to make of the speech of the proposer of this resolution it is that he belittled the accomplishments to date of this great measure.

Mr. Argue: Not at all.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says "not at all" and I am happy to have the correction. When one looks at the amount of money paid in family allowances to Canadian children from Newfoundland in the east to British Columbia in the west, including the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, one cannot help but conclude that those who were responsible for the inception of this measure will deserve for a long time the thanks of the great majority of the people of this country.

This act was intended to benefit the great majority of the people. It was predicated upon the fact that 19 per cent of the working population of Canada is responsible for almost 84 per cent of the children of Canada up to 16 years of age. It was predicated upon the fact that our wage system does not take into account the obligations of a parent with one or more children as compared with those of an employee who is not married. It was done in a way that no other country in the world has succeeded in doing, without in any way encouraging a disposition to depress the wage scale of the wage earners of the country. At first labour was a little concerned about this measure, and not unnaturally so. They had seen the experience of France and at least 20 other countries of the world where family allowance schemes were in existence and where their maintenance had been used, not to add to the daily receipt of income by the wage earner but as a means of depressing wages, as a means of substituting payments by the state for the fact that the employer had failed to carry out his obligation in terms of economic return to his employees.

Those of us who sit on this side, and I as the minister responsible for the administration of this act, make no apology for the attitude I am taking with regard to this proposal. In fact in taking the attitude that I do, I feel I am strengthening—I say this with great respect to the hon. member—the structure upon which the family allowance measure in this country is based. I want to see it preserved. I do not want steps taken now which might result later in a serious reduction in this or in any other social welfare measure. That has happened in Great Britain; it is happening today in France. That has happened in Belgium and in at least four other European countries. It has happened in at least three Latin-American countries that I know of.

The estimate for the fiscal year 1953-54 for family allowance payments is $347 million. We estimate that the increase on the basis of the present program is from $12 million to $15 million annually. I know those are facts and considerations which my hon. friend would feel it was necessary for me to indicate in answering his proposition. I have before me a table which I would ask the house to allow me to place on Hansard, unless it is insisted that I go through it in all its detail, which I think would be unnecessary. This covers December, 1952, and shows the number of families in pay, the number of children in pay, the average allowance per child and the average allowance per family for each of the ten provinces. It represents a total payment of $28 million in that month to 2,021,745 families representing almost 5 million children. With the unanimous consent of the house I think this table, printed in conjunction with what I am saying, might prove of interest to those who want to peruse my remarks.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the minister wish to have the table printed in Hansard? Is that what he meant?

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin: The table is as follows:

There are other considerations that I think one should bear in mind in connection with this measure because, while there are occasional abuses, those abuses, as the proposer himself has indicated, are by no means as great as the occasional critic suggests. One financial journal in Canada and one daily newspaper in Toronto, the Globe and Mail, have questioned the validity of the whole measure. We have sought to indicate the false position and the false premises of these arguments, but I can say on my responsibility as the minister in charge of the department that family allowances have helped Canadian parents to provide for their children better food, shelter, clothing, health care and education.

As the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald) mentioned, the family allowance measure is perhaps the most successful truant officer we have. There is no doubt that, almost coincidental with the introduction of the measure, school attendance in Canada achieved and has maintained record proportions. This, of course, is as the act intends, as suspension of payment for a child is made if he or she fails to attend school, except for some legitimate reason.

It is significant that last year, as an indication of the careful supervision given, there were a little under 39,000 suspensions of family allowance payments for children who were not attending school and for whom family allowance benefits were claimed. The number of prosecutions for illegal receipt of family allowances, fraudulently or for other reasons since the inception of the program in 1945, is under 200, which indicates that, whatever may be said about family allowances, the people of Canada are honest in their attitude towards them.

There are in rare instances people who abuse the measure, but they represent a very small section of the receiving public or receiving children. I had a man say to me the other day, "If you want to see how family allowances are spent go into a beer hall or tavern at the end of the month." I told him what I am telling the house, that that kind of assertion cannot be substantiated in fact. We trace that sort of thing with great minuteness, and we have yet to find any serious case where it could be demonstrated that that was the habit. I am not saying there have not been cases. I am not saying that we are not on the alert and do not find cases of this sort, but what I do say is that they represent a small section of the parents of this country, and it is a tribute to the honour and honesty of Canadian parenthood that I should be able to make this statement.

By the time a child reaches the age of 16, it is estimated that under this measure he has received approximately $1,188 over that period of years. For some people that may not represent a great sum of money but I could read hundreds of letters—I have a few here today but I am not going to read them—from all sorts of parents, from mothers and fathers and children too in all parts of the country; and I can tell you that the sum of $1,188 representing the average payment does mean a great deal to the masses of our people. This represents money that comes not from the government but from the people, but as a result of policies conceived by the present government of Canada. While I am on that subject I think I should say—and I am not surprised; I have said it before—that when provincial elections take place, and we have had them recently, knowing human nature as I do I think it is interesting to note that there are some provincial governments that try to urge the people of their provinces to return them to power because they hold themselves out as the authors of the family allowance measure. I need not tell any hon. member of this house that family allowances in Canada are due exclusively to an act passed by the parliament of Canada.

The significance of this measure may be seen from the fact that if the United States were to adopt such a proposal—and there are there strong proponents of the measure, including the man who retires tomorrow from the presidency of the United States—it would cost almost $3½ billion a year. Our family allowance program was, by implication, compared today with those of some other countries. The three other countries that have family allowance schemes of proportions comparable with our own are Great Britain, Australia and New Zealand, but none of these countries provides the same amount of cash benefits provided by the Canadian act.

It is interesting to note the percentage of net national income spent on family allowances in the four countries, including Canada. It will be seen that on this basis of comparison Canada is ahead of Australia and Great Britain, our percentage being 1·86, Australia's 1·44 and Great Britain's ·55, while New Zealand is higher than Canada, being 2·62. But taking the relation of family allowances to other social security expenditures—and this is something we must do when we consider a proposal of the magnitude put forward by the hon. member whose motion we are now discussing—in Canada for 1951-52 family allowances represented 25·5 per cent of all social security expenditures. This is a larger proportion than in any of the three countries I have mentioned. It is larger than Australia whose percentage is 23·3, than New Zealand whose percentage is 25·5, and than Great Britain whose percentage is 4·5.

Therefore if we were to adopt the proposal the result would be that in relation to other social security benefits we in Canada would be spending much more on family allowances than on our other social security measures. What one has to do—because there is a limit to the availability of money for these purposes—is consider the effect of any particular proposal on existing measures or upon other proposals or projects that the administration may have in mind.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister permit a question at this point?

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if he has information with respect to the four countries he is dealing with as to what percentage the total social security payments are of the gross national product in each case.

Mr. Martin: If I may deal with these things in order, I am going to come to that in a rough way, and if I do not do so just mention it to me later. However, I think you will find that I will. It seems to me we have to keep in mind three important considerations. First of all, as the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite) mentioned, family allowances, or any other social benefits, were never intended to cover the complete cost of child maintenance. That is what any social benefit is, a contribution toward some form of maintenance. It cannot be anything else; and certainly if family allowances were intended to provide for full maintenance we would have to acknowledge at once that we had changed the character of our economic and social system. The second point to consider is that, without any increase in the amounts of benefit, family allowances this year will cost us $332 million and some odd thousand. Third, each year there is an increase in the cost of this measure by some $12 million.

Now, the house will no doubt agree that, in the face of the fact that we are engaged in a commitment to spend over $2 billion for national defence, for preparations to preserve our way of life, together with other tremendous but I think responsible expenditures in the field of social welfare, and having in mind the universal demand that is made by hon. gentlemen opposite for a cut in taxation, it is hardly responsible at this time, in respect of this one measure, to make the proposal that has been made. If one were to calculate the suggestions for expenditures made on the other side, and place those alongside the charges that are being made against this government, I am sure that would be the greatest demonstration of lack of logic that the political life of Canada has ever witnessed.

Speaking immediately after the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston), I want to say that I believe he overstated his case when he tried to suggest that this government was not concerned with the proper expenditure of money, that we were interested in defending extravagance. I hesitate to take issue with him because of the conciliatory attitude he took towards me personally, but as the first minister to speak after his observations I want to say that I am sure that, upon reflection, he would want to do a lot of editorializing on the remarks he has just made. On that point I suggest to him that the administration of family allowances is an indication of the concern not only of the department for which I am responsible but of the government for the proper administration and the wise expenditure of public moneys.

I have indicated that this year we will spend $332 million in family allowances. When you consider the huge amount involved, it would not be unnatural to expect that we would be spending, by way of total administration costs, much more than is being spent. Last year the Department of National Health and Welfare spent in the administration of this gigantic program less than $2 million, specifically $1,858,000; treasury spent $2,627,335; public works, which looks after our ten regional offices, spent $234,758. The whole administration cost of family allowances, administered by the federal government, was $4,720,093. I doubt if you could find a better example of careful accounting and careful expenditure.

Mr. Johnston: I did not question that.

Mr. Martin: I know you did not, but I thought this would be a very good example to disprove what I thought was a very wide accusation and charge that the hon. member was making. Now, Mr. Speaker, the estimated expenditure on social security in Canada for the current fiscal year will be $1,300 million.

Mr. Knowles: Is that federally or for all levels?

Mr. Martin: That is for all levels. The federal portion will be $1,010,500,000; provincial, $255,400,000; municipal, $83,200,000. This makes a total for all governments of $1,349 million. Those are figures that are in addition to the voluntary expenditures which are made but which, alongside the total of the government expenditures, represent a surprisingly small amount. One could give a further breakdown, but I would not want to tire the house. I simply give one example. In the matter of government health expenditures, which come within this category, the federal government on all counts, including the national health program and other departments of government as well as the Department of National Health and Welfare, will spend in the current fiscal year $91,900,000; provincial governments will spend $158,600,000, in respect of matters that are admittedly within their exclusive constitutional competence, and municipal governments will spend $62 million. This makes a total of $312,500,000. Approximately one-half of the total that goes for health care in Canada is already distributed by taxation across the whole population.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that this very dry recital of the facts from our point of view will be a conclusive answer to the hon. gentleman who is proposing this resolution. It is not a denial of the validity of the principle. We believe in family allowances within our capacity and to the extent that we are able to meet other obligations. This suggestion has been made from other quarters of the house as well, and we should like to be able to accede to it at this time. For the reasons I have given, I believe we should not accede to it. I believe that the family allowances measure, our old age security measure, the provision for veterans under the veterans charter, the significant work—as the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald) pointed out—of the national health program and other measures, together with the social welfare measures introduced and carried on by all our provinces, represent a contribution toward responsible social reform of which no Canadian need to be ashamed. I feel that the program for which I am responsible as Minister of National Health and Welfare, along with my colleagues of the government, is one which commends itself to reasonably-minded people in this country, and most of our people I think are reasonably minded.

The people know that if we stop at one particular measure, it is not because we do not want to do anything further in that particular field, but rather because we take into account the commitments for national defence and the desirability of expenditures in other fields as well. I do not know how long I shall be in this particular post, although I am sure a Liberal will be in this post for a long time; but I know that with Liberals recognizing the need of maintaining a balance between security and freedom the result will be more and more measures of a humanitarian kind.

This will demonstrate to those who would challenge our way of life that the free world is capable of giving, in a more lasting way, succour and assistance to those in our nation who need it. We must never lose sight of the importance of that objective. In speaking to this particular motion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say if there is any argument I can adduce to show that this government will never be unmindful of its social welfare obligations, it is the record in the field of health and welfare of the Liberal party and of the present government of Canada.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Knowles: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Martin moves, seconded by Mr. Fournier (Hull), that this debate be now adjourned.

Mr. Knowles: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Martin) which was agreed to on the following division:

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SOLDIER SETTLERS

PROPOSAL TO GIVE CLEAR TITLES TO VETERANS WITH UNPAID BALANCES

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of giving clear titles to all soldier settlers of great war I who hold land under contract with the soldier settlement board.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as this resolution now almost qualifies for the other place, I hope it will not be necessary for me to move it another year. Its subject matter has been before the house since 1937; and if it takes another sixteen or seventeen years to bring it into operation, I would hope to keep it at all times before the house. I say this because in my view it is something worthy of consideration and should be attended to, even before this government goes out of office.

The resolution in its present form is somewhat trimmed down as compared to what it was when first placed before the house. The preamble, it will be noted, has been removed. Perhaps this is a good thing, because it has been before the house so often that it would no longer seem necessary to have the preamble.

I believe hon. members know very well what I have in mind in placing this resolution before the house. They know that back in 1919 a piece of legislation was passed by the government of that day making provision for loans to veterans of the first great war who had returned to Canada, but who were congregating in the town and cities. In order to get them out on the farms, and so they would not cause trouble where they were congregating, the legislation was passed.

That legislation has been described by one minister, in whose charge it was, as having been hastily improvised. That is about the best that could be said about it. I am pleased to say, however, that its successor, the Veterans Land Act, has been greatly improved. Had the old vets been given the opportunities given those who came back from world war II, it would not have been necessary for me or for anyone else to keep a resolution of this kind before the house for so many years.

I do not think anyone will question the justice of the claim I have propounded. We made solemn promises to the veterans of world war I, and we did the same with those of world war II. Why in the world we should renege on those promises is beyond my understanding entirely. I can see no reason for it, because we have been told time and again that our productive capacity is increasing from year to year. Our national product is now valued at about $22 or $23 billion, and there is no reason why an injustice that has existed since 1919 should not be cleared up at this session, at the very latest.

I should like to place on record an article I have read on many occasions before. This was an address by Sir Robert Borden, at a time when he was prime minister of Canada, to members of the Canadian expeditionary force in 1917. This is what he said:

You are men actually facing the enemy day and night. You are suffering greatly from fatigue, overstrain, and lack of rest. The marvel of it is that men could undergo such a strain without breaking; but you have never yet broken, and history will appreciate that in days to come.

You men are about to enter one of the most serious engagements that ever faced the Canadian corps. I cannot, at this moment, give any information as to where this attack will be staged; whether it be successful or not, it is to be borne in mind that it will not be an easy success. We feel confident that you will succeed where others failed; for you have never yet failed in anything you have set your hand to, as a Canadian corps.

You can go into this action feeling assured of this, and as the head of the government, I give you this assurance: that you need have no fear that the government and the country will fail to show just appreciation of your service to the country and empire in what you are about to do and what you have already done.

The government and the country will consider it their first duty to see that a proper appreciation of your effort and of your courage is brought to the notice of the people at home, and it will always be our endeavour to so guide the attitude of public opinion, that the country will support the government to prove to the returned man its just and due appreciation of the inestimable value of the services rendered to the country and empire; and that no man, whether he goes back or whether he remains in Flanders, will have just cause to reproach the government for having broken with the men who won and the men who died.

Anyone who has lived in Canada since 1919 and has kept track of the treatment handed out to those old vets of world war I, particularly when the act was administered by the department of mines and resources under Hon. T. A. Crerar, and when Mr. Murchison was director of the department, cannot agree with this statement by Sir Robert Borden to the men in France.

Mr. Mutch: Nonsense.

Mr. Fair: In the days of depression, men were thrown out on the roadside. It was not because these men did not do their duty; it was not because they did not work their farms as well as they could; it was simply because of the conditions they faced. First of all, they were burdened with debt because of the high prices they had to pay for land, livestock and machinery. It was impossible for them to surmount those difficulties.

In spite of all this a number of men were kicked off their farms and made to sign quitclaim deeds. Evictions were even resorted to, with the result that members of the house got busy and stood up for these men and finally Mr. Murchison was fired out of office and a good man put in his place. These men were being treated in a way that was not worthy of this country.

When I first brought in this resolution I was told by a former minister of veterans affairs, the late Ian Mackenzie, that the only way to deal with this matter was to give clear title. I believe he fully intended going through with that program, but apparently somebody else in the cabinet had a little more power than he did. My guess is that possibly the treasury board had something to do with it. The result was that these men were not given clear titles during the late Mr. Mackenzie's tenure of office.

Then later on another funny occasion arose. When the matter was brought up a man prominent in Liberal politics in Saskatchewan talked the matter out. Some say that he is coming back here to us again. In order to talk it out he had to bring in mothers' allowances, old age pensions and many other subjects that did not have anything to do with veterans' affairs. When some of us laughed at the way he was using the time of the house he got rather peeved, and I do not think he is over that yet.

Since that time the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), whom we all respect and have respected since we first knew him, gave the old veterans a break. He was responsible for these veterans being given their oil and mineral rights. I want to thank the minister publicly. A lawsuit was under way, but the minister felt there was justice in our claim and saw to it that those rights were handed back. I want to thank the present Minister of Labour, then minister of veterans affairs, for what he did in connection with that matter.

Since that time we have had another Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe). I do not see him in the house tonight, but his parliamentary assistant is here. I want to thank that parliamentary assistant for the good work he did as chairman of the committee on veterans' affairs. Before he came in I said that I hoped this would be the last time it would be necessary to move this resolution. Then one of my friends on the other side suggested that they would be glad to see me back again. But I do hope that this resolution is agreed to before prorogation.

It must be realized that this matter has been brought to the attention of the house on other occasions. Looking over Hansard I find that on February 24, 1930, the late Mr. W. L. Mackenzie King, then prime minister, when dealing with returned men, made this statement, as reported on page 44 of Hansard:

> May I say that after giving a great deal of time and careful thought and study to this question, the government has come to the conclusion that the existing legislation is not adequate. In particular it has been borne in upon us that there are a large number of returned men who, while not suffering from any disability immediately traceable to some particular happening, are nevertheless finding themselves breaking down through causes more or less unknown. In other words, they are experiencing after a number of years what I think would be described in medical terms as the effects of deferred reaction. Though they went through the strain of the war, though they suffered mentally and physically as they did in those years, the fact that at the time they were strong and in good health led to nothing being immediately visible as a consequence of the strain they had been called upon to endure. As the years have gone by however, and the system has weakened from other causes, the strain of past years has begun to tell and many men are breaking down today apparently for no other reason than that of the strain of the war period.

I have read that statement by the late Mr. King to show that he was thinking of the problems of the veterans. On one occasion I visited the former prime minister in his library at Laurier House in connection with clear titles, and found him most sympathetic. Apparently there was some other power that did not surrender to his wishes.

I hope we are coming near the end of the road as far as these men paying off their debts are concerned. To begin with more than 25,000 were involved. On January 1, 1952, we find there were 862 still in debt, owing a total of $950,725.33 or an average of $1,102.90. That was the result after they had paid for something like 33 years. That does not look very good to me. I have farmed all through the game and have worked just as hard as the other fellow. I did everything I could, even to the extent of working off my farm at other work so that I could stay on it and perhaps some day get out of debt. On the first of this month I find there were 548 men still in debt to a total of $572,411.33, or an average of $1,044.55. It means that these men will still have to work pretty hard in order to pay off their debts within the year unless some good reduction is made.

These figures indicate that 314 men got clear titles during the year just finished. During that year they paid in $293,876.92. In 215 of those 314 cases reductions were made to the extent of $122,023.25, or an average reduction of $567.55. Instead of wholesale evictions and signing of quitclaim deeds under Mr. Murchison, only one foreclosure took place during the year just ended. I believe that was because the man had left the land years ago and was still residing in England.

There have been heavy crops during the past three years, and in my opinion that has helped to account for the good showing that has been made by these old veterans during the past year. Of course the average reduction of $567 has helped. But considering the conditions under which these men have to work I contend that the whole amount should have been wiped off many years ago.

I bought land in my territory for one-quarter what some of these men paid for theirs, and I feel I paid a good price even at that. These men were saddled with heavy prices for livestock and machinery; they were saddled with worn-out horses that were good for nothing else but crow bait, and with milch cows that were just in the canner class.

During the past few years cattle and hog prices have been much better, and this has contributed to these men being able to pay off their debts. Actually many of them have gone without the things they needed in their homes, including improvements to their homes, so they might be able to get clear title before they passed on to the great beyond. I believe that all these men are 60 years of age or older at the present time, some of them being many years older than that. I do ask the government to give consideration to this matter and spend $572,411.33 in order to clear off this indebtedness.

I believe we may now get this matter cleaned up, and that it will not be necessary for me to bring it before the house again. As I said earlier, however, if it is not cleared up then it will be before the house again next session. I want to thank members of all parties for their co-operation. Thanks for this co-operation have been expressed time and again by members of the soldier settlers' association of Canada, and I express it on my own behalf tonight. The men who are not on the treasury benches know the hardships that many of these fellows have gone through, and I hope the men on the treasury benches will see to it that no time is lost in rectifying this injustice.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to congratulate the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) for again bringing this matter before the house. As he has said, it is a subject that has been before the house on many occasions. As a matter of fact I think this is the sixteenth time he has moved this resolution, and I confess it is about the sixteenth time that I have spoken on the matter. The resolution he has moved today is the same or nearly the same as he has moved in former years. The subject has been well covered not only in the house but also on many occasions in the veterans affairs committee. It has also been a subject of discussion with the Legion and other soldiers' organizations across Canada.

I must say that I do not consider the matter as important today as when the hon. member for Battle River first brought it before the house. A great many changes have been made and there have been a great many improvements. We must admit that. A great many improvements were recommended in the veterans affairs committee by veterans' organizations, and I am pleased to say that some, if not all, have been implemented. But, Mr. Speaker, it is now 1953, and it is a long time since 1919 when these so-called soldier settlers came back from the first war and took up these farms. I do not suppose any group of men in Canada deserves more credit than the soldier settlers. For all these years some 25,000 of them have been endeavouring to pay for their farms against very great odds. Most of them have now succeeded in doing so, and we are pleased to hear from the hon. member for Battle River that today of the original 25,000 there are only about 500 remaining who have not fully paid for their farms.

It is not necessary for me to repeat the arguments we have heard many times in the house with respect to why we consider these men deserve great consideration and praise. They took up farming after coming back from overseas, when farming was not a profitable occupation. They took it up at a time when the prices they had to pay for their farms were out of all proportion to what they were worth at a later date, and what they were worth prior to the time they bought them. The hon. member for Battle River also mentioned the price of the stock they had to buy. They paid $125 or $150 for a cow which a few years afterwards they had to sell for $15 or $20. What was true of their cows was true of their horses and the other stock they purchased.

They also went through what I suppose was the hardest period of years in the life of farmers in Canada. In the period from 1920 to 1939, when the second great war started, there had been two depressions. These men struggled through the bad times. Their case was considered by the government on several occasions during that time, and some improvement was made. In addition, Mr. Speaker, these men were never their own bosses. If they had something to sell they could not, like the ordinary farmer, go out and sell in the best market or sell when they wished to. There was always someone from the soldier settlement department at their elbow who told them when they could or could not sell. I know from the experience of potato farmers in particular in my own province that when the soldier settlement board felt they should pay whatever was due on their farms they were practically compelled to sell their product at the then market price and not wait, as other farmers had the opportunity to do, until prices increased. All these things reacted against these men.

I believe the hon. member for Battle River also spoke about the high interest rate these men had to pay. If he did not do so this year I know he has in the past. For many years these men were charged 5 per cent on the money they had borrowed, and any who did not make their payments were charged 7 per cent. All this indicates the great hardship under which these men operated. I am satisfied that most of them not only paid for their farms but paid for them two and three times over.

There is another matter that we should take into consideration when we are considering the debt we owe to the soldier settlers. When the second war came many thousands of them joined the veterans' guard and did their part a second time for the safety and protection of our country. Many thousands of their sons joined the forces and went overseas.

As I said before, there were 25,000 soldier settlers in 1919, but today I understand that not more than half of them are living. We must remember that most of them are now over 60 years of age. They have become old men, and I think it is only a matter of justice for us to say to the 500 who have found it impossible to pay for their farms in all these years that we as a parliament and a people feel that we owe a great debt to them and that before they pass on, as hundreds of their comrades already have, they will be permitted to own the land for which they have tried to pay for so long a time.

I was speaking a moment ago about the difficulties these men encounter when they come to sell their products. I wish to mention the fact that those who come under the Veterans Land Act also face the same difficulty at the present time. When I was home for the Christmas vacation I had occasion to discuss the problem with a settler under the Veterans Land Act. He told me that over a year ago he wanted to cut some pulpwood. At that time he could have obtained $20 a cord for it. He made application to the board for the privilege of cutting the pulpwood, but did not receive permission until nearly six months after his application had been filed. When he cut the pulpwood he found that the price was not $20 a cord as it had been when he expected to cut it, but only $10 per cord. Then he found that it was impossible for him to sell at that price. The board would not allow him to sell, so he is holding his pulpwood today and it is rotting in the woods. This man, who is a poor man, cut 25 cords of pulpwood in the hope that he would receive $500 for it but today it is not worth anything. I say that because of the bureaucracy of the officials administering the Veterans Land Act the men are suffering somewhat the same as did these men under the Soldier Settlement Act.

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, it is necessary for me to labour this question at any length. As I said a moment ago, 34 years is a long time in which to ask a man to pay for property. I believe we owe it to these men to give them clear title. I understand there are only 500 men involved, and the amount is only $500,000. Today we are paying $150,000 a year to clear up the indebtedness on these farms. In a few years, at $150,000 a year, we would soon equal the $500,000 that is owing. I agree, therefore, with the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair). Let us clean this matter up today and give these old men, who for so many years have hoped that before they died they would have their homes paid for, a clear title. I am sure we will not only be doing justice to them but justice to ourselves.

Some people may contend, and I have heard the argument in this house, that such an action would establish a precedent. As I said a few moments ago, the original agreement with these men has been changed many times. On many occasions the Legion and the veterans' organizations in this country have recommended the very procedure which is recommended in this resolution tonight. I do not think there is a returned man in this country who would feel that a precedent had been established. In addition to that, the only men who could claim that a precedent had been established would be these men under the Veterans Land Act. These men were given 33 per cent off the price of their farms when they purchased them after the second world war. A large amount was also spent in helping them to buy machinery. Today the men under the Veterans Land Act are paying 3½ per cent on the money they borrowed, whereas up until 1944 the men under the Soldier Settlement Act paid over 5 per cent, and if money was overdue they paid 7 per cent. In my mind, therefore, there is no argument at all about a precedent being established.

I am not going to labour this point any further. Like the hon. member for Battle River I hope this will be the last year that it will be necessary for this resolution to be brought before this house. It is a very small matter indeed. It will mean very little to the people of Canada, but it will mean a great deal to these few men who still remain. I believe it is only a matter of justice that this should be done.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I should like to add my words, Mr. Speaker, to those of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) and the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) in support of this resolution which the hon. member for Battle River has presented to this house so often over the years. It has been my privilege to support him in presenting this resolution during the years that I have been here. As a soldier settler myself, and one who knows something of the trials and tribulations of the 25,000 veterans who took up land under the soldier settlement board in 1919, I can assure you, sir, and this house that the few remaining men who still have debts under this act would be almost invariably those who have had trials and difficulties over and above the ordinary disadvantages that have accrued to farming over this number of years.

Originally we had 25,000 veterans who owed some $109 million. The average original debt was about $4,380. By 1951 that debt had been reduced, as had the number of men who still owed money, and there were 1,272 settlers owing some $1,428,000. At that time the veterans affairs committee recommended that that debt should be cancelled. On page 547 of Hansard for 1951, you will find the recommendation the committee made to this house. It reads:

> Your committee recommends that all indebtedness of soldier settlers under the provisions of the Soldier Settlement Act, 1918, be remitted, and that they may be granted clear title to their holdings.

At that time we had real hopes that the government would accept that recommendation. Unfortunately they had decided previously to take a different course of action. They decided to set up a fund, and individual applications were to be made for refund of debt. In 1949 there were 692 of these applications and a reduction of $269,311 was made. In 1950 there were 226 reductions—I should not say applications because there were a greater number of applications, but that number of applications were given favourable consideration. In 1950 some $106,386 was written off individual debts. During the last two years still further reductions have been made, to the point where today there are only 548 settlers owing about $573,000.

I should like to know just what it has cost the government to screen all those individual applications. It seems to me that it must have cost them almost as much as the total debt that is still owing on these lands. I am sure that if the hon. gentleman who replies on behalf of the government would give us the figures, they would show that the amount of money these 548 settlers who still owe the government have paid over the past 34 years is probably three or four times the amount of their original debt. They have been paying for about 34 years on these debts when they were able to do so, yet the average debt is over $1,000 today. Surely after 34 years some consideration should be given to these veterans who gave their best in the first world war. Many of these men were wounded, and many of them are unable to carry on as you or I have been able to do over the years.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Wright: Yes.

Mr. Blackmore: Does he happen to have at hand the average interest rate over the years?

Mr. Wright: I know that during the first years the interest rate was 5 per cent, and if there were any overdue balances the interest was 7 per cent on those. This interest adds up rather quickly. I know that at various times the government came to the assistance of these settlers. At one time there was a reduction of some 30 per cent in the indebtedness on stock and equipment. Another time fifty-fifty payments were arranged with regard to back payments, so that if you paid fifty cents on the dollar you were credited with the dollar payment. But even with those steps that were taken by the government there still remained a hard core of veterans who, because of no fault of their own—because of sickness in their families, ill health, the fact that they had been settled on poor land, or perhaps that they did not have any farming experience to begin with—were unable to meet their obligations. I do not think it is asking too much of this parliament to ask it to clean up those remaining 548 cases and give those old veterans, who for 34 years have been struggling to pay for their land, clear title to that land.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I should like to support the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) with respect to soldier settlers. I should also like to say that he deserves great praise for his persistence in bringing this matter before the house every year. I am quite sure that he has earned the distinction of being a fighting Irishman, because I think this is the sixteenth or seventeenth different occasion on which he has brought this matter before the house.

I do not rise to support this motion merely because I happen to be an old soldier. I rise as a Canadian, because I want to see justice for these old soldier settlers. The matter of granting clear titles to these men has been brought up for consideration in the veterans affairs committee on many different occasions. The matter has also been raised in the house here. The Canadian Legion has supported it; in fact, the Legion has given it every support. The hon. member for Battle River and other hon. members of the house have put on the record statistics covering the last 30 years. No good purpose would be achieved by my putting those statistics on the record again. According to the remarks of some of the members who have already spoken, these old soldier settlers now owe about half a million dollars; I think the hon. member said the amount was $572,000.

I can talk from practical experience, having been a settler in this country. When those soldier settlers were buying their farms wheat was $2.50 a bushel. Everything they bought—whether it was the farm, horses or anything else—was based on $2.50 wheat. You did not get a particularly good team of horses in those days for $500. Cows were $150 apiece. Implements were on a level with those high prices. It is the men who have stuck to the farms, the veterans of the first world war, whom we want to see have some comfort and pleasure after an extremely hard life.

One could talk about the frozen crops, the drought, etc., but they lived through the thirties, a period which was calamitous not only to soldier settlers struggling for an existence but to all farmers. Like my colleague the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), I sometimes wonder what the administration costs are in connection with this half million dollars that is now owing. I wonder if it would not be good business for the government to write off that amount. I wonder whether they would not be farther ahead, whether they would not save themselves considerable money by so doing.

Most of these men are now over 60 years of age and should be entitled to every consideration in connection with giving them clear titles. This is not a political matter. In the past hon. members of all parties have supported this resolution. On behalf of these men who rallied to the call of Canada in the years 1914 to 1918, in our hour of need, I appeal to the government even at this late date to give them clear titles and let them hold their heads high for the few remaining years they will be here.

Mr. L. A. Mutch (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first occasion on which it has been necessary, or on which it has been my pleasure and responsibility, to speak on this motion. I need not remind the house—because the hon. member for Battle River never lets the house or me forget it—that on two occasions from my seat in the house I supported the resolution which is now before us, and did so with a vote.

I think perhaps I can show that in recent years I have been able to do something more about it than support it, when I say that during the time I have been associated with the department, under successive ministers, as a matter of policy some $825,000 has been contributed toward the liquidation of some of these cases of debt in an orderly fashion, by means of an annual grant, on the principle of applying this measure of relief where it was most imperative that it be given and where it was most needed.

I rise now to suggest to the house that this is a proper practice which has been carried out for the last five years, I think it is, and is now projected for another year. I would point out that what has been accomplished has been, year by year, to do in an orderly fashion rather more than to give consideration, which is what the resolution asks for. We have not only given consideration; we have actually liquidated the problem—and to an increasing extent—each year.

I think there is more to be taken out of the progressive increase in the number of cases of debts liquidated each year than the mere fact that although these old veterans are getting a little bit older, most of them living in Alberta and Saskatchewan, I am told, have in recent years had rather better than average crops with better than average prices, and they have responded by helping themselves.

I am quite frank to say that on a couple of occasions when the numbers involved were greater; when the stability of Canadian agriculture was infinitely inferior to the position at the present time; when there was a great demand all across the country for handouts of various kinds, I supported this motion as it stood. I also supported it in the veterans' affairs committee, as was mentioned a moment ago, at least to the extent of receiving the recommendation and reporting it to the government—I think I was chairman of the committee at the time—on the ground that it was uneconomic to send good money after bad.

But I would remind the house that members of the government have a responsibility—and surely those in the opposition would not quarrel with this statement—to husband public money even more carefully than they would their own. I accept the figures which were given to us tonight of a reduction of approximately $400,000 in the amount for last year as against a contribution from the government of less than half that amount. I think perhaps there is a good deal to be said for a good business policy of orderly reduction of debt by assistance.

I reject out of hand the suggestion in the speech of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) tonight for the first time, that these people had been badly treated, that they have been subjected to injustice. I think the hon. gentleman was more unfair and a bit more bitter in his presentation tonight than he had ever been before. It surprised me a little, particularly when he is getting so near to the end of the road and when so many pleasant things have been said to him about keeping this matter before the attention of the house. He has been fairly successful. To put it in his own words and in the words of others, this campaign of his has been so successful that I was surprised a little that he should be digging back into the past to claim any credit for his opinion of former officials, rather than to accept the fact that his voice has been listened to, as all voices are listened to, when that which they propose has merit.

The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) also had something to say. I know him; I know his sympathetic instincts. I know the tendency of the Scot to be sentimental. I know as well as any man in this house the difficulty of keeping the sentimental approach away from any matter dealing with veterans, and particularly of veterans who are ageing and under financial or physical stress. In his remarks he indicated that he had accepted the idea that there was something unjust about it. The injustice of what has happened to these people in individual cases is often the result of their differences of opinion with administrators in the field, or it is the result of the prevailing prices which existed at the time of purchase, or it is the result of bad advice which was given and taken by the members of the then department.

Mr. Fair: If I might come to the hon. gentleman's assistance, the injustice I mentioned was the price these people had to pay for land, livestock and equipment, which was two or three times what it should have been at that particular time. That is the injustice.

Mr. Mutch: I was coming to that. I just said that it had sometimes been related to prices, and I was on the point of saying that in certain circumstances it has long been recognized that too high prices were paid on good land and a great deal of inferior land was, in other circumstances, procured for and sold to soldier settlers.

I am not going to dig back into the political history of the early twenties to remind the house of some of the situations which arose then. I am not denying what some of my hon. friends have said tonight, that there were factors which were recognized in the first instance by some of those who, if they did not perpetrate the mistakes, permitted them to happen during their administration, and by those who succeeded them. One must remember when we talk loosely of injustice that 30 per cent of that indebtedness was written off at one crack, and that many others who were industrious and who were good operators were given a further opportunity under the inducement that was mentioned of a fifty-fifty break on their indebtedness if they were able to meet the offer, and thousands of them did meet it.

Therefore I am a little surprised at my hon. friends coming to the house now at the close of the fifth year of a rather unusual experiment in accomplishing the very thing which they desire to happen, and not showing at least the same kind of appreciation in public which the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) mentioned a moment ago when he spoke about his realization that the urgency had gone out of some of these problems. I did not take it that he meant that all the bad cases had been dealt with; neither did I take it that he felt that it was not—I was going to say any reflection—on those who were still in difficulty, but that would be too strong a word. I do not take that position myself, but I do not believe, as the hon. member for Selkirk suggested, that all those men who remain under indebtedness have been the victim either of their service or their circumstances, any more than I believe that all those who already have had advantage of these various reductions were always entirely deserving.

Really it is too late to look into that aspect of it; it is too late to make an issue of whether the late director of the soldier settlement board was a saint or an angel. It is almost bad form to think of him in relation to this particular type of legislation, and certainly I was surprised that any hon. member should claim any credit for the fact that he has been translated to another sphere in the public service. That is not an issue which is germane to this matter.

We have a problem. About a year ago we had 862 people who owed roughly $950,000. As the result of the administration of a fund of $175,000 last year we have been able to reduce these numbers by 262. I did not subtract the figures, but the figures used a moment ago show a balance outstanding of less than $600,000. Taking into account the figures which my hon. friend has given, this probably means that in about two years' time, at that rate, we shall have removed the problem, and we shall not have established a precedent of saying that if you are stubborn enough and you live long enough, even though you make a contract with the government you will not have to pay.

I am not suggesting that a single one of these remaining men is taking that attitude. There have been instances of men who did. I do not know of any at the present time. I am not suggesting that, but I do suggest that there is a principle which has to be recognized; there is a contract. Under these conditions I do suggest it is unfair to say that any injustice has been done to them as individuals as compared with all of the other 25,000 who have succeeded or who have passed out of the picture, having striven and failed.

I am particularly and peculiarly aware of the fact that we have here a great new field of contracts with the veterans of world war II. We shall have more shortly. I am not unmindful of the importance of the way in which this or any other government succeeds in winding up the soldier settlement board scheme. I feel sympathetic. I am as sympathetic to the objects of the hon. gentleman as I was when I stood up in my place in the house and voted on the first occasion, with some personal embarrassment.

Being as close to the administration of the department as I am, I am convinced from what I have seen that what we are doing is not working the type of hardship upon these people which has been indicated tonight by some of my hon. friends. I believe that we are accomplishing our objective in an orderly, businesslike manner, and in a way which is not likely to prejudice the contracts which will exist in the future or give rise to hard feelings on the part of those who made the necessary little bit of extra struggle or had the necessary little bit of extra luck to fulfil their contract at the full price.

There is no one, I am informed, who is in dire necessity as a result of his indebtedness to us who is not given consideration, who is not assisted in many instances either partially or by outright payments. I submit, sir, that this approach to the problem, with which I have had some association and which has been received so well by most of those who have profited by it, is as much as the house should ask of the department at this particular time. I submit that it is meeting the situation and will continue to meet it in full whether or not my hon. friend will have an opportunity to come back and make one more appeal for the last time. I suppose that is in the hands of other persons than him and me. If he is elected, I am sure he will make the plea again. If he does and I am speaking with any responsibility at that time, I am quite sure that I shall be able to tell him that the number is reduced again; that the cases of real hardship have been taken care of, and that the people for whom he pleads and for whom he has pleaded for so long—whom I too, in my own way, have tried to serve—are not getting a deal that can be described as unjust, but that they are, among debtors, in a preferred position, and that we are glad it is that way, and have every intention to keep it that way.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make one or two comments on the speech of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mutch). He has referred to the fact that many reductions have been made in the past. However, perhaps many hon. members are not aware of the fact that the reductions that were made rarely, if ever, caught up with the accumulation of back interest.

In those early years, in 1919 and 1920, when the soldier settlers first settled on their lands, the costs of those lands and of the equipment were excessive. Unfortunately it seemed to be the practice of many civilians at that time to soak the veteran the very highest price for any land he bought or any stock they sold him. As a result of that, and the fact that the prices of farm products fell very rapidly after the first war, soldier settlers very soon found themselves in a position where not only could they not make payments on principal, but they could not make their interest payments. The result was that interest charges accumulated on the overcapitalized value of the farms.

Finally, when the government saw that many of those soldier settlers were going to throw up the sponge, a reduction was given. But the reduction was too small. The interest had already accumulated, and the reduction did not bring the amounts owing by soldier settlers down to a level which bore a fair relationship to the value of the commodities they owned.

It has been pointed out that only 500 are left, and it is urged that this is not a bad record when one considers that originally there were 25,000. That, however, is not the case. It does not mean that only 500 of the 25,000 have not paid for their land, because a large percentage of that 25,000 simply quit. If we could say that they had all paid for their land, with the exception of 500, it would be a pleasing picture; unfortunately, however, a large percentage lost their land, and we cannot do anything about it now.

I went through the depression years as a soldier settler, and I know about many of the tragedies enacted in those years. I know of farmers who were trying to hang on, trying to get along on a shoe string, while at the same time pressure was being placed on them to make payments on their land. Those men were having tremendous difficulty in barely existing on their farms. That is why so many of them became discouraged and gave up.

As I say, we cannot do anything about that now. I appreciate what has been done in recent years in cutting down the amount of indebtedness of our older soldier settlers. Yet we must keep in mind that those few who remain are getting on in years. They are in a position now where they should be able to build up a reserve for their old age, and they should not have to continue to make payments on land. Let us keep in mind that the soldier settlement scheme was supposed to be a re-establishment scheme under which soldiers could become established within a period of 20 years. But now more than 30 years have gone by, and still they are not established.

The parliamentary assistant would admit, I am sure, that this situation has developed through no fault of these men. We recognize that in certain cases it was not possible for veterans to become established in 20 years, or in any length of time. Now we have 500 of them left, and it is 33 years since they first took up their land.

Surely we can very well write off the small amount that is left. The parliamentary assistant has suggested that this would be a bad example to the veterans settling under the new scheme. I think it would be just the opposite, because it would give those veterans who are settling today an assurance that if they play the game and if, in years to come, owing to conditions over which they have no control, they are unable to meet their obligations, the government will play fair with them and, if necessary, make a further reduction.

I can see the parliamentary assistant does not fully agree with what I am saying. But let me say that right today perhaps too much pressure is being placed on some of the veterans under the new scheme. I have heard that observation from some of the department's own field supervisors, who say the main point of consideration should not be how much money a veteran pays in, but rather to what extent he has improved the land; and that if certain improvements have been made the government should ease up on its collections. If certain farms are to become really productive, then a certain amount of money must be spent on them. If they are permitted to depreciate, to go downhill, they will suffer a loss of revenue.

I am quite satisfied that if we treat these 500 in such a way that we finally wipe off the debt it will not encourage veterans now settling on the land to say that they are not going to pay. I am sure they will not wait 20 years to have their debts reduced.

These old veterans have been on the land 30 years. While I appreciate what the department has done in recent years in cutting down the debt, I appreciate especially the work of the parliamentary assistant, because I feel that in the years he has served as chairman of the veterans affairs committee he had done everything within his power to see that the veterans get a fair deal, not only in regard to land but in regard to pensions and other matters connected with veterans affairs. He has done good work.

I suggest that at this time the government might very well say, "Well, there are only 500 of them. They have done their best. We will wipe the thing out."

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe), who is away on duty, I should like to say a word on this resolution. It is a pleasure at this time to renew acquaintance with my old friend the resolution of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair). Each year, when I had the honour of being minister of veterans affairs, I had that pleasure.

I express my thanks to the hon. member tonight for bracketing my name with that of the present minister and of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, in connection with the useful efforts that have been made on this subject. I am not going to make a prolonged speech. Certainly I am not going to make the old speech made in the past, because I have not had a chance to dig it up.

I am interested, however, in seeing that this problem, brought before the house each year by the hon. member for Battle River is, like the old soldier, not dead, but gradually fading away. Indeed it is fading away very rapidly, if we may judge by the figures quoted tonight. I believe it was in 1948 when we did institute a program, and at that time we said it would be a long-term one. However, it is not going to be so long because, as the parliamentary assistant said this evening, before very long, the whole matter will be wiped out in orderly fashion. And perhaps it will be cleared up with priority given to those—and I say this after due thought—who deserved it most in the first instance.

Having said that, it is with a good deal of regret that I must tell my hon. friend again this year that the government is not prepared to concur in his resolution. Consequently I shall find it my duty to vote against it. However, I join with him in expressing appreciation to the minister and his parliamentary assistant, as well as to the director of the Veterans Land Act, for the sympathetic understanding they are giving to veteran problems, and particularly the problems of the old-timers affected by this resolution.

Veterans Affairs

VETERANS AFFAIRS

AMENDMENT OF STANDING ORDERS TO PROVIDE FOR STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort) moved:

That standing order 63 be amended by inserting therein immediately after subsection (1) the following new subsection:

(m) on veterans affairs, to consist of 35 members, 10 of whom shall constitute a quorum.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it hardly seems necessary for me to speak to this motion which in effect would set up a permanent veterans affairs committee of the house. The necessity for such action is quite evident from resolutions passed by the Canadian Legion over the past number of years. In almost every presentation they have made to the veterans affairs committee they have asked for a permanent committee. The veterans affairs committee played a very prominent part in drawing up the veterans' charter which parliament passed after the last war, and I believe it was of great help to the government in so doing. That was natural, because on that committee there have always been members who were veterans and who from past experience have been able to give ideas and suggestions to the government in the preparation of veterans' legislation for the house.

It was because of the veterans on the veterans' affairs committee that the new act dealing with land settlement was so much better than the old Soldier Settlement Act that we had after the first war, and which the house has been discussing tonight. It was due to the suggestions of veterans on the veterans affairs committee that housing projects for veterans were initiated after the last war and the small holdings scheme brought into operation. It was due to the suggestions made by the veterans affairs committee to the government that much of the legislation in the veterans' charter was placed there. Therefore I feel that a permanent veterans affairs committee would be of great assistance to the government in seeing that the purpose for which the legislation was passed is carried out in the administration thereof.

As time goes on the administration sometimes gets farther and farther away from the intent and purpose for which acts were passed. After some five or ten years the people administering such legislation forget the purposes and objectives underlying its passage, and I am sure that a veterans affairs committee of the house dealing with these matters from year to year would be able to see that the intention behind the various pieces of legislation in the veterans charter was carried out. Only with a permanent veterans affairs committee that can keep the administration of the legislation close to the needs of veterans are we going to get the kind of administration that we should have.

Take, for instance, the war veterans' allowance. At the present time there is a payment of $50 a month to a single man and $90 a month to a married man, with an allowable earned income over and above that of $120 per year. Surely no one can argue that is enough for a veteran to live on. Surely the allowable earned income should be greater than it is at the present time. Surely the $50 and $90 should be raised to at least $60 and $120, and we should allow our veteran whatever he may be able to earn over and above that amount. These are matters which should be dealt with by a permanent veterans affairs committee.

Over the past number of years the government has seen fit to set up veterans affairs committees approximately every second or third year to deal with legislation which they proposed to bring before the house in the form of amendments to the various pieces of veterans' legislation. These committees are set up for a specific purpose, and are not able to deal with the general veterans' legislation. The discussion in the committee is held to the matters which are referred directly to that committee, and we are not able to bring forward many of the suggestions that we, as members, have from our own organizations in the country or from individual veterans as to how the administration of the veterans' charter could be improved.

As I said, as time goes on there are going to be more difficulties in the administration of the veterans' charter. The people administering it are not as sympathetic as they were when the acts were first passed. At that time most of the men who were holding administrative positions in the department were veterans themselves, and were in immediate contact with their comrades. As time goes on they become civil servants rather than the representatives of the veterans.

Mr. Mutch: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? Is he suggesting that the interpretation and administration of the veterans' charter has suffered by a lessening of the community of interest between the officials of D.V.A. and the veterans?

Mr. Wright: I am saying that has been the tendency in the past. Certainly that is what happened between the first world war and the second world war. I am saying that that tendency in the Department of Veterans Affairs will grow unless we have a permanent committee of this house. I believe it is quite evident to the hon. member who has just spoken that that did happen between the first war and 1939. At that time there was a much less sympathetic attitude in the department than there was in 1919 and 1920, so far as the administration of veterans' legislation passed after the first war was concerned. I am quite certain that will occur again in the department.

Mr. Mutch: Since the hon. gentleman has challenged me, I would not concede that. I believe that the interest, the knowledge and the understanding of the intent of parliament was much greater, and that within the scope of the legislation individuals were much better treated in 1939 than anyone thought possible in 1919.

Mr. Wright: The hon. member who has just spoken has expressed his opinion, and I am expressing mine. I am expressing an opinion which I think was held by a great number of veterans. I believe I am expressing an opinion which is becoming prevalent among the veterans today. They believe that as time goes on there is a less sympathetic administration of the various acts under the veterans' charter.

I believe one of the main reasons for establishing a veterans affairs committee is to ensure that the intent and purpose expressed by the veteran members of the committee when the various acts were passed are carried out by the administration as the years go by. If that were not a fact, why would the Legion representatives ask for a permanent veterans affairs committee? That has been one of the things we have had placed before us by practically every representative of the Legion during the last three years. Surely they must have a reason for that. The Legion usually has sound reasons for making requests to this government. From time to time the government has seen fit to listen to these representations and, in part at least, to put them in the form of legislation.

I should like to hear from the hon. member who has interrupted as to just why we should not have a permanent veterans affairs committee, in view of the fact such a committee could assist the government in the administration of the veterans' charter. That is the only reason I have for putting forward this suggestion at this time. It is a suggestion which I believe would assist the government in keeping the veterans' charter what it was intended to be, something of real assistance to our veterans in their re-establishment in civil life.

Another matter which is being brought up this session is that of further assistance to veterans' children for education. This subject was discussed when the charter was first being considered by the veterans affairs committee. On different occasions I, along with other members of that committee, asked that some provision should be made in the veterans' charter for the education of veterans' children. It is only now, after several years, that the government is considering the matter.

I do not know what legislation the government may introduce concerning assistance to the veterans' children for education, but I hope they will appoint a veterans affairs committee of this house and submit the legislation to that committee. In this way the government would receive the benefit of the knowledge of the members of this committee, and that would be of assistance to the government. As yet we have had no indication that it is the intention of the government to set up the veterans affairs committee and refer that particular legislation to them. I believe that should be done.

If this motion were accepted and a permanent veterans affairs committee established, it would add to the effectiveness of the veterans' charter by reason of the fact that the committee would be kept in close touch with those who are affected by the charter. I am sure that if he had been here the minister would have had something to say about this matter. I am sorry he is not in his seat tonight. Probably his assistant may have something to say on the subject. I hope what he says will be sympathetic, and I hope he will agree with me that we should have a permanent veterans affairs committee of this house.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): I should like to say a word or two on this motion. I am rather surprised that the hon. member took up so much time. On a motion as important as this, I would not try to talk it out. I should like to say that I agree with him, but if the matter comes to a vote I shall not be able to vote because I am paired with one of the members in his group. I am putting forward a different argument in favour of the motion.

I happen to be a member of two committees of this house, I believe. One is the committee on the restaurant. It might just as well be sitting in Korea for all it does. Then I have the honour to be the chairman of the printing committee. I believe I have been the chairman ever since 1940. We have had one meeting since 1940. I would have liked to have meetings oftener. Once when I thought we were going to have a room all to ourselves I saw a picture in the press of the place our new offices were going to be in Hull. I still cannot swim, so I could not hold the meeting over there.

I believe the government has stated how important this committee on veterans affairs is. If I recall correctly, last year we spent $228 million in the Department of Veterans Affairs. I am looking at it from the straight financial point of view, and $228 million is a lot of money. I do not know of any committee that should be more important than the veterans affairs committee. If we owe a debt to anybody, we owe it to the veterans of this country and their dependents. We have had excellent committees ever since I have been here. I have had the privilege of sitting on them. On the whole we have got on very well together as members representing all parties. I have never been able to see eye to eye at all times with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). But on the other hand, any man who could see eye to eye with him on all matters should not be here. He should be in a position which is a long way upward. But the veterans themselves have asked for this committee. All the veterans' organizations have asked for it because they and I think it is in the best interests of the veterans themselves.

We had an excellent committee, Mr. Speaker, which had more to do than anything else in this house with bringing in that excellent old age pension legislation we now have. That committee studied the matter continuously. I believe we should have had a committee this year on health insurance. Whether that view is right or wrong, that is my opinion.

We have a large number of veterans in the Dominion of Canada. I am not going to say here and now whether or not they have been properly treated. That is not the point as I see it. For the benefit of the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), I may say that I am not reading my speech. In the interests of the veterans throughout the country and, as a matter of fact, in the interests of the economy of Canada as a whole, we should have a permanent committee. Obviously as the years go by we shall have to review the plight of the veterans and their dependents from a different angle from year to year. We brought down an excellent veterans' charter, but that charter should be kept up to date. In order to keep it up to date we shall have to look at conditions as they change. We have had inflation to a certain extent. We therefore have to view the financial remuneration to these veterans and their dependents in the light of world conditions of the day.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

I am not trying to talk this resolution out. Probably I am in the unfortunate position that I am not able to vote for a few days because of my pair. I believe that the people of Canada, including the majority of the members of this house if they look at this matter from a free point of view, would like to see this committee set up. As I have already said, Mr. Speaker, when we have set up a committee that sits once in ten years and another that sits about once in three or four years, whose members do nothing but look at one another and sympathize with one another over the poor food we get in the cafeteria, surely we should have a permanent committee to consider the affairs of our veterans. I am entirely in favour of it. The veterans of my riding, through their Legion, are entirely in favour of this committee. I also believe that the people in my riding are in favour of having this permanent committee set up at this session of parliament.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member who has just taken his seat, I do not wish to talk this resolution out because I think it is an extremely important one. It is one that has been before the house on many occasions. The house well knows my views on this subject. On a good many occasions I have recommended a permanent veterans committee of the house. As I think the hon. member who has just taken his seat stated, the veterans of this country look upon the veterans committee as their forum.

Since the first veterans committee was set up many years ago—I am not sure of the date but I think it was in 1916—we have had a great many veterans committees. We have had one practically every second session. As far as veterans are concerned, the situation keeps changing from year to year. When the veterans' charter was put through here in the house a few years ago—and at that time the members who sat on that committee worked for many weeks—we thought we had evolved a fairly perfect charter for the veterans. But since then there have been a great many changes; and year after year, as conditions change in this country, the veterans' situation changes. I am sure it is obvious to all of us that, with these changes, it is necessary that the veterans committee of the House of Commons should be permanent.

When I was speaking on this matter on a previous occasion I think I pointed out that there are in the House of Commons a number of permanent committees which never sit at all. They never have any business to come before them. A veterans committee, however, is one in which, every year, extremely important business could be discussed.

For instance, there are now two government resolutions on the order paper. One of them, of course, is not particularly important because it is more or less routine. The other, however, is important and should be discussed by a veterans committee. There should be other resolutions as well. I am not going to discuss the War Veterans Allowance Act tonight, but there is not a member in the house who does not realize that the situation with regard to that act is highly unsatisfactory to war veterans all across this country who are in receipt of that allowance. There should be a change in the War Veterans Allowance Act. I am hoping that a committee will be set up this year and that the War Veterans Allowance Act will receive consideration by this committee and by the government.

As I said a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to assist in talking out this resolution. It is a most important resolution. I sincerely believe that a committee of this house should be set up. I wish to express my strong approval of the resolution which has been moved tonight by the hon. member, and to express the hope that the house will give favourable consideration to setting up this year a permanent veterans committee of the House of Commons.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to repeat any of the arguments used by those who have already spoken in this debate, but I want to indicate my approval of this resolution and to express the hope that the government will see fit to set up this permanent committee. We have veterans' legislation coming up from time to time; and from all appearances we shall have such legislation coming up for quite a number of years. With a permanent veterans committee set up, it will be possible to deal with those items as they come up without having to wait—as I know we have had to wait in the past—for a number of pieces of legislation to come up, hold them back and lump them all in one bunch so the committee could be set up and take them all in one lot.

In addition, we find that the veterans' organizations hold their conventions annually. With a permanent committee set up we could hear their briefs and consider their recommendations without having to wait to set up any special committee. We regret that the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) will not be able to vote on this matter; but he is in the fortunate position of being able to indicate which way he would have voted when he stands up to announce that he is paired.

Mr. Cruickshank: I have already stated that.

Mr. Thomas: That is fine. The hon. member can do it again.

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in connection with this resolution. At the very commencement of my remarks I wish to say that I am in favour of the principle of this resolution with respect to the setting up of a permanent veterans committee.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, without my reiterating it now, we have a large number of house committees. We also have at various stages of development and, I might say, of impotency, special committees of the house. They are set up annually, and as the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) has already said, they seldom meet. Anyone who looks at this problem will have to appreciate the fact that as long as the cold war continues—and at the present time there seems to be no abatement of it—as long as we have the great number of veterans that we have from world war II, and as long as we have that diminishing number of veterans of world war I, it seems to me that the establishment of this committee is a great deal more essential than a lot of the other committees that are now recognized as established committees of the house.

In addition to that, there is the question with respect to the changing conditions of the veterans. Last year, as a member of the veterans committee, I supported Bill No. 181 because I felt it was a step in the right direction; not that it was the complete answer to the veterans' problems but at least a step in the right direction. I think it is the duty of all hon. members in all parts of the house to be interested in the welfare, health and well-being of every man who in the hour of national crisis as far as the freedom of our country was concerned, saw fit to enlist in one of the various branches of the armed services of our country. I do not know of any class of citizens within the Dominion of Canada possibly more entitled to consideration than the men who offered their lives in the service of their country.

That is why I wish to say very tersely and affirmatively that as far as I am concerned, and I am sure as far as the veterans' organizations and the general population and the electors of my own riding are concerned, they will support me one hundred per cent when I make a plea for the establishment of this committee at this time.

Mr. Knowles: Question!

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. L. A. Mutch (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): No, we will not vote on the question at the moment. If one accepts the speeches we have heard on it tonight, to say nothing of the ones we have heard before, at anything approximating their face value, this matter should not be decided in the last three minutes of a long day, and particularly in the absence of the minister of the department. It is also a question in which numbers of those on previous veterans' committees, which includes the hon. gentlemen who just called "Question", have been gravely concerned. I am not going to attempt to deal with it in the three minutes that are left, so I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to call it ten o'clock, and I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Mutch the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move the adjournment of the house, Mr. Speaker. Tomorrow we shall take up the motion to set up the committee to examine national defence expenditures. If that motion is disposed of we shall take up the resolution relating to the appointment of an associate minister of national defence; then the items on the order paper in the name of the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Green: In what order, can the minister say?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Items 32, 31, 30 and 26 on today's order paper.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 9.55 p.m.

CANADIAN NATIONAL TELEGRAPHS

MOA091 39 Montreal Que 10 1227P

The Honourable Brooke Claxton

Minister of National Defence Ottawa

Your telegram ninth received. Have had private investigation underway and some significant developments. On speaking RCMP headquarters here am told not yet instructed but will put my investigators in touch with them with all information and co-operation.

G. S. Currie.

MINISTER OF JUSTICE AND ATTORNEY GENERAL OF CANADA

OTTAWA, Canada, January 17, 1953.

My dear Colleague,

Referring to your letter to me of January 10th, 1953, I now wish to inform you that the R.C.M.P. have now completed their investigation and their report discloses that a copy of a draft of the report by Mr. George S. Currie was stolen from a printing shop in Montreal between November 25th and November 29th, 1952. In our opinion there is sufficient evidence to identify the person who took the report and warrant a criminal charge against him.

Following normal police practices, the facts as disclosed by the investigation have been made known to Mr. Currie.

Yours truly,

Stuart Garson.

The Hon. B. Claxton, Q.C., M.P.,
Minister of National Defence,
Ottawa, Ont.

OTTAWA, January 17, 1953.

G. S. Currie, Esq., C.A.,
507 Place d'Armes,
Montreal, P.Q.

Dear Mr. Currie:

Following your letter of January 7 and my telegram of January 9, the R.C.M.P. as you know have been investigating the matter.

I have just received from the Minister of Justice a letter of this day's date reporting on this and I enclose a copy.

Yours sincerely,

Brooke Claxton.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, January 20, 1953

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

CURRIE REPORT

REFERENCE TO RADIO BROADCAST BY MR. KNOWLES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. Last evening the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) participated in a broadcast outside the house about a matter being discussed in the house, namely the Currie report. I, of course, take no exception to that action. However, in the broadcast the hon. member used these words:

> But at any rate may I also point out that the Prime Minister himself, back in 1945, received certain documents which he knew were stolen.
> Mr. Fraser: What do you mean by that?
> Mr. Knowles: The documents that Igor Gouzenko brought to him when he was minister of justice and he felt it in the interest of the state that use should be made of those documents even though he knew quite clearly whence they had come.

I do not doubt that the hon. gentleman's recollection of what took place in 1945 may have become a bit hazy, but that statement is quite untrue. I never at any time saw Igor Gouzenko nor his documents nor did I at any time have them in my possession. The whole story is related in quite some detail by the then prime minister in Hansard of March 18, 1946, starting at page 47. I will not take the time of the house to read it but any hon. member who wishes to refresh his memory about the complete details will find them enumerated there. In the report of the royal commission which was set up to inquire into that matter, in another long narrative of the facts he will also find the following paragraph at page 644:

> Gouzenko, his wife and child, remained in apartment 6 for the rest of the night, under the care of the city police. There was a later caller at apartment 4 in the night but he retired in a short time without incident. On the morning of the 7th of September, Gouzenko was taken to the office of the R.C.M.P. where he turned over his documents, told his story and asked to be kept in protective custody as he feared for his safety and that of his wife and child.

My own personal recollection of the facts is that on the morning of the 6th of September—parliament was opening on that day—I did not go to the Justice building but came directly to the centre block here, and that when I arrived here my secretary reported to me that a man with his wife had gone to him and asked to see me and had explained that he wanted to see me because he was from the Russian embassy and had some papers that he felt were of importance to the security of Canada. I answered that I could not see him, that we were maintaining friendly diplomatic relations with the Russian embassy and that I could not take any part in any quarrel between an employee in the embassy and his employers. I felt that that might become a rather serious international incident.

I communicated with the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs and told him what my attitude had been and that, unless I received directions from the government to act otherwise, that is the way I felt I should act; that my secretary had a story that he would tell the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs if he wished to hear it. I heard nothing more about it that day or until an incident that afterwards I found rather amusing. The high commissioner for the United Kingdom was having a reception out at Earnscliffe. It was a fine day and he was receiving his guests on the lawn. I was standing chatting with him when the Russian ambassador came up to greet his host. I still stood there and we had a few minutes' conversation, in the course of which the high commissioner asked the ambassador—who, I gathered afterwards, used to do some fishing in the Ottawa river opposite Earnscliffe—if he had done any fishing recently. The ambassador had not done any in the last few days, and he turned to me with a smile and said: "And what about Your Excellency? Did you find the fishing good today?" Well, I did not know that he was chaffing me about the possibility of information having been conveyed to me by someone from the embassy. But afterwards I came to the conclusion that perhaps my sense of humour was not as keen as was that of the ambassador.

It will be recalled that this man had tried on the 5th to tell his story, and had told his story to someone in a newspaper office, and had not been taken very seriously. He had tried that day, or on the 6th of September, to get someone to take his story seriously and had failed to do so. He had then asked—being apparently in real fear for his security—the occupant of apartment six in the apartment house where he had apartment four if he could not stay there, or if they would not take care of his child because he was afraid there might be some attempt to reach him in his own apartment, and there was an attempt which is related in this report by the Prime Minister and related in the report of the royal commission that there had been a fracas there. Four people had burst into apartment four and had ransacked it. The municipal police had been alerted and they did appear on the scene, and they watched over Gouzenko and his family's safety during the whole of that night, and the next morning they took him to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I was informed that that was taking place; I was told that he was brought there by the city police. I said: "Well, that seems to be regular procedure. I am not giving any instructions to the R.C.M.P. to behave in any other way than they behave when incidents are brought to their attention by municipal police." After that, the thing developed, but to the best of my recollection I never at any time saw Gouzenko. I did not see him to know that he was Gouzenko even if I did happen to see someone going by with the R.C.M.P. who actually was Gouzenko, and I never saw the documents.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, if I made a statement with respect to the part played by the Prime Minister in this incident which is not completely correct I readily accept the correction that he has made this afternoon. But may I be permitted at the same time to ask the Prime Minister one question? Is it not true that the documents referred to were accepted and used by the government of which he was a member, despite their known source?

Mr. St. Laurent: The documents in question were used as evidence of a criminal conspiracy against the safety of the state, which they revealed, and I am convinced that the hon. gentleman will agree that there was nothing done there in any way different from what is done when stolen property gets into the hands of the police and is used as evidence in prosecutions that are later instituted.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION

TABLING OF CONVENTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in conformity with the provisions of article 19, section 5, of the constitution of the international labour organization, I desire to lay on the table authentic texts of the following conventions and recommendations which were adopted by the international labour conference at its thirty-fifth session, held at Geneva, in June, 1952, together with a copy of a letter from the acting deputy attorney general of Canada setting out the legislative jurisdiction for each of these conventions and recommendations: Convention No. 101, concerning holidays with pay in agriculture, 1952; Convention No. 102, concerning minimum standards of social security, 1952; Convention No. 103, concerning maternity protection, revised, 1952; Recommendation No. 93 concerning holidays with pay in agriculture, 1952; Recommendation No. 94 concerning consultation and co-operation between employers and workers at the level of the undertaking, 1952; and Recommendation No. 95 concerning protection of maternity, 1952.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), the adjournment of the house, under standing order 31, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the possibility that the government may be influenced by the report of the royal commission tabled yesterday and thereby fail to undertake the immediate construction of the beneficial South Saskatchewan river project consistently recommended by the government's own P.F.R.A. officials and repeatedly promised to the people of western Canada by spokesmen for the federal government.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Argue, seconded by Mr. Wright, asked leave to make a motion under standing order 31 to adjourn the house to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance. The motion is made according to the rules after the ordinary daily routine of business has been concluded and before notices of motions or orders of the day are entered upon. The motion is accordingly made at the right time. The hon. member has stated the matter and has handed to me a statement of the matter proposed to be discussed.

It is my duty is determine whether it is in order and of urgent public importance. I have read the motion. One question for me to consider is whether the matter is one of urgent public importance in accordance with the rules of the house. I should remind the house that the question of urgency is one which means that the matter is so important that the national interest would suffer if consideration of it is not proceeded with immediately. The provisions with respect to this matter are found in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, citation

172 and following citations. Let me refer hon. members to citation 176, which reads:

The "definite matter of urgent public importance", for the discussion of which the adjournment of the house may be moved under standing order 31, must be so pressing that public interest will suffer if it is not given immediate attention.

And may I also remind hon. members of the second paragraph in citation 174, which reads:

"Urgency" within this rule does not apply to the matter itself, but it means "urgency of debate", when the ordinary opportunities provided by the rules of the house do not permit the subject to be brought on early enough and public interest demands that discussion take place immediately.

This is a matter which has been under consideration by a royal commission for some considerable time. The report of the royal commission was tabled yesterday. I am sure there will be ample opportunity within the near future, under the rules of the house, to discuss the matter. I do not feel it is one which should be debated today, so as to interrupt the business which has been arranged for today. Therefore I cannot allow the matter to be proceeded with at this time.

CUBAN SUGAR

IMPORTATION AND SALE IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. MacKenzie (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to ask a question of the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce or, in his absence, the parliamentary assistant to the minister. In view of the fact that sugar beet growers in western Ontario are quite alarmed about the importation into Canada of fully refined sugar from Cuba, has the parliamentary assistant to the minister of trade and commerce any definite information as to what date the minister is scheduled to be in Cuba, in conference with the Cuban government officials, in an endeavour to come to an amicable agreement on the selling of fully refined Cuban sugar in this country?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): As hon. members are aware, there were two or three public announcements put out about the trip of the minister to Latin America. I understand he will be in Cuba on February 2, 3 and 4, and that a meeting will take place on February 4. I think that is public information that has been put out many times before.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FREIGHT RATES

REPORTED HIGHER RATE ON BRITISH AUTOMOBILES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport, of which I have given notice. Has it been brought to the minister's attention that a higher freight rate per mile is charged by the railways on British cars shipped to the prairies from Montreal than on Canadian cars shipped from Toronto Oshawa or Windsor? If so, has he considered action to end this discrimination?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, dealing with the last part of the question first, let me say that the matter of discrimination is not one which can be handled by the minister. It is one which as a rule, is the responsibility of the board of transport commissioners when there is unjust discrimination. But there are cases where the railways, because of competitive rates, have the right to file certain tariffs.

In this case I am informed that current rates on domestic automobile traffic are dictated by competitive conditions which are said not to exist in relation to automobiles imported from other countries.

DAIRY INDUSTRY

UNITED STATES IMPORT RESTRICTIONS—ACTION BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the government of Canada made representations to the government of the United States protesting against their most recent action in placing further restrictions against the importation of dairy products into that country, contrary to the Geneva agreement on tariffs and trade?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): The answer is no. Hon. members are no doubt aware of the changes now taking place in the United States administration. In the light of these changes, the government has been awaiting a favourable opportunity to review this whole question, and to decide what further representations should be made. It will be recalled that representations were made with respect to the first action taken by the United States government.

Mr. Fleming: Could the parliamentary assistant give us the date upon which the last representations were made on this subject to the United States government?

Mr. McIlraith: I cannot give that date, offhand; but I can recall to the hon. member's attention the fact that the further restrictions referred to in the question were imposed by the United States government on December 30, 1952.

VICTORIA DAY

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF DATE OF HOLIDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State. In view of conflicting interpretations in the press concerning the act passed last year, can an official announcement be made as to which Monday in May will be observed as Victoria Day?

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, an announcement is to be made in due course.

DEFENCE EXPENDITURE

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Friday, January 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for the appointment of a committee to examine defence expenditures and commitments, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Claxton, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Knowles.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I intend to intervene but briefly in this debate, which is taking place on the subject as set forth in the resolution read to the house a moment ago by the Clerk Assistant. Many matters have been covered in debate, with some of which I should like to deal again. I do not think it would be fair to the house, however, to repeat some of the arguments made here before, important as they may be.

References have been made to statements made by the chief of general staff, both in a letter tabled in the house and in an article which has appeared subsequently in the Canadian Army Journal. I was very glad indeed to hear the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that the article in question had been written prior to the chief of general staff having seen the Currie report. This might suggest that the printing of the Canadian Army Journal is not as expeditious as one might like. Nevertheless it is a good thing that the statements contained therein cannot be construed as a criticism of the House of Commons, as such.

However, in his letter, the chief of general staff referred to what he termed as attacks upon the armed services. And the minister, speaking in the house on January 13, said, as reported in Hansard:

> Perhaps I have been overenthusiastic in the defence of the armed forces, against what I felt to be unjustified charges.

I say, with respect, that that is a red herring thrown across the trail to try to obscure the real matter which should be investigated. In so far as I know, there have been no charges made against the armed forces at any time—certainly by no member on this side of the house. That should be made clear.

Mr. Currie in his report, and quite properly, reflects credit upon and compliments the members of the armed forces for having failed to walk through the open door which was left open to them by the administration, through this government, of the Department of National Defence. He says that it reflects great credit upon the honesty and integrity of the members of the forces. With that we all agree. We realize, as I think the Solicitor General (Mr. Campney) said earlier in this debate, that in any group of men you are bound to find some crooks. That is true. But we do take pride in the fact that the number of those who have appeared in any investigation of the armed forces is very small indeed.

I am sure that the reputation of our armed forces as to either honesty or efficiency, will compare very well with the reputation of the forces of any other nation in the world. I am quite sure that members of the armed forces would compare most favourably with a similar group of citizens from any walk of life, even members of the House of Commons. Some of us have had experience in the armed forces. There are many sitting around here, some like myself, who were rear rank privates while others were colonels, generals or occupied comparable ranks in the sister services. I think we all realize that the one thing which undermines the morale of the armed forces more than anything else is the loss of confidence in those at or near the top. That is something which saps the morale of the armed forces. It is something this parliament should rectify. That is what we are trying to deal with during this discussion of the Currie report, and nothing more.

Let us analyse for a moment the speeches made by the Solicitor General and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), the latter speaking on January 13, both of which were long, both of which fully covered the field, and both of which were undoubtedly carefully prepared. I think they made the best defence possible in view of the circumstances with which they were confronted.

What do we find? I think their arguments fall into two classes. In the first place they both denied that there was any breakdown in the administration of the department. I think they denied that categorically. Then they went on to say, following somewhat the principle of the pleadings which were in effect under the old common law practice of confession and avoidance, that if there was a breakdown, which they submitted there was not, then it was due inevitably to the sudden expansion of the department brought about by the Korean crisis and the impossibility of getting trained personnel with which to perform the task confronting the department.

That is a most plausible explanation. It is one which perhaps we could understand, it is one which perhaps we could accept with some sympathy, if it were not for some of the statements which have been made by the Minister of National Defence in dealing previously with this matter. I have gone back through Hansard to look up some of the statements made by the minister with respect to the reconstruction of this department and its expansion. We remember in 1946 when the legislation was passed providing for the reorganization of the department following the war. Steps have been taken since then to develop this department.

We find that on June 24, 1948, almost five years ago, the minister, speaking on behalf of the government, set forth the purpose of the Department of National Defence, and I quote from page 5784 of Hansard of that date as follows:

(2) to provide the operational and administrative staffs, equipment, training personnel and reserve organization which would be capable of expansion as rapidly as necessary to meet any need;

That was a program which the minister laid down for himself, for the government and for his department in 1948. On August 31, 1950, the minister summed up the work of his department during the past year and then went on to say, and I quote from page 104 of Hansard as follows:

In conclusion I think we can say that we have been fortunate in that we were able to complete—

I ask you to note the word "complete".

—the post-war organization of the armed forces earlier and to a greater extent than most other countries, so that we have a sound organizational foundation upon which to build. It is, I believe, a smooth-working and efficient set-up—

Having reviewed his department during 1950, that was the statement made by the minister. Then during his estimates in 1951 there was some discussion with the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), who inquired about the set-up. The minister is reported on page 3362 of Hansard of May 24, 1951, as having replied to the hon. member for Greenwood as follows:

It is set up in accordance with the practice which has obtained in the Department of National Defence over the years. There has not been much change. We have to do a job, and we do it.

That was a summary given by the minister in 1951. In other words, in 1948 we have the minister setting forth the program which he has to accomplish, that is, the setting up of an administrative nucleus which could be expanded to meet any demands. In 1951 we have the minister boasting of the fact that that has been accomplished. That program was to cover an administration organization which would be capable of expansion to meet any demands, to use the minister's own words.

What do we now find? We find the minister and the Solicitor General coming into the house and saying, "It is true, we have run into difficulties, but that is because we have been expanding, it is because we have not been able to get trained personnel, it is because we have not the organization which we should have in order to meet the demands with which we are confronted." I think that one can say without being unfair that what the minister is saying is this: If we have failed, and we have failed to some extent, then our failure is due to the fact that we failed to set up the organizational set-up which we told the house we had set up. In other words, the house was not treated frankly when those questions were asked before and when the picture was created that we had a nucleus which could be expanded to meet any demands. Now we have failed because forsooth we failed in the past in setting up that organizational base.

In this connection I think one should point out that in 1947-48 this government spent for national defence in the establishment of this nucleus $239·9 million. In 1948-49 we spent over $252 million. In order to establish the nucleus which the minister said would be capable of expanding to meet any demands we spent over a quarter of a billion dollars in each of those years.

In 1936-37 this government spent $36 million through the Department of National Defence. Having spent what now appears to be a most paltry sum upon a nucleus for the defence of Canada, the Department of National Defence was able to expand and to take care of all the administration work entailed in fighting a second world war. According to the boasts of the government, they expanded it efficiently, there was no scandal or no suggestion of waste or extravagance. Yet a few years later with an expenditure ten times as large they were not able to make the expansion which was so necessary to be made.

In that connection too I should like to refer to another statement of the minister to the hon. member for Greenwood in the same debate on May 24, 1951. The hon. member for Greenwood had raised some question about the possibilities of moneys being wasted, and the minister said, as found at page 3348 of Hansard:

> I should like to ask the hon. member who has just expressed these vague fears if he knows of any reason for having them. If he knows of any failure of the services engaged in inspection to do their job properly I should like to hear about it. I have not heard about it and therefore I can assure him that I know of no reason for expressing dissatisfaction with the present situation. I hear of all cases that involve trouble, and I have heard of no case.

That is the statement of the minister to the hon. member for Greenwood in May of 1951. Yet Mr. Currie in his report refers to the fact that the chief auditor had made reports time and time again. Mr. Currie said:

> Time and again he had reported unsatisfactory conditions. This is clear from appendix "B" which summarizes his findings over a period of years. The deputy minister in each case had directed the quartermaster general to investigate and report. Lack of adequate action at this point had, however, caused a progressive deterioration in the situation. Aside from reports being delayed for considerable periods of time, the record shows the next audit revealing conditions similar to those previously reported and, in some cases, worse. The process is then again repeated.

We have the situation that in May, 1951, the minister said he had heard no report whatsoever reflecting on matters concerning his department. Yet we have this unqualified statement in the Currie report speaking about report after report that had been referred and pigeonholed. The minister did not deal with this matter in his lengthy address the other afternoon. I think the minister should tell the house whether he obtained these reports to which Mr. Currie refers. If he did not get them, why did he not get them? If he did get them, why did he make a statement such as he made to the hon. member for Greenwood in reply to his question? I think those are matters with which we are concerned.

The minister did say that some time in February of 1952, I think it was, a committee was set up, almost a tri-service committee, representing the Auditor General, his own department and others, to conduct an investigation. He says that at that time he had received reports about Petawawa and other matters and he set up an investigating committee to conduct an inquiry. I wonder if that was the first investigation that was conducted for the department? I wonder if the minister received no other reports before that. He was laying the foundation for the expansion of his department. Would he not apply to the civil service commission, for instance, for administrative personnel when necessary? Would there not be reports by officers of the civil service commission with respect to his department? I wonder how many reports the minister did receive concerning affairs in his department. I wonder if, for instance, he received reports criticizing construction costs. We have had a statement by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) respecting certain defence costs. I wonder if reports were received showing that buildings constructed by the engineers, for example, cost twice as much as those built by civilian contractors long before 1951. How many reports, if any, other than this one which the minister received, were received by his department, if not by him, prior to May 24, 1951?

Those are matters concerning which I think the house is entitled to more information than it has received heretofore. I quite agree with the minister that we are not concerned here with looking for scapegoats, and whatever our own interests may be in this house, certainly the people of Canada are not concerned with us playing politics. What they want is the situation cleared up so that the defence department and armed services can be maintained at as high a standard of efficiency as possible, and so that the taxpayers' dollar, 50 cents of which goes into this department, can and will be safeguarded. It is for that purpose that the defence expenditure committee is being set up, and I do not think it is fair to the committee to hamstring it by an order that it must first deal with the Currie report. In other words, the function of the committee would then be to investigate the investigator.

There are many other things that should be investigated by the committee. There are tremendous expenditures of government money concerning which the people expect a report by this parliament. Normally the house will be rising in a few months, and with the vast amounts of money that have been expended by this department and which expenditures have been referred to the committee, I say, sir, that it is not expedient, practical or right that the committee should be compelled to deal first with the one matter of this report and therefore be precluded from investigating many other matters with which the committee would like to deal. In fact it would appear that not only is the government attempting to becloud the matter of the Currie report itself, but by tying it in with this committee it is also going to do its best to hamstring that committee and prevent it from conducting investigations into other matters which certainly should be investigated rather than the one question of the Currie report.

I do not intend to go further into this subject at this time. I think it is a matter of paramount interest to the nation, and one with which parliament should deal and deal now. I should like to make one reference to a matter which transpired yesterday and which possibly is sub judice now. However, I intend to make no specific reference except to the letter tabled yesterday by the Attorney General of Canada having to do with certain investigations and saying that following normal police practices certain matters had been referred to an individual. Without going into the details of any one matter, I wonder just what the reference to "normal police practices" means. We have heard a reference this afternoon by the Prime Minister to the police dealing with a national matter threatening the safety of the state and on a national basis. I have had some little experience with police matters as a prosecuting officer for many years and sometimes as defence counsel, and it is my experience that it is not the function of the police to conduct investigations on the orders of the Attorney General of Canada and then apparently to pass the matter on to an individual and say, "Either you deal with this or not", with the inference that if you do not you are failing in your duty to the state.

If there is a crime under the provisions of the Criminal Code, that is a matter for the attorney general of the province, and with that he should deal. If there is no crime under the Criminal Code and if it is a matter affecting the safety of the state, then it is one with which the Attorney General of Canada should deal as attorney general and not simply table correspondence in the house saying that the matter has been referred to an individual, and will he now please make up his mind what he is going to do about it. I doubt if that is consistent with the way in which matters of this kind should be dealt with, and I think it is something which will cause concern to all who do not want to see the intervention of police in matters which at one moment are termed criminal and at another moment savour of a political investigation. These, sir, are simply some observations of many that could be made on this report at this time.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak today only as a member of parliament or as a member of the Liberal party. I want to speak in another capacity, that of a taxpayer—a modest taxpayer who tries to abide as well as he can by the law of the land. I find that the contest between the C.C.F. and the Progressive Conservatives to steal, not another copy of the report but the show of political propaganda, from each other, is rather childish. Last week, leaving aside countless interruptions and elaborate and learned dissertations on points of order, for three days—with the exception of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), only five Liberals and fourteen opposition members spoke. There were nine Progressive Conservatives, three members of the C.C.F. and two Social Crediters. Two opposition members spoke for every supporter of the government who spoke.

Last session the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) criticized the appointment of Mr. Currie to make the report which has been referred to so often.

Mr. Fleming: No, he did not.

Mr. Pouliot: I remember that he complained about Mr. Currie's appointment.

Mr. Fleming: He did not.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to make a correction. There is no record of my having criticized the appointment of Mr. Currie—in this house or outside the house.

Mr. Fleming: At any time.

Mr. Pouliot: I am very glad the hon gentleman has said that because now he considers Mr. Currie to be a great oracle.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, in a matter that affects a very definite question of the acceptance of Mr. Currie, I wish to make it clear that I have at all times expressed my confidence in Mr. Currie. That confidence has gone back for a great many years.

Mr. Pouliot: That is very good. Then he is an oracle and the Leader of the Opposition had no reason to rise again. He, and the C.C.F., swear by Mr. Currie's written word—

Mr. Fleming: The Liberals are swearing at him.

Mr. Pouliot: —and not at all by his spoken word. They do not want him to appear before the committee which would be appointed in virtue of this motion. The Progressive Conservatives and C.C.F. together do not seem anxious to controvert the veracity or exactitude of his pronouncements and to know whether they are well founded in fact or not. On the other hand, the Minister of National Defence, whose conscience is clear, says: Let us call Mr. Currie to give evidence before the committee.

It makes a great difference.

The amendment of the Minister of National Defence was to instruct the committee—

—initially to give priority in their examination—

—to the Currie report. On the other hand, the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) moved instead that Mr. Currie should be——authorized to continue his inquiries and conduct a similar investigation—

—during the sittings of the committee. That subamendment was declared out of order.

Then, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), a C.C.F. member, moved:

—to give consideration to the desirability of recommending that Mr. Currie be asked to conduct a further inquiry into any other expenditures and commitments covered by the terms of this resolution.

Both subamendments are wholly ejusdem farinae—to the same effect. The Progressive Conservatives and members of the C.C.F. do not seem to desire that Mr. Currie shall appear before the committee to substantiate his allegations of wrong doing in the army. Either they are afraid to have him as a witness or they realize that there is not enough already in the report to justify their commitments.

Mr. Wright: The police prosecutions have substantiated them.

Mr. Pouliot: That is the opinion of the hon. gentleman. We may differ with him. He may be right and I may be right. He is right in name but I may be right in fact.

Mr. Speaker, I have read with great concern the last report of the R.C.M.P. in which it is said that criminality has increased by 43 per cent in one year. That is very bad. Human nature is the same in the army as in civilian life—no better. No certificate of good behaviour is required by the army and the toughest guys are often the best soldiers. The responsibilities of parliament and the duties of members to control expenditure are necessary things in parliamentary life, but one should not lose any sense of proportion. Now, according to the Currie report, and if what he says is right, the total amount that has been wasted would be $50,000 out of $2 billion. That means—

Mr. Fleming: That is not what he said.

Mr. Pouliot: Well, that is the calculation that has been made by most of the speakers. That means $5 for each $200,000 of expenditure; $1 for each $40,000 of expenditure; 1 cent for each $400 of expenditure; and ¼ of a cent for each $100 of expenditure.

An hon. Member: Peanuts.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. Fleming: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pouliot: Surely.

Mr. Fleming: Will the hon. member, in the light of what he has just said, favour the house with his comment on this expression in Mr. Currie's report as found at page 714 of Hansard?

My view would be, however, that the generally lax administrative situation would give rise to waste and inefficiency far more costly in loss than that covered by actual dishonesty.

Would the hon. member favour us with his comment on that pungent statement in Mr. Currie's report?

Mr. Pouliot: My comment would be this, and it dates back to a long time ago. One day in this house I said that the brass hats were mummies wrapped up in red tape. To my great humiliation the prime minister of the time asked me to withdraw. It may apply to Mr. Currie.

Mr. Fleming: He is not a brass hat.

Mr. Pouliot: What the hon. gentleman has said shows clearly the importance of the subamendment sponsored by the Minister of National Defence, to bring Mr. Currie—

Mr. Knowles: Mine is the subamendment.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, but the first subamendment was by the Minister of National Defence to give priority—

Mr. Fleming: That was the amendment.

Mr. Pouliot: —to the report before the committee. Then, when the motion is accepted or is voted on, the hon. gentleman and all other members of the committee will have full opportunity to get some evidence from Mr. Currie, and to be informed about the total amount of the money which has been wasted, according to what he has said. Until then and until his figures are checked and corrected, if necessary, it will be impossible for anyone, on the face of the report, to say what it is. But $50,000—

Mr. Fleming: What does the hon. member say it is?

Mr. Brooks: He was just speaking in respect of Petawawa.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member has stated there was a figure put on—

Mr. Pouliot: I would ask the hon. member not to be hurt by what I have said. He may have a great surprise when he has the opportunity to hear the evidence that will be given by Mr. Currie before the committee. I hope that he will get full information. Undoubtedly he will do so. Then he will be in a better position than he is today to make a statement or to adopt a statement that has been made by another.

I will now tell him something. He is a lawyer of experience and he knows that all reputable institutions have an account which is called the profit and loss account. I should be greatly surprised if the profit and loss accounts of our chartered banks, which are solid, and those of other important financial institutions were not higher than the amount referred to a moment ago and if their losses amounted to less than or to as little as a quarter of a cent per hundred dollars. But the opposition can hardly find any scandal during the eighteen years the Liberal party has been in power.

Mr. Hodgson: What about Beauharnois in 1927?

Mr. Pouliot: That was not in the last eighteen years and it was not a scandal. It was greatly exaggerated.

An hon. Member: Do not start to go back too far.

Mr. Pouliot: If we go back far enough we may find Garland, Foster and others such as Sam Hughes and all that. If you want a retrospective story I can give it because I have used it a great deal in past elections. I have a good enough memory to describe Sam Hughes accurately—

Mr. Hodgson: Tell us about Beauharnois.

Mr. Pouliot: —and also what happened at Valcartier near home.

Mr. Hodgson: You are part of the government. Tell us about Beauharnois.

Mr. Pouliot: No, no. I want the committee to sit as soon as possible. The position of the opposition is this. The hon. gentlemen are overrating and exaggerating the importance of this one report in the hope that it can serve their petty political purposes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fraser: No.

Mr. Pouliot: My friend the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) says no. I will mention one incident, and I will do it in French. "La plus noble conquête que l'homme ait jamais faite est celle de ce fier et fougueux animal qui partage avec lui la gloire des combats." I mean the horse, the friend of man. Having spoken of horses on the paylists, they do not realize how harmful it could be to those who have spoken about it in the house. I know the farmers and the day labourers very well. No one of them is so pleased as he is when he can have some work with his horse. When he works without his horse he is paid much less than he is paid when he works with his horse. I invite any Conservative speaker to speak about the shame of having horses on the paylist. He would be laughed at by his audience. The people who have horses are accustomed to work with them—to work with the horse and the wagon—and they are naturally better paid than they are when they have none to work with.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Currie said they were there under the names of non-existent labourers.

Mr. Pouliot: Perhaps it was the family name of the horse.

Mr. McGregor: I think the hon. member is headed for the Senate.

Mr. Pouliot: My hon. friend does not represent a rural constituency; but if he saw the names of some animals, he would be surprised. The names are so long that he would take them for grandees of Spain.

Mr. Fleming: Apparently the Department of National Defence did that.

Mr. Knowles: Are any of those horses going to run in the next election?

Mr. Pouliot: At the next election we will all defeat the president of the C.C.F. in the province of Quebec as I did twelve years ago when a majority of 12,000 was changed into a majority of 3,500. I had my say then. He will never be successful in political life. He is just a turncoat. That is not a threat, Mr. Speaker. It is a warning and a prophecy.

All hon. members are entitled to scrutinize the public accounts with a magnifying glass. No one should have any objection to that. But their criticism has missed the target because it was overdone and mostly because it was unfair and expressed lack of confidence in the Minister of National Defence. The only trouble was that he had to travel a great deal and nobody was appointed as a joint minister or acting minister until recently. But I understand that the government was right in appointing two defence ministers so that when one of them is outside of the country or is outside of Ottawa, there is always one here, who represents the government and the department. The appointment of the new minister was timely and called for.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I must say that since the report was tabled on December 15, I have met a number of people, and they are surprised at the length of the speeches which have been made with respect to it. Very often the issue has been sidetracked. What is before you, Mr. Speaker, is a motion to set up a committee on national defence expenditure; an amendment to give precedence to the examination of the Currie report by the committee; and then another amendment to which I have referred and which I hope will be defeated. In any event, the Canadian people have confidence in the Prime Minister, in the members of the government including the Minister of National Defence—the whole cabinet—and the Liberal party; and the next election will be won by the Liberal party.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the subject before this house is one which does not lend itself to the kind of remarks which have been made on a number of occasions. This house has now before it a resolution which relates to the most important department of government, and to the expenditure of approximately half of the money that is being taken from the taxpayers of this country at this time. Moreover, the ultimate effect of the discussion which is taking place, and to which our remarks should be directed, is the security of Canada and its survival as a free nation, and nothing else. We are not dealing with any mere satisfaction with the details of one report or another; we are dealing with the effectiveness of the administration of a department which is answerable to the people of Canada for the state of the armed forces and for the welfare and the maintenance of young men and women in uniform over widely separated parts of the world today.

There are young men in Korea engaged in what to them is no cold war, who must rely upon the efficiency of the administration of the department which is under consideration, and they must rely upon the acceptance by the government of its responsibility as a government for the efficiency of that department. There are also young men and women in uniform in Germany, in France, in Britain and in other parts of the world. It is to them that our thoughts should first be directed in considering the effect of any information now before us which may have been brought to our attention. Let us be quite clear on one fact. The reason that the Currie report is before us for discussion now is solely the responsibility of the government. We had on the order paper for some time a notice of a motion which would call for the setting up of a committee to inquire into defence expenditures and commitments for defence expenditures. When that motion was called a week ago today the government employed a device which is entirely within the rules, but which is unusual, of having another member of the government rise on the motion and introduce an amendment which of necessity would preclude the possibility of an effective amendment to the motion such as was well known to be the intention of the opposition.

What must be recognized by everyone is that when an amendment has been made, such as that which was presented in this instance, one need not be in very much doubt that it will receive the support of the majority of hon. members, and therefore any sub-amendment must be added to that amendment and must embrace it. The amendment in question was one to direct the committee to give priority to the consideration of the Currie report. That is the reason this discussion has been taking place in the past week in regard to the Currie report, and the only reason.

It was well known to the government that in our opinion there was no need for the Currie report to go before the committee on defence expenditure; it was well known to the government that we asked only for action on the Currie report, but that we did seek a wider inquiry into the broad field of organization and administration of the Department of National Defence which it was obvious should take place because of the disclosures in the Currie report.

I am speaking at this time on the first occasion in this debate. I have waited in the hope that there would be some indication from the government that it would accept the suggestion which I made directly in a letter to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on December 18 and which has been repeated on other occasions since then, that there be an inquiry into the broad details of organization and administration of the Department of National Defence. It is clear now, however, that the government intends to proceed with the course which it stated it intended to follow at the time that its position was put forward on the evening of December 17 last. Because of the extent to which an attempt has been made to divert attention from the real considerations before us I think it may be well to clarify some of those issues.

In the statement made by the government on the evening of December 17 an attempt was made to belittle the importance of the Currie report. Furthermore, an attempt was made in that carefully prepared statement by the government to create the impression that any attempt to deal with the disclosures in that report was to be regarded as an effort to take political advantage from the situation disclosed. In addition, it was indicated that the government proposed to divert attention in any way it could from the seriousness of the situation for which, as a government, it must accept full responsibility at this time.

The thing which it seems necessary to repeat and to emphasize is that the Currie report deals only with a very small segment of one part of the army, and deals in no way with the air force, the navy, or with any of the remaining parts of the army not covered by the direction to inquire into the army works services of the engineers. When these fantastic irregularities are disclosed within that small segment, then is it within the bounds of reason to suggest that the breakdown in the department which permitted that to happen affected just one small part of the army? If any argument of that kind were to be made, the answer to that argument was furnished to hon. members of this house by the annual report of the Auditor General tabled here a week ago yesterday. That report, presented by an official whose integrity and independence is unchallenged and unchallengeable, indicated that there are eight different methods of accounting within the Department of National Defence.

Do not let anyone come before this house and suggest that this is a desirable system, and one which has been maintained because of its efficiency. The Auditor General makes it perfectly clear that the ineffectiveness of the system has been emphasized over and over again, and that the government has failed to take the appropriate action to bring about the single system of accounting which is desirable.

These truly fantastic irregularities reported in the Currie report, almost all of which occurred in one camp, were under one system of accounting. What of the other seven systems? What is the evidence in regard to them? The Auditor General makes it quite clear that those other systems are not working any better.

He reports, as an example, that a brigadier in the army, proceeding to the civilian branch of the same service, receives a large salary in that office immediately upon his appointment to the civilian post, and for three months thereafter received the large salary paid him in the civilian post and at the same time his salary or pay as a brigadier. Other examples were given of irregularities which this chaotic system of accounting had permitted.

And yet, after this length of time, since the Currie report was presented to the house—now more than a month ago—there has not been any attempt to apologize to the house and, through the house, to the people of Canada, for the condition which has been disclosed. There has not been any attempt to express an appropriate measure of regret, but only an attempt to create the impression that any emphasis on the need for reforms within that department are, on the one hand, an exaggeration of the importance of the situation or, on the other hand, an attempt to create uncertainty in the public mind as to what the situation really is.

The Currie report is not the issue before us. Neither is the report of the Auditor General. Neither is the evidence put forward by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray), on his responsibility as a member, of still larger thefts and defalcations at an earlier date.

This Currie report brought before us for consideration, by the amendment presented by the government a week ago today, is a symptom of a grave disease, not the disease itself. It is the symptom of a dangerous and pernicious disease which calls for deep, firm and courageous cutting to remove the root of the trouble.

However, instead of any indication of an intention to submit the diseased administrative body to this type of operation, poultices of one kind or another are being applied to the surface irritation which has appeared. If this course continues, and if that majority in the house which, for whatever reason it does so, regularly supports the government, does support the course now proposed, then it will assure delay of those effective measures so badly needed to bring about some cure.

By the introduction of the Currie report in relation to the defence expenditure committee the government itself has placed squarely before us its administration of national defence. We know from the Currie report that there has been a complete breakdown in the accounting system of that department, so far as it affected the army branch of the engineering service. The Auditor General leaves no doubt that this breakdown, these chaotic conditions, extend over a wider field.

The statement I have just made cannot be challenged by the government, unless it is prepared to repudiate the Auditor General and also to repudiate Mr. Currie, the man whom they described last year as the man best qualified in the whole of Canada to undertake an inquiry of this nature.

There are certain findings in the Currie report which must not be dismissed from our minds, if we are to give appropriate consideration to the need for action other than that now suggested by the government. When we are told that there was only a loss of $50,000 at Petawawa, and that statement was repeated by one hon. member today, may I remind hon. members of Mr. Currie's words in that connection.

At no time did he suggest that $50,000 measured the losses at Petawawa. Where does this figure come from? On what authority?

Let us see what the man best qualified in the whole of Canada to state the facts has told us on this point. As reported on page 714 of Hansard, Mr. Currie, under the heading "The Attempts to Estimate Losses", had this to say:

> These, then, represent the ascertained cases of irregularity at Petawawa. How many more there may have been will never be known. It was apparent from the beginning of the investigation that the accounting records were in a chaotic condition and would be of little use in determining the nature and extent of irregularities. It is impractical, and perhaps impossible, regardless of the time which might be spent on examining records, to try and determine by this means the amount and value of the deficiencies.

That is the statement of a man accustomed to examining accounts. That is the statement of the man chosen by the government to conduct this inquiry. That is the statement of the man whom they described as the best qualified in Canada. That is the statement of a man in whose integrity and accuracy we have indicated our complete confidence. He tells us that these figures cannot be estimated, that the accounting methods are so chaotic that the amount of the losses will never be known.

Let us see what has been said during this debate in regard to some of those things. Speaking for the government, the Prime Minister made the statement that there were no horses on the payroll. We have the positive statement of Mr. Currie that there were. What is the authority for these statements that there are none?

Mr. St. Laurent: The payrolls.

Mr. Drew: The Prime Minister interjects the word "payrolls." When he discussed the report the evidence that he relied on was the evidence of a man convicted of a crime and now in the penitentiary. He ranged that man's evidence against the evidence of Mr. Currie. In fact they waited in order to get this very important evidence so that he could make the statement. Remember that this was not any casual statement by Mr. Currie; this was a statement which had been reconsidered by Mr. Currie. This is the statement which the government tried to have kept out of the report.

An hon. Member: No evidence of that.

Mr. Drew: Oh, yes, there is. This is the statement that was considered and discussed and that Mr. Currie chose to keep in. There is no question as to the good faith of the Prime Minister in making the statement, but the fact remains that he was relying on information which had come to him through channels which are challenged by every finding in this report. He was relying on information which came to him from a man who was convicted in connection with the very irregularities which are reported to us. I might say that he was relying on the evidence of a man who is now in the penitentiary and is seeking a parole.

An hon. Member: He will get it.

Mr. Drew: There is another thing I should like to point out. In an attempt to create the impression of inaccuracy in this report reference was made to the railway siding at Petawawa. The explanation with reference to this or the attempt to diminish its importance has two most interesting aspects.

Mr. Garson: I wonder if my hon. friend will permit a question. He has just made the statement that Sergeant Young is seeking a parole. Would he tell us upon what authority he makes that statement?

Mr. Drew: I would ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) if he will say that it is not so.

Mr. Garson: I most certainly will. The remissions branch comes under the Department of Justice and certainly no application for a parole has come to my attention. That is the reason I asked the question.

Mr. Drew: I repeat that the man in question is seeking a parole. The Minister of Justice is well able to find that out if he will seek the information.

Mr. Garson: May I ask my hon. friend the source of his information? Did he get it from Sergeant Young?

Mr. Drew: I am referring now to the statement made in the Currie report in regard to the railway siding as reported on page 713 of Hansard.

> In one striking instance, a large quantity of rails belonging to the Canadian Pacific railway was removed. When this loss was noted by the C.P.R. and questions raised, a spur line of the Canadian National running into the ordnance depot was taken up and the rails used to replace the missing C.P.R. track.

Some importance was attached to the statement that these rails did not belong to the Canadian National. I would point out the careful distinction that is drawn in this finding between the rails of the Canadian Pacific that were taken up and the Canadian National siding. My recollection of Petawawa goes back a great many years and the second siding from which the rails were removed has been known as the Canadian National siding since it was built into that camp. Those were the rails that were taken up.

However, the most interesting feature of this is that the government seems to think that it is perfectly all right if rails belonging to the government are stolen, but that it may not be all right if they belong to the Canadian Pacific. That is exactly why I say that the time is overdue for the government to recognize the seriousness of the situation disclosed by this report, by the report of the Auditor General and by the known disappearance of camp equipment right across the country. The attitude of the government is that if it is stolen from the government it is a very different thing. According to the government, this is not a Canadian National siding, it is a government siding, so it is quite all right—help yourself.

Mr. Rowe: Selective theft.

Mr. Drew: This could be described as a selective theft. That has been the attitude of the government in regard to these matters. The story about the dam at Tucker creek is heart-warming to those who realize the piscatorial possibilities of the area immediately behind that dam. It really must conjure up in the minds of members who know a very dramatic picture of fire-fighting when they are told that the dam was built to fight fires out in that distant area so far from the place where the important buildings of the camp really are.

I submit that these are minor findings in this case, but the government has given them importance in an attempt to create the impression that the Currie report is not accurate in detail.

We are told that the government proposes to seek no scapegoats. What is it doing in attempting to create doubts about the reliability of the report made by the man whom they have described as the best qualified man in Canada for this task? If this government, with all its opportunities for propaganda outside of the house—paid for of course by the people of Canada—is going to follow a practice of this kind when it engages the services of a distinguished Canadian like Mr. Currie, then it is going to close the door to the services of a great many Canadians who know what may be in store for them if they state their frank opinion about what the government has done.

We are told that it is important to bring the report before the defence expenditure committee. We are told that it is important to submit these findings of facts to that committee. We are told that it is important to find out if these horses were actually on the payroll or if the information given the Prime Minister by Sergeant Young, who is now in penitentiary, is accurate information.

Mr. St. Laurent: On a question of privilege, I deny having received any information from Sergeant Young or even knowing exactly where he is or how he got there, beyond what I have seen in the records of the department. The information I got was from the department and all the facts, except as to the division of the $1.50 an hour, were taken from the departmental records. The information with respect to the division of the $1.50 an hour was taken from a signed confession of Sergeant Young made before his conviction both to the officers of the provost corps and to the officers of the R.C.M.P.

Mr. Drew: That is the information which the Prime Minister referred to in the statement given in this house—

Mr. Fleming: Pages 892 and 893 of Hansard.

Mr. Drew: —and he told us then that he was waiting for the report of the statement by Sergeant Young.

Mr. St. Laurent: My hon. friend is quite mistaken there. I said I made a qualification when I gave the information to the house because there was some of the information that came from a statement made by Sergeant Young, but that was the statement made in the form of a written confession to the police.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, since this has been raised, let me read exactly what the Prime Minister said. I am interested in the Prime Minister's remark that he did not know where Sergeant Young was. These are his words, as recorded at page 892 of Hansard:

> I make this qualification because a part of the information is based on statements secured by the police from Sergeant Young who is now in the penitentiary and it is not possible to check all of them from official records.

Mr. Rowe: That is just what he said.

Mr. Drew: That is exactly what I said, that the Prime Minister was relying in part on information given by Sergeant Young, and the Prime Minister did know he was in the penitentiary.

Mr. St. Laurent: I know he is in a penitentiary. I do not know which penitentiary—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. St. Laurent: —and the statement—

Mr. Rowe: It does not matter much.

Mr. St. Laurent: —that I rose in my place to protest about implied that I had been in personal communication with Sergeant Young.

Mr. Rowe: It would not matter much which penitentiary he was in. He would be just as comfortable in one as in another.

Mr. St. Laurent: The record will show if that is the implication of the words I rose to protest against.

Mr. Drew: The statement of the Prime Minister is perfectly clear that he knew Sergeant Young was in penitentiary and that in making his statement he did not wait until he got that statement to tell the house what he thought about the horses.

Mr. Rowe: And Mr. Currie.

Mr. Drew: The fact is that what has happened is that the jockeys are in jail but the horses are still loose.

Mr. Garson: That is statesmanlike.

Mr. Drew: This may have appealed to many people because of its absurdity but it is the kind of thing which brings into sharp focus the nature of the irregularities which were occurring.

Mr. Garson: Typical tactics of the opposition—Hong Kong, Bren gun, North Star.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) is so interested in these proceedings, I should like to deal with certain activities of the government for which I assume he has accepted responsibility. A great deal has been said about the theft of a document. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police were used to conduct an inquiry. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police were directed to conduct an inquiry into what? Into anything affected by any federal law? No. The Minister of Justice makes that quite clear now. They conducted an inquiry and as a result the Minister of Justice has now advised that if anything is to follow it must be at the instance of Mr. Currie or the printing firm from which, according to him, this paper was removed.

Mr. Garson: I wonder if my hon. friend would identify the statement or material upon which he bases the last remark he has made.

Mr. Drew: Oh, Mr. Speaker, the Hansard record is adequate and I leave it at that.

Mr. Garson: Quote it then.

Mr. Rowe: He has been quoting it all afternoon to your shame.

Mr. Garson: If it is in Hansard and he is depending upon it, let him quote it.

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) is not required to answer questions. It is a matter entirely within his discretion.

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege, I say that my hon. friend's statement is without foundation, and if he has the evidence he will cite it.

Mr. Drew: The authority for it is the long and evasive speech made in the house by the Minister of Justice on this very subject. Furthermore, there is the letter of the Minister of Justice to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) which was placed on record, and so far as I know was a letter that actually did pass.

Mr. Rowe: Think that one over now.

Mr. Drew: I assume the minister signed that. Let us get this thing in perspective.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Let us get this in perspective so that those who obviously have been diverted from the real issue may bring their attention back to what is before us.

Mr. Garson: You are the person who has been doing the diverting.

Mr. Rowe: Your applause did not settle anything. Go ahead.

Mr. Drew: We have heard a great deal about the use of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. We have heard the astonishing statement by the Minister of Justice that if it is appropriate for individuals to use private detectives it is quite proper for the government to use that great force for activities of this kind.

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Drew: The minister says "right".

Mr. Garson: No, no.

Mr. Rowe: Some other member of the government.

Mr. Drew: Another member of the government—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No, no, not of the government.

Mr. Drew: Then, Mr. Speaker, what has just occurred indicates the desirability of those who have intelligent remarks to make getting on their feet to make them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the ribald laughter of members who support the government for one reason or another—

Mr. Garson: They have great justification.

Mr. Rowe: I would not laugh if I were on your side.

Mr. Drew: —indicates the attitude of the supporters of the government in regard to the serious situation disclosed in this report. I hope that right across Canada the people of this country will know that, while we are discussing the administration of a department that takes over $2 billion of their money from their pockets by taxation, supporters of this government can find nothing better than laughter with which to greet the discussion of a subject as serious as that now before us.

An hon. Member: We were laughing at you.

Mr. Rowe: He laughs best who laughs last.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Humbug.

Mr. Drew: I can just imagine the righteous indignation with which the Prime Minister would have demanded a retraction if that remark which has just been made had been made on this side of the house.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Hold your horses.

Mr. Drew: One of the typical remarks made by a supporter of the government is "hold your horses".

Mr. Rowe: I wouldn't mention them again.

Mr. Drew: It is the job of this government to hold the horses, and they have made a very poor effort—they have made an extremely poor effort; and these horses are nothing more than an indication of the general incompetence for which apparently the government is not prepared to accept the responsibility which it should.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: Are those DeWitt Foster's horses?

Mr. Drew: I am speaking about the use of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to conduct an inquiry. We already have had the term "theft" applied to this piece of paper. Now, what was actually taken? The government apparently does know now how it was taken, from whom and by whom. In that, it certainly has the advantage over most of the members of this house at this time.

What was taken? The working sheets, put in printed form, of what the man appointed by the government to make this inquiry proposed to present as his report. Was this an army operation order? Was this any secret government document relating to atomic secrets? Was this anything relating to the development of new weapons or anything of that kind? No.

An hon. Member: It was a new weapon for the Tory party.

Mr. Drew: It was the draft of findings in regard to matters which have been under discussion for over a year—as has been pointed out over and over again by the government in discussing this subject.

I have no knowledge of how that document became public, as has already been indicated. The government now has. I would imagine that the man appointed to conduct the inquiry would have some very serious objection to a document of that kind getting out of the printing shop; but what has actually happened as a result of that? All that has been lost is any pretence that this government permits reports to come before it without advance consideration. What has been disclosed by that chain of events, whether excusable or otherwise, is that this government tried to have substantial changes made in the Currie report and did not succeed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: It got out too soon.

Mr. Drew: What has been demonstrated beyond all question is that Mr. Currie was asked to reconsider the report, that he did, and that the report we now have before us in its final form is a report which was subject to that double checking and bears that double responsibility.

These words that are before us are words which this highly regarded accountant, this distinguished soldier, this man who at great personal sacrifice had acted as deputy minister of national defence during the war as a public servant, checked and refused to have changed.

When the government expresses such synthetic indignation over the removal of this paper from the print shop, I think it would be appropriate that we receive information from the same source about what the government is doing in regard to another report that got loose recently. Has the government instructed the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to conduct an inquiry as to who got a copy, in advance, of the report of the commission inquiring into the prospects of the South Saskatchewan power and irrigation development? Certainly one report was just as confidential as the other—but there is a difference, remember. There is a difference. The report on the South Saskatchewan development was a report to the government, and if it got out here in Ottawa it got out from the government and not from a printing office in Montreal or in Regina or in Saskatoon. Perhaps the government in this case feels that as long as it is theft from the government it is a kind of selective theft to which there is no objection. But let us make no mistake about it: if one was reprehensible, the other was. If the removal of one paper was open to criticism and justified an inquiry by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, so did the other.

Now, do not let anyone suggest that there was no criticism of the leak of information in that other report. Perhaps, as a matter of fact, as a result of criticism, they may know the man that they describe as the thief in that case. As far back as five days ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in Saskatchewan did criticize, and I quote his words, "unauthorized disclosure of confidential content".

Those are his words. Now, Mr. Speaker, one disclosure was no more important than the other. There is this difference, that it does appear that the disclosure of the contents of the first print of Mr. Currie's report was done without the knowledge of the government.

There is no evidence that that is so in the other case. We have become accustomed to well-informed disclosures in advance, which have the effect of softening up the impact of unfavourable communications of different kinds. At any rate, there is the situation. Here are two parallel cases. We have the information before us, from whatever source it came; and that information discloses a situation which cannot inspire confidence on the part of anyone as to the willingness of this government to accept an independent and frank criticism when that criticism is due for the conditions which exist.

Mr. Croll: Will the hon. member permit a question?

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Croll: Will the hon. member not say that he said—and I read his words—

> I do point out that a question does arise as to how this copy came to be delivered to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Did he not say that as reported at page 656 of Hansard? Did he not ask the government how this copy came to be delivered to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the Hansard record is quite clear, and I accept any statement in the Hansard record. That has nothing whatever to do with what I am now saying. I simply pointed out clearly—and if the hon. member had been listening and not reading at the moment he would have heard it—that there is no suggestion of approving the method. I do not know what the method was. The government may know. If it does, we hope that we shall have a clearer explanation than any that has yet been given. But what I am pointing out is that the net result of this disclosure has been to bring to the attention of the members of this house and the people of Canada the important fact that a strong effort was made by this government to prevent the delivery in its original terms of a report which gave to this country extremely important information.

Let me mention another matter dealt with in that report. It is under the subheading "Failure in Security". These are the words of the Currie report in that respect, as found at page 715 of Hansard:

> There was in addition a serious collapse in security. There was little to prevent or to detect the organized plundering of military stores on a systematic scale, though apparently comparatively little of it took place. If there is excuse for inefficient accounting, there is none for the failure of security which is, after all, a prime military consideration. I take a serious view of this breakdown. If it is easy to pilfer military stores, then, by the same token, it is easy to sabotage military equipment.

That is the most important single statement in this report. I refer to the statement that as a result of the breakdown in security, of the general inefficiency of this department in its supervision of army stores, there is the possibility not only of pilfering and looting but also of sabotage of military equipment.

We now come to the suggestion that this report which has been tabled be submitted to further inquiry, and that is the substance of the amendment which the government has introduced. Why is a further inquiry now needed into that part of the army activities already covered by the Currie report? Let us remember that, at the time Mr. Currie was appointed, the committee on defence expenditure was then meeting and could have dealt with this subject, as is now suggested. The government chose another course. The government decided that this was a subject that could be better dealt with by an independent inquiry carried out by Mr. Currie. On a number of occasions the defence expenditure committee was told that it could not explore certain subjects because of that fact.

Let us see what the government thinks about the reliability of this man whom they chose to conduct an alternative type of inquiry. At pages 1814 and 1815 of Hansard of May 2 of last year this statement was made on behalf of the government by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) in regard to Mr. Currie:

> I announced the appointment of Mr. George S. Currie, a prominent chartered accountant and a man of outstanding integrity . . .
> Mr. Currie had been deputy minister of national defence. He had served with distinction in the first world war and we felt that no better man could be found to do this job if we searched the length and breadth of the country.

That was referring back to the statement made by the minister on behalf of the government on April 21, and emphasizing their complete confidence in Mr. Currie's ability and integrity. We now have the report by this extremely able man. What earthly purpose can there be in submitting this report of one inquiry to another inquiry? This report and the report of the Auditor General make it clear that what we need in this case is not a further inquiry but action; and that what we need in the way of inquiry is a similar one to be conducted by Mr. Currie into the rest of the army and the whole of the navy and the air force with regard to organization and administration by the Department of National Defence.

We have been told by Mr. Currie that so lax were the methods used that there was an invitation to wrongdoing. That invitation has been extended by these lax methods right across Canada. Surely what all of us want to see is the removal of any possibility that these lax methods may continue. The best way that can be done is to have a complete and comprehensive inquiry into the whole of the Department of National Defence, as has been suggested.

Mr. Speaker, when the proposal is put forward that there be an inquiry of this kind, the most improper statement has been made that this proposal constitutes criticism of our armed forces. I cannot imagine anything less worthy of this government than the suggestion that an attempt to deal with this situation constitutes criticism of the armed forces. Every remark I have made is directed to the government. The one place where criticism should be directed is to the government itself for the conditions which existed and the invitation, as Mr. Currie states it, to wrongdoing, which has been created right across this country.

Mr. Cleaver: And not to the thieves.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, when interjections of this kind and suggestions such as those to which I have referred are made, I remind those who make them that the hon. member who spoke first was the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes). When these statements are made about the criticism of the army and the danger of lowering morale I ask, is there any hon. member in this house who on second thought will suggest that the officer who has had the most experience of any officer in Canada, the man who has been awarded more decorations for valour than any other officer in Canada, the man who at his own expense has given such unlimited time to the advancement of the reserve forces, army, navy and air, is in fact criticizing the members of any of those forces when he makes such statements in this house as he did in this debate? What I have just said applies in various degrees to others who have spoken on this subject, whose record on the field of battle in the last war precludes any suggestion that they would in any way seek to attack our armed forces, or to minimize their effectiveness, or in any way interfere with their morale.

No, Mr. Speaker; the one danger to morale that lies in this report, or in the Auditor General's report, or in any of the other disclosures would be the knowledge in the minds of those now in uniform that nothing effective was going to be done to deal with these irregularities which have occurred.

Every day that elapses without that kind of action which indicates an acceptance of the kind of responsibility that should be shown does raise questions which could interfere with morale; and it is with that thought in mind that I and others in this house have urged that the government act without delay on the report now before it, and that they also conduct a wider complete inquiry into the whole organization and administration of the armed services.

I have already suggested, and I repeat the suggestion, that if the government really meant what it said when it expressed its confidence in Mr. Currie, that it seek to have Mr. Currie conduct that wider inquiry with the same independence and impartiality that he showed in conducting the inquiry of which we now have a report. Mr. Currie of course would be free to do that if this diversionary action, to use a term that we have heard, were not employed, and the device were not adopted of having an inquiry into a report of another inquirer.

Let us see what would happen even if for the first time we did receive the kind of report from this committee that we had hoped we might receive when we urged the setting up of such a committee. That report would come back to this house. It would have no effect except as a finding of fact, corresponding with Mr. Currie's finding of fact, until it had been brought to the attention of this house by a motion for its approval. Are we to have another inquiry into an inquiry into an inquiry? That is what this procedure suggests. No, Mr. Speaker; right at this moment young men in uniform are facing a dangerous and terrible enemy on the field of battle. Young men in the Royal Canadian Air Force in France and in Britain at this very time are manning the aircraft of the squadrons which are over there as part of the joint defence of our freedom.

In Germany young Canadians in the army are carrying the name of Canada on their shoulders in a manner which gives us justification for pride in the Canadian uniform wherever it may be. At sea and in many parts of the world young men and women are offering the highest form of service to their country, to their fellow Canadians, that any citizen of this country could offer. And without trying to divert attention from the facts before us, they deserve assurance that there will be immediate action to remedy the situation which has been disclosed.

There are also the Canadian taxpayers, burdened down with the weight of the taxes they are now shouldering as part of their responsibilities as citizens of this country. When we have urged over and over again that steps be taken to reduce taxes and increase the efficiency of the administration of the departments, particularly of the Department of National Defence, we have been told that no savings could be made because nearly all the expenditure was for fixed obligations such as social services and for national defence. We have been left with the impression that the government thinks that national defence expenditure is sacrosanct. Any suggestion that there might be improvement in the methods adopted has been met by the improper suggestion on some occasions that we were urging that we reduce the defence forces of this country. No matter what other results there may be from the Currie report, there is this definite result. No person who has read the findings in that report can hope to have his statement taken seriously if he now contends that there is no waste, extravagance, or improper use of public funds. And even without the Currie report, the Auditor General's report makes it perfectly clear that there are things that can be done to bring about a more effective supervision of public spending in this country.

There have been strong statements on both sides. When the statement of the government was made, along with the introduction of the report on the 15th of December, immediately the suggestion was made that any criticism was to be taken by the government as being political criticism. When the carefully considered statement of the government was made two days later, on the evening of December 17, there in a fully prepared statement on behalf of the government we had the same implication conveyed to us and to the people of Canada. That was not welcomed by members of the opposition. Similar suggestions have not been welcomed since that time because they are wholly out of keeping with the responsibility of every member in the House of Commons. The government has not welcomed criticism from this side of the house. That is its right. It has given very rigorous and very noticeable evidence of its objection to some of the comments which have been made.

Let us accept that as part of the debate on a report which, doubtless, came as a surprise to every member in the house except those who had the special privilege of an earlier consideration of it. But let us accept the fact that, no matter what debate there has been, and no matter whether there has been objection on one side or on the other to things that have been said, we are dealing with the security of Canada, with the way in which young men and women will be permitted to defend this country in the uniforms they wear so proudly, and also with the assurance that the money paid out by our heavily-burdened taxpayers is being used in the best possible way for the defence of our native land.

These are the issues that are really before us. And it is in that light I hoped that at this time the government would reconsider its position, would depart from its rigid stand of defending the indefensible, and would depart from its diversionary activities in regard to the real core of the issue before us. I think I can safely speak on behalf of all members in the opposition in this instance, although without previous consultation with them, when I say I feel sure that hon. members in all parts of the house would applaud a decision by the government, if we received evidence of its determination to act effectively at this time.

We have before us a subamendment, which will be the first question upon which hon. members will be called upon to vote. Members of this party could have presented a subamendment in that form, but we did not do so because we hoped it would be possible to deal with the need for a wider inquiry, and at the same time do that without being called upon to accept, even in form, the proposition that the Currie report should be submitted to a further inquiry. However, as a result of the procedure adopted by the government we were denied that opportunity. And while I regret that it has become necessary for a subamendment to embrace, in form at any rate, the amendment of the government, I welcome the fact that, subsequent to the subamendment which we put forward and which was ruled out of order, another has been introduced which will call for a straight vote on the question of whether this inquiry is to be carried into the wider field of all the rest of the department, which has not been covered by the Currie report.

For that reason I am sure the subamendment will receive general support among members of the opposition. However, we are still in a position where something else might happen. In all earnestness I do urge the government between now and eight o'clock, when the debate will be resumed, to follow a course which will not impose upon its own members any question of a vote of confidence, or any reflection by those who normally support that government on what it has done.

I urge the government, in all earnestness, and having due regard to the full significance of the disclosures made in this report, to state to the house that it will act upon the Currie report; that the defence expenditure committee will be free to carry out the work for which it was set up, and to deal with other subjects; and that there will be a full inquiry into all the rest of the defence services by Mr. Currie or someone equally competent to carry forward an inquiry of this nature.

That would bring us back to the position we were in last April, when the government indicated its desire to get at the facts and deal with them. May I anticipate only one answer to this suggestion. We have been told that already the government has taken action to deal with so many of these things that, for all practical purposes, the job has been done. Mr. Speaker, if that were so there would be no need for the Currie report to go before this committee. If the government really believes that everything has been done that should be done under this report, then the only purpose in referring the Currie report to that committee is to try to cast reflections upon the accuracy of the report.

I hope that is not their purpose, because that would stultify the effectiveness of the committee and would drag out proceedings which, at this important time, could be directed to very important subjects which would come properly before the committee. I refer again to the statement by Mr. Currie that the chaotic conditions of the accounting methods are such that no one knows what the losses really were, and represent those of only one camp, amounting in value to perhaps 3 per cent of the total value of all the property of the Department of National Defence. The report does demonstrate the need for a wider and similarly complete inquiry. I hope we will have it.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The house will now consider business connected with private and public bills.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE QUORUM OF HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 18, to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1952, with respect to the quorum of the House of Commons.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is one which concerns us, and I hope it will be considered by members of this House of Commons as a matter which should receive our serious and earnest attention. The proposal contained in the bill is that we make a slight increase in the quorum required for the transaction of business in the House of Commons. As hon. members know, at the present time the quorum is 20 members, as set out in section 48 of the British North America Act, which reads:

> The presence of at least twenty members of the House of Commons shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the house for the exercise of its powers; and for that purpose the Speaker shall be reckoned as a member.

As has been indicated in the explanatory notes to the printed copy of the bill, this figure of 20 members was decided upon back in 1867 when the membership of the House of Commons was set at 181. For my part I think that that was a very small quorum to propose for a house of 181 members. Nevertheless, in suggesting that the quorum should be increased I have felt that it might be difficult to persuade some hon. members that we go beyond the proportion that was fixed at that time.

The figure of 30 members as a quorum which my bill suggests was arrived at by the process of simple arithmetic. As hon. members know, the membership in this House of Commons is now 262. By reason of the amendment to the British North America Act passed last year respecting representation in the House of Commons, and the Representation Act of 1952, the terms of which were based on the amendment to the constitution to which I have just referred, we will have 265 members in the House of Commons that will meet following the forthcoming election. If 20 members were considered to be a quorum when the membership of the house was 181, simple arithmetic makes it clear that in the light of our larger membership the quorum would be 29 and a fraction. I have suggested the nearest round figure of 30. All that this bill proposes is that we change the quorum for the transaction of business in the House of Commons from 20 to 30 members.

This is the first occasion on which this bill has come before the house for consideration, but it is not the first occasion on which it has been on the order paper. As a result of it having been on the order paper on previous occasions, I have had comments made to me about it and I have noted comments in the press. The only serious criticism that has been made, a criticism which I readily accept, is that the figure of 30 seems too low.

House of Commons Quorum

The so-called man on the street, to whom we often refer, is really shocked when he learns that our present quorum is only 20. At times I have asked unsuspecting people who do not know our rules what they supposed was the quorum in the House of Commons. Many times the answer has been, "I suppose a bare majority." Others have suggested 100, and the lowest figure I have ever had suggested to me by an unsuspecting person was the figure of 50. Yet here we are with a quorum of only 20.

Some of those who have commented on my bill are amazed that I have not proposed an even larger figure than 30. I want to make it clear that for my part I would like to see a much larger quorum. I think it only proper that for the transaction of this nation's business there should be required to be in attendance a much larger proportion of the membership of this House of Commons.

However, knowing the tendency that exists to be guided by precedent and tradition, for the purposes of this bill I am prepared to go along with the proportion established by the fathers of confederation. It is in that spirit that I have arrived at the figure of 30. I earnestly hope that the house will consider favourably this bill and will support the view that our responsibilities are such that there should be a few more of us here for the transaction of business than the minimum figure of 20.

Not only have I discussed this matter with people outside the house; not only have I noticed comments in the press on it. There have been some comments on this matter made to me by other members of the house. The difficulty raised by some who have spoken to me is whether or not it would always be possible to get as many as 30 members in the house, particularly at a time when committees were meeting. No one can deny the fact that when several important committees are meeting it might seem to be difficult to get a quorum in all the committees and also have an adequate attendance in the house at the same time. I admit that that seems to be difficult, but I submit most seriously that it should not be.

As hon. members know, the facilities in this building in the way of rooms available for the holding of committee meetings are much more limited than one would think when he looks at the amazing size of this building itself. Hon members know that we cannot hold more than four or five committee meetings at one and the same time. Committees vary in size, but even if we take the outside figure as an average of the normal committee meeting and assume that we have five committees going on at the same time with 30 members in each committee, that makes only a total of 150 members, leaving 112 members available for attendance in the House of Commons.

Mr. MacDougall: Provided they are here.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member says, "provided they are here." Are we not supposed to be here? Is not that the whole point? I recognize that that comment is made by a member from British Columbia, and that members from the more distant parts are more likely to be here pretty regularly. At any rate the interjection indicates the whole point of the argument I have just laid before the house, namely, that we are supposed to be here.

I submit that the figures I gave a moment ago concerning attendance in committees was much larger than is actually the case. I doubt if there has ever been an occasion when 150 members of this house have been in committee meetings outside of the chamber at one and the same time. But even if that were the case, it would still leave 112 members; therefore I suggest that there should not be any difficulty getting a quorum of 30, indeed a quorum of 50 or even 100 if that were the proposition.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: Gladly.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think I heard the whole of what the hon. member said. Did he give us the quorums required in other jurisdictions, for instance at Washington or London? I think it would be interesting if those figures could be available.

Mr. Knowles: No, I did not give those figures. As a matter of fact, I am a little surprised that this matter came up today and I may say frankly that I have not looked them up. I am basing my whole argument on what would seem to be reasonable and responsible on our own part. I agree with the hon. member that the other figures would be interesting, and perhaps they can be ascertained and brought to bear upon the question. But whatever those figures are, even if they are smaller in proportion, I submit that we owe it to the country we serve by the duties that we perform here to require of ourselves a higher rate of attendance in the house than is required by section 48 of the British North America Act as it now stands. I repeat what I started out by saying, namely, that my bill does not ask for these much higher quorum figures to which I have referred. My bill asks for only 30, which is simply maintaining the proportion established by the fathers of confederation in 1867.

There are other aspects of the whole question of attendance that might be gone into. I have been known to take cracks, shall I say, at a certain institution that meets at the other end of this building; but so far as the question of attendance is concerned may I say that I note with interest and approval that in the other place a daily record is kept of the attendance of Their Honours, the members of the Senate. We have no such record here. There are times when we would not need a record. During the last week or so the interest in the subject that has been under discussion has been such that we have had excellent attendance in the house and in the galleries as well. But it is our responsibility to give serious and responsible attention to the business of the country whether or not it is a matter of great, dramatic and spectacular interest.

For that reason I press upon the house the serious consideration of this matter. I ask hon. members to face the fact that the change suggested in the bill is ever so slight. As a matter of fact it can be argued that it does not introduce any change at all. It merely says that we agree to maintain as a quorum the same proportion of our total membership that was agreed upon by the fathers of confederation in 1867. Despite the fact that I am not a lawyer—and one can always be corrected on these interpretations—I would point out that the wording of section 48 in the original British North America Act does not, in my view, say that the quorum can be no higher than 20. It merely says that there must be at least 20 members, and I have often taken the view that it would have been within the right of parliament, even before we had the right to amend the British North America Act, to fix a higher figure. In other words I am wondering if the fathers of confederation expected that 20 would remain as the figure. I wonder if they did not leave it to the House of Commons itself to make that figure a little higher if the house wished to do so. At any rate, we have not done so in all the years from 1867 until the present. Despite the increases that have taken place in the membership, the quorum has remained at that same terribly low figure of 20 members. Now that the matter has been put before the house in a formal way I hope we will correct the situation.

There is one other aspect about the bill which I might take the liberty of calling to the attention of the house, merely because I am sure it is of interest to many hon. members. This bill, like the one last year that changed the rules regarding redistribution, involves an amendment to the British North America Act. The bill with respect to redistribution, which was piloted through the house last year in the name of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris), I believe, was the first bill to amend the British North America Act, the constitution of this country, on the basis of legislation passed by this parliament and by this parliament alone. The bill now before us might be referred to as the first private member's bill amending the British North America Act since we obtained for ourselves in 1949 the right to amend that act in Canada in respect of matters exclusively federal.

This bill is drawn in exactly the same form as the bill introduced last year by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, at least in so far as its being a bill that amends the British North America Act is concerned. For my part I have been interested in this question, and have had the opportunity of discussing it with a number of authorities in the constitutional field. One question that used to concern me about this whole matter was a purely technical one. How was it possible for us in the parliament of Canada, even after the amendment of the British North America Act was passed which gave us the right to amend our own constitution, to amend what in effect seemed to be a statute of another country, namely the British North America Act passed originally in the parliament of the United Kingdom in 1867?

The opinion that was expressed to us on that point last year in the redistribution committee is, I think, perhaps novel but also interesting and rather conclusive. It was that the British North America Act of 1867 was, in purely legal and technical terms, an enactment of the crown which was passed with the advice and consent of the parliament of the United Kingdom. All we are doing when we amend that act in Canada is arranging for the crown to amend the same act which the crown originally enacted, the only difference being that in the meantime there has been a change as to who advises the crown with respect to this act, and in this instance it would be the parliament of Canada advising the crown rather than the parliament of the United Kingdom.

I think it is fair to say that, until the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration brought in his bill last year respecting redistribution, there were different patterns that might have been followed in amending our own constitution by decision of this parliament, and that any one of two or three different patterns might have been justified. I think it is also fair to say that, once a pattern has been established, there being plenty of lawyers around this place, the tendency will be to say that that is the correct pattern and that is the pattern to follow henceforth.

In any case the bill follows that pattern so far as its technique is concerned. It is a bill of the parliament of Canada amending what is known as our constitution, the British North America Act. We have the right to advise the crown to enact legislation in this form by virtue of the amendment to the British North America Act of 1949 which gave the parliament of Canada the power to amend its own constitution with respect to matters that are exclusively federal. The issue in the bill is obviously a matter exclusively federal. It is even narrower than that; it is a matter that concerns us right here in the House of Commons. Therefore I think there can be no doubt as to our right to deal with the subject matter of the bill.

I also feel, as I have already said, that there is surely no doubt as to the simplicity of the request, as to the fact that it is a very minor change that is being requested. It merely proposes that we maintain the same proportion that was established in 1867.

I hope this will not be looked upon as a bill coming from any one party in the house, but rather as a bill presented to the rest of the members by one member who is interested in these things, and that it will be given very serious consideration in all parts of this house.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate what my hon. friend has said about the constitutional aspects of this bill. Having, as he has said, sponsored a bill last session which did amend the British North America Act, I am obliged to say that I think the method followed at that time would be a proper one, and that this probably does fall into the same form.

Like my hon. friend, I was rather surprised that we reached this bill at this stage, because I expected there would probably be debates on the earlier bills this afternoon. It was with that in mind that notice was given today by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) of the setting up of the committee on house procedure. That has been placed with the officials of the house and, had this bill been reached on Thursday or Friday, I should have moved an amendment to the motion for second reading to refer the subject matter of this bill to the committee which, presumably, at that time would have been established.

I do propose to follow that procedure when the time comes. Unfortunately I did not have an opportunity to discuss with my hon. friend his preference in this respect. I take it that the motion which I had proposed to make, that the subject matter of this bill be referred to that committee, cannot now be made because the committee does not exist, although notice of it has been given. Therefore I propose to move adjournment of the debate, and on the next occasion when we reach this item I will move that the subject matter be sent to the committee on house procedure, there to be discussed and reported on as that committee thinks advisable.

Mr. Knowles: May I just say that the procedure suggested by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) seems to me to be quite acceptable. The only question which arises is whether or not any other members of the house care to make any comment on the matter before it is referred to that committee. I am not saying that there are any who do. The other members might be quite satisfied. For my own part I have no objection to the procedure the minister proposes to follow, at one stage or another.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I just add a word. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is often very persuasive. Sometimes I feel that I have to be on my guard against him. Today I must say that he was prima facie persuasive to me, but since I asked him the question I have been informed that the quorum in the British house is 40. That does give me a feeling that this matter perhaps is not quite as clear as it otherwise might be.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said that his proposal was to maintain the same percentage of membership that was originally laid down, and that seemed to me to go a long way toward answering the question. But circumstances have changed; for all I know there may be more committees that sit now. In any event, I am glad this is going to be considered by the committee as suggested by the minister.

Mr. Harris: I might complete what I was about to say. It would be the intention of the committee, I would hope, to consider this bill; and if any other member wishes to add his views at this moment I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I have no desire to intervene. I waited until everyone else had had an opportunity to rise. I shall sit down and ask one of my colleagues to move the adjournment of the debate after everyone else has had an opportunity to get up, if he so desires, and make a speech.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the proposition the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has put forward, if it stands simply on the basis of carrying forward to the present time the proportion that was established in 1867 which the quorum of the house should bear to the total membership of the house, seems to have much to commend it to reasonable people. However, there is another aspect of the matter which all hon. members must bear in mind.

The proposal just put forward now on behalf of the government by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) I think is one that will meet with general approval in this house. This is a matter that may very well be considered in relation to the other matters that will, I take it, in due course be referred to the committee on rules for consideration. But whether the matter is dealt with conclusively here or whether it is deliberated on by the committee on rules, there will be no escape from one consideration.

When the fathers of confederation agreed upon their proposals for the formation of a nation on this northern half of the continent, they did not leave it to the parliament, nor to the House of Commons, to establish the quorum of the house. This matter was never viewed hitherto as a matter of concern simply to the House of Commons. That is not the way the fathers of confederation drafted the structure of confederation in this respect. They made it a provision of the British North America Act that the quorum should be fixed as set forth in section 48 of the act.

It might impress many hon. members that this is after all a relatively simple matter. You just change one figure, one word in the British North America Act. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is quite true that the amendment that is under discussion now does not do more than that in form. It simply changes the word "twenty" in section 48 of the British North America Act to "thirty". But before we can do that, Mr. Speaker, we must have due regard for some of the implications of the step we are taking.

The views which we of the Progressive Conservative party hold in regard to the subject of amendment of the British North America Act have been set forth on previous occasions, the last of which was the debate on the redistribution bill on June 12, 1952. While the matter before us now looks to be so simple, it nevertheless presents the same problems, Mr. Speaker, as to the right of parliament to proceed to amend the British North America Act without consultation with anyone.

The fact that this problem arises again in a situation where the amendment proposed is in form so simple I think serves to emphasize once more, Mr. Speaker, the fact that the country needs today the legislative adoption of a proper formula for amendment within Canada of the British North America Act. That in turn requires the resumption, at as early a date as possible, of the conference which was called some three years ago—the dominion-provincial conference—with a view to working out by agreement some formula for amending the British North America Act within Canada.

It will be recalled by hon. members that when the provinces were asked to indicate their views on the method by which the act should be amended in various respects, there was quite a variety of answers. In view of the fact that this particular bill has been called unexpectedly today, Mr. Speaker, I have not had an opportunity to review the recommendations made by the provincial governments at that time with reference to the amendment of this particular section of the act. It may well be that many of the provinces at that time indicated they had no objection to parliament taking unto itself the right to amend this section simply by act of parliament. But I am not prepared to assume that with reference to all the provinces, because the views expressed by some of the provinces were quite strong as to the necessity for working out a general formula for amendment on the basis of that formula being satisfactory to all provinces, although the formula itself would make provision for the amendment of various provisions in the British North America Act, under varying terms. In some cases it would be by consent of a majority of the provinces, in other cases by varying proportions, leading up, in the case of some provisions of the British North America Act, to the requirement that the particular provision of the act should not be amended without the consent of all the provinces.

Surely what is required, not simply in relation to this particular matter but in relation to the whole question of the constitutional position of Canada, is that there should be a prompt resumption of that dominion-provincial conference. This particular section 48 is by no means the only section of the British North America Act that is crying aloud today for some legislative consideration. In the British North America Act today, as the fundamental law of Canada, we have provisions that are quite outworn; and the continued existence of those provisions, Mr. Speaker, stresses the necessity for a dominion-provincial conference with a view to changing them.

May I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that we still have provisions like this in the British North America Act—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member has been trying to stress the point that a dominion-provincial conference should be resumed for the purpose of studying not only this matter of a quorum but perhaps others. It seems to me that he has perhaps spent long enough on that part of his argument. If he wants to speak to the principle of this bill and to make his remarks relevant to it, I do not think he should embark upon a suggestion that there are other points in the constitution which deserve further consideration by a conference such as the one to which he has referred.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, the point I was making—and I did not intend to elaborate on it at length—was that this bill, as do many other circumstances, points to the necessity for the resumption of that dominion-provincial conference. What I was about to do when you rose, Mr. Speaker, was to recall to the minds of hon. members that in sections like 55, 56 and 57 we have, in this fundamental written law of the constitution today, provisions that are completely outworn and that emphasize the necessity for our trying to bring the constitution up to date by the only method by which, in my submission, it can be brought up to date, namely by working out an amending formula that will be acceptable to the provinces.

This consideration, Mr. Speaker, is one that must be borne in mind, in my submission, even though this bill at a later point in this session may be referred to the house committee on rules. Had the fathers of confederation regarded this matter of the quorum of the house as simply a matter of the internal organization of the house, then this provision contained in section 48 would not have found its way into the act. It would have been left to the house to establish its own quorum. It may be that there are many today who, if this question were approached de novo, would take the position that it should be left to the house. But that is not the position in which we find ourselves.

As a result of the amendment of the British North America Act that was adopted in 1949—an unwise form of amendment of the British North America Act, in my submission, in the ill-considered formula that it contained for carrying out amendments of the British North America Act—the position in which we find ourselves at the moment simply means this. Because this provision is in the British North America Act and the government says that it is a federal matter, then this result follows: if it is in the act, you simply proceed by a bill, give it three readings, and change it just as you wish. If it were a rule of the house, presumably the house would simply change it by resolution providing for an amendment of the rules of the house. That is the only difference left. We in this part of the house do not think that the constitution of this country, the fundamental written law of Canada, should be equated simply with a rule of this house.

No matter how simple this matter may be in form, it has implications of great importance. Because of the fact that the federal government has not made any move to call for a resumption of the dominion-provincial conference, one province—Quebec—has recently found it necessary to propose the appointment of a royal commission to review the whole question of federal-provincial relations. In the face of situations like that, surely the need for the resumption of that dominion-provincial conference on the British North America Act and methods of amending it is imperative today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member has made it quite clear that he is opposed to this method of bringing about an amendment to the constitution. If he wishes to speak to the principle of this bill, he should confine himself to the suggestion contained in the amendment, which in effect provides for amending our rules with respect to a quorum by inserting the word "thirty" instead of "twenty". I should like to hear him on that point.

Mr. Fleming: With great respect, Mr. Speaker, may I say you have stated that this may involve the amendment of the rules of the house. The very point I am seeking to argue at the moment is that what is involved in this bill is an amendment of the British North America Act. The legislative position created by an unwise amendment of the British North America Act by the parliament at Westminster in 1949, at the instance of this parliament, makes this provision of the British North America Act mean little more than just a rule of the house. It can be changed in practically the same way that we can amend any rule of the house. It seems to me that is one of the implications of this present bill that ought to be laid before this house and ought to be considered by this house with the utmost seriousness.

As to the form of the amendment, I wish to make it clear that I am expressing no objection in principle to an increase in the quorum of the house. Just on the basis of mathematics alone I think there may be a good deal to be said—as was stated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in introducing this bill—for increasing the quorum so that the fraction it represents of the total membership today may bear a reasonable relation to the fraction that was established in 1867. But the way to deal with this matter is not, in my submission, to treat it simply as a matter in which parliament has a perfectly free hand to proceed without consultation. There are implications here that go much farther and they are implications which, in my submission, are not going to be disposed of merely by referring the matter to the rules committee. I would not oppose that course for consideration of the matter but, Mr. Speaker, that will not end the problems that are presented by this bill. There will still be the fundamental problem that here you are dealing with a provision in the fundamental written constitution of this country.

What is so badly needed today is to avoid a piecemeal approach to this question. What is needed is not an approach that is going to make it more difficult to have that form of constitutional amendment which is required but which will instead make provision for a formula for dealing with all amendments that may be sought by the Canadian people. What is required here is due acknowledgment of the fact that the British North America Act is a fundamental constitutional document, and that in making changes in that fundamental constitutional document more should be required than simply a decision from time to time in this house or in the other place.

I urge, Mr. Speaker, that the only way out of the problem that has been created by an unwise amendment of the British North America Act in 1949 is the one I have proposed, namely that this and other matters requiring consideration in reference to needed amendments of the British North America Act should be the subject matter of consideration in an immediate resumption of the dominion-provincial conference on amendment of the British North America Act.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I feel that I should say just a word about the bill that has been introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I think its provisions are reasonable. I would favour increasing the quorum to 30 because I think that does appear to keep the proportion the same as 20 was to begin with, when we had only 181 members in the house.

Because it is reasonable, and also because it does not appear to be a very important matter for constitutional reconsideration, I would hardly suggest that we hold up the bill until such time as a new formula for amending the constitution has been adopted; although I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I certainly feel sympathetic to the views of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). We do need at the earliest possible time a formula for constitutional amendments. But the fact is that in 1949, if I remember correctly, this sort of thing was entrenched solely within the powers of the federal government. And since it does not affect the provinces in any way, since it affects nothing but the conduct of the affairs of this house, it would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, to be completely within our competence; and I would suggest that the procedure that was proposed by the minister be followed, namely that it be presented to the committee. Therefore I favour second reading of the bill.

On motion of Mr. McIlraith the debate was adjourned.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 54, STATUTES OF 1947-1948—VOLUNTARY REVOCABLE CHECK-OFF OF UNION DUES

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles for the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (voluntary revocable check-off).

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): When I adjourned the debate last Tuesday I was examining certain views that had been expressed in a previous debate by some of the main supporters of the amendment which is now before the house. I had occasion more particularly to refer to the debate on the Maintenance of Railway Operation Act of 1950, and to the remarks of both the leader of my hon. friend, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). I also referred to statements made by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), and at the time of the adjournment I still had one or two statements by the hon. member for Spadina that I wished to put on the record.

All those quotations which I have offered for the consideration of the house were intended at that time—and I use them in this debate for the same purpose—to indicate how important it is for the welfare of the Canadian worker and for the peaceful development of our industry as a whole that the utmost freedom should be left to collective bargaining between the two partners in industry.

During the debate on the Maintenance of Railway Operation Act of two years ago, the hon. member for Spadina placed a great deal of importance on this basic principle of free collective bargaining in industry. I have quoted a few sentences from his remarks in this regard, and I wish to add this one which will be found on page 41 of Hansard for the fall session of 1950:

> I believe that compulsory arbitration means the death of collective bargaining. It is all very well to say that we shall apply this principle only in this case, but we have done damage to a fundamental principle of freedom.

In my several participations in debates on this matter of the voluntary revocable check-off, I have always sustained that particular point. Should this bill be passed and the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act be amended to make it compulsory to have the voluntary revocable check-off, we would, using the words of the hon. member for Spadina, be doing damage to a fundamental principle of freedom.

I should like to quote from the speech that the mover of this amendment made in the same debate in the fall of 1950, and which I submit is most relevant to the point. It will be found at page 41 of Hansard of that session:

> I share the view that has just been expressed by the hon. member for Spadina, and which was also put forward by my leader and by the member for Vancouver East, that it is in the public interest also, indeed that it is of primary importance, that there be no interference with the principle of free collective bargaining.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) also participated in that debate and expounded his views on the basic principle of industrial relations in this country and on free collective bargaining. He had this to say, as reported at page 48 of Hansard:

> I am convinced that you cannot write a trade-union agreement on the floor of the House of Commons. The former minister of labour made that statement many times and I agreed; you cannot do it.
> We are setting a precedent that will be taken as a pattern by industry in this country if and when the bargaining gets a little tough. The simple and easy thing to do then will be to break off, throw the matter into the lap of the government and have a bill passed.

On page 49 the hon. member had this to say:

> I believe we did a good job of writing a national labour code, but do not forget that this bill automatically wipes out many provisions of that code as it applies to this dispute.

The hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) also participated in the debate, and made an interesting contribution which I should like to place on record, when he said:

> I object as strenuously as does any other member of this house to compulsion of any sort in labour-management disputes or in anything that has to do with collective bargaining.

[Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle).]

While I cannot recall definitely the stand taken by the hon. member for York West on measures of this kind when they were presented to the house in years past, I wish to stress that all the other hon. members to whom I have referred have approved the principle of this amending bill, and by so doing have taken a position which is in direct conflict with the statements made by them during the debate on the Maintenance of Railway Operation Act in 1950.

If on the one hand parliament should preserve by all possible means the freedom of action of both management and labour when they get together and attempt in good faith to reach common agreement, then the amending bill proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) becomes quite objectionable. It may not mean very much in itself, because what it proposes to introduce is, after all, only the slightest possible measure of union security, described in the amending bill as the voluntary revocable check-off. But once the principle is applied of interference by parliament in matters which have thus far been left with labour and management to discuss, and upon which they can surely agree, there will be no limit to the powers of parliament in future years for further interference, in circumstances which might be much more important than those surrounding the voluntary revocable check-off.

While I have not the exact reference before me, I do recollect that on one occasion in the past, when the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) was discussing a similar bill, I asked him if the bill were passed whether he and his party would be satisfied to leave it at that, and give a guarantee that it would not be considered as a precedent; that they would not come here year after year asking for more and more interference by parliament in matters of collective bargaining. He said, "No, that is not the end; that is just the beginning". I can vouch for his reply on that occasion. So, that means a policy of opening the door wider and wider as the years go by, and some day bringing parliament to a position of dictating by statute what the wages, hours of work and conditions of work will be in any plant or industry coming under the jurisdiction of parliament.

Mr. Knowles: Does the parliamentary assistant believe that to be a fair interpretation of what the hon. member for Vancouver East said on that occasion? I remember it very well, too.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): I am referring to the answer made by the hon. member to a question I put to him at that time.

Mr. Knowles: I remember it.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Unfortunately I did not expect this bill would be reached this afternoon, with the result that I have not with me certain papers which, otherwise, I would have had. I can assure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, however, that I can produce the reference. At that time I asked the hon. member for Vancouver East if, in the event of the acceptance of the bill we were then studying, that would be the end of interference by the state in matters of collective bargaining—

Mr. Knowles: And his reply was, "We believe in further progress."

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): ". . . that further progress should be made, further amendments should be brought, and so on". His reply was brief. In what I have said I am sure I have not gone beyond the meaning of the reply he made at that time. If I have gone too far in my interpretation, then in due time I shall be ready to apologize. I feel sure, however, that I am placing the proper interpretation upon the statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver East at that time.

I have quoted several statements from the late Hon. Humphrey Mitchell, but, after having placed on record the observations of those who have supported bills of this kind in the past, I should like to quote one further sentence from the late Mr. Mitchell, so that hon. members may compare his views with those which the supporters of this bill have expressed on another occasion. This is what Mr. Mitchell said:

> Legislation of this nature will fail in its fundamental objective if it introduces features of a coercive character which only result in driving employers and employees further apart. That would make it more difficult for them to establish those friendly relations of good will and co-operation which are so necessary.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle) the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour for private and public bills having expired, at eight o'clock the house will resume the business interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

DEFENCE EXPENDITURE

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for the appointment of a committee to examine defence expenditures and commitments, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Claxton, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Knowles.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I desire to supplement a statement I made this afternoon, which was as follows:

> The remissions branch comes under the Department of Justice and certainly no application for parole has come to my attention.

The reference here is to an application for parole by or on behalf of Sergeant Young. I wish to confirm now that this statement of mine is entirely correct. When later the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) repeated that Sergeant Young is seeking a parole, I took advantage of the dinner recess to check with officials of the remissions branch concerning this matter. They inform me that Mr. J. A. Maloney as counsel for Sergeant Young has made an application for parole which in due course will be laid before the minister for consideration as soon as the usual reports have been obtained in relation to it.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has referred in this debate to red herrings. I would not be surprised if he is beginning to try to forget their paternity. I am not going to devote much time to the red herrings which he brought into the house for the first time on December 15 and which, because they are now beginning to smell, he is trying to lay on the doorstep of the government. But there are three points I should like to make in connection with the hon. member's red herrings.

The first is: How did he get the draft report? The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre took part in the broadcast "Press Conference" last night from Ottawa in the course of which one member of the press asked him:

> Now, if it was not a stolen document, what was it?

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre replied:

> Well, it was a document that had come into our possession. We did not know the ultimate source of it, but we were ready to believe that the person who sent it to us was concerned over the fact that changes were being made and he seemed most anxious that the matter might be raised in public.

You will all recall that the only report, the signed report, was tabled on December 15. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) wrote me a letter on January 17 reporting on the investigation by the police which showed that a copy of the draft stolen from the print shop had been stolen between November 25 and November 29. How did the person who had stolen the report between November 25 and November 29 know there were changes in the report as tabled on December 15?

Then according to a statement by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, reported in the Montreal Gazette of this morning, the draft came into the possession of his leader only—and I quote—"a few days before December 15". How did the person who delivered the stolen copy, if he was different, as the hon. member has said, from the person who took it—how he would know that precisely, I do not know—how would the person who delivered the stolen copy of the draft to the C.C.F. know that changes were being made when that could only be ascertained by a comparison of the two copies on December 15?

My second point is that the hon. member seems to be trying to excuse his conduct by pretending that the course of events has revealed that I brought pressure to bear on Mr. Currie. Hon. members opposite cannot have it both ways, as I pointed out the other day to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). Either they have confidence in Mr. Currie as being a competent person, who therefore will not accept pressure—

An hon. Member: Haven't you?

Mr. Claxton: —or else they have not. I have, indeed. That is why I say he is not the kind of person who can be subjected to pressure and that if any change was made in the draft in consequence of suggestions made to him by the deputy minister of national defence, he adopted those changes because he believed they brought his report more closely to the truth and more in accordance with the facts.

The hon. member then said—this is the third and final point to which I shall refer—that my letter to his leader dated January 10 implied a threat. This letter, which appears in an appendix to Hansard, was sent as a courtesy to his leader and for no other reason. There was no reason why I should tell the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), for whom I have high regard as I have for other hon. members, that the R.C.M.P. were being instructed to look into this matter. There was no reason to inform him except as a courtesy because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had indicated that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had received this report.

Having received the report, as indicated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, it seemed to me that had I not told the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that the R.C.M.P. were being instructed to investigate the matter I would have been charged at once with gross discourtesy to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Now, we asked Mr. Currie to make a report. It was indicated in the house on December 15 that a draft of that report dated November 26 had come into unauthorized hands. On my return I wrote Mr. Currie and asked him for an explanation. After two previous letters he wrote me and said in the letter dated January 7, 1953, which appears at page 977 of Hansard:

> Everything which I have done by way of inquiry and investigation negatives the possibility that the copy in question could have got out in any stage or step between the printer's shop and my own organization and the department; but I still, of course, welcome any further investigation which the department or any other authority may deem it expedient to make from any angle or direction.

Until this mystery was cleared up, Mr. Speaker, the officers of the Department of National Defence, Mr. Currie and the members of his firm and the printing company and its employees would all remain subject to the shadow of the suspicion that they had acted improperly with a document intended to be delivered to a member of the government in accordance with a request for a report. They all would have remained subject to that suspicion and to the further suspicion of dealing with a document which was to become a public document, and which should have been dealt with by a professional man and by a printing establishment in a way which should ensure security.

It seemed to us—and here I can tell the house that I consulted my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson)—that this was a case where the public interest was engaged, where it was desirable in the interests of finding out the truth, of getting to the bottom of the mystery and of putting the blame where it belonged, that we should continue the inquiry, particularly since Mr. Currie said in his letter that he would welcome its continuation. Accordingly I sent a letter dated January 8 to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), but because I knew he was in hospital I communicated first with his secretary and asked whether it should be sent to the hospital or to the secretary. The hon. member was in the hospital, though expected to be out in a day or two. The secretary took it to him and I received a very courteous and prompt reply.

In these circumstances I do not think we have anything further to explain or say about this matter. But with one statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I will emphatically agree, namely when he says that he has felt all along that the important question is what Mr. Currie dealt with in his real report. I have followed this debate closely and carefully. I had to be absent one day through illness but I read what took place, and I think I can say not with immodesty but with accuracy that so far in this debate since introducing the discussion a week ago today, I am the only member who has dealt at all with parts II, III and IV containing the concrete recommendations of Mr. Currie. I think I am the only member who has even referred to them.

Mr. Harkness: I dealt with them at some length before Christmas.

Mr. Claxton: Indeed—and I think this is accurate too—only the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) and to some extent the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) this afternoon have referred in any way to the facts I gave in my statement, to the background explaining the way in which the auditor's branch worked, the army works services were established and the audits were conducted, or to the recommendations that have been made by Mr. Currie. Yet, hon. members opposite have endeavoured to say that we were not treating the report seriously. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Thomas) said, as found at page 1028 of Hansard:

> The minister intimated yesterday that the report was of very little value.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) said, "The government intends to do nothing". There were other hon. members who spoke to the same effect. I do not want to repeat, and I am sure nobody wants me to repeat, what I said a week ago; but I did tell the house precisely what the government and the department had done and were doing in consequence of the report, which I referred to as a very important document, and I referred to its constructive recommendations. Then I went on to deal with the recommendations under different classes. I referred to those which were being implemented before we ever received Mr. Currie's report at all, those which were being considered, and at the end of my remarks I referred to two which we considered so far as not being desirable in the circumstances.

That is not taking the report lightly. I have dealt with the report as it deserves to be dealt with. I have recounted to the house the approach we made to it, the consideration we gave to it and what we have done in consequence of it. I also said it would continue to receive consideration. I thought there were a number of matters raised in the report, particularly the recommendations in parts II, III and IV, concerning which it would be very useful indeed to have the views of the committee and also those of Mr. Currie. If this matter had not become the political issue that it has been made, I can tell the house that I would have been in continuous consultation with Mr. Currie since he made his report working out with him ways and means whereby we might implement it as expeditiously as possible in exactly the same way as we in the department were in consultation with him and his representatives throughout the whole period of his investigation, which was carried on as a joint operation.

It was in that spirit that the job was approached and it is in that spirit that it would have been carried through. But I hope the defence expenditure committee will be able to look into the report, have the officials of the department there and see whether the views I have already expressed on the cost of implementing some of the recommendations of the report are correct or whether the estimates of cost are as low as they can be made. Perhaps we can find ways and means of building fences and providing security guards at lower costs than those I gave the house last Tuesday, but these costs are the lowest at which we have been able to arrive so far. Some of them throw grave doubt upon the desirability of some of the additional security measures to which reference has been made.

Mr. Fleming: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Claxton: I think I had better finish.

Another thing, Mr. Speaker, at which the hon. members opposite have been pounding away, is that I gave the opposition and the country the assurance that everything was perfect. The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) at page 1069 of Hansard said:

> . . . he gave us the assurance that everything was perfect . . .

Similar expressions have been uttered by virtually every speaker for the Conservative opposition. Now, I have a pretty good filing system and index, and I have searched the records since I became Minister of National Defence in 1946 for any single occasion on which I said that everything was perfect, or anything to that effect. It is another myth the opposition are seeking to build up in order that when they find, as I know, that everything is not perfect they will say "but he said it was perfect".

Today the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) quoted three passages from speeches of mine in the house in 1948, 1950 and 1951. The quotations were, I think, intended to support the assertion that I said everything was perfect. Well, I ask hon. members to read Hansard for this afternoon to see whether they can extract any such assertion from those three statements, even widely spaced, and putting them together out of their context. Indeed, I will find a dozen statements in which I brought before the house the difficulties and problems of building up defence forces during this period after the second world war. I assure hon. members that I was fully conscious of those difficulties and, sometimes, conscious of the fact that not very much in the way of support was given in that very difficult task.

Now, sir, reference was made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) to the report of the Auditor General. That is a report made to parliament. In it the Auditor General makes his observations of the activities of various departments and agencies of government. The report has a total of 43 pages. It has 107 numbered paragraphs. Twelve of those paragraphs are devoted to national defence.

One section to which the Leader of the Opposition referred appears at page 24 of the report of the Auditor General. It deals with the methods of keeping accounts for stores. Here I would suggest that the Leader of the Opposition, in his remarks this afternoon, appeared as it were to put into the mouth of the Auditor General, in presenting his report, more than I think you will find in the report itself. Hansard and the report will of course speak for themselves. In paragraph 56 the report refers to service forces accounting:

> Stores. Surveys made of accounting systems—there are at least eight—indicate that no sustained effort has been made to achieve uniformity in systems within the services. The result is that mandatory directives are specialized, particularly with respect to the army. Various other special problems also exist, in particular:

Now, sir, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to our uttering a blast upon receipt of the report of the Auditor General. There was no blast. The Canadian Press, the British United Press, and other sections of the press asked for comments on the background of the Auditor General's report and a statement was issued which gives some of the background. I will read from part of it.

> The storekeeping systems in use by the services were explained at some length to the defence expenditures committee last year. While they vary in detail, the basic principles underlying the systems are the same in all three services, and within each service. The organization for administering them differs among the services by reason of the differences in organization in each service to provide for the essentially different tasks of each. In the army, the ordnance corps, the army service corps, the medical corps, the dental corps and the engineer corps each have their own stores and accounting organizations. In this respect the Canadian army is similar to the British and United States armies with which they work. These systems of each corps differ in varying degrees to meet the specialized needs of the corps they serve. Continuous efforts are made to improve these systems and while uniformity is not an objective for its own sake where an improvement in one system could be usefully applied in the others, it is.

Then, Mr. Speaker, there are further notes. I suggest to the house that this is a matter which can properly go before the defence expenditure committee and be considered by it as was done last year.

The Leader of the Opposition, and also the member for Winnipeg North Centre, referred to the case of a brigadier who had received from the army both a retirement allowance and pay as a civilian employee in respect of the same period. That is dealt with at page 26 of the report, in paragraph 65. Here the Auditor General makes an observation drawing, as he properly should, the attention of parliament to this fact.

This grows out of the application by the Department of National Defence of the provisions of the law and regulations relating to retirement. Under these laws and regulations an officer or man on completion of a certain number of years of service is entitled —just like a civil servant—to a number of months of leave with pay upon retirement. In this case, and in numerous cases in this and other government departments, officers and men entitled to retirement leave have wished to join the civil service. Indeed, in our case, this officer was very much sought after and we wanted him to come to work at once. In accordance with the authority given to us by the treasury board, the civilian end of the department paid him his salary as a civilian worker while he got his retirement allowance for the period of leave which he was not getting. That was strictly in accordance with a ruling of the treasury board dated February 4, 1944.

The Auditor General feels that this should be drawn to the attention of members. It is another matter which I suggest could go before the committee on defence expenditure. Last year, when the observations of the Auditor General were before that committee, the committee examined them, heard the observations of the department, and appeared to be completely satisfied therewith. I hope the same result will obtain this year.

Now, sir, in the course of the discussion a number of points were made to which I have only a brief moment to refer. The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) was good enough in his very courteous remarks to extend to me a welcome back, which I appreciated. Both he and the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Thomas) referred to the reduction in size of the forces, and demobilization at the end of the second world war, having brought about or contributed to the situation in which the army works services found themselves at the time of Korea. I do not believe that can be successfully argued. There was no time at the end of the second world war when we were not engaged in building up the permanent peacetime army. Officers and men were taken on at the rate at which they were available, and at which spaces and money were available. The build-up was steady. Had we kept on forces in being and had we postponed demobilization, the disposal of surplus war stores and the conversion to peacetime use of the productive capacity in factories, I can hear the cry that would have gone up at our delay in getting the boys home and getting the people back to work. As it was, the speed with which the operation was carried out was a major factor in establishing Canada on a sound economic foundation and the early start in the post-war period contributed greatly to the prosperity which we have enjoyed ever since.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked the Prime Minister whether there was not another order issued by the chief of the general staff with regard to the discussion of the Currie report by employees of the department, and the Prime Minister said there was none. The Prime Minister was quite correct. The only order issued by the chief of the general staff was the one read by the Prime Minister. However, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had a unit order which had been issued to a minor unit by the commanding officer, and it was couched in those terms because he had a number of civilians working alongside service personnel. The fact that this had been done was discovered within a matter of days and a correction was entered.

Then the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) asked a number of questions with regard to aircraft, particularly what we were doing to plan and equip ourselves with supersonic aircraft of types more advanced than the F-86 Sabre and the CF-100, which he said were good aeroplanes. Then he went on to say, as reported at page 1077 of Hansard:

—they would be practically useless as effective barriers to such bombers.

Mr. Speaker, his intelligence probably is no better than that available to the armed forces, but he himself suggests that these bombers, which might have an extremely high rate of speed and be able to travel at a high altitude, might come into the possession of the only possible enemy in three to five years. I believe that to be a rather modest estimate. I hope it is.

Mr. Adamson: I said a minimum of five years.

Mr. Claxton: All right; a minimum of five years. I should think that was a fairly sound position. The F-86E is the most advanced type of aircraft in production anywhere. That fact is brought out by the fact that it is being produced by us for Britain to help fill the gap there. It is being used by us in Britain and in France as part of the front line defences of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and it has proved itself in the battlefield in Korea. Not only have the United States-built Sabres proved themselves there, but the Canadian-built Sabres have also done so and, if I may say so, so have the officers of the R.C.A.F.

Then the question is asked: What are we doing to design and to construct a fighter plane with the characteristics necessary for successful combat? There is no fighter having better characteristics for successful combat belonging to us or to our allies today than the F-86E, and when equipped with the more powerful Orenda engines it is believed that it will have characteristics which will enable it to have a considerable life of usefulness against any enemy that might confront us. However, we are doing preliminary design work and are working out the characteristics for further long-time development of the CF-100. We work in close co-operation with our allies, the United Kingdom and the United States, with whom we have the closest liaison.

Then the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) referred to the Alaska highway, particularly in 1942 and 1943. I should point out that, as hon. members know, the highway and all its operations were only taken over by the Canadian army on April 1, 1946.

The Leader of the Opposition referred to the question of security. I should refer again to what I said on this subject a week ago, as reported at page 942 of Hansard, when I recalled that at Petawawa alone the cost of fences necessary to provide security was estimated at $286,000 and the annual cost of the additional guards would be $119,000. At Camp Borden the figures were respectively $346,000 and $139,000. In connection with these questions you find that you must strike a balance between how much you gain through reducing your potential losses by investing in capital equipment and putting on additional personnel.

As I pointed out the other day and as was pointed out by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite), in his constructive and fair speech, the most striking example of that feature was at Farnham where, in order to save a possible loss of property having a value of probably $10,000, it would have been necessary to spend between $25,000 and $30,000 a year on guards.

The question has been asked: Why should we refer the Currie report to a committee? In the speech I made the other night and in my remarks tonight I have indicated some of the reasons why that should be done. I can also point to others. Other matters which are particularly interesting, and upon which it would be most helpful and constructive to have the views of the committee would be the simplification of the procedure for establishing positions and the machinery for filling positions. As the Currie report states and as I stated—and as everyone knows—the main reason for the situation which gave rise to the opportunities that occurred at Petawawa was a shortage of staff. As I said the other day, we have full documentation on each of the recommendations, and will be prepared to put before the committee in detail the efforts made to secure adequate establishments and staffs, both within the department and through the civil service commission. Having regard to the circumstances; the fact that this new system had only begun to be introduced and that its introduction was only likely to be completed in 1951; the fact that Korea intervened in June, 1950; the fact that since then we have had the great build-up in the operations and size of the armed forces, I think the committee, in the end, will be satisfied that even with all the advantage of hindsight it is difficult to see today what should have been done—and nobody here has suggested it—to prevent what happened. We must use every possible endeavour to see that everything reasonably economic to promote the efficient operation of the department and proper accounting is carried through. But once again, Mr. Speaker, I would remind hon. members that in this matter there was no failure in operations. There was a breakdown, as Mr. Currie calls it, although I think it was not so much a breakdown as the fact that the new system never had a chance to be established. It was this which produced a lack of more adequate accounts in the most difficult type of stores, the accounts for these engineering and building stores at a place in which, like other establishments across Canada, there was a great amount of construction going on.

Now, sir, at the beginning of his speech the Leader of the Opposition made reference to an amendment which the opposition had proposed to make. Of course it is appreciated that that amendment was not before the house. He suggested that the government had employed a device, though he said it was a perfectly proper device, to exclude its consideration. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) did on that occasion was something that I really cannot imagine the Leader of the Opposition, or for that matter many leaders of parties, doing, namely forgoing his right to speak in order that on my return from abroad, I might take advantage of the first opportunity to deal with a matter which had come up during my absence. I am sure that had that not been done it would have been a subject of criticism.

Mr. Cardiff: A pretty lame excuse.

Mr. Claxton: It does not need an excuse at all. I have as much right to speak as the hon. member when I catch the Speaker's eye, and hon. members made no objection at the time. They had no right to make an objection, and no objection has been made since then.

Mr. Casselman: You are entitled to your ordinary time.

Mr. Claxton: The Leader of the Opposition said that perhaps we should have anticipated what their attitude would be because we knew they would be opposed to referring the Currie report to the committee on defence expenditure. Well, if that is so, what better—

Mr. Lennard: Who said that?

Mr. Claxton: —part could we play than to give them as early an opportunity as possible of indicating just where they stood; and that is what my amendment did.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It has been brought to my attention that the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Claxton: I am through; thanks.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Claxton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, hon. members.

In beginning his speech the Leader of the Opposition said that the effectiveness of the armed forces must depend on the administration of the Department of National Defence. He referred to our forces in Korea and in Europe, and later on in his speech he praised them as I have praised them. But in conclusion I would point out not only that the effectiveness of the forces depends on the administration of the department, but also that the effectiveness of the armed forces does not come about despite the department.

Mr. Fleming: The minister was kind enough to say that he would answer a question. When Mr. Currie says that internal warnings had not been lacking in the department, and that the chief auditor time and again had reported unsatisfactory conditions—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understood the Minister of National Defence to say that he would hear a question at the close of his remarks. The hon. member for Eglinton may ask a question.

Mr. Fleming: I ask the minister whether those reports of the chief auditor of the department were read by the minister.

Mr. Claxton: I have already dealt with that. I dealt with it in my statement last Tuesday, Mr. Speaker. I pointed out that he made 1,185 reports and that in the nature of things they could not be seen by the minister, and only the most important ones by the deputy minister. However, matters were from time to time drawn to my attention.

Mr. Fleming: The minister never saw any of those reports personally? The minister shakes his head, indicating his answer is no.

Mr. Fraser: That is a terrible condition.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I rise to support the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). In our opinion the Currie report, the report of the Auditor General tabled in this house, and the concern of the public over the expenditure of the taxpayers' money by the Department of National Defence warrant—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Herridge: —that Mr. Currie be asked to conduct a further inquiry into the many other expenditures and commitments covered by the terms of the resolution. Without doubt the minister is responsible for the administration of his department, and quite openly has expressed no desire to escape the responsibility. I am of the opinion that the greater responsibility is not on the minister but on the government as a whole. To expect one minister to administer a department of such gigantic size as the Department of National Defence, having supervision over the expenditure of over $2,000 million, is to invite the very things to happen that are indicated in the Currie report.

There is no doubt about it that rather late realization of this fact has caused the government to consider and advance proposals for the appointment of an associate minister of national defence. Personally I think that is all to the good. But I am quite sure everyone will recognize that under present conditions the minister has an intolerable amount of office work. I understand that the signing of letters even, and the signing of orders is a tremendous physical task alone, and it is far too much for this government to expect such a huge department to be administered by one minister.

I am not capable of making suggestions as to what is best so far as the division of this department is concerned, but I will say this. I have heard a good number of people across this country say they are of the opinion that the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) should be brought back and given charge of air, and that possibly we should have an associate minister for the army and an associate minister for the navy. I just offer that suggestion as one that has been given to me by a number of persons who have some experience in military matters, and who are concerned about the present situation and with relieving the minister of a tremendous load.

This evening I really have one main subject to deal with, but before going on with that I want to say that I was very interested to listen to the explanation given to the house this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in connection with the inadvertent mention by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in his radio broadcast of the Prime Minister as receiving certain documents. Knowing the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as I do, I know he certainly would not make an intentional misstatement. He did that quite unintentionally. The point is this, that everything that was being done at that time was under the direction of the then minister of justice, the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and with his knowledge. As a matter of fact his personality affected all the events of that day. The government itself used certain documents and certain reports that were acknowledged to be stolen, in the interests of the state and for the safety of the state. No one criticized him on that account at that time.

This afternoon the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) I thought dealt very well with the, shall I say, "circumstances alter cases" part of the situation, when he was referring to the government's action so far as the Currie report is concerned when compared with its action on other reports. I quite support what he had to say with respect to the royal commission's report on the Saskatchewan water development, where it is obvious that the gist of the report was in the hands of some of the press some days ago, and members of the House of Commons and people generally throughout Canada were able to read details in various important magazines. Yet we have not heard of any suggestion by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that a search is going to be made to see who leaked that report, or anything of the sort. We feel that circumstances do alter cases, and that possibly there is not quite the same incentive on the part of the government to find out who leaked that report, who stole that report, which has a bearing on government action, as there has seemed to be in connection with the first or working draft of the Currie report.

Before leaving that subject I should like to bring to the attention of the house this fact, that from a reading of the royal commission's report on the Canadian Pacific scandal of 1873, of the records of the house at that time, and of certain correspondence, I think it is quite correct to say that the first Liberal government that ever came into power in Canada after confederation obtained office as the result of a stolen telegram for which a supporter of the Liberal party paid $5,000. I think that is quite right. It is obvious that the tradition was established at a very early date.

I have said that the great majority of the people are concerned, in the first instance, with the expenditure of their hard-earned tax dollars for defence purposes. I think the people of Canada are willing to pay for a satisfactory and efficient defence; but they certainly want to be assured that those hard-earned tax dollars are being spent in a proper way. That is an aspect of the question which has been dealt with extensively by members who have spoken previously, including those of the Progressive Conservative party, as well as members of my own group and the Social Credit group. I am not going to discuss that matter tonight, but I shall deal with another aspect of the subject which I think is causing a good number of thinking Canadians serious concern.

I have had an opportunity to discuss this matter with people in various walks of life, people who see things seriously, and I think it is quite safe to say there are quite a number of people seriously concerned with one aspect of the Currie report connected with the actions of some of the military personnel in high authority. I refer particularly, first of all, to the tabling by the Prime Minister, at the time he tabled the Currie report, of a letter written by the chief of the general staff. I refer secondly to the message of the chief of the general staff in the latest issue of the Canadian Army Journal. I refer also to certain comments made by people in the Department of National Defence with respect to the Auditor General's report, as it applied to that department.

I deal with this question because I think at a time like this it is wise to bring it to the attention of the house, so that we may refresh our minds as to the exact meaning of a democracy. A great many editorials have been written about the tabling of the letter from the chief of the general staff, and about his message in the Canadian Army Journal. It is obvious that in some quarters there is great concern about this action. This is not the first time in Canada that a government has had to indicate that in a democracy those in high command in the army—the chief of the general staff and others—must accept their policy and their direction from parliament, through the government.

I should like to refer to the celebrated case in 1904 of Lord Dundonald, general officer commanding, who was dismissed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the then prime minister, for not observing the principle that the civil power must at all times rule the military. This episode took place when the then minister of agriculture, Mr. Fisher, in his capacity as acting minister of militia, cancelled the name of an officer from a list of officers of a new regiment of dragoons, which had been recommended to the council by Lord Dundonald. Speaking at a military banquet in Montreal, Lord Dundonald, at that time general officer commanding troops in Canada, denounced the minister's action as a gross instance of political interference. The case was brought up in parliament, occasioning vigorous debate. Sir Wilfrid Laurier stated that the cabinet was not obliged to accept the general's recommendations, and said:

> We are not accustomed to being dragooned in this country; Lord Dundonald, with all the respect I have for him, must learn that this is a responsible government.

I should like now to quote briefly extracts from volume 1 of the queen's regulations and orders for the Canadian army. Section 3, which deals with public, civil employment, and political activities, in article 19.36, headed, "Disclosure of information or opinion", states:

> No officer or man shall publish, communicate, or otherwise disclose any information or opinion relating to military subjects acquired as a result of his army service to any person who is not entitled to receive such information or opinion.

And article 19.37 headed, "Permission required to publish writing or deliver address" states:

(1) The provisions of this article shall not apply to a writing, lecture, address or broadcast confined exclusively to members of the Canadian forces.

(2) No officer or man shall, whether it purports to be fiction or fact, publish any writing or deliver any lecture, address, or broadcast in any way dealing with military subjects unless permission is first obtained to do so.

At this point I am going to ask the minister a question: In view of the queen's regulations, when writing his message to the army did the general officer commanding obtain permission to make what in the opinion of many members in the House of Commons would be considered a reflection upon parliament?

In that connection, before proceeding further I should like to read a few brief extracts from the message to the Canadian army from the chief of general staff. I realize that this has already been placed on record by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I should add that this is a well drafted and well written message, and states:

In recent weeks and months the army has been the target of unremitting attacks from many sources. We have been criticized for the indiscipline of Canadian soldiers. We have been criticized for too much discipline. We have been criticized for extravagance and criticized for not providing a whole host of things which cost a very great deal of money. We have been criticized for lack of morale and accused of complacency and arrogance when we have shown or proclaimed a pride in the Canadian army.

And again:

None of this should give cause for any discouragement or depression. The only justification for the existence of the Canadian army is to defend democracy of which free public criticism is an essential element. Some of this criticism has been, and will continue to be, unfairly biased and irresponsible but that will be as clear to the citizens and taxpayers outside the army as to those that serve in it.

And again:

I charge every soldier to apply himself in all those matters where we clearly need improvement but not to be discouraged or depressed by criticisms which are neither founded on truth nor justified in the light of our positive achievements.

My point is this. In view of the fact that criticism of the operations of the army and of the Department of National Defence has been primarily in this House of Commons during the last twelve months, in view of the fact that there has been criticism in the press as a result of the debate in the House of Commons, we in this group think it is quite improper for the chief of the general staff to write a message to the troops of Canada which obviously, in view of what he has written and of what has occurred in this house, where the criticism of the Department of National Defence originated, can be taken and has been taken by a great number of people to whom I have spoken about the matter as a criticism of parliament. I just want to go on to another aspect of these regulations. Section 3 of regulation 19.37 states:

No officer or man of the active force or of the reserves when he is on continuous army duty, special duty, or camp training, shall, whether it purports to be fiction or fact, publish any writing or deliver any lecture, address, or broadcast in any way dealing with subjects of a controversial nature affecting other departments of the public service or pertaining to public policy unless permission is first obtained to do so.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question in that connection. We all read the comments and quite clear criticism of the Auditor General's report which, according to the press, originated with high officers in the Department of National Defence. I ask the Prime Minister if those officers who made those comments in the Canadian press on the Auditor General's report had received the permission of the minister to do so. We in this group think it is highly improper for any official of the Department of National Defence or any high military officer to criticize or to comment upon the report of another department when it is issued. If that state of affairs were allowed to continue we would have the deputy minister of one department criticizing the deputy minister of another department.

I challenge anyone on the government side to indicate where in British parliamentary history a senior military officer or a senior official of the department having to do with military affairs, the war department as it is called in England, has criticized in public or in the press the report or statement of the official having a capacity equal to that of the Auditor General of Canada. It just is not done. I suggest in the same way that it is quite improper and is not fair to the officials who are being criticized or whose recommendations are being commented upon.

I am not going to delay the house at great length, but I feel keenly about this question because I think it is fundamental. I should like to make further reference to the case of Lord Dundonald, who was the general officer commanding in Canada in 1904. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then prime minister of Canada, spoke in the debate that arose out of this case and I should like to quote his words, as reported in column 5533 of Hansard of June 24, 1904 as follows:

You will see in this but one more of the numerous contests for supremacy between the military power and the civil power which have taken place in England and in all British countries for many ages back. In England, sir, and in all British countries, and indeed in all civilized countries, these contests have taken place, but with this difference, however, that in all countries except England and British possessions, this contest invariably terminated by the civil power being crushed by the military power; whereas in England and in British countries, countries that enjoy British laws the contest was decided once for all in favour of the civil power and of civil liberty. But though this contest was decided more than 100 years ago, still it is now and then revived by the military power.

I suggest that in the publication of this report and its distribution to the army, and in this reference to the Auditor General's report, there is an indication that some people are not considering parliament in respect to its relationship to the military power of this country. We all know that under British practice it is strictly forbidden for any member of the high command to comment on any political question or upon the happenings in parliament. I am informed by a good authority that on one occasion since 1945 a top ranking commander in the British army made a slight reference to the happenings in parliament and political developments, and was called immediately before the Prime Minister of Great Britain and told that that sort of thing was just not done.

I should like to refer again to what occurred in the house in 1904 and I quote from columns 4624 and 4626 of Hansard of June 10, 1904, where Mr. Henri Bourassa, speaking on the same Lord Dundonald matter, had this to say:

I think it is well that we should understand exactly the point at issue, not only before the house, but before the country. That point is whether the general officer commanding the militia of Canada is a servant of the government or not. If he is not a servant of the government, I quite accept the conclusion of hon. gentlemen opposite and say that he should not be interfered with by politicians. But, if it is acknowledged, as I always thought it was acknowledged, that he is a servant of the government, that he is appointed and paid by the government and therefore must report to the minister—who is responsible to the house—before stating anything to the country, then, I think the course of Lord Dundonald is absolutely indefensible.

But so long as this general officer commanding is in the position of any other public servant, he is bound to be silent, bound to do what would be the duty of any officer in his position in any civilized country.

Those remarks are strictly in accord with British tradition as to the relationship between parliament and the military power. Before concluding I should like to deal with the propriety of the Prime Minister tabling the letter written by the chief of the general staff, which has tended to have some influence on the public mind with regard to this Currie report and the consequential debate in parliament. I refer again to the debate that occurred in the Lord Dundonald case. There was another interesting aspect to that case which I think has a direct bearing upon the Prime Minister's action in tabling the communique from the chief of the general staff. Lord Dundonald had submitted a report, and it was argued by some that the minister of militia should have tabled the report. In that debate the then prime minister of Canada, Sir Wilfrid Laurier—I know hon. members on the other side hold his memory in greatest respect—quoted from Todd, that great parliamentary authority of Great Britain. He gave a series of quotations, but I should like to read only one or two. I refer hon. members to column 5541 of Hansard of June 4, 1904, where the then prime minister quotes Todd as follows:

The system of laying upon the table of the house reports from officers addressed to particular departments of the executive government is most objectionable.

He then went on to quote Disraeli who had spoken in the British house on the question of the tabling of correspondence or reports by officers addressed to executive members of parliament.

This is what Laurier quotes Disraeli as saying:

There have been cases in which reports of a confidential character from officers of the government have been laid upon the table of the house, to prepare the public mind, and also that of parliament, to consent to some large measure, or perhaps some considerable vote of public money; but generally I think it is a course which the house ought not to sanction.

These are opinions from high authorities which I think indicate some grounds for saying that we consider it improper for reports to be tabled in that way. If the chief of the general staff wanted the matter brought to the attention of the house he had the right to bring it to the attention of his minister or the Prime Minister, and then it would be the duty of the political executive to bring the matter to the attention of the house.

I mention my objections to these things at this time because I find that the newspapers of the country have shown considerable interest through their comments, and newspapers do not comment on things of this sort unless they realize that a principle is at stake or that a large number of people are interested. I also find that quite a number of people are most concerned about this development. I am not suggesting that at this stage it is a serious one, but I do think it is a development that should be nipped in the bud by the Prime Minister and the minister of the department concerned.

This is a democracy; and in our opinion if we are going to maintain it as a democracy parliament and the civil power should always remain supreme. Democracy on occasions, Mr. Speaker, has to be defended on the field of battle. However, its ultimate and final defence rests in the hearts and hands of those who live in the cottages of our land. I am sure all members of the house will agree with me when I say that their front-line trench is parliament.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, in beginning my remarks I should like to say a word to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) because he commenced proceedings this evening by admitting that the point of order raised this afternoon was not well taken and that Sergeant Young actually has applied for parole. I would think the word "parole" would have a great attraction for the Minister of Justice and the other members of the government, because if there is anything they need it is parole from their present responsibilities. I am glad to see the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) back in the house. I am also glad to say that, in spite of fairly strong political differences and probably harsh words back and forth in the house, personally we have remained quite friendly. I think that is one of the good things about this chamber.

I was sorry for the minister tonight because he was, in the words of my leader this afternoon, in the position of trying to explain the unexplainable. That of course is not novel for Liberal speakers during the past few years. They have had quite a number of unexplainable things to try to explain. I should like to comment on some of the matters the minister raised. While he was speaking I scribbled away fairly rapidly, but it may be that I missed some. However, I have a number of notes that cover most of them.

One of the first things he said was that the red herrings are beginning to smell, referring to a certain amount of comment that has come from this side of the house with respect to the red herrings the government has been attempting to drag across the Currie report. All I can say is that the minister's olfactory senses cannot be very keen or he would have recognized some time ago that the red herring was beginning to smell. The biggest red herring that has been brought into the debate so far is the attempt to make out that the most important issue before us is how the C.C.F. got possession of a draft copy of the report. That is the chief red herring that has been introduced into the debate.

It is beyond me why the members of the government would think that was a matter which the general public of the country were going to look upon as being very important, compared with the budget of $2 billion being spent on defence with which this debate is supposed to be dealing, to a considerable extent, in that we are talking about the setting up of a defence expenditure committee. I do not understand why the government would think a red herring of that sort would have very much effect so far as the general public are concerned. That is certainly the smelliest of all the smelly red herrings that have been introduced. I am not, however, going to enter into the Liberal-C.C.F. argument that has been going on with respect to whether an extremely serious offence was committed when the C.C.F. got hold of a draft copy of the report. I think I can quite readily leave that to my friends of the C.C.F.

The minister also said that the only person who had dealt with parts II, III and IV of the report—the ones containing the recommendations—was himself. As a matter of fact, as I tried to point out to him by an interjection during his speech, I dealt with those parts when speaking on this matter before Christmas, at the time the Currie report was first tabled in the house. I dealt particularly with one recommendation which I think is extremely good, namely that a pilot plant or company should be set up so far as the works services are concerned. I recommended at that time, and I recommend now, that pilot companies, pilot battalions, pilot batteries and so forth be set up for all the various branches of the army and the other defence services, so people can see how things should be done properly and how they can be done properly, and then can go back to their own units and apply what they have learned.

I pointed out at that time that from my reading of history that was one of the chief strengths of the German army and one of the reasons they were able to train as good an army as they did in a relatively short period before the last war. That is one of the recommendations I dealt with at some length before Christmas, and I emphasize it again now because I think it is so important. Any attempt the minister may have been trying to make to represent that the members on this side of the house are not interested in the recommendations, that all we are interested in is the first part of the report which blisters the government, is a complete failure. We are even more interested in the latter parts of the report and the recommendations contained therein than in the first part, and we are particularly interested that those recommendations be put into effect.

I shall come back to that matter later. Certainly if the recommendations are to be put into effect it is absolutely useless to place them before the defence expenditure committee. The very name of the committee indicates that the committee is not equipped to deal with recommendations of the type Mr. Currie has made in his report. The only way these recommendations can be put into effect is for the minister and the officials of the department to start to put them into effect. The minister said in his other speech that quite a few of the recommendations—I think he said twenty odd—

Mr. Claxton: Twenty-seven.

Mr. Harkness: —had already been put into effect. When the defence estimates are before the house later in the session I shall be interested in hearing a report from him with regard to how the recommendations put into effect have been working out, how successful they are and so forth, but certainly the defence expenditure committee cannot do anything toward putting them into effect. The idea of referring the report to the defence expenditure committee, from the point of view of the recommendations, is completely hopeless and just does not make sense.

The next thing is that the minister complained that we said that he said everything was perfect. He went on to say that was a myth, and he never did say so. He will recall, and I think he will admit, that at least I have complained of that myself for the last four years. As a matter of fact, every year for the last four years when we have been discussing the defence estimates I have brought this matter up and cited chapter and verse.

I have not time to go into it now, but I can think of two instances in which the minister represented everything as being just perfect. I brought up these things and asked "What is the situation?" and he gave an answer which did not mean anything. One was in connection with the number of field guns we had in this country. The other was in connection with the number of ack-ack guns we had in this country, and what kind of ack-ack defences we had. He said we had excellent ack-ack defences and that the people of Canada had nothing to worry about. I asked him what was this ack-ack defence and where were the guns. I cited the city of Ottawa as having no ack-ack defences. The minister never answered that and never said anything about it again. He just conveniently forgot it and hoped that everyone else would forget it.

Those are just two specific examples of what he claims is a myth. He has represented, in connection with practically every single matter brought up in the house, that everything is just fine: "Don't worry, boys; leave everything to me and the defence of the country is in safe hands." Every time we have brought up specific matters to show that such was not the case he would try to brush the thing aside, or forget it, or say nothing about it. Mr. Speaker, I was glad to hear the minister admit tonight—and I think it is for the first time—that everything was not perfect. I think the minister is now making progress.

Mr. Harkness: He finally admits for the first time that everything is not perfect, and it is the very first time.

The next matter the minister dealt with was the fact that complaints had been made from this side of the house to the effect that the rapid demobilization which took place following the war had been responsible for the lack of personnel in the army works services, and that therefore the policy of the government was responsible for the present mess at Petawawa and elsewhere. I think he quoted the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) and another hon. member in that regard. The minister said that rapid demobilization on the contrary had contributed greatly to the "prosperity of the country"; that is the note I made. He said it would have caused a great deal of disgruntlement amongst servicemen if it had not taken place. I agree with that; but what happened was that a great number of people who did not want to be demobilized were demobilized against their will, the very people who had administrative experience, who could have trained the other members of these works companies and other administrative people throughout the army.

I also spoke on this matter before Christmas and I do not like to repeat what I said then, but apparently the minister paid no attention to what I said at that time, and to what others said. Following the war the Department of National Defence followed the policy of getting out of the army all of the older officers who had had experience before the war in the peacetime administration of the army, the older N.C.O.'s and so on. A very considerable number of those people were retired years before their normal time for pension.

As a result of that policy of retiring these people—I think the idea was that by getting rid of the older fellows they could make room for younger fellows and then keep promoting them more rapidly, and so on—nearly all the men who had any amount of administrative and accounting experience and so on were let out. That was particularly true with those who had served in the Canadian army before the war. They were let out after the war, and we started with a group of green people. A great many had no experience along administrative and accounting lines.

Their experience during the war had been fighting experience; it was not administrative experience. It is no wonder they did not do a good job, and took a long time to learn the job.

So I place the responsibility for this situation which has developed at Petawawa, and generally as far as administration is concerned, squarely on the shoulders of this government, because of the policy they followed after the war of getting rid of people who did have administrative experience, accounting experience and so on.

The minister went on to say something about the obsolescence or otherwise of the F-86E Sabre. That, Mr. Speaker, is a very technical matter and there is not very much use of either the minister or myself, or any other member, making assertions about it. I personally hope very much that what the minister said was correct, that the F-86E Sabre is the best fighter in production. Unfortunately I must point out that the United States jet fighter pilots who have come back from Korea have not said that. It is useless for the minister and myself to get into an argument on the matter because I know that neither he nor I have the technical knowledge to know what we are talking about. We are just taking assertions from this, that or the other person. In any event I will say no more about that particular matter.

The minister next asked why should we refer or why are we referring the Currie report to the committee. He said there were a lot of reasons which perhaps had not been mentioned. The first reason was to secure simplification in regard to the filling of posts. Goodness gracious, how can referring this report to the committee do anything in the world in regard to simplification as far as filling posts is concerned? The committee cannot do anything about that. All the committee can do is to listen to the recommendations from Mr. Currie or others, recommendations which he has already made to the government.

Once more this is one of the things which can only have any effect if the government takes it up and gets some good personnel managers on the job, gets them to work and gets posts filled as a result. Referring it to the committee is only going to delay getting personnel on the job, and the determination of what is required in posts in the army works services or other branches. The minister gave a second reason, but he wandered around and I really did not gather enough about it to comment.

Next was the question asked by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). In reply to that question the minister said that 1,100 odd reports from the auditors of his own department had been made. On further questioning, as I understood him, he said he had read none of those reports. Was that correct? He had not read a single one of those 1,100 reports submitted by his own inspecting officers or auditors, some of which reports are referred to in the Currie report.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that many of the present troubles in the Department of National Defence might have been prevented if the minister had read those reports. I think this was one of the most significant admissions the Minister of National Defence has yet made in this house. I referred to one a while ago, that everything was not perfect. Now this is a more significant admission because it shows clearly that the breakdown of administration which took place in his department was the result of not paying any attention to the inspection and auditing system which they had. Under any reasonable system at all I should say the minister would have had the more important of these auditors' reports brought to his attention. At the very least, Mr. Speaker, if the administrative set-up in the department had been running at all properly, a digest of these auditors' reports, and of the things which they showed were wrong, would have been placed before the minister every month or every two weeks, or at some such stated periods. Then, they having been brought to his attention, he could have taken some effective action to correct them. As the situation was, none of these 1,100 irregularities which the auditors reported was ever brought to the attention of the minister. Under those circumstances how could you expect any corrective action to be taken?

Mr. Claxton: Not 1,100 irregularities, as the hon. member stated, but 1,185 reports.

Mr. Harkness: The irregularities were contained in the reports. There is no question about that. Many other matters might have been contained in them also, but the irregularities were contained in them. Under those circumstances, Mr. Speaker—the minister not having read a single one of them; none of them having been brought to his attention in any way—I would say it is no wonder that Mr. Currie in his report said that things had gone wrong at or near the top.

So much for the various matters which the minister mentioned. There are a few other things to which I should like to refer. A person sitting in the gallery throughout the discussion of this report, as far as the members on the government side of the house are concerned, if he happened to come in and listen only to government members, I am sure would have been greatly perturbed and puzzled as to what was the motion before the house. We of course are on a motion to set up a committee to investigate defence expenditure, the same sort of committee that we had for this purpose last year. I think the terms of reference are exactly the same. To that motion the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) moved an amendment. The amendment directs the committee, when set up, to first consider the Currie report.

As has been abundantly shown by all those who have spoken on this side of the house, I think that report speaks for itself. I can think of nothing less valuable than to have the committee on defence expenditure spend its time, in effect, in investigating the investigator. That is what we would be doing, and that is all the defence expenditure committee can and will do if it is turned loose on this Currie report. We shall be investigating the investigator, the very man the Minister of National Defence and this government appointed for the purpose of investigating the irregularities which had taken place at Petawawa, who spent months in doing that, and who turned in what I think everyone will admit was an absolutely splendid report.

The reason for the tactics of the government in moving this amendment, Mr. Speaker, seems to be quite clear. I do not think there is much doubt about it. The first thing they hope to accomplish by doing that is this: By having the committee go minutely over the Currie report, clause by clause, their objective is to try to cast some doubt on some of the items which are contained in it and, at the same time, by spending weeks in that procedure, to smother the whole report in words. As a matter of fact, that is the technique which was employed so effectively on many occasions by their late leader, Mr. Mackenzie King: smother the thing in words. That seems to be what they are going to try to do in the committee on defence expenditure with regard to this report.

A second and probably much more important purpose would be served, as far as the government is concerned, in moving this amendment, and it is this. As a result of considering the Currie report the committee would not have time to investigate the much more important matters on which it should be engaged. Those matters are the expenditures, by this time something over $3 billion, on our rearmament. How much more than $3 billion it is, I do not know. It certainly must be considerably more than that by this time because the committee's work starts back when the Korean war began in 1950.

What happened last year in the committee on defence expenditure I think presents a reasonable parallel with what happened here in the house this year with regard to this amendment moved by the minister. I think probably the results which were achieved last year in the committee by the tactics followed there suggested the present course to the government and constitute the reason they have adopted it. Last year in the defence expenditure committee I made a motion that the committee should investigate the situation which had developed at Petawawa, but the government would not hear of it. Oh, no; there was no chance at all. It was sub judice. Everything was wrong with that idea.

In the committee we talked about the matter for some time. The government was in this position, I think. They did not want a vote on the issue directly. They thought it would look bad through the country to refuse to have the committee investigate Petawawa, so the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite) rose and moved an amendment to that motion. The amendment was in this form:

> That all the words after "that" be struck out—

And "that" was the first word in my motion. It can therefore be seen that the idea was to slaughter my motion completely. I may say that this was on April 29, 1952. The amendment continues:

> That pursuant to the terms of reference of this committee evidence be taken from competent witnesses dealing with the administrative procedures laid down by the Department of National Defence for the receipt, stockkeeping, issue and accounting of stores, material and equipment at military camps and establishments and in particular the steps taken to prevent, discover and eliminate the loss, misuse or wastage of government property of every kind and that the committee thereafter consider what further steps, if any, should be taken.

Of course that amendment was adopted by the Liberal majority of two to one on the committee. Those are all exceedingly high-sounding words. It sounded as though this were going to be a terrific committee, and as though they were going to carry on a terrific investigation. But in actual fact, Mr. Speaker, here is what it accomplished. It accomplished the purpose of keeping the committee occupied, for half of its entire sittings, with a mass of detail on hundreds of sheets of paper—and they were piled up to a considerable height—which contained lists of losses by fire, theft and other irregularities in the navy, the army and the air force, including items of $2.50, $3.69 and so forth. We were expected to go through—and we did so as far as two of the services were concerned—these long lists, item by item, with an explanation on the side as to how this loss of $2.50 had taken place, and so on. What was accomplished by all that was this. Instead of doing the work which it was appointed to do; instead of doing the work it should have done; instead of doing the work that it was necessary should be done for the welfare of this country, that committee was smothered with this great mass of unimportant details which we had not asked for and which was pushed on top of us.

I have here, Mr. Speaker, an analysis of the meetings of that committee. The committee met first, for organizational purposes, on April 8. It was just an organization meeting. Following that meeting we had seventeen working sessions. Mark you, Mr. Chairman, this important committee held its first working session on April 22. It took all that time for the government to get around to the point of even getting the committee started, before they started to smother it. We started on April 22 and we finished on June 17 having, as I say, held seventeen working sessions, two of them on the last day we sat.

In order that there will be no mistake, the last working day we sat was June 12. We had two sessions, morning and afternoon. On June 17 we had a closed session to consider the report, which was presented to us in mimeographed form. It had been prepared by the chairman or somebody else, I do not know whom, but there it was in front of us, and they said: "There is your report." That is the great committee to which members on that side of the house will refer and say: "The committee on defence expenditure considered this, and they did not find anything wrong. The committee on defence expenditure did not find anything wrong with this particular matter. They did not turn in any adverse report on it." Mr. Speaker, do you think that any report brought in on a mimeographed sheet of paper by the chairman of the committee and presented to the members of the committee was going to be critical of anything the department had done? Why, the thing is unthinkable.

Mr. Croll: Will the hon. member tell me how else you can produce fifty copies of a report?

Mr. Harkness: Well, I will say this, Mr. Speaker. When we consider a report, we might consider some of the things that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) and the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), and two or three others and myself think should go into the report, but naturally these things were not wanted in.

Mr. Adamson: And they were deliberately prevented from going into the report, too.

Mr. Rowe: Seventeen whitewash brushes.

Mr. Harkness: A little further explanation of what went on at these various sessions is also extremely illuminating. There were seventeen working sessions. Eight of those were on these lists that I have talked about, losses by fire and theft and so forth, those minor matters. Eight of the seventeen were given to that. Then one was entirely given over to an explanation on the part of the deputy minister as to the excessive number of boots and forks and teapots and carpets and things of that sort that had been purchased and about which complaints had been made.

Mr. Rowe: And nylon stockings.

Mr. Harkness: Four of the meetings were on mechanical transport. That is all right; mechanical transport is an important item in the armed services, but it is by no means one of the most expensive items. There was one session and a very small part of another one on armaments; that is, guns and small arms and that sort of thing. There were two sessions on aircraft of all kinds, ships and ammunition, all these things which took in I should say all told more than half the total defence budget. Well over $1 billion would be represented in these items of aircraft, ships and ammunition, and we had two out of the seventeen meetings on those items. Then the Liberal members of this house come here, and they go out around the country, and say that the defence expenditure committee did not find anything wrong; everything is fine. What opportunity did that committee have to find out anything about important items as far as expenditures in the country are concerned? They really had no opportunity at all.

Then we had one session on the construction program, which carried on—

An hon. Member: How corny can you get?

Mr. Harkness: I think the minister gave the figure the other day of the total amount of buildings which we had in works services as $750 million. On that we had one session of two hours, most of which was taken up by Mr. Mansur, who gave a very able presentation. He spent most of the time reading his brief or giving his presentation in regard to that matter, with the result that just a few minutes were left for questioning on it. That was the defence expenditure committee last year. That is what went on in the committee last year. The committee was not allowed to function as it should have been allowed to function. The committee was deliberately put on unimportant matters, and was kept on those unimportant matters as long as it was possible to keep it there.

It seems quite evident, Mr. Speaker, that the idea this year is to put the committee on to the Currie report, and as a result to prevent it from dealing with these large items of expenditure. The aircraft item of $668 million which I referred to before Christmas is one such item. God knows how much more it is by this time.

Mr. Adamson: And how effective it is.

Mr. Harkness: The construction program which was spoken about by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), and which the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) promised would be investigated by the defence expenditure committee, is another. How much time will the construction program get in the defence expenditure committee? I venture to predict that it will not get one two-hour session during the whole time. If this program envisaged by the government is carried out time will be spent on a minute examination and re-examination of the Currie report, and it will be a complete waste of time as far as the committee is concerned.

Mr. Rowe: They will be expected to curry the Currie report.

Mr. Harkness: It seems to me that what the people of Canada are interested in is in seeing that value is received for the money spent on defence. That is the main thing that the people of Canada want at the present time. I do not think any Canadian grudges one cent or one dollar which is spent effectively for the defence effort. I emphasize the word "effectively" because the people of this country almost universally do grudge and complain bitterly about the money which is taken from them and wasted, as far as the defence effort is concerned, and which contributes to the inefficiency which has been displayed up to date in regard to our rearmament effort and defence spending generally.

At the present time people are making up their income tax returns. Those people are not too interested in how the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) got hold of an unauthorized copy or a draft copy of the Currie report. They are not too interested in that or in the other extraneous matters which have been brought up here, the red herrings which have been referred to. What they are interested in, and what they are concerned about is how their dollars are being spent for defence. They are very interested in that; and a task which the defence expenditure committee can do for them is to determine whether these dollars are being properly and effectively spent in at least some ways in the defence department. Under the course followed by the government that committee is going to be prevented from discovering that.

The government, as I mentioned before, has attempted to make this disappearance of a draft copy a major question. The major effort on their part is to distract attention from the really important questions posed by the Currie report. The important criticism of the government in the Currie report is not the various details which the minister has spoken about. It is the general breakdown in administration which has taken place within the Department of National Defence, the cost of which Mr. Currie has said cannot even be estimated, and which is certainly very much greater than the value of the articles which were stolen or otherwise made away with.

I have comments here on speeches made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the other Liberal members who have spoken in this debate. I see that I have not time to deal with them all. I would sum up all the speeches which have been made by Liberal members in defence of the government as far as the Currie report is concerned in this way. They were a confused mass of irrelevancies, and they exhibited a complete failure to meet the important criticisms to which I have referred, which are either definitely made or implied in the Currie report and also in the report of the Auditor General.

The criticisms which are either made or implied in these reports are criticisms which we on this side of the house have made here in the past three or four years. Year after year we have been telling the Minister of National Defence that things are not going well this way, or that they are not going well that way; that his general administrative set-up in the Department of National Defence headquarters is staff-heavy; that there is too much red tape; that in some places he has too much staff and in other places he has not enough; that his department is badly organized.

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) urged that a firm of efficiency experts should be brought in to make recommendations to the minister as to how the civilian or administrative part of his department could be reorganized so that he would have a more effective and better working department, but the minister has always pooh-poohed the idea. He has said, "The department does not need an efficiency expert. They are small potatoes, so far as we are concerned". According to the minister, only small concerns call in efficiency experts today. Well, I venture to say that if he had called one in three years ago the government would not be in the position they are today with regard to the Currie report.

Mr. Rowe: Some of them might have read the report, anyway.

Mr. Adamson: You see what just one chartered accountant did for them.

Mr. Harkness: I can sum it up in this way, that the Auditor General's report and the Currie report have demonstrated all too well that the criticisms we on this side of the house have been making in the last three or four years are only too well founded.

On motion of Mr. Noseworthy the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow is private members' day. We shall proceed according to standing order 15.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 9.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, January 21, 1953

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. POULIOT—REFERENCE TO CHANGES IN "HANSARD"

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I am not touchy about changes that are made by hon. members in their speeches, and I very seldom go to the Hansard office to correct my own; but on page 1152 of Hansard of yesterday I read this:

Either they are afraid to have him—

Speaking of Mr. Currie.

—as a witness or they realize that there is not enough already in the report to justify their commitments.

Mr. Wright: The police prosecutions have substantiated them.

Mr. Pouliot: That is the opinion of the hon. gentleman. We may differ with him.

And so on. The Hansard office has sent me that page of the script of yesterday and the reporter, referring to Mr. Currie of whom I had spoken, had written the following:

Mr. Wright: He has substantiated them.

It was changed in high and sharp penmanship—I wonder if it is the penmanship of the hon. gentleman or of his deskmate—to:

The police prosecutions have substantiated them.

I had spoken of Mr. Currie as a former brass hat, but I never said that he was a policeman, and it changes completely my remarks:

That is the opinion of the hon. gentleman. We may differ with him.

If this is going to be read by many people, and it is, I must say that the police prosecutions are to the honour of the Ministers of National Defence, and it is their best defence against all the accusations that have been brought against them.

Mr. Wright: Mr. Speaker, on the point of privilege which the hon. member has raised, I did not go to the Hansard office. Hansard sent me the blue copy and asked me to correct it because, as indicated by the hon. member, the words that were there were not the words that I used in the house, and I made the necessary corrections here in the house on the blue copy which was sent to me by Hansard.

QUESTIONS

CONTRACTS FOR PARACHUTES

Mr. MacLean (Queens):

1. Have contracts been let by the government for parachutes since 1946?
2. If so, what individuals or companies asked for information or specifications?
3. What individuals or companies submitted tenders for any contracts?
4. What was the total amount of contracts let to each company for (a) man-carrying parachutes; (b) other types of parachutes?

He said: I wish to have this question dropped for redrafting.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

SUDBURY—GRAVEL FOR DEFENCE CONSTRUCTION PROJECT

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury):

1. Has A. W. Robertson Construction Company Limited been paid for gravel used by that company on a defence construction project in the Sudbury district?
2. If is, for what yardage of gravel has this company been paid, from July 1, 1951, to date?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Yes.

2. Yardages of gravel as follows: (a) Mr. W. T. Green, Sudbury, Ontario, 20,053·7 cubic yards; (b) Pioneer Construction Company Limited, Sudbury, Ontario, 15,104·5 cubic yards; total, 35,158·2 cubic yards.

CANNED PORK—GOVERNMENT PURCHASES

Mr. Lennard:

1. At what date did the Department of Agriculture start purchasing canned pork?
2. At what date is it proposed to terminate this purchasing?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. Week ending March 15, 1952.

2. No definite date has been set for the termination of purchasing. This will depend on market conditions, storage space, marketable surplus and other factors.

FROZEN TUNA—IMPORTS FROM JAPAN

Mr. Pearkes:

1. Has any frozen tuna been imported to Canada from Japan, or Japanese fishing vessels?
2. If so, what quantities were imported, during the years 1951 and 1952?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, it will be noted that this question refers to frozen tuna. Frozen tuna is not separately classified in trade statistics, and for that reason it is not possible to get the information asked for.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

SOY BEANS—IMPORTS

Mr. White (Middlesex East):

How many bushels of soy beans were imported into Canada, during each of the months of September, October, November and December, 1952?

Mr. McIlraith:

September, 1952	6,482	bushels
October	589,672	"
November	875,982	"
December	not yet available

COD FISHING EXPERIMENTS—VESSELS HIRED

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. Who are the owners of the vessels Edward Humby, Atlantic Rover, Marjory Beryl, Pat & Judy, and Gertrude & Ronald, employed by the federal government during 1952, in Newfoundland waters, in experimental methods of catching codfish?
2. What is the rate of hire in each case?
3. For what period was each vessel hired?
4. Is it the intention of the federal government to continue to hire these vessels during 1953?

Mr. MacNaught:

1. Edward Humby, G. Hemeon (Lessor); Atlantic Rover, R. W. Decker; Marjory Beryl, M. S. Taylor; Pat & Judy, J. Atkinson; Gertrude & Ronald, G. Hemeon.

2. Edward Humby, (a); Atlantic Rover, (b); Marjory Beryl, (b); Pat & Judy, (b); Gertrude & Ronald, (b).

Rate (a) $1,350 per month for vessel and skipper, all fish or other catch to be the property of the lessor and the lessor to supply the necessary crew; (b) $1,500 per month for vessel and skipper, all fish or other catch to be the property of Her Majesty and the department to reimburse lessors for crew, not exceeding three with a maximum limit of $800 per month.

3. Edward Humby, Jan. 1 to May 10, 1952; Atlantic Rover, June 23 to Nov. 30, 1952; Marjory Beryl, June 21 to Nov. 30, 1952; Pat & Judy, June 21 to Nov. 30, 1952; Gertrude & Ronald, July 17 to Nov. 30, 1952.

4. The Atlantic Rover and Gertrude & Ronald have had their charters extended to cover the period January 1 to April 30. It is the intention to continue this experimental fishing during the summer and fall of 1953, but arrangements as to boats to be chartered have not yet been concluded.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

Mr. Argue:

1. How many townships or parts of townships in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, were eligible for prairie farm assistance in 1952?

[Mr. McIlraith.]

2. How many farmers in each province were eligible for prairie farm assistance in 1952?
3. What is the total payment involved in each province as a result of crop failure in 1952?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. 1952 eligible townships and part townships paid to December 22, 1952, Manitoba, 5; Saskatchewan, 152; Alberta, 107; British Columbia, 3; total, 267.

2. Manitoba, 117; Saskatchewan, 3,010; Alberta, 1,609; British Columbia, 74; total, 4,810.

3. Manitoba, $12,595.25; Saskatchewan, $383,825.00; Alberta, $137,138.50; British Columbia, $2,761.00; total, $536,319.75

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—DRUMMONDVILLE, QUE., PREMISES

Mr. Courtemanche:

1. From whom does the unemployment insurance commission rent premises for its offices at Drummondville, Quebec?
2. Are these premises completely heated?
3. If not, what floor area is heated and what floor area is not?
4. When was the lease first signed?
5. For how many years and at what price?
6. Was the lease renewed before the expiry of the first lease?
7. If so, at what price?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. The Department of Public Works rents the second floor of building at 165 Marchand street, Drummondville, P.Q., from Messrs. Ernest and Ubald Grondin for the accommodation of the unemployment insurance commission.

2. The lessors attend to the heating.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. June 15, 1949.

5. (a) For five years, with option to the crown to renew for one year on the same terms.

(b) $6,247.50 per annum.

6. No, lease is still in force.

7. Answered by No. 6.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

COAL—PRODUCTION AND IMPORTS

Mr. Gillis:

1. What was the total coal production in Canada for the year 1952, by provinces?
2. What was the total tonnage of coal imports from the United States to Canada in the year 1952?
3. What was the total tonnage of imported American coal used or stockpiled by the Canadian National Railways, in (a) Ontario; (b) Quebec; (c) New Brunswick (d) Nova Scotia?
4. What are the names of the companies in Canada who import American coal?

LUNAM CONSTRUCTION COMPANY—CONTRACTS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many contracts for buildings or projects have been let by any department of the government other than the Department of Public Works to the Lunam Construction Company, in Saskatchewan, since January 1, 1948?
2. What was the amount to be paid to the said company for completion of each of the said buildings or projects?
3. How much was paid to the said company on each of the said buildings or projects?
4. Did the said company become insolvent? If so, when?
5. How much was owing by the said company for (a) wages; (b) materials; (c) other services, on each of the said buildings or projects, since such insolvency?
6. Of the amounts so owing, how much has been paid by any department of government other than the Department of Public Works?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. J. I. Hetland (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. Smith), the adjournment of the house under standing order No. 31, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the possibility of another railway strike, due to the reported break-off of negotiations, which would tie up the economy of the country and prevent the sale of millions of bushels of grain, much of which is out in the open and unprotected, in western Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Hetland), seconded by the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. Smith), has asked leave to move, under standing order 31, to adjourn the house to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance. The request for leave to make his motion appears to have been made at the proper time.

The hon. member has handed me a statement of the matter proposed to be discussed. The next procedure is for me to decide whether it is in order and of urgent public importance. I must say that the hon. member informed me that he would ask leave to propose a motion with respect to this matter. I realize it is a very important matter, and I have no hesitation in saying that the hon. member's proposed motion has given me some concern. In the statement handed to me the hon. member refers to a reported break-off in negotiations. The only information I have as to a break-off is what I have read in the press. I believe it would be in order if, before I proceed to make a decision, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) were to inform the house as to the present position of negotiations. I assume that this matter is one which is in the first instance for his department. Would this procedure be agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members will agree with my hon. friend from Humboldt (Mr. Hetland) that this is a matter of great importance. I am not going to discuss the degree of urgency of the motion, but in response to your suggestion, sir, I should like to say something as to its expediency at this time.

It is true that, overnight, I received communications from both parties in the present railway dispute, one which has come toward the end of a long series of industrial disputes between railway managements and their various classifications of organized employees. They told me that yesterday negotiations had been discontinued. But in spite of that I entertain the hope, and I am expressing that hope to the two parties, that they might continue their efforts toward a settlement in the only satisfactory way the dispute can be settled, namely, by collective bargaining and negotiations.

Just before entering the chamber today our officials told me there was a possibility this afternoon of a renewal of talks leading toward that objective. I hope most sincerely that this might be true. I know all hon. members realize how delicate and difficult is the task now before the two parties concerned in relation to all the other contracts that have been worked out. Frankly, I doubt very much whether a full-dress debate on the subject here this afternoon would help the two parties in that difficult task.

Consequently, on my undertaking that we will continue to keep in the closest possible touch with the situation, I would like to ask the hon. member for Humboldt if, for the present, he would withdraw his motion.

Mr. Hetland: In view of what the minister has said, I agree, for the time being, to withdraw the motion.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

HUMAN RIGHTS

DECLARATION TO ENSURE FREEDOMS—REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT AS TO JURISDICTION

Mr. E. D. Fulton (for Mr. Diefenbaker) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, immediate consideration should be given to the advisability of introducing a bill or declaration of rights to assure amongst other rights; 1. Freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of the press and of radio; 2. That habeas corpus shall not be abrogated or suspended except by parliament; 3. That no one shall be deprived of liberty or property without due process of law, and in no case by order in council; 4. That no tribunal or commission shall have the power to compel the giving of evidence by any one who is denied counsel or other constitutional safeguards.

And that as a preliminary step the government should consider the advisability of submitting for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada the question as to the degree to which fundamental freedoms of religion, speech and of the press and the preservation of the constitutional rights of the individual are matters of federal or provincial jurisdiction.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might have leave of the house to make a very brief statement on behalf of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I am sure hon. members will learn with regret that he has been called home because of the serious illness of his mother.

This is the second time the hon. member's motion has been called. It was first called last Monday and, for the reason I have just indicated, he was not here. If it stands again today I believe that, under the rules, it would be dropped from the order paper. Therefore, with your permission and by leave of the house I would like to move this motion on behalf of the hon. member and then move the adjournment of the debate. As I understand, under the rules the motion would then go over to "Public Bills and Orders", but would be preserved to be called when it was reached in due course under that heading. If that meets with your approval and I have the leave of the house, I should like to follow that course.

Mr. Speaker: I presume the hon. member has the approval of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) to adopt this procedure?

Mr. Fulton: I must be candid and say that owing to the sudden nature of his call home, and also the fact that the hon. member was in Toronto over the week end where he received the call, I did not have the opportunity to take up the details with him. But it occurred to me and to my colleagues as being the only way in which this motion could be preserved at all during this session. I think I know the hon. member well enough to feel that I can take the responsibility to ask that this procedure be followed.

Mr. Speaker: The reason I brought the matter to the attention of the hon. member is that if that procedure is followed this afternoon this item will next appear under "Public Bills and Orders." I would not think that the possibility of it being reached would be very great.

[Mr. Fulton.]

It may not be any greater if the motion were dropped and restored to the order paper in the usual way. It would then appear at the foot of "Notices of Motions". However, I shall leave it entirely to the hon. member for Kamloops to say what procedure he would like to have followed.

Mr. Fulton: I rather feel that the chances of the motion being reached if it were dropped and then restored under "Notices of Motions" would be slightly less than the chance of it being reached if it were placed at the foot of "Public Bills and Orders". In view of the great and continuing interest in this matter of the hon. member for Lake Centre I felt it would meet with the approval of the house if someone could just speak to it, move the adjournment of the debate and thus preserve it so that it will still appear on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: It is agreed that the motion has been moved and has been adjourned.

OBSCENE LITERATURE

PROPOSED JOINT COMMITTEE TO RECOMMEND MEASURES TO DEAL WITH FILTHY LITERATURE

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops) moved:

That, in the opinion of the house, the government should consider the advisability of appointing a joint committee of both houses of parliament for the purpose of studying and recommending legislation or other measures under which the growing volume of filthy literature circulating in Canada can be effectively dealt with, without at the same time improperly restricting the freedom of the press or of genuine literary or artistic expression.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in bringing this matter before the house today I feel that you and hon. members will be glad when I say that my intention is to speak for less than the length of time allowed because I know there are a large number of hon. members who are deeply interested in this subject. As there are only three and a half hours for debate today I feel that I should be as brief as possible to give an opportunity for others to speak who wish to do so.

I have said that I know that this matter is one of the greatest interest to a large number of hon. members. I base that statement on the volume of resolutions and letters which I have received from all parts of Canada in support of the suggestion contained in the resolution and also from conversations which I have had with my colleagues in the house in which they have indicated their interest in and concern over the situation which exists. I say without fear of contradiction that there is evidence of a disturbing increase in the volume of filthy literature circulating in Canada.

That fact indicates the seriousness of the problem. It is also a problem of great complexity, the solution to which is going to tax the ingenuity of this house or of any body that has to deal with it. I venture to state that the difficulty of the problem is indicated in the words of the resolution, which I have phrased as I did because of that difficulty. So that the context may be complete, I should like to read the resolution, which is as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of appointing a joint committee of both houses of parliament for the purpose of studying and recommending legislation or other measures under which the growing volume of filthy literature circulating in Canada can be effectively dealt with, without at the same time improperly restricting the freedom of the press or of genuine literary or artistic expression.

That is the problem, and it is an old problem. The problem is to reconcile freedom of speech and literary and artistic expression with the necessity of preventing abuse, preventing a situation under which liberty becomes licence and degenerates, in so far as this matter is concerned, into lewdness or obscenity.

Hon. members, from reading the press and other sources dealing with this matter, are perhaps well acquainted with the fact that there is in Canada, as there is in the United States, a growing concern over this problem. Therefore it is not necessary for me to review at any length the growth of the situation which now confronts us. I would however draw your attention and the attention of others to the fact that there has existed on the statute books of Canada for some years legislation dealing with obscene literature. This will be found in section 207 of the Criminal Code. This legislation was substantially amended in 1949 by a bill passed in the second session of that year.

The fact is that the only heading under which obscene literature is dealt with in section 207 is by use of the one word "obscene". There is no wider or broader definition given in the code of the type of literature with which we are concerned. It is made an offence to print, publish, circulate and, generally speaking, otherwise deal with or have in possession, for any of those purposes, obscene literature.

The amendment which was passed by parliament in 1949 provided for certain changes, but they dealt mainly with crime comics. I am not attempting to state that that was the only purpose or only effect of that legislation, but I think I am accurate when I say that it was the main concern before the house at that time. So, broadly speaking, we are left in the situation where the legislation dealing with obscene literature is in the same form as that in which it has existed for many years. I but reflect the views of a very large number of Canadians and I believe a considerable proportion of the membership of the house when I say that, under circumstances now prevailing, as pointed up by the very great increase in the volume of this filthy matter now circulating, it is correct to say that the legislation is no longer adequate to deal with the situation.

In connection with this whole subject, I received this morning a report that has just been published of a committee of the United States congress. It is headed, "Report of the Select Committee on Current Pornographic Materials, House of Representatives, 82nd Congress, Pursuant to House Resolution 596", which was passed in May of last year. The United States house of representatives set up a committee pursuant to that resolution which made an exhaustive study of the whole matter. For the benefit of the house I should like to read the summary of their approach to the matter. I do so because I find that their approach and the approach I am about to suggest are almost identical. As recorded at page 12, the United States committee said:

> A practical solution consistent with adequate safeguards against possible violation of the constitutional rights of free speech is the aim of the committee and never has it entertained any thought of federal censorship of the press.

I submit, Mr. Speaker that is the line of approach which our parliament should follow. We should not adopt, as the objective in dealing with this problem, the setting up of any form of federal censorship. I believe that to set up a form of censorship, particularly at the federal level, would be to expose the country to dangers greater possibly than the danger with which we are seeking to deal, the danger present in this large volume of filthy literature. There are other approaches much more consistent with our traditions of justice, freedom and democracy which I suggest should be the main concern of the house in seeking ways to deal with the problem. I suggest that the basis of that approach is to seek to strengthen the existing legislation, to seek to find a method under our Criminal Code whereby we may define with sufficient clarity just what offence is meant, just what it is that we mean by obscene literature which it is an offence to publish, so that our courts may deal with the matter with certainty and without the great difficulties which now surround their consideration of such cases when they come before them.

I shall have something to say in that connection in a few moments. I mention it at this stage because I want to make it perfectly clear that that at any rate is my approach to the matter in bringing it before the house, not that we should have censorship, but rather that we should seek to strengthen the legislation and then leave it to the courts to decide whether, in any particular instance, an individual or a corporation has been guilty of an offence.

I should like to have the indulgence of the house for a moment or two to outline the seriousness and extent of the problem, because after all what I am suggesting, and suggesting in all seriousness, is that the House of Commons should set up a committee to deal with the whole matter, and I know how serious that is. Parliament is composed of members who have a great volume of work, who are extremely busy, and it would not be proper for anyone to suggest lightly that we should add to our work by setting up another committee unless the subject suggested for reference thereto is one of extreme importance.

Mr. Garson: I wonder if I might ask my hon. friend a question. Before he leaves the alleged inadequacy of the law, would he favour us with his opinion as to why it is inadequate as it stands at the present time. That seems to be the point.

Mr. Fulton: If the minister will permit me, I shall come back to that in the course of my remarks. I intend to deal with it, and will not leave it with only a passing reference, but I want now to suggest to the house the seriousness and extent of the problem which I say should be referred to a committee. I should like to rely to a considerable extent, if I may, on quotations from authorities far better qualified than I am. As you know, Mr. Speaker, a committee of the Senate was set up to study the whole matter. It sat during the last session and I understand it is to resume its studies during the present session. I shall not refer to anything current but I should like to quote one or two excerpts from their proceedings of last session.

One question which I think is sometimes present in the minds of those considering this matter is whether after all it is so important. I know in fact that it is rather easy and sometimes tempting to treat the necessity of dealing with obscene literature as the ideas of a bluestocking reformer, as something which can be treated with humour and laughed off. I take the liberty of suggesting, on the basis of my own experience, that it is not readily understood by ordinary Canadians of decent mind the extent to which this filthy literature infests the newsstands across the country. It comes as an eye-opener, as a shock, to go in and browse around a newsstand and pick up some of the things exposed for sale there and which are available at 5, 10 or 15 cents—rarely more than 35 cents—to the youth of the country. Anyone realizing the volume and the perniciousness of the materials which are offered for sale, and the ease with which they can be acquired, would, I am confident, not hesitate for a moment to devote his full attention to the question.

I hope I shall be able to lay before the house some indications of the extent of the circulation of this material, and therefore of the seriousness of the problem, in justification of my request that we set up a committee to deal with it. Last session a delegation from the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire appeared before the Senate committee. It is not necessary for me to speak about the responsibility of that organization and the care with which it might be expected to make its representations. Here is an extract from what they had to say with respect to the extent of the danger. They are dealing at this stage with comic books only, and I wish to read from page 30 of the report of the proceedings of the special committee of the Senate. They said:

> There are approximately 125 "comic" books published with types too numerous to mention. One newspaper editor in the United States examined 108 "comic" books and found 70 per cent altogether undesirable. A survey committee in Victoria, B.C., estimates that less than 10 per cent of the "comics" are at all desirable

They go on to say:

> Few and deadly dull are the comics that even pretend to be comical. The humour has disappeared. Instead we have Superman and gangs of thieves, G-men and sadistic murderers who carve their way through the "funny pages" talking plain talk, and giving people "the works".
> Comics are on sale at all newsstands, many shoeshine parlours and tobacco shops. They also are stocked in pool rooms and children go there to make their purchases. Bookstores refuse to stock "comics" because children, coming to buy, handle and soil other merchandise.
> The "comic strips", however, are mild in comparison with the "escape literature" of today. Just to look at the gruesome cover pictures on a newsstand is enough to make one's hair curl. Yet apparently people, including children, read it, and in fact demand it. The "bad" versus the "good" is the theme nowadays and the ugly chatter of machine guns and the wham-wham of black automatics are altogether commonplace.

Then the committee of the United States house reporting on their studies of the extent to which this material circulates had this to say, and I am reading from page 2 of their report:

> Pornography is big business. The extent to which the profit motive has brushed aside all generally accepted standards of decency and good taste and substituted inferior moral standards, has become not only a national disgrace but a menace to our civic welfare as well. Parents who would not tolerate salacious conversation in their homes apparently do not object to, or are unaware of, the presence of degrading types of books and magazines devoted to the same topics, whose principal appeal is to the salacious-minded.

They go on:

In addition to their other vices, so-called "comics" for children are build-ups for later sales to adults of low ethical standards. Much of the modern output of such juvenile fiction does not teach children to think straight. Cartoon-comic books, a degenerate outgrowth of long-established newspaper comic strips, were "bootlegged" when they first made their appearance but are now flaunted openly in public markets. Men who certainly ought to know, former Warden Lewis Lawes of Sing Sing Prison, J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the F.B.I., and Judge James V. Mulholland, of the New York City Domestic Relations and Children's Courts, agree that they have a definite influence upon the motivations of youthful offenders.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I should also like to quote from the statement made by one member of the committee of the United States house who spoke of her difficulty in persuading herself that this was in fact a pressing problem. I suggest that in the minds of many in Canada there is present the same difficulty. As reported at page 9 of this report she says:

I can remember very well that ten years ago so-called smutty literature was unknown in this country. It was so unknown that I personally, when I was appointed to this committee, thought we were chasing something that was rather absurd because there was so little of it, that it would not amount to anything.

Now the thing that has appalled me is that this stuff is very big business, that it is going out in millions, and that, as I see the picture, it has changed the mores and the morals of the country because, after all, people can be judged by what they read.

I was always under the very happy impression that Americans did not read this kind of literature, but they apparently do, judging by the money that is taken in by great publishing houses, and also by the quantity of this stuff that comes out, and I think it is unfortunate that they are reading so much of this.

The evidence that we have had, both by way of representations from individuals and by way of submissions to the Senate committee, indicates that the situation in Canada is no less serious than it is in the United States.

Then there is the question of who is responsible for the situation, and I have heard a number of suggestions to the effect that this is not a matter calling for parliamentary action or legislative action—that it is a matter which the parents and the people of Canada, and particularly the publishers and distributors of printed material, should themselves handle.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the house that the problem has gone far beyond the stage at which such voluntary action, if you want to call it that, can provide an adequate solution. There is the question of the various stages involved from the time the material is conceived in the mind of some perverted author, through the various printing, publishing, distribution and retail trades into the hands of the ultimate purchaser. There is the question whether the vendor, the distributor, the publisher or the printer should be the target of suggestions about how this matter might be handled.

The Senate committee had an outline presented to it last year of the difficulties of saying just who is responsible for the widespread distribution of this filthy material. They had before them a gentleman who owns a newsstand here in Ottawa. It appears that in Canada, in this part of the country at any rate, this type of publication is distributed mainly by two large concerns, the National News Company and the American News Company. This witness gave us the information that the retailer was not free to insist to his distributor that he should not be provided with undesirable types of literature and that they should give him only the desirable type that he might wish to sell. He informed the committee that the vendors receive what they call packaged literature. That might mean they would get up to 75 different magazines in a bundle. That bundle is delivered to the store on regular days once a week in most cases. It contained just the number and type of magazine which the distributor felt were appropriate in that bundle.

He said that in his little store it is necessary, and would always be necessary if he wanted to be certain that no undesirable material reached the public, to have a girl and pay her full time to do nothing more than to go through those bundles and make sure the undesirable literature was removed and put under the counter leaving only the desirable types exposed for sale. Even then he said it is difficult to know whether you are getting a person qualified to make that choice.

So you see, Mr. Speaker, that it is not fair—although I am not suggesting that they should be absolved altogether—to blame the vendors, because they get this material in vast quantities and it is a task of the greatest difficulty, from a physical point of view alone, for them to sort it out. It is my suggestion that the distributor, and more particularly the printer and publisher, should be held responsible; and that the greatest onus for cleaning up this situation should be placed on them.

The witness I am referring to, a Mr. Grenier, gave this answer before the Senate committee to a question regarding what would be necessary for the retailer to clean up the situation. As shown at page 23 of the committee's proceedings, he was asked by one hon. senator:

You would require a censor in every retail store?

The answer was:

It would amount to that.

The United States committee came to very much the same conclusion about the difficulties of cleaning the situation up by taking action at the retail level. As reported at page 17 of the report of their select committee, they said:

It seems clear that publishers are responsible for the inception, preparation, distribution, and sale of pornographic literature, which now reaches an incredible volume and produces profits of such magnitude as to encourage resistance on their part to all efforts leading to control by law. Any effort toward controlling this menace effectively must begin at the source, which is the publisher, and this is emphasized by the results of inquiries which the committee has conducted.

They say further:

It would be paradoxical to state that if such books were not in existence this moral stigma would thereby be eliminated; but the idea in making such a statement is to point out that the source of this pornographic stream is the publishing house and while the distributor, the wholesaler, and the retailer all participate as purveyors, it is the publisher who is primarily responsible, since he is the architect and creator without whom the chain of distribution could not function.

In Canada, Mr. Speaker—and I mention this only in passing—the problem is complicated by the extent to which literature circulated in this country is imported from the United States. Even if we could devise a satisfactory answer along these lines, probably it would not be the complete answer in Canada to hold the publisher exclusively responsible, because in many cases the publishers are United States concerns. We have to go a little farther than the findings of the United States committee might suggest.

As to the nature of these problems, may I just read one further extract from the findings of that United States committee. I do this, Mr. Speaker, because I have read through this volume carefully and I say without hesitation that their findings, in so far as the nature of this filthy stuff is concerned and its prevalence, are borne out by the limited investigation that I, as one individual, have been able to carry out in Canada. The situation here is proportionately just as bad as it is there. Here is what the committee has to say with regard to the magazine type of obscene literature, which I think is the type that reaches young Canadian boys and girls in the formative stage of their lives, in the greatest quantity. I read this from page 24:

The weight of evidence against cheesecake-nudism is not so much against nudity per se as against those avaricious publishers who present their subjects in torsos abnormally exaggerated as to their secondary sexual attributes, and in suggestive, even lascivious, poses. It cannot be denied that such pictures will have a libidinous effect on many normal individuals. Their effect upon the subnormal individual may be more disastrous. The most objectionable feature of this state of affairs is that pornographic pictures are sold indiscriminately to men, women, youths of both sexes, and even to children.

It is not pleasant to dwell at length on the details of the kind of filth found in these publications, but I should like to outline for you an example from just one publication. I think it may come as a shock to hon. members, certainly it did to me, to know about this. I do want to emphasize to the house that the extreme seriousness of this situation is that children—possibly the children of many of the hon. members here—are exposed daily to this type of thing. It is a matter calling for the earnest consideration of parliament to find ways and means of ending the flood of this filthy literature.

In a magazine which I picked up on the newsstand in Ottawa, but which I shall not name, there was a series of pictures of what you might call the comic strip variety. It was entitled "Undressed to Kill". There was a series of pictures of a bandit, so-called holding a woman up at the point of a gun and forcing her to undress; and the undressing is revealed progressively until the culmination. The first picture has the caption—"'What's coming off here?' the cool killer asks his beautiful victim" She has her dress about half way down. The next picture—"Too bashful to answer, April turns her back on the cad. Nice back." Let us say nothing about that—except that the dress is all the way down now. "'O.K., Babe', he says, 'let's take off.' Our nervous heroine thinks he means this." By now the slip is coming off. In the next picture, "She gives him a different view of his work. Nice view."—showing a further stage of disrobing. "He sees this won't be an undercover job, and he likes what he sees." Then: "Fighting desperately for her life, she sends a warm breeze his way." And the final picture: "No use. A ·45 slug rips through pale flesh and April's out of season." She is by then completely undressed, and being carried off over the shoulder of the "bandit".

The point I want to make, Mr. Speaker, is this. This type of magazine can come into the hands of anyone in Canada who wants to buy it. They are being bought, and bought in large quantities, by young boys and girls. As every hon. member knows, children are born imitators. They imitate, not in the sense of wanting to do something that is wrong, but simply because it is what they have seen. Even if it happens to be wrong, they imitate it, and the first thing they know, they are accused of doing something wrong.

I ask hon. members who may have children themselves to imagine what would happen if this magazine or others like it fell into the hands of a gang of boys, perhaps 12 or 13 years old, to whom these words and pictures appeal as a rather exciting thing. They would be inclined to imitate it. Here is a rather exciting thing they have seen illustrated, and they decide it would be fun to copy it. I believe every hon. member will be able to look back and recall, from his own knowledge, actual cases about which he has heard, where boys and girls have got into trouble by doing that sort of thing in exactly the sort of way I am describing. They may start by undressing their little sister or by grabbing a little girl on a vacant lot and starting to undress her. I am not overshooting the mark, because the undressing of others, and worse, has been done by gangs of school children in cities of the United States and our own country.

Obviously, such incidents are not the result of only one cause, but I do suggest this sort of thing is a contributing factor. When we have illustrations of this sort, combined with the warnings of such men as Mr. Hoover, director of the federal bureau of investigation, that these things do contribute to juvenile crime, then I think we can appreciate the seriousness of the situation. We have, therefore, a very serious problem. We have the problem of preventing people from perverting the minds and morals of youth for profit, but it is a problem which I believe to be capable of solution by this parliament.

I am not going to be dogmatic, and am suggesting the question be referred to a committee. But my own view is that one way to a solution lies in strengthening the legislation, which still refers to the one word "obscene". This word "obscene" has received a variety of interpretations. I looked it up in the Oxford dictionary and in Funk and Wagnalls, the United States dictionary, and I find that these authoritative works have great difficulty in adequately defining the word "obscene".

Mr. Garson: Is my hon. friend aware of the fact that it has been judicially interpreted?

Mr. Fulton: I am very much aware of the fact that it has been judicially interpreted in the case of Regina v. Hicklin, I think the name was. In any event, it was Chief Justice Cockburn who laid down the judicial definition of the word "obscene". I have his definition before me here, and it reads:

> The test of obscenity is this, whether the tendency of the matter charged as obscenity is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences and into whose hands a publication of this sort may fall.

One of the difficulties there, of course, is that that sets up any judge trying such a case as a censor. He has to determine whether or not the matter complained of is obscene within the meaning of that definition, whether or not the tendency of the matter charged would be such as to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences and into whose hands such a publication may fall. The difficulty—

Mr. Garson: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Just in a minute. The difficulty that judges have found, and indeed have expressed in the courts, is that they do not feel themselves qualified to be censors, because they realize fully that what may appear to be obscene to them, and may be obscene in one context to them, may not be obscene to others, and might not be obscene in another context. Judges have expressed, as the minister knows, the greatest reluctance to come to conclusions as to whether or not matter complained of is actually obscene; although they have expressed the strongest personal revulsion to the matter complained of, they still say: "I do not want to set myself up as a censor."

Mr. Garson: Will my hon. friend tell us, if a judge is not permitted to decide on questions of fact in a matter of this kind, such as whether it is obscene, in what other way an enforceable section of the code could be drafted?

Mr. Fulton: I am going to give a suggestion along those lines in a minute, and I realize I am perhaps soon going to break my own resolution and speak for the full forty minutes, so I will hasten to a conclusion. I do not suggest for a moment that a judge should not have to determine a question of fact; but—and I am not going to be dogmatic and lay down the words of any definition which might be adopted, though I should hope it would be decided by the suggested committee after its hearings that some clear definition be inserted—I suggest the judge should be assisted in his task of deciding the question of fact by a more adequate, a more clear-cut definition, dealing by classification if necessary, of the types of literature which now circulate in quantities and of a sort entirely unheard of and unsuspected when this legislation was first enacted. Here, for instance, is an illustration of the sort of problem with which judges are faced, and problems which have the result that judges are not deciding questions of fact but are deciding questions of conjecture and are asked to become the arbiters of moral standards, a position which every judge, however high-minded he may be, dislikes being placed in.

In the case of Rex v. Descotes, a 1925 case, reported at 63, Quebec Supreme Court Cases, page 52, the judge said this:

> The last words of this quotation—
> Referring to another authority.
> —point out a factor which must be borne in mind. A medical work would not be obscene if sold only to medical students or practitioners. But it might be most unwise to allow such a book to fall into the hands of young people without medical training, and so far as the general public was concerned, such a book would then be obscene, and its sale an offence.

Mr. Garson: What is obscure about that? That is as clear as daylight.

Mr. Fulton: It may be clear to the minister but it has certainly not been a matter that judges have found it clear to decide. The minister wants to leave the judges and the courts without any help in arriving at this question of whether or not the matter complained of is obscene, and we have seen the results in our courts. It is perfectly true that a number of prosecutions have succeeded, but a number of other prosecutions, in connection with matter which I suggest without hesitation this parliament would unanimously decide was obscene, have failed because the judge has said: "I have my own personal views about it, which I would not hesitate to express, but as a judge in a court of law I do not feel that I am qualified to set myself up as a censor and say what is obscene, because, although it is obscene to me, it may not be obscene to others, and for all I know it may not be obscene to the majority." I suggest to the minister and to the house that it is the duty of parliament—that is one of the things that we as legislators are here for—to say what "obscene" means, and when we are providing that it shall be an offence against society to engage in the publication of this type of lewd, obscene matter, to say wherein the offence lies; and that being so, let us define what is the obscenity that we are trying to deal with, and define it in such clear terms that when a judge is confronted in a complaint against a person that he has committed that offence, he will be enabled to find without hesitation and without doubt whether or not that person committed that offence. In view of the many judicial statements and dicta in connection with these cases, the minister cannot say that judges are in a position today where they can make such a finding without hesitation and without doubt.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member permit another question? My hon. friend says that parliament will be able to draft a better definition. Can he imagine a better definition of obscenity than the very one which he has just quoted? The test of obscenity is this: whether the tendency of the matter charged as obscenity is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences and into whose hands a publication of this sort may fall. Can he imagine parliament getting a better definition than that?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, I can imagine that a committee might work out a better definition. That definition was given in 1868 before the present pulp comic was ever thought of, and at a time when literature which now masquerades in many cases, in cheap editions, under the guise of works of art and sociological studies, in gaudy covers, was simply not available to the teen-agers, boys and girls, into whose hands that literature now falls. I am sorry I cannot deal with it at too great length; my time is nearly up. Take the case of the medical book referred to in Rex v. Descotes—

Mr. Garson: That is exactly covered by this definition.

Mr. Fulton: With deference, the minister and I apparently are just poles apart, because I submit it is not covered by that definition at all. Are you going to charge the medical book as being obscene simply because it falls into the hands of a person other than a medical student? And yet that is the difficulty. Are these books, which might not be regarded as obscene if they come into the hands of certain people, to be regarded as obscene merely because they come into the hands of other people? That is what the minister is saying. In other words, the minister would want the judge to make the test of obscenity not whether it was really obscene or not but into whose hands the matter came. I submit that is not a satisfactory test of obscenity.

Whether the minister and I can ever be of one mind on this point or not, I do say this to him, to you, sir, and to the house, that the growing concern over the danger to the morals of the children of this country, expressed by parents and by many organizations, is an indication, if any other indication were needed, that this matter is not being satisfactorily dealt with under the present legislation; and indeed, sir, the very fact that the volume of this filthy stuff circulating in Canada is growing in such enormous proportions is another indication, if another indication were needed, that there is not a satisfactory answer in the legislation on the statute books at the present time.

Mr. Speaker, as I said, I am not going to be dogmatic. I think the whole question is one for a committee of parliament to study. If of course they feel that the present legislation is satisfactory, then they will so recommend. But I think there should be a committee. I hope the house will agree because I believe there are sufficient able men in this house and in the other place to be able—and here I answer the minister definitely—to devise a more satisfactory definition, a definition which is more appropriate in the light of the present type and quantity of literature circulating in Canada, and also possibly to classify the types of literature with which we are dealing, because there is certainly no attempt to differentiate between different sorts under the present legislation.

I can tell the house as a matter of interest that I had the opportunity to appear before the Senate committee last session. I asked the hon. senators if they would welcome a suggestion that this house join them in such a study. They gave me their assurance that they would indeed, and that if this house were to set up a committee the two committees might then meet and form a joint committee of parliament to continue the study on which they have embarked.

I know that you cannot legislate morality; you cannot, by legislation, require and compel people to accept standards which they do not believe in. But I do not think there is any difficulty on that ground, because certainly the moral standards of the people of Canada, as will be agreed by all members of this House of Commons, are such that they all condemn this filthy trash to which our children are exposed. So, while you cannot legislate morality, I do believe you can and you should, by legislation, define as an offence the publication of literature which seeks, for motives of profit, to pervert morals, particularly those of children. And that is what this type of filthy trash does. I think by legislation we should provide that that shall be an offence, adequately defined, and liable to extremely heavy punishment.

I hope that the house will accept the suggestion to set up a committee which would devote its attention to the whole problem, to the end that the people of this country, particularly the children of Canada, may have more protection than, I respectfully suggest, they have now against this type of obscene literature.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate, following the speech of the hon. member who has moved the resolution, I should like to indicate at the beginning that, as a citizen, as a member of the House of Commons, as Minister of Justice and, particularly, as a parent, I am in complete agreement with him as to the desirability of doing everything within our power to stamp out traffic in this obscene literature.

We know, as he has stated, that there are those who make light of this literature, as being not a matter of serious moment. But I do not share their views for one moment. I think that this is a matter of great seriousness.

I was glad to hear him say that he agrees with the conclusions of an American committee to the effect that a practical solution is their aim. We can all agree in being against sin, and we all agree with practical solutions. I am glad to hear him say that he has no thought of censorship. I wondered if, toward the end of his remarks, what he had in mind was some kind of index of banned books prepared by parliament. He shakes his head in the negative and I am glad to see that he excludes that possibility.

Likewise I was glad to hear him say, and I entirely agree with him, that there is no use depending upon voluntary action in this matter, because it will not be sufficient.

An hon. Member: Private enterprise intervenes.

Mr. Garson: Quite. Where there is a thoroughgoing big business on the one hand, and a few volunteers on the other; and it simply will not work out.

That being the case, it seems to me that my hon. friend from Kamloops has pretty successfully narrowed down the field of inquiry of the committee to which he has referred, and the field of consideration that we might give to this matter in the present debate. He has narrowed it down to a provision in the Criminal Code prohibiting the possession or the sale of this type of literature.

As I understand my hon. friend, he says that the section in the Criminal Code at the present time is defective only in that it does not provide a sufficiently clear definition of the crime itself.

Mr. Fulton: I did not have time to make all the suggestions that should be made. That is my main objection to the present provision. But I also believe the penalties are not sufficiently heavy, and that they should be even more severe against the printers and publishers than they should be against retailers and distributors. Those are other suggestions.

Mr. Garson: I am very glad to have my hon. friend's supplementary remarks; but I think he will agree with me that the question of penalty is not basic in the matter. The basic question is whether we can get a satisfactory definition of the crime itself.

Now, while I agree with my hon. friend on all these points I have indicated, I still deprecate very much indeed his attitude toward this subject, and for reasons which I shall now indicate. Because what will prevent more than anything else any proper action in connection with this matter is divided counsels as to the manner in which it should now be dealt with. And when we are fussing around and tinkering with the law, instead of enforcing it, we are not going to cure this evil.

My submission is—and I hope to back it up with cogency—that the law which we now have is quite enforceable. I say that the way to cure this evil is a very simple way, and that is by enforcing that existing law; and every step we take, such as the one which my hon. friend indicates in the house today, that draws attention away from the fact that enforcement is the only thing that will cure the evil, is a step in the wrong direction.

The thing to do today is to bring to bear the pressure of public opinion upon the authorities which have the responsibility for enforcing this law. In that way—and in my judgment in no other way—will we cure the evil in quick order.

What are the facts? I am surprised my hon. friend from Kamloops, of all members of this house, should have forgotten them so soon. He brought a bill before the House of Commons dealing with crime comics. It was accepted by the government in good faith. But when we examined it we thought it was wholly inadequate for the purposes for which it was intended.

Mr. Fulton: That is not easy to understand. It was prepared by the Department of Justice for the previous minister of justice.

Mr. Garson: That may or may not be; but I had thought perhaps it was done under my hon. friend's instructions.

But, no matter what its origin was, when it was considered it was found to be wholly inadequate for the purposes for which it was intended. And my hon. friend must remember—and if not I shall now refresh his memory upon the point—that his bill was held here in committee for a long time. And for what purpose? It was held in committee in order that, as we had announced we would do, we could write to the attorneys general of the various provinces of Canada, and have them confer with their prosecuting officers, men who know from practical experience what should be in a law of this kind to put it into a condition that a clever defence lawyer could not drive a herd of elephants through it.

And after the bill had been in committee for that purpose for that length of time, after we had received very great co-operation and consideration from those law officers in the provinces of Canada, we incorporated all their best suggestions into the law which now appears upon the statute book. This law now reflects the judgment of the people who day in and day out are dealing with this matter. With all deference to the Senate committee or the House of Commons committee, if there is any group of people in Canada who should know what should go into a law of this kind, then surely it must be the people who have the experience and responsibility of enforcing it.

These provincial law officers made suggestions from which we drafted this section. It was very clear, when we got the bill into the Senate, and representatives of the industry came down to give testimony concerning it, that they took strong umbrage at this treatment which they said they had received. "Why", they said, "the bill that the hon. member who introduced it in the first place presented suited us very well. We were quite agreeable to that. But now that the government have come along, after the bill had been introduced, and changed it in this way, it is a terrible thing for us. It will put us right out of business"—as I believe it might tend to do, if it were enforced.

Mr. Low: Perhaps they should be out of business.

Mr. Garson: Out of this business?

Mr. Low: Yes.

Mr. Garson: No one is arguing on that score; perhaps it would be better.

Now, in this section they did not define "obscene" because it was the judgment of these practical and experienced criminal lawyers that the judicial interpretation of the word "obscene", which was the one stated by my hon. friend, was just as good as any that parliament would be likely to devise, and was all the more certain and effective because that was already the law as established by judicial decision. What is the matter with this definition?

Mr. Fulton: Does the minister not recall that, although the section dealt with other things, it dealt with crime comics as new matter, and a definition of crime comics was written into the statute?

Mr. Garson: A definition was written into the statute?

Mr. Fulton: By the bill in 1949.

Mr. Garson: Certainly.

Mr. Fulton: Why not a definition of obscene literature?

Mr. Garson: For the simple reason—

Mr. Fulton: If one has worked, why would not the other?

Mr. Garson: For the very reason that my hon. friend from Kamloops developed at some length in his own remarks today. My hon. friend said that the reason we have to redefine obscenity is that the judges back at the time of Chief Justice Cockburn did not properly know what obscenity was, that they were innocents in those days.

Mr. Fleming: He did not say that.

Mr. Garson: That was the implication.

Mr. Fulton: What I said was that they did not have to deal with the type of literature with which we have to deal today.

Mr. Garson: I would point out to my hon. friend that the reason there was not any reference to crime comics in the judicial literature, in the law books and in the statutes at the time Chief Justice Cockburn made that decision was that they did not then have this new invention of crime comics. If we were going to deal with and prohibit crime comics we had to define them in the legislation. But when one examines this definition of obscenity by Chief Justice Cockburn its great value becomes apparent. It reads:

> The test of obscenity is this, whether the tendency of the matter charged as obscenity is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences, and into whose hands a publication of this sort may fall.

My hon. friend was much concerned as to whether medical works were obscene. To begin with, a medical work may cost $5 or $6 and hence it may not likely fall into the hands of the average adolescent or other person adversely affected by it. Even if it did, any medical work I have seen, even though it may have dealt with sex, did not handle the subject in a very amorous or erotic manner, and I do not think it would tend to deprave or corrupt.

After this law went on the statute books, a great number of complaints came to my department from those who felt strongly about the matter and who argued along the same lines my hon. friend was arguing today, that the law was defective. There would be in this or that municipality perhaps a situation where the local authorities did not want to deal with the matter or get caught between amiable booksellers, on the one hand, and those who wanted to stop this traffic in immoral literature, on the other. They did not want to become tangled in a controversy, as to the freedom of the press, between the extremists who wanted great freedom of thought, on the one hand, and those who were prepared to clamp down most severely, on the other hand. It was a very hot issue and not one which the law enforcement officers were desirous of tackling.

The obvious excuse would be, "we cannot prosecute because the law is not enforceable." I got a number of letters from various municipalities, and even some resolutions which were passed by councils after great deliberation, to the effect that the law was not enforceable and asking us to change it in order to make it enforceable. Remember this was after parliament had received my hon. friend's bill, had held it in committee for several weeks so that we might confer with the people whose advice might be the best available, and we did accept their advice in order to produce an enforceable law. Yet the whole issue is said to be still obscure to some. I should like to read as a sample a letter which I wrote to one of these municipal councils. This reads in part:

> It will be recalled that in 1949 parliament revised and re-enacted the provisions of the Criminal Code dealing with this subject. Before the revision was undertaken, we consulted the attorneys general of all the provinces of Canada, who in turn consulted their law enforcement officers in order that the revised provisions might include everything to make the new enactment more enforceable. For this reason it is felt that the new section has been made as enforceable as it can be.
> It will be recognized that the jurisdiction of the federal parliament extends only to the making of criminal law. We do not have anything to do with its enforcement which is entirely in the hands of the provincial legislatures of the provincial governments and the municipalities, which derive their power from the provincial legislatures. The problem is basically one of enforcement and thus far we have received no representations which would lead us to believe that the present law is unenforceable. Your council will appreciate, however, that any experiences with the application of the relevant sections of the Criminal Code to this problem in your city would be of assistance in considering this matter now.

Here is the $64 question.

> It would be of interest to know how many times in your city the crown prosecutor or the police force have laid charges under section 207 of the Criminal Code. If such charges have been laid and it was impossible to secure a conviction, it would be of interest to have the ruling of the magistrate or judge in order to consider in what respect, if any, the law might be considered to be inadequate.

How can any person, such as my hon. friend, argue that a law which has been arrived at after the greatest precautions is inadequate if no responsible law enforcement officer will take it upon himself to invoke it? I might say that I have not received a single reply from a municipality to that type of letter indicating that having attempted to invoke this law they found it unenforceable

That being the case, let us explore for a moment some of the points which my hon. friend has raised. Indeed let us examine the section itself. I should like hon. members who are interested in this matter to say in what way they think this section can be tightened up. Section 207 reads:

> Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse,—

My hon. friend says that the imprisonment is not adequate, but two years is quite a bit for selling a book.

> (a) makes, manufactures, or sells, or exposes for sale or to public view, or distributes or circulates, or causes to be distributed or circulated, or has in his possession for sale, distribution or circulation, or assists in such making, manufacture, sale, exposure, having in possession, distribution or circulation, any obscene book or other printed, typewritten or otherwise written matter,—

How does my hon. friend want to tighten that up? Can he suggest some way in which we can tighten it? I would be glad to have his suggestions, just as I was glad to have his advice when we were dealing with the bill which he himself introduced.

Mr. Fleming: What objection would the minister have to seeking the collective wisdom of and study by a joint committee of both houses?

Mr. Garson: This is the objection. When this parliament has received a bill, has considered it, has held it in committee for some weeks in order to get the best advice available, has then considered that advice and has brought forth an amendment which no person has argued with any convincing effect is unenforceable, surely the time has been reached in dealing with this evil to concentrate the forces of public opinion upon the enforcement of it, and not be wavering irresolutely in more committee discussion. Just enforce the law.

Mr. Fulton: That is an odd thing for a minister of this government to say.

Mr. Fleming: Does the minister remember that he advocated the appointment of a committee a year ago last fall when members of this house were advocating some action? What is he talking about dilly-dallying for? Surely if it is said that he wants suggestions he is not above receiving them from a parliamentary committee now.

Mr. Garson: I am not decrying for a moment the great virtues of a parliamentary committee in respect of a matter which requires consideration before a law is enacted. What I say is that when this parliament has already given it the utmost consideration, when it has enacted a law which is quite enforceable, and which no one can say is unenforceable, you are just helping out the very evil you are trying to stamp out if you do not then concentrate upon its enforcement. That is what I say.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Garson: Surely.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister says, "If you do not concentrate on its enforcement." Having regard to what I imagine we all agree is the lamentable situation at the moment, does the minister not think that perhaps one of the advantages of a committee of this kind might be to arouse the public conscience which so obviously needs it?

Mr. Garson: Well, I suppose it might have some effect in that regard, but that is not in accordance with the theory developed by my hon. friend who moved the resolution today, which is—

Mr. Fulton: Certainly it is.

Mr. Garson: Just let me finish the sentence before you interrupt.

Mr. Fulton: Certainly it is.

Mr. Garson: —that he wants to set up a committee—

Mr. Fulton: I say that it is.

Mr. Garson: I will be very glad to sit down, as I always do, and let my hon. friend speak if he will just let me finish the sentence.

Mr. Fulton: You are saying that I said something I did not say.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend said, if I understood him correctly—and he can contradict me if he wishes—that he wanted to set up this committee because he thought the use of the word "obscene" was not satisfactory. He wanted parliament to provide, for the purposes of this section, a better definition of "obscene".

Mr. Fulton: May I correct the minister? I think it is obvious that he has misunderstood my remarks. I said I was not going to be dogmatic. I wanted a committee to review the whole matter in the light of what has been described as an unsatisfactory situation and, while not being dogmatic, I said that I was going to make some suggestions. My suggestion would be to proceed along the lines of improving and perfecting the legislation; but it was not the tenor of my remarks that the committee should be set up for the sole purpose of redefining obscenity. If I said anything to give the minister that impression, it certainly was not intentional. In any event the resolution speaks for itself.

Mr. Garson: Well, but it does not speak for my hon. friend's speech.

Mr. Fulton: Oh, the minister cannot find that in my speech. The resolution says:

—a committee . . . for the purpose of . . . recommending legislation or other measures under which the growing volume of filthy literature . . . can be effectively dealt with—

Mr. Garson: In any event what my hon. friend has said is on Hansard, so it will speak for itself. I should like to refer to section 207 (1) (b). I had better read the beginning of the section so it will make sense. It reads as follows:

Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who . . .

(b) makes, prints, publishes, distributes, sells or has in possession for any such purpose, any crime comic.

That was my hon. friend's bill or the substance of it.

Subsection 2 reads as follows:

Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years imprisonment who knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse,

(a) sells, exposes to public view or has in possession for any such purpose any obscene written matter, picture, model, or other thing whatsoever;

(b) publicly exhibits any disgusting object or any indecent show; or

(c) offers to sell, advertises, publishes an advertisement of, or has for sale or disposal any means, instructions, medicine, drug or article intended or represented as a means of preventing conception or causing abortion or miscarriage or advertises or publishes an advertisement of any means, instructions, medicine, drug or article for restoring sexual virility or curing venereal diseases or diseases of the generative organs.

Subsection 3 reads as follows:

"Crime comic" means in this section any magazine, periodical or book which exclusively or substantially comprises matter depicting pictorially the commission of crimes, real or fictitious.

(4) No one shall be convicted of any offence in this section mentioned if he proves that the public good was served by the acts alleged to have been done, and that there was no excess in the acts alleged beyond what the public good required.

(5) It shall be a question for the judge whether such acts are such as might be for the public good, and whether there is evidence of excess beyond what the public good required; but it shall be a question for the jury whether there is or is not such excess.

(6) The motives of the accused shall in all cases be irrelevant.

(7) It shall be no defence to a charge under subsection 1 that the accused was ignorant of the nature or presence of the matter, picture, model, crime comic or other thing.

My hon. friend will recall that when this new section was brought down after we had conferred with the attorneys general of the provinces his colleague, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), criticized this legislation as being too tight and too tough, and said that if we left it in that form juries might acquit in protest against it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask a question? Is there any change under the revised Criminal Code? I have been reading the section and it is substantially the same, but it does not speak about everyone being liable on indictment. Is there any change with regard to the manner in which a case would be heard.

Mr. Garson: I have not examined the new provisions with that in view, but I think not. My offhand view would be that there is no change at all, because the purpose of the consolidation of the code was in general to consolidate it but not to change any of its principles. There was no occasion for changing this section 207. Suppose we set up this committee and it considers the matter. Can my hon. friend suggest any other better consideration by the committee, if they have any doubts whether this word is adequate, than that they should go back to the crown prosecutors of the various provinces and get another set of opinions from them? They are the ones who have had practical experience. If they do not know what an enforceable law is, who else is more likely to know? I suggest that when we have this law, when so far the enforcement authorities have not seen fit to invoke it to the extent that they should, the thing we should do now is to bring the pressure of public opinion to bear in favour of its being enforced. Then if it appears that there is any doubt as to the efficacy of this law, that will be the time it will be worth while for us to have the matter considered by a parliamentary committee.

At the present time, as I think perhaps my hon. friend is aware, there has been a prosecution in the courts in Ottawa and there has been a conviction.

Mr. Fulton: It is being appealed.

Mr. Garson: Oh, yes, quite. I should like to read from the judgment given by the trial court in that case. I have to be careful in doing so because the matter is still sub judice. However, I am not in any way questioning the judgment. As it happens, I entirely agree with it; I simply want to refer to it to see whether there is this great difficulty to which my hon. friend refers, as to the judge deciding on the facts of the case before him whether the material in question is obscene. Here is what Judge McDougall says—

Mr. Fulton: I admit this judge found no difficulty in this case.

Mr. Garson: Not the slightest.

Mr. Fulton: But there are many the other way.

Mr. Garson: First of all, did he have any difficulty in reaching an opinion, having regard to the fact that the section only mentions the one word "obscene" or "obscenity", as to what meaning should be given to that word? He says:

> The rule as to the interpretation of the word "obscenity" in the statute has been well stated as: 'The test of obscenity is this, whether the tendency of the matter charged as obscenity is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences and into whose hands a publication of this sort may fall.'

In other words, the interpretation given by Chief Justice Cockburn is still quite good law and has been recognized as definite and clear; and in my view we are lily-gilding if we attempt to disturb it in any way.

He says further down:

> I have read the volume carefully.

This was "Tragic Ground" by Erskine Caldwell.

> I can see little, if any, public good that can be accomplished by the distribution of this book to the public at large. In any event the language of the book and the description of the characters and of their actions is greatly in excess of anything required for that purpose.

Here we come to the complicated question my hon. friend is talking about—the matter of deciding whether the book in fact is obscene or not—a matter said to be of great complexity, of great difficulty. However, the learned judge disposes of it in—I have not counted the exact number—but about twenty-five words. He says:

> In my opinion the tendency of the book would be to deprave and corrupt many of those into whose hands it would fall.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, having regard to the fact that this is probably on its way to becoming a leading case—I am told quite unofficially that the intention is to take it to the Supreme Court of Canada—that before we start dealing further with section 207 of the code we should find out whether this section, which was drafted with great care after consultation with all the attorneys general of the provinces, whose responsibility it will be to enforce it, and which has been affirmed in this judgment, is or is not good law, and enforceable. If it does not hold, that will be the time for us to give further consideration to the matter.

Mr. Fleming: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Garson: May I finish this sentence? I do suggest, and I think my hon. friend from Eglinton who is rising to his feet will probably agree, that it will be a matter of very considerable difficulty for a parliamentary committee, interested in what my hon. friend indicated is certainly one of the reasons for setting it up, to themselves arrive at a proper definition. I do not think the parliamentary committee will be able to discuss properly and with sufficient freedom a case of this sort which is sub judice. Why get into that difficulty unnecessarily, especially when we do not need to do so, in order to enforce this law just as it is throughout the length and breadth of Canada in any municipalities where the law enforcement officers may wish to do so?

For that reason I think we would be well advised not to consider changing this law, that has been so carefully drafted, until this case has gone to the Supreme Court of Canada and we know from it that the law is not enforceable.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask the minister how long he expects that to take?

Mr. Garson: I do not know that I can help my hon. friend too much in that regard. A great deal depends upon the perseverance and pressure which the appellant puts upon his appeal. If he desires to get it before the supreme court quickly it will be one period of time. If on the other hand he wants to drag it out a bit, it is possible within limits to do that. It would have to go from the court that decided it to the appeal court of Ontario, and then appeal would be taken from that court to the supreme court.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): A couple of years.

Mr. Garson: I do not think it would take a couple of years. It might take a year at the outside. In the meanwhile the law is good; and, in the meanwhile, as long as it is sub judice, neither parliament nor the Senate nor the committees thereof can discuss it. So what purpose would there be in sending it to a committee? The case we are discussing is a main case in issue in Canada today in connection with this matter, as I am sure my hon. friend from Kamloops will agree.

One point my hon. friend raised was, I thought, a very important one, and I am glad it led him to the view that censorship should not be attempted. Censorship I think, and I believe he will agree with this, can only be conducted in relation to specific documents or paper writings which are before the board of censors or before a judge in court as a censor. That is one of the difficulties and one of the reasons, I think, why the attorneys general did not want to attempt to define "obscene" or "obscenity" in the statute itself. It is extremely difficult, if not impossible, for any legislative body by language put into a statute in relation to literature generally, to provide a satisfactory and workable prohibition of written or other material which the legislature has not before it. If one attempts to classify these things the way my hon. friend suggests, in order to say this is permissible and that is not permissible and so on, surely that is a very difficult thing to do in the abstract without any concrete example before one. It is hard, as I think my hon. friend will admit—and that is part of his case—for the judge to decide whether or not a document or magazine in front of him is obscene. How infinitely more difficult it would be for the legislature in relation to unseen material to define adequately what was prohibited and what was not prohibited.

That is one of the reasons why I think this parliament very wisely accepted the recommendations of these law officers in just relying on the word "obscene" which, at the time it was suggested, had already been interpreted by Chief Justice Cockburn in the judgment to which reference has been made. For example, a certain subject dealt with by Shakespeare or Goethe or in a scientific thesis may be unquestionably not obscene. The same subject dealt with in this trash which is sold at the book stores at 25 cents a book may be unquestionably obscene. It is the same subject matter in both cases, and whether it is obscene is just a question of difference in treatment. The obscenity or otherwise in each case is a question of fact which has to be decided either by a board of censors or by the judge in a prosecution on the facts before them.

My submission is that this question is not to be decided fairly on any abstractions or general definitions in a statute. In the light of that fact, my contention, and my reason for suggesting that this motion should be voted down, is that there is nothing vague in section 207 (2) when it provides that:

> Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse (a) sells, exposes to public view or has in possession for any such purpose any obscene written matter, picture, model or other thing whatsoever;

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I think we should be grateful to the hon. member who has raised this question this afternoon. I believe he should be congratulated on the care and work which he has devoted to it over the years.

I am a great respecter of the power of an informed public opinion. You will notice that I include the word "informed". I think the hon. gentleman, by interposing this matter into the business of this house, has taken advantage of one of the methods by which public opinion can be so informed. We are creatures of habit, and we get into ways of doing things and into ways of reading things. I think it is a good thing that once in a while someone should stop and say: Let us consider the way in which we are going.

Personally I am inclined to look upon this resolution with some favour. It is at least innocuous in that it does not create any prohibition, and the best or worst that its implementation could mean would be the setting up of such a committee as the sponsor proposes. I cannot enter into the legal niceties indulged in by my learned friends, but I have followed the argument with some interest. I am more interested in the problem from other directions.

I was interested in the minister's statement that an informed and active public opinion would be the most compelling reason for the enforcement of the legislation which now exists. I believe his statement went something like this: Is it not true that those who have as their task the enforcement of such legislation are those best qualified to deal with this matter of deciding which of these things are obscene? I am somewhat worried about that statement. I wonder if the minister would apply it to the question of those who censor the literature entering Canada. Would he suggest that in such censorship as we have, if I may call it that, the customs officers along the United States boundary are the ones best qualified to judge what books shall or shall not be admitted to this country? I am aware that the customs officials, when in doubt, have an advisory board to which they can submit these books for reading and consideration. I know that censorship board is there. I am not going to branch into that today, because I have dealt with it once or twice before.

However, I am of course keenly conscious of the quantity of salacious literature that inundates our country, and our homes, today. I am perhaps almost as concerned about what I might call the silly and pointless reading as I am about the salacious variety. You will find some of this in the drugstores, although it has been a mystery to me why drugstores sell all these things as well as drugs. This literature is found in stationery shops, and the like, as well.

I am even more concerned, I think, about the lack of good reading which is displayed in these same places. I could not help but contrast conditions in Britain in this regard during a visit there a year or so ago. I am speaking of the availability of good books at prices which young people, or even most people, are able to afford or are prepared to spend for that sort of thing. If we are going to get people to read, we have to have reading matter available for them.

The unfortunate part of it is that this salacious reading matter is available in large quantities. It is practically ubiquitous across the length and breadth of this land. The only cheap reading material—no, that is not fair—most of the reading material that is available to us at reasonable prices is material of a poor and even harmful character. I am glad the hon. member put these words in his resolution:

—without at the same time improperly restricting the freedom of the press or of genuine literary or artistic expression.

As I believe the members of this house must have noted, during my period here I have been especially anxious about the preservation of intellectual freedom in the pursuit of truth. I would reject out of hand any form of censorship that would interfere with that freedom. Let that be basic and fundamental to the understanding of my feelings in regard to the question.

There is a matter, of course, of prohibition. Unfortunately, it does not seem to be successful; but if it were I doubt that I would be in favour of it whether it be the prohibition of liquor or of reading material. I voted for the prohibition of liquor once, but I do not know what I would do the next time. I was not very successful in my effort to stamp out that particular evil. As a parent and as a former teacher I have watched with some interest the effects of prohibition. If you want a little lad to smuggle a book off the shelf and read it in bed, the best way is to tell him not to do it. Perhaps hon. members will tell me that their children have been better behaved than mine, not that I consider we have made such a bad job of it. I have to say that publicly in case I get into trouble at home. I would suggest that it is a good thing to have lots of reading material available of the type you would like to have the little fellow take up and read in bed. In other words I am suggesting a positive rather than a negative approach to this whole matter.

Although the minister did not state it in these terms, I believe he is partly right in his argument when he says we have to pin our faith on education and other means of promoting public taste.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): There is more education now than ever.

Mr. Knight: I do not want to be diverted. Reading habits are just that; in other words, they are habits; and as I understand it and as I have been told, habits are formed by the repetition of acts. I do not like to use the term "good", but if a young boy has an opportunity of reading material that is good or of getting a selection of reading material that has literary value, if you like, then I do not think we need to worry about his ultimate rejection of the filthy and the foolish. Educators, newspaper editors, publishers and such people, whom we expect to be well informed and good citizens of our country, I feel have some responsibility. I believe they should acknowledge and assume that responsibility. Some of them, of course, disagree.

I recall talking to quite a prominent editor of a well-known newspaper about this very subject. I was suggesting to him that the editors of newspapers have certain responsibilities. I think we were talking about the cultivation of public taste, and I was surprised at his answer. I have been told that newspapermen have a reputation for being "hard-boiled". If I may say so, he certainly did not lessen that opinion. I asked him, "Do you think it is the business of an editor to give to the public just what the public wants, or do you think he has any responsibility in the matter of promoting and refining the public taste?". I have never forgotten the answer. He said: Sir, I am not running a Sunday school, and the shareholders expect dividends". Well, I suggest that a growing public indecency and a depraved public taste are pretty heavy penalties to pay for the attainment of those particular dividends.

I shall simply conclude by saying that if somehow or other we could take the profit out of filth, it would tend to disappear.

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to say a few words on this subject, as I did on the presentation of the bill on crime comics, introduced by the same hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). Of course, if anyone thinks a law can do away with or solve this problem he is greatly mistaken, because a law could never be enforced to such an extent as to stop any individual from obtaining one or two of these filthy books. A law of the kind advocated by the hon. member for Kamloops could help, and a committee of both houses could help, but it would not be the solution of the problem, I am sure.

There is one thing everyone knows, namely that obscene literature is something like the microbes in the physical organism. They are not very large; they are small, and they are introduced very surreptitiously into either the intellectual or moral organism, but the wounds that these kinds of microbes make in that organism are much more dangerous and much harder to heal than any physical wound, because the wound is moral and intellectual instead of being physical. The field of action of those microbes is vast because they act on the wit, on the mind, on the heart and on the soul.

Unhappily our world has been going steadily toward materialism. This world of ours is much more interested in trying to heal the physical or economic wounds than it is interested in trying to heal the moral or intellectual wounds.

When we discussed the other bill on crime comics I received a number of letters and requests from my county asking me to support this kind of bill, and asking me to do my utmost to oppose any spreading of those crime comics. I am sure that all these associations in my county would use the same words, and stronger words perhaps, to tell me that I should come back and support any move toward stopping the spreading of this obscene and pornographic literature. That is what I am doing this afternoon. I am sure that the farmers' associations of Deschambault, Cap Sante, Les Ecureuils, St. Marc des Carrieres and Ville Montmorency would be ready to support me in my contention this afternoon as they did when I spoke on the crime comics bill.

It has been said this afternoon that a committee of this kind sat in the Senate last year. I doubted that I could quote any words used in that committee, but after consultation I was told that I could quote from the minutes of evidence given there, which I shall now do. I notice that at the first meeting of this special committee on the sale and distribution of salacious and indecent literature testimony was given by Father Gay. He was the representative of a religious organization in the diocese of Ottawa. I should like to be permitted to quote a few words of his testimony given under his first heading "Moral standards" and his second "The intellectual standards". Father Gay had this to say:

> The law (section 207 of the Criminal Code) also aims at magazines usually featuring provocative nudes and carrying erotic articles.
> But it does not aim at magazines, reviews or books, which, incidentally, include the odd voluptuous description or lewd picture, or which are known as "vulgar".
> Nor, as a rule, do art publications come under the ban. But they should display authentic art and there should be no doubt that it was not the intention of perverting which prompted the publisher's choice. Moreover, they are not meant for children.
> If that is obscenity, is it exaggerated to state that one-third of all magazines sold in Canada are obscene?
> Evidently, it is an easy task to publish and to sell magazines appealing to man's lower instincts. It is a much more difficult one to produce a wholesome and interesting magazine.

He is quite right in saying that. I continue:

> Retailers who try to go against the current are carried away by what one might call the magazine trust; they are not free to make their own choice and their conscience protests.

Obscene Literature

> Then there is the effrontery of those who republish, in Canada, pocket books whose entry into this country is forbidden by the Department of National Revenue. That is nothing but cynicism.
> The hon. senators' attention should also be drawn to those "novelties" imported from Japan or elsewhere; these are often indecent.

Under his second heading dealing with intellectual standards he had this to say:

> We must not be content with supervision and control; that is a purely negative approach. On the contrary we must make it a point to give publishers and their collaborators an exact idea of the lines along which they must work to renovate and make more wholesome published material of all kinds.

To achieve this end Father Gay made the following suggestions:

> (1) Illustrations and text should respect science and natural history, and not be altogether contrary to verisimilitude. This desirable result can be achieved through intelligent effort much more than by force, by tending to dignified and unselfish ends, far removed from vulgarity and coarseness, from scenes of horror and torture, in the description of a peaceful and honest life.
> (3) Human life should be respected. The guilty parties should be punished by due process of law, and not by the whim and fancy of the hero. Tracking down the villain should not be a sport but an ideal.
> (4) Dishonest persons should evoke pity or contempt, never sympathy.
> (5) The text should be well written so as to bring the child to turn, little by little, from comics to books.
> (6) The general tone of magazines should be optimistic and pleasant.

These are the suggestions he makes with respect to moral standards as well as intellectual standards. In quoting Father Gay I am quoting a man who has been giving more than second thought to the whole problem of morality, which is the real problem in this particular situation with the spreading of morally obscene and pornographic literature. Then there is the evidence of Mrs. Gould, a lady who appeared before the Senate committee. I find at pages 43 and 44 she was questioned by Senator David, and that the discussion ensued in this way:

> Hon. Mr. David: Well, what have been the reports of the teachers in the schools as far as the influence of these books, radio programs and the rest, is concerned?
> Mrs. Gould: I would say, from my own personal viewpoint, I feel that since I was a teen-ager and a young person growing up, we have degenerated, and to a great extent. I really believe that.
> Hon. Mr. David: Do you put the fault on the insanity of the century in which we live, or the insanity of the home itself?
> Mrs. Gould: You are asking me personally now?
> Hon. Mr. David: I am asking you personally.
> Mrs. Gould: That is, just my personal opinion?
> Hon. Mr. David: Yes.
> Mrs. Gould: Well, I will put it down to the decay, or the insanity of this age we are living in; secondly—and I hope I won't be sued for this—to the laxity of the government to find out and make certain that the customs department is conducted in such a manner that these things cannot be brought in from other countries. I also would put it down to laxity on the part of our parents—a lot of the parents—certainly not the teachers, but a lot of the parents, and I would not blame them too much, because of the strain of two world wars coming so close together, and the need of mothers, in order to make ends meet, going out to supplement the family funds to keep body and soul together. Of necessity these mothers, with the fathers overseas, had to leave the children to secondary care, to the care of others who certainly would not have such personal interest. I think every one of us is to blame to some extent for what has been allowed to happen, and I believe that every one of us some day will be held responsible if anything happens to our youth.

From that testimony I conclude that Mrs. Gould was telling the Senate committee that the problem is one for the individual; that it is not only a problem for the government, not only a problem for the different associations gathering force to fight the spread of obscene literature, but that chiefly it is the problem of the individual to look into the matter, to face it, and to try to solve it to the satisfaction of his own conscience.

Then I have here the testimony of Miss Charlotte Whitton, as it is reported at pages 57 and 58 of the proceedings. Appearing before the committee Miss Whitton said this, speaking of the spread of this kind of literature in some provinces of Canada:

I may say that one part of the more detailed knowledge which led to my more determined interest in the matter was gathered in the trial through which I passed in the province of Alberta in 1947 and 1948. The charge of conspiracy to libel, which was levelled against the editor of "New Liberty" and the publisher, and against myself as providing the basis of the story in question, brought into evidence there material which I think would be of value to this committee in regard to the tight control of the distribution of periodical literature.

She is speaking here about the control of that kind of literature.

I suggest that you might apply to—I imagine it would be—the registrar of the supreme court of Alberta for that evidence, because it showed how the avenues of distribution were controlled and in fact dictated right down into the smallest villages in which books or periodicals were sold at all. It also showed that right from the lakehead roughly to the Pacific coast there were only about—if I recall correctly—either five or six outlets. The area was zoned. For instance, if a dealer in Wetaskiwin, Alberta, were carrying so many of one of our own monthly magazines, so many of our fortnightlies, so many of our weeklies, and were carrying different United States periodicals, weeklies, all of a reputable character, then he must handle a certain proportion of what we would call undesirable literature and a very large proportion of pulp magazines.

Miss Whitton says, in effect, that the government has to be most careful. Listening to the minister a few moments ago I noted that he had written to all the attorneys general of the different provinces of Canada. On that account, the attorneys general in Canada—and this is my personal view—should give more than a second thought to the matter, and should do their utmost to help in the observation of the provisions of the Criminal Code by dealing with the distribution of this literature. They should attempt to stop the underhanded process of distribution which places this filthy literature in the hands of our people, provided that the interests of the dealers are protected in their sale of reputable publications. The dealer should have the right to suspend the sale of certain books from his store.

That is one part of the problem to which Miss Whitton made special reference. Then I have here the publication of the Saskatchewan library advisory council. This document is dated November 25, 1946, and in it is set out a division of the kinds of undesirable periodical literature. I place this on Hansard, not through any desire to stand in the House of Commons and speak, but because I wish to place before hon. members certain facts in connection with this problem.

This document describes the different types of undesirable periodical literature as follows:

(1) Salacious and pornographic literature.

(2) Low-grade fiction magazines specializing in love, crime and western stories. (Sometimes called "pulp magazines".)

(3) Confession magazines.

(4) Movie magazines.

(5) Comic strip books.

In the same brief I find an opinion set out in the Chicago Daily News in 1940, as quoted in the Journal of Educational Psychology for December 1944, at pages 193 and 194. It states:

Badly drawn, badly written, and badly printed, a strain on young eyes and young nervous systems—the effect of these paper-pulp nightmares is that of a violent stimulant. Their crude blacks and reds spoil the child's natural sense of colour; their hypodermic injections—

And he is quite right in saying that.

—of sex and murder make the child impatient with better though quieter stories . . . The shame lies largely with the parents who don't know and don't care what their children are reading. It is with the unimaginative teachers who force stupid, dull twaddle down eager young throats and, of course, it lies with the completely immoral publishers of the "comics"—guilty of a cultural slaughter of the innocents.

If there are quotations which deal with the wax-like minds of our children, there are others which I cannot support because they express the kind of philosophy—I shall not say I hate it, because one must not hate anything—but the kind of philosophy I am always ready to fight against. Dr. Lauretta Bender of the psychiatric division of Bellevue hospital and the New York University medical school has this to say:

> Normal well-adjusted children with active minds, given insufficient outlets or in whom natural drives for adventure are curbed, will demand satisfaction in the form of some excitement.

That is the opinion of Freud, a man who has had great influence in modern times.

> Their desire for blood and thunder is a desire to solve the problems of the threats of blood and thunder against themselves or those they love, as well as the problem of their own impulses to retaliate and punish in like form.

I do not agree with that way of looking at the minds of our children. I admit that this problem is most difficult to solve, and it will demand the co-operation of all men of good will. But I believe I am right in saying that the problem is one of the re-education of the individual. Of course the law can help, different organizations dealing with that kind of danger can help, but I repeat that it is a matter of the re-education of the individual. That is what we need first and above everything else. The law will help, the various associations of educators, parents and social workers will help a great deal, but they must focus their attention not only on the different ways of checking the printing and distribution of obscene literature, but on the betterment of the individual both on the intellectual and moral levels.

Most of the time the failure is not to be found in the law but in the lawbreaker. Hence the necessity of enacting a law against this kind of literature that will be airtight. The law against immoral literature or motion pictures can never be too severe because the mind of the individual is more precious than the profits of the publishers or producers, or the taxes or duties these flourishing businesses may bring into the public treasury.

The country should have very conscientious censors. I am not ready to say that we should not have censors, that we should rely entirely on the Criminal Code to prevent the ill effects of this kind of literature. The law can help, but there must be something done outside of the law because, as I repeat, there will always be lawbreakers. So we should have conscientious censors whose philosophy of life is something better than that of giving priority to sex influences or denying the rational difference between right and wrong, between good and evil.

When discussing another matter in this house I was asked what it was that told me what was good and what was evil. Something tells me what is good and what is evil; I do not need any law to tell me that. But everything possible must be done for the betterment of the individual on the moral and intellectual levels of our Canadian society. That is why I say that if we have some body or organization controlling the spread of this type of literature it should be, as we say in French, trier sur le volet.

Our world of today has lost or at least forgotten the necessity of having a moral standard. Material values have priority over intellectual and moral values. As the world is composed of individuals, if we are to correct these conditions we must start with the individual. There is no doubt that the producers of filthy literature envisage the profits they expect to make as being above everything else. They are directed by a certain amount of psychology, and give to their readers what they want. They are oblivious to the moral dangers their books are bound to create and develop to the point of disaster. All they want is financial success. They cynically display immorality in their books. If I were speaking on the subject of modern philosophy I would gladly express the same ideas and give the same warning. It is astonishing to realize to what extent obscene literature cohabits with the philosophical theories I mentioned previously.

When these people are cornered by sound reason they reply that it is progress, that our world is no longer bound by medieval taboos, and they continue in their foolish way. Patriotism is likely to suffer as much as moral values if we do not wake up to the danger ahead. Will loose morality, which believes that anything is right provided one is not caught, make for a strong, disciplined and stable nation? Will pornographic literature develop devotion and sacrifice for the welfare of our compatriots and the grandeur of our nation? It cannot, because this kind of intellectual food debases human beings. Our people must look always higher and higher if they are to stick to their ideals.

The problem is a hard one to solve, but it can be solved if all those of good will are ready to go to work immediately. In reading a book by Monsignor Fulton Sheen I found something in the beautiful pages he has written that I should like to place on the record. He understands the problem of the modern world. He sees the problem exactly where it is, in the individual. Here is what he says:

> The repeated use of the word "crisis" in reference to morals is interesting, for it reveals a tendency on the part of many modern writers to blame the abstract when the concrete is really at fault. They speak, for example, of the problems of crime, rather than of the criminal; of the problems of poverty, rather than of the poor, and of the crisis in morals, when really the crisis is amongst men who are not living morally. The crisis is not in ethics but in the unethical. The failure is not in the law, but in the lawbreakers. The truth of this observation is borne out by the failure of such writers to distinguish between the problems of making men conform to standards and that of making standards conform to men. Instead of urging men to pass the test, they alter the test. Instead of inspiring them to hold to their ideals, they change their ideals. In accordance with this logic, they urge that morals be changed to suit those who cannot live morally, and that ethics be changed to please those who cannot live ethically. All this takes place in accordance with the democratic principle of certain philosophers who are prepared to construct any kind of philosophy that man desires.

I repeat that some kinds of philosophy and pornographic literature cohabit together very easily. Monsignor Sheen continues:

If men want ghosts, the democratic philosophers, who know the will of the populace, will write a philosophy justifying ghosts; if the man in the street wants to follow the line of least moral resistance, philosophers will develop for him the justifying philosophy of "self-expression"; if the man of affairs has no time for the thoughts of eternity then philosophers develop for him the philosophy of space-time. There are ultimately only two possible adjustments in life.

One evidently is good and the other bad. Monsignor Sheen continues:

One is to suit our lives to principles; the other is to suit principles to our lives. If we do not live as we think, we soon begin to think as we live.

May I add that if the population reads obscene or pornographic literature it soon thinks that way. The problem is well stated by Monsignor Sheen. The individual is to be changed and made better. The situation calls for more than law, more than the gathering of these organizations to which I referred before. It calls for a regular and real crusade of men and women of good will. If we win the victory the effects will be far-reaching, and peace in the mind of the individual will inevitably bring peace in society and in the world.

The effect of the discussion this afternoon and the effect of the barring of this literature to the Canadian public will be far-reaching, because it will bring peace in the individual, in society and in the world. I think we should do everything possible to help those who want to set to work to stop the spreading of the moral and intellectual microbes which develop and create wounds a lot deeper than the physical wounds that medical men are trying so ardently to cure.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few comments on the resolution, I think perhaps I am motivated chiefly by two reasons. First of all, I want to do anything I can to support the resolution of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), to whom I think the members of this house owe a great deal for having brought this matter up, just as a few years ago he brought up a somewhat kindred subject. Incidentally, I draw attention to the terms of his resolution which are not rigid or inflexible. I am sure that his whole attitude on the whole question is flexible.

Perhaps my second and biggest reason for wanting to say a word is an incident that happened last summer when I was making calls in my constituency. The mother of some teen-age children spoke to me about this question, and she practically extracted a promise from me that if the matter ever arose I would have something to say about it. Therefore I am going to have something to say today.

It is an advantage, I think, that by no stretch of the imagination can this be a partisan or party question; and while we get a certain amount of relaxation out of the cut and thrust of party questions it is also a satisfaction for the moment to be able to relax and feel that we are all concentrating on the matter single-mindedly.

Of course it is true, as the minister implied—I do not know whether he actually used these words—that there is not enough initiative throughout the rank and file of our citizens to set the law in motion. I was reading that great lawyer, Dicey, the other day, and he points out that the difficult thing is not so much to get measures on the statute books as to devise the method of enforcing them. I make one suggestion. We are apt to take these things rather lackadaisically, but I am quite sure that if I could fill this house with the parents of teen-age children we would not be lackadaisical about it. I am quite sure that if by some magic we could make the parents of teen-age children the censors of this kind of thing, an enormous amount of this sort of literature would disappear overnight.

The minister has said that the legislation is all right, and I must confess that I found myself rather persuaded by his suggestion that the definition itself, the key words of which are "a tendency to deprave and corrupt", was not a bad one. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that, however readily we accept the view of the minister that the legislation is all right, we only need to go to a railway newsstand to realize that the law might as well not be on the statute books, or virtually so. I know that in one way that is not the responsibility of this house. Our criminal law can be set in motion by the law officers of the provinces and by individual initiative. I know something about that, and I know therefore that in a way the minister has an alibi.

I want to say also that I am sure the minister is just as keen to remedy the situation as the rest of us are. However, the fact remains that the evil is there, and the hon. member for Kamloops indicates to me that the bulk of this kind of literature is growing. Since the debate began I got in touch with some library authorities, and my conversation was both depressing and in a sense reassuring. I found what were to me some rather astounding figures about the kind of literature that is read by little children. As shown in the review to which I was referred, 95 per cent of boys and 91 per cent of girls from six to eleven read twelve to thirteen comic books per month. I am not suggesting this is filthy literature, but I am suggesting it is trivial literature which cannot possibly do them any good, which must distract their minds, and of course it keeps good literature away from them. That is the other side of it.

In the ages from twelve to seventeen 87 per cent of the boys and 81 per cent of the girls read twelve to thirteen comic books per month. Apparently as we grow older we grow a little wiser and we do read less of such literature. At the same time it was reassuring to be told by the librarian that due to the work of home and school clubs and other such organizations the reading of better books is increasing. That is the experience of the Ottawa library, and that was reassuring.

I come back now to the resolution and to one practical point that has struck me this afternoon, and which I want to put to the minister. I am not very well informed about this matter and if the minister wishes to correct me at any point I shall be very glad. I gather from what I have learned this afternoon and from what the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) tells me that actually, though various references were made to censorship as if it were an unspeakable thing which we could not have—and I know it is full of difficulties—we have virtual censorship, or are supposed to have, of this kind of thing coming in from the United States. The minister does not correct me, so I go on.

If that is so, then it seems to me we have accepted the principle of censorship to a degree. The only question is whether we are going to have good or bad censorship. I am told that the censorship on this literature coming in from the United States—and I want to use moderate words—is, to put it mildly, ineffective. I am told that it is ineffective for two reasons. First, if you come to one customs office and they show some signs of not letting it in, you just take it along to another and it gets through there. I am told, and I have no reason to doubt it, that the administration is not very tight. I do not know whether it rivals the orgies of cigarette smuggling that we were told about, but there is a lot of smuggling in that sense of this kind of literature. I am also told that we have not taken the business of censorship seriously in that we have not sought to have people who might be considered by education and experience to be capable. We have not taken pains to get that kind of person in the censoring business.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I know how difficult censorship is. I read the statement of a United States judge to whom some allegedly obscene books had been submitted. He dismissed the charge and practically said—and I want to paraphrase or summarize it fairly —that in matters of obscenity it is a matter of rugged individualism; that you could not have a standard. I think that is not an unfair summary of what he said. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not accept that. We look back to the Victorian era, which we now hold up as a travesty of common sense. We look back to what we regard as a very silly procedure where they even swathed the legs of the piano. As I say we have been building a travesty of it; nevertheless, while we have moved a long way forward materially from that era, I wonder if we have moved a long way forward in others. I wonder if we have not created a vacuum which this utterly worthless literature fills while serious literature is so often wanting.

I come back to the resolution, Mr. Speaker, and my statement which I believe to be true. As I said, anyone who goes into a railway station and sees what is there is offended beyond words. I would leave it to any group of censors appointed in this house to go to one of those railway newsstands, and I venture to say that it would soon look like the shelves of the library, empty after the fire, by the time they were through, and there would not be much difference of opinion among them. Certainly that would be so if my friends, the parents of adolescent children, were allowed to go in there. Carrie Nation used to smash up saloons with her axe, but she would not be a patch on what they would do.

I have talked perhaps rather vehemently about this, but I feel strongly about it. I also feel strongly about the difficulties, as I do about the problem. I say again that I am sure there is not a man in this house more interested in the matter than the minister but I do feel that somehow those in responsible positions ought to be in a better position to say how a public opinion which will support the law is to be created.

I hope the minister, either today or on some other occasion, will say something about this question of censorship, because we have it. Apparently we have a worthless or almost worthless censorship; and I am asking why, if we have accepted the principle of censorship, we should not have good censorship. Why should we not take a lot of trouble about it? It is full of difficulties, I know. You have the intellectuals who come in and try to dispose of the matter by saying that we should have no censorship of any kind. Well, I will face the intellectuals. I will not necessarily answer them on their level but in—

Mr. Fraser: Army language.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We do not use that in parliament here, although we have all read about swearing like the army in Flanders, and no doubt the soldiers were very proficient in that line. However, I come back just to repeat that I do not believe anyone in this house would deny that there is a problem which cries out to be dealt with. It is not satisfactory to say that nothing can be done and that we must just wait for a year or two while lawyers argue the question in the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my viewpoint on this bill. I am heartily in support of any effort to improve the literature in this dominion. I feel that any support we can give this bill should be given, although I realize the difficulty of enforcing an act requiring booksellers to refuse to stock obscene literature. At the same time I think we could start by cleaning our own house.

The most obscene literature that comes to my desk comes from the other place in the form of divorce evidence. I think if we are sincere in this we should be quite honest about it and cut that out. Nothing sold in any bookstore in this or any other town equals that evidence under the term of obscene literature. If we are sincere in this let us enforce the act and provide good books for the youngsters who are now being satisfied with this type of trash.

For fourteen or fifteen years I was chairman of the Okanagan union library, and we have developed a circulation covering several hundred square miles, including numerous towns and villages. At the present time we have 96 outlets for our books, in schools, libraries and by van. I found that as we were able to get money to purchase more books the children took more and more of them out. However, we find difficulty in meeting higher costs of books for the larger number of outlets. From time to time we have sought assistance from the various governments, but they are reluctant to assist libraries of this type. I do feel that the dominion government should enter into the field of supplying good literature to the people of Canada—both adults and children—by subsidizing any well-established library that is endeavouring to give this service.

Instead of trying to change children by closing an avenue for certain books, let us give them an opportunity to get good books. I believe the day has come when the federal government must subsidize, through the provincial governments, municipalities or district libraries, a system of that nature to replace what is a growing menace to the minds of our young people in Canada. If we do not do anything we shall stand condemned as being indifferent to their thought processes during their teen-age or younger years.

I do not like to take your time to deal with what I have in mind regarding subsidies, but I think you all realize that in smaller areas and rural areas where the taxes for libraries are based on the land, they are objecting to that tax. The objection is not so much that it is for the libraries but because the land, especially in British Columbia, is already bearing too heavy a burden. For that reason I would ask the national library or the government of Canada to provide books in large quantities—children's books, good books—and circulate them on loan through rural and urban libraries, allowing for distribution among the children. They would then be the censors and they would be filling a gap that needs to be filled if we are to prevent the distribution of obscene literature.

That is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): Like the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate because of a vital interest in this topic. For the past few years this matter has been discussed among groups of young people with whom I have met, and I am under an obligation that whenever there was an opportunity in this chamber to discuss the subject I would try to present my personal viewpoint. I want to congratulate the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) for providing this opportunity this afternoon, because the resolution deals with a pertinent problem in our dominion at the present time.

There have been various attempts during the discussion, which has been quite dispassionate and objective, to place the responsibility for a situation that is all too obvious. We need only look at the bookstands and newspaper stands in our own communities to be aware of the fact that there is a problem. Various speakers this afternoon endeavoured to place the responsibility for this situation. Speaking in broad terms, I believe the situation arises from the fact that it is possible to commercialize the publication of pornographic literature today. There is a market for that literature, and as long as there is a market of course there will be authors, publishers, distributors and retailers who will be interested in exploiting the market. If I might generalize, I think I would place the responsibility directly on the purchaser, because it is the purchaser who provides the market for this type of literature.

It is a long-established truism that biographies of sinners have always tended to be better sellers than the biographies of saints. Judging by the tremendous turnover in obscene literature and pulp magazines of the pornographic variety, it would seem that a great many people want it that way. They are willing to buy; they are interested in the subject; and they are willing to pay the necessary price for that type of literature. This afternoon we have been dealing largely with the difficulty which arises when this literature becomes available to children and adolescents. From my knowledge of the limited financial resources of this age group it would seem that they are not the chief offenders in creating the demand. I believe it is the purchaser on the adult level who provides the financial stimulus necessary to enable this business to continue quite profitably.

In Maclean's magazine a few months ago there was the biography of one of the more prolific writers in this field of popular fiction, a person by the name of Mickey Spillane. I was interested in the article because Maclean's is a reputable publication and always presents a factual case. I was surprised to discover that some 7 million copies of the Spillane type of murder mystery had been sold on the North American continent. Canada would, of course, be part of that market. One can see the Spillane type of murder mystery, as it is called, on every newsstand, and in almost every instance it is a combination of lechery and violence. The bulk of the purchases of this type of literature is not made by children or adolescents, but by the adult population. It would seem that a good many enjoy that type of escape from reality or that type of release from the confused situation in which they find themselves.

The very fact that there are 7 million readers—and no doubt a greater number have since become fans of the Mickey Spillane novels—would tend to suggest that some of the statements made by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) are correct. What we find confronting us today is a tendency toward a moral breakdown, a failure to distinguish between what is good and what is bad so far as literary values are concerned. In so far as children are concerned, and adolescents who are still dependent upon the home and other social institutions, this problem would be no problem at all if those institutions were exercising the control that they have traditionally exercised. The very fact that moral standards have tended to become dim in the confusion and complexities of modern civilization would suggest that these basic social institutions have lost some of their control over the young people in our society. When I speak of "decline in our moral standards", I mean there is a failure to an increasing degree to distinguish the principles by which we judge behaviour to be either right or wrong.

Arising then from the problem of the market available for this type of literature, it seems to me that the solution put forward in the resolution by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) has some validity. I am particularly interested when he speaks of a joint committee of both houses of parliament being set up for the purpose of studying and recommending legislation or other measures. I like the idea of "other measures" perhaps better than recommending legislation. Then the increasing volume of filthy literature circulated in Canada could be dealt with effectively but without, at the same time, improperly restricting the freedom of the press or genuine literary or artistic expression.

The very fact that this discussion has taken place here this afternoon will create an awareness among those who should accept responsibility in this regard. For example, take the recently established organizations existing in a good many of our schools across Canada, the parent-teachers associations. If they were to get hold of the significance and magnitude of this problem it would not be very long before they began to take some positive and constructive action to remedy the situation. I am sure the publicity given to this matter will create such an awareness in places where it does not already exist. Because of the complex nature of the society in which we live, there are all sorts of things going on almost under our noses of which we are not aware until they are actually brought to our attention by someone who is a little more observant, someone who has a keener appreciation of his social and community responsibilities.

In bringing my remarks to a close, I commend the hon. member for Kamloops for providing this opportunity to discuss the subject. I would suggest that once the problem is brought to the attention of those institutions or groups responsible in every part of Canada, it could be dealt with successfully on the local community level. If it goes to a committee, as is suggested in the resolution, and receives further airing and discussion, and if a real awareness of the difficulty is established, then the particular problem that has received the greatest emphasis this afternoon—namely, that of children and adolescents being exposed to obscene literature—will to a large extent wither away.

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena): What brings me into this debate this afternoon is a reference made by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier), and some extracts read from the evidence given by Mayor Whitton. There is in my home town a small newsstand, the name of which I have no intention of mentioning here for fear of possible repercussions against it later. I was approached by the proprietor of that little newsstand last summer and he was discussing this question of the sale of various types of what might be called undesirable literature. He informed me, as was stated by the hon. member for Portneuf, that if he wished to obtain a reasonable supply of what he considered were the desirable magazines, a sufficient supply to serve his regular customers, he also had to take so many hundreds of pounds of various types of intellectual tripe.

A lot of the material he would be compelled to take in order to qualify for his quota of better literature was not necessarily pornographic, filthy or illegal, though some of it most likely was. If it is the situation that, in order to get a supply of magazines class A, a retailer has to accept and pay for a given quantity of magazines class B, that is something or other in restraint of or in control of private enterprise. It should be investigated, and most thoroughly investigated, I respectfully submit, by the Department of Justice, and that soon; because I believe that situation is responsible for some, if not all, of the sale of the material which is objected to in the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Kamloops.

I must say I have some sympathy for the small businessman who finds himself in that position, who cannot make a working profit and pay for the junk out of the profits he will get from the better class of material, and therefore in self-defence has to display and dispose of the less desirable types of literature.

I have not the slightest doubt that if that situation exists it is going to be pretty difficult to ferret out, because the people who are in business in a big way are by no means ignorant as to how to conceal what they are doing, and those who depend upon them for their supplies, which means those who depend upon them for their livelihood—I refer to the little retailer—may have some difficulty in producing the necessary evidence upon which to found a case.

With reference to the meat of the hon. member's resolution, in this case I find myself in agreement with much of what has been said by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), and I presume that means much of what has been said by the hon. member for Greenwood has merit. In particular he frankly admitted the difficulties in solving what is equally frankly a problem.

The first question that comes to my mind, and which I think has been discussed in a great many homes and a great many other forums, is what is filthy; what is obscene; what is pornographic?

One hon. member, whose name I have forgotten, referred to the evidence before the Senate divorce committees as being this type of filth or pornographic literature. Well, I am wondering. That is a factually documented report, published without the slightest effort being made to make it palatable, to make it good reading. It is just about as sensational, it is just about as attractive, from my point of view, as a medical book on some branch of obstetrics might be, yet it is not desirable reading. It is not the type of thing that the average parent would supply to a twelve-year-old child. Nevertheless it is doubtful whether anyone would say that publication of that particular material should be made illegal.

I honestly believe that if we took all the members of this house of one political group —I do not care which—we could produce to them certain types of doubtful literature and find that some would regard it as pornographic and illegal and worthy of suppression, while others would regard it as of no importance at all. There is of course no question that certain types of material are definitely pornographic, flagrantly so, while others are not. But there is this dividing line somewhere, and the whole crux of the question is that nobody can agree just where it is.

Then I think the question has been somewhat bemused this afternoon with the addition of a great many references to what is intellectually desirable. I think it was the hon. member for Greenwood who described it as trivial and worthless. I feel—and I do not know that I am too much of a highbrow—that a great deal of the material which is now being sold in bookstores and other places is trivial and is intellectual tripe; but I would not have the slightest excuse for suggesting that it was immoral or should be made illegal. Perhaps it is a fair comparison to say that there are a lot of very cheap candies on sale which do not do the children who buy them any good and which do not do them any harm, except that when they are taking these cheap and worthless candies they are filling their little stomachs with stuff which will do them much less good than if they were getting good fresh fruit, or something of that sort. In other words, it may not do them any positive harm, but it is keeping out the possibility of doing a certain amount of positive good. If you were to carry that analogy further down the line of course you would come to the material which would actually poison the child, and we are dealing now with the material which will poison the minds not the reading of which is just a very silly waste of time.

Then there is the other question. Perhaps I am a little bit old-fashioned. I am not one of those—at least I do not think I am—who rush in to the defence of advanced thought along most any line except of course political; but we have to be just a little careful that in our discussion of this or any other similar matter we do not decide that the stage at which we have arrived, you and I, is the ultimate; that because we have said, or have decided in our own minds, that this is good and that is bad, you shall not go any farther; that this decision, like the law of the Medes and Persians, can never be changed.

I wonder if I may be permitted to use an example that I know full well is a most dangerous one. There are in the house and country hundreds of thousands of people who are quite morally convinced that anything dealing with free information on the subject of birth control is absolutely immoral. There are also in this country, and most likely in the House of Commons, a great number of people who are quite firmly and morally convinced that the advocacy of birth control is something which is morally right and, some people think, morally desirable. I am not going to say who is right; that is not the question before us. The point is that there can be very firm convictions held by very decent people as to what is right and what is wrong; yet the convictions of one group can be anathema to the other group.

That brings me to an observation made by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier). He was dealing with the possibility of some form of censorship or control, and his words as I took note of them were: "The law can never be too severe". That is something with which I cannot agree, because I think conceivably it could be. If the law were imposed by a group of intellectuals whose views were different from mine, I would then be of the opinion that the law was too severe. A form of control based upon what we are led to believe was the official thinking of the Puritans on the North American continent, in the early days, might be acceptable to some in this country and quite unacceptable to others. Yet both groups might be perfectly decent and Christian, and equally sincere.

If I remember correctly it was the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones) who made what I believe, thus far, has been the only positive approach to the subject. All the rest of us have been talking from the negative viewpoint, stating that something should be forbidden. While I do not undertake at the moment to offer my support to the hon. member's suggestion, the fact is that he did make one concrete and positive suggestion as to the manner in which the problem might be met.

I think all of us have been thinking in terms that are purely negative. The solution facing us at the moment would appear to me —and conceivably I could be wrong—to be that we are going to have decisions as to what is or what is not to be sold made either by some board of censors or under the Criminal Code. I do not think anyone will claim that, to date, the results in the criminal courts have been satisfactory. I lay part of the blame where I placed it when I began these observations, namely on the situation which I believe exists as between distributors and retailers. But we are told by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) today that we may expect a good deal from the disposition of a case now under appeal.

I am afraid of a board of censors. Quite frankly I am afraid of anyone undertaking to tell me what shall be my standards in respect of morals or decency. I would be afraid to place the matter under the control of a board of censors which, if it wished, could tell us that the statue of Venus de Milo is indecent and immoral, and that every reproduction of it should be removed. Then, if it went too far the other way, quite conceivably it could continue to permit the importation and sale in this country of some things which would be offensive to a great majority of the people.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Applewhaite: Yes; but I am not an expert, and I could not guarantee the answer.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does the remark the hon. member has just made indicate that he would favour doing away with censorship or quasi-censorship such as I understand exists through the customs, against this kind of literature?

Mr. Applewhaite: If any alternative solution at all can be found within the Criminal Code or elsewhere my present answer would be yes. I was just going to deal with that. I do not believe that any group of individuals, whether set up as a board of censorship under a provincial government or whether it be a branch of the Department of National Revenue, or whether it be set up under some new act of parliament, should decide what shall and what shall not be literature.

I do not believe any such board of censors could come to a decision that would meet with the approval—I do not say the pleasure—of the majority of people in this country; because I do firmly hold the view that the standards and tastes of all of us vary to such an extent that no 20 people, or no 262 people, can say what is or what is not going to be effective. They must draw the line somewhere, putting things on one side or on the other.

There is only one alternative solution that I can see. It may not be perfect, and I know that there are weaknesses in it. The alleged crime would have to occur, followed by a decision by jurists. If they came to a conclusion that just looking at a picture would have an immoral effect, and that it should be removed, their decision would have to be respected. I know there are weaknesses in this alternative, in that a certain amount of damage is done before a decision is made. But, speaking as one individual who must choose between that and living under the jurisdiction of one or several boards of censors, I will choose the criminal court solution every time.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I take part in this debate because I have received several letters from people in my constituency. Then, a year ago samples of some books were sent to me. If I had my way and it were possible to have these objectionable books taken off the shelves of the bookstores in Canada, I would certainly have it done.

The books to which I have referred were received from a Christian lady. I gathered from her letter that she had read them. I read them, and having done so carried them over to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) who, I hope, in turn also read them. In this way we have gained firsthand knowledge of some of the vicious literature contained within the covers of these novels. I was not afraid the books would do the minister any harm, because I felt his age and experience would protect him. I was sure they would not hurt him physically, mentally or morally.

If the appointment of a commission should be the right procedure in this matter, I would be in favour of it. On the other hand it occurs to me that a board of censors—and when I say this I realize I am disagreeing with the hon. member who preceded me in the debate—might be the better alternative.

Any move to clear out this vicious literature and make it less easily obtainable by our young people is a move in the right direction. The vicious contents of this literature, the suggestive names the books carry and the luxurious pictures on their covers in my opinion are not good for the younger people of Canada. If this resolution is a move in the right direction I am in favour of it.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) upon his thorough preparation and presentation. This question of obscene literature does not alarm me so much today as it did two years ago, because I am told by booksellers that there is a greater demand today, not for literature dealing with the breaking of the seventh commandment but for a better type of book. There are many books dealing with the way a man can overcome his worries, how men and women can carry out their tasks in life and win the victory.

The writings of Lloyd Douglas are in great demand. He is an outstanding guide and helper. The demand today for his books and his type of literature is much greater than it was a few years ago. Dr. Norman Peel of New York is an outstanding writer who tells men and women how they can best overcome their worries and achieve a clean life. I have some pamphlets here which indicate the type of literature available. This indicates that there is inspiration everywhere; it tells us to let freedom reign, how to become secure in insecure times and so on. As our church leaders, our doctors, our teachers, our members of legislatures advertise these things through their own lives, the great call will not be for literature dealing with the breaking of the seventh commandment.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has said that there is enough legislation if it is enforced. I do not know whether this resolution will help, but if we can get something that will be enforced I think we should have it. In your prayer every day you say, "lead us not into temptation." If this committee were set up it might show the booksellers and those who would appear before it the error of their ways, and they might wake up. You cannot make people good by passing resolutions or legislation; the change must be in their own hearts.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the comments of the various hon. members who have spoken on this important resolution. Members of the Social Credit group I believe will support the resolution. There is great difficulty in knowing just how to correct the problem which is involved. Everyone knows that for some strange reason obscenity seems to be increasing in the literature commonly available to people. How to stop that increase, how to take the necessary steps to restore the standards of high thinking which prevailed fifty years ago, is something which I think is beyond the average mind to conceive.

I can see no harm in calling a committee of this kind and having them devote a measure of attention to possible solutions of the problem. Whether or not any legislation would be based on their findings that would be of assistance, I would hate to say. But I do believe we ought to do everything we can. If we do not do everything we can to improve the moral attitude of the youth of our time and their elders, I think we shall stand condemned before those who follow.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The motion is by Mr. Fulton. Before the motion is put, may I point out that I have modified it to read, "That in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the advisability of appointing a joint committee" rather than "the government should consider".

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Fulton) which was negatived on the following division:

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall continue with the debate on the motion to set up a committee to examine into national defence expenditures. If we dispose of that motion to set up the committee we will take up the resolution relating to the appointment of an associate minister of national defence, and then deal with the items in the name of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson).

It being fifteen minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

QUESTION

MUNICIPAL POLICE SERVICE, SASK.—CHARGES BY R.C.M.P.

Mr. Wright:

1. What increases have taken place in the charge per man by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for police services to municipalities in the province of Saskatchewan, since January 1, 1951?

2. What increases have taken place in the rentals or other services required by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in these municipalities?

Mr. Garson:

1. No general increase has taken place between January 1, 1951 and December 31, 1952. The charge per man per annum was increased to the town of Eston from $1,200 to $1,400 on the 1st November, 1952, and the rate to the city of North Battleford was increased from $1,000 to $1,400, effective the 1st November, 1951.

2. Certain municipalities have been required to pay the sum of nine cents per mile for each mile travelled on municipal duty by R.C.M. Police transport. Certain municipalities not providing office accommodation have been required to pay an appropriate amount in lieu of such accommodation.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

MEDICAL AND SURGICAL SUPPLIES—CONTRACTS TO NOVA SCOTIA COMPANIES

Mr. Balcom:

What contracts over $100 for medical and surgical supplies have been awarded Nova Scotia drug or surgical instrument companies by the Canadian Commercial Corporation?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That a select committee to be designated be appointed to consider with Mr. Speaker the procedure of this house for the purpose of suggesting any changes that may be desirable to assure the more expeditious dispatch of public business, with power to send for persons, and papers and to report from time to time its findings and recommendations to the house.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have not checked to see if this motion follows the same form as the motions in the last two sessions dealing with the appointment of this particular committee, and I wonder if the Prime Minister would tell us if the purposes outlined here are sufficiently broad. We are all concerned about the more expeditious dispatch of public business but it may be that there will be other matters that should be considered by the committee and which would not come strictly under the heading of the more expeditious dispatch of public business.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think these words are identical with the words of previous motions. I know that last year the motion was to continue the work that had been done by a previous committee and the report of that previous committee was referred to the committee to be set up. It was felt this time that it would be in order to have the language as general as possible. I am quite sure that if the committee finds that there is something that it wishes to do that is not covered by this reference, there will be no hesitancy on the part of the house to accept its recommendations that the terms of reference be enlarged. I would undertake to bring that before the house without any delay whatsoever.

Mr. Fleming: I wish to thank the Prime Minister. I take it that we can agree that the purpose of the motion is to provide wide terms of reference for the committee.

Mr. St. Laurent: Oh, yes. I would hope that these terms of reference would be quite sufficient to enable the committee to consider the principle of the bill introduced to amend the constitution with respect to the quorum of this house, if that bill or the subject matter of the bill is referred to the committee. I can give the hon. gentleman assurance that there is no desire to circumscribe the terms of reference of this committee in any manner whatsoever. Should the committee find that it requires some modification in the terms of reference in order to permit it to make the kind of recommendation it feels would be proper, I shall do my best to bring it before the house at the earliest possible moment and recommend that it be considered. We want the members of this committee to have full opportunity to consider the rules and make such recommendations as they hope will commend themselves to the majority of the members of the house.

Motion agreed to.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO ROYAL COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the conflicting recommendations in regard to the South Saskatchewan river project, will the Prime Minister say whether it is the intention of the government to stand by the recommendations of its own P.F.R.A. engineer and its own promises to the people of western Canada?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The government has not yet had an opportunity to give proper consideration to the report of this royal commission. As soon as it has had that opportunity and has reached any decision, that will be announced to the house.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): May I ask a supplementary question? Is it the intention to have the report printed and distributed at an early date among members of the house?

Mr. St. Laurent: I am surprised to know the hon. member has not received it. Instructions were given to make it immediately available to all members of parliament. If that has not been done, I shall take steps to see that it is done at once. I was informed on Monday morning that there were copies in sufficient number to make them immediately available to all members of parliament.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Graydon: Did you make a good count of the copies?

Mr. St. Laurent: I was told in general terms that there were enough to go around and that there were sufficient copies available to enable me to send some to the governments of the three western provinces, which was done.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ALLEGED INTENTION TO BROADCAST A CHILDBIRTH

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): On January 15 I put a question to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), as reported on page 1014 of Hansard. This question was as follows:

> Is the Minister of National Revenue aware of the fact that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, through its present information service, is announcing that on January 29 it will broadcast a childbirth? If so, what action is the government proposing to take?

The minister then replied as follows:

> I am not aware of the matter, but I shall have it referred to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and give the imformation later.

A week has passed, and I wonder if this question could be answered soon.

BRIDGES

INQUIRY AS TO BRIDGE BETWEEN CROSS POINT, P.Q. AND CAMPBELLTON, N.B.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bona Arsenault (Bonaventure): I wish to put a question to the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier).

Two lives having been lost recently as a result of the collapse of part of the ice bridge between Cross Point, Quebec, and Campbellton, New Brunswick, I would like the hon. Minister of Public Works to tell me:

1. Whether he has received from the government of the province of Quebec or from that of New Brunswick any representations through which these provinces have formally agreed to participate financially in the construction of an interprovincial bridge between Cross Point and Campbellton.

2. Whether the federal government is willing to participate financially in the construction of such an interprovincial bridge, according to the practice generally adopted up to now in this country.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the matter of the construction of an interprovincial bridge between Cross Point and Campbellton has been brought time and again to the attention of my department by those members representing the neighbouring constituencies, including the one who asked this question.

Each time, I pointed out to hon. members that the federal government is always prepared to consider any proper suggestion that the two provincial governments might submit. However, no suggestion of the kind has yet been submitted to us by the provincial authorities concerned, neither jointly nor separately.

I should like to add that as soon as the two provinces concerned have formally indicated their decision to participate financially in the construction of this interprovincial bridge, I shall submit their proposals without delay to my colleagues of the cabinet.

DEFENCE EXPENDITURE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for the appointment of a committee to examine defence expenditures and commitments, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Claxton, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Knowles.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, this debate is now going into its second week. During that time the Department of National Defence has acquired an unenviable reputation. It has become a joke and the laughingstock of this country. Worse than that, the present administration of the department has brought the department itself, and particularly the army branch, to a position where it also has become a laughingstock in the country. That, I suggest, is a very regrettable affair. The Department of National Defence is not only the largest spending department of the government but it is the department that is concerned with the nation's very survival in time of war. It is the department which is concerned not only with the spending of hundreds of millions of dollars but the department which is concerned with the life and welfare of thousands of our citizens who enlist in the various branches of the services. It is the department that must inspire young Canadians with sufficient confidence to induce large numbers of them to choose the armed services as their lifework and to inspire still larger numbers to submit themselves to sufficient training to enable us to defend ourselves in case of attack.

It is not good for the morale of the army or the morale of the Department of National Defence, nor is it good for the morale of the country, that a department of such importance should become the laughingstock of the country, particularly at this time. When have we ever before in all the history of Canada had a department of national defence that has become, as this administration has, the subject of such numerous jokes by jokesters and cartoonists all across the country? When has any one of our great national dailies ever had the opportunity of making such fun at the expense of the Department of National Defence as the Globe and Mail did on the front page of its issue of January 15? I have a copy of that page on my desk. There is a whole page of cartoons gathered from all across the country that hold the Department of National Defence up to ridicule.

There is a cartoon, for instance, representing an ordinary soldier up before the big brass of the army and defending himself by saying, "All I said was, I have been working like a horse." The present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), Mr. Speaker, is the most nagged man in all Canada today.

Mr. Sinnott: That is only your opinion.

Mr. Noseworthy: It is small wonder that the Department of National Defence has become an object of such ridicule. When before in our history has Hansard ever printed on one day a letter tabled by a minister of a responsible department, a letter supposed to be written by him, signed by him and sent by him to another citizen, only to be told on the next day by the minister that he did not write the letter, he did not dictate it and the signature must have been added at some stage either by a clerk or by a printer? It becomes quite evident to the public that the minister is not only unfamiliar with what goes on in his own department but he does not even know what he is doing when he is tabling documents in the House of Commons. He does not even know what he is tabling. How can we expect the country to have confidence in an administration of that kind? What goes on in the Department of National Defence? Who played such a prank on the minister? I suggest that this is a case worthy of the best efforts of the R.C.M.P. Certainly it is as worthy as some of the duties that have been assigned to that force by the Department of Justice in recent weeks.

The debate, as I said, has gone on now for two weeks. During that time the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Campney) have all participated along with some other lesser Liberal lights. Actually the big Klieg lights of the Liberal party and the little candle lights, as for example, the one from Mackenzie, have only served to blur the picture before us. What has quite evidently been the object of the government in this debate is the minimizing of the importance of the actual report and drawing the attention of the public to other minor and side issues.

I submit it is in the public interest that our attention should be focused on the report and the revelation of inefficiency on the part of those at or near the top of the Department of National Defence as exposed in the report. That is the issue which should be our concern. It is not, I submit, a matter of grave national importance whether a colonel's rocking horse was a $400 bang-up thoroughbred affair with a silken mane, as the soldier who made it evidently thought, or whether it was, as the minister says, a rough affair made from scrap, from a lady's worn-out fur coat and a milkman's horse's tail, a rocking horse that was only worth $9.50—

Mr. Studer: Your party brought it up.

Mr. Noseworthy: —and which $9.50 was returned to the government some weeks or months after the horse was made and after the investigation was well under way. It is a matter of some importance that an investigation by an investigator of Mr. Currie's standing gives us certain important facts. It is important that the explanations that the Minister of National Defence and the Prime Minister have given us pertaining to the same facts are at variance with and contradictory to those given by Mr. Currie. This becomes more important when we are given to understand by the minister that Mr. Currie got his information from the Department of National Defence, that the department cooperated with him in giving him all the information he wanted, and that the reason the minister wanted the Department of National Defence to check the report was that the facts had been given by the department.

The minister and the Prime Minister got their facts from the Department of National Defence. Yet they are at variance in a number of details. How does it happen, for instance, that Mr. Currie's story about horses on the payroll should differ so widely from the Prime Minister's explanation? How does it come about that Mr. Currie could find no useful purpose being served by a certain dam that was built and yet the Minister of National Defence comes forward with an explanation? How does it happen that nobody in the Department of National Defence was bright enough to think of these explanations when Mr. Currie interrogated them and that the explanations come to us only after Mr. Currie has given us an entirely different version? Any impartial citizen who is at all interested in this affair can only reach one conclusion. That one and only conclusion is that the government is going to great lengths to whitewash the Currie report.

It is a matter of some public concern, I think, whether a government department being investigated should have the right to edit a report which exposes the inefficiency of the department being investigated. Is it the right of the Department of National Defence to have that report, which condemns that department for its inefficiency, revised and edited by that department before it is made public? That, I take it, is a question of some national importance.

The minister tries to gloss over that fact, without really facing up to it, by telling us that he ordered the report; that he wanted the truth; and apparently he admits that Mr. Currie could not get at the truth and so the minister has to get at it after the report is published. He tells us that Mr. Currie got his information from the department but the department wanted to check the facts that it gave to Mr. Currie.

The whole question at issue is whether or not a government department that is being investigated can require the submission to it of a report of the investigation which condemns that department for inefficiency—before the report is made public. You do not answer that question by saying that this report was Mr. Currie's; that Mr. Currie could submit it or not as he chose; that Mr. Currie could take the suggestion of the Department of National Defence or not as he pleased. That does not answer the question.

We shall never know what conversations took place nor what persuasive measures were taken to induce Mr. Currie to comply with the minister's request in this respect. I say that it was submitted for editing advisedly, because in my opinion the change that was made in that report, changing the wording from "those at or near the top" to read "higher ups" cannot by any stretch of the imagination be considered factual or anything else but editing. That was the real purpose why that report had to be submitted to the officers of the Department of National Defence.

Let us not forget that had it not been for the fact that what the Prime Minister calls a preliminary working paper found its way into the hands of the leader of this group, the country would never have known that Mr. Currie was requested by the Department of National Defence to submit his report to them for editing before it was tabled in this house.

Some of us believe that a department of government being investigated should not be accorded the privilege of editing a report made by an independent investigator condemning that department. We believe that a report produced and made public under those restrictive conditions could—I am not saying that this one did—lose all of its validity as an independent report by an independent investigator. On those grounds we think that the department should not have been accorded that privilege. In fact, some of us feel so strongly on this point that we believe that the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) would have been condoning the action of the government and would not have been fulfilling his duty as a member of this house if he had, as the Prime Minister suggested, refused to make use of the information which came into his hands.

Are we to assume that only the government has the right to make use of stolen information—if it was stolen? No one questioned the right of the government to make use of stolen information in the Russian spy case. Are we to accord that right only to the government or, as the Prime Minister suggested, to the leader of the official opposition? As he suggested, had the report been taken to the editors of the country—

An hon. Member: Who stole the report?

Mr. Noseworthy: —it might have been taken to the leader of the official opposition. Are we to accord that privilege to those people and not accord it to the opposition members of parliament? That is an issue, I think, which might well be considered.

The Prime Minister on January 15, when speaking in this house about the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), as reported in Hansard on page 1019, said:

> —the hon. gentleman is sometimes inclined to set himself up not only as an authority, . . . but also as an example of rectitude for the rest of us to follow in our own public conduct.

Then a few minutes later the Prime Minister, as reported on page 1021, sets himself up as an example to the rest of us when he makes this statement:

> Does anyone imagine, Mr. Speaker, that I would be doing for anyone but the public service what I have been doing for the last four or five years for the pecuniary compensation that I get for it?

I am not for one moment questioning the fact that the Prime Minister was rendering this service because of his interest in the public and in the welfare of Canada, but what I am saying is that the Prime Minister should be broad-minded enough to accord to gentlemen on this side of the house the same privileges that he takes unto himself and that he takes for the members of his government.

An hon. Member: He did not steal anything.

Mr. Noseworthy: Is the Prime Minister unwilling to concede that the member for Rosetown-Biggar used that information for no other purpose than in the public interest? He implies in his speech that the man who brought that information to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar—

An hon. Member: Who was it?

Mr. Noseworthy: —was not only stealing this information but that he was bringing the document solely for the purpose of its being used in party strife. The Prime Minister insinuated that the member for Rosetown-Biggar, when he made use of that information, was making use of it for no other purpose than party strife. Is the Prime Minister not big enough, is he not gentlemanly enough, to assume that there could be some people on this side of the house whose principles are high enough—

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I want to know if the word "insinuate", in this case, is unparliamentary?

Mr. Brooks: Look it up in the dictionary.

Mr. Dupuis: Let the Speaker decide. To me the word "insinuate" means lied. I should like to know whether or not, in the present circumstances, that word is unparliamentary. I am waiting for your decision, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think I should rule that the word "insinuate" is out of order. I do not think it means "to lie". Many things may be insinuated. I cannot declare it to be unparliamentary in the present circumstances.

Mr. Brooks: Nor could anyone else.

Mr. Noseworthy: By what means does the Prime Minister arrive at his conclusion that because opposition members cannot identify the interests of the Liberal party with the interests of the country, as quite evidently the Liberals do, they are therefore stooping to party strife? They have attempted to expose a government practice which they consider wrong, and which they consider against the public interest. Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, we in this group believe that the exposure of the government's insistence on editing the Currie report is not in the best interests of Canada, and that those who exposed that were, in reality, rendering the country a good public service.

Apart altogether from the question of the document and the issue arising out of it, I want to support the subamendment moved by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr.

Knowles). The subamendment, on page 1019 of Hansard for January 15, 1953, reads in part as follows:

—and to give consideration to the desirability of recommending that Mr. Currie be asked to conduct a further inquiry into any other expenditures and commitments covered by the terms of this resolution.

If the Currie report has done nothing else, it has alerted the public to the fact that they are not getting value for all the money the Department of National Defence is spending. The public not only regard the administration of that department, as I said before, as a joke, but they have become cynical about it. They have become suspicious of what is happening elsewhere in that department. In my opinion, public interest and the interests of the Department of National Defence require that there be a thoroughgoing investigation of the expenditures of that whole department. Only in that way will public confidence in the department be restored to the point where the public will be willing to see our youths devote their services to this country through the Department of National Defence.

Today this department is completely discredited in the eyes of the public, and only such a thoroughgoing investigation can restore that department to the confidence of the public. The minister tells us that he wants to get at the truth. I am confident the Prime Minister also wants to get at the truth. Yet, both of them will oppose this subamendment. The Prime Minister has told us he will vote against it, and he thereby gives the signal to all his followers to vote against it. Why? Certainly, they cannot pretend to those of us who sit in this house that they believe for one moment the committee on defence expenditure will make any such investigation of the true facts? They will get from that committee just those facts that the government wants revealed, and nothing more. Those of us who have had experience in sitting on committees in the past, and I sat on the defence expenditure committee during world war II, realize that they get just what information the government wants them to get.

I believe the keynote of the committee's investigation was given in an interview by Mr. MacTavish, president of the national Liberal federation, as reported in yesterday's Journal. Mr. MacTavish was interviewed during his first western trip in his present capacity, and had this to say:

—he believes the report will be put in its proper perspective after it is examined and analysed by the defence expenditures committee of the Commons.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

Then he goes on to say that it will not be an issue in the forthcoming election. The report will be put in its proper perspective by the Liberal majority of that committee. They will minimize the charges in the report, and give the report such a good coat of whitewash that the Liberals hope the country will forget the report when election time comes, thus exonerating the government and the Department of National Defence from the charges that are implicit in that report. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that the good name of our Department of National Defence, the good name and reputation of our armed forces acquired through the sacrifices of our soldiers, sailors and airmen in two world wars, is being sacrificed and held up to ridicule in this country because the Liberal party places party interests before national interest.

If the government today uses its majority in this house to defeat that subamendment, and thereby show the country that they do not want a thorough investigation into the Department of National Defence, they will furnish the country with proof of what I have just said.

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): I have been reluctant to enter the debate on the establishment of a committee to investigate defence expenditures and examine the Currie report. Rumour has it that I shall have ample opportunity in the very near future of discussing the Currie report. The house will understand, therefore, if I do not discuss it at the present time. But in listening to the debate, and I have listened to it since its inception, I have had a curious feeling of unreality. Let us see what the government is proposing to this house. The government is proposing, and I quote:

That a select committee be appointed to continue the examination of all expenditure of public moneys for national defence and all commitments for expenditure for national defence since March 31, 1950, and initially to give priority in their examination to the expenditures and commitments of the Canadian army works services as dealt with in the report of G. S. Currie, Esquire, chartered accountant, tabled in the House of Commons on December 15, 1952.

That is the government proposal. The position of the official opposition on that matter is well known and was stated by a member of last year's committee on Tuesday, January 20. As reported at page 1182 of Hansard of that day the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) said:

The idea of referring the report to the defence expenditure committee, from the point of view of the recommendations, is completely hopeless and just does not make sense.

Then again at page 1184:

I can think of nothing less valuable than to have the committee on defence expenditure spend its time, in effect, in investigating the investigator. That is what we would be doing, and that is all the defence expenditure committee can and will do if it is turned loose on this Currie report. We shall be investigating the investigator, the very man the Minister of National Defence and this government appointed for the purpose of investigating the irregularities which had taken place at Petawawa, who spent months in doing that, and who turned in what I think everyone will admit was an absolutely splendid report.

Then again at page 1186, still quoting the hon. member for Calgary East:

If this program envisaged by the government is carried out time will be spent on a minute examination and re-examination of the Currie report, and it will be a complete waste of time as far as the committee is concerned.

Then quoting the hon. member at page 1184 of Hansard:

Last year in the defence expenditure committee I made a motion that the committee should investigate the situation which had developed at Petawawa, but the government would not hear of it.

At that stage the hon. member for Calgary East neglected or in any event omitted the meat of his motion. The motion, as he states it, is tasteless, without being spiced. I cannot resist taking advantage of the opportunity to set the record clear.

On Tuesday, April 29, 1952, the committee on defence expenditure met and there were present Messrs. Adamson, Applewhaite, Blanchette, Campney, Cavers, Churchill, Croll, Dickey, Dinsdale—he had replaced the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) in that and a few other meetings; the hon. member for Nanaimo was away at that particular time —Fulton, Gauthier (Portneuf), George, Harkness, Henderson, James, Jones, Larson, Macdonnell (Greenwood), Power, Stick and Weaver. Twenty-one members were present. Six members belonged to the official opposition; they were all present.

At that time the hon. member for Calgary East introduced a motion before that committee. I think I can tell you now that all the members of the official opposition voted for the motion of the hon. member for Calgary East and gave rather emphatic speeches on behalf of it. Let me read you the motion, Mr. Speaker; this is his notice of motion. It has four parts, (a), (b), (c) and (d) and it reads as follows:

(a) That the Department of National Defence be asked to bring before the committee at its next meeting officials who can give us the general administrative set-up at Petawawa.

(b) That witnesses be called before the committee to outline the losses of stores, etc., which have taken place at Petawawa, and the manner in which these losses occurred.

(c) That witnesses be called to outline the accounting and other procedures in use at Petawawa and other places to prevent loss and waste of government property.

Before I read (d) to you, Mr. Speaker, I want to repeat the proposal of the government before this house at the present time, namely:

That a select committee be appointed to continue the examination of all expenditure of public moneys for national defence and all commitments for expenditure for national defence since March 31, 1950, and initially to give priority in their examination to the expenditures and commitments of the Canadian army works services as dealt with in the report of G. S. Currie, Esquire, chartered accountant, tabled in the House of Commons on December 15, 1952.

I now read section (d) of the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Calgary East and supported by all the members of the opposition whose names I have read, all of whom have spoken in this house and all of whom support his point of view. It reads:

(d) That as soon as Mr. George S. Currie has completed his investigation at Petawawa, his report be placed before this committee and that he be called for questioning on it.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, from both the Currie report and the Sellar report one thing is clear to me, and that is that the biggest business operation being conducted in this country today, namely the Department of National Defence, is being conducted on sloppy, inefficient and unbusinesslike lines. Both these reports have pointed out that little heed has been paid to accounting methods and accounting; and after all, accounting is the backbone of any successful business operation.

When he was speaking on Tuesday night, the minister made a rather startling admission. He admitted that he had not read any of the 1,185 auditors' reports dealing with conditions in his department, and that he was therefore unfamiliar with what those reports contained.

Mr. Claxton: That was also stated by me in my speech a week before.

Mr. Hees: Then I think that makes it doubly shocking, Mr. Speaker, that someone in charge of a business operation which spends over $2 billion of the taxpayers' money each year, and which spends fifty cents out of every tax dollar collected from the Canadian people, has never bothered to look at an auditor's report on the conditions existing in his department. To me that is an exceedingly startling revelation.

When he was speaking in this house on Tuesday night, the minister said that not one member of the opposition had offered a constructive suggestion as to how the irregularities mentioned in Mr. Currie's report could have been prevented. I say to the minister that if he had paid some attention to the continuous reports of the chief auditor in his department, there would have been no necessity for Mr. Currie to make his investigation, because the conditions which necessitated that investigation would have been stamped out several years before.

If the president and the board of directors of a business corporation tried to defend this kind of negligence to the shareholders, all of them would be fired at the next annual meeting. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the cabinet are the president and board of directors of this country. They have taken the position that they have nothing to excuse with regard to the administration of the defence department. They are, in so many words, condoning these irregularities brought to light by Mr. Currie, and, in so doing, are saying to all other departments, "Do not be too careful about wasting the taxpayers' money. Go ahead and waste a little, if you want to. We will not remonstrate with you."

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Hees: The government is saying, "There is lots more money where this came from. If you are a little short, we will take more from the taxpayers for you; because in the last six years we have been overtaxing the people of Canada by more than a million dollars a day in excess of what was needed to meet all requirements, and we cannot see any reason for stopping now."

And now, to show you how little the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and others in charge of the defence department know about its operations, I would like to compare two statements made recently by the minister and his associate minister.

Speaking on this matter on December 17 the Acting Minister of National Defence, as reported at page 864 of Hansard, told us that the army works services consisted of 7,500 personnel. When speaking in the house on January 13 the Minister of National Defence, dealing with the army works services, said, as reported at page 937 of Hansard, that the army works services was made up of 765 service personnel and 3,334 civilian personnel, for a total of 4,100. There is a difference of 3,400 between those two figures, or the equivalent of an army brigade.

What I want to know is this: What happened to that army brigade in three weeks' time? It was there on December 17, but it had disappeared by January 13. If the two ministers in charge of the department can, between them, lose an army brigade in three weeks, how in the world can they expect those who are working for them to keep track of smaller items such as railway sidings, trainloads of cement, and all the other examples of unchecked waste of the taxpayers' money which was brought to light by the Currie report?

Mr. Campney: Does the hon. member wish me to make a correction now, and clear the issue up?

Mr. Hees: No, I shall be glad to have the correction made later on.

An hon. Member: You are afraid to hear it.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): You are afraid of it.

Mr. Dickey: You do not want to have the truth on the record, eh?

Mr. Hees: I believe this kind of inefficiency and lack of knowledge of what is going on by way of waste and extravagance in the department is just not good enough, as a national effort, to back up our young fighting men in Korea and northwestern Europe. Those young men are giving up their very best; and I believe they are deserving of the best from the department that is responsible for our whole defence effort.

There is nothing that saps the morale of fighting men quicker than the knowledge that there is inefficiency in high places; and the inefficiency in this case stems right from this government.

As a member of the reserve army between 1947 and 1951, and as one who attended Petawawa Camp in three of those four summers, I want to say that I believe the personnel in both our active and reserve forces is absolutely first-class. I feel that it is no responsibility of those fine young men and women in our armed services that the conditions brought to light by Mr. Currie existed. The responsibility lies "at or near the top" of this defence department. They, together with the whole of the government, must share the responsibility for the fact that these conditions were allowed to exist for several years, despite the fact that the auditor of the department reported such conditions on several occasions.

Mr. Studer: And you were at Petawawa?

Mr. Hees: I was at Petawawa, training to be a soldier, like other young men and women who go there to train. I was not there to build houses. I was not there to check the accounting system; I was there in training to be a fighting man.

Mr. Sinnott: And you are still dumb.

Mr. Studer: And you did not see a thing.

Mr. Hees: If you are training, my dear friend, you do not have time to see these things. You are training; you are not looking at railway sidings, bags of cement or accounting records.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we would make greater progress if hon. members would address the Speaker.

Mr. Hees: By ignoring proper accounting methods, and the continued warnings of the auditors within the department, I believe the Minister of National Defence, and those associated with him in running the department, threw the door wide open for wrongdoers. To me, the great wonder is, as Mr. Currie said, that far more crooks did not walk through that door than actually did walk through it. Surely it is a great credit to the young men and women of our armed services that there was not far more pilfering and dishonesty than actually developed.

The other afternoon we were entertained by the presentation of the sequel to the Currie report—the Murray report—given to us by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray). He outlined the kind of irregularities which took place in connection with the construction of the Alaska highway during the period of the last war. According to him, what went on at Petawawa was simply child's play when compared with what went on in the construction of the Alaska highway.

All the hon. member for Cariboo succeeded in doing was to prove that this kind of waste and inefficiency in our defence department has been going on for at least ten years and, as in the present instance, the responsibility for that waste, mishandling and maladministration must be placed right on the shoulders of the government.

The people of Canada do not object to paying for the cost of defence if they feel that they are receiving value for their tax dollars.

An hon. Member: I have heard that before.

Mr. Hees: They have proved this by paying willingly for the cost of defence during two world wars and, to date, for what might easily turn out to be preparations for a third world war. Mr. Currie has discovered gross waste and inefficiency in a relatively small branch of the defence department. If the people of Canada are to continue willingly to meet the huge cost of defence, then they must be assured that this kind of waste and extravagance does not exist in all other branches of the Department of National Defence.

If, as a parliament, we fail to give them that assurance, we will be doing much to turn public opinion back to the days when taxation for defence purposes was not willingly accepted.

I believe that our obligations as a parliament, both to those in the armed services and in respect of our commitments to our allies in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, demand action no less than that contained in the subamendment.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to delay the house long. At the outset I must congratulate the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) on pinpointing exactly what the opposition wanted to have done some time ago. It seems to me that the man who was put in charge of digging into matters at Petawawa and who accused certain people of looting should have been able to keep track of his own papers and not allow someone to steal them. I do not think he can condemn too much what was done at Petawawa when he could not keep track of what he was doing himself.

I have no brief or sympathy for any man in the armed forces who swears allegiance to his Queen and country and then loots and pilfers at the expense of the Canadian people. The government has dealt with these matters when they have been brought to their attention and it has been pointed out that twelve of these men are now in penitentiary.

Every business in Canada allows for certain losses occurring, but in the armed forces it is a different matter. When a man swears allegiance to his Queen and country he should live up to his signature. I understand that the items referred to by Mr. Currie in his report total in the neighbourhood of $50,000, much of which has been recovered. I am not talking about the horses that were referred to at Petawawa, but it does seem to me that at this time we are simply beating a dead horse.

The amount not recovered is no more than $15,000 or $20,000, and up to the present time we in this house have used $70,000 worth of time debating. We had better cut this out if we have any interest in the Canadian public dollar. If the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and members of the opposition parties are interested in saving money they should stop talking and get down to business and, at the earliest opportunity, see what this Currie report has to say.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken I should like to speak for one moment on the subamendment proposed by the C.C.F., and make the position of the Social Credit group clear to the house. Members of our group have not done overmuch talking about the Currie report. I think I am correct when I say that thus far only three of us have entered into the debate. I spoke very briefly when the report was tabled, I think on December 16, and placed our position before the house as clearly as I could, having had only a brief time in which to examine the recommendations of Mr. Currie. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Thomas) spoke on January 15 and outlined our position a little more fully. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) spoke on January 16 and expanded somewhat on what had been said already.

Let me make it clear that the members of our group have not felt that we should strain at this matter. We felt that it was our responsibility to examine most carefully into the report and to see what could possibly be done to correct or help to correct the situation that has developed within the army works services. We felt right from the beginning that in his report Mr. Currie had revealed a shocking state of affairs within the army works services, a state of affairs that has caused considerable uneasiness to the people from one end of Canada to the other, a state of affairs that has resulted in the loss of many thousands of dollars of the taxpayers' money.

We have tried to keep a balance in all that we have said or done in connection with the report and in the part we have taken in the debate thus far. We do not want to go overboard in an effort to make of this an election or political issue because we felt that we would like to know all that we could possibly learn about both sides of the question. We have felt that the government has been at fault in a good many ways and we have felt that to merely correct the accounting system and the security system which had been allowed to become loose and lax is not enough.

We have stated from the beginning that we felt that after doing everything possible to tighten up and improve the army works services accounting and administration systems, the government should then undertake a thorough and complete investigation of the whole Department of National Defence in all its branches from one end of the country to the other. We feel that it is necessary to investigate all branches of the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production to see if there are not other places where a saving of the taxpayers' money could be effected.

The hon. member for Red Deer has pointed out on two different occasions that he has evidence which indicates that there must be serious losses in connection with defence construction, which evidence he is prepared to present at the proper time. We call upon the government to institute a wide investigation into defence construction activities from one end of the country to the other, into the granting of contracts and all that sort of thing that needs to be investigated. We are satisfied that much more serious losses will be revealed than have been revealed at Petawawa.

As a consequence we felt that we could not lay undue emphasis upon the Currie report, particularly in view of the fact that the government has given evidence that it is trying to close up the gaps, to tighten up the administrative and accounting systems which will make impossible the things that have happened in the past and which were revealed in Mr. Currie's report.

We did not enter into the discussion with respect to how a copy of the report got into the hands of the C.C.F. We felt that was a matter which did not concern us too greatly. All I can say is that I am most thankful that nobody came to me and offered me an advance copy of the report. I am glad that I did not have it. It was soon enough for me to get it when it was tabled in the house. Entirely aside from who was responsible and whether it was stolen or not, we felt that we should not help to bog down the discussion in this house on a matter that did not concern us too much.

What does concern us is what can be done from here on. We do not think that a mere consideration of defence expenditures by a committee of this house is enough. We feel that nothing short of a complete judicial inquiry into all phases of defence expenditures and commitments, including defence construction, will suffice. I think the people of this country are demanding just that sort of thing. They are certainly getting tired of hearing of horses and nags and all the other things that have been bandied about for some weeks. They want action and I think they expect this house to settle down to business now and get action as quickly as we possibly can.

At first, Mr. Speaker, we felt that we could not support the C.C.F. subamendment because it did not go as far as we wanted it to go. We felt that merely asking Mr. Currie to continue an investigation in the field of defence expenditures and commitments was not nearly enough and we did, as I say, call for a full judicial inquiry into all phases of defence expenditures and commitments. However, since the first speeches were given in the house on the Currie report we have listened carefully and have tried to measure as carefully as we possibly could all of the evidence. A number of things have been brought out that have changed our views a bit, and we find ourselves at the present moment in favour of the C.C.F. subamendment and will vote for it as the next best thing to a judicial inquiry.

It does not seem possible to get a judicial inquiry out of the discussion that we are carrying on here at the present time. Therefore we are prepared to support the C.C.F. subamendment, and we hope that the committee will get down to business as quickly as possible and will not only investigate the Currie report but will launch out and investigate all these other things that a good many of the members, including the hon. member for Red Deer, would like to have investigated. I name particularly defence construction contracts.

Mr. Cruickshank: I was paired with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis).

Mr. Black (Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): I was paired. Had I voted, I would have voted against the subamendment.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Members of this group intend to vote against the amendment, Mr. Speaker, and I want to say a few words before the vote is taken to indicate why we are taking that position. The member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) made what he thought was a telling point when he claimed that members of the official opposition, last year at a session of the defence expenditure committee, had moved that when the Currie report was tabled it be referred to that committee. There may be members of the house who think that this amendment does refer the Currie report to the committee. My contention is that it does not do anything of the kind.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) moved, seconded by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson):

That the motion be amended by inserting after the words "March 31, 1950", in the fourth line thereof, the following:

"and initially to give priority in their examination to the expenditures and commitments of the Canadian army works services as dealt with in the report of G. S. Currie, Esquire, chartered accountant, tabled in the House of Commons on December 15, 1952."

There is nothing said here about referring the Currie report to the committee. What it does state is that the items referred to in the Currie report be examined by the committee, and, indeed, be given priority, which is a very different thing.

We are voting against the amendment because it does not refer the Currie report to the committee. It does not instruct the committee to consider the recommendations in the Currie report. All it does is instruct the committee, as its first task, to inquire into the very same matters as Mr. Currie has already inquired into. I maintain, Mr. Speaker—I am not allowed to impute motives—that the only result of the adoption of this amendment will be to prevent the committee doing anything except to hash over what has already been hashed over in this house for the last two weeks. That is the purpose of the amendment, and it could have no other purpose.

Why does the government want that to be done? As has been said, the government wants that to be done because, while the government accuses the opposition of playing politics with this report, the government is going to play politics with the report the moment that report comes into the committee. For that reason every member in this house who is interested in the honest administration of this country's affairs, every member in this house who feels appalled, as the general public feels appalled, at what was revealed in the Currie report should, regardless of his party affiliation, vote against this amendment. If there needs to be anything further done in that regard, it should have been done by adopting the amendment moved by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Regrettably, it seems to me, the government has tried to belittle the Currie report; to make light of it and to laugh at it.

No matter how generous we want to be to the Department of National Defence, what was revealed in the Currie report is most appalling and should be considered seriously by this government. I should like to have spoken at length on this matter, and if the debate had continued a little longer I would have done so. If the government wants the people of this country to believe that they are interested in the honest administration of the Department of National Defence, for which the people of Canada are paying such a large amount of their taxes, not only for the defence of this country but for the defence of the free world, they should stop this quibbling, this manoeuvring for political position, and let this house and the government get at the facts.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my remarks only to the amendment before us and to the reasons why that amendment will be opposed by myself and, I believe, by the members of the party to which I belong. We have already indicated quite clearly that we disapprove strongly of this amendment and the manner in which it was introduced. It is accepted that this procedure is within the rules; nevertheless it establishes a highly unsatisfactory practice. In order to vote for a wider inquiry, it became necessary for us to support a subamendment which embraced the motion now before us. I explained why we would vote for the subamendment as we have voted for it. The amendment is now before us and I propose to vote against that amendment. In doing so, however, there are one or two points I wish to emphasize and I also wish to deal with a point raised this afternoon.

Some attempt was made to suggest a measure of inconsistency by reference to a motion made in the committee on defence expenditure on April 29 last by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness). The motion which has been referred to was a motion consisting of four paragraphs, one of which dealt with Mr. George S. Currie and the report he was to present. I submit that the way in which this reference has been introduced at this time is merely indicative of the extent to which the government and its supporters refuse to face the reality of the situation which is before us. Every device by which attention can be diverted from the real issue is employed by those who should be insisting upon a full inquiry if any of the arguments they made at that time in that committee had any real validity at all.

They opposed this motion for many reasons. They opposed this motion and voted it down in the same way that every attempt before that committee to get facts was voted down. But anyone with any desire to understand the facts would know perfectly well that the motion as presented contemplated the return of the report by Mr. Currie during the life of that committee a year ago. The motion could have had no other meaning and no other thought. That was a year ago. The government did not want that report then; its supporters on the committee did not want that then. This man they had appointed was going to conduct an inquiry which would answer all these questions. They chose that course. They have received that report which is before us; and now a year later they suggest that it is wise for them to follow a course which they considered unwise a year ago.

Their inconsistency is this. If they really wanted to get at the facts, then was the time to do it. But no; they welcomed the postponement. They received the report. They delayed as long as possible its presentation to this house. Then when the report is before us they seek, by every device possible, further to postpone action on this report and also to prevent the possibility of that wider inquiry which is the only thing that we really need now.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) has emphasized a point which might well be borne in mind by every hon. member of this house who will for a moment think of what we are really dealing with at this time. We are dealing with the preparation of the defences of Canada, the taxpayers' money, and the possibility of ending the extravagance, waste and theft disclosed by the Currie report. That is what we are dealing with. Every cent that is wasted; every cent that is lost by the theft of goods; every cent that disappears as a result of the wholesale looting which took place means added taxes to the people of Canada. That is one of the reasons why this matter calls for a wider inquiry into the whole field covered by the administration which invited theft and looting of this kind.

The hon. member for Vancouver East has pointed out that this resolution now before us does not refer the Currie report to the committee but that it refers, for prior consideration of the committee, the subjects dealt with by Mr. Currie in conducting his inquiry which was the basis of this report. If the hon. members of this house support this resolution, they should recognize the fact that they are passing a resolution which is designed to sidetrack the Currie report and to conduct another inquiry into the same area, although that inquiry was denied when the proposal was made by the hon. member for Calgary East before the defence expenditure committee on April 29 last year.

Let us once again recall what it is that is under consideration. A man with a distinguished record in the army in the first world war, with a high reputation as an accountant and with a respected reputation as deputy minister of national defence during the last war, undertook this task at the request of the government and conducted the inquiry they directed. They chose this great man, as they described him. We have accepted their estimate of that man. We are consistent in our acceptance of that estimate by saying that this man, with the qualifications which he possesses, should be permitted to extend that inquiry into the remaining part of the area of administration of the Department of National Defence which will expend this year over $2 billion of the taxpayers' money.

If that man was the great man described by the government, and if they accept even in a substantial measure the accuracy of his findings, then surely the first obligation of this government to our young men and young women in uniform and to the taxpayers whose money is being wasted and squandered, as disclosed in this report, is to appoint Mr. Currie to carry forward the investigation into every nook and cranny of a department whose administrative supervision of its responsibilities has broken down in the manner described.

That is what should be done. This motion is simply further delaying action by the government. It is drafted in a way that permits the government to sidetrack the report itself, to point to the wording of the report and say, "What you are told to consider in this committee is the subject matter that Mr. Currie dealt with, and to make your findings on that subject matter."

This house has debated the question for some time. Various opinions have been expressed. The answer of the government is, first of all, that the report of Mr. Currie in certain cases uses exaggerated language to describe events; and moreover, in so far as it makes recommendations, the government says in effect, "We have done most of these things that are suggested."

If this last assertion were so, then what earthly use would there be in having a further inquiry into a subject matter already covered by the report? Obviously if the government has acted, then that is finished business. The two arguments do not go hand in hand; it is one or the other.

The fact is that appropriate action has not been taken. The fact is that appropriate action has not followed the findings. The fact is that there is no assurance and that there can be no assurance in the minds of the people of Canada that this long inquiry by this highly regarded expert is to produce any effective results on behalf of the heavily burdened taxpayer, or for the men and women in the uniform of Canada who are serving in different parts of the world today.

The government may not welcome repetition; it may not welcome discussion of this subject; but once again I urge every hon. member to recognize the evasive way in which this motion has been drawn and to vote according to his conscience. May I also urge that even at this late stage in the debate the government accept its responsibility, its duty to the men and women in uniform, its duty to the people of Canada, and say that it will direct Mr. Currie, or someone of equal competence, to continue this investigation into the large area not yet touched, and make a report which can result in savings of scores of millions of dollars to the taxpayers of Canada, as well as greater efficiency in the administration of that department upon which our security depends.

Mr. Cruickshank: I was paired with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis).

Mr. Black (Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): I was paired. Had I voted, I would have voted in favour of the amendment.

Mr. McCubbin: I was paired with the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, no!

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I would be disappointed on rising to speak on an occasion such as this if I were not greeted with the groans that I heard a moment ago from the Liberal benches.

Mr. Graydon: Groans from the roans.

Mr. Knowles: My purpose in intervening in this debate once again is to have something to say about an issue which it seems to me is extremely important but about which very little has been said. Indeed, I doubt if anything has been said about it during the course of the debate at the various stages of the proposition under discussion. It is an issue with reference to defence expenditures concerning which there seems to be a sharp difference of opinion between the Auditor General and the Department of National Defence.

Earlier in the debate I had something to say about what I referred to as the blast by the department at the Auditor General. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) took exception to that language when he spoke on January 20, 1953. As recorded at page 1174 of Hansard, this is what he said:

> Now, sir, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to our uttering a blast upon receipt of the report of the Auditor General. There was no blast. The Canadian Press, the British United Press, and other sections of the press asked for comments on the background of the Auditor General's report and a statement was issued which gives some of the background.

Before I go into the specific question which is at issue between the Auditor General and the Department of National Defence, and which gives me concern, may I draw the minister's attention to the comments that appear in Arthur Blakely's column in this morning's Montreal Gazette with reference to the statement of the Minister of National Defence which I just read. In his column, "Ottawa Day by Day", Arthur Blakely says, after quoting the statement of the minister to which I have referred:

> But the explanation wasn't strictly accurate. Newspapermen who received the defence department statement criticizing the Auditor General hadn't requested one. It appeared out of the blue and was distributed long before most correspondents had received copies of the Auditor General's report but not before, evidently, the anonymous defence department spokesmen had received and scrutinized theirs.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I have obtained a copy of the document to which the minister referred. He entitled it "Background material". It is a mimeographed document of some eight pages and it is headed, "Department of National Defence, background material in connection with defence references in the report of the Auditor General for the year 1951-52". It bears no signature, and thus there would seem to be some point to Arthur Blakely's description of it as coming from anonymous defence department spokesmen who had had an opportunity to scrutinize the report of the Auditor General and prepare replies to his comments, which replies appeared in the press on the same day the press carried a story on the Auditor General's report itself.

Mr. MacInnis: How did it get into their hands?

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) wonders how that advance copy of the Auditor General's report, which report was tabled in parliament by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), got into the hands of these anonymous spokesmen for the Department of National Defence.

Mr. MacInnis: Another case for the mounted police.

Mr. Knowles: That is an inquiry that might profitably be pursued. However, my purpose in rising at this time is not to deal with these very interesting aspects of the matter but with a matter of real substance on which, as I say, there seems to be a difference of opinion between the Department of National Defence and the Auditor General. Before I go into that, may I say a few words of a general character about this mimeographed document entitled "Background material". I have no quarrel with any person, department or organization coming to its own defence when attacked; but it does get a bit monotonous to discover that, so far as the Minister of National Defence and his department are concerned, they are always right. It does not matter what complaint is made, it does not matter what criticism is levelled, there is always a perfect answer, so far as the minister is concerned. Therefore when the Auditor General's report was tabled in the house on Monday, January 12, that same day the press was put in a position to carry answers from the Department of National Defence to every paragraph in the report of the Auditor General that referred to that department.

The answers all make it clear, of course, that what the Department of National Defence had done was really all right or it was by understanding with the treasury board or that the matter had been sufficiently dealt with. However, let me get down to the issue in the dispute between the Auditor General and the Department of National Defence which I think is the most important one. It is found in paragraphs 56, 57 and 58 of the Auditor General's report which appear on pages 24 and 25 thereof. These paragraphs, the numbers of which I have just given, deal with several questions but in the main they deal with the manner in which the auditing of stores is conducted by the defence department. Mr. Watson Sellar, the Auditor General, points out in paragraph 56 (b) the following:

> Long-term usage is to regard stores as service property with responsibility for accounting and custody vested in various components of the service forces. The consequence is that no civilian authority answerable to parliament exercises direct control after procurement.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the light of what has happened, which we have been discussing in relation to the Currie report, and in the light of the importance of parliamentary control over monetary and financial matters, I submit that this is a very important question upon which the Auditor General has put his finger; namely, that the set-up in the Department of National Defence is now such that these stores, the purchase of which parliament authorizes, which can run into millions and hundreds of millions of dollars, are being checked and audited by a system which is removed from direct responsibility to parliament.

In the document to which I referred, and which I originally called a blast back at the Auditor General, the Department of National Defence makes it clear that Mr. Watson Sellar is perfectly correct in his analysis of the situation. It is made clear from both these documents that what we have is a situation something like this. The deputy minister of national defence is regarded as responsible only to see and to satisfy himself that the chiefs of each of the services, the chiefs of staff, have an auditing system which is satisfactory. Beyond that, the responsibility for auditing and the responsibility for the care of these millions and hundreds of millions of dollars worth of goods that have been procured rests solely with the chiefs of the various staffs. In other words, if I may quote the language of the Winnipeg Free Press which happens to be on the side of the Auditor General and against the Department of National Defence in this matter, the deputy minister by this set-up has been reduced to the status of an errand boy.

[Mr. Knowles.]

The Department of National Defence, in my view, completely missed the point in Mr. Watson Sellar's paragraph 56 (b), because their answer to it in "Background material" is just a very simple sentence which reads:

> The minister of the department is answerable to parliament for the stores held by the services.

It seems to me that is a very academic statement to make. The minister can stand up and say that he is responsible for everything that goes on in his department and all that sort of thing, but after the goods have disappeared, after it has turned out that the auditing system does not meet the scrutiny of an eye like that of Mr. Watson Sellar, or the scrutiny of Mr. Currie, it is not much use for the minister to say to parliament or through this memorandum that he is responsible.

The Winnipeg Free Press, as I say, deals very fully with this in an editorial which appeared in the issue of Saturday, January 17, 1953. It quotes in that editorial the main part of paragraph 56, together with some other material in that section of the Auditor General's report; and it also quotes the reply which was made by the Department of National Defence in its document entitled "Background material". After having quoted the pertinent paragraph from "Background material", the Winnipeg Free Press goes on to say:

> With all deference to whoever wrote the foregoing, it must be said that to discard, demote or nullify the deputy minister in this fashion, the present law notwithstanding, is a reversal of sound practice. Moreover, to exalt the chiefs of staff in this way is to revert to the commander-in-chief principle of military organization which consistently and disastrously failed in Great Britain and was finally abandoned early in the present century. To abolish this chief of staff mastery was, perhaps, the greatest achievement of the famous Haldane reorganization and reform of the British army. It is shocking to discover that such antiquated ideas of army, air force and navy organization not only exist but are in operation at Ottawa.

The paragraph in the material from the Department of National Defence which the Free Press is criticizing, in the quotation which I have just read, is a paragraph which reads in part as follows:

> The point which the Auditor General is endeavouring to make is obscure.

Well, right off the bat these anonymous spokesmen for the Department of National Defence admit that they did not understand the point that was being made by the Auditor General, so I do not see why they should so readily rush into print with an answer to it. They go on to say:

> Stores purchased for the Canadian forces may only be used for those forces except where parliament has given authority for their use for other purposes. Parliamentary grants do not distinguish between moneys for reserve stores and maintenance stores nor would it be desirable to segregate these for the reasons given with reference to audit note No. 56. In so far as a distinction between service and departmental accounting responsibilities is concerned, each chief of staff is responsible under the National Defence Act for the control and administration of his service.

That is the position taken by the Department of National Defence with respect to the care for these huge quantities of stores, that each chief of staff is responsible; not the deputy minister, not the minister, but the chiefs of staff.

Let me go on and indicate a point I made a moment ago, namely that the minister of the department takes the view that the only responsibility of the deputy is to be satisfied as to the kind of accounting system that the chiefs of staff are using. This is the position taken by the department:

If by departmental, the Auditor General has reference to the deputy minister and his staff, the responsibility of this officer extends only to an examination on behalf of the minister of the manner in which the accounting operations are being carried out by each service.

That is the statement, that is the view that is advanced of what is going on in the Department of National Defence which even the very Liberal Winnipeg Free Press cannot take and against which it has made the comment in the paragraph I quoted from that paper a moment ago.

I recognize that the language I used when I referred to this material as a blast may have been offensive to the minister, but it was not uncalled for. I am still puzzled as to how that department was in a position, so soon after the tabling of the Auditor General's report, to make these replies of theirs to points in the report. I am even more puzzled, if Arthur Blakely's comment is correct, over the fact that some newspapermen had this background material from the department, these answers to the Auditor General's report, even before they had the Auditor General's report itself.

Mr. Claxton: Might I clear that up?

Mr. Knowles: You mean right now and then I will go on? Certainly.

Mr. Claxton: We had inquiries during the morning from members of the press gallery as to background material, and that was being prepared during the afternoon. It was released to those members of the press gallery who had asked for it at 6 p.m. The report of the Auditor General was, of course, available to everyone at that time; and other members of the press gallery said well, we want copies too; so they were made available at that time.

Mr. Knowles: I am very glad to hear that explanation from the minister. He now tells us that the request for this information came to the department during the morning of January 12, and that the material was prepared and made available to them by six o'clock that evening. The Auditor General's report, of course, was tabled in this house at 2.30 o'clock that afternoon. Well, that is efficiency which we do not always find in the Department of National Defence, in that it was possible between 2.30 in the afternoon when that report was tabled and six o'clock to prepare and distribute an eight-page mimeographed document answering in technical language all the technical points set out in the Auditor General's report.

However, Mr. Speaker, I leave that part of the matter for those interested to pursue; but I do raise this matter of substance in the hope that the committee will go into it very carefully. It seems to me it may well be that one of the reasons we have had the scandals at Petawawa, one of the reasons we have had the things exposed that were revealed in the Currie report, is this kind of set-up with respect to these stores where there is that gap in responsibility between the civilian authority, namely the deputy minister acting for his minister on the one hand, and the chiefs of staff on the other. We urge very strongly that there should be no diminution of the practice of the principle of parliamentary control over the moneys we vote, and over the use of the stores that are purchased with that money. Parliamentary control of these stores must not disappear or be diminished in any way. That is what has happened as a result of this change in the set-up in the department. In my view the position should be changed back again at the earliest possible date, so there will be a complete responsibility for the auditing at the level where there is direct responsibility to parliament.

I recognize what this may mean in terms of more work at the deputy ministerial level. I realize what it may mean in terms of more work at the ministerial level. It may require more deputy ministers or it may require more ministers in the Department of National Defence, if this department is going to be such big business as it is. But in terms of parliamentary authority over these things there is a principle here that we simply must not let go. I recognize the tremendous amount of work and physical labour that must be involved when the minister has to sign his name hundreds of times every day. Even so, I think we were all amazed to have him tell us that he had not looked at any of the reports of the chief auditor in his own department, and that the deputy minister had looked at only a few of them.

When you add all those things together, that lack of concern in studying these reports and the fact that this gulf has been created between the responsibility of the minister and the responsibility of the chiefs of staff, you have a situation which I suggest may have helped create the open doors referred to in Mr. Currie's report. One of the things that interest me about the Auditor General's report is the way he can deal with very important issues in the most moderate language. I find, for example, that his language in paragraph 58 is most restrained. He says:

Once procurement has been completed, it is the practice in some commonwealth countries—

Implying there that it has not yet been recognized as the practice in Canada.

—to regard issues for immediate requirements of the services as outside parliament's concern; all other holdings are regarded as still of parliamentary interest.

Then he shows the basis upon which that decision has been taken in some commonwealth countries, but not in Canada. He goes on to say:

Should this view—

The view that there are certain stores that are beyond parliamentary concern.

—be regarded as suited to Canadian requirements, attention is drawn to the need for the establishing of a dividing line between service and departmental accounting responsibilities.

In other words, Mr. Sellar admits that government policy is not his business. He merely comments on what is happening, and government policy rests with the government and whatever it can get through parliament. It seems to me that paragraph 58, taken along with paragraphs 56 and 57, indicates very clearly that, so far as Mr. Sellar is concerned, he does not approve of this practice of drawing a line between the two types of stores and allowing this huge quantity of stores to get into places where it is beyond accounting scrutiny that is directly responsible to parliament.

It is that issue which prompted the Winnipeg Free Press, in its editorial of January 17, 1953, on the defence department, to express the hope that the practice now being followed will be changed. The Winnipeg Free Press says:

Whatever else it may do, "Background Material" proves conclusively that there are grave weaknesses in the present organization of the Department of National Defence."

This is what I am talking about now. For the moment I am not complaining against any persons. I am not even repeating my complaint about the attitude of the top brass, and that sort of thing. What I am talking about now is the organization. Perhaps the minister will say this is provided for in the new National Defence Act. The Free Press admits that may be the case, and says if that is so then the act ought to be changed. The editorial goes on:

Would it be asking too much of the members of the government that they study the Esher report, the Haldane reforms, such textbooks on military as those written by the late Spenser Wilkinson, the former Chichele professor of military history at Oxford and examine the present organization of the British army, air force and navy?

There is a long, interesting, and exceedingly rewarding history in this regard and quite clearly the structure of our defence department at Ottawa is faulty.

Army organization is not and should never be a party or political matter. It is not a case of votes or constituencies. The need is for efficiency in the armed services and "Background Material"—

That is this document which was prepared and made public on the day the Auditor General's report was laid on the table of parliament.

—indicates all too clearly that our air force, army and navy are organized upon lines which make efficiency unattainable.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the charges in that editorial in one of the most prominent Liberal newspapers in the country, the Winnipeg Free Press, provide an even greater challenge to the government, and to the defence expenditure committee, than the Currie report or the Auditor General's report. There is a clear suggestion that the organization that is now in effect, particularly with respect to the handling of these huge quantities of stores, in the words of the Free Press, "makes efficiency unattainable". I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the defence expenditure committee will go into this important phase of the matter and make appropriate recommendations back to parliament.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I merely wish to state why I shall be supporting the motion. This motion is actually for the purpose of setting up a committee which we have asked to have appointed for some considerable time. We will support the motion to set up this committee. In doing so, however, and in spite of the amendment which has been passed which ties the hands of that committee to some extent, I would hope that on this occasion the committee will make a serious effort to open up an inquiry into the accounts and not continue to be the kind of whitewashing committee which it has been in the past.

In view of the statement that has been repeated by members of the government to the effect that the defence expenditure committee has dealt with certain questions on certain occasions and found everything to be satisfactory, I should like to remind hon. members that no minority report is permitted from committees of this house. With respect to the defence expenditure committee, in many cases the majority reports have not represented the opinions of the members of other parties.

This is not the time to discuss the rules of the house. I would hope that before this committee deals with the subject matters which come before it and is ready to report, the government will give consideration to the advisability of making provision for minority reports. In this way there could be an expression of opinion on the part of those who seek to place before the house ideas as to the way in which changes could be made for the benefit of the people of Canada. This committee can perform a great service if it is free to do so. But past experience is not encouraging. I urge the government to take off the shackles and indicate its desire, so that the measure of the uniformity of opinion which has so often asserted itself on the part of members on the other side might conceivably assert itself again to the advantage of the people of Canada rather than to the advantage of this government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the main motion. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) moves, seconded by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), that a select committee be appointed, and so on. Shall I dispense?

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. Knowles: On the motion as amended.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes, as amended. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion as amended?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion as amended agreed to.

PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house may I now submit to you the names of those who are to make up the members of this committee on defence expenditure?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Weir moved:

That the following members compose the special committee on defence expenditure: Messrs. Adamson, Applewhaite, Benidickson, Bennett, Blanchette, Boisvert, Cannon, Cavers, Crestohl, Croll, Dickey, Fleming, Fulton, George, Gillis, Harkness, Henderson, Jutras, Larson, Macdonnell (Greenwood), McIlraith, Pearkes, Power, Stick, Thomas and Wright.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to do the arithmetic that one might like to do when those names are read out quite so fast. I might say that is no reflection on Your Honour for reading them quickly. But the question arises as to the make-up of this committee with regard to representatives from the various groups in the house. I would hope that we might be given some information as to how many of those named represent the government side of the house and how many represent the groups on the opposition side. Notwithstanding the general practice that committees conform, roughly, to the proportions of groups in the whole house, it is my strong view that this is a committee which is so important that it should be more evenly balanced. I made the suggestion earlier and I repeat it now—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I was listening to the hon. member carefully, and I do not think he is in order when he wants to discuss on this resolution the method whereby the various members are apportioned among the parties to which they belong.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I quite understand the position of the hon. member; but presumably the practice has been that the whips, to a certain extent, provide the names of those who will be members of the committee; I refer to the whips of the various parties. Then a motion is moved by the whip of the government party. If there are any difficulties as to the number by party, I would suggest that the matter might be discussed on a different occasion. At the moment what we have before us is a motion that the members whose names I have read out shall comprise the membership of the committee which was set up by the motion adopted just a moment ago.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, if we had in our hands the list of names which you have in your hand, I take it that it would be—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If I may do so, I should like to say this at this stage, following the remarks that have just been made by the hon. member. When the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir) asked for leave to introduce this motion setting out the names, at that stage the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre should have objected and asked him to wait until they appeared on the order paper. But he has not asked that; he has given his consent that this motion be made at this time. I therefore think that if he has any representations to make, he should make them later on. Does the hon. member wish me to read the names again?

Mr. Knowles: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is merely a formal motion, which I do not think is debatable.

Mr. Knowles: There is no point in the names being read again, Mr. Speaker. If Your Honour or the mover would allow the motion to stand until later, the purpose would be served. My point is this, and I will stick to it. The motion proposes certain names. On the motion proposing certain names surely it is in order for us to suggest that too many of those names are from one party, that some of them should be withdrawn and that names from the other side of the house should be put on in order to balance the committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Knowles: From the chorus on the other side of the house I take it that the proposal for an equal balance is not acceptable to the government members.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I tell the hon. member that what are being proposed are not certain names; the motion is that a gentleman designated by name and other members designated by name be members of the committee. If the hon. member wishes to be in order in discussing these names which are submitted, he must object to certain names being included in the list. Is the motion agreed to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT

PROVISION FOR APPOINTMENT OF ASSOCIATE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the National Defence Act to provide that the Governor General may at any time appoint an associate minister of national defence at a salary of ten thousand dollars per annum.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the motion agreed to?

Mr. Drew: I trust that the Prime Minister is going to explain the reason for this motion.

Mr. St. Laurent: I have a statement to make, Mr. Speaker. As the hon. gentleman knows, I have previously suggested that the time the motion that you leave the chair is made would not be the proper time for a statement to be made in support of the resolution. I do not want to enter into a procedural debate at this time, and if hon. gentlemen prefer that I make the statement now I am quite prepared to do so, merely suggesting that when the committee to consider the rules is carrying on its deliberations, attention be given to that point as to whether there should be two occasions for a debate on a resolution for the introduction of a bill. I understand that it might be the desire of the house that I make my statement before Mr. Speaker leaves the chair.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I think that procedure is desirable. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister has referred to clarification of the rules on this matter, I should like to make an observation on that point.

The motion before us is to the effect that, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that something be done. I submit that before the members of this house express their opinion whether it is expedient to do anything, they should know why it is expedient to do so. For that reason I think this is the occasion when the purpose of a resolution of this kind should be explained. At a later point undoubtedly it will be desirable that the details be explained and also the effect of the wording that may be introduced when the proposed legislation is before us.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that on November 24 last I laid on the table order in council P.C. 4553 which had been passed that day. This order designated the Solicitor General (Mr. Campney) as a person who, under the terms of section 5 of the National Defence Act, might exercise any power or perform any duty or function that is vested in or that may be exercised or performed by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). I think hon. gentlemen will find at page 15 of Hansard the statement I made on tabling that order in council. At that time I drew hon. members' attention to the forecast of legislation made in the speech from the throne, to provide for an associate minister of national defence. And as hon. members will recall I dealt with the desirability of having an associate minister of national defence, and foreshadowed the legislation to be introduced in consequence of this resolution. I have little to add to what I said on that occasion.

As I pointed out, a number of countries at the present time have, in addition to an overall minister of national defence, a minister for each of the three services, the navy, the army and the air force. That is the situation, I understand, in the United Kingdom, in the United States, in France and in Australia.

We have, however, considered it preferable in Canada to stress unification of the services for purposes of administration under the control of a single minister, a single department and a single deputy minister. We believe that our system has demonstrable advantages for this country, and that the appointment of separate ministers for each of the three services would be a retrograde step.

In the United States even today it is the view of the Hon. Robert A. Lovett, secretary of defence, who has just retired after quite a long experience in the defence department of that country, that the department has not had and still does not have sufficient power to bring about that degree of unification and co-ordination which was aimed at when their present national security act was adopted in 1947, or even when it was substantially amended in 1950.

In consequence of the course we adopted we have, I believe, gone as far to bring unification and co-ordination to the armed forces as have any of the free countries. While that is so, additional ways of developing unification and co-ordination still further are the subject of constant consideration.

As I said, it was hoped, and it was even expected, that the volume of work required of the minister would have become lighter as the defence program developed. That has not proved to be the case. Unfortunately the prolonging of the conflict in Korea, the build-up of our forces in Europe, and our relations with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, as well as greatly increasing the responsibilities of administering the department have also made it necessary quite frequently for the minister to be absent from the country. Our experience has shown that in a country like Canada the Minister of National Defence cannot administer the department and supervise the armed forces adequately by spending his whole time here in Ottawa.

Perhaps I should add a word or two to indicate just what there is to be administered and supervised. Reading on the globe, from left to right, as they do in photographs, we have the 25th Canadian infantry brigade in action in Korea, including various supporting units and details, back to the former capital of Seoul, where there are a number of units including a hospital, and then back to the base unit at Pusan, which is the main harbour.

To the west of Korea, in the Yellow sea, there are usually stationed three destroyers of the Royal Canadian Navy, making active contact with the enemy. They are based in Japan, over 100 miles to the east.

Not far back, at Kure, Japan, is the reinforcement group and other supporting details of the 25th brigade. At Kure also is the commonwealth division's hospital, with a number of Canadian doctors and nurses, and, unfortunately, several Canadian wounded men. Not far from Kure there are training grounds where officers and men receive final training before going up to the front lines. Some 400 miles to the northeast of this is Tokyo, where there is a leave centre, a recreation room, and joint staff mission. Here also is the Japanese end of the Far Eastern airlift of the R.C.A.F., which has supporting details at Shemya in the Aleutian islands, as well as at McChord field in the state of Washington.

Then across Canada we have the various administrative training and operational units of the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian army and the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Units of the navy train by being at sea, and of the air force by flying. Their training and operations have taken the R.C.N. and the R.C.A.F. into most quarters of the globe during the year.

However, resuming our glance from left to right, we come to the R.C.A.F. wing at North Luffenham and the depot at Langar in England. Also in England we have the joint staff mission and a very considerable number of members of all three services either on exchange duties or attending courses and taking training. In addition there are British and United States service personnel in Canada for similar purposes.

Then in Germany we have the 27th brigade located at three different camps around Hanover but often away in different parts of Germany on exercises. This year we hope it will take up permanent quarters of its own at Soest, halfway between Hanover and Cologne, and we shall establish base detail in Belgium.

In France there is a second wing of the R.C.A.F. at Grostenquin and the air division headquarters at Paris, soon to be established at Metz. We shall soon have a Canadian component in the 4th allied tactical air force of which our air division will form a part.

In Paris also we have our representatives, civil and military, to NATO, and a certain number of Canadian officers at SHAPE.

In a month or two we will have a third wing of the R.C.A.F. at Zweibrucken and later this year a fourth wing at Bad Solingen in Germany.

I mention this because today we have members of all three services engaged in the threefold task of supporting United Nations action in Korea, taking our part under the North Atlantic treaty and engaged in the defence of Canada, involving relations with more countries than ever has been the case for this country in war or in peace.

Canadian forces are in Korea, Japan, the United States, Britain, Germany, Belgium and France. This situation is new. We have to work out with all these, as we call them, "host countries" agreements regarding jurisdiction over civil and criminal matters, customs duties and other taxes, passport and immigration regulations, postal and transport arrangements, tenure of land and maintenance of buildings, and numerous other questions of the greatest complexity and importance. This has involved endless negotiation at every level, and I am glad to say that the arrangements we have made have generally proved quite satisfactory.

Largely because of the increasing importance of such matters, we found it necessary some time ago to appoint a chairman of the chiefs of staff committee. A large part of his time is devoted to dealing with matters of joint co-operation in NATO, and with other countries, at the highest service levels.

In addition to these matters which are to a considerable extent political, constitutional and legal, there are other matters regarding standardization, the exchange of information on development, research and doctrine, the development of channels of communication and co-operation which require attention not only at the service level but also at the political level.

In all this I may say Canada has taken a very considerable part, and there is every indication that this kind of work will increase rather than diminish.

Within Canada the basic program has been laid down, and I think and hope the majority of the contracts for construction and equipment has been placed. It now seems possible to see a clearer division between matters of policy and matters of administration or of the implementation of policy.

Therefore it seemed to the government that this situation would make it possible to have the responsibility shared between ministers, and that that could best be done by the appointment not of three ministers of defence over the separate services but of one associate minister of national defence. The minister and associate minister will work closely together in all matters. One will take the place of the other when the other has to be away attending conferences, visiting our forces abroad or in points in Canada away from headquarters. The experience of the present minister would indicate that this is apt to take about one-third of one man's time.

The main line of division will be that the minister will usually attend to matters having to do with defence relationships with the United Nations, with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, with countries of the commonwealth and with the United States. He will also usually take the initiative with respect to matters of policy within Canada relating to defence generally or to two or more of the three services.

The associate minister, in addition to carrying on the work of the minister when the minister is away, will keep more closely in touch with matters of administration relating to the services. If I may repeat, it is expected that the associate minister would act for and exercise the powers of the minister when the minister is away and deal with matters of administration relating to the three services, including requisitions for construction, equipment and supplies, submissions on similar matters to the governor in council and to the treasury board, control of the establishment, appointment and supervision of the civil employees and service personnel, approval of expenditures, orders, instructions and plans within the lines of agreed policy.

When they consider the magnitude of the task of presiding over the department hon. members will probably ask themselves why an associate minister was not designated before now. Certainly the question has been raised in a not altogether friendly fashion by at least one newspaper and perhaps also elsewhere. However, it will be recalled that immediately after the war, and indeed right up to the outbreak of hostilities in Korea, our defence program was less than a quarter of what it is now. In addition, we felt it desirable to emphasize as much as we could the unification of the services for administrative purposes. Even with the coming of war in Korea and the rapid planned build-up of forces for the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, it was not for some time that the pattern of our defence effort came to be worked out. There was much discussion and revision of plans and programs.

While the load of work borne by the Minister of National Defence was very great it was not clear, until the greatly enlarged program got under way, how best to divide the responsibilities of the defence department. We were not getting into a full-scale war but we were certainly into something which was not normal peace; and while plans for the build-up were being made it would not, I think, have been wise to divide the constitutional ministerial responsibility for meeting the many grave problems which arose from day to day in building up our defence forces.

Having now settled the main lines of our defence effort and having reached the principal decisions on policy, it has been possible to work out a plan for sharing the heavy load of responsibility in the manner envisaged in this legislation to provide for the appointment of an associate minister of national defence. I hope the plan will commend itself to the house.

Mr. Drew: Is the Prime Minister not going to explain to us why the act needs to be amended? That is what the motion proposes to the house, yet he has given no word of explanation as to why the act needs to be amended.

Mr. St. Laurent: The act needs to be amended because as it stands it provides that the governor in council may in an emergency appoint as many as three additional ministers of national defence; but only in an emergency. We do not think we are in the kind of emergency that would allow the governor in council to act under that statute and make appointments without further authority from parliament. We are now asking that, although there is not that kind of emergency, the governor in council may appoint an associate minister of national defence; and that while there is in office an associate minister of national defence the act which provides for the appointment of three additional ministers in an emergency be amended to provide for the appointment of two only.

Mr. Drew: I should like to ask one question before I make any further remarks. I understand the Prime Minister's reason for considering it expedient that we have this amendment is that the number should be reduced from three to one.

Mr. St. Laurent: The National Defence Act as it stands provides that in an emergency there can be an over-all minister of national defence and one separate minister for each of the three services. Here we wish to provide for the appointment of an associate minister of national defence who will not be identified with any one of the three services in particular but who will have powers that will extend to all three. We propose to ask the house to amend the provision in the statute by taking power to appoint an associate minister, even though there not be an emergency contemplated by the act. Secondly, we are asking to amend the provision which permits the appointment of three separate ministers by providing for the appointment of two only while there is an associate minister acting with the minister.

Mr. Drew: So that I may understand it, when the Prime Minister speaks of the emergency contemplated in the act, am I right in assuming that there is no difference between the emergency contemplated in this act and any other emergency?

Mr. St. Laurent: My understanding is that the emergency contemplated in the act is the kind of emergency defined in the War Measures Act; that is, the existence of war, actual or apprehended. We had quite a lengthy debate in this house when we introduced the first modified Emergency Powers Act immediately after the outbreak of war in Korea to take certain powers less than those that would result from the proclamation of the War Measures Act. We felt that there was not the kind of emergency existing at the present time that would authorize us to proclaim the War Measures Act or to exercise powers that are similarly to be exercised in the case of a situation described in the statute as an emergency.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has outlined the heavy duties that devolve upon the Department of National Defence, and has indicated the reasons which in his opinion support the contention that there should be an associate minister. But I submit that the amendment that is suggested is hardly supported by the arguments he has put forward. The reference to events in different parts of the world with which the Department of National Defence is connected does not in itself suggest a change in the situation which would support the need for an amendment of this nature at this time, unless there are some reasons which have not been placed before us.

I could understand an argument in favour of the appointment of a minister to deal with a specific service or to deal with specific duties in relation to the functions of the Department of National Defence. If the associate minister is, however, simply to have parallel duties to those of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), it seems that the purpose of the appointment—not the amendment but the appointment—is merely to give ministerial rank to a parliamentary assistant. The duties that have been described would be performed by a parliamentary assistant except in so far as attendance at cabinet meetings is concerned.

I doubt if any hon. member will question the fact that steps need to be taken to improve the situation. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said that many countries have ministers for each service. He has pointed out that this is the system adopted in the United Kingdom, the United States, France, Australia and other countries.

He did go on to say that the government believes our system has advantages in bringing about co-ordination. I should think we have had abundant evidence in the past few days that it has produced the very opposite. I should think we have had abundant evidence in the past few days that what we greatly need is some new definition of the duties of those who will be responsible for administration. If there is to be an additional minister, then I submit that one of the things which should be before the house is a clear definition of the responsibilities of that minister. If his real duty is to be that of an administrative official with cabinet rank, then I believe that should be before us in some detail when we say that it is expedient to introduce an appropriate amendment for this purpose. If on the other hand it is to deal with a particular service, then I think that should be before us.

I should think that great advantages could accrue from the appointment of a minister to a particular service, even if at the present time it is only to take over one service. Having regard to the fact that special emphasis is being placed upon Canada's development of its air defences, I can well see reasons why we should have a minister of national defence for air, or, if the minister is to be appointed under section 6 of the army act, an associate minister specifically appointed to deal with the administration of that branch of our military services.

I must confess that I find it difficult to understand how the government can contend on this occasion that there is no emergency and that the act must be amended for that reason, if it proposes to come before us at a later time in the session and suggest that there is an emergency which calls for the introduction of two other bills referred to in the speech from the throne. Either there is an emergency or there is not. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said that this provision was made at a time when we contemplated a special type of emergency. Then he went on to say—and while I do not purport to quote his exact words I am sure I am quoting their effect—that while we were not in a full-scale war we were certainly in something other than normal peace.

The only amendment, Mr. Speaker, that is contemplated by the motion before us, the only amendment it is suggested we should declare ourselves to believe it is expedient to introduce, is that the restriction that this can be done by order in council in time of emergency shall be removed and that there shall be a provision that at any time an additional minister can be appointed by order in council. I submit that if there is no emergency we should follow the normal method, and that a bill should be introduced to deal with the appointment of a new minister in the ordinary way. Otherwise it is open to the government to appoint a new minister by order in council at any time without the matter being submitted to parliament. If there is no emergency, then the ordinary procedure of creating a new ministry and describing its functions by statute should be employed.

If there is an emergency, then no amendment is required. Section 6 of the act as it stands is more than adequate for the purpose of dealing with the situation outlined by the Prime Minister. I should think that everything that has taken place in the house ever since we met this session would emphasize the need for the most exact procedure in dealing with all matters connected with the Department of National Defence. I do not think we should further increase the opportunity for informal proceedings and undefined authority.

For that reason I hope hon. members will realize that what we are asked to declare by this motion is that, in the opinion of the members of the house, it is expedient that at any time, without the house knowing anything about it, an additional minister may be appointed without the house having any opportunity to say whether or not it is wise and also without the house having any opportunity to say what the duties of that minister shall be. I hope that hon. members, with that before them, will oppose this motion.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) moved a resolution that it was expedient to introduce a measure to amend the National Defence Act.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I correct the hon. member? The motion that was moved was that the Speaker do now leave the chair. That is the motion.

Mr. Pearkes: That in committee we should discuss this resolution:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the National Defence Act to provide that the Governor General may at any time appoint an associate minister of national defence at a salary of ten thousand dollars per annum.

We feel this resolution unnecessary because we feel that the present act makes provision for the government to appoint such associate minister if the government so desires. We also feel that in the remarks made by the Prime Minister the duties of this associate minister were ill-defined, vague and not sufficiently specific.

I think it would be advisable to quote the actual words of the National Defence Act, paragraph 6 (1):

> The Governor General may, during an emergency, by a commission under the Great Seal appoint (a) not more than three additional ministers of national defence, each of whom shall exercise and perform such of the powers, duties and functions of the minister as may be prescribed by the governor in council;

That refers to the possibility of the appointment of additional ministers of national defence. When the Prime Minister was speaking, according to the notes I jotted down at the time, he said that the National Defence Act as it stands provides that in an emergency there can be an over-all minister of national defence and one separate minister for each of the three services. My interpretation of the act, as I have read it, is that it does not state definitely that these three ministers are to be allocated to each of the three services; because it says very distinctly:

> —each of whom shall exercise and perform such of the powers, duties and functions of the minister as may be prescribed by the governor in council;

My interpretation of the duties of those three ministers, if appointed, is not so circumscribed as the interpretation given by the Prime Minister this afternoon.

Paragraph 6 (1) (b) of the act reads:

> —not more than three associate ministers of national defence, each of whom shall exercise and perform such of the powers, duties and functions of the minister as may be assigned to him by the governor in council or the minister.

That is, if necessary in an emergency there may be appointed three associate ministers of national defence. Paragraph 6 (2) goes on to say that such minister—> —may be continued in office for not more than six months after the termination of the emergency during which he is appointed.

I must submit that a great deal of the Prime Minister's speech this afternoon indicated that an emergency does exist. He referred to the 25th brigade being in action in Korea, and outlined the various establishments which are maintained in the Far East, not only for the army but also for the navy and the air force. He went on to describe how our 27th brigade is stationed in Germany and how various units of the Royal Canadian Air Force are also stationed in Europe. He pointed out that we had units of our defence forces in Korea, Japan, the United States, Britain, Germany, Belgium and France. Those units of our defence forces, be they of the army or air force, are stationed in Europe because the dread of war hangs over Europe.

We find that we have Canadian troops in the Far East because there is real war. The illusion that there is only police action in Korea surely has been shattered when we realize that there have been over 1,200 Canadian casualties in Korea, of whom some 245 have been killed. Surely nobody is trying to maintain the myth that there is not war in Korea. Of course there is war, and real war, in Korea.

So far as Europe is concerned the raison d'être for our troops being in Europe is the threat of war; war is apprehended. In the definition of this act we are told that an emergency means war, invasion, riot or insurrection, real or apprehended. I do submit, then, that we are faced with real war in Korea and apprehended war in Europe. For these reasons I feel that there is an emergency, and therefore the paragraph of this act granting authority to appoint both additional ministers and associate ministers amply applies, and has applied for many months past. On that ground I feel that it is quite unnecessary to refer this resolution to any committee or to even present the resolution at all. I do not see how we can say on one hand there is war, and on the other hand that our troops in action in Korea are not taking part in active service operations there.

Then the Prime Minister referred to the fact that in a number of countries there were over-all ministers of defence. I believe he pointed to the United Kingdom, the United States, Australia and France as countries having over-all ministers of defence. He said also these ministers had under them subordinate ministers who were charged with the responsibility of supervision, administration and organization of definite services, or some specific job they had to do. For several years after the end of the last war, while the army and navy were combined under a minister of national defence, we still retained a minister of national defence for air. It is not, therefore, an unusual thing so far as this country is concerned, and so far as the policy of the present government is concerned, that there should be a separate minister for one or other of these services, with a definite job.

The Prime Minister said that it would be a retrograde step if we established separate ministers for each of the three services. I wonder whether the experience which has been gained by following this fetish of unification has really shown that the policy of unification at the top has been entirely successful. I believe we have had ample demonstration recently that it is impossible to have unification throughout the administration of the services. There may be unification or an attempt at unification at the top, but we have not made any great progress in unification in the middle. Only a few days ago we heard that there were eight different accounting systems. In fact, if I recall correctly, it was suggested that there was no great harm in having various accounting systems in the service, and that we should not strive after unification for unification's sake.

I am not at all sure we have not stressed too greatly this necessity for unification starting at the top. True, we are trying the experiment at the bottom as well. We have the three combined service colleges in which cadets of the army, navy and air force are studying together. I do not think we have gone far enough yet to say whether that experiment is entirely successful. We must have liaison and co-ordination, most assuredly. There has to be co-ordination between all three services; there is no question about that.

Surely the Minister of National Defence, who we have been told must spend a large part of his time away from Ottawa conferring with other countries—conferring with the NATO commanders; conferring with the United Nations and so forth—with his broad experience of what is going on in other countries would be in an admirable position to co-ordinate the activities of our three services. Because he is away from Canada so much, and because his duties take him into the realm of diplomacy, into the management of international relations, experience has shown that he has not had sufficient time to devote to the administration of all services, the army, the navy, the air force and the defence research council. We have found that there have been reports of failure in the administration. In fact, a great deal of the present minister's time has been taken up with the management of international relationships as well as the management of interservice relationships. I submit that he is in a position to be able to continue with the general supervision over all three of our services.

In order to help him along these lines he has, within the last couple of years, appointed a chairman of the chiefs of staff committee, to whom the Prime Minister referred. Under that chairman there are the chiefs of staff of the navy, army, air force and research council. There you have co-ordination at the top; liaison by the chairman of the chiefs of staff committee with the chiefs of staff of every service. As I see it the present minister is in a position to exercise that general supervision, being the over-all minister, in much the same way as the chairman of the chiefs of staff committee exercises general supervision over the chiefs of staff of the various services.

We do realize that it would be an enormous task for the present minister or any other minister to maintain the general supervision of all the services and carry on these international discussions and relationships. It is beyond human power to be able to do that. He does need, and has needed for a long time perhaps, additional assistants. He has been provided with parliamentary assistants for some time. Just how he has divided the responsibilities which are his amongst his parliamentary assistants is a matter for him to decide.

This afternoon we were told by the Prime Minister—and I use his words as closely as I could copy them down while he was speaking—that the associate minister would keep more closely in touch with matters of administration relating to the services, that he would keep in touch with the administration of the three services as well as acting for the minister when he was away. Of course, when one minister is away another minister always has to act in his place. Then the Prime Minister went on in a little bit more detail and said that, amongst his other administrative duties, he would be required to supervise requisitions for construction. As we know, there is a great deal of building going on for the three services. Construction is playing a big part and is taking a large portion of the money which is voted for defence purposes. The associate minister would also be responsible for supervision of civil employees in the department—of whom there are a great many—and also for appointments and for the approval of expenditures. There may have been some other details to which the Prime Minister referred but those are, in the main, the duties which he assigned to the associate minister.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is utterly impossible to separate administration from policy. If administration falls down, then the policy cannot be put into effect. Administration and policy go hand in hand; and it is exceedingly difficult to make one man responsible for administration and somebody else responsible for directing policy. I think everyone who has had any practical experience, either in the services or in business, will realize that policy and administration go together. I therefore foresee that there will be great difficulties confronting the associate minister of national defence if he is to devote his attention almost entirely to matters of administration.

It is essential that the load be taken off the present Minister of National Defence. I know that is the truth. In fact, in this house I suggested, I think about a year ago, that the present minister could not undertake all the responsibilities in connection with civil defence; and I am pleased that, shortly after that suggestion was made by me, the government acted on it and transferred the duties of civil defence to another minister.

One man can do just so much. It is an unfortunate practice that we sometimes have of overloading the willing horse. Hence I suggest that in the past we have been asking too much of our Minister of National Defence and that some relief was due him long ago. If that relief is long overdue, let us be practical, and let us see what is the best way in which we can relieve him of some of this burden which has overtaxed human ability.

We must realize that the present Minister of National Defence has shown exceedingly great ability. I do not hesitate to pay my tribute to him for all that he has attempted to do. He has had to try to take in the broad picture. By inclination he is extremely keen on administrative detail; hon. members can see that inclination evidenced in the reports he has made to this house. He has almost a mania for detail. He will come here and give us a large number of figures representing the amounts of money which have been spent by this and that department. He will have them at the tips of his fingers. I think he has shown on many occasions a remarkable ability in being able to point out the details connected with the various services. I am afraid that, by inclination, he is going to follow on with that mania. He loves detail, and it is going to be tremendously hard for him to divorce himself from administrative detail.

We are obliged to rely upon him to give us the over-all picture, and to deal with the immense problems of international relationships, interservice policy and so forth. But if he ties himself down to details as well, we are not going to have this country adequately served in that respect. If only loose instructions are given to his associate minister to look after administration I am fearful that, during the two-thirds of his time that the Minister of National Defence will be looking after affairs in Ottawa he will, by sheer force of habit, delve into matters of administration. Hence I foresee an associate minister of national defence charged with the responsibility of administration and a minister of national defence finding it extremely hard to divorce himself from the details of administration because, as I have already pointed out, administration and policy are closely interrelated. I therefore fear that we shall have confusion worse confounded and that we shall just go on muddling along; because if the division of responsibility, as defined by the Prime Minister today, is adhered to we shall have no clear-cut solution to the problem.

I should like to see this resolution reconsidered and provision made for a definite area of responsibility to be allocated to this associate minister of national defence. If any additional help is required for the minister, then let further parliamentary assistants be appointed. As was suggested this afternoon by the leader of this party, I would suggest that at this time we might well appoint a minister of defence for air.

Let us just look for a few minutes at the responsibilities a minister of defence for air would have.

To begin with, let us consider the amount of money that this house allocated in the main estimates during the last year for the defence services. For air alone there was allocated the huge sum of $929 million plus $577,891, a total of $929,577,891. The administration of that huge sum of money certainly requires that there should be a separate minister to look after that particular service. If it were just in the ordinary course of events that this large sum of money was being provided for our air service, perhaps the need would not be emphasized to the same extent as it is when one looks back and takes note of the amount allocated in the main estimates of 1951, at which time the sum of $252,842,836 was set aside for this purpose.

So we see here an enormous increase in expenditure for the air force, an increase in one year from $252 million to $929 million. These figures must give hon. members some idea of the tremendous expansion and increase in our air defence. Surely we will not say that we are going to have just a flash in the pan, or that we are not going to stress the air service in the future.

On various occasions in the house I have stressed the necessity of placing emphasis upon our air defence. We are particularly suited to play a large part in air operations. We have an enormous country which can be defended only by rapid movement from one part of the country to another. Our air services are essentially for the defence of the country. Not only are they for the defence of Canada, but also to fulfil our obligations in other parts of the world, notably those under the United Nations. We have an air division either in or about to arrive in Europe. I think some 12 fighter squadrons is the number that has been mentioned, and those squadrons are expected to arrive in Europe within the foreseeable future.

Then we have the NATO training scheme, in which we are inviting young airmen from other countries who have joined us in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to come to Canada so they may do their training here. We do this because we have the facilities for it.

We have our obligations in Korea where No. 426 transport squadron has been doing amazing work. As was disclosed recently, they have made over 350 crossings of the Pacific, both ways. They have flown over four million miles in transporting over 8,500 personnel.

Then, because of the stress being placed upon air forces the world over, the whole situation regarding air warfare is in a constant state of flux. Our responsible officials, be they service personnel or ministers of the crown, have tremendous obligations in order to keep up to date in matters of research, design and construction in connection with aerial warfare.

During the last war there was no question that Canada played a most effective part in aerial warfare. I think very few members in the house would question the statement that to a great extent our success was due to the energy and ability of the minister of defence for air of that time.

I feel the time has now come when we have to have a clear-cut understanding of the responsibilities and duties of this new associate minister, and that the logical, practical and realistic step to take is to say now, "We will revert to our wartime policy of having a separate minister for the air service," so that the activities of the air force with all its tremendous developments, and the administrative arrangements regarding personnel, as well as the provisions for modern types of aircraft with which it must be supplied, will be the responsibility of one individual.

In order to tie in those responsibilities and that development with the development and progress of our other defence forces, there would be the over-all minister of national defence, who would be able to spend his time dealing with his international responsibilities. Being relieved of air force responsibilities, and of the expenditure of these $929 million—almost half of the defence vote—with the assistance of such parliamentary assistants as he might deem necessary he would be able to look after the administration of the other two services, the army and the navy.

It is for these reasons we feel this resolution need not be submitted to a committee at this time. While we are opposed to the resolution for the reasons I have advanced, we feel it would be better to wait until the bill is before us to advance any amendments we may have in mind. I indicate to the Prime Minister the line of objection we shall take to the bill when it is presented, and I do this in the hope that he will give serious consideration to the arguments I have advanced, that he will realize the resolution is not necessary, that all the powers exist in the National Defence Act as it stands today, and that there is an emergency—and one cannot gainsay that there is a war in Korea and a war apprehended in Europe. If there is a real war in Korea and an apprehended war in Europe, an emergency exists. And if that emergency exists, then in the act he has all the power required to appoint whatever associate ministers he may need.

Finally I hope that a much clearer definition of the responsibilities of the associate minister will be placed before us. I do recommend with all sincerity that the simplest and most logical way of proceeding is to appoint either a minister or associate minister of national defence for air, and to divorce from the present minister all those details of administration, design, construction and development connected with the air services. I feel it will only add to the confusion if an associate minister is given responsibility in connection with administration, when his responsibility for general policy is limited.

I do not believe it will be possible for the Minister of National Defence to divorce himself entirely from matters of administration. I repeat that I hope the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will see that it is not necessary to proceed with this resolution. Secondly, I hope that when the associate minister is appointed his duties will be clearly defined and that he will be made responsible for one service. I submit that the air service is the logical one to be given a minister rather than confuse the whole question by giving him some vague, ill-defined responsibility over the administration of the navy, army and air services, the northwest system and all the other administration details of national defence.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I am prompted to enter the debate at this time after having listened carefully to the recital which the Prime Minister gave us before the recess of the duties devolving upon the Minister of National Defence. I think he opened our eyes; but perhaps he should also have told us that the Minister of National Defence handles nearly 50 per cent of the national expenditure. That is the responsibility of one man, whereas the other nineteen members of the cabinet look after the other 50 per cent of our national expenditure. It is the thought of the tremendous responsibility that is placed upon the Minister of National Defence that prompts me to say a few words tonight.

This department has always received the lion's share of our national revenue. As the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) just mentioned, the handling of this department has always been too much for one minister. I remember when this department was handled by my predecessor from Yale, the late Hon. Grote Stirling, in 1934 and 1935; and tonight I pay tribute to that hon. gentleman. He served for twenty years as a member of this house, and he acted also as minister of national defence. He gave of his best with untiring zeal during those twenty years. He was a fine gentleman, a good member of the house and a conscientious administrator. I still find in my correspondence reference to the work he did and the good deeds he performed. He passed away during last week end and I am glad of this opportunity to pay this tribute. He was honoured by all parties in the house.

It is with those thoughts in the back of my mind that I think of the heavy responsibilities that devolve upon the shoulders of one man. The division of duties will naturally be a contentious subject. We from British Columbia are pleased that one of our members has been selected as the associate minister, but at the same time we are not quite happy about the situation. The difficulty seems to me to be in the division of responsibility. From what we have heard, this responsibility will still rest upon the one man. He will have an associate to help him, but previously he had a parliamentary assistant. He is not a great deal better off.

I think we as members of parliament should place direct responsibility on all our ministers. I do not care whether the department is divided into four ministries, but I do feel that the army, navy and air force require separate ministers. I should like to see consideration given to the appointment of a minister to handle administration matters, to clean up the mess exposed by the Currie report. I think it would be money well spent to have a minister to do nothing else but look into the bookkeeping system, the storage system, the security system, and to be personally responsible for those matters. Then other developments in the army, navy and air force could be under separate associate ministers if you wished. I realize that this may mean greater expenditures; but when you consider that half our national income is spent by this one department under one man, and the other half by the other nineteen members of the cabinet, I think the expenditure will be found to be justified.

That is all I have to say. I am not going to criticize the appointment because we from British Columbia are pleased with it. I think we have as good a man as we could find to fill the position. But I sincerely believe that definite responsibility should be placed on this individual rather than to make him just a glorified parliamentary assistant with increased pay.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I agree that an associate minister will be of great assistance to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), although I contend there should be a more definite division of duties than was laid down this afternoon by the Prime Minister. I should like to see the new minister named as minister of air or as minister of air and navy, whichever is practicable, so there would be a more even distribution of responsibility.

This afternoon the Prime Minister said he did not like that kind of division because they were trying to retain as much unity as possible among the various branches of the service. But I would think if a break in that unity brought about increased efficiency it would probably be a good thing. If such a move would mean greater efficiency, then by all means we should have that definite break and have the duties of each of these ministers clearly defined.

We do not like to see a glorified parliamentary assistant in this post. We want to see a minister with definite duties. We want to see someone who can assume responsibility for certain branches of the department. I shall have to agree with the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) in disagreeing with the method proposed by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister says that he does not believe there is an emergency, and therefore he does not have the power under the act to appoint other ministers.

I do not know whether I would agree with the Prime Minister that there is not an emergency. Our boys in Korea feel that there is some sort of emergency or they would not be fighting there. If the government is not willing to accept the fact that we are in a state of emergency, surely they will agree that at least the Department of National Defence is in a state of emergency. The events and debates of the last few days I think prove that pretty clearly.

If we are in a state of emergency then the government has the power to create one minister or three ministers, whichever number is needed. If there is no emergency then I am afraid I cannot agree that this is the type of action that should be taken. The position of the new minister should be created by statute and not in the manner that has been set forth in the house today.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a very few words, really to follow up what has been said by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes); but first I should like to make one or two general comments on the Prime Minister's speech. As I listened to the Prime Minister describing to us in his quiet persuasive tones the reason for the appointment of this new minister; as he described the scope of the duties of the present minister; as he took us from the front line in Korea to Pusan, to the destroyers in the sea of Japan, to the Aleutian islands, to Canada, to Britain, to Germany, to France and described in great detail—and I am sure accurately—the scope of the duties of the present minister, I said to myself: Is this really the month of January, 1953? What has been happening in the last two and a half years since July, 1950, when in effect the enormous nature of the commitments which we had undertaken became clear?

If the Prime Minister was trying to demonstrate to us that it was utterly impossible for one man to undertake these duties, I think he succeeded admirably; and the only thing I would say to the Prime Minister is that for many many months we on this side in our small way have been trying to persuade the government that that was so.

Mr. St. Laurent: You are always right on your side.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, we are not always right but we are sometimes right. We do not even suggest the government is always wrong, although they are sometimes wrong. What I want to come back to is that the government has taken advantage of the insatiable appetite for work and the insatiable energy of the Minister of National Defence; and in my opinion the government, and the Prime Minister at the head of it, are grievously to blame for the disorganization about which we now know, a disorganization which is demonstrated by the Currie report and which, if Mr. Currie could only investigate the whole of the expenditures instead of one one-hundredth, would be demonstrated even more.

[Mr. Thomas.]

We come now to this situation. I repeat that I think the government and the Prime Minister at the head of it are grievously to blame. Now the thing is to be set right; and how is it to be set right? Well, it seems to me that we are perhaps going from the frying pan into the fire. It seems to me we may be falling between two stools instead of falling off one stool. It seems to me that the outline of the duties that has been given does nothing whatever to indicate that there will be a clear-cut division. We were told by the Prime Minister this afternoon that the Minister of National Defence will usually look after duties A, B and C, let us say, and the associate minister will usually look after duties D, E and F, and that when one minister is away the other will look after his duties.

That is all right so far as it goes, but I submit it still leaves us in exactly the position outlined by the hon. member for Nanaimo, namely that there is no clear-cut definition of duties. We will still be in the position where energy and courage are asked to do the duty of organization. We have now found defects in the organization. We hoped that when the Prime Minister brought forward the resolution there would be evidence that there was now going to be some clear thinking to set this thing right. So far as I can see that evidence is not there. So far as I can see we are going to go on with the same vagueness, the same want of organization.

I hope, as the hon. member for Nanaimo has said, that the government will see fit to take another look at this matter. I hope in particular that they will accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Nanaimo, with all his experience and knowledge of these matters, as to a minister for air. In general it seems to me that he has made suggestions which, if we are single-minded in trying to correct this situation, the government might very well consider.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I want to make it quite clear that as far as this group is concerned we believe that the principle behind the resolution is good. We believe the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) is in need of some assistance at this time. As a matter of fact, we think such assistance should have been given much earlier. We agree that when we sent our troops to Korea in the first place we did not expect that the war would drag on for two years, and that we probably thought then there might not be an emergency. But surely when we decided to become partners in NATO and to send a brigade to Europe, when we added to the responsibilities of the minister that of meeting the chiefs of staffs of other countries and of consulting with the joint defence board set up in conjunction with the United States, it must have been apparent to the government that some assistance was necessary.

It should have been apparent to the government when our spending in this department practically tripled in one year that some assistance was necessary for the Minister of National Defence. Everybody agrees that the minister has done all that it was humanly possible for one man to do, but even that was not enough in the light of the tremendous responsibilities that devolved upon him so far as the increased expenditures and increased tensions in the world today are concerned. As I say, we agree with the principle that the minister should have assistance, but we do think it should be done in a somewhat different way than is being suggested.

In introducing the resolution the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) stated in a general way the division of responsibilities between the associate minister and the minister. He said the associate minister would be responsible for administration while the minister would be responsible for policy decisions and for attending international conferences and other meetings which our ministers of national defence must attend. That is not enough. When a government in this country appoints a minister of the crown and pays him the necessary emolument for that position, it seems to me that the minister as a member of the cabinet should be responsible to parliament for certain well-defined duties. After all, we still have a parliament, and it is parliament that is responsible to the people of the country, not the government alone.

How is parliament to hold the new minister responsible unless he has clearly defined duties? Therefore we say that in making this appointment the Prime Minister should clearly define the responsibilities that the associate minister is going to have. Surely there is some way in which the responsibilities involved in the Department of National Defence can be divided. Surely the matter of procurement and stores is a responsibility which might be given to the new minister at this time, because we are procuring tremendous quantities of goods and supplies not only for our armed forces as they are today but as they may be in the future. Surely there should be somebody directly responsible for that.

I am not going to try to define what division of responsibilities the government should make, but I say it should be clearly defined to parliament so that parliament can hold the minister appointed, whoever he may be, responsible for certain specific duties that he will have to perform as a member of the government. The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) has suggested that the new minister might be made minister for air. That is a reasonable suggestion. In our defence department air responsibilities have always been great, in the last war and since the last war. We have taken on additional responsibility for the training of personnel from other parts of the NATO partnership, and those responsibilities are great.

I am not trying to say what the duties of the associate minister should be, but I do say they should be clearly defined by parliament so that when that minister is appointed parliament can hold him responsible for well-defined duties, as other ministers of the crown can be held responsible for their departments.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): I merely want to support the hon. and gallant member for Nanaimo with regard to a minister for air. If there is any way in which we —and I say "we" in the way the board of trade or chamber of commerce said "we as the third trading nation of the world"—have any responsibility in particular, it is our responsibility in the air. We have only a small population, and mass armies and large manpower are not for us. They can never be for us with our small population.

In two wars the Canadian genius showed us to be supreme in the air. I think the percentage of Canadians in the Royal Air Force and the Royal Flying Corps in the first war, and the Royal Air Force and the Royal Canadian Air Force in the second world war, was out of all proportion to our population. It is for that reason, for the logistics in the matter —one might almost say the geopolitical side —and also because of our peculiar genius for work in the air, that we should give special attention to it.

As has been said, expenditures for air defence have increased from a quarter of a billion to nearly one billion dollars. Not only have the expenditures increased; the technological progress in the air has increased at a very rapid rate and it is continuing to increase at even an accelerated rate at the present time.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that a minister for air, with the specific job of co-ordinating and co-operating with the air arm of the defence services, is an absolute necessity. Let us take what has happened recently. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) was away attending a NATO conference. While he was away the Currie report was brought down and there was a great deal of confusion in the department. To have had a minister for air, or another defence minister, would have tremendously reduced that confusion and steps might have been taken immediately, rather than to have the very unfortunate time lag and time waste which took place.

So I say that a minister for air, not only because of our small population but because of our geopolitical position and because of the genius of Canadian people for work in the air, is an absolute necessity.

I feel that unification of the armed services is ideal, but it has never been effectively worked out in the United States or in the United Kingdom. Despite all high level conferences and all attempts to work out unification of defence forces, they still form themselves into three essential services. I understand it is the United Kingdom practice, and I think it is desirable, that a member for each service is appointed whose job is purely of a technical nature. He has the responsibility of reporting on technical matters directly to the cabinet, thereby taking off the shoulders of the ministers, who have other responsibilities in the house, the details of the technical problems of the services. I have been informed that that system has worked very well and has relieved ministers of a great many of these technical problems for which they have not been trained. So, Mr. Speaker, while the problem is to take as much of the technical responsibility and essential detail off the shoulders of the minister, I also feel that if we are increasing the cabinet it is essential that we increase it by a specific minister with specific duties. I suggest, in our peculiar position, a minister for air is one of the essential additions we should make to the cabinet.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, if this is a motion on which I am not entitled to reply—

Mr. Speaker: This is not a substantive motion and is not one on which reply is allowed by the rules, but with unanimous consent of the house—

Mr. St. Laurent: No. I will have an opportunity in committee.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, had it not been possible for me to have this opportunity at once, I would have asked for the unanimous consent of the house to express to the hon. and gallant member for Nanaimo my sincere appreciation for the well-merited tribute he paid so generously, in a non-partisan fashion, to the ability, energy and devotion to duty of the Minister of National Defence. As a citizen of Quebec, I would also like to thank him for the equally generous and well-deserved tribute he paid to my old colleague from Quebec, now the dean of this House of Commons, for the service he was able to render to his country and to his fellow citizens during the last war as minister of national defence for air. It is refreshing to find that we have these sentiments, and that party affiliations have not prevented us from giving expression to them when there is proper occasion for doing so.

I think it was quite refreshing also to hear the tribute paid by the present member for Yale (Mr. Jones) to the nobility of character and the service rendered to the country by the former member for Yale, though they were not of the same political allegiance. I am sure that all hon. members who had the privilege of being fellow members of the late Hon. Grote Stirling were deeply gratified that there was this opportunity of paying a tribute to his memory, which we all would have been delighted to pay as soon as we learned of his death if it had not been contrary to the usual practice in this house, which is to refer only to those who are still members of parliament.

I believe there has been general agreement that there was occasion for assistance in some form in the discharge of the heavy responsibilities that now weigh upon the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). There has been a suggestion that under the terms of the National Defence Act the same thing could have been done by the governor general in council without coming to parliament. Perhaps those who hold that view are right. Perhaps the present situation is as defined in the National Defence Act as an emergency, which means war, invasion, riot or insurrection, real or apprehended. We did not feel that there would be unanimity over such a construction of the present facts. If the governor in council had the right to do it without coming to parliament, it was thought parliament would not feel that it was offensive to ask parliament to state by statute, because this is to be a statute, that under present conditions one of the three authorized by the act might now be appointed.

As to the division of duties, the hon. and gallant member for Nanaimo suggests that a more clear-cut division would be the appointment of a minister for air. I have pointed out the distribution of our forces at the present time, and it is almost impossible to have separated the civil administration of these units belonging to the three different services. The arrangements that are entered into with the host countries, where there are members of our forces, are arrangements that apply to all the members of our forces who may be there. These arrangements are very closely connected. The arrangements we make for the establishment of airfields and barracks at Grostenquin have a bearing upon like arrangements that are being discussed for barracks in Germany or barracks in Belgium. We are now fourteen allies in this North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and we are trying to adopt a pattern that will suit the purposes of all. These arrangements have to be negotiated and dealt with by one minister for the three services. I hope there will not be confusion in the performance of the work that has to be done by the minister and the associate minister.

The hon. gentleman says that the Minister of National Defence has a passion for doing it all, or for seeing to all that has any bearing upon that for which he is responsible. Well, that is no doubt a fault, in one aspect, but it is one to which I have to confess, too. But I find that in other aspects it is not altogether unfortunate that one can take details into account. After all, a nation is made up of individuals, and the implementation of policies is made up of an infinity of various small actions. The hon. member knows better than I do that the credit brought to this country by the performance of our armed forces during the last war was the result of the sum total of individual action of individual men and women, and the whole was magnificent because each small part had been regarded as important and an essential contribution to the whole picture.

I trust that there will not be such an amount of attention devoted to detail as will prevent one from seeing the forest itself as well as the trees. The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) says there should be something specific for which the new minister will be responsible. The new minister, like all his colleagues, will be constitutionally responsible for everything that will have taken place in that department as well as in any other department of government. I have made no answer to the oft-repeated assertion that, in connection with the irregularities disclosed by the Currie report, each member of the government was constitutionally responsible. That is the doctrine and will continue to be the doctrine, not because I admit it but because it has come down through the traditional development of parliamentary institutions.

I hope the manner in which this will work will prove a very great alleviation of the heavy burden the present minister has to carry, and will make it humanly possible, within the twenty-four hours of each day of a man's life, to have closer supervision of all the incidents connected with the expenditure of money appropriated by parliament to perform this job. I am sure the whole Canadian public wants to see it performed, but performed as efficiently and as economically as it can be performed under the best possible supervision.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, there is no occasion to extend the debate in committee. The bill will come before the house and it will be possible then to discuss it. I would point out, however, that nothing the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said in any way deals with what was placed before the house by the hon. member for Nanaimo, who has pointed out the need for clearly defined duties on the part of the minister to be appointed and has recommended the appointment of a minister for air. That course would be consistent with the practice in every other major country which carries on under the same system as ours or one similar to it.

In disposing of this matter at present, we leave it in the position that we will discuss it when the bill comes forward; but in view of what has been said with regard to this matter by the hon. member for Nanaimo, the hon. member for Greenwood and others, I would hope that the Prime Minister would review the situation and consider the advisability of following the course that has been suggested.

Far from a satisfactory situation prevailing there is one of confusion and great waste of public money which needs to be dealt with. That was the purpose of the suggestions that were made—as well as the welfare and efficiency of the armed forces—and which were put forward clearly, and with great understanding of their need, by those who advocated this course. The detailed discussion of this subject can take place on the bill itself, but I hope that the government will still reconsider the course they are proposing to follow.

Mr. Pearkes: Is it the intention of the government to provide an additional deputy minister? Section 7 of the National Defence Act provides that, where additional ministers or associate ministers are appointed, additional deputy ministers may also be appointed. If there are going to be two ministers working through the one deputy minister, it seems to me that you are going to have a difficult bottleneck.

Mr. St. Laurent: The department at the present time has one deputy minister, one associate deputy minister overseas and one associate deputy minister here in Ottawa. I would not want to commit the government to a policy of not making further appointments, but up to the present time no consideration has been given to the appointment of additional deputy ministers.

Mr. Pearkes: There is no amendment to that effect?

Mr. St. Laurent: No.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 103, to amend the National Defence Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

JUDGES ACT

SALARY FOR ADDITIONAL JUDGE OF SUPREME COURT OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Judges Act, 1946, to authorize payment of a salary for an additional judge of the Supreme Court of British Columbia.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister say just a word as to the necessity for this resolution?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, the necessity for it arises from the fact that the legislature of the province of British Columbia has created a vacancy for the appointment of an additional judge of its supreme court. The purpose of this amendment to our Judges Act is to give us power to make an appointment to that vacancy so created.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Garson thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 104, to amend the Judges Act, 1946.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall this bill be read the second time?

Mr. Knowles: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Garson: Might I speak to that point, Mr. Speaker? Before we agree to amend our Judges Act in order to authorize the appointment of an additional judge in any province, it is our practice in the department to ask for the production of statistics showing that the case load of the province amply warrants the additional assistance of another judge. That practice was followed in the present case. The statistics we received proved beyond any question that an additional judge was required, and we proceeded on that basis. Just within the past few days the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of British Columbia has had to go away for the purpose of an operation. This fact will leave the bench still further short. If there is no objection, I would ask the indulgence of hon. members that we might pass this bill through all of its readings tonight in order that we can appoint a judge quickly, owing to the fact that the bench is short as a result of the illness of the Chief Justice.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Has any request been received from the government of the province of British Columbia to have this bill go through right away?

Mr. Garson: Yes, indeed there has been a request, not only from the Chief Justice himself but from the acting chief justice. He wrote me a letter just a few days ago.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that the second reading take place now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Garson moved the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. Garson moved that the house go into committee on the said bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: Before you do that, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that hon. members have not the legislation before them. I do not think it is a matter of any importance but, before we agree, if at this stage the minister could just give us details as to the form of the legislation and its effect, we would know what we are agreeing to.

Mr. Garson: Certainly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The motion for second reading has been carried. Therefore I must leave the chair so this bill may be considered in committee of the whole. If the hon. member does not object, perhaps the minister could give a further explanation of the bill when we are in committee of the whole.

Mr. Fulton: That will be satisfactory.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Then is it agreed that I do now leave the chair, and that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on the said bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Knowles: Is this bill very long, or can the minister read the bill in full?

The Chairman: According to the rules, the chairman is supposed to call the first section and, if necessary, to read it.

Some hon. Members: Read it.

The Chairman: It is as follows:

Part I

1. Paragraph (d) of section 13 of the Judges Act, 1946, chapter 56 of the statutes of 1946, as enacted by section 3 of chapter 52 of the statutes of 1951 (first session), is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(d) Eight judges of the supreme court, each ..... 14,400.00".

The marginal note for section 1 is as follows:

Salaries of judges of court of appeal and supreme court of British Columbia.

Then part II is as follows:

Part II

2. Paragraph (d) of section 13 of the Judges Act, chapter 159 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(d) Eight judges of the supreme court, each ..... 14,400.00".

The marginal note for section 2, part II, is as follows:

Salaries of judges of court of appeal and supreme court of British Columbia.

Then section 3:

3. This part shall come into force, and part I is repealed, on the day the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, come into force.

And the marginal note for section 3: "Coming into force; repeal."

On section 1—Salaries of judges of court of appeal and supreme court of British Columbia.

Mr. Knowles: May we take it, then, that the only change being made by the bill is to increase the number of judges from seven to eight? Possibly the nod of the minister's head could somehow be reproduced in Hansard, perhaps by the offset process.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend will notice that I was nodding my head up and down, and thus signifying agreement with what he was saying. The second part read by the chairman is placed in the bill for the purpose of having it dovetail with the new revised statutes. But so far as the substance of the bill is concerned it provides only for one more judge in the British Columbia supreme court.

Mr. Graydon: Is there any great reluctance out there on the part of people to take this extra job?

Mr. MacInnis: I was not in the chamber when the Minister of Justice was giving his reasons for the bill. I should like to know if there is any backlog of court cases in British Columbia that are not being dealt with because of a shortage of judges. I imagine that is about the best criterion we could apply as to the need for an additional judge or judges.

Mr. Garson: With deference to my hon. friend may I say that the volume of writs issued and cases tried perhaps would be an even more accurate indication of the need for a new judge. I have the figures showing the number of writs and petitions in 1942. There were 669 writs and 525 petitions, making a total of 1,194. In 1949 the writs had risen from 669 to 1,882, and the petitions from 525 to 921, for a total of 2,803 instead of 1,194. Then in 1951 the total had risen from 2,803 to 2,981. And in 1952, for only seven months—and these are the final figures for only those months, because we have to secure them from the whole of the province and there is some lag—there were a total of 3,248 writs and petitions for only seven months as compared with 1,194 for the whole twelve months as recently as 1942.

Then the figures for cases heard show that in 1942 there were 226; in 1948 there were 478; in 1951 there were 597 and for seven months of 1952 there were 440.

In 1942 there were 5,165 motions in chambers, whereas in 1952 there were 8,195.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What was the change in the number of judges during that period of time?

Mr. Garson: One more. My hon. friend will recall that one was added a year or so ago. So they are certainly working a lot harder than they were ten years ago, even with this new judge. Then to continue with these figures: In 1942 there were 973 undefended divorce actions; in 1949 there were 1,572; in 1951, there were 1,554 and in 1952, 1,134.

In 1942 there were 598 lawyers in the province, while in 1952 there were 1,024.

Mr. MacInnis: Perhaps to a lawyer the figures the minister has given would be a satisfactory answer to the suggestion that another judge be appointed. Perhaps, however, there is another answer; that prior to this time the judges really did not have much to do, and that they could deal with twice as many cases as they were dealing with before. I do not think they work a great deal of overtime—and would the minister please let me finish before he interrupts?

This may not be a very convincing argument, but it will be better if I have a chance to complete it at this time.

In all walks of life today—and I am not suggesting that it should be carried too far in court procedure, because that is something that should not be unduly hurried, and cannot be done on an assembly-line basis—people are doing more work in less time than they did before. If the minister would speak to a logger who worked in the British Columbia woods twenty-five years ago and to another who works in those woods today, he would find out that there is a great deal of difference in the amount of work each logger did.

I agree that there is another side to the matter, that the population of British Columbia has increased tremendously in the last few years. That would possibly be as good a reason as any as to why there is more work. But the actual figures the minister gave may mean, as I said before, that in the recent past the judges did not have much to do. Now, when there is some work to do, they should not be so insistent upon getting further help.

Mr. Garson: The point the hon. member has raised would be a good one if I did not have an answer for it. However, we do not appoint judges merely because we are asked to do it. We have to be shown that there is a need. Among other things we ask the question as to how much work the judges are doing. The answer to that question reveals that while in 1942 the seven judges did 1,332 sitting days' work, or an average of 16 days per month each, in 1952—

Mr. Graydon: I do not think the judges would agree with you on that.

Mr. Knowles: How many months a year?

Mr. Garson: In 1952 the average number of sitting days per judge per month was 16; in 1952, on the basis of eight judges, it would be 26 days, or on the basis of nine judges, including the chief justice, it would be 23 days. It will be seen therefore that there has been a substantial increase in the amount of work they do.

Mr. Fulton: I think the minister might make his statement a little clearer. Unless I am mistaken, when he makes reference to 16 days and 23 days he means the days on which a judge would be sitting in court. But we must remember that a judge must do his homework, write his judgments and so on.

Mr. Garson: The point raised by my hon. friend is quite correct. I had thought that this would be quite obvious. The court officials have no way of keeping track of how much time a judge spends in doing his homework. They can just keep track of the time he spends in court. I was giving the sitting days only. I do not know what percentage of his time a judge would spend writing judgments and so on, but I am sure it would be substantial.

Mr. Cruickshank: If this bill passes, which I presume it will, is there any set date by which the appointment must be made?

Mr. Garson: If this bill passes, as I hope it will, the desire will be to have the appointment made as soon as possible, because we want to get the new judge working right away.

Mr. Cruickshank: I just wanted to point out that if the appointment is held off until after the election the services of the hon. member for Kamloops will be available.

Mr. Fulton: After the election there will be more chance of a Conservative government being in power.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not believe the minister has given us the details of the arrears. I think the hon. member for Vancouver East ought to be satisfied that the judges are not actually doing six or seven times as much work as they did in 1942. If the figures are available, I think we should have the number of cases in arrears awaiting judgment. Has the minister any comparative figures relating to other provinces?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I have, but I think it would be most undesirable to give them unless an application were being made by the other provinces for the appointment of a judge. The figures I have indicate that on a comparable basis the need for an additional judge in British Columbia is substantial. I feel that will answer my hon. friend's question. I would not feel free to put the figures for another province on the record unless that province was urging the appointment of a judge.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Has the minister the same feeling with regard to comparable figures as to cases awaiting judgment?

Mr. Garson: You mean arrears?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes.

Mr. Garson: I have no figures as to arrears. I understand from the fairly lengthy exchange of correspondence which took place between myself and the Chief Justice that the arrears in British Columbia are not substantial. The judges have been working very hard in order to keep up with their work. I do not think the arrears are necessarily a good criterion because if a court is not being carefully run and if the case load is not being properly distributed, it is quite possible to build up considerable arrears when the judges available should with proper distribution be able to handle the load. I think the real test as to whether another judge is needed is the increase in the volume of work and the number of sitting days each judge puts in.

The figures I put in indicate that these judges are carrying a heavy load. They have to do a lot of homework in addition to their sitting days in court. If by hard work they have kept themselves free from an accumulation of reserved judgments, the fact remains that they still need additional help.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not question the fact that most judges work very hard, but the figures given by the minister seem to leave one question in my mind. If I understood them correctly, they appear to show that the judges seem to be trying about five times as many cases as formerly. If there is any answer that can be readily given to that, I shall be interested to have it.

Mr. Garson: I think the hon. member for Vancouver East has put his finger upon part of the explanation. The case load in 1942 may have been on the low side. Since then there has been an increase of about 40 per cent in population and the number of lawyers has nearly doubled. From being on the low side, the case load is now on the high side and an additional judge is needed to take care of a load which is heavy and still increasing. Even with an additional judge these judges will be working quite hard.

Mr. Applewhaite: I think there is one aspect of this matter which has not been recognized by hon. members. Not only has there been a great increase in population in British Columbia, the picture has changed greatly as to distribution of population. There are now large and prosperous communities in the north and in other parts of the province far away from existing centres of population. While not a practising lawyer I know from contacts I have made that there is considerably more work for judges on circuits, more need for them to spend a great length of time away from Vancouver and Victoria. Therefore the amount of time spent by a judge in carrying out his duties would not be accounted for entirely by the number of cases on the docket.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT AFFIDAVIT TO BE SWORN BEFORE A NOTARY OR A COMMISSIONER

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 9, to amend the Canada Evidence Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Proof of compliance with conditions.

Mr. Fulton: I can only assume that there must have been some reason in the minds of the members of parliament and the authorities in drafting the original act when they restricted the officers qualified to take these affidavits to notaries public. What reason is now advanced why it should be desirable to enlarge it to include commissioners for oaths? I must say I see no objection but I am a little curious to know what was the original reason for restricting it, and why the change?

Mr. Garson: As my hon. friend knows, the practice prevails under this statute of doing away with the retention of voluminous documents by taking microfilm reproductions of them which are properly authenticated. Having regard to the fact that the original documents are destroyed and that all that is left of documents which may be very important are these films, I would offer the theory—I do not know for sure what the reason was, but I imagine this is it—that the reason for providing that the taking of the film had to be sworn to before a notary public was that they thought that might give an oath which was a little bit more serious or solemn than if taken before a commissioner for taking oaths.

But as time went on a number of these films were sworn to before commissioners, and the result is that a lot of material in microfilm form, the authenticity of which is beyond any doubt whatever, would now be technically, in a legal sense, valueless for the purposes for which it was originally prepared. The purpose of the bill is twofold. It is to provide that these microfilms, the taking of which has been proven by oath sworn by a commissioner rather than a notary public, shall be legal retroactively, and that from now on it will be possible to authenticate microfilms of that sort before a commissioner.

Canada Evidence Act

On section 3—Proof of compliance with conditions.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister when it is expected that the revised statutes will in fact be proclaimed? I notice they are called the revised statutes of 1952, but we are now in 1953 and we have not got them yet.

Mr. Garson: Yes. As a matter of fact we had thought that they would be available sometime during this month or next month. It is not very long ago that the hon. member for Eglinton asked me that question and elicited that answer. But the queen's printer tells us that the volume of work he has been kept busy doing is interfering with that program, and I do not think it will be possible for us to get them in February. It will be some months later in 1953 before they become available. So far as the Department of Justice is concerned, our task was completed some time ago. It is just the question of their reproduction in printed form. We also have the problem of getting the French translation made available, and there will be a bit of time lag on that as well.

Mr. Green: Is this not a rather peculiar procedure to follow? I notice that several of the bills on the order paper contain a similar provision. They purport to amend the revised statutes of 1952.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Green: The house is being asked to approve that legislation without having any idea whether or not the amendment fits into the revised statutes. Are we not a little premature in passing these different amendments to the revised statutes of 1952 when we do not even have those statutes? Why is it necessary to include these changes in the bills before we actually see the revised statutes?

Mr. Garson: Well, for the reason that this bill and the revised statutes of 1952, to be completely effective for the purpose for which they were prepared, have to be a complete entity so that those referring to those statutes later on will know when they reach into the bookcase and pick out the volumes of the 1952-53 statutes and of the revised statutes of 1952 that these are the law as it stood in 1952, complete and entire. If we did not, in the course of this amendment we are putting through now, insert this part II revising the revised statutes of 1952, then the revised statutes of 1952 when they were later proclaimed in their present form would repeal this very bill we are now passing. Thus later we shall not only have to look at the amendments passed in 1953, 1954 and 1955 and so on, but we would have to look back to the statutes of 1952-53 and the revised statutes of 1952 to ascertain what the law was. That is why, as my hon. friend can see, we have included in all these bills a part II which merely has the effect of leaving the revised statutes of 1952 in the position in which they must be, if when they are proclaimed they are not to repeal the bill we are now passing.

Mr. Green: Will this part II appear in the actual revised statutes of 1952?

Mr. Garson: Yes, in effect.

Mr. Green: If the minister is right in that, it means that we cannot get the revised statutes of 1952 until the end of this session because the amendments involved in all the bills that are to go through the house during this session will have to be written into the revised statutes of 1952, will they not?

Mr. Garson: Well, as I was explaining a few moments ago, we cannot get them anyhow because there is this printing lag. If we could get them it would be a different question, but we cannot.

Mr. Green: It does seem unreal that the house should be called upon to pass this legislation without in effect being able to check it at all. Why not do as I believe has been done in the province of British Columbia? Where there is a revision as of a certain year there may also be statutes passed in that same year, and you have to look at those in order to be sure that the revised statutes have not been changed. Here we are in a new year. This is not the session of 1952. This is the session of 1952-53.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Green: The revision is supposed to be as of 1952. Should the statutes of 1952-53 not be in the ordinary form and make amendments of the law as it now stands? The lawyers will have to check that, but it seems to me there is no justification for asking the house to pass legislation of this type when we really do not know anything about it. We are not in a position to check it at all.

Mr. Garson: I suggest to my hon. friend with all deference that we do know about it because the Canada Evidence Act will appear in the revised statutes. We see in part I of the bill the substance of our amendment, and all that part II of the bill says is that the substance of it will be carried into the revised statutes. That is all.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Fulton: At the next sitting of the house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will take up third reading of Bill No. 9, an act to amend the Canada Evidence Act; Bill No. 10, an act to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act, and Bill No. 45, an act to amend the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act; also the resolution respecting the liability of the crown for torts and civil salvage. If those matters are disposed of, and I hope they will be, I am told that the Minister of Justice will be ready to take up second reading of Bill No. 93, an act respecting the criminal law.

Mr. Fulton: In the order the minister has given?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): In that order. If we dispose of those different matters, we will take up the small bills in the name of the Minister of Transport, Nos. 19, 38, 39. After that we can take up Bill No. 44, an act to protect the coastal fisheries.

Mr. Green: What are you going to do after that?

It being three minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 23, 1953

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

GANDER AIRPORT

INQUIRY AS TO IMPROVEMENTS IN ACCOMMODATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if it is correct that extensive improvements are being made at Gander airport in Newfoundland for the benefit of passengers by plane who have to stop off there?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Yes, that is so. We have in mind redecorating the present building and laying it out in a different fashion which should prove of tremendous benefit to incoming and outgoing passengers.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Have those works been started?

Mr. Chevrier: They are being planned at the present time.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ALLEGED INTENTION TO BROADCAST A CHILDBIRTH

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) asked me the other day about a broadcast dealing with childbirth announced by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the end of this month. I have inquired of the C.B.C. about this matter. I am informed that this program, "A New Life Begins", was broadcast on station CJBC, Toronto, on November 30, at the suggestion of, and in collaboration with, Women's College Hospital in connection with the appeal for funds by the hospital. In view of the interest and high proportion of favourable comment on the broadcast locally it had been decided to repeat it on the trans-Canada network on January 30. While the hospital expressed approval of the original program after the broadcast, it has subsequently withdrawn its concurrence in the program being repeated on a national network, and the repeat broadcast will not take place as announced.

SHIPPING

COLLISION OF VESSELS "PHYLLIS W" AND "GAESTANO S" OFF NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries a question following an inquiry I made of his parliamentary assistant on Thursday of last week concerning the ramming of the Phyllis W by the United States dragger Gaestano S. Is the minister in a position to tell what decision the department has made as to the procedure it intends to follow?

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): This department has investigated the incident but as it is an international matter beyond the control of the department we have referred it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) who will investigate the matter and raise it with the proper authorities.

BACON

INQUIRY AS TO SALE TO THE UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): I should like to ask the Acting Minister of Agriculture if he will comment on the statement made over the C.B.C. at the noon broadcast that negotiations are under way for the sale of bacon to the United Kingdom to the extent of $1 million.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Acting Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the million dollar bacon purchase just announced by the British ministry of food was made possible by some of the results of the Canada-New Zealand beef exchange agreement. Exact terms of the purchase and dates of delivery have not yet been worked out, but it is expected that all details will be cleared in the near future. It should be understood that this is a single purchase and is not a bacon contract in the sense in which that term was used in the war and post-war years. It does, however, indicate the genuine desire of the two governments to maintain advantageous trading relations.

Mr. Gibson: Does the acting minister anticipate that there will be any more fortuitous profits available to the British ministry of food with which purchases may be made in Canada? I should like to suggest if that is the case that perhaps he might consider canned salmon the next time.

WHEAT

BRITISH PURCHASES FROM RUSSIA—SALE OF CANADIAN SURPLUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I had proposed to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture but as he is not present I would ask that the question be taken as notice unless any member of the government cares to answer it. In view of the report in today's Montreal Gazette that the United Kingdom is seeking over 22 million bushels of wheat from Russia, will the government indicate whether any steps are now being taken to arrange for sales of our surplus wheat at this time, particularly having regard to the fact that the press report indicates a condition in relation to that delivery which might not be acceptable to the nations of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I think we should take the question as notice. I know there have been recent discussions between the food ministry and the wheat board in respect of this additional quantity of grain required by the United Kingdom, and rather complicated arrangements have been worked out for at least a portion of that quantity, but I think it would be preferable to have the exact details of the arrangements before attempting to say any more than I am saying at the moment.

Mr. Drew: I recognize that, and I presented the question so that it might be in the form of a notice in view of the fact that, together with the indication that the United Kingdom is now seeking 22 million bushels of wheat at a time when we have such a large surplus, there is also an indication that a condition of that arrangement will be the availability of rubber from commonwealth countries, which might be open to objection.

Mr. St. Laurent: I wished to give the hon. gentleman the assurance at once that there had been discussions between the food ministry and the Canadian wheat board in respect to the whole problem and that some arrangements had been worked out for at least a portion of the deficiency required by the United Kingdom.

[Mr. Gibson.]

BROADCASTING

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of National Revenue when the government proposes to take the necessary steps to set up the special committee of the house on radio broadcasting?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The matter only awaits the naming of the personnel, and I expect that probably this afternoon I shall be able to place the usual motion on Votes and Proceedings, which will include the personnel of the committee.

Mr. Casselman: A week ago today I understood the Minister of National Revenue to blame the failure to name the membership of the committee on the whip of the Conservative opposition. Is he laying the blame in the same place again today?

Mr. Chevrier: Is that not so?

Mr. McCann: Perhaps I should have included the other parties at that time.

Mr. Knowles: Well, which ones?

Mr. Weir: In fairness to all concerned, the names of the members of the committee on radio broadcasting are in our hands. There are two or three adjustments that we are attempting to make on our side of the house, but I wish to assure the house and the other whips that there is no reflection on the latter for delay in presenting the names of their members so that the committee may be set up. I think that it can be arranged satisfactorily this afternoon.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT AFFIDAVIT TO BE SWORN BEFORE A NOTARY OR A COMMISSIONER

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill No. 9, to amend the Canada Evidence Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES ACT

TREATMENT AND RECLAMATION OF YOUNG OFFENDERS—BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 10, to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act.

Mr. Fulton: Would the minister make a statement as to the representations which were made which gave rise to this bill?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, the representations to which my hon. friend refers consist of a letter to myself from the former attorney general of British Columbia and in respect of which I have received confirmation today from the attorney general's department under the new government. It is a rather lengthy letter but perhaps I had better read some of the main portions of it. They are as follows:

> Some years ago, as you know, I established the institution known as New Haven for the treatment and reclamation of specially selected young offenders between the ages of sixteen and twenty-three, which has operated very successfully since its inception. We have in addition now established what is known as the young offenders unit for the reclamation and treatment of young offenders sentenced to Oakalla prison farm. It is legally part of Oakalla jail but is actually a separate building on the jail grounds operated separately from the jail. Its purpose is to take young offenders away from the jail and put them by themselves where they will be free of the jail atmosphere and the influence of the more hardened and experienced prisoners, and also provide a complete training, recreational, educational and vocational program. The unit has been in operation since early in the year and has been very successful. The principles of treatment and training approximate very closely those in New Haven, the main difference between the two institutions being that New Haven is what is known as an "open institution" with no fences or bars, whereas the young offenders unit is a "closed" institution where the inmates are kept behind bars. The unit is designed to house 100 prisoners, and the population at present is approximately sixty—
> To further our program of penal reform for the young offender in this province it is necessary to make provision for transfer of inmates from New Haven to the young offenders unit and vice versa, and from either of these institutions to the jail—the transfer to be by warrant under the hand of the inspector of jails.

The purpose of this present legislation is to authorize that transfer.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wonder if the minister, while the Speaker is still in the chair, would care to say a word about the relationship between penal administration in the province and in the dominion. I should like to read from the annual report of the commissioner of penitentiaries dated March 21, 1951. I am surprised to find that apparently the one for a year later is not available yet. At page 95 there is the following:

> A new area of co-operation was established this year by two visits to the staff of the young offenders unit newly created under provincial government auspices at the Oakalla prison farm.

Without taking the time of the house at the moment to make any comments on the treatment of young offenders—we are all deeply seized with the importance of it—would the minister say a word to indicate the division of responsibility, if it is a division, between the dominion and the province in this connection? Would he also say something about the area of co-operation? Perhaps the minister will know whether there is anything, in the last report of the commissioner, on this subject; and in general I would be glad if the minister would outline to us the relationship, which I find a little confusing, and the nature of the co-operation. Also, perhaps he would say in general terms something about the problem of treating young offenders. As I said a moment ago that subject, we all realize, has an importance of its own.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): Before the minister makes his statement and closes the debate, I would just like to have a word on this subject and also to present a query of interest to myself and, no doubt, others concerned with the problem of penal reform in Canada.

We have all been encouraged in recent years by the indications that the recommendations of the Archambault commission are at least being carried out. The province of British Columbia, from what I understand of the situation, has been pioneering in the adoption of the Borstal system in Canada, and I have been quite interested in the experiment going on at this Oakalla prison farm. Recently there were some disturbing reports of undesirable conditions existing at the prison farm and I am wondering whether the request from the province of British Columbia has anything to do with the reports that appeared in the press.

Apparently there was a breakdown in discipline—I imagine at the prison farm itself—because of the lack of suitable supervisory staff, persons with proper training and so forth. It seems to me that perhaps, as the recommendation before us this afternoon deals with the problem of segregation or increasing the facilities for segregation, it may be related to some of the reports that came out in the press concerning the disturbances at Oakalla prison farm. I would like to have that question answered.

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Before the minister speaks I would like to tell the house that not only is Oakalla prison farm in my riding but also this young offenders unit and the New Haven. I would like to tell the minister how successful this young offenders unit has been.

The success of the unit is due first to the choice of the young men they put in there and, more importantly perhaps, to the type of man that is on the staff. There is a chap named MacKay in charge of the unit and he is about the finest type of man for this work that I know of. When I am home I go to the young offenders unit at least twice a month and some of the work that is being done with young men is marvellous. Some of them seem to me, in the first instance, not likely to be good citizens, yet in three, four, five or six months they turn out to be very fine types of young men. Credit for that, of course, is due to the staff.

I want to tell the house about the type of building they house the young men in. It is an ideal building. It is a clean building, put up in the last two or three years, and they have there, more or less, a system of honour. New Haven is a different type and quite lately I have heard some instances of young men being taken out of the young offenders unit and New Haven and put into private industry before their sentences have been completed. That has worked out well.

I have had a little to do with the New Haven unit too and I can only say to the minister that both of these places are being taken care of by excellent staff.

As far as Oakalla is concerned, you know the situation as well as I do. It is a bad situation. Young prisoners there are in overcrowded conditions. The provincial government of British Columbia is now proceeding to put up new temporary buildings which will not fit the requirements at all, and we have arrived at the point where we must take young offenders away from old offenders. Until we do so we will not have success with youth reform.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): There is nothing I wish to add in debate on this bill except to endorse what has been said by the member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode). The purpose of the bill is a very logical one, that of attempting to segregate young offenders or first offenders from seasoned and old criminals. I am told that one of the results of the present situation, where young offenders are sent to Oakalla, is that they mingle with persons of chronic criminal habits. These young men who are put into prison in the hope of reform as well as punishment come out worse than they went in.

As the bill states in the explanation, this is an effort to put them under better circumstances so that they will come out and have a chance to go on in a more constructive way of life.

I will say to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and to the member for Brandon (Mr. Dinsdale) that the happenings at Oakalla have nothing immediately to do with the bill but they give another reason for passing the bill. This material and the explanatory note from the attorney general came over a year ago and what happened at Oakalla was much more recent, although it developed over that period. I believe that the measure is one that is entitled to our unanimous support.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the government of British Columbia for what they are doing in this matter. We must commend them and also this government for the support it has given in that way.

I think one of the great drawbacks has been that of putting younger offenders along with older offenders. The younger ones learn very quickly. We put them in prison not only to punish them but to reform them, and a system like the one contemplated here will do wonderful work.

I know that the Minister of Justice has seen something of it in Britain. I made a point of looking it over myself and there is no end to the good that can be done if you can save even a percentage of these people from becoming regular offenders. The effort is well worth while, and I hope that this will spread to other provinces so that we will be able to give all young people who make a first mistake an opportunity to be shown the error of their ways and of becoming good citizens. I think that it would be better to keep inside those who are not going to become good citizens, because we can look after them more cheaply inside than we can on the outside.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): I welcome the bill and the principle which lies behind it. My purpose in rising at the moment is to ensure that the minister answer one or two questions which I have in my mind about it.

I see in the explanatory notes that the purpose of the bill is reclamation. That is all to the good. The province has now established the young offenders unit for treatment or reclamation of young offenders sentenced to Oakalla prison farm. Then it says, as the minister has said, that the main difference is that there are bars in one place and no bars in the other. I think there must be other differences, and it is about those that I should like to ask the minister. I am interested, for example, in how the people will be selected, because I presume they will be a selected group. Unfortunately, there are criminals even in the age group suggested, between sixteen and twenty-three, who would be better kept out for the sake of others in that particular institution because of the evil influence which they might exert upon others. I suppose the minister, therefore, will assure us that there will be a screening to ensure that these will be people who not only will benefit personally from such treatment, but will not be an evil influence upon the others who are there.

My question would naturally be, is there any qualification for the selection of these particular prisoners, except the one qualification of age, being between sixteen and twenty-three. The avowed purpose of the bill is the reformation of these people. I would be interested in knowing something of the method by which that reformation will be carried out. The minister will not be surprised if I ask him what the program of education is to be for these people, and what system it is hoped to use?

Then there is this last thought. Just as these young people can be sent to this better type of prison, I presume arrangements can be made whereby they can be sent back to the original prison farm, if that is the proper term. I would be interested in knowing under what conditions these people would be sent back to a place where, even at their age, they would have to mix with what someone has called hardened criminals. Those are the thoughts that have occurred to me, and I would hope the minister might tell us a bit about some of those things.

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): I should like to say a few words in connection with this bill, Mr. Speaker, because of the close proximity of my riding to Oakalla. In addition to that is the fact that, regardless of the merits of this bill—it has merits and I support it—in my opinion we are not getting down to the roots of the problem connected with the Borstal institute and the Oakalla institute. Later in this session I propose to introduce certain amendments to the narcotic drugs act, which I feel are closely associated with the inmates of the institutions mentioned in this bill.

I believe it would be wise that hon. members of this house should know now that today we have more than 4,000 drug addicts in the Dominion of Canada. By that I do not mean only 4,000 people who take drugs, but those are the drug addicts who are known to the authorities. I am sorry to have to admit, sir, that amongst those 4,000 the city of Vancouver, being a seaport, has between 1,300 and 1,400. Next come the city of Montreal, the city of Toronto and the city of Winnipeg. Consequently, it is a vicious situation with which we have to deal. In my opinion it is one which can only be effectively stopped or retarded by very severe amendments to our present narcotic drugs act.

It is common knowledge that there is traffic in drugs throughout all the ridings of the lower mainland of British Columbia, including the riding of Burnaby-Richmond, Fraser Valley, New Westminster, and including all the ridings of greater Vancouver. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) might object, but I might go so far as to say that there is some traffic in drugs in the southern portion of his riding, which includes the towns of North Vancouver and West Vancouver. The unfortunate part of the situation is that first offenders go into these institutions, and by the time they come out they are post-graduates in the drug traffic. Not only does this traffic cause the great influx into these institutions, but the traffic is spreading amongst the high school group quite rapidly. This is natural, because it is like the bootlegging business. A bootlegger cannot thrive unless he has new customers. Similarly, a trafficker cannot thrive unless he has new potential buyers for the drugs he is selling.

Now, that is a picture of which I do not think any Canadian can be particularly proud. I am sure that when I introduce these amendments to the narcotic drugs act they will receive the complete endorsation of every member in this House of Commons. I do not believe these amendments are going to be the cure-all or end-all of the present problem. In the city of Vancouver we have had a committee of experts studying this problem for a long time. I do not mean amateurs, but men who know the business. They have given us their report. The thing which I wish to make clear is that anything we may do in this bill is not going to completely cure the problem. It will be what I might term a step in the right direction. Anything that can be done to remove the appalling situation which now exists in these institutions and segregate the young offenders from the old drug addicts, who are only too happy to teach the young offenders, will be a step in the right direction. Anything that might be in the least a preventive will be welcome. Consequently, though I say this is not by any means the answer to the problem, it is a step in the right direction, so I shall support it.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Garson: If I may take up some of the points which have been raised, first of all I should take up the point raised by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). May I say that I can well understand the confusion which arises here because of the fact we are dealing in this house with a law which is applicable, not to our own penitentiary system at all, which is covered by a separate statute, but to provincial prisons and reformatories. This which on the surface might appear as an anomaly is accounted for by the fact that, under our constitution, it is this parliament which has the responsibility for the enactment of the criminal law of the country. We have discharged that responsibility by providing in this country a law known as the Criminal Code which sets out the various offences and crimes, and prescribes their punishment. Section 1056 of the Criminal Code provides:

> Everyone who is sentenced to imprisonment for a term less than two years shall, if no other place is expressly mentioned, be sentenced to imprisonment in the common jail of the district, county or place in which the sentence is pronounced, or if there is no common jail there, then in that common jail which is nearest to such locality—

In addition to these common jails in which the facilities are not always of the highest order, there have been created in the various provinces a number of other institutions such as those which are at present under discussion in the case of British Columbia. In line with the jurisdiction of the federal parliament over criminal law and the punishment to be meted out under the criminal law, it has been necessary for us to pass this Prisons and Reformatories Act to provide for the manner in which prisoners who have broken federal laws and are in this other better class of prisons and reformatories in the various provinces shall be guarded and cared for.

In this act we have in part I the general group of sections which are applicable to all of the provinces. In parts II to IX are the sections which are made specifically applicable to each of the provinces. For example, part II deals with Ontario, part III deals with Quebec, part IV deals with Nova Scotia and part VIII with British Columbia.

In this present bill we are seeking to deal with certain sections of part VIII. These provisions in our federal statute deal with the way in which prisoners shall be maintained in these provincial institutions. When some new method of dealing with them—such as the one contemplated in this present bill—is evolved, it is necessary, from the legal point of view, that the attorney general's department of the province concerned should seek from us an amendment to our statute, the Prisons and Reformatories Act, empowering them, as in this case, to transfer these prisoners from one institution to another.

This sounds indeed like a rather awkward arrangement but by a great measure of co-operation between the two levels of government we have experienced no difficulty. Where we have a request, as we have here, we satisfy ourselves that it is a reasonable one and then always comply with it without any question. It is for that reason that I would be unable to go into the points which were raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight). He says he wants to know what method of reclamation they have in those institutions, and that he surmises that the purpose of the bill is to deal with these young offenders and to screen them. His surmise in that respect seems to be correct. What we are doing here is to give, by an amendment to this statute, the necessary legal authority which will enable the provincial authorities to provide some of the mechanics of screening. For if, as my hon. friend from Saskatoon suggests, there may be amongst the young offenders one who is the most dangerous, he then should perhaps be screened out from that group which the authorities are trying to reform and should be sent over to the other institution. In that process there will be a movement of prisoners from one institution to the other, as the screening proceeds. Without the authority to transfer these prisoners provided by this bill there is some question whether they would be able to do that. What we are really providing here is a means of facilitating the plan of operation of the provincial authorities.

I want to make it abundantly clear that because the provincial authorities come to us for legal authority in this way, we have never to the slightest degree attempted to withhold that authority, subject to our approval of what they do. Therefore, not having interfered with them in any way whatever in their management of their institutions, I may tell my friend the hon. member for Saskatoon, through you, Mr. Speaker, that we are not able to say what their methods of reclamation are.

The hon. member for Greenwood referred to an allusion in the penitentiaries report for the year 1951 which he has in his possession, and which was to the effect that the author of that report or of the portion of it dealing with British Columbia had said that the area of co-operation had been extended in that year by a visit, as I recall it, to Oakalla prison. I would interpret that statement to mean nothing more than that since the federal penitentiary authorities and the provincial prison authorities in British Columbia are both labouring in the same vineyard, trying to provide for the custody and reclamation of prisoners, they try to co-operate; although I want to make it perfectly clear that, in doing so, they stick quite closely to their own jurisdiction.

There is no connection at all between the operation of our penitentiaries system and the operation of the provincial prison system in any province. I want to make that fact abundantly clear. The Criminal Code states it clearly. Those who are sentenced to less than two years go into the provincial prison system. Those who are sentenced to two years and more go into the penitentiary system. But while these two systems are quite distinct, the two authorities co-operate with one another. Since this bill is confined to this one narrow question as to whether we are going to give the British Columbia prison administration legal authority to transfer these prisoners, it is for that reason, that as to these other matters which have been raised I am, to begin with, not equipped with facts to discuss them; and if I were, Mr. Speaker, I think I would be out of order in doing so; for to do it is not really relevant to the real principle of this bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Imprisonment in young offenders unit or in New Haven.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): As the minister mentioned, Mr. Chairman, I looked up the annual report of the commissioner of penitentiaries just in order to see whether there was any reference to this matter and I found that there was. I have tried to get a more recent report. I spoke to the minister about it and I am not quite clear—I am raising the point now—why the report of March 31, 1952, which I understand is in print, is not available. Can the minister tell us whether or not it has been laid on the table?

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend raised this with me last night, as a matter of fact, and I have been so very busy that I have not had time to check. I have a recollection, which may be wrong, that I did table it, and I dictated a memorandum about midnight last night suggesting that a copy of this report could be obtained for 1952 and sent to my hon. friend. If he has not received it I can only say that I will double check and see that he gets it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I was told by the library last night that it was in print but that the queen's printer would not release it. Can there be any foundation for that?

Mr. Garson: I would not think so. May I ask the Clerk to find out whether it has been tabled? My recollection is that it has been, but the Clerk tells me that they will have to check downstairs to see if that is so. In any event, owing to a lack of time, I have not checked it before now, but I shall do so, not this afternoon or evening but I shall do so certainly in the morning and see that my hon. friend gets it.

Mr. Goode: May I ask a question? In the explanatory notes I find the following paragraph:

> The purpose of the amendment is to authorize transfer from the young offenders unit to New Haven and vice versa, and between these institutions and the Oakalla gaol.

This has been going on for a long time. From whom has the provincial authorities received authority to do that?

Mr. Garson: Well, I have no official cognizance of the fact that it has been going on for a long time. Perhaps it may have been going on without this authority, but if it has been then I would assume the provincial authorities have requested that we pass this bill in order that the practice in that regard may be regularized. Transfer of offenders under provincial laws does not require this authority.

Mr. Goode: I have no desire to embarrass the minister with respect to anything that goes on outside his authority; but I know of dozens of cases at least where this has happened. This may be a legal question, and it may not, because I would not know one. What would be the position of a young man who was taken from the young offenders unit in Oakalla and transferred to New Haven? What is the legal right now if that happened say three months ago? Has a person who is so transferred got any redress in law in regard to that change, or not?

Mr. Garson: There is a rule, Mr. Chairman, in this house, I believe, that the attorney general is not supposed to give any legal opinions in the house, a rule which I very seldom invoke; but I think this is one occasion when it would be prudent for me to invoke it. To begin with, I think it would be a matter of some difficulty to say what his rights were. That would depend in some degree upon when he attempted to exercise them. If he, for example, were strongly opposed to being so transferred and if his friends could consult a solicitor he might at that time challenge the action. But if this happened six months ago, what he could do about it now is open to considerable question, because if there were legal injury I should think that the damages for it would be very small indeed.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—

Mr. Knowles: May I ask another question on clause 2 to obtain further information as to the form of this bill and other bills which are being enacted during this period of time when we have not yet received the printed volumes of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952? I note that the clauses in part II of this bill seem to be identical with the clauses in part I, except that they are numbered differently. Am I correct in assuming that that difference in numbering is so that part II will conform to the changes in the numbering of the sections in the Revised Statutes of Canada? Is that a fair assumption? I see the minister nodding his head up and down.

My further question is this. It arises because as we look at a number of these bills having two parts there does seem to be a complicated procedure and I suggest that we are going to need more lawyers to understand these very complicated bills. If a bill such as this, or any other that is set out in two parts, were delayed until the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, had appeared in public, would it still be necessary to have these two parts in these various bills?

Mr. Garson: May I deal with my hon. friend's last question first? He says, until the revised statutes appear in public. If he would amend that and say, until they have been proclaimed, then it would not be necessary.

The point which has been raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is the same point that was raised yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. I must say that in an endeavour to make a brief reply to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra I really do not think that my answer did justice to his question, and therefore it would be desirable—if hon. members will bear with me, and if they object to the length of the statement they will have to blame the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for having raised this matter again—to make a somewhat more adequate statement on the point now.

The first fact in this connection that should be noted is that—and some of these facts may be obvious, but they are relevant to this question and I think I should mention them in this context—the preparation of the revised statutes is an enormous task. There are approximately 6,000 pages in each version, and to print this material and bind it takes from eight months to a year.

In our last revision which took place in the quieter days of 1927, there was then sufficient time between sessions of parliament to get this printing done; but as hon. members know, in the last two sessions of parliament we have had to sit almost constantly, which has made it impossible for us to get the revised statutes printed and issued between sessions of parliament. The result of that is, as is the case with this very bill that we are dealing with now and the one dealt with yesterday, all these amending bills that come before this session of parliament will be amending statutes that are in the process of consolidation, revision and printing. Our new Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, are now on the presses. The first three volumes have been printed and the remaining volumes are being printed. The result is that the amendments which are now being made in this parliament—this very bill, for example—cannot be incorporated in the text. That was the point that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra brought up. They cannot be incorporated in the text of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, without scrapping the entire revised statutes and resetting type for the whole thing, and that is of course out of the question.

Part I of the bill deals with the Prisons and Reformatories Act as it now exists. However, when the time comes that we get the printed Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, from the printers complete and entire and are in position to proclaim them, to bring them into effect, the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, will thereupon be repealed and the new revised statutes of 1952 will take their place.

In the particular case with which we are dealing, this will mean that the Prisons and Reformatories Act as it now exists will be repealed and a new Prisons and Reformatories Act will take its place, but this new Prisons and Reformatories Act as it is set out in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, will not include the amendment which is now being made.

Therefore, the result of proclaiming the revised statutes of 1952 will be to wipe out the amendment now being made by parliament in this bill and restore the law to what it was before this bill was passed.

Mr. Green: If there were not a part II to the bill.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has put his finger right on the point, when he says "if there were not a part II to the bill". To avoid this result is the purpose of this part II. We add to all of these bills a part II which will make to the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, the same amendment which is now being made to the Prisons and Reformatories Act by part I. The result will be that when the revised statutes come into force they will be amended in exactly the same way as the present act is being amended by part I of this bill and in that way the law will remain the same and will be contained in the revised statutes of 1952 and in the statutes of this 1953 session of parliament.

Mr. Knowles: I am grateful to the minister for his explanation as it answers most of the questions that have occurred to us. Another question that occurs to me might more properly be asked under section 3, but since it is so closely related to these questions perhaps I will be permitted to ask it now. This is a technical legal question by a non-legal person. Why is it necessary when part II comes into effect and thereby amends the revised statutes of 1952 to repeal part I which had the effect of revising the same law in the statutes of 1927? Do the revised statutes of 1927 go out of existence? Are they quashed? Are they done for when the revised statutes of 1952 come into being?

In the research that I have done from time to time I have had occasion to look up statutes that were pre-1927 and the free legal advice that I pick up around this place has been to the effect that some of the statutes previous to the revised statutes of 1927 are still part of the law of the land. I should like to have the minister's comments on this.

Mr. Garson: I must not be taken as agreeing with any statements which my hon. friend has just made, although I am not particularly questioning them. I would prefer to put this in my own words. Section 3 reads:

> This part shall come into force, and part I is repealed, on the day the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, come into force.

I apprehend that the reason for that section is to make it clear out of an abundance of caution that after this part comes into force the Revised Statutes of Canada as amended by part II of this bill will be the law on this subject. It is an attempt to remove any possible doubt there might be or to answer an argument that an astute lawyer might make to the effect, "Part I is still in effect in relation to this," or perhaps the argument might be made that by not repealing part I it was an affirmation that the statute as distinguished from the revised statutes should continue in force.

Mr. Knowles: What is the situation after the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, are proclaimed with respect to laws previously passed? Perhaps I could put my question in two parts. First, what is the status of these books entitled "Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927"? Have they any more value or can we throw them away? Secondly, what is the status of any laws back across the years which have not been brought forward and put into the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952?

Mr. Garson: Before answering the second part of my hon. friend's question I would want him to give me a concrete example. With regard to the first part of his question, I would point out that when the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, come into effect and part II of this bill comes into effect along with them, it becomes part of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952. There is a provision in the revised statutes of 1952 repealing the whole of the revised statutes of 1927, just as this section 3 will repeal part I of this bill on the day the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, come into force.

Therefore the answer to the first part of my hon. friend's question is that from that point on, the revised statutes of 1952 will be in full force and effect but the revised statutes of 1927 will be without effect. He asks if he can throw them away. I would say "no" because they will have great historical value to assist lawyers and others to trace the history of certain pieces of legislation.

Mr. Knowles: I recognize clearly that they will have a historical value, but might there not be another type of value? Supposing a lawyer was dealing with a case of some sort concerning which it was necessary to find out what the law was at a certain previous date, which might have a bearing on a case in court. Might it not be desirable for him to look back and say to the court, "This is what the law was in 1927."

Mr. Garson: That is exactly what I meant by historical value. I was using two words instead of a larger number.

Mr. Goode: Not being a legal man, may I ask this question? May I refer to section 153 of the Prisons and Reformatories Act. Whenever he deems it expedient to do so he may take young lads out of the young offenders unit, or out of New Haven, and put them into Oakalla prison. I should like to ask the minister whether there is any appeal from the decision of the person who is inspector of jails or from that of any other officer authorized by the lieutenant governor? Is there any appeal from his decision or can he just come along willy-nilly and say: This lad should not remain in New Haven; we will put him with the older men in Oakalla prison?

Mr. Garson: Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I could not say because I would imagine it would depend largely upon the provisions of the provincial statutes which cover the operation of these jails, and I do not have them before me.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Fulton: Next sitting. May I ask the minister whether he has had a request from British Columbia to expedite this measure in the same way that he had one with regard to the amendment to the Judges Act?

Mr. Garson: Having regard to the fact that the request came back in October and that I have got confirmation only this day from Mr. Pepler, the deputy attorney general, I think it would be desirable. We could not get it through before because the house was not sitting. However, if as the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond has said, they have been acting in this way for a long while, perhaps we had better legalize what they are doing as soon as possible.

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Garson moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PENITENTIARIES

TABLING OF REPORT FOR 1952—AVAILABILITY OF COPIES

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might clear up a matter which was raised by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). He asked whether I had tabled the report on penitentiaries for 1952. I was sure I had because there is a provision in the act that requires its tabling within a certain period of time, and that is not a provision which I am likely to overlook. In order to comply with that provision, however, I had to table it in photostatic form, in which form it is rather bulky and unhandy. The printed copies are not yet available from the bureau but I understand they will be fairly shortly.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I, as a question of privilege, ask one question? Can the minister tell us when it was tabled? Here we are almost a year from the termination of the period which the report covers and we have not got it yet.

Mr. Garson: I tabled it on the 1st of December, 1952. The explanation for the time lag is that the fiscal year of the penitentiary system ends in March but we have, as my hon. friend knows, penitentiaries and institutions scattered throughout the various provinces of Canada and there has always been that much lag in getting the accounts in, the report prepared, and so on.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have not made my point clear. The minister filed it in December. It is nearly February. Is there a necessary time lag of two and a half months for printing?

Mr. Garson: I did not hear the hon. member.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is there a necessary time lag of two and a half months? Could we blame this on the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) in any way?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not know, but I am under the impression that under the statutes these reports must be tabled at the next session of parliament within the first fifteen days. That is what applies to my department and other departments, I believe, where the fiscal year ended on the 31st March, 1952. They prepared the report—they could not prepare it before that—and when the session started in November last year the minister, as it was his duty to do, tabled the report on the 1st of December.

Mr. Green: But the question is, why not give us a printed copy?

Mr. Garson: That is the point.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Do not blame the minister for that.

Mr. Garson: That is the point. Why not a printed copy? The reason for the printed copy not being available is that it does take that length of time to compile all the material and get the report ready. I will not take in too much territory, but I can assure hon. members that certainly there is no more efficient branch in the Department of Justice than the penitentiaries division. It is very well operated and they are excellent men.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I wonder how much longer I should allow this debate on a question of privilege to go on.

COMPANIES' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

LIMITATION TO COMPANIES WITH OUTSTANDING BOND ISSUES

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 45, to amend the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1933.

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister going to give us a little speech on this one?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act was passed in 1933. At that time the Bankruptcy Act did not contain adequate provisions for an arrangement between a corporate debtor and its creditors by which the corporate debtor, by getting an extension of its liabilities, could liquidate them, avoid bankruptcy and retain its identity. In other words, if they were going to come under the Bankruptcy Act at all they had to go into bankruptcy. The Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act was passed to enable these corporate debtors to make an extension of that sort without going into bankruptcy. But it appeared that the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act was passed without too careful regard for the protection of the trade creditors of mercantile concerns going into an arrangement of that sort under this act, and since the arrangements under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act were not in the hands of an official trustee as under the Bankruptcy Act, it was found in a number of cases that the trade creditors' interests were frequently and seriously prejudiced.

As a consequence a bill was introduced in the house in 1938 to repeal the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act altogether. But this was strongly opposed by the Dominion Mortgage and Investment Association because, amongst other reasons, the laws of the United States prohibit the sale of securities unless there is in existence in relation to them appropriate legislation to enable a majority of stockholders to effect a reorganization of the company if the circumstances seem to demand it. Of two conflicting groups who were in disagreement in respect of the legislation, one was this Dominion Mortgage and Investment Association which desired the retention of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act in order to deal with financial companies whose creditors were secured by a trust deed containing a provision for a trustee for such creditors. On the other hand was a group of businessmen who were either trade creditors themselves or were opposed to the trade creditors being mulcted under the same act in respect of mercantile liabilities.

The introduction of the present bill is agreeable to both these groups. When the bill was before the other place, I am informed that both groups appeared and were agreeable to its provisions. With the passage of this bill it will leave companies that have complex financial structures, and a large number of investor creditors, able to use the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act for the purpose of reorganization. Moreover they will be able to use it efficiently; because as a rule, the terms of their own trust deed provide for a trustee of the creditors whose business it will be to look after their interests properly, a provision which is almost invariably absent in the case of the mercantile creditors. The mercantile companies will be able to use the provision of part III of the new revised Bankruptcy Act, which, unlike the Bankruptcy Act in force in 1933, has a provision whereby companies may apply for an extension to work out their affairs without incurring the stigma of bankruptcy.

Moreover, this provision in part III of the Bankruptcy Act requires the appointment of a trustee in bankruptcy who will look after the interests of the mercantile creditors and who will have supervision of the bankruptcy branch, which proceedings under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act do not now have.

I have a very large number of examples of abuses of the existing act but I will not burden the house with them unless anyone wants an example given.

I do not think there can be great opposition to this because it seems to be an arrangement—the arrangement set out in this bill—which adequately protects the mercantile creditor, adequately protects the position of the investor creditor, and is not at all unfair to the corporate debtor in either case.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This is a measure, as the minister has indicated, which has to do with the mechanics of reorganization. I think it can be said, following his explanation, that the proposed amendment will leave the Bankruptcy Act and this act complementary to each other in a way which I think will be efficient. It will facilitate corporate reconstruction when it is necessary and also remove the occasions of abuses which at one time were rather freely practised.

The matter was discussed at length in the Senate committee. Present there were representatives of those who are, I think, most familiar with this. I do not think there can be any suggestion that, as it stands now, it will be anything harsh or oppressive, or anything which can be used in an unscrupulous manner by debtors who wish to escape their creditors.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, I think the amendment is sound.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act

On section 1—Unsecured creditor.

Mr. Fulton: Just one question on section 1. I would appreciate it if the minister could advise why it is that the exception is included in the amendment. The amendment itself, included for the purpose for which he described and with the effect that the hon. member for Greenwood has outlined, seems to be entirely an exception. There is included in the amendment a provision which, as it has been explained, seems to have the effect that the trustees for the holders of these unsecured bonds, debentures, debenture stock or other evidences of indebtedness, are deprived of their right. I understand that otherwise they would have the right of voting at a creditors' meeting in respect of such unsecured obligations of the company. Why is that exception put in there?

Mr. Garson: I am sorry but I do not get my hon. friend's point. What is the language of the bill to which he refers?

Mr. Fulton: The provision starting at line 15:

—except voting at a creditors' meeting in respect of any such bonds, debentures, debenture stock or other evidences of indebtedness.

The effect of the amendment as it now stands seems to me to be that there is now included in the definition of an unsecured creditor a person who is, or a corporation who is, a trustee for the holders of any unsecured bonds, debentures, debenture stock or other evidences of indebtedness. He shall be deemed to be an unsecured creditor for all purposes of this act:

—except voting at a creditors' meeting in respect of any such bonds, debentures—

Why is that exception put in the amendment?

Mr. Garson: I imagine it is put in the amendment for the purpose of protecting an existing right which he has and which it is not thought necessary to disturb by this new arrangement.

Read the whole thing. It says:

'unsecured creditor' means any creditor of a company who is not a secured creditor, whether resident or domiciled within or without Canada and a trustee for the holders of any unsecured bonds, debentures, debenture stock, or other evidences of indebtedness issued under a trust deed or other instrument running in favour of the trustee shall be deemed to be an unsecured creditor for all purposes of this act expect voting at a creditors' meeting in respect of any such bonds, debentures, debenture stock or other evidences of indebtedness.

In other words, the exception that my hon. friend is referring to is an exception which refers to this new part which is being added to this clause, and it refers to a trustee for the holders of unsecured bonds.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Garson: And it says he shall not have any right except to vote at a creditors' meeting in respect of the bonds for which he is trustee.

Mr. Fulton: No. On the contrary, unless I misunderstand the language, it says quite the opposite. It says that he shall be deemed to be an unsecured creditor for all purposes of this act except the right to vote at a creditors' meeting. In other words, you are bringing the trustee for the holders of unsecured bonds, debentures, debenture stock or other evidences of indebtedness into the category of a creditor for the purposes of this act; and then you are providing that he shall not be a creditor for the purposes of this act with respect to voting at creditors' meetings on the strength of his unsecured bonds—

Mr. Garson: I would submit that it says that a trustee for unsecured bonds shall be an unsecured creditor except that he can vote at a creditors' meeting in respect of those bonds for which he is trustee. Surely he is entitled to that.

Mr. Fulton: The minister is saying that except with respect to a creditors' meeting he shall be a secured creditor.

Mr. Garson: No. He shall be able to vote—at a creditors' meeting in respect of any such bonds, debentures, debenture stock or other evidences of indebtedness——for what he is—a trustee for the holders of unsecured bonds.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

CROWN LIABILITY

TORTS AND CIVIL SALVAGE

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the liability of the crown for torts and civil salvage so as to place the crown in substantially the same position as a private person as regards liability for (a) torts committed by servants; (b) torts arising out of breach of duty attaching to the ownership, occupation, possession or control of property; (c) damages caused by a motor vehicle upon a highway, and (d) civil salvage, and to permit certain actions to be taken against the crown in the provincial courts.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps the minister will tell us what this is all about—in detail.

Mr. Garson: The principle of the bill which this resolution seeks to introduce is a most important and far-reaching one. It is the final step in making the federal crown of Canada liable in tort for damages in much the same way as if it were a private person. It would be liable in respect of tort committed by servants of the crown or in respect of a breach of duty attaching to the ownership, occupation, possession or control of property or in respect of motor vehicle damages sustained by any person by reason of a motor vehicle owned by the crown.

This bill has the purpose of making the crown liable for civil salvage.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister explain that for the benefit of those who may not understand it?

Mr. Garson: Well, civil salvage is a claim which arises when a ship owner renders services to a ship in distress which result in its being the subject of salvage. This bill will make the crown liable to pay civil salvage to those who render such services in respect of ships belonging to Her Majesty, in the right of Canada.

I think perhaps, although I would be willing to go on and deal with the matter in more detail, it would be preferable to discuss the principle of the bill at the proper time on second reading when hon. members have the text of the bill in front of them.

Mr. Fulton: In connection with this resolution, Mr. Speaker, I think that we in the official opposition are disposed to agree that the debate should take place when we have the bill before us. We shall not, therefore, at this stage say anything more than that we welcome the introduction of this resolution, because it precedes a bill which, as we understand it from reading the resolution, will accomplish an object which we have advocated for some years. While no one likes to be invidious or to indulge in recriminations purely on those grounds, I think it would be correct to simply point out that about a year ago, when we had the bill abolishing the petition of right before us, we urged the minister to go on and take the next logical step, which would be to give ordinary citizens, aggrieved by acts of those in possession or custody of crown property, the right to sue the crown in tort. We are glad the minister is now doing it, although we regret he did not do it previously.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister whether this measure will cover the case of a person suffering damage before the bill becomes law? For example, suppose a person was injured a year ago by reason of neglect in the care of a government building, would it be possible to sue in respect of that negligence under the new act? I would hope that would be the case. I do not think it would be fair to restrict the right to causes of action which arise after the bill has been passed, provided the causes have not been outlawed by provincial law.

Mr. Garson: I really believe that is a matter that is related to the text of the bill, Mr. Chairman, which will be brought down after the resolution is passed. If my hon. friend has no objection, I think it could be best handled then, and I would be glad to do so.

Mr. Nowlan: Did I understand the minister to say, with respect to those matters enumerated here, that after the passing of the legislation the same rights would exist against the crown as exist against any individual? In other words, are there any restrictions in the law with respect to actions in tort which will be remaining after the passing of this legislation?

I am very glad to see a reference here to the bringing of actions against the crown in provincial courts. I believe that I drew to the minister's attention the unfortunate position in which people are placed when his agents have brought action as a result of motor vehicle accidents in the provincial courts, and yet when there was a good counter-claim we could not bring the counter-claim. We had to start a new action in the exchequer court. If anyone could find a more annoying situation than that, I should like to know what it is. I am not suggesting that the minister give an undertaking, but I am suggesting that he instruct his agents to proceed slowly with the institution of actions in the immediate future so that we would not find ourselves in the unfortunate position of having actions instituted by the minister in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia some time in May, and yet because this bill had not received the royal assent we would be faced with the inconvenience of bringing an action for the counter-claim in the exchequer court.

Mr. Garson: I think, Mr. Chairman, when the text of the bill is before my hon. friend he will probably agree that the point which he raises is satisfactorily covered. In any event, it would be better perhaps to delay the discussion of the point until he has the text before him so that, if he does not agree with our interpretation of the text, he may offer an amendment with regard to it.

Mr. Henderson: Will the bill contain a definition section defining highway, or will that be defined by the Highway Traffic Act?

Mr. Garson: I would think, Mr. Chairman, that highway would be defined by the provincial act.

The Chairman: May I suggest that if the minister gives an indication to the hon. member of what will be in the bill, he will have to reply to the other members. We should not anticipate discussion on the bill at this stage.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister whether the legislation contemplated by this resolution has any bearing upon the position of civil servants in their personal capacities in respect of debts, garnishee arrangements and so on? I see the minister shaking his head. Can he indicate what the situation is in that connection while we are on this resolution? At the same time, will he tell us what the position of members of parliament is in these matters? Having regard to ourselves, I want to say that I do not think we should be in any preferred position. I was wondering whether this resolution might be of the kind that would do away with any preferred position, if there is such, so far as members of parliament are concerned.

Mr. Garson: The point which the hon. member raises is one which has no relevancy whatever to the present resolution. This resolution will not touch it in any way, and therefore I think that it would be only proper observance of the rules of the house to postpone any discussion of that point until some more apt occasion.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Garson thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 105, respecting the liability of the crown for torts and civil salvage.

He said: Mr. Speaker, before you put that motion may I say that His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house; and having also been acquainted with the purport of the measure to be introduced has given consent, so far as Her Majesty's prerogatives are affected, to the consideration of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. Garson.]

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF EXISTING STATUTE

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 93, respecting the criminal law.

Mr. Fulton: I presume that the minister will make a statement advising us of his intention with respect to the course of the legislation.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, we have been going along so rapidly here that my file on this Bill 93 is on its way to me from my office at the moment.

Mr. Fulton: We know that the minister is capable of speaking extemporaneously.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, the bill, the second reading of which I am now moving, passed the Senate before the Christmas adjournment and will, I expect, be referred to a committee of this house. As a matter of fact, I propose to make a motion to that effect after the second reading has been given. Having regard to the fact that it will be considered—as it was in the Senate—in great detail in this committee, I feel that there is no necessity for me to deal with it at too great length at the present time.

Before touching on the main principles of the bill I desire to say a word or two concerning its preparation. On April 7, 1952, I tabled in this house the report of the commission which had been instructed to prepare for consideration by the government a draft bill to amend and revise the Criminal Code. In that report, which I am sure all hon. members have read, there are set out at length the various stages of the work which was done and which culminated in the presentation of the draft bill that was tabled along with the report.

I should like to pause here to pay tribute to those men who were responsible for the revision. The Criminal Code revision commission was originally composed of Hon. W. M. Martin, Chief Justice of Saskatchewan; J. H. G. Fauteux, Q.C., then of the Quebec bar and now Hon. Mr. Justice Fauteux of the Supreme Court of Canada; Mr. F. P. Varcoe, Q.C., deputy minister of justice. To assist this commission and to undertake in large measure much of the detail, there was appointed a committee composed of Mr. Robert Forsyth, Q.C., then with the Department of Justice, now senior county court judge at Toronto; Mr. Fernand Choquette, Q.C., then of the bar of Quebec, now Mr. Justice Choquette; Mr. H. J. Wilson, Q.C., deputy attorney general of Alberta; and Messrs. Joseph Sedgwick, Q.C., and J. J. Robinette, Q.C., of the bar of Ontario. The personnel of the committee was subsequently increased by the appointment of Mr. W. C. Dunlop, Q.C., of the Nova Scotia bar; Mr. H. P. Carter, Q.C., director of public prosecutions of Newfoundland; and Mr. T. D. MacDonald, Q.C., who prior to succeeding Judge Forsyth in the Department of Justice was deputy attorney general of Nova Scotia.

The work of the commission and the committee was commenced in 1949 and continued until September, 1950, when there was a reorganization and the work from that time on was carried on by a committee which was subsequently appointed a commission, and was instructed to prepare a draft bill for the consideration of the government.

I am sure hon. members will agree that as the Criminal Code which was first enacted in 1892 had not had any major review or overhaul since that date, the time had arrived, when this commission was appointed, when this task or revision should be undertaken. Indeed that is rather an understatement, if anything.

The terms under which the commission was asked to enter upon the preparation of a draft bill are as follows: (a) Revise ambiguous and unclear provisions; (b) adopt uniform language throughout; (c) eliminate inconsistencies, legal anomalies or defects; (d) rearrange provisions and parts; (e) seek to simplify by omitting and combining provisions; (f) with the approval of the statute revision commission omit provisions which should be transferred to other statutes; (g) endeavour to make the code exhaustive of the criminal law; and (h) effect such procedural amendments as are deemed necessary for the speedy and fair enforcement of the criminal law.

Hon. members will note from the terms of reference that the purpose of the revision was not to effect changes in broad principles but was to produce as simple a code as possible by the elimination of unnecessary or obsolete provisions, the correction of errors, the removal of inconsistencies and by such consolidation and rearrangement of provisions as was deemed necessary to facilitate reference. The work involved was arduous and required great care. I am sure that hon. members who have studied the bill will agree that the commission has admirably fulfilled this very exacting task.

In this connection, I should like to refer to a statement contained in the report of the subcommittee of the standing committee on banking and commerce of the Senate which made a study of the bill:

> Your subcommittee is of the opinion that our new Criminal Code will be a better code than the one it will replace and a large measure of the credit for it must be given to the commissioners.
> Your subcommittee wishes further to record its appreciation of the great public service given by the commissioners in the performance of a laborious and difficult task. The condensation, rearrangement and clarification of many of the sections of the present code will effect a marked improvement in the criminal law of Canada.

I have pointed out that the commission was not charged with the task of making changes in broad principles, but was asked to evolve as simple a code as possible and in doing so to make such consolidation and rearrangement as it thought necessary to the accomplishment of this end. Hon. members will observe that there has been considerable consolidation and rearrangement. This phase of the work has contributed to the marked reduction between the number of clauses in the bill and the number of sections contained in the present code. This feature of the work of the commission will, I am sure, prove of great advantage to those who are called upon to interpret and to administer the criminal law.

Another matter which I wish to call to the attention of the house is the extent to which the bill will be exhaustive of the criminal law. Under the terms of reference the commission was asked to endeavour to make the Criminal Code exhaustive of the criminal law. The commission, however, came to the conclusion that the code should be exhaustive in so far only as criminal offences are concerned, and that the criminal law of England, as presently in force in Canada, should be continued in respect of other matters, inter alia, procedure, matters of defence and rules of evidence not already codified. The result is that no change has been effected in so far as the common law may now have effect in Canada, other than to preclude the institution of proceedings for common law offences. The commission found upon consultation with the provinces that resort has been had to common law offences in a very limited number of cases, and there have been incorporated in the draft bill those common law offences which the experience of the past sixty years has shown could be continued as part of the criminal law of this country.

I am sure hon. members will agree that it is much more satisfactory to have those things which constitute crimes clearly set out in a statute readily available to all than to have to refer to ancient texts to ascertain what conduct is criminal in this country.

The commissioners in their report dealt at some length with punishment. There is just one phase of this matter, however, to which I wish to direct the attention of hon. members at this time, and it is their recommendation, carried out in the draft bill which they presented, that minimum punishments and higher maximums for subsequent offences both be abolished in order to leave a greater degree of discretion to the courts.

This recommendation was not acceptable in toto and in this bill minimum punishments have been restored in respect of driving a motor vehicle while intoxicated and where ability to drive is impaired, and also in the case of certain minor offences in respect of the mails.

May I for a moment now touch on the provisions dealing with procedure? In the present code there are two parts dealing with the non-jury trials of indictable offences. In the bill, these two parts have been consolidated, and the provisions of part XVII, which deal with jury trials where they are not inconsistent, have been made applicable. The advantage of this is to have uniformity in so far as possible in the trial of indictable offences.

It will be observed that under the provisions of the consolidated parts, the jurisdiction to be exercised by magistrates will be exercised only by those who are specially appointed for that purpose.

In view of this and in the expectation that jurisdiction to act under this part will be bestowed on qualified persons, and jurisdiction to try an accused with his consent has been extended to include certain offences which must now be tried by jury. I would emphasize that this in no way impairs the right of an accused to trial by jury and that the accused will continue to have the right to select the method of trial which he desires.

The principal matters with which I wish to deal in respect of changes in procedure in summary conviction offences are the following: Under the bill provision is made for the inclusion of more than one offence in single information. This is not an innovation. A similar provision will be found in statutes of parliament and of the provincial legislatures, and the practice was widely adopted in connection with wartime regulations. As a proper safeguard, it will be noted that power is given the court to order a separate trial on any one or more of the included charges if the court is of opinion that such a course is necessary in the interest of justice.

Under the present provisions of the code, where an appeal is taken in a summary conviction matter, the court must hold a new trial. The commissioners recommended that the appeal should be determined on the evidence taken in the court of first instance as in the case of indictable offences, and that in order that the court should have before it all essential evidence, authority should be given to hear additional witnesses as well as witnesses called on the trial. It appears, however, that the proposal that appeals in summary conviction matters should be heard on the evidence taken before the court of first instance did not appeal to the hon. members in the other place, with the result that the bill that is now before this house provides that appeals in summary conviction matters shall be by way of trial de novo, as they are under the existing law.

Before leaving this branch of the bill, I should point out that the summary trials part and the part relating to summary conviction offences were submitted to provincial representatives at a joint meeting held in Toronto in September, 1951. These parts were discussed section by section, and the commission in its report points out that in general the revision of these parts was acceptable to the provincial representatives.

I think some reference should be made to what has happened to the bill since it was tabled, in draft form, in this house on April 7, 1952.

The bill was introduced as letter H-8 of the Senate on May 12, 1952, and on May 13 I attended in the other place, as ministers of the crown may now do, to speak on the motion for second reading. The bill was referred to the banking and commerce committee of the Senate which appointed a subcommittee to consider the measure clause by clause. After twelve meetings the subcommittee reported to the main committee on June 20. The main committee held three meetings for the purpose of considering the amendments and subsequently recommended to the Senate that, because of the amount of work remaining to be done, the bill should not be proceeded with further at that session.

During the summer of 1952 the bill was reviewed by the officers of my department in the light of the recommendations made by the banking and commerce subcommittee and a number of recommendations made by that subcommittee were adopted. The views of the criminal law section of the conference of commissioners on uniformity of legislation in Canada were also sought and secured in respect of particular provisions in the bill. I might also mention that the bill was the subject of a paper delivered by Mr. F. G. Scott, crown prosecutor for the city of Vancouver, to the section on the administration of criminal justice of the Canadian Bar Association at the meeting of that organization at Vancouver in September last. Mr. Scott, after observing that the bill had been studied intensively by a committee of lawyers, including the provincial deputy attorney general, a learned magistrate and nine or ten lawyers recognized as very skilled in criminal law, made the following comment in connection with the bill:

> One comment I find is common to every brief that I have received: this is the wholehearted commendation to the commission for what is unanimously termed a wonderful piece of work.

In addition, during the summer recess, the Department of Justice received comments on the bill from a number of barristers in Canada and, after due consideration, certain proposals made by these gentlemen were incorporated in the bill which is now before you.

The bill was again introduced in the Senate in November at the opening of the present session of parliament and was referred again to the banking and commerce committee. The subcommittee held fifteen meetings and examined the measure clause by clause. In their deliberations, the subcommittee and the main committee had the assistance of officers of my department who were familiar with the bill. In addition, the main committee heard witnesses representing interested groups in Canada.

I think that in closing my remarks I should mention two matters that were the subject of amendments in the other place and that will undoubtedly merit discussion here when the bill is in committee.

The first of these is the question of appeals from convictions for contempt of court. Neither under the law of England nor under the law of Canada is there express provision granting an appeal, as of right, by a person convicted of contempt of court in connection with criminal proceedings. The Senate apparently considers that some provision should be made in the criminal law to permit appeals in such circumstances, and accordingly an amendment has been made in the other place to clause 8 of the bill providing for an appeal to the court of appeal of the provinces. Under the amendment, where a contempt is committed in the face of the court, no appeal would lie in respect of the conviction, but an appeal would lie in respect of the sentence imposed. Where the contempt is committed not in the face of the court, an appeal would lie both from the conviction and from the sentence imposed. I do not propose to discuss this question further at this time, but I shall have more to say in this connection when the bill is in committee.

The other matter to which I should like to direct the attention of hon. members is clause 46 of the bill, which defines the offence of treason. In the draft bill prepared by the Criminal Code revision commissioners and in the bill introduced in the Senate, paragraph (e) of clause 46 provided:

> Everyone commits treason who, in Canada, conspires with an agent of a state other than Canada to communicate information or to do an act that is likely to be prejudicial to the safety or interests of Canada.

This was undoubtedly an extension of the law of treason beyond what is contained in the law of treason at the present time under the Criminal Code and the common law. The punishment provided in the bill for this offence was death or any term of any imprisonment up to life imprisonment. It appears to have been the opinion of the hon. gentlemen in the other place that this is not an offence that should properly be defined or punished as treason, and the paragraph in question has accordingly been transferred by the Senate to clause 50 of the bill which provides a punishment of imprisonment for a term not exceeding fourteen years. This is also a matter upon which I shall have more to say when the bill is in committee.

In conclusion I might point out again that the revision of the Criminal Code was not undertaken for the purpose of effecting changes in broad principles. As hon. members know, our system of criminal jurisprudence embodies the high principles of the British system and provides as fair and just a system as it is possible to devise to ensure that justice will be accorded to all. I am sure that hon. members who study this bill will agree that there has been no departure from these principles.

In closing I should like to say on behalf of myself and the government that we appreciate fully the work which has been done by the commissioners who produced the original draft and by the various lawyers, the commissioners on the uniformity of legislation and others who have taken a keen interest and have made many useful suggestions, some of which have been incorporated in the bill before us.

Of all that group there are none who are entitled to greater commendation and gratitude than the members of the Senate committee on banking and commerce, in particular Senators Hayden, Farris and Roebuck, members of the subcommittee. Their long and arduous labours upon this bill have been invaluable and entitle them to the gratitude of the people of Canada.

Mr. Fulton: I wonder if before concluding the minister would say a word with respect to the proposal to send the bill to a special committee. The minister merely referred to that, but did not enlarge upon it.

Mr. Garson: After second reading a motion will be made to refer the bill to a committee.

Mr. Fulton: It is the intention to move that motion immediately following second reading?

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Fulton: There will be an opportunity at that time to discuss the matter?

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult at this stage to say very much on a subject of this nature. This is the motion for second reading of a bill, not to amend so much as to revise and consolidate the Criminal Code. In discussing the principle of the bill one would be discussing the very principles of criminal justice, to which the minister has made reference in his closing remarks. The principles of criminal justice as they prevail in Canada are not of themselves the object of this bill now before us. As the minister said, the intention was not to alter or vary those principles but rather to codify the various sections of the code as they have grown up over a large number of years, dealing with various criminal offences and the procedures by which they would be tried.

My remarks will not be extensive, but there are some observations I should like to make. At the outset I join in what the minister said by way of expressing gratitude which this house and country owes to the commission and committee appointed to undertake this revision and also to the committee of the Senate which reviewed the bill the commission drafted. It is no detraction from my sincere expression of appreciation to those bodies when I say that no minority report was submitted by the committee, although it is my understanding that certain members had some reservations which they did not feel could be placed in a minority report. They were nonetheless serious, although not reduced to writing in that form.

It is not to cavil at the really outstanding job done by these bodies to say that I feel that these reservations, which were shared by other lawyers in the country, should be referred to at this stage in the hope that when discussed in the committee and advanced as objections or reservations in connection with certain provisions in the bill they may perhaps form the basis of amendments in an effort to improve the work done.

I should say also that I am speaking on behalf of the official opposition in the absence of at least one and perhaps several who are more qualified than I am to deal with this subject. I express the regret of this party, and I am sure the regret of the whole house, at the unfortunate and enforced absence of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) on this occasion. In the remarks that I shall make I am frank to confess that I speak not as an expert but simply in an effort to put into workmanlike language the views which have been expressed to me by those who are undoubted experts in this field.

The fundamental criticism which has been advanced to me is that while the committee and commission were instructed and did make a real effort not to rewrite the substantive portions of the Criminal Code, but merely to codify them, they did in fact on a number of occasions yield to what has been described as temptation to rewrite the substantive as well as the procedural law, and to use words with respect to that substantive law.

The objection advanced to that course is that criminal jurisprudence has been built up over the years, in fact for almost a century, around the wording of the Criminal Code as it was first enacted, and it will be a matter of considerable difficulty for the courts to interpret the new provisions of the substantive law. It will be necessary for the courts to reinterpret words and to that extent build up new jurisprudence. Wherever words of an old section dealing with an offence have been changed it will necessarily involve the development of new jurisprudence regarding interpretation and application.

It seemed to those who expressed this view that it was unnecessary that that course should have been followed, that a greater determination should have been shown not to write new law but simply to stick to the task of codifying the existing law.

Then there have been objections and criticism with respect to another matter mentioned by the minister in his remarks this afternoon. That is in connection with the enlarged jurisdiction of magistrates. It is no part of my intention, Mr. Speaker, to imply in any degree that magistrates are not conscientious, hard-working and, for the most part, fully qualified men; nevertheless I think it is a fact that by the very nature of things magistrates are not as highly qualified as judges of either the county or supreme courts of our provinces. It is felt for that reason that it is a dangerous tendency, particularly in criminal matters, to enlarge the jurisdiction of magistrates, and it has been suggested that to do so, to enlarge the jurisdiction of magistrates, who sit of course always without a jury, obliquely abolishes or whittles away the right of an accused to trial by jury which is such a fundamental part of our criminal law.

In that connection I realize that the commissioners have themselves pointed out that the accused is still free to elect whether or not he will be tried by jury. What the commissioners have to say on that point is found at page 13 of the mimeographed copy of their report which was presented to parliament last year. They say:

> Consideration was given to the extension of the absolute jurisdiction of magistrates and it was decided that certain minor extensions of this jurisdiction would be justified.

Then they go on to refer to the actual sections of the new bill which have that effect. They say:

> The absolute jurisdiction was further extended—

This is absolute jurisdiction, not qualified or elective.

> —to include attempts to commit the offences of obtaining property by false pretences, receiving and retaining, where the value of the property does not exceed $50.

Then they go on to say:

> In view of the requirement that magistrates who are to exercise jurisdiction under the part must be expressly appointed for the purpose, it was decided that the number of offences which should now be required to be tried by judge and jury should be reduced to include only treasonable offences, piracy and piratical acts, murder, manslaughter, combinations in restraint of trade, discrimination in trade, accessory after the fact to murder or treason, attempt to commit murder and conspiracy to murder. The rights of an accused are in no way impaired as he is entitled to elect whether he will be tried by a judge and jury, by a judge alone, or by a magistrate.

Although they have placed in there that last sentence I have read, and the minister himself has referred to it, I beg to take some issue with that statement. My submission is that, the jurisdiction of the magistrate having been enlarged and in some cases, as contained in the extract from which I quoted earlier, absolute jurisdiction having been extended, it is a fact that that is a whittling down of the right of the accused to trial by jury. Even where an accused has an election, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that it is a dangerous tendency because we know that there is a temptation to the police, who are conscientiously endeavouring to do a good job—it is with that spirit that they approach their duty, and I fully recognize it—to get a case disposed of as quickly as possible and to suggest to an accused person that he probably will be better off if he has his case disposed of with as little fuss and bother as possible, and probably it would be to his advantage to elect to be tried by a magistrate.

There are ways and ways of suggesting to an accused person just how it will be to his advantage to follow that course. Accused persons, perhaps people in trouble for the first time, not being aware of the seriousness of their position and not always realizing the fact that they are going to have a blot on their records which will follow them for the rest of their lives, are prone where the police seem friendly—they do want to keep it out of the papers and so on—to accept these suggestions. I believe that is a dangerous tendency. I realize that it is one that is welcome to prosecuting officers, but I believe it is a dangerous tendency thus to enlarge the jurisdiction of magistrates and, as I have said, to whittle away the absolute right of an accused to trial by jury.

I have heard criticism by lawyers well qualified and experienced in these matters that in this respect, as well as in some of the revised procedural sections, there has been a tendency to rewrite the law from the point of view of the prosecuting officer so as to make it easier to obtain convictions. There has been a tendency to eliminate some of the difficulties experienced by these very prosecuting officers in the past in obtaining convictions, and I state very definitely that is a fundamentally wrong approach to the task of revising the Criminal Code.

A closely related subject to that which I have just been discussing has to do with the question of the trial de novo. That is the question of the appeal from a conviction by a magistrate to a superior judge which, under the code as it stands, has to be a trial de novo, that is to say a new trial with witnesses called and the full evidence presented again. The proposal of the commissioners in the draft bill was that such an appeal should not be a trial de novo, but merely an appeal on questions of law; that all that should be before the judge of the higher court would be the record, such as it might be, of the proceedings in the magistrate's court, and that the judge should not have before him the witnesses and the evidence upon which the conviction was based.

I am very glad indeed to find that the Senate committee recommended, and in fact has written into the bill as reported to us from the other place, the principle that formerly existed in the code that an appeal from a conviction by a magistrate to a higher court shall be by way of a trial de novo. I hope this house will preserve that provision which the Senate has rewritten into the bill before us.

I do not wish to transgress the rule against discussing particulars, but I think these are matters of principle. I want to mention the reservations that are felt by a large number of qualified lawyers with respect to the elimination of the necessity for corroboration in sexual offences. That is referred to at page 16 of the report of the commission. They say:

> One example is that under the present code on a charge of rape or indecent assault, the evidence of the complainant need not be corroborated. However, a rule of practice requires the trial judge to give a warning as to the danger of convicting on the complainant's evidence alone. This rule is codified and extended to cases of carnal knowledge with the result that under the draft bill corroboration of the evidence of the complainant is no longer required in cases of carnal knowledge.

I know that those who have had experience in criminal law and criminal trials have very great misgivings as to the tendency to eliminate the necessity for corroboration in connection with offences of this kind.

There are two other matters which I should like to mention in connection with the bill and the report of the royal commission. In reading the report I was disturbed to note that after the commissioners had stated that they had eliminated minimum fines, which I believe is a sound principle, they went on to state at page 19, in connection with the punishment for summary conviction offences:

> In keeping with our desire for simplification, the draft bill provides one general penalty for all summary conviction offences, namely, a fine of $500 or six months' imprisonment, or both.

I mention this, Mr. Speaker, because I think it is perhaps important and certainly of general interest to those who may be considering this matter who probably would have been as disturbed as I was to see that, on a first reading of these words at any rate, a standard fine of $500 for all summary conviction offences was being included. However, when you turn to the relief section and the new part dealing with summary convictions, you will find that the fine of $500 is a maximum with no set minimum at all, and that minimum sentences have been eliminated. However the first impression gathered from a reading of the committee's report is that everyone convicted on summary procedure would be fined $500. That is not borne out by the words of the section involved, which I think is 694.

The final subject which I would like to mention is in connection with this section referred to by the minister, dealing with the offences of treason and related offences against the state. I have certain very definite views on this matter, Mr. Speaker, and I think it is most unfortunate that the waters have been muddied to a certain extent by presentations—I do not want to dignify them by that word, but it was a form of presentation—made to the Senate committee by the communist leader in this country, Tim Buck.

[Mr. Fulton.]

I take the view that notwithstanding the fact that the communists may have muddied the water, we should not refrain from expressing our own considered opinions on the merits or demerits of these provisions because we are in the unfortunate position that somebody else may have spoken on the matter.

I am not going to go into detail in this house at this stage on all these questions, but I think there are certain things which can be said on these matters, as well as the relation to what I have described already as an unfortunate tendency to make it easier to obtain convictions. As I said, one matter is improperly enlarging the jurisdiction of magistrates in certain respects. However, I think the proper place for that discussion would be in the committee which the minister proposes to set up. What we say here is of general application and it is not easy to be specific.

I do want to say that while I reject absolutely the hypocritical utterances of the communist leader, Tim Buck, in this regard, nevertheless I hope that all other members will feel free, as I do, to express their views when the matter is reached.

Just in case it should appear from my remarks, which have dealt with what I consider to be weaknesses in the bill, that I am too critical, I want to say that I hope I have not left that impression. I think the bill represents tremendous work and improvement by way of codifying and shortening the code. I want to say that I join fully with the minister in the sentiments he expressed regarding the debt which the country owes to the commission and the Senate committee who have done such outstanding work in this connection.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to make a few remarks on second reading of this bill. I notice that it is getting pretty close to five o'clock, and on two or three occasions we have trespassed on the hour for private and public bills, so I wonder if the house would be willing to call it five o'clock now and go on with other items. If so, I might make my remarks in a more connected fashion at eight o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the house consent to call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE BILLS

BEAVER FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 43, respecting Beaver Fire Insurance Company —Mr. Rooney—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Name changed.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I wonder if the sponsor of this bill could say a few words about it. Is this company operating all over Canada?

Mr. Rooney: Yes, all over Canada. The head office is in Winnipeg, but at the moment they are changing their offices from Winnipeg to Toronto.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Why?

Mr. Rooney: I suppose it may be possible they want to come to a great city. The only change in this bill, however, is to allow them to extend their activities to other than fire insurance.

Mr. Knowles: They are establishing a branch office in Toronto? Is that the idea?

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Section agreed to.

Bill No. 99, for the relief of Arthur Piche.—Mr. Winkler.

The Chairman: Shall the bills carry?

Mr. Knowles: Before you put that motion, may I just say a word? It is not my intention to do what I have done on some of these occasions with respect to these bills, namely to require of the house patient attention to and consideration of each of them. But I do feel that the house should at least be conscious of what it is doing. We are now being asked, by the terms of the motion which has just been called, to agree to clause 1 of 74 different divorce bills at one and the same moment. Surely the continuation of this process underlines it as something that this parliament should not be doing.

REPRESENTATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO CHANGE THE NAME OF CONSTITUENCY TO SWIFT CURRENT-MAPLE CREEK

Mr. Irvin Studer (Maple Creek) moved the second reading of Bill No. 101, to amend the Representation Act, 1952.

Mr. Knowles: Is anyone going to speak to this bill on behalf of the government?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I shall gladly do so, and say that because of the excellent presentation of the hon. member for Maple Creek the government has no objection to the bill.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am very interested in the comment which has just been made by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris). I may say that we, too, have no objection to the bill or to the idea that the name of Maple Creek be continued along with that of Swift Current for that very large constituency in the southwest corner of Saskatchewan. It does seem to me, however, that it should be noted that it is something of a precedent for the Representation Act to be amended in between the redistributions that take place once every ten years.

In view of the fact that the government has agreed with the excellent representations, as the minister called them, made the other day by the member for Maple Creek

(Mr. Studer), I hope the government attitude will be the same if similarly excellent representations are made for any other changes in the same Representation Act. I realize that if one were to suggest changes of any great substance, the moving of boundaries or anything like that, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) would say that was a different matter, and he would be correct.

There is one point I should like to call to his attention now, and I do so very briefly. I hope he may indicate some day, not necessarily now, whether the same receptive mood would be forthcoming toward it. It so happens that the line drawn between the constituency I have the honour to represent, and the constituency of my colleague the member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), goes straight through an institution—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I just wonder whether, during the discussion of this bill, one can permit a discussion of the boundaries of various constituencies. I think that is going perhaps beyond the principle in this bill. Unless the house wants to have a general discussion—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: —I believe the discussion should be strictly relevant to the present bill.

Mr. Knowles: I dared to hope, Mr. Speaker, that since it was an act to amend the Representation Act, some minor points of this nature might be mentioned. I shall not trespass on the ruling Your Honour has just given. I simply repeat what I said a moment ago, that I hope the precedent that has been established by permitting the act to be amended when the representations are excellent will be remembered if some of the rest of us make similarly excellent representations for minor changes.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DIVORCE JURISDICTION

EXCHEQUER COURT TO HAVE JURISDICTION IN ACTIONS ORIGINATING IN QUEBEC AND NEWFOUNDLAND

The house resumed, from Friday, January 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles for the second reading of Bill No. 3, to provide for the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court of Canada in matters of divorce.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question? I understand that this is an adjourned debate. Those in favour of the motion will please say yea?

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

I declare the motion lost.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE QUORUM OF HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles for the second reading of Bill No. 18, to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1952, with respect to the quorum of the House of Commons.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): If I may take part in the adjourned debate, I should like to move that the subject matter of this bill be referred to the select committee on procedure which was set up yesterday, I believe.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As I indicated the other day when the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) suggested this procedure would be followed, it is acceptable. Naturally, anyone bringing in a bill hopes he may have success such as the member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) had a moment ago. If the government does not feel that it can accept the measure without further study, certainly it is highly desirable that it should be studied. I think it is a step in the right direction that the subject matter be referred to the committee over which Your Honour will preside. I dare to hope that, as a member of that committee, I shall be able to persuade the other members of the committee that it is desirable to recommend back to this house that this bill again be put on the order paper and be given second reading and final approval at a later date in the session.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the amendment to refer the subject matter to the committee referred to by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris).

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Harris) agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 54, STATUTES OF 1947-1948—VOLUNTARY REVOCABLE CHECK-OFF OF UNION DUES

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles for the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (voluntary revocable check-off).

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, toward the end of my remarks last Tuesday I had occasion to refer to the debate which took place on the same subject during the session of 1951. I then quoted a question I had put to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) during the course of his remarks, and I commented on the reply which he gave on that occasion. Since then I have had occasion to check on the debate of that day; and in order to keep the record clear I should like first to refer to the same debate and to quote a word or two of what I had to say and the reply which the hon. member who is moving his amendment made to a question of mine on that occasion. This is to be found at page 768 of Hansard of February 28, 1951:

> I am sure that my hon. friend would not be satisfied, even if we were to pass this bill providing for the voluntary revocable check-off. I am sure that it would not be long before he would come to the house again and ask for another amendment calling for a greater measure of union security. Do I understand that my hon. friend agrees with what I say?
> Mr. Knowles: Yes.
> Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Thank you. If that is so, by adopting this amendment we are engaging the state in a field of activity which belongs to labour and management, and we would be restricting more and more as we went along the area of free collective bargaining between labour and management.

After I concluded my remarks my colleague, now the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair), made a contribution, and he was followed by the hon. member for Vancouver East who had this to say as reported at page 772 of Hansard of 1951:

> Then the parliamentary assistant went on to say that he was opposed to it because if the house approved this amendment today the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would be back next year asking for something else. Well, surely that is what parliament is for. Surely even if we pass this amendment today the act will not be perfect, and someone like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will note that we have not yet attained perfection and will come forward here, where such matters should be brought up, and propose other amendments that will make the act more nearly perfect.
> Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Where will it end if you accept that principle?
> Mr. MacInnis: It will never end as long as there is a human wrong to be corrected, as long as the weak person or the weak organization needs protection from the strong.

In order to show the relevancy of my comments on these quotations which I have just made, I wish to make clear that at that time we were discussing matters relating to the field of collective bargaining between labour and management. Of course, in the act which this bill attempts to amend prohibitions have been enacted; duties and privileges have been determined for both sides, that of management and that of labour. But in opposing the bill before the house my thesis is precisely that in the act parliament has kept away from a field which has always been the exclusive privilege of management and labour, namely that of collective bargaining. Since matters of check-off and matters of union security generally have, by tradition, been reserved as matters appropriate for collective bargaining I contended, as I still contend, that parliament should not interfere.

If parliament enacts the bill which we are now considering, we will be setting a precedent of interference by parliament in the field of collective bargaining. The precedent having been set, there is no reason why, on other occasions in years to come, parliament should not be called upon to entertain other amendments which would bring the state further and further on in that field of collective bargaining. If I am mistaken I would ask the hon. member for Vancouver East to correct me, but I think in the light of the discussion which took place on this same subject in 1951, what divides the trend of thought of the sponsor of this bill and his group from the one which I entertain is a matter of procedure.

The two groups, those favouring the passing of this bill and those opposing it, are anxious to see the trade unions of this country gain strength, prestige and influence throughout the years to come. Rightly or wrongly—and there are differences of opinion—this question of check-off is considered as a procedure for the collecting of union dues which tends to strengthen the position of a union in a plant.

I agree with the principle of the check-off of union dues, as do those who are sponsoring the bill. What differentiates the two attitudes in this matter is that we on this side of the house feel that it is a matter which should be left to labour and management to discuss and negotiate between themselves, while my friends opposite claim at this time that this is a matter that should be enforced by statutory action.

In the past my hon. friends opposite had a stronger argument in support of their contention on this particular matter, when they referred to the situation in the Canadian railways and deplored the attitude of the railway companies, who had opposed the acceptance of any measure of check-off. The companies seemed strongly determined not to change their attitude. As a matter of fact the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did refer to the brief which the railway association had circulated among the membership of this house and outside of this house at the time the companies raised several objections to any legislation in the nature of the bill which is now being considered.

If I may, I should like to emphasize that their main objections were the following: The first was that the introduction as a statutory obligation upon all employers of what is essentially a matter of bargaining is fundamentally unsound. Their second objection was that the extent of the burden of the enforced check-off upon separate industries will vary greatly, and that it will be very serious upon some of them, for instance, on the major railway companies. Their third objection was that the major railway companies deal with 27 different organizations representing over 150,000 employees, and from any or all of such organizations requests for check-offs might be received. The fourth objection was that these railway companies have employees throughout the country from coast to coast, many of whom are located at isolated points, but of necessity the accounting and payroll procedures are centralized at relatively few points, substantially distant from many of the places of employment. Another objection was that this centralized accounting procedure of necessity requires the handling of a large volume of work in a limited period of time, and there is a period of only two weeks from the close of a pay period until pay cheques must be available for delivery to the employees, including all the time the payrolls and pay cheques are in transit and the time involved in connection with auditing payrolls and preparing pay cheques. And finally they objected on the basis that there are differences in the amounts of the dues collected by the various unions. In some cases, the union dues payable are dependent upon minimum monthly earnings.

I do not intend to speak at any great length on the recent agreement which was concluded between the brotherhoods representing the non-operating trades of the railway companies last December 19, especially in view of the fact that there is at the present time a situation which we all hope will be terminated as quickly as possible, before any threat of a strike is implemented.

Nevertheless I wish to refer to the agreement which was concluded on December 19 in order to show that through negotiation, and in spite of the seven or eight serious objections which the railway companies had interposed throughout the years in their negotiations with labour organizations in order to avoid any bargaining or any conclusion of an agreement on the matter of the check-off, in spite of all that there was included in the agreement of last December, to which I have referred, a provision for the check-off of union dues, which my hon. friend who introduced this bill has read in extenso, and which I should also like to quote. It is found on page 43 of the report of the conciliation board, and reads as follows:

> With regard to the check-off, the board is of opinion that, as every employee now has the same right as any other creditor to assign the whole or any part of any debt, present or future owing to him, the proposed clause is one that should properly form part of the new agreements.

As a matter of fact, in the language in which this recommendation was set out in the agreement I can say, and my hon. friend recognizes it, I think, that the provision goes beyond the provision of the bill we are now considering.

If through the usual bargaining process the brotherhoods or organized labour generally have succeeded in concluding an agreement on a matter such as the check-off, which was subject to such strong irreductible opposition on the part of management in years gone by, I cannot see that today the bill now before us can be supported even to the extent to which it received support in the last few years. I do not claim, and I have never contended in the past, that at no time in the future would it not be possible to consider the propriety of any measure such as the one submitted by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but I claim that any such measure should not be introduced in this house before prior consultation with management and labour organizations in this country, and without securing their approval on the basic principle of this or any like measure.

At the time the late Humphrey Mitchell introduced the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, either in the house or in committee he expressed the view to the hon. member for Vancouver East or the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) that it would be premature and perhaps not right to attempt to revise or to alter the basic principles of the act until some experience had been gained of its workings. To a direct question he replied that in his estimation that period should be at least five years. The act came into force in September, 1948, and that five-year period will be up next fall.

The information I have is that the act is functioning well, and that the Canada labour relations board has been gathering important and useful jurisprudence on matters of certification of unions and so on. I should think that the material obtained from the administration of the act, the experience gained by officers of the department, by leaders of trade unions and of management organizations would be such that we might consider at the next session of this parliament, or at the conclusion of the five-year period I have mentioned, examining the old act in the light of that experience. I think that would be a proper procedure to follow. I do not think it would be wise to attempt to amend an important act such as this piecemeal. We are being asked through this bill sponsored by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to do away with one of the basic principles of the act, the absolute freedom of collective bargaining to which management and labour are committed.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Could the parliamentary assistant tell us just how many people would be affected by the provisions of this bill, and what different occupations are involved?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): The agreement signed on December 19 between the railway companies and the non-operating trades covered between 125,000 and 150,000 men, if I am not mistaken. Negotiations are going on between the railroad trainmen, totalling some 22,000, and the two companies. As far as the two railway companies are concerned, I think there would be a coverage of some 200,000 employees.

This bill would not apply to agreements in force which contain provision for a check-off such as the one concluded last December 19. In addition to railway employees I would imagine there would be close to 400,000 other employees across the country. My information has been that the ratio of railway employees to all employees, with the exception of civil servants, is one to three.

[Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle).]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is beginning to deal with another branch of the question that was raised and I would inform him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): I should like to ask a question of the hon. member for Vancouver East. I ask him in all sincerity whether he would not approve of the suggestion that we should not try to amend this act piecemeal, but should take advantage of the first opportunity to examine the act and revise it if necessary, following the same procedure followed when the act was first introduced. Would that not be the best way to attempt to bring about a betterment of the act?

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I shall answer the question asked by the parliamentary assistant before I go on to say what I intended to say on the second reading of this bill. If the idea he is proposing is accepted, that acts should not be amended before a certain period of time has elapsed, then no act would be amended except when the government—it would have to be the government—believed that a complete revision should take place. I do not accede to that theory at all. I believe this house—that is what we are here for—should amend legislation whenever we believe it would be in the public interest.

There is another reason why this particular amendment should not be considered as a fundamental change in the act. The amendment proposed in the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was approved when the committee on industrial relations was considering the bill before it became law. When the bill came into this house a motion was moved to rescind or delete the decision of the committee, and that was carried in the house. Therefore we are not asking for something that has not been before the industrial relations committee, or that has not been approved by the committee of 1948. However, I am grateful and encouraged by the speech which the parliamentary assistant made today. He has softened up considerably in the last few years and now, if I am not misinterpreting what he said, he has admitted that this amendment, if carried, would not have associated with it the dire consequences that he mentioned when we were discussing a similar bill in the session of 1951, I believe. In the parliamentary assistant's remarks on January 20 he referred to what I was supposed to have said when a similar bill was under discussion, and I have had this drawn to my attention. Let me read what he said, as found at page 1170 of Hansard:

> . . . when the hon. member for Vancouver East was discussing a similar bill, I asked him if the bill were passed whether he and his party would be satisfied to leave it at that, and give a guarantee that it would not be considered as a precedent; that they would not come here year after year asking for more and more interference by parliament in matters of collective bargaining. He said, "No, that is not the end; that is just the beginning." I can vouch for his reply on that occasion. So, that means a policy of opening the door wider and wider as the years go by, and some day bringing parliament to a position of dictating by statute what the wages, hours of work and conditions of work will be in any plant or industry coming under the jurisdiction of parliament.

That is putting an extremely wide interpretation on what I said on that occasion. I should like to say that if the occasion arises when parliament attempts to pass legislation that would bring about what the parliamentary assistant said would happen if this amendment were carried, I have not the slightest doubt in the world that if I am here I will be a stronger opponent of that action than he will. But he is not afraid of that any more. If after the end of this year, when the act will have been in operation for five years, the industrial relations committee should meet, as recommended by the late minister of labour, and recommend this change, my impression is that the parliamentary assistant would favour it. That is progress, as I see it.

May I call the attention of the parliamentary assistant to the fact that almost the first provision in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act dictates to workers and employers what they must do. It tells them that they must meet together and bargain together in good faith. That is something I am sure the parliamentary assistant would have strenuously objected to ten or fifteen years ago, if he had been in the house and such a proposal had been made. That step having been taken, other steps just as far-reaching have also been taken in the short time the act has been in effect. Let us see what the bill does. The amendment reads as follows:

> Upon request of a trade union entitled to bargain collectively under this act on behalf of a unit of employees and upon receipt of a request in writing signed by any employee in such unit, the employer of such employee shall, until the employee in writing withdraws such request, periodically deduct, and pay out of the wages due to such employee to the person designated by the trade union to receive the same, the union dues of such employee; and the employer shall furnish to such trade union the names of the employees who have given and withdrawn such authority.

I do not agree that parliament would be dictating to either employer or employee if this amendment were passed. As a matter of fact parliament would not be going any further than conciliation and arbitration boards have already gone in this direction. I think it was pointed out by the parliamentary assistant that the check-off was made part of the recent agreement reached between the railway companies and the non-operating employees. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) quoted the relevant paragraph in the board's findings when he spoke on January 13. It is very short and I will read it again. It is found at page 953 of Hansard and reads as follows:

> With regard to the check-off, the board is of opinion that, as every employee now has the same right as any other creditor to assign the whole or any part of any debt, present or future owing to him, the proposed clause is one that should properly form part of the new agreements.

We are not asking for any more in this amendment than is implicitly stated in the provision contained in the new agreements affecting the railways. Since we have had the so-called Rand formula in effect a principle has been developed the suggestion of which only a few years ago would have been considered outrageous, namely that all employees of an organization or industry covered by an agreement, whether or not they are members of the trade union, must pay trade union dues. The principle there is quite sound. The union provides advantages to the employees covered by the agreement, to those who are not members of the union as well as to those who are; but when such a provision does not apply, namely that non-union employees must pay union dues, non-union employees get the advantages without any expense whatever on their part. As a matter of fact it has been recognized that these non-union employees are spongers, and such a condition should not be tolerated in a properly organized democratic society.

I do not wish to take up any more time of the house debating this matter. It was covered so well in the speech made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when introducing the bill that there was really no need for me to say anything, but I rose because of the reference made by the parliamentary assistant to remarks that had been made on a similar bill some sessions ago, and also because of the question he put to me as he was concluding his speech. I am taking no exception to what he said when the bill was last under discussion. In regard to my remarks I am quite sure that he had no intention of misrepresenting me in any way whatsoever. I am quite sure he is not that kind of person, and I am satisfied to leave the matter there.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) told me that he wished to speak on this bill but he is out of town—

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): I wonder if the hon. member who has just taken his seat would let me give my reply, very shortly, to two or three questions which he has raised while commenting on my remarks in this debate.

Mr. MacInnis: It is up to Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I shall leave it to the house.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): I think these are three important questions, and I would like to put my answer on Hansard immediately. I thank the house for the privilege of doing so.

First, the hon. member has extended the meaning of my contention that we should rather favour revision of the act by the same procedure that was followed when it was introduced, than bring amendments piecemeal. The hon. member said that we do carry amending bills regularly in this house and it would not be a good move to have a bill amending an existing statute opposed with the suggestion that the whole act should be revised in each instance. I suggest that the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act is not an ordinary act. It is one which deals with human relations and, precisely on account of that, there are basic principles which should not be changed piecemeal. There was a specific purpose in laying down the basic principles of this important act, and in submitting them for approval by organizations of labour and management and by the members of this house, through a committee. The act should not be altered in any of its basic features without the whole act being considered through the same process.

In the second place, the hon. member says that at the very beginning of the act there is a provision making it compulsory for labour and management to negotiate. He says that we already have that compulsory feature at the very beginning of the act. Yes, labour and management are obliged to get together and bargain in good faith; but the act does not say in any way what the bargain shall be. I say to my hon. friend that this bill would be one that would tell the parties what they must include in their agreements as far as union security is concerned, namely the voluntary revocable check-off of union dues.

I know the minister would like to participate in the debate, but I do not think it is necessary for me or anyone else to move the adjournment this afternoon, because I know some other members would like to express views on this bill.

Mr. Knowles: You couldn't anyway.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): As I have taken part in the debates on similar bills in previcus sessions, I would like also to take part again this afternoon.

First of all, may I say to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) that I can assure him that members on all sides of the house are very pleased to see him back in his place and taking part in the proceedings and debates in this house with his old vigour and effective approach.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dickey: As I say, Mr. Speaker, the subject matter here has been before the house on previous occasions and the hon. member is certainly persistent in bringing the proposal before parliament. Perhaps we can be forgiven if we show equal persistence in speaking on this measure and expressing the views we hold with regard to it, which are contrary to his own.

My particular concern in so far as the subject matter of the bill is concerned has been the position of the employees of our two great railway systems. It has always appeared to me that their position has been one of the more important factors in considering the provisions of our labour code and the suggested amendment contained in this bill. I am not going to put on record any quotations which indicate the stand I have taken in the past but I would like to say that, in addition to expressing my views in the house here, I have felt that it is the duty of members of parliament to discuss questions of this kind with their constituents to determine what their views are and whether or not they have any suggestions about how these questions can be approached and dealt with.

For that reason I have discussed on a number of occasions the exact subject matter of this bill with friends of mine in the membership of railway unions in my constituency of Halifax. I have found that some of them agreed with the general position that I have taken in the matter, and some of them did not agree. My position, as far as they were concerned, was to urge that, if they wished to have a check-off, they should present those wishes to the companies in the course of their regular collective bargaining, with the objective of attempting to secure the kind of check-off they wished through that process. I have also taken the opportunity of expressing my views to one of the railway companies about what they should do; that they should consider this question as a matter of collective bargaining and not expect parliament to deal with it as a matter of legislation.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Dickey the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF EXISTING STATUTE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Garson for the second reading of Bill No. 93, respecting the criminal law.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we readily approve of the suggestion which has been made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), that after this bill has been given second reading it should be referred to a special committee, so that that committee, on behalf of the house, might make a very thorough study of all its provisions. We are aware of the fact that a great deal of study has already gone into the preparation of this bill. We realize that there was considerable work and study before the bill was ever introduced. It is also a fact that the members of the Senate gave a great deal of thorough study to the provisions of this bill, and that as a result of that study quite a number of changes were made. Those changes are incorporated in the bill in the form in which it is now before this house.

Nevertheless, we feel that it should not be contended that because of all the prior studies by the commission, by the officers of the department and by the members of the Senate, this should curtail to any degree whatsoever our examination of the provisions of this legislation. After all, the members of this House of Commons are the elected representatives of the people of Canada. It is we who are most responsible for legislation that goes on the statute books, and I strongly urge that the committee which is set up to study this bill be given plenty of time, all the assistance it needs and all possible encouragement to do a really thorough job on this revision of the Criminal Code. I hope, too, that that committee will be given the usual powers to send for persons, papers and records; and that it will use that power to extend invitations to interested bodies and organizations that may wish to appear before the committee to make representations. I want to say that, in our view, we cannot be too careful in discharging our responsibility as the elected representatives in this parliament with respect to this very important piece of legislation.

It is true, of course, that in many sections of this bill we have simply a consolidation, codification or carrying forward in slightly different language of the provisions or principles that have been in the criminal law of Canada for a long time. As a matter of fact the Minister of Justice this afternoon suggested that the desire in revising the Criminal Code was not to effect changes in broad principles, and in many sections of the bill that idea has been kept in mind. However, despite the fact that that desire was laid down by the minister as a guide, it does seem to us that there are a number of instances where very definite changes have been made in this legislation, both as to principle and with respect to the severity of punishment that is prescribed for certain offences. I shall, in developing my remarks, refer to some of the instances where it seems to us new law is being written in this code. I mention it now simply to support the plea I make that there be no attempt to rush this committee, but that it be given a chance to do a thorough job on this very important piece of legislation.

With respect to the principle of the bill, the subject matter of the legislation itself, we feel that there are certain shortcomings. I need not take time to speak of the advantages of revising the code, and all the good things which are in it which are being carried forward. Those can be taken for granted. It is our job, particularly on the opposition side of the house but also we feel it is the job of all members, to be concerned where we feel there are errors or shortcomings in legislation of this kind. I shall point to a number.

In the first place, we are dissatisfied that the legislation contains no clear statement as to the purpose of the punishment of criminals. I draw attention in particular to what, in my view, was the very excellent brief on the revision of the Criminal Code which was presented to the minister on June 8, 1950, by the Canadian Welfare Council. The point I have just now suggested is made very effectively as the first point in that brief. To put it in the language of the Canadian Welfare Council, I would quote from page 2 of the brief where they say:

> This committee recommends inclusion in the Criminal Code of a statement of the purpose of criminal punishment emphasizing that the aim is the protection of society through the reform of the individual.

The Canadian Welfare Council gives certain instances where the purposes of similar legislation have been indicated in the legislation itself, and in my view the government has not paid sufficient attention to that part of the brief submitted to it by the Canadian Welfare Council.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Did I understand the hon. member to say that he would give illustrations where the aim of the legislation was contained in the statute?

Mr. Knowles: Right on the next page of the brief I hold in my hand the Canadian Welfare Council states this:

> Such a guide is provided in similar legislation. Section 38 of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, 1929, states:

There is a paragraph from that act, and perhaps I should put it on the record.

> This act shall be liberally construed to the end that its purpose may be carried out, to wit: That the care and custody and discipline of a juvenile delinquent shall approximate as nearly as may be that which should be given by its parents, and that as far as practicable every juvenile delinquent shall be treated, not as a criminal, but as a misdirected and misguided child, and one needing aid, encouragement, help and assistance.

I am not suggesting that in the Criminal Code for adults the purpose would be exactly the same as that; but I am suggesting that if in that legislation it is possible to state its purpose, it should be possible to do it in this legislation.

As has often been said by the hon. member who has just interrupted, because of his own great personal interest in the whole question of penal reform, we have made great progress in our thinking as to crime, and its punishment, and the reform of criminals. I agree with the representations made by the Canadian Welfare Council that this progress in our thinking with respect to crime, its punishment and the reform of criminals should be reflected in the legislation when we are rewriting the Criminal Code.

Mr. Fulton: Will the hon. member permit a suggestion as to what the title might be?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: I suggest that the title should be "An act for the prevention and punishment of crime." That is what it is concerned with.

Mr. Knowles: I think the suggestion is one that deserves consideration, and I am glad to have these interjections by my two hon. friends. I hope these interjections will suggest to the minister that maybe this point which they are supporting, and which the Canadian Welfare Council urged upon this government, should be given more consideration than it appears to have been given thus far.

A second shortcoming or complaint that it was my intention to develop a bit with respect to this legislation was given to the house this afternoon by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). I fully agree with the position he took, so I shall not take time more than just to state it. He quoted certain authorities in support of his position—and my legal advice is the same—that the legislation seems to have been drafted from the viewpoint of the prosecution, its aim apparently being to make it easier to secure convictions. That aim, Mr. Speaker, is obviously inconsistent with the modern philosophy of the treatment of crime, to which I have referred in quoting from the Canadian Welfare Council. We feel that here too there is a shortcoming, and I hope this aspect will be gone into thoroughly by the special committee which deals with this legislation.

At the expense of being repetitious, I repeat my plea that the committee not be rushed, that it not be told by whoever is its chairman that this bill has all been gone over by the commissioners, by the officers of the department and by Their Honours in the other place and therefore it should be put through in a hurry. By doing that we would not be discharging our responsibilities as elected members of parliament.

A third aspect of this legislation which it seems to us should be looked into carefully is the way in which a number of the punishments provided have been considerably increased in severity. Entirely apart from the question whether or not that course is consistent with modern philosophy so far as the treatment of crime is concerned, and just on the basis of older ideas, we find it hard to understand why there should be so many instances where the punishment has been increased, in some cases from several months to a number of years, in some cases from two years to fourteen years and in some cases from a few years to the possibility of life imprisonment. I need not worry the house with details; I have a number of them jotted down.

Despite the fact that this aspect may have been looked at by those who have gone over this legislation before us, we suggest that is a fairly serious change to be making in the law of this country, and that the committee should look at it carefully. There is one case—it slips my memory for the moment but it does not matter—in which the punishment provided was increased the last time we went over the code in 1951; and now, only a year and a half or two years later, it is being increased again to quite a substantial extent. We therefore feel that that is another aspect of the code which the members of this house and of the committee which will do the main work on this legislation should look at carefully.

Then, too, as a fourth comment about this bill—and one which underlines the need for giving it careful study—I wish to mention the fact that it seems to involve a good deal of changing of established law. In view of the things I say from time to time, and will probably continue to say, about lawyers and their reliance on precedents and so on, it may seem a bit out of character for me to take the other side for a moment; but despite the shortcomings of the law, the way it has been written and the way it has been phrased, it seems to me that to make the number of changes that are being made in this legislation, without careful and thorough examination of it, would not be wise or responsible action on our part.

It may be that every one of these changes can be defended, but let us not rush into it. There is an atmosphere of fear and anxiety abroad today; and sometimes there is undue pressure, it seems to me, to try to deal with things by suddenly changing the law and making the punishment more severe. All of this is exceedingly important. I would suggest that it would be far better to take considerable time to go over this legislation with respect to its codification and its legal aspects and produce a good bill, one that is really satisfactory, rather than just to have the satisfaction the minister might like to experience of getting the legislation through and getting it on the statute books.

Mr. Carroll: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? What was the particular crime to which he made reference, as to which a change was made in the punishment some years ago and another change is made in the present legislation?

Mr. Knowles: I believe that is in the sections dealing with treason, but I am not quite sure. If I can find my notes on that point, so my answer may be correct, I should be glad to do so.

An hon. Member: Try the other pocket.

Mr. Knowles: It is section 62 which deals with sedition. I did not have quite the right word. In 1951 the penalty was increased from two years to seven years; and by this bill it would be increased to fourteen years. At any rate, that was the example I had in mind.

Mr. Speaker, thus far I have given four reasons why we feel that this bill should be looked at carefully, and we regard each of those reasons as important. I have left to the last, the fifth of our criticisms of this bill, an aspect which is perhaps more important than any of those I have mentioned thus far. It is our feeling that in this legislation there are provisions which will have the effect of imposing greater restrictions on the rights of citizens, particularly in relation to the rights of labour and established civil liberties, than we have yet had in this country. As I launch into a few comments on this question I want to say how much I appreciated—as I think all hon. members of the house did—the way in which the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) approached this question this afternoon. I am sure we all agree with him that it does not matter what anyone else may have said about these questions, the rights of labour, and civil liberties; it does not matter that criticisms have been levelled against these sections in this bill by people whose motives we may not trust; surely if we think these restrictive sections are wrong, it is our right and our duty to say so, and it is our privilege to say so without any charge of association being applied against the hon. member for Kamloops or any of the others of us who may be concerned about legislation which seems to impose restrictions on the rights of citizens which are contrary to the principles of democracy.

As I said a few moments ago—and we all recognize it—there is in the atmosphere of this day and age quite an element of fear. We know whence that fear comes, and there is no point in trying to deny that it is there. Most of us can remember the days in the early part of this century when we thought freedom and democracy were on the march, and it was just a matter of time until their glory would spread and cover the entire earth. We have seen quite a reversal of that trend in the last few decades, and we live today in the fear that we might lose some of the freedoms which were won in the nineteenth century, and which were cherished by our forefathers at that time.

I think it is still true that many of us in this place regard as some of the greatest speeches of the past that we like to read the speeches that dwelt on that same theme of the freedoms that had been won and how important those freedoms are to us. We get the occasional uplift of that kind today. I was particularly interested in a speech by Mr. Churchill not many months ago when there was a discussion in the British House of Commons with respect to free speech as it applied to a certain person in that country. Mr. Churchill stood up in true loyalty to the belief in freedom that is so characteristic of that little island, and insisted that freedom was for everybody if we believed in it at all, including the particular person who was being discussed at that time. And I insist, agreeing as I do with what Mr. Churchill said on that occasion, that we must not lose confidence in democracy's capacity to tolerate free speech.

It is not often, Mr. Speaker, that I feel it is appropriate to use the word "sacred" in application to political concepts. But when we are talking about freedoms we are talking about something that is really sacred, and in my view we must be careful not to hedge the old sacred freedoms with restrictions born of fear and capable of costing us the very freedoms we are seeking to protect.

In the light of that affirmation of faith in democracy and in the principle of freedom, I want to suggest that in our view there are some provisions in this legislation that need to be looked at very closely by the committee. My view that they should be looked at closely is I think borne out by the fact that some of them were looked at very closely by Their Honours in the other place; and in some instances they made changes which in my view definitely improved the legislation. In this instance I take my hat off to Their Honours, at whom I sometimes make cracks.

Despite the improvements they have made, there are still sections of the bill which we feel should be looked at very carefully. There is a provision dealing with prohibited acts, to which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) referred this afternoon when he pointed out that a clause which formerly was in the section under treason, where it was punishable by death, had been moved down into a section headed: "Prohibited acts" where the punishment would be less severe. I was glad that he was able to point out that that change had been made; but I would point out that in that section, even in the new place where it has been put, there still appears the word "likely", where it seems to me you ought to put words to indicate the quality of intent. We cannot discuss the details of sections of the bill on this occasion, but perhaps I may be permitted to go as far as the Minister of Justice went and say that what we do not like about that section under prohibited acts is that the wording suggests that there are certain things which are liable to punishment if they are likely—with emphasis on the word "likely"—to be prejudicial to the safety of Canada. We feel that is a place where the word "likely" should be taken out and some other word put in that would convey the quality of intent to be prejudicial to the safety of Canada.

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Will he not agree that its inclusion in the section dealing with treason in itself would require the proof of mens rea?

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: I am not perplexed by the minister's use of Latin; I am perplexed by his suggestion that if it were in the section on treason it would make a difference. It has been taken out of the section on treason, has it not, and put in section 50 rather than in section 46 where it was before?

Mr. Garson: I understood my hon. friend was complaining about it having been put in the section on treason in the first place. At least when it is in the section on treason it is necessary to prove intent, and if my hon. friend says that is what he wants, I would point out that is what he had at the beginning.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, this is one of the things we can go into in committee. Perhaps we are misunderstanding each other, or it could readily be that I am lacking in legal training, but my point was that it has been taken out of—

Mr. Riley: What an admission!

Mr. Knowles: Everyone says it is obvious, and everyone knows it. But this subsection has been taken out of section 46 and put in section 50. One of the points we should go into is the question as to what happened to this very point in the Senate committee. I have no doubt that the argument made by the Minister of Justice was made over there, and I have no doubt that the argument I am making was made over there, even if in more legalistic terms.

Mr. Riley: You are circling now.

Mr. Knowles: No, I am trying to convince my hon. friend that we have a point here that has to be gone into by our committee without our being told that this has been dealt with before by the commission or by the Senate. I have looked at it pretty carefully; I have some friends who are lawyers; I have discussed the matter with them, and at this moment I am persuaded that the quality of the intent should be included in that section.

Similarly, Mr. Speaker, there is a section that happens to be numbered 52—but we are not supposed to refer to sections—dealing with sabotage. It was section 49 of the bill when it was first introduced into the other place. This is a section which it seems to us could be used as an anti-strike weapon. The minister shakes his head. The minister may be right, but there are a lot of people who do not agree with him. There are many people who feel that this could be used as an anti-strike weapon. We know the minister will say here again that such actions as interference with the movement of vehicles and so on would have to be prejudicial to the safety and interest of Canada before it could be brought under the terms of this section. But the point I wish to make is again parallel to a point that was made at the other end of this building; that is, that the word "interests" still appears there. That section, by the way, was improved in the other place. They put in the quality of intent but they left in the word "interests". The safety of Canada is something that we can all understand and there is no quarrel with that part of the section; but as one of Their Honours in the other place pointed out in relation to another section, when you talk about the interests of Canada you bring in things of an economic nature. In my view there is real danger of this being an anti-strike weapon. We feel that this section, formerly section 49 but now section 52, is one that must be looked at most carefully. I hope there will be complete freedom and abundant liberty for the labour organizations of this country to appear if they wish to do so, and I know they do, before the committee to state their views with respect to this section.

Similarly, I believe labour would like to appear before the committee and have something to say about the breach of contract provisions in section 365. Here again I anticipate that the minister will probably shake his head from right to left, but there is a feeling on the part of labour that this may be an anti-strike provision despite the fact that we have other legislation which recognizes the strike weapon under certain conditions. I suggest that there is something new in this section 365, despite the minister's statement earlier today that there was no desire to effect changes in broad principle.

In so far as you can relate this to other provisions in the code, there has been a considerable increase in the penalty involved. If you make more stringent provisions of that kind and increase the penalties, I suggest that you put into the hands of those who are hostile to labour—and we may as well admit that there are such still in the country—a weapon that they can use to the detriment of organized labour in particular.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I probably shall not have another opportunity to question the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but is he entitled to discuss all these sections in detail at this time?

Mr. Knowles: The point of order is well taken. The only trouble is that it should have been taken when the Minister of Justice was speaking this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: If the point of order is well taken it will not be necessary for me to make a ruling.

Mr. Knowles: As I said myself before I started referring to the sections, I shall just refer to the provisions. The Minister of Justice recognizes, and we all have recognized it in discussing this same legislation every year, that it is pretty difficult to talk about the principle of this kind of legislation without talking about the things it does.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Especially a code.

Mr. Knowles: As the hon. member for St. John's West says, especially when you are dealing with the Criminal Code which contains so many provisions. However, my time is just about up and the points I wanted to deal with are just about exhausted, but there is one other I should like to refer to. Another provision in this legislation deals with what is termed mischief. As a matter of fact, we think that the section itself is mischievous. It deals with obstructing the use of property. Here again we feel there is something that could be used as an anti-strike provision, which is contrary to the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and to court decisions which have upheld the right to strike and the right to peaceful picketing. That is section 372; and I shall not mention any more sections.

I hope I have demonstrated the main point I wanted to make, that this legislation is extremely important because it covers so many subjects. Despite the fact that it may be a good idea to bring the code up to date, to revise and codify it, there are still these aspects which make it necessary for the committee to do a thorough job on it. So far as we are concerned we are prepared to listen in committee and again in the house to all the legal arguments that can be advanced with respect to the matters at stake. But I want to say clearly that we will urge the importance of the three or four points I spoke about in the earlier part of my remarks. Furthermore, when it comes to things that are basic, when it comes to the concept of freedom, we will oppose with all the vigour we possess any sections of the bill which in our view curtail the rights of labour or in any way impinge upon or diminish the established liberties of democracy.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Chairman, I do not think it will be necessary at this stage to enter into any lengthy discussion of this bill respecting the criminal law, because the minister has indicated already that it is to be referred to a small committee of this house for careful study and report back to the house.

It is not my intention at this stage to enter into a discussion of the individual provisions of the bill. If I did so I would clearly be out of order, as has been admitted already by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). As a matter of fact I would feel hesitant at this stage to enter into a discussion of the specific provisions of the bill because I consider it to be foundation law, and I feel I will know more about it when the committee has finished its studies. I will be in a better position to discuss with something like authority the provisions of the bill when it is referred to the committee of the whole house. So I shall resist any temptation to discuss the individual provisions.

I find myself in thorough agreement with the principle of the bill as expressed this afternoon by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). As a consequence of a study of this monumental work I have wondered whether the bill continues to adhere closely to the principle that was laid down. While it was the definite purpose of the committee which worked on it for so long to produce a simple modification of the Criminal Code rather than to change any broad principles, I am wondering if in some cases there has not been what could be called extensions of the law that may have the result of affecting seriously fundamental principles and liberties of the Canadian people. Many Canadians who have given this careful study believe that to be so.

When we come to the committee stage we ought to give the most careful consideration to the claims of these people and take plenty of time to study their claims, as against the study that has been made by the hon. members of the other place. We should make doubly certain that we do not unnecessarily abridge the rights and principles of the Canadian people. At the same time we should realize that we are living in a day when there are many people who are all too ready to abuse the privileges and liberties they enjoy. Unfortunately that is so, and I am afraid that it becomes more so the further we get from the great struggle which our fathers made to win these freedoms for us. As a consequence we simply must have law with teeth in it so we can protect the rights and liberties of all the people.

In my judgment we have to look at both sides of these cases. Let me take, for example, the case that was raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). When we talk of the liberties, rights and privileges of the labouring people, with which I thoroughly agree, at the same time we have to consider the rights, privileges and liberties of those people who are hirers of labour. These things must be fair. They must be just to both sides, and in our studies let us make sure that the law that is laid down extends justice to all parties in the land. I am more concerned about those things than I am about some of these other things that have been mentioned.

We think it was wise to omit most of these mandatory minimum sentences that are prescribed in the present Criminal Code. But having said that, I think it may be established—I am not going to say that it can be but it may be—that there have been altogether too many unnecessary increases in maximum penalties. I am not going to criticize at this stage because I have not yet been convinced that that is so, but that fact may be established as a consequence of our careful study.

I am going to take the same position that was taken by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) this afternoon. I thought it was a good point, and I believe it would be well for all of us to approach the study of the bill to amend the Criminal Code with this thought in mind. No matter who has said what about it, we should be prepared to take a careful look at all opinions that have been expressed with regard to it, and certainly no one should have the right to call anybody else a communist or a communist sympathizer simply because he may say something that the communists have already said.

Having said that, I want to assure the minister that we are prepared to support the bill being sent to a committee, and we are prepared to accept our responsibilities in the committee to give it a thorough and competent study.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, the minister has already stated that it is his intention to refer this matter to a committee and, as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) has just stated, I am sure there is no one here who will question the advisability of that action. However, tonight I was looking over the list of standing committees of the house, and I was rather impressed with the fact that we have no standing committee to which such legislation can be sent. I know the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) is a modest man who is carrying out his duties in accordance with the constitution of the country, but perhaps he does not appreciate the fact that as Attorney General of Canada and as Minister of Justice of this country, by virtue of his position and the matters with which he deals, he is actually the second man in the government of Canada.

When you look over the standing committees of the House of Commons you see that we have a committee on a restaurant, we have a committee on elections and privileges which may sit once in twenty years, and we have a committee on a library. Yet we have no committee on justice to which fundamental matters such as this may be referred. One sometimes wonders if there should not be a further amendment of the rules of the house, because today there certainly should be a standing committee to which this and kindred legislation could be sent. There was a time when the position of minister of justice in administering a few general statute laws was such that, although he had a most responsible position, it was kept within rather narrow confines. Today we see it in every phase of our lives, and I do think that when legislation such as this comes before the house we should have a standing committee to which such matters can be referred.

In the absence of that, Mr. Speaker, I do think the committee to which the bill is referred should be fairly large. We have here various members who are qualified to sit on such a committee. We have the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), whose modesty prevents him from admitting that he is one of the outstanding lawyers of this house though we all recognize the legal qualities which the hon. gentleman possesses. We have in the house tonight a gentleman who for many years was one of the outstanding jurists in eastern Canada and who presided over many criminal trials with fairness and ability. I know because I appeared before him on many occasions.

Mr. Stick: In what capacity did you appear?

Mr. Nowlan: Coming from Newfoundland my friend will immediately suspect a case of politics, but that is not necessarily true of those who come from the rest of Canada. There are many lawyers in the house who I think would like to make some contribution to this committee. Perhaps their contribution would not be great but at least they would have an opportunity of expressing their views and possibly giving some of their experience. If the matter is referred to a small committee of the house, then I am afraid the minister may not save as much time as he would like in dealing with this very bulky and most important legislation, because certainly when it comes back to the house there will be many who will want to deal with it clause by clause and section by section and express their own views, which possibly would not be the case if the committee were larger. It has been whispered privately—and when I say "privately" I do so with no opprobrium —by the minister in discussions with various members of the house that the committee might be of a size which I frankly think is too small if it is to deal expeditiously with the matter and accomplish the results which he would like to see accomplished, namely a fairly detailed and comprehensive discussion in the committee. Then the house could deal with it much more expeditiously than would otherwise be the case.

So much for the general suggestion as to the reference of the measure to a committee. I simply want to reiterate what was mentioned by the hon. member for Kamloops this afternoon. There are many phases of the bill which one could question—I will not say quarrel with—if one were going to deal with them in detail. However, that is not the purpose of this debate and I do not propose to do so. But very obviously from a reading of the report of the commissioners and of the general bill there is, as was stated this afternoon, a further curtailment of the right of trial by jury if this bill is adopted in its present form.

A few moments ago the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to the rights of labour and expressed the fear that they would be curtailed. Frankly I am no more interested in the rights of labour than I am in the rights of farmers or fishermen. What I think we are concerned with are the rights of Canadian citizens, and I do suggest that any curtailment of the right of trial by jury in this day and age is a dangerous infringement upon our rights which we should scrutinize most carefully. It is true that if the rules permitted, and if one were going to deal with the sections in detail, one would probably find that the absolute jurisdiction conferred upon magistrates is only increased in one or two cases, perhaps in cases of receiving stolen goods up to a value of $50 or something like that.

One may say, why bother about a matter such as that; but I wonder how many here have tried cases in a magistrate's court. I wonder if the Minister of Justice, who has been removed from active practice for some years, realizes the atmosphere which pertains today in provincial magistrates' courts where you perhaps have a docket of 30, 40 or 50 cases in the morning. Some of them are simple drunks. Some of them are for offences under the game act. Some of them are for offences under the motor vehicles act. Some of them are minor infringements of the Criminal Code.

You spend an hour or two taking the pleas of guilty, and then you start back on those cases who wish to plead not guilty. Some poor lawyer has to defend them before a magistrate who is harried and rushed, and who probably has to appear in some other court fifty miles away at half past two that afternoon. Those are the conditions under which magistrates operate and I say, sir, that it is unfair to them to increase their absolute jurisdiction one iota.

If a prisoner wishes to elect to be tried before a magistrate and the magistrate can find the time to try him, well and good; but let us not impose on these overworked magistrates any heavier burden than they have at the moment. I can tell you, speaking at least of the magistrates in my own province, for whom I have the greatest respect, who are men of real ability and who do the best job they can, that it is impossible for them to carry the load they have now without imposing anything further on them.

As I said, you can forget the mechanics of the situation and go beyond the atmosphere of the courtroom; and why should the right to jury trial be curtailed on the part of anyone—whether it is for theft of $50 or of 25 cents. In these days and times when pressure of all kinds is mounting, when you have suspicion and distrust of the power of government—and I am not saying this at all politically—there is this one fundamental safeguard of the liberty of every Canadian citizen. It is his or her right to appear before twelve good men and true, or women as the case may be, and have the case tried before them.

I deprecate any enactment which will in the slightest degree infringe upon that fundamental safeguard. It is true that somebody will say that if persons are tried absolutely before a magistrate they are very fortunate because they can only receive a maximum sentence of six months; that is all that can be imposed upon them. There are many cases where a sentence of one day may be fatal to a person. It is not the extent of the sentence with which many of these accused are concerned, it is the fact that they are convicted at all.

Without embarking on other fields outside the scope of this debate, if a man is convicted and sentenced for one day, one month or six months, and is obliged to serve that sentence in jails such as are provided by municipalities in many parts of Canada today, then I say that is a dire punishment indeed. It is one matter which I think probably should be dealt with by a committee on justice. The whole administration of justice, the enforcement of the law and enactment of laws, and the whole question of punishment and the question of our jails and the use of them should be dealt with by a committee of this house.

So without taking further time now, Mr. Speaker, I do want to say that when this matter is before this house again, or in committee, I personally want to make many criticisms of the special sections; and I am going to continue to insist that there should be no abridgement of the right of trial by jury. It should be extended rather than abridged. These are fundamental rights which are guaranteed by practices which have gone on through the centuries, and they should not be interfered with by this special statute which, as we all know, is to some extent an infringement or alteration of the old English common law on criminal practice which has grown up through the centuries.

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): It was not my intention to enter this debate and, first of all, may I explain that I am not a lawyer. But I dare say I am as good a lawyer as my good and honourable friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Knowles: A Q.C. for you.

Mr. MacDougall: Down in the maritime provinces they have a term they apply to a non-lawyer who tries to speak as a lawyer. They call him a seafaring lawyer, I think. Well, I am not even a seafaring or sea-going lawyer—a sea lawyer; I am corrected. However, in my opinion there is something to be said by hon. gentlemen in this house at this time in connection with this tremendous job of revising the Criminal Code. I think there are something like 477 clauses.

Mr. Fulton: There are 700.

Mr. MacDougall: Seven hundred and forty-four. Well, there are a lot of clauses but I am not going to deal with them individually, you may rest assured.

There are a couple of surprising aspects about this report, to me at least. Despite the fact that there has been an increase in crime across the Dominion of Canada, we have some hon. members of this house saying that we should be more lax in our punishment of crime. Although I have not the number of it before me, I recall the clause on treason. The penalty there has been increased considerably, and I want to deal with that for a moment. If in this country we are to continue a virile democracy, the harder parliament, through the enactment of amendments to the Criminal Code, cracks down on treason the better for the people of Canada. We hear a lot about sabotage in various countries of the world today and there are a lot of people in this country—I hope not too many, but I think I am on safe ground to say a few thousand—who are determined to alter the government of this country not by the votes of the electors but by force.

I have had and I am sure a great number of members have had communications from the Canadian peace congress. Strangely enough, no matter where those letters come from—and I have received them from pretty well all over western Canada and certainly all over the province of British Columbia—they list the same clauses and this is the number one that is complained of as anathema to democracy. If we take them too seriously I think we are going to run ourselves into a great deal of trouble because in this modern, scientific era there is such a thing as a thermal bomb. A few people, undemocratic in their views of government, could do a terrific amount of damage to the economy and welfare of the Dominion of Canada through the use of a few thermal bombs.

I do not think my hon. friend from Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) was laughing at me when he laughed just now, because what I say is quite factual. Those bombs do not need to be any larger than your fountain pen, and ten or twelve of them thrown along the railroad tracks going through the Fraser canyon, for instance, would completely sever rail communications between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. These are serious aspects of our amendments to the Criminal Code.

In so far as the amended clause with respect to treason is concerned, I would say that as originally drafted it was not sufficiently specific. With respect to that aspect, and that aspect only, I believe the gentlemen in the other place were quite right in their amendment. In the final analysis we, as representatives of the Canadian people, ought to be very careful that when this bill goes to committee, the committee hearing is not going to result in a repetition of the principle of stare decisis. If it is, it is going to be too bad for the amendments to the Criminal Code. I will admit that the members of that committee should be clever jurists. The hon. member for Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) spoke about poor lawyers. I hope he was referring to them in a monetary sense rather than in a qualitative sense.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think he mentioned poor lawyers.

Mr. MacDougall: He said "poor lawyers"; you read it. The point is that we want to do the best possible job on these amendments to the Criminal Code. We must always keep in mind the fact that some of the country's outstanding jurists gave these revisions a great deal of thought over approximately a two-year period. The members of the other place did likewise. I only ask that we, as members of this house and of that committee, give these amendments equally sound thought. We should keep constantly in our minds that what we are trying to devise is something that is going to be of specific benefit to the Canadian people as a whole, not one class or one group within the community.

Finally, I may say, with respect to the whole set-up of the revision of the Criminal Code, that unless we are determined to tighten the sections concerning treason and sabotage, and all those related matters, in my opinion as members of this House of Commons we are falling down on our job. I hope that is one thing that will come out of the discussions in the committee. It is almost axiomatic, Mr. Speaker, that if we allow freedom to be undermined in any part of Canada through laxity in our law, then our liberty is a farce.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to make some observations on this rather mammoth document of 294 pages, Mr. Speaker. I can assure you that I shall be quite brief, because I think the member for Winnipeg North Centre dealt quite effectively with this subject, particularly with our concern and the concern of many others over certain sections in this bill. I must say that I enjoyed the speech delivered by the member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) this afternoon. I thought he made a most thoughtful contribution to this debate.

Since this bill has come to public notice as a result of a draft copy being made public early last summer, there has been considerable interest in certain sections of the bill. Since that time it has been given close scrutiny by a large number of trade union groups in this country, by gentlemen of the legal profession, and I might say, Mr. Speaker, by the C.C.F. group in this house and others who belong to it outside of this house. According to parliamentary practice we are only permitted to discuss the principle of the bill on second reading. There are, however, sections of this bill of serious concern to the people in the groups I have mentioned, who consider they are a violation of traditional civil liberties and traditional trade union rights. I think the speaker who just preceded me made some references which indicated that there may be irresponsible people taking exception to some sections of this bill.

To illustrate the concern of the labour movement, I am going to place on record a letter sent by the secretary of the Canadian Congress of Labour to the secretaries of affiliated and chartered local unions, labour councils, federations of labour and representatives of the congress, concerning this bill. This letter is dated November 25, 1952, and reads:

Greetings:

The congress has received a number of inquiries about Bill H-8.

Of course, it is now Bill O.

This was a bill to revise the Criminal Code, submitted to the Senate at the last session of parliament. It was a bill of 744 sections, running to 294 pages of type.

The congress officers studied it, and referred it to the congress legal adviser; and the congress would have made representations on certain sections if it had not become clear that there was no chance of the bill passing last session. Actually, it never even got to the House of Commons.

During the summer, the congress was in touch with the government on the matter. The government said that the bill would be reintroduced at the present session, and would be referred to a special parliamentary committee, before which everyone interested would have ample opportunity to appear and make representations. The bill is in fact, so long, so elaborate, and so important, both to ordinary citizens and to the legal profession, that this course is inescapable. The bill just cannot be rushed through; every lawyer in parliament will insist on a most minute examination.

The moment the new bill is printed, the congress also will subject it to a most minute examination, with the assistance of the congress legal adviser. When it has done so, it will make prompt and full representations to the parliamentary committee, to parliament and to the government, on any and every provision of the bill which appears to be in any way dangerous either to the rights of unions or to the civil liberties of ordinary citizens.

Yours fraternally,

Donald MacDonald,
Secretary-Treasurer.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that was a letter addressed to the local unions of the congress, and it shows concern over certain sections of this bill. I have received correspondence from unions affiliated with the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, from independent unions, and even from quite small groups of employees organized on a local basis. In addition, I have received communications from other groups in the community, groups interested in civil liberties, women's groups and so on. I have noticed in my own constituency that quite a number of the gentlemen of the legal profession are most interested in this bill. In fact I was asked to send several copies of this bill to members of the legal profession in my own constituency.

At this point I might say that I was interested in what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had to say when he was making reference to the legal profession. As a rancher, one of those who make their living from the soil and the forests, I will freely admit that years ago I used to have a somewhat sceptical approach to the legal profession because, on occasion, I had found that it was quite expensive to have dealings with that profession. I will, however, say this. Since being a member of the legislature of British Columbia and a member of this house, I have come to the conclusion that the great majority of the people of Canada do not realize what a great deal they owe to the legal profession, having regard to their interest in civil liberties, the traditional rights of Canadians and that sort of thing. I have always noted that, regardless of party, they take a keen interest in this type of legislation.

As I said before, I have had a number of lawyers in my constituency ask me for copies of the bill, express quite severe criticism of certain sections of it, and promise to write me at length when they had an opportunity to study the latest draft of the latest bill which is Bill O. I have had responsible businessmen in the constituency I represent write me at length and ask for copies of the bill. They have given it some consideration and have expressed their objection to certain sections included in it.

In addition to that I have received in the neighbourhood of one thousand communications. On one hundred of these communications I notice the signatures of men who have served this country in either the first or the second world war. I therefore do not think it is quite correct for the hon. member who spoke previously to me to suggest—if I heard him correctly—that people who take objection to some sections of this bill are not entirely responsible or are not too greatly concerned about the welfare of this country.

I am not going to deal with the various sections of the bill, Mr. Speaker; in fact, I do not think I am capable of, shall I say, getting away with it as well as did the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when he dealt with them. I heartily support the criticisms be brought forward concerning certain sections, as we all do in this group. We were rather delighted to see that he followed the example of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) in so doing.

We in this group were glad when, last session, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the Minister of Justice said that this bill would be referred to a committee. We believe that is an excellent practice. It is impossible to deal with a tremendous bill of this sort—one that is full of technicalities, legal phrases and that sort of thing—in the House of Commons in debate or actually in the House of Commons in committee of the whole. This committee will have a great and important task. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that it will be a committee of sufficient size and not just a small committee composed only of legal experts, with a few members from all parties in this house. I hope it will be a substantial and representative committee of this House of Commons, with members on it representing various points of view, various professions and trades, and so on. There is no question about it, the important work on this bill, so far as the House of Commons is concerned, will be done by the committee to which it is referred at the conclusion of this debate. That committee will have the opportunity to hear representations from trade unions—and I am sure a good number of them will make representations—and other groups.

In that connection I should like to make a point. I have answered dozens and dozens of letters about this bill, and I have made it a particular point to draw to the attention of the people who wrote me that Canada is a democracy, that the minister had advised us that the bill would be referred to a committee, and that all representative groups would have an opportunity to express their point of view, their objections to certain sections and so on.

I say again that we are extremely pleased that this bill is going before a committee. We hope the committee will take plenty of time. There is no need to hurry this matter through. In the opinion of this group it is far better to take two years before we finally adopt this measure than it is to make one mistake that transgresses any traditional Canadian civil liberty, any of the rights of trade unions, or any of the freedoms and democratic facilities we have enjoyed to date and trust that we shall continue to enjoy.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, this committee has an exceedingly important and serious task to perform at this time in connection with this bill. I trust that it will give every consideration to the representations that are made to it and that it will make certain that, when the bill is returned to the house, it will recommend amendments, as necessary, to remove any suggestion that there is a violation of the traditional civil liberties or traditional trade union rights.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a few observations to make on this measure; but before doing so I just want to follow through, as it were, on two things which have been said by others.

In the first place, I should like to join with those who have suggested that they view the task of the committee as a most important and onerous one and who believe its numbers might be increased. I know that ordinarily one is inclined to think a small committee is better than a large one. But having regard to the magnitude of this task, and having regard to the fact that, for inevitable reasons, members are obliged from time to time to be absent, I think it is worth while to have a larger committee.

The second thing I should like to say is by way of comment on what the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) said with regard to trial by jury. I remember reading a statement years ago by that great English lawyer, F. E. Smith as he was originally and who was subsequently Lord Birkenhead. He was a man who, I suppose, had pleaded in scores—perhaps even in hundreds—of jury trials. He spoke about the British jury and said that, in all the cases he had tried, there were only three in which he thought the jury had come to a wrong conclusion. He also said that in two of those cases he had since come to the conclusion that it was not the jury that was wrong, but himself. To me that was a tremendous endorsement of this practice. It is easy to make fun of the jury. A good deal of wit has been exercised at the expense of the jury; but there we have the opinion of a great and experienced authority.

I should like to make one or two comments on the measure itself. In the first place I was utterly astounded to find how many people are affected by the criminal law in this country. I could hardly believe my eyes when I read the debate in the other place. According to the figures given, there were 918,000 convictions in the year 1948. That does not include the people who were tried and let off. Of course the great majority of those convictions were for trivial offences. One does not want to create the impression that the people of the country generally are criminals. A great many of the offences would perhaps be due to a little bit of excessive enthusiasm the night before, and we should not take them too seriously. But on the other hand it is a tremendous figure, and it makes one realize how close this legislation comes to the lives of a great many people.

On looking over the provincial records I read with some regret that my own province of Ontario has the unenviable pre-eminence of leading the list. The ratio to 1,000 of population in Ontario was 147·4. For reasons that will be better known to the people of that province than they are to me, Saskatchewan was at the bottom of the list with 29·2 per 1,000. I can only hope that we in Ontario have this pre-eminence perhaps because of superior energy which has to be let loose in one way or another.

I was born and brought up in Kingston. We had many advantages in that city. We had a penitentiary, an asylum and a university. I remember once walking past the penitentiary where a very novel view of crime was presented to me, which I do not endorse for one moment. I just pass it on as the view of a whimsical man. As we were walking past he pointed out the penitentiary and said that in there were people who possessed such energy that we could not compete with them, so we conspired to lock them up. That is not a view of crime that I wish the committee to take into serious consideration, but it just occurred to me as I was going along.

The other chief point I would like to make is what an amazing advantage it has been to us who live in this country that in the wisdom of the framers of confederation, in spite of what must have been great difficulties, we ended up with one criminal law; whereas in the United States, and I read from volume 6 of the "Encyclopaedia Britannica", they have—

> For purposes of the administration of criminal justice each of the forty-eight states, and the federal government, is a sovereign state with its own law, its own exclusive jurisdiction, its own judges and other officers of justice, its own system of penalties.

And so on. I think we are all familiar enough with life in the United States to know the results of this multiplicity of jurisdictions and different laws. When I say "different laws", there is this that is common to them all, that all or nearly all of them embody a great deal of the common law of England. I might refer to one thing here, that the common law was very general throughout the states, but on the other hand it was not accepted in toto. For example, in an early Pennsylvania case I read the following from the judgment:

> The common law punishment of ducking (which was the punishment for the offence of being a common scold in England) was not received nor embodied by usage, so as to become a part of the common law of Pennsylvania. It was rejected—

I understand that "scold" as used there means "wife".

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It is retained here especially.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The hon. member says it is retained here especially. That is a comfort; I did not know that. These things are important to have in mind when one thinks of the difficulties in the United States due to this multiplicity of jurisdictions that has occurred. Any number of undesirable pardons have been issued there by state governors. As I understand it, you can work up such a lobby that it is often easy to have the ends of justice defeated. That leads one to pay tribute to the wisdom and the generosity of the framers of our constitution, because it meant a good deal of giving up here and there to make concessions necessary to have a common criminal law, which has meant a great deal to the development of juridical life in this country.

There are one or two other comments I wish to make. I should like to endorse what my colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops, has said on the subject of treason. When one thinks of treason, it is not so many years ago that we thought of it as something that existed in funny far-off countries, where they did not know how to live together and where strange things happened, which of course could never happen here. Well, since then things have changed. I imagine most of us have read that book "It Can't Happen Here". I suppose that everyone who read it had the same feeling I had, how easily it could happen anywhere if people became careless about the protection of their freedom.

The protection of freedom is not an easy thing, because there is a great temptation, when we find freedom attacked in one way that we find abhorrent, to crack down on it in ways which perhaps strike against the very principles we are trying to protect. Therefore, as I say, this question of treason is terribly difficult. We have to be firm; we must not be sentimental or unrealistic in recognizing the fact which I for one was slow to recognize, namely that there are people in this country who go about among us, who seem like us, who are personally quite pleasant, who take full advantage of our institutions, who have had the benefit of them, but nevertheless are prepared to conspire to overturn them; and yet in our indignation at them we may go too far, for it is so easy sometimes to feel that we must go the limit in cracking down.

Without elaborating the matter further, Mr. Speaker, the only safe place I can find where I can come to rest is to say that we shall not try to punish men for what they think; we shall only punish men for what they do. As to the definition of the act, I am not going to discuss it further. Someone said here earlier, and I agree with it, that what we have to do is consider this act as something which is for the benefit, not of this section or that section, but of every citizen of Canada.

As I take my seat I should like to reiterate something that was said to this house earlier; that in spite of all the difficulties and sometimes they are terrible ones—facing us in some of the things abhorrent to us which people will do, I recall again Churchill in different circumstances. He was mentioned earlier tonight. I suppose if there is one man in this world who must have tried the patience of those having to do with him it is the red Dean of Canterbury. Our late colleague, whom we all remember with regret and affection in this house, the former member for Calgary West, Art Smith, spoke of him one day in this house in terms of great vehemence which I think reflected the views of all of us, but when Churchill was pressed to take some action—I suppose it would have meant a change in the law in order to do it—he said: "We must remember that the principles we believe in have to be preserved; even though we suffer greatly in the doing of it, we must stick absolutely to the law."

We have here this tremendous bill, tremendous in size and tremendous in importance. I agree with all that has been said about the care and thought which should be given to it. The thing is not to get it back here quickly; the thing is to get it back here in the best possible shape it can be given.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to make a few remarks. I commend the Minister of Justice on his wisdom in agreeing to have this bill sent to a special committee. We should not rely entirely on the experienced lawyers in the other place, because there are so many lawyers and ex-judges in this place who can give us the benefit of their experience in such an important matter as a new revision of the Criminal Code.

I should like to make an humble apology to the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) for interrupting him when he was speaking on the serious offence of being a common scold. My memory was at fault. I said it was being specially retained. It is being specially rejected. I find this in the commissioners' report:

> Certain common law offences are, in the opinion of your commissioners, obsolete and archaic and are not retained, for example, champerty and maintenance, barratry, refusing to serve in office and being a common scold.

I think most of these offences are as Greek to the ordinary layman.

There are two special subjects about which I should like to speak, and they are both linked together here in this report of the commission that dealt with this subject. They are the questions of restitution of property and compensation, and the jurisdiction of magistrates.

As everyone knows, when property is damaged maliciously or is stolen the state feels that a public offence has been committed. It is an offence against the state; that is why there is a hue and cry and action by the police and the attorney general and so forth. But the person who suffers most is the one whose property has been taken or damaged, or who has received personal injuries. Quite often his rights are neglected and he may suffer more in fact than the prisoner who is punished. At times the prisoner is punished but the party who is injured is completely forgotten.

A person may have property stolen. The Criminal Code now provides that he might be compensated to the extent of $1,000, which would constitute a judgment debt against the convicted person. That provision is going to be changed; the limit has been taken out and the compensation is now limited to the moneys found in the possession of the prisoner when arrested. In other words the prisoner may be a millionaire, but if he has no money on him when arrested there will be no restitution of property or compensation for the injured person.

I know of an instance where a place was broken into and property stolen and damage done to the extent of about $500. The accused was unable to obtain a bondsman to provide bail, and he offered the magistrate a certified cheque for $4,000. He was allowed out. When he went to the supreme court they would not take this cheque as bail, so the money was returned to his lawyer and some of it went to his wife. The person whose property was damaged has not yet received any compensation. I do not see how anyone can call that administration of justice. The one person who is most concerned is the one whose property is damaged and in that case he has not yet received any compensation. The matter was pursued in the civil courts, but the accused person had left the country. He was released by authority of the Department of Justice because he was ill, and he escaped from the jurisdiction. Compensation has not been given to the person whose property was damaged.

I feel that consideration should be given to this important matter. I know from experience that it has been a most valuable provision for a judge to be able to order that compensation should be given. In my opinion, apart from the punishment of the guilty person, that should be done whenever possible. These people who have suffered injury should not have to bear the expense of a civil action. Their losses may run more than $1,000, and the present limit should be removed and compensation, whatever it may amount to, ordered to be paid out of any property belonging to the accused, not merely what he has in his possession at the time of arrest. The arrested person may be cute enough to pass whatever money he has to some friend before he is actually put in the cell block. By that means he could escape having to pay any compensation. I hope therefore that this matter will receive consideration when the bill goes to the committee.

I should like to deal now with the question of the jurisdiction of magistrates. This bill proposes to enlarge their jurisdiction to some extent. It must be remembered that magistrates are concerned chiefly with the administration of provincial laws, and these are considerable in number. I think that constitutes the bulk of their work. Every year new laws are passed which must be dealt with summarily by magistrates. Over the last 50 years the work performed by magistrates has increased manyfold.

The tendency has been to give more work to the magistrates and to take work away from the judges. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) knows that in Newfoundland we have only the supreme court and the magistrates' courts; we have no county court or district court. I had the honour of being the last district court judge; no appointments have been made since. The law provides for five district court judges, but not one has been appointed.

The magistrates are being given tremendous powers, the same as judges of the supreme court, to pass sentences up to fourteen years. Only two or three of the magistrates in Newfoundland are lawyers, and I do not think it is fair to give an untrained layman the responsibility of imposing a sentence of that severity. I know serious mistakes have been made. It is a reflection upon those responsible for the administration of justice that such power over their fellow men should be given to men who are not legally trained. I think my hon. friend will agree with that.

I know the magistrates are overworked. The magistrate's court in St. John's is a disgrace. Anyone who has gone there and who has had any experience anywhere else knows that they are tremendously overworked. It is a reflection upon those responsible for the administration of justice down there. You have a courtroom, and you have an office that is sometimes used as a courtroom. The magistrates have even to hear trials in their offices.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I believe the hon. member is getting much farther away from the bill than perhaps any other previous speaker. The facilities available for magistrates, about which he is now speaking, should not be discussed on the second reading of this bill. I know some latitude has been given, but I am asking myself if I should not intervene at this time and ask hon. members to confine themselves to discussing the principle of the bill and not go into individual cases, the application of the law or the organization of the provincial courts.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I wonder if I may, with deference, disagree with some of the observations you have just made about speaking to the principle of the bill. I would point out that this is a code which contains many principles and which deals with many subjects.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I did not make a ruling, I simply made an observation in the hope of getting the co-operation of hon. members. I do not want to enter into a procedural debate. The hon. member may continue.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): This increased work has been given to the magistrates without any consideration being given to increasing their salaries. If you increase the jurisdiction of a judge or magistrate I think it is only fair that that point should be considered also.

Another point to which I wish to refer is the taking of evidence by commission where a witness cannot be brought before the court. That provision applies only to trials in the higher courts, and I submit that it should apply to the magistrate's court as well.

I should like to repeat the two points that I wish to make. First is the importance of providing restitution of property as part of the penalty inflicted upon a person convicted of an offence. Second, there should not be too great responsibilities placed upon the magistrates, either by giving them too much work or too much power.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if before he closes the debate the minister will put on the record, for the benefit of a number of groups which I know are desirous of coming before the committee, the details of the procedure that should be followed. Will the minister indicate also whether, as far as his department is concerned, the bill as now amended and presented to us is like the law of the Medes and Persians, not to be changed? Is this bill going before the committee with the minister and his supporters being there to see that no change takes place? Will the committee be given some latitude to hear and weigh representations and, without the use of the party whips, be free to try to reach fair conclusions regarding some of the points in the bill which are in dispute?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question which the hon. member for York South has asked, I should like to point out that, while I am sure there were no implications, aspersions or insinuations in his question and that he was just asking for information, I really do not think, with great deference, that on the basis of the performance of the government in this matter to date he is really entitled to entertain any doubts at all upon the points he has raised. The fact of the matter is that in my memory there has been no bill in this house, or in any other legislative body in which I have been, to which a greater amount of genuinely democratic consideration has been given, than to this.

The first draft was made by a commission of highly qualified and experienced experts in the field of criminal law who were representative of all parts of Canada. In spite of the eminence and the outstanding and recognized ability of all the members of the commission, which, may I say in rebuttal to those who have suggested that nothing but the prosecution viewpoint has been reflected in this bill, included such eminent defence lawyers as Mr. Joseph Sedgwick, Mr. J. J. Robinette and Mr. Arthur Slaght, and in spite of the undoubted excellence of the draft bill which they produced, this government has never at any stage taken the position that it was a law of the Medes and Persians. When we have received and in several cases acted upon representations from individual lawyers, from the bar of British Columbia and the bar of Nova Scotia as professional groups, from the commissioners on the uniformity of legislation, criminal section, from the attorneys general of the various provinces and from the members of the other place, particularly from the subcommittee of the Senate committee on banking and commerce which turned over the great bulk of work which was done by that committee, the spade work, the hard work of drafting, to three senators, namely, Senator Hayden, Senator Farris and Senator Roebuck, who are known from one end of the country to the other as eminent, skilful and experienced defence criminal lawyers, it seems to me that it is not altogether in accordance with the facts to suggest that we have refused to accept worthy suggestions, or that there has been a bias in favour of the prosecution in the drafting and revision of this bill.

If indeed there ever was at any stage of the proceedings, it has certainly been counterbalanced by what was done by these three senators in the subcommittee. These men are all outstanding as excellent criminal lawyers, and if they have any bias at all it would be extraordinary if it were not in favour of the defence when they have been acting for the defence in so many cases over the years. The government has maintained an open mind in respect of all these matters and it will continue to maintain an open mind with relation to the many valuable suggestions it has received from these several sources. We have always welcomed and we have given most careful consideration to these proposals. We have adopted a large number of them. If those members who are familiar at all with the bill as it was introduced in the other place last year will compare it with the bill which was introduced in the other place this year they will see that there have been many material changes in the draft which, when it came from the commission, was recognized from one end of the country to another as excellent to begin with.

Therefore, while I agree with the viewpoint of every one of the speakers who have preceded me as to the wisdom of this house making its own decisions with regard to the provisions of the bill, you may rest assured, sir, that if these decisions commend themselves to the open mind which we shall maintain, just as much in relation to the proposals of the House of Commons as we have maintained in relation to the suggestions of the other place, we shall give effect to them.

All of these Canadian citizens to whom I have referred have taken a very great and keenly intelligent interest in this matter. The work which they have performed on a voluntary basis has been of a most creditable character. Their contributions and the manner in which they have been received by the other place to begin with, by the government, and, as I am sure they will be, by this house, have constituted a heart-warming example of democracy in action in a matter in which everyone from the ordinary citizen to parliament itself has played his part in a co-operative effort to get as good a law as we possibly can in this consolidation of the Criminal Code.

I do not share all the views of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Indeed, I think on every one of the specific points he raised tonight I find myself, quite reluctantly of course, in disagreement with him, but there is no harm in that. Our disagreement will produce all the better debate in the committee if he will venture to become a member of it. While I have great respect for the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan), there is one respect in which I must quite modestly venture to disagree with him. I must say in all frankness that if one had not had the experience of this measure in the other place before one, one would be inclined not to disagree but to agree with his viewpoint as to the value of a large committee. But it was very clear there that when a committee is dealing with the actual drafting section by section of a difficult statute, which is a tedious, grinding job, in the end, as happened there, the great bulk of the work falls upon the shoulders of three very hard-working men who put in long hours of labour on the bill.

For that reason—and I may say I have discussed this matter with the leaders of the other parties—I think that perhaps the best membership for the committee that we could set up would be a membership of 17. Once the house gives second reading to the bill I should like, if I may, to have unanimous consent to move that the bill be referred to a committee and to provide for the setting up of that committee this evening if possible.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—REFERENCE OF LEGISLATION TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the minister wish to have leave to revert to motions?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, before you contend that leave has been given, in the light of an experience we had yesterday I do not think it should be assumed that leave has been given to what the minister proposes to do until we know precisely what that is. I wonder if there is any hurry about the bringing in of the motion setting up the committee. Is it not possible—I think it is procedurally correct—for the minister to move that the bill be referred to a committee to be designated later?

Mr. Garson: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Knowles: I thought the minister was now going to indicate the number of members of the committee and its composition. It is only the number of members of the committee and its composition that I think should be left over. I am not opposed to a motion that it be referred to a committee to be designated later.

Mr. Garson: May I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that I naturally conferred with the Clerk in this matter and reached agreement that this is the form of motion which it is now appropriate to move. Perhaps if I read the motion my hon. friend may consider whether he wishes to object to it or withdraw his objections. The motion is:

That a special committee be appointed to consider Bill No. 93, an act respecting the criminal law, and all matters pertaining thereto, with power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to print its evidence and proceedings, and to report from time to time its observations and opinions thereon; that the said committee consist of seventeen (17) members to be designated at a later date;—

Mr. Fulton: Is there not something about a provision regarding one of the standing orders?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

—and that standing order No. 65 be suspended in relation thereto.

If I am not out of order perhaps I might indicate the second motion which would follow there.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. minister unanimous consent to proceed in this fashion? He has not had leave to revert to motions. Has the hon. gentleman leave to revert to motions at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am speaking now about the first motion, the one that was read by the minister a moment ago.

Mr. Fulton: The minister indicated that in order that we should know what was contemplated he would indicate, without moving it, what the motion was, so that we may have the whole picture before us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. gentlemen realize that this sort of procedure can only take place with unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Garson: The second motion would be:

That Bill No. 93, an act respecting the criminal law, be referred to the special committee appointed to consider the said bill.

Mr. Knowles: If we pass these two motions we will adopt everything except the names of the persons to compose the committee, and that will be left to a later date.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the two motions. Are they agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: I want to make a brief observation on the motion, although I am agreeable to the procedure.

I just want to take this opportunity to support fully what was said earlier by the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan). While this is the only way in which this bill could be referred to a committee, I think it indicates more clearly than anything else the desirability of having a standing committee on justice under the rules of this house.

I want to point out to the house and the minister that the judicial committee, as it is called in the United States congress, is one of the most important committees of that body. We have had a number of experiences with bills requiring more in the way of legal consideration than partisan or political consideration, matters on which there is no difference between the parties. They require very careful consideration for their legal implications, and I believe that type of bill should be referred to a standing committee on justice. I believe that is indicated by what has happened here today, in fact by the readiness of the house to give its agreement to this procedure. And it would seem more appropriate if it were not necessary to ask for that type of consent, and if it might be recognized practice of this house that bills of this kind would be referred to a standing committee which should be set up for the purpose.

I hope the minister will give his consideration to it, not only because of what has happened here tonight but because I believe that questions coming before this house dealing with the administration of justice in this country are matters of great importance and warrant the setting up of a standing committee on justice so they may be automatically referred there.

Mr. Knowles: Just one word on these motions. One of them is debatable, even if the other is not. I am referring to the motion to set up a committee of 17 members, whose names are to be designated later. If that number is as high as the minister is prepared to go I presume we have no alternative but to accept it. It is certainly better than the rumour we heard some time ago as to what the number might be.

I just want to say, in line with what other members have said tonight, that it seems to me that the importance of this question is such that, out of a house of 262 members, with the plethora of lawyers we have here, 17 is hardly enough. One of my reasons for having demurred just now was the hope that the minister might consider a larger number than 17; but it is better than the smaller committee, and if that is as high as he will go we have no alternative but to accept it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that this bill is referred to the special committee appointed to consider the said bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motions agreed to.

SAINT JOHN BRIDGE AND RAILWAY EXTENSION COMPANY

PROVISION FOR ACQUISITION BY CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 38, respecting the Saint John Bridge and Railway Extension Company.

Mr. Green: I suggest that we call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Chevrier: I have no objection provided it is made mutatis mutandis.

Mr. Green: I did not hear that.

Mr. Chevrier: It is a Latin maxim.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) move the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. Green: No, Your Honour, I did not move adjournment.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It has to be that way.

Mr. Green: I suggest the minister move adjournment.

Mr. Chevrier: I have no objection at all.

On motion of Mr. Chevrier the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, Monday is private members' day. We will proceed according to standing order 15.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, January 26, 1953

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DREW—REFERENCE TO C.B.C. BROADCAST "CAPITAL REPORT"

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise to state a question of privilege affecting every hon. member of this house. It is in connection with a C.B.C. broadcast yesterday from Ottawa called "Capital Report". I have in my hand a copy of the text submitted to the station by Mr. Michael Barkway and I shall read the portion which I am making the subject of privilege. I think what I have to put forward constitutes one of the most astonishing breaches of the privileges, rights and responsibilities of the members of this house which can have come to the attention of any hon. member. I propose to read part of page 1 and page 2 of the text used yesterday by Mr. Barkway in the broadcast on a national network from Ottawa. After referring to what he described as the domestic drama of the Currie report, he went on to say:

As a drama critic, I think one's bound to say that act II wasn't up to the standard of excitement of act I. For one thing the sub-plot took up a disproportionate amount of attention. This is the mystery—now being cleared up—of how the C.C.F. party got its hands on an earlier draft of the report which Mr. Currie had neither approved nor signed. The first half of the answer is that the copy was stolen from a print shop in Montreal; and the man accused of stealing it is now in custody awaiting trial. How it got from the thief to Mr. Coldwell—who is certainly honest—we still don't know. But I suppose part of the scene of act III will be laid in a courtroom in Montreal, where some more of the story will come out.

The other part of act II which has now concluded was laid in parliament. I remember remarking on this program six weeks ago that Mr. Currie's description of the Petawawa horses on the pay roll was "more picturesque than precise". It turns out, in fact, to have been so imprecise as to have been false. It was taken, apparently, from the police records and the records of the Petawawa trials and in the process of condensation into one sentence it was wholly distorted. A cub reporter who had done the same thing would have lost his job.

You may think this was just by the way. But these inaccuracies in the Currie report—the horses and the false accusation that the C.N.R. let its tracks be stolen—I think they had a good deal to do with the major theme of the recent parliamentary debates. And that was whether the Currie report should be referred to the defence expenditures committee, or whether instead Mr. Currie should be invited to extend his inquiries into the rest of the Department of National Defence. The government wanted to send the report to the commons committee for a fuller examination. The government majority—inevitably—voted to do that, and the committee has been set up. This wasn't what the opposition wanted. They say—and they're right—that the committee has a majority of Liberal members; and it's a foregone conclusion that its report will be as favourable to the government as the loyal Liberal majority can make it.

No doubt this is perfectly true. But the committee's report won't matter so much as the evidence which the committee hears—particularly from Mr. Currie himself. The inaccuracies of the original report—which are after all purely incidental—won't matter much if Mr. Currie has a mass of further detail to back up his charges of the "general breakdown in administration". But if he hasn't more detail than he gives in his report, then the government will be in a better position to claim that this is a bit of a storm in a teacup.

The most serious breach of the privileges, rights and responsibilities of members, Mr. Speaker, is the bald statement by this man who purports to be an accurate reporter—

An hon. Member: He is.

An hon. Member: Too accurate.

Mr. Drew: —that, had it not been for these demonstrated inaccuracies in the Currie report, then it is likely that the inquiry might have occupied a wider field. Then let us see some of the positive statements made by this man who enjoys the privileges of the House of Commons, under the privileges extended by Your Honour in the usual way to the highly respected members of the press gallery.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the laughter that greeted that comment indicated a lack of appreciation on the one hand of the significance of a statement of this kind by a man who has the special advantage of hearing all of the debates, under the privileges extended to members of the press gallery in the house; and, on the other hand, that laughter indicated that some of the hon. members who made that interjection in that way obviously disregard the fact that such a statement as this might reflect upon those hon. members of press gallery whose reputation is of the very highest. I think it is our concern in this house to maintain responsibility for members of the press gallery who are part of the general proceedings of this house.

Now, first of all, may I point to the fact that we have here the bald and emphatic statement, without any reservation, that the Currie report turns out in fact to have been so imprecise as to have been false. Mr. Speaker, I would have hoped that some member of the government would have risen to deal with a statement of that kind with regard to a man they had chosen, and whom they describe, as the most highly qualified man in the Dominion of Canada for the task allotted to him. Nevertheless, whether that might be regarded as the duty of the government or not, the fact remains, as very well might be pointed out, that such a statement is in itself wholly removed from the truth. No such finding has been made; and no such finding could be made.

May I also point out that we have this statement not only going out from this reporter but going out from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which is guided by the policy laid down by the government, as stated by the minister responsible for that department.

Mr. Speaker: I have not interrupted the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), but I am following him closely to determine the question of privilege on which he has risen. A criticism of the government at this time is not a question of privilege. May I suggest that he should state his question of privilege.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am submitting this to Your Honour: to consider on the one hand what disposition you feel should be made of these facts, having regard to Your Honour's responsibility for the privileges within this house; and, on the other hand, I am placing before the government facts which they must immediately take into consideration, having regard to their responsibility for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—because there is another point which I think is extremely important in this statement, and it is the question of contempt of court.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, I hardly think this is the time to place that question before the government. On a question of privilege all that can be considered is the breach of the privileges of the house in so far as they concern the house generally or some members of the house.

Mr. Drew: Well, Mr. Speaker, I pointed out that this statement, carried to the people of Canada by the government-owned broadcasting system—by a man who enjoys the privileges of the press gallery—stated as a fact certain things which are before members of this house for consideration in committee. This man, over the government-owned system, is taking it upon himself to pass judgment in regard to something that is before hon. members of this house for decision. That is certainly an infringement of the right and duties of members of this house.

Moreover, this man has taken it on himself to flagrantly stand in contempt of court, and the government must have some concern about that, in view of the fact that it initiated these proceedings and also in view of the responsibility it accepts for the policies of the C.B.C.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the facts are before you. This report that I have read to you from Mr. Barkway's text contains one demonstrable misstatement after another. In no single case are those misstatements clearer than in these two statements. There is a reference to non-existent horses—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: —and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has stated that they existed.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot allow a debate on that question at the present time. I hope that the Leader of the Opposition will not press that point now.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I will not press that point but I will refer every hon. member to the statement of the Prime Minister which shows that they did exist. I would also point out that in this statement Mr. Barkway refers to the false accusation that the C.N.R. allowed its tracks to be stolen. No such accusation was made.

Mr. Speaker: Clearly that does not come within the questions of privilege which an hon. member is allowed to state as a question of privilege at this time. We are now getting into a debate on whether the facts stated by the member of the press gallery are correct or incorrect.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I will close my comments with this statement in reference to what I have put before you. The statements in this text are before you for consideration. I ask you to consider them in relation to the report, in relation to the statement made by the government in this house, and in relation to the fact that a committee has been set up to discuss this very subject. Also, I place this matter before the government in view of the fact that it has stated its responsibility for the policy of the C.B.C. I submit that the government should act in relation to contempt of court by the C.B.C. as well as this broadcaster—because if propaganda of this kind is going out while matters of this kind are before this house it destroys the whole effect of committees in this house.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has stated that he has placed these facts before you and that he wishes to have you appreciate them. I do not think I need to make any comment whatsoever.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent: He read the statement about which he complains and then he made his speech about it. There is a certain doctrine about what is said or what is published that is sometimes called the doctrine of fair comment. Well, I think that if one applies that doctrine to the statement read by the hon. gentleman, and to his own comments on that statement, the conclusion will not be a very difficult one to draw.

Now, regarding the responsibility of the government for what goes out over the C.B.C. there is to be set up a committee to deal with the C.B.C. It has been stated many times in this house that the government does not attempt to dictate to the C.B.C. what will go out over its wires, and I think the best evidence of that is some of the things that the hon. gentleman himself broadcasts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent: If the committee examining the conduct of those who do direct the policies of the C.B.C. sees fit to make a report to this house, about matters such as this, I am sure the house will consider it. Perhaps in the meantime Your Honour will have to consider whether our privileges have been impinged upon, and whether they are by the broadcast read by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) or by his own statement.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I rise now on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: It is regrettable that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) should disclose his lack of appreciation of the difference now between the position of a member of this house and someone outside making comments about matters that are before this house for consideration. His closing remarks were wholly unworthy of the nature of the matter that is before us.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take under consideration what has been said, and if I feel that I should take any action I shall do so.

WHEAT

BRITISH PURCHASES FROM RUSSIA—SALE OF CANADIAN SURPLUS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): On Friday, January 23, the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) asked a question about a report in the newspapers concerning the purchase by the United Kingdom government of some 22 million bushels of wheat from Russia. I made a reply in general terms and promised to make an inquiry to get something more precise to put before the house. This is the information I have now obtained.

It is pointed out, in the first place, that the press reports of the negotiations refer to a quantity of 600,000 tons. I was not able at once to reduce that quantity into bushels, but I am told it is approximately the equivalent of 22 million bushels. In the second place, the report referred not only to wheat but to all grains, and particularly coarse grains. Hon. members will know that the United Kingdom has bought substantial quantities of coarse grains from Russia in the past few years, and the present negotiations are no doubt a continuation of that pattern. The quantities under negotiation, if correctly reported, would appear to be less than in previous years. Generally speaking, the United Kingdom has followed the practice of buying a large part of her wheat requirements in Canada, and the bulk of her coarse grain supplies elsewhere. In the first ten months of 1952, Canada exported only 1,615,000 bushels of barley to the United Kingdom.

On Friday I made reference to current negotiations between the United Kingdom and the Canadian wheat board. As a result of these negotiations, arrangements have been made for the United Kingdom ministry of food to take a portion of the agreed quantity of food for the present year—a rather small percentage—on a class II basis and price rather than under the lower international wheat agreement price. This arrangement will permit the United Kingdom to purchase under the international wheat agreement additional wheat which recently became available in Australia, and which it would otherwise have no right, under the international wheat agreement, to purchase at the class II price because Australia has been unable to fulfil the quota that it must dispose of under the international wheat agreement price. This arrangement does not, however, up to the present time, involve any change in the quantity of 115 million bushels which was announced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) as the amount which the United Kingdom had contracted to purchase. It may mean that for a certain portion of it the wheat board will be getting a somewhat higher price than under the original agreement.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa): In compliance with the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) of January 22, I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Tremblay), that the members whose names are annexed hereto shall constitute the special committee of this house on procedure. The names are as follows:

Messrs. Bradette, Churchill, Fleming, Fournier (Hull), Fulton, Harris, Knowles, MacNaught, Pouliot, Quelch and Weir.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT TO ELIMINATE LEVEL CROSSINGS IN FUTURE CONSTRUCTION

Mr. J. L. Gibson (for Mr. Murray, Cariboo) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 106, to amend the Railway Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Gibson: The purpose of this amendment to the Railway Act, Mr. Speaker, is to provide that, in any future application to the board of transport commissioners for the construction of any railway, the board shall make such an order as will ensure the elimination of level crossings, and no highway shall be constructed across a railway unless it is carried over or under such railway.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

C.B.C. SPECIAL PROGRAM TO BRAZIL

Mr. Hees:

1. Did the international service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, broadcast a special program to Brazil from the Plateau hall, Montreal, on December 17, 1952?

2. If so, who authorized this program?

3. Who was the conductor of the program, what is his name and permanent residence address, and what was he paid in (a) salary; (b) expenses, for his services for this broadcast?

4. What orchestra was employed and how much was paid each member for (a) rehearsals; (b) recital?

5. What other expenses were incurred for this special program, giving amount in each case?

6. What was the total cost involved in connection with this program?

Mr. McCann:

1. A special program comprising four works, two by Heitor Villa-Lobos, one by a Chilean and one by an Argentinian composer, were performed on this occasion and records were made for use in broadcasts by the international service to Brazil and other Latin American countries, to be sent for broadcast by individual Latin American stations, and other uses. This arrangement was made as part of the cultural and artistic exchange of the international service with countries, particularly with Brazil, which has brought a number of Canadian artists to that country.

2. The C.B.C. international service.

Questions

3. Heitor Villa-Lobos, world-renowned Brazilian composer and conductor, whose permanent address is Rio de Janeiro. He came to Montreal from New York city at the beginning of an American and European conducting tour. He was paid no salary, but was given his usual conducting fee, which he agreed in this case would cover his travelling expenses to and from New York and while in Montreal, and his rights as composer of his two compositions performed.

4. The orchestra employed was that of les concerts symphoniques de Montreal. Payments were at the regular rates of the American federation of musicians for the services performed, including rehearsals, performance, recording rights, and stand-by conductor's fee.

5. Rental of hall for rehearsals and concert (three days) $150; set-up arrangements for orchestra seating $24; advertising and publicity $517.

6. $24,278.50 covering all costs including recording rights.

INDIAN SCHOOLS—TEACHERS

Mr. Gibson:

1. What qualifications must a person possess in order to teach in an Indian school?

2. What percentage of persons teaching in British Columbia Indian schools hold (a) first-class certificate; (b) second-class certificate; (c) any British Columbia certificate; (d) no certificate; (e) have never attended normal school or any teacher-training course?

3. What is the salary schedule?

4. (a) How many advertisements for teachers in Indian day schools have been inserted by the Indian department in newspapers, during the past ten years; (b) was any mention made of required qualifications; (c) was any salary stated in figures; (d) were any specific schools mentioned?

5. How many months has Masset Indian day school been closed in the past ten years?

6. Must Indian children wait until seven years of age before starting school? If so, for what reason?

Mr. Harris:

1. Teachers are expected to hold a second-class Canadian teaching certificate or better—or equivalent. Because of the shortage of teachers in Canada it has been necessary to accept some applicants who do not hold such certificates.

2. (a) 70·1 per cent; (b) 22·8 per cent; (c) 33·9 per cent; (d) 7·1 per cent; (e) 4·7 per cent.

3. Schedule attached.

4. (a) From 1942 to date 85 advertisements for teachers have been published in 201 newspapers. The number of insertions in each newspaper have not been counted.

(b) Only with reference to salary schedules.

(c) Most of the advertisements stated that a salary schedule was in effect, and in 19 of the 85 advertisements the salary range for teachers holding first- and second-class certificates was stated.

(d) The name of specific schools was mentioned in 21 advertisements.

5. The Masset school was closed during the past ten years as follows:

1945, October to December inclusive; 1946, September to December inclusive; 1947, September to December inclusive; 1950, December. A total of 12 months.

6. No. Indian children are admitted to schools before the age of seven years. However, they are usually not admitted to residential schools until they have reached the age of seven. Except under special circumstances, it is not considered advisable to remove children under seven years of age from their homes for admission to a residential school.

Questions

OLD AGE AND BLIND PENSIONS—PAYMENTS BY PROVINCES

Mr. Laing:

1. How much was paid out by each of the provinces in 1951 calendar year for the provincial share of pensions to the aged and blind under the provisions of the Old Age Pensions Act?

2. How much was paid out by each of the provinces in the calendar year 1952 as the provincial share of payments made under the provisions of the Old Age Assistance and Blind Persons Acts?

Mr. Martin:

	1. Provincial share of payments (a) under the Old Age Pensions Act for the calendar year 1951	2. Provincial share of payments (b) under the Old Age Assistance Act and the Blind Persons Act for the calendar year 1952
Alberta	$ 2,096,988.69	$ 893,763.08
British Columbia	3,651,724.84	1,567,254.02
Manitoba	2,106,894.52	934,032.21
New Brunswick	1,967,953.25	1,074,333.99
Newfoundland	1,408,322.24	650,072.68(c)
Nova Scotia	2,351,236.03	831,764.51
Ontario	10,621,361.58	4,307,509.01
Prince Edward Island	342,485.88	62,341.01
Quebec	8,945,230.44	6,242,236.85
Saskatchewan	2,058,270.80	925,272.23
Total	$35,550,468.27	$17,488,579.59

(a) The provincial share is calculated by taking one-third of the amount paid by the federal government to the province for the federal share.

(b) The provincial share of old age assistance is the same as the federal share, the province and the federal government each paying 50 per cent of the amounts paid out for assistance. The provincial share of the cost of blind allowances is calculated by taking one-third of the amount paid to the province by the federal government as the federal share.

(c) Newfoundland paid old age assistance from April 1, 1952.

BONELESS BEEF

Mr. Wright:

1. What amount of boneless beef was purchased under reference B.2 page 28, an order issued by the agricultural prices support board, October 7, 1952, contained in sessional paper No. 165A, tabled Monday, January 19, 1953, in each of the provinces listed in that document?

2. What were the grades of beef so purchased?

3. Is the agricultural prices support board still purchasing boneless beef under this order?

4. What are the corresponding commercial grades on the livestock market reports to the M grades, grades D-1, D-3, and S grades mentioned in the reference B.2, on page 28 of the above sessional paper?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. British Columbia, 140,698 pounds; Alberta, 405,664 pounds; Saskatchewan, 143,280 pounds; Manitoba, 1,318,403 pounds; Ontario, 1,044,711 pounds; Quebec, 2,576,183 pounds.

2. M, S, D-1 and D-3.

3. No.

4. Carcass grade; M, D-1, D-3, S.

Corresponding grade on livestock market reports; canners and cutters, common steers and heifers, common cows, bulls and stags.

IMPORTS OF CUBAN RAW SUGAR

Mr. Huffman:

1. Does the federal treasury benefit from the raw sugar imported into Canada under the special arrangement between Cuba and Canada?

2. If so, what is the estimated amount of the benefit to the treasury, during the period of the agreement?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Yes; the respective rates of duty vary slightly according to the quality of the sugar but in a typical case an importation of Cuban raw sugar would be dutiable at $1.35798 per 100 lbs. while a similar importation of commonwealth raw sugar would be dutiable at $0.30664. In sales to Canada, commonwealth sellers normally obtain approximately 85 cents per 100 lbs. more for their sugar than Cuban suppliers. Therefore, when duty is rebated to equalize the landed cost at refineries, approximately 85 cents out of the $1 margin of preference is retained by the treasury.

2. On the 358,000 short tons of raw sugar which will be imported from the three countries concerned during the period of the agreement, there will be an estimated $6,000,000 of additional revenue to the treasury after payment of rebate to prevent any increase in landed cost to Canadian refiners.

FARM POPULATION AND INCOME

Mr. Fair:

1. What percentage of Canada's population was actually living on the land and deriving their living therefrom in the year 1952?

2. What percentage of the national income did such persons receive?

Mr. McIlraith:

1 and 2. Information not available for 1952. The nearest available information is as follows:

1. As of June 1, 1951 (census date) the population living on farms was 20·8 per cent of Canada's total population.

2. In the calendar year 1951 the net income received by farm operators plus wages and income in kind received by farm help was 13·6 per cent of the national income.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FIRES ON NATIONAL DEFENCE PROPERTY

Mr. Cardiff:

1. How many fires have occurred on property belonging to the Department of National Defence since June, 1950?

2. Where were these fires?

3. What was the estimated loss in each case?

4. Was the cause determined in each case, and, if so, what was the cause?

5. How many prosecutions have been instigated, as a result of fires to national defence property, since June, 1950?

NATIONAL DEFENCE—PROPERTIES LEASED

Mr. Fraser:

1. Did the Department of National Defence lease any properties in Canada, during the year 1952, for military or other purposes?

2. If so, (a) where are these properties located; (b) on what dates do these leases commence; (c) what amount is paid per month for each lease; (d) were these places in continuous use from the start of each lease?

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD—PURCHASE OF LAND

Mr. Shaw:

1. Under what date did the soldier settlement board of Canada acquire, by purchase, certain lands situated in township 44, range 25 west of the 4th meridian?

2. From whom was the above land purchased by the soldier settlement board?

3. Were mines and minerals on the said lands acquired by the soldier settlement board at the time of the land purchase?

4. Are such mines and minerals now held in the name of any department of the federal government?

5. Has consideration been given to the transferring of the mineral rights to those veterans who purchased land in township 44, range 25 from the soldier settlement board?

C.B.C. INTERNATIONAL SERVICE

Mr. Hees:

1. Who is the head of the international service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

2. What salary does he receive per annum?

3. What was he paid in travelling or other expenses, during the calendar year 1952?

4. Is he employed on a contract basis? If so, when does this contract terminate?

Mr. Bradley: Return tabled.

IRRIGATION—SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER

Mr. Knight:

1. What was the total amount spent by P.F.R.A., since and including 1942 to the present date, upon studies or surveys of the South Saskatchewan river project?

2. What amount was spent in each of the years covered by question 1?

3. On what date was the report of the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan river project or any information as to the contents of the report released (a) to the press; (b) to the governments of the prairie provinces; (c) to the House of Commons; (d) for distribution through their mail boxes, to the members of parliament?

Mr. McCubbin: Order for return.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes. I think parts Nos. 1 and 2 should be made orders for return. As to part No. 3 of this question, the answer is that the report of the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan project was released to the press on January 19 when I tabled it in the house. It was sent to the governments of the prairie provinces by the clerk of the privy council on the same day. When I tabled the report I had been assured that there were available sufficient copies to provide one for every member of parliament, and I so stated in the house. When the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) inquired about copies for members, I was surprised to learn that they had not in fact reached all hon. members and I made inquiries about the matter. I found that, through some unfortunate hitch with regard to assembling, packaging and conveying to the House of Commons, there had not yet reached the distribution office a number sufficient to supply a copy to all members of this house and the other house. I can assure hon. gentlemen that that matter was immediately attended to because we realize—as all those who have to do with distribution must realize—that, when a public document is tabled and distributed, those who are first entitled to get it are the members of parliament.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

IRRIGATION—SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of any communication received by the Prime Minister or the federal government from the Saskatchewan government, or any minister thereof, with respect to advance information concerning the contents of the report of the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan river project, and also a copy of any reply to such communication.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I think this motion might be adopted. As far as I have been able to ascertain, the only communications were between Mr. Nollet and myself. I now table the telegram I received from him and the answer I addressed to him on January 15.

EDUCATION

EQUALIZING OF OPPORTUNITY—ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of expanding and equalizing educational opportunity across Canada by the granting of financial assistance to the various provinces for that purpose.

Mr. Speaker, I shall first of all anticipate the arguments of the opponents to the subject matter of this resolution by stating that we in this party would wish—and in fact would insist—that such federal aid as that visualized in the terms of the resolution should in no way involve any interference with provincial jurisdiction over education. Such aid as I visualize would be simply an extension of the extensive aid which is now rendered by the dominion government to education in the provinces and which has been such a distinct benefit to the provinces and indeed to the nation. This aid has been received by all the provinces of Canada, including those which have been most insistent upon their retention of provincial rights. Nowhere has it been argued—and certainly not in this house—that the aid which has already been extended in that matter has in any way interfered with provincial jurisdiction over education, particularly in the vital matters of method, administration and curriculum. The aid to which I have referred has been extended with respect to vocational training, technical training, scholarships in research and the like. I shall refer only to those now, but I have in my hand a sessional paper which shows that vast amounts of money have been expended by the federal government in the provinces for education in other directions.

This is not the first time, Mr. Speaker, that I have propounded these arguments.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

For the sake of those who are actually interested in this matter and would care to do some research on it, I would refer to the debate which took place the last time I moved this resolution, namely on March 19, 1952, at which time the debate continued on March 20. Today, instead of bringing forth those rather academic arguments—I think they were once so characterized by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent); I have brought them forward year after year and the house must be familiar with them all—I want to deal rather with the effect which this resolution is having upon the opinions of the people in the country with regard to it. When I shall have finished, Mr. Speaker, I think you will decide that I have support in some rather unexpected quarters.

At any rate, in my speech on the date that I have mentioned, I dealt with the alarming situation in education which has developed in Canada. The last time I moved this resolution it was talked out by a Liberal member of this house. The speech itself which opened the debate dealt largely with the shortage of teachers, the dropping off in the number of students enrolling in the teaching profession, and the great increase in the enrolment in both elementary and secondary schools. At the time of the debate I presented figures to substantiate my arguments in those directions. Those figures I obtained from the dominion bureau of statistics and other reliable sources. These things are of interest surely to all Canadians. I confess that my own interest in the matter is the welfare of all Canadian children, and I lay the emphasis upon the "all". As reported at page 590 of Hansard of March 19, 1952, I stated:

The principle behind the resolution is that all children in Canada should enjoy equality of opportunity of education irrespective of their geographical position, of the country of origin of their parents, or of their economic status. That should be denied to no child in Canada, irrespective of where he may live and irrespective of his origin.

My aim is a degree of equality of educational opportunity for all Canadian children. May I say to one or two of my friends who need to be told, that I have no desire to ask for uniformity in education or equality of education; I am asking for equality of opportunity in education, which is a vastly different thing.

In the speech, the date of which I have mentioned, I produced evidence of glaring inequalities of opportunity in education all across this country. That inequality is due to the difference in the ability of the provinces to raise funds for educational purposes. In the particular tables of figures from the dominion bureau of statistics which I quoted at page 591 of Hansard in that debate in regard to the amount spent per child by the various provinces upon education, I find that the expenditure per pupil on public, elementary and secondary education on an average daily attendance basis in 1949 is as follows: British Columbia spent $244; Alberta spent $201; Saskatchewan, $174. These are the three highest, as compared with the three lowest Newfoundland, $77; Prince Edward Island, $83; and Nova Scotia, $114. My hon. friends will agree with me that there is not much equality of opportunity depicted in these particular figures.

Many children are having to put up with unqualified teachers and, worse still, with persons who are sitting in a chair presiding over the school and who are not teachers at all.

An interesting pamphlet has been published lately, I think in preparation for education week, by the Canadian education week national headquarters at Ottawa. It says this:

> The teacher is the most important single factor in the success or failure of our educational system. Canada needs to have more of her best young people enter this profession. We should be concerned about retainment as well as recruitment. We can help by supporting measures that will elevate the prestige of this profession. Better teacher education, better salaries, improved working and living conditions are essential.

We cannot have good teachers unless we are prepared to provide the above conditions. At the time of the debate last year it was estimated that the teacher shortage—and this is serious—by 1955 would have climbed to 2,500, and at the same time the normal school enrolment had dropped by 20 per cent in a single year. The pamphlet also mentions as well as the teacher shortage another imminent problem, and that is the increasing pupil enrolment. I shall quote that part of the pamphlet. It says this:

> The swelling flood of school enrolments, having filled our elementary grades to the bursting point in the immediate post-war period, is now about to descend on the higher grades and secondary schools. We must be ready for this influx or our crowded schools will be literally swamped and the teacher shortage, already serious, will become critical.

In this pamphlet there is a chart. I shall not quote the passage, but I shall give the figures of the estimates of secondary school enrolment in the years from 1952 to 1964. They have given 1952 figures of 300,000 children enrolled in the secondary schools, and the estimated figure for 1964 is 620,000, or a secondary school enrolment which will double itself in the next twelve years. I ask you, sir, whether or not under our present conditions of education in the provinces, and particularly in some of the provinces, we are now equipped to deal with that condition. It is an interesting thing, and I think it is based on the province of Ontario, to look at the commentary by Francis Oakes Baldwin of Ottawa. This commentator quotes J. T. Stubbs, president of the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation, as follows:

> J. T. Stubbs made it clear that the present shortage is just a taste of what is to come—and he made it clear that he was not speaking only of Ontario. He said: "We are resting in a momentary calm at the heart of an educational hurricane—the most alarming teacher shortage ever to face the secondary schools of this province.

I shall not continue to read it, but it goes on to give the figures on the elementary schools and the increases therein. He calls it the swollen attendance in our public schools.

Now, sir, I suppose it is a condition of our history that most of the aid which has been given by this government to education in this country has been extended in a rather underhand and furtive manner. I would suggest that if the government is not prepared to accept this resolution—and I have no doubts about that particular matter—then there are one or two ways in which it might continue this furtive aid to education without making it, as it appears to be today, a political issue. I am thinking of one or two things; I am thinking of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, for example, where we have great numbers of people coming into this country from other countries and bringing their children with them. The Department of Citizenship and Immigration, without saying too much about it, has had to bolster the finances of suburban parts of cities and towns, mining camps and so on, so that schools may be built for the children of those new citizens. I suggest that that is the way that the government could continue to do this thing which it is not supposed to do. In a matter of teachers' training, I would suggest that if we are to get enough teachers in the immediate future we shall have to do something, and I would suggest that the government might even try something which they could very well do without having any suspicion or even an argument raised against interference with provincial autonomy in that field. The teachers' training would still remain in the hands of the provincial authorities themselves and the federal government could stand by with a little financial aid.

I could go on and say a word or two about the same sort of thing in the Department of National Health and Welfare, but I want to leave that phase of the question for a moment. As I have said, federal aid to education has already been very general and very generous in spots, and I think almost wholly successful. There is a long list of things in which the government has taken part. As a matter of fact, the federal government is up to its neck in aid to education now. I hold in my hand sessional paper 184, tabled in the House of Commons on May 2, 1952, which shows that millions of dollars have been spent. The list is too lengthy to read. There is apprenticeship training; youth training; supervisory training; training of persons to fit them for the armed forces. That is a sad confession. They have to educate people in order to fit them for the armed forces; training of persons to fit them for gainful employment; vocational training for discharged members of the armed forces; vocational correspondence schools; payments to provinces for capital expenditures for education, and so forth; Indian education. There are dozens of places where millions of dollars are being spent at the present time for the purpose of education.

We have of course the recent payment, and the thing which perhaps I am most thankful of all for, namely, the present aid to the universities of Canada, without which aid I see no other alternative but a breakdown in our higher education in the universities of Canada. I hear there is some talk of further expansion of scholarship grants and some federal aid to the children of veterans.

Well, sir, I am in favour of it, but I would suggest that what is good for the children of veterans is also good for other people's children.

Those who have supported the government in its stand have, for want of a better argument, resorted to what I believe is a false one, that the whole matter is unconstitutional. Again, I challenge anyone either in the house or outside of it to say that the grants I have listed have taken away, in any degree, any of the jurisdiction of the provinces over education. Neither has there been any actual interference by federal authorities either with the administration or with the curriculum of the schools.

In various places—seldom, it is true—I have been accused of raising this argument for some ulterior motive. It has been said that I have done so for purposes of political gain. Let me assure my hon. friends that I was working for federal aid for education long before I took an active part in politics, or ever saw this House of Commons.

Let me draw to the attention of the government and the house just how this issue of federal aid to education is considered throughout the country. Up to this time I have tried to keep this matter from becoming a political issue, and I have placed on the records of the house all the non-political arguments I could bring to bear. I suggest now however that the subject is likely to become a political issue. I fancy it will be in my part of the country during the next election campaign; but if it is, I shall not accept responsibility for it.

I can show from files on my desk that the subject matter of this resolution has been favoured by branches of the I.O.D.E., Legion organizations, labour organizations, agricultural co-operatives, and the Canadian Trustees Association. This is a matter which is the concern of many people throughout the country.

The Canadian School Trustees Association has been particularly active. At the very moment I speak they are aiming to collect between $30,000 and $40,000 to be spent on research in this very matter. They have employed Dr. LaZerte, one-time dean of education in Alberta, to carry out research; and the Canadian Teachers Federation will of course support that project. I do not know whether they have subscribed financially to the campaign, but I believe they are going to institute a similar research program, if they do not join the Canadian School Trustees Association in the other one.

To support that point I should like to read from a pamphlet issued by the Canadian School Trustees Association. It bears the title "Federal Aid", is taken from the Canadian Teachers Federation news letter, and states:

> The Canadian Teachers Federation will continue its campaign for education and in this connection will give financial support and actively co-operate with the Canadian School Trustees Association in their research project under the direction of Dr. M. E. LaZerte. This outstanding educationalist has accepted a two-year contract with the trustees to do a fact-finding survey of educational finance with particular reference to need for federal aid.

The fact of the matter is—and this is the most important thing I shall say today—that the expenses of education can no longer be borne by municipalities at the local level. These municipalities turn to their provinces for aid; and in that I wish them all success. I am in favour of educational aid from every source that it can be obtained. But some of the provinces are at the end of their financial tether. Local taxation upon real estate can no longer bear all the brunt. The basis of taxation for purposes of education must be broadened; and the federal government is the only institution of which I am aware with the resources necessary to make possible the equalization of educational opportunities.

I say that federal aid is the only aid by which we will be able to lower the tax rate on local municipalities. This applies particularly to suburban municipalities, where there has been a great influx of new population, where there has been new building and there is a necessity for new schools. In that connection federal aid might well take the form of the payment of expenses in connection with the building of those institutions.

I could give dozens of examples. Here is one. Only yesterday I received a newspaper clipping—and I am sorry I cannot give the name of the publication although, from the appearance of it, it would seem to be an Ontario agricultural paper. It is headed "School Tax Protested at Federation Meeting". The federation to which reference is made is the Ontario federation of agriculture, before whom Mr. Heatherington made a report in which he said:

> Because of the tremendous burden imposed on rural municipalities, due to the need for expansion of present educational facilities, we strongly suggest that the full capital cost of all new school buildings should be borne by the provincial and/or federal governments.

And at that meeting it is indicated that a Mr. Laventure said that he wanted action, "even if it meant a fight." I do not know with whom he was going to fight. At any rate this gentleman who lives in McNab township, county of Renfrew, said that his school tax alone was $185. Then the article goes on to say:

> The average one hundred acre farm in his township paid $60 to $80 in school tax, while the village dwellers paid $6 to $8. Farm property pays 10 times as much school tax as non-farmers pay on their dwellings, he said.

I offer this as some evidence as to what people are thinking concerning the source to which they should turn for relief of this condition.

As I said a moment ago, I have tried to keep the discussion non-political, but have warned the government that it could and probably would become political. My submission is that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made it a political matter when, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who was requested by some of the local school people to support an application for federal aid for education—

Mr. Knowles: The Winnipeg school board.

Mr. Knight: —the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 1355 of Hansard for November 27, 1951:

> While I have the responsibility as the head of the government I would have to ask my colleagues to join with me in refusing to consider such a request.

Then, I have referred to what I said on Friday, March 19, 1952, as reported at page 593:

> I should like to warn this government, in terms that it understands, that in the past five years a tremendous demand for federal aid to education has been created.

And again, on the same page:

> I warn the government that so far as we in western Canada are concerned, ninety per cent of the people who are represented by the Liberal members from Saskatchewan are in favour of federal aid to education. Up to the moment I have not heard much support for that cause from those particular backbenchers.

When I said that I was talking about the backbenchers from Saskatchewan in the Liberal party. We are approaching a federal election, and the government should know that the people of this country in most places support the general terms of this resolution. It is fair to say that the party of which I am a part has supported it unanimously over the years, and I think the same can be said for the Social Credit party. With only a few reservations, where some doubts have been expressed about provincial autonomy it can be said, too, of the Conservative party. And the reservation in connection with provincial autonomy is a perfectly legitimate one; we are making it ourselves.

But I have found that our Liberal friends supporting the government, so far as their votes in the house, or their words in debate are concerned, have been diametrically opposed to it. I say this does become a political issue when the opposition to this measure comes from the Liberal benches, is led by the Prime Minister, and three outstanding ministers of the government, among whom is the one now looking in my direction, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). He and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) appear to be the men who were chosen to lead the opposition of their confrères against this resolution. So I state that it is somewhat of a political issue today. So far as the backbenchers are concerned, they of course voted against the resolution, having taken their cue from whatever minister happened to be leading the fight against it on the particular day. I have made statements that the people in my own province and the people of constituencies represented here by Liberal members are about 90 per cent in favour of the terms of this resolution. Naturally I have no statistics and cannot prove that opinion. Only one Liberal backbencher, the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Harrison), actually spoke against the resolution and his speech is found at pages 644 and 645 of Hansard for March 20, 1952. In reply to my assertion with respect to the 90 per cent he said, as found at page 645:

I can say that I never had anyone mention to me federal aid for education.

That was his reply to my assertion that there was a lot of interest in the subject. Then he went on to say with respect to my figure of 90 per cent:

I would say that the only 90 per cent figure in that area I covered would be the number of those who are just plumb—

That is not my word. He said "plumb".

—against that provincial government. They are going to change it—and they are going to change it this summer.

I would suggest that if my hon. friend is no greater authority upon federal aid to education or education generally than he was a prognosticator of the results of that provincial election, then he does not know too much about it. My hon. friend of course did not debate the resolution at all. He simply loosed a wild tirade against the provincial government and, may I say, Mr. Speaker, that comes pretty ill from a member whose district has the highest equalization grant given by the province of Saskatchewan. In that whole federal constituency, as was later brought out by Mr. Lloyd, the minister of education, 72 per cent of the total cost of education in that member's entire territory is furnished today by the provincial government of Saskatchewan.

An hon. Member: How?

Mr. Knight: I hear some murmurs from some of my backbench Liberal friends. They apparently like this so I will give them more of it. The remarks of the hon. member for Meadow Lake were deeply resented throughout the province and I bring this letter to the attention of the house to show what the people of the country really think about this resolution for federal aid to education. The Saskatchewan school trustees association sent the hon. member a letter which he said he would put upon Hansard. For some reason he neglected to do that. He rose on a question of privilege with respect to the letter on March 31, as found at page 944 of Hansard.

An hon. Member: What year?

Mr. Knight: 1952. The hon. member was interrupted in his remarks by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) who asked the following question:

Would the hon. member put on the record the letter to which he is referring?

The hon. member for Meadow Lake said, "I shall be pleased to do so", but somehow or other in the heat of argument he neglected to put the letter on the record, and therefore it is my intention to do it for him today. The letter had enclosed with it a resolution passed at the provincial executive meeting of the Saskatchewan school trustees association held in Saskatoon on March 22, 1952. The resolution reads as follows:

Whereas from press reports it appears that Mr. J. H. Harrison, M.P., of Meadow Lake, Saskatchewan, when speaking in the House of Commons, stated that Saskatchewan had "the worst situation in education to be found anywhere in Canada" and further "the reason Saskatchewan had no teachers was that the larger school units—

I will leave out that part.

Some hon. Members: Read it all.

Mr. Knight: All right.

Mr. Studer: Saskatchewan spends less money on education than any other province.

Mr. Knight: I continue:

—did the hiring and they did not go into the competitive market";

And whereas in our opinion—

These are the words of the resolution of the Saskatchewan school trustees' association, a non-political body.

—these statements are false and malicious and serve only to create a grave injustice to the teachers and school trustees of the province of Saskatchewan and to educational progress generally in our province.

And whereas it would appear from these statements that Mr. Harrison is ignorant of the true situation within the province of Saskatchewan and even of the situation in and benefits obtained by his home town of Meadow Lake.

Now therefore be it resolved that the secretary be instructed to write Mr. Harrison, forwarding a copy of this resolution and requesting him to withdraw his statement so made in the House of Commons and to apologize for the injustice thereby created to the end that the stigma which he has attached to those interested in education in our province, including teachers and school trustees individually and this association, be removed.

That resolution was carried unanimously and forwarded to every member of parliament representing a seat in the province of Saskatchewan. So much for my friend from Meadow Lake. I said that the matter was to some extent becoming a political issue, and I suggest that the hon. member helped to make it so when, in attempting to defend himself, he wrote a letter to an organization of teachers in his own territory who had asked for an explanation as to why he, their member, had opposed my resolution for federal aid to education. He wrote an amazing letter which is worth a lot just as a source of amusement. My friend thought it was a good letter so he sent it to the North Battleford Optimist and the Turtleford Times. I should like every hon. member to listen to this. It shows the methods of these people. He said:

As a Liberal member here, Mr. Knight's resolution to me—

This is his explanation of why he voted against it.

—was nothing more nor less than a C.C.F. motion. It was put in there expressly to deceive people.

I challenge the Minister of Justice or anyone within the sound of my voice to suggest to me face to face in the house that I have moved this resolution deliberately for the purpose of deceiving people. That is the kind of thing we get on the hustings these days. Out west even Liberal constituents believe in federal aid to education but apparently the federal Liberal members of parliament do not. I want to relate another little incident. My very good and personal friend, the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson), came to Saskatoon a little while ago and I suppose he thought he should say a word or two about his M.P. host while he was there. He met a body of Liberals, but I do not know whether it was the Saskatoon or Saskatchewan Liberal association. At any rate, he met some of them. My hon. friend was hardly fair in what he said because, according to the press report, he insinuated that I was prepared to accept federal control over education, something which the hon. member has heard me deny time and time again in this house, or else he has read it in Hansard if he has done me the honour to read my speeches. As an intelligent member of parliament, I expect that the same hon. gentleman has done me that honour.

He spoke in Saskatoon, and it is most amusing. I said I would show that there was support for this resolution in very curious places, so I am going to read a short extract from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix dealing with the meeting of the Liberal association held on October 9, 1952. It is as follows:

Another resolution dealing with federal aid to education also touched off warm debate and finally was passed in an innocuous form.

That "innocuous" is good.

A. G. Lamarsh originally urged that the meeting go on record as endorsing federal aid to education and said it was inevitable that it would come eventually.

Then the paper quotes him as saying:

I think we should be climbing aboard the bandwagon—

How like my Liberal friends.

—and taking some of the credit for it, and not let Mr. Knight (R. R. Knight, C.C.F., M.P. for Saskatoon) steal our thunder.

"Our thunder". Whose thunder? It makes me think of Mr. Churchill's famous expression about "some chicken—some neck".

There was another gentleman present at this Liberal meeting who said:

It would be a catastrophe if the federal government ever came to a point where it controlled education.

It goes on:

Mr. Larson said he did not think even Saskatchewan wanted the federal government to take over education and there was already a good deal of criticism of the federal government for its taxation policies—

He felt that federal aid to higher forms of education, such as the national research council, was all right, but if it was granted to primary and secondary education it would cut across a lot of religious and other barriers. He added that he thought—

And this is significant.

—Mr. Knight will run into a lot of trouble over the issue, and he has received very little support for his motion to date.

—in spite of these appeals and letters that I have had from organizations all over this country.

Then I will give you a typical Liberal resolution which comes at the end.

Mr. Lamarsh finally changed his resolution to one asking the executive to investigate the problem with a view to bringing in a future resolution if it was believed advisable.

Shades of Mr. Mackenzie King!

An hon. Member: Liberals all.

Mr. Knight: Now, sir, I have finished but I would just like to put on the record, so we may know what we have been talking about, a paraphrase of a paragraph of my speech last year. I have put forward certain conclusions. Firstly, I have set forth as a matter of premise the democratic principle that every child in Canada should have as a right equal opportunity of education with every other child in Canada. Secondly, I have shown that the education system is riddled with inequalities and the cause of such inequalities is largely financial. Thirdly, I have shown that municipalities in certain provinces, and those provinces themselves, are unable to cope with the expenditure needed to bring about that equality.

Finally, asserting that such equality of opportunity is a subject of national concern, I urge that the dominion government, the only body with the necessary financial resources, while safeguarding the jurisdiction of the provinces over education within their own boundaries, should proceed forthwith to inaugurate a system of federal aid to education in Canada.

Here is a last paragraph, this time from my speech of May 22, 1950, which I would like to put on the record. This is not a wishy-washy innocuous resolution put because somebody thought it is necessary to get on the bandwagon. Here is what I said and by it I am prepared to stand or fall:

> The birthright of every child is a minimum standard of education, based not on the wealth of the parent, of the local school district, or even of the province, but on the wealth and the resources of the whole country.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Adjourn the debate.

Mr. Garson: No, I am going to disappoint my hon. friends, for I am not going to adjourn the debate.

I am a little bit embarrassed, Mr. Speaker, as a minister, in rising so soon to take part in the debate on a resolution moved by a private member on the opposition side. I do so only because I have another engagement this afternoon which I made long before I had any idea that this subject would come up now. I must get away to attend if I possibly can.

I would like to compliment the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) on the presentation which he has just made, which I am sure from his standpoint at least is a fair one. With respect to some of the main points which he has made I do not think there will be any disagreement on the part of any member of this house. No one will disagree with the splendid rhetoric with which he closed his remarks to the effect that every Canadian child should have as far as possible equal opportunity of adequate education. But I would point out that in this matter in Canada, with the peculiar set-up we have, the means to these very desirable ends which he has enunciated is of very considerable importance. I would point out, moreover, that every competent body of specialists that I know of which has investigated this problem of the best method of providing adequate support for primary education has reached conclusions which are quite different from those which are pressed by my hon. friend.

Mr. Graydon: Not the municipal experts.

Mr. Garson: Not necessarily the municipal experts. I am referring to the body which was set up to deal with this very problem in the 1930's when it was a much more acute problem than it is at the present time—the Rowell-Sirois commission set up in 1937. That was the latter part of the depression when the problem of providing a very much lower standard of expenditure for primary education was much more acute than it is for us now to provide a much higher expenditure. This was one of the main problems with which the provinces, the municipalities and, as related to them, the federal government, were faced.

That body dealt specifically with this very question and made certain comments upon it to which I shall refer in due course. Following that there were conferences between the provinces and the dominion, which, after some ups and downs, eventually culminated in the present tax agreements between those two levels of government. Throughout all of those proceedings the desire and the objective was to place all of the provinces in a position where they would be able to discharge their constitutional responsibilities for, amongst other things, primary education—without any interference in the discretion they would exercise in discharging their responsibilities in their own field of jurisdiction.

The present financial arrangements between the dominion and the provinces—under the tax agreements—are the result of the recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois report to put into the hands of the provincial governments, from federal sources, grants of income which the provinces themselves can spend as they choose. Whether they wish to spend it for primary education or for the building of roads or for any other provincial function is their choice. In other words, the central purpose was to provide all of the provinces with financial means of discharging their responsibilities—leaving with the provinces the sole discretion of how they should do that. Whether they spend more money on primary education and less on roads and the like is entirely up to them.

It is in the light of these decisions and recommendations, recommendations by the Rowell-Sirois report and decisions reached between the provincial governments and the federal government, to which only the other day the province of Ontario subscribed, as the ninth province to do so, it is under these arrangements that the provinces are in a better position to make provision for primary education, among other things.

The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) was fair enough in his remarks to admit that the federal government gives large educational grants to the universities and training schools which are set up for specific purposes under the joint auspices of the federal and provincial governments. I am sure that he would be the first to admit that these arrangements represent the willingness of the federal government to make contributions to the provincial governments in all of those cases in which it is possible to do so without interfering in any way with the provinces' exclusive control over primary education

In support of what I have just been saying, I should like to quote from the Rowell-Sirois report, because I do not know of any other place in which these principles are more lucidly set forth. I should like to quote from volume II of the report, page 50, to this effect:

We have already said that the instruction of the young during their formative years is a matter which the provinces must continue to control (subject, of course, to the safeguard for religious minorities provided in the British North America Act and amendments). A free hand in something so important to the social and cultural life of the people seems to us to be vital to any provincial autonomy worthy of the name, and it is obvious that any attempts to alter the existing arrangements would meet with powerful opposition and would provoke profound resentment.

I suggest that the hon. member for Saskatoon, as a school teacher, must be assumed to be familiar with some Canadian history. I hope he is. As a school teacher, and as a member of this house, I am sure he will not disagree with that principle enunciated in the Sirois report.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is quite obvious to anyone who stops to reflect upon this matter that it is one thing for the federal government to make grants, for example, to the universities which are self-governing and self-contained. They exercise their own discretion as to the manner in which those grants shall be spent. Any government, whether provincial or federal, knows that in making such grants to universities it has given up any kind of residual control that it might wish to exercise. To argue, because it is proper, in the light of Canadian history, to make grants to institutions of that kind, that it is equally proper to make grants to provincial governments earmarked for primary education, is a totally different matter. It is impossible to draw any proper analogy between the two types of grants.

This is indicated by a further comment from the Rowell-Sirois report. At page 51 they say:

Many representations have been made to us that financial help should be extended by the dominion to the provinces for various purposes, such as scholarships, technical training, grants to be used for general educational purposes provided that the provinces did not reduce their own expenditure on education. These representations appear to have been inspired largely by consternation—

Remember that this was back in the time when provincial expenditures for education were a great deal lower than they are now.

—at the reductions in educational expenditure which certain provinces, under the stress of the depression, have felt compelled to make. It has even been contended that the dominion is bound to see that there is equal educational opportunity (as far as is practicable) for every Canadian child. We have the deepest sympathy for these views which have been advanced by many of the organizations most closely associated with education in Canada, and we share to the full the regret that, especially in recent years, education has been terribly neglected in many of the poorer parts of the country and that wholly disproportionate sacrifices have been imposed on those who have devoted their lives to this important public service. But the representations appear to us to go too far in denying the right of each province to decide the relative importance of expenditure on education and expenditure on other competing services. It is our hope—

Now, they are enunciating here a principle which is one of the cardinal principles of the Rowell-Sirois report, which is one of the basic principles of the financial arrangements which have been reached between the federal government and the provinces, and which is the only principle upon which it is possible, in these financial arrangements, to have proper respect for provincial autonomy.

—that provision can be made for the fiscal needs of all provinces, including within those needs provision for the education of the young. Our financial proposals aim at placing every province in a position to discharge its responsibilities for education (on a scale—

Now, this is an important consideration for my hon. friend to listen to. The taxpayers of this country will certainly listen to it.

—that is within the means of the people of Canada) if it chooses to do so.

If we say, as the motion does, that the federal government should make grants to the provinces to supplement their expenditures for primary education at the present time when their budgets are certainly in a very buoyant condition, if we say it is still necessary to supplement them at this time, and the proposal is—I am sure my hon. friend will agree with this—that sums which would reach large amounts should be paid to the provinces for that purpose and earmarked for primary education, no one with any practical knowledge of public administration would say that there was not a clear responsibility upon the federal government to exercise a reasonable degree of supervision to make sure that the moneys voted by parliament, allocated for purposes of that sort, are actually expended for the purposes for which they have been given to the provinces.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Would he say that what he has just pronounced applies to the case of the $250,000 which I am very glad the federal government is making available to the school board of Winnipeg for building a school in the city of Winnipeg in the Fort Osborne district?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will investigate the very matter to which he refers, he will find that the department of government which makes the grant to build that school does satisfy itself that the school meets certain standards and that it is properly built. I would point out to my hon. friend that if he has any idea of Canadian history he will surely be able to distinguish between that case and the case of moneys turned over for the payment of teachers and the like in the field of primary education, involving continuous supervision of provincial expenditures over a period of years.

Mr. Noseworthy: He would have to be a Liberal lawyer to make that distinction.

Mr. Knowles: This money has been turned over to the Winnipeg school board.

Mr. Garson: Yes, turned over for the purpose of making a capital expenditure. If my hon. friend spoke with knowledge, he would be telling the house that there are careful checks made in all of these cases to ensure that the money is being properly spent. I do not think my hon. friend is taking the position that the Rowell-Sirois recommendations are wrong. I do not think he is taking the position in opposition to these tax agreements, because certainly if he did he would be acting very much against the interest of the province from which he comes. But what he is saying is that after these arrangements have been made, he is not satisfied as a teacher, as a member of the house or as a Canadian, if you like, with the amount of money which the provincial government, with all the grants which it receives, is spending for primary education in the province of Saskatchewan. That being the case, he wants the federal taxpayers to pay over some more money for that purpose.

There was a time, Mr. Speaker, when a case of that sort could be put up with a great deal more cogency and force than can be done at the present time. Back at the time when the Rowell-Sirois commission was set up, it was quite true that the amounts which were being spent for educational purposes were disgraceful, and that they were much more disgraceful than they are at the present time. My hon. friend may say that they are still disgraceful, even in the province of Saskatchewan. He may say that. But if they are, then may I say I have a few figures here to show that if the province of Saskatchewan wishes to do so it can certainly spend on primary education more money than it is at present spending—

Mr. Knight: May I interrupt—

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will allow me to finish my sentence, I shall be glad. I was going on to say that the figures also show that the province of Saskatchewan has been placed in a position to do so by the very tax agreements whose adequacy my hon. friend is now challenging.

I say to him that the western provinces and the maritimes particularly—and other provinces of Canada; Ontario is now included —have worked extremely hard to find, under the existing distribution of responsibilities between the federal government and the provincial governments, some method whereby every province in Canada, within reasonable limits, could provide at least a minimum service in the field of education and other fields of provincial responsibility; and they have, after long negotiations and much travail, finally obtained an arrangement which is working reasonably well. What I warn my hon. friend against is leaning too heavily on special earmarked grants and tearing down the whole structure of federal-provincial finance.

When we look at the facts, what do we find? We find that in 1939 the total expenditure on education in all of the provinces was $38 million. At that time—even then—the total expenditure upon highways and bridges was $87·6 million. But in 1949, after the tax agreements had been in effect but before they were signed by Ontario, the amount spent on education was over $154 million—up from $38 million—an increase of more than fourfold in ten years. But during that period of time the expenditures upon highways and bridges by the provinces had been enlarged by $164 million per year because, in part, of the assistance which they had obtained in these tax agreements. The total provincial expenditures in 1939 in all provinces were $356 million. In 1949 they were $858 million.

In the face of these facts, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me to be an extremely difficult thing for a member of this house—even such an eloquent gentleman as the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight)—to say with any force that, in this increase in expenditures from $356 million to $858 million, there was no room or no adequate scope for a larger increase upon education if the provincial government charged with the constitutional responsibility for dealing with primary education had chosen or had desired to spend more money upon that function. In the face of this large over-all increase in all other forms of provincial expenditure, surely no one can suggest otherwise than that if the provision for education is as inadequate as the hon. gentleman suggests it is, then the provincial ministers have the clear responsibility, and not only this government but provincial governments, provincial public men, the Sirois commission and those who took part in the discussions between the provinces and the dominion leading up to the tax agreements, all seemed to think that it was desirable that the provinces should continue to retain and to exercise that responsibility.

Mr. Knight: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Garson: Surely.

Mr. Knight: Has he read the pronouncement of Premier Campbell of Manitoba in that regard at the time the provincial conference was being set up and also the request of Premier Douglas that this matter should form part of the agenda?

Mr. Garson: I may perhaps have read them but I have not retained them in my memory. But if they are to any different effect from what I am arguing, I would certainly disagree with them.

Mr. Knowles: And you would be wrong again.

Mr. Garson: No; not necessarily. I made the suggestion, and I make it again, that I should like my hon. friend—and he put up a good case today—sometime during the course of his research in this matter and his statements upon it to say—as he has been careful not to say—what these bodies like the Rowell-Sirois commission who have investigated this matter think about it.

As to the province of Saskatchewan, let us examine my hon. friend's arguments. He wants more money paid by the federal government into that province.

Mr. Knight: May I ask the minister a question? Does he not realize that the whole burden of my speech is that I am just as much interested in the children of Newfoundland or Prince Edward Island as I am in the children of my own province?

Mr. Garson: Oh, I agree.

Mr. Knight: Surely that is plain.

Mr. Garson: I agree. But during the course of his remarks my hon. friend talked a good deal about Saskatchewan, and properly so, because he represents Saskatchewan. Surely he is not going to deny me the same right. Of course not.

Mr. Knowles: But the minister comes from Manitoba. Tell us something about what happened there.

Mr. Garson: I shall be glad indeed to do that if I may make that interjection right now. As to Manitoba, for the information of my hon. friend, although I am sure that he knows it quite well, under these tax agreements that province is getting—and I am just speaking from memory—about three times as much as it was able to get from those same revenue sources by provincial taxes which at that time were the highest of their kind on the North American continent. They are getting it without the imposition of those taxes and without the imposition of as high taxes as Saskatchewan has, with the imposition of only a nine-cent gasoline tax, with no sales tax of any kind at all, and have been able to increase their budget from something of the order of $17 million to between $40 million and $45 million.

Having made that comment upon Manitoba, may I be permitted to deal with Saskatchewan. In 1952-53, these are the amounts paid by the federal government into Saskatchewan: Subsidy, $24,626,000—that is under the tax agreement; health grants, $2 million; pensions to persons 65 to 69, $2,024,000; pensions for the blind, $155,000; vocational training, $128,000; trans-Canada highway, $1,937,000, for a total of $30,870,000: The amounts paid to individuals in the province of Saskatchewan were: Family allowances, $19,450,000; pensions to persons over 70, $19,200,000, or a total of $38,650,000, or a grand total of $69,520,000. Let us get this clear. I am not arguing for a minute that, because these amounts were paid, that in itself is a reason why money should not be paid towards primary education, if it can be shown that after all of these federal payments, and after all of the moneys which that province is able to collect in taxes as a result of the prosperity towards which we have at least in part contributed by the policies of this government, they are in serious need of money, and therefore because of that need cannot support their schools. But, Mr. Speaker, this is the central point upon which my hon. friend's case falls down, namely that under the existing financial arrangements between the dominion and the provinces the provinces do not have enough money to spend upon primary education, if they choose to spend it there, rather than upon roads, bridges and other provincial purposes, which is their right. I sympathize with him; he has done a wonderful job with the material which he had, but he just does not have the facts to support it.

Under this tax agreement the Saskatchewan government has had surpluses every year from April 30, 1944, to March 31, 1951.

Mr. Noseworthy: What about the federal government?

Mr. Garson: Yes, of course they have had surpluses, too.

Mr. Graydon: And how!

Mr. Garson: And when you have a great degree of economic activity, high employment and no unemployment—

Mr. Graydon: And bad guessing.

Mr. Garson: And high production in the country, not only the provincial governments but the federal government, by the imposition of tax rates that are not out of line compared with those of other countries, get large amounts of revenue, and we can have surpluses. I think my hon. friends who have been interrupting me with these remarks will all agree that it is a very desirable thing that Saskatchewan should have a surplus. I am all for it; I am glad to see this province have surpluses; but in spite of the fact that when they have had surpluses for ten years running, and that they have reduced the debt between April 30, 1944, and March 31, 1951, by about $54½ million —this is apart from the surpluses—I think the federal government should be given some credit for what it did with respect to that $54½ million because it cancelled indebtedness of that province to the extent of $36½ million, they now say that they cannot afford more money for primary education.

In rebuttal of this poor mouth which my hon. friend puts up here on behalf of the Saskatchewan government, let me read an article from Time magazine of January 19, 1953. Some, if not all, of the facts on which this article is based must have been supplied by the provincial treasurer of the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Knight: On a question of privilege, I have put up no poor mouth for Saskatchewan. I was speaking on behalf of the children of Canada.

Mr. Garson: Perhaps that was a harsh way of putting the words of my hon. friend, but I leave it to you, Mr. Speaker, and to hon. members, if what my hon. friend did was not this. He said on behalf of the children of Canada: "I would like to see them have a good education; I want more money spent on education, but I want the federal government to spend it." Well, the responsibility for providing the education is that of the provinces, and the only excuse that the provinces have for not providing it is that they have not the money with which to do it. While perhaps the term that I used was hardly fair, yet essentially my hon. friend's case is that we are asking the federal government to put up this money because the provinces either have not the money or they will not spend it in adequate amounts.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): May I ask the minister a question? He said that the federal government cancelled indebtedness to the extent of $36½ million for Saskatchewan. Why was no calculation made for Nova Scotia?

Mr. Garson: To be fair to all concerned, I think one should say that the $36½ million represents amounts that were advanced by the federal government to the province of Saskatchewan during the 1930's when the price of the primary product that is turned out there had fallen to its lowest level in four hundred years, and when there was a succession of five or maybe six droughts. Those large amounts of money were advanced to the province for seed grain and relief upon the understanding that the seed grain would be repaid, and when, under conditions which reflect no discredit either upon the provincial government there or upon the people of Saskatchewan in any way, the amounts were not repaid, it was considered proper and fair to everyone concerned that the $36½ million should be cancelled. I presume the reason that was not done in Nova Scotia was that the same indebtedness had never been incurred.

I was saying that in the issue of Time of January 19, 1953, the following article appeared:

Saskatchewan
More cornucopias

For 364 days a year, Clarence Melvin Fines dresses like the conservative citizen that he is. But once a year, on the day he delivers his budget to the Saskatchewan legislature, provincial treasurer Fines puts on his gaudiest necktie. It is a flashy red, yellow and blue number, patterned with spilling cornucopias that symbolize the budgetary surpluses Fines has reported for every one of the eight years he has managed the province's finances. Last week, as Fines prepared his 1953 budget message, it was apparent that the cornucopia pattern of his "budget necktie" would be more appropriate than ever. Saskatchewan is winding up the most prosperous fiscal year in its history. With provincial revenues expected to top $70 million, more than double what they were a decade ago, a record-busting surplus is in store in the new budget.

Mr. Cardiff: What kind of cornucopia does the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) put on?

Mr. Garson: He is also doing a very good job under those excellent policies. The article goes on:

Fines convinced his socialist colleagues that a high credit rating should be the province's goal. "We were under suspicion" he says. "Our financial methods had to be more than orthodox. They had to be ultra-orthodox".

And now as a result of the ultra-orthodox methods applied, I presume in relation to the cost of primary education and creating a condition upon the strength of it, the hon. member for Saskatoon is urging that more money should be paid by the federal government. We have this request being made. Well, it reminds me, Mr. Speaker, of one time when I was in the position that Mr. Fines is in now and perhaps the hon. member for Saskatoon was in the position he is in now, and I was applying to Mr. Dunning at that time for more money. He said: "Garson, I am delighted that you should have it as long as you do not take it out of me." In the present case, if the—

Mr. Graydon: And the taxpayers think that, too.

Mr. Garson: Yes, perhaps. I think my hon. friend is entirely right because the danger with which we are really faced in connection with this matter of federal subsidies is this. Perhaps the hon. member for Peel made the remark in part facetiously, but it is a very pointed remark just the same. The danger we are faced with is this. We have here an arrangement entered into after long negotiations and great travail, under which provincial treasuries upon the whole have flourished very greatly indeed. And if there is a tendency not to use in their budgets the prosperity which these agreements have brought them in order to discharge carefully their own proper constitutional responsibilities, and if there is a tendency to keep on loading more and more upon the federal government, then the federal taxpayers of this country, like the goose that lays the golden egg, are going to balk.

Mr. Graydon: They have to pay for the schools at home.

Mr. Garson: Yes, they have to pay for the schools at home. In other words, it can hardly be maintained that this attitude is reasonable when, during the currency of these tax agreements, the provinces, after increasing their expenditures not only upon education but also upon roads and everything else—very nearly tripling their expenditures over the period of the tax agreements—have an over-all accumulated surplus in the five-year period of nearly two-thirds of a billion dollars.

And yet my hon. friend makes that the basis for his case—that we should provide federal grants to education, to help out provinces which are in that position. Now, I say to my hon. friend that if that is the sort of demand that he is going to make, in the circumstances in which we are at the present time, then he wants to be very, very careful that the point is not reached where the federal taxpayer is going to balk at this and say, "We do not want the agreements at all." And if that were the case, where would his province be?

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): May I ask the minister a question? Can the minister inform the house if at any of the dominion-provincial conferences provincial governments have requested from the dominion direct grants for education and, if so, how many of them?

Mr. Ross (Souris): Yes.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): The hon. member for Souris says, "Yes". If so, how many?

Mr. Garson: I hesitate to speak offhand, from memory, on this matter. But I did make a statement last year, at which time I had somewhat more leisure than I have had on this occasion to check that very point. This is what I said at that time—and if the situation has not changed in the last year, it is still true:

> It is commonplace to say that the jurisdiction of provincial legislatures over education is, of all provincial rights, the one of which some if not all of the provinces are most jealous. Therefore, as between federal and provincial governments, the initiative in connection with matters pertaining to education is one which I think the federal government has always felt should be taken by the provincial governments. So far as I am aware, the provincial governments have never raised with the federal government at any time the subject matter of this resolution as such;

Mr. Knight: May I ask a question?

Mr. Garson: Please let me finish. I am in the embarrassing position of quoting myself because, as I say, I had more leisure last time to prepare. I have not had time to check between last year and now as to whether representations have been made, or have come in, and I do not like to make a definite statement until I make an inquiry. However, I am quoting now what I said at that time—and I think it is still true:

> So far as I am aware, the provincial governments have never raised with the federal government at any time the subject matter of this resolution as such; nor have they raised the question of educational costs except as an item of the provincial budgets which naturally were the subject of discussion in the Rowell-Sirois report, in the conference dealing with the dominion proposals of 1945, and indeed in all the fiscal conferences between the federal government and the provinces.

When I say "as such" I mean this, that the provinces have never been willing to concede that the federal government by any means, directly or indirectly, should have any control over their primary educational system. But what they have said is this: "We are addressing ourselves in this conference as to our educational needs to cover our whole budget. Here it is. We have to provide for education and we have to provide for health. There it is." It is only in that sense that they have referred to education.

The whole consideration of the Rowell-Sirois commission report was with a view to reaching an agreement under which provincial budgets as a whole could be taken care of. And I am sure that every member will agree that they should have the right to decide, in respect of a matter which comes under their jurisdiction, as to whether they will spend their money upon primary education, or upon highways, or upon roads, or some other way. Surely that is a matter of ordinary common sense.

Surely, from the standpoint of just ordinary, proper administration, where you have three levels of authority, the school administration, the municipal and the provincial, with all their overhead, their rent, their stationery, and all that sort of thing, it is not a fair or prudent expenditure of the taxpayers' money that you should add a fourth level of government, and waste it in that way.

Surely it is a much more sensible arrangement, as the Rowell-Sirois commission recommended, that the provinces should be put in a position where they can arrange their own proper responsibilities, and then leave them there to mind their own business, and not attempt to interfere with them or to supervise them in any way.

Now, my hon. friend will say, "I do not want to supervise them". But does he think for one moment that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) can write out a cheque for, let us say, $50 million or $75 million—and at $5 a head in Canada, if it were at that rate, it would be $75 million—does he think that the Minister of Finance can just write out the cheque and say, "Here you go; you do not have to run your primary education. You do not have to take the responsibility for the expenditure of the money. Just go ahead and spend the money, and we will not take any further notice of the matter, at all."

He cannot do that. If he did, he would have to see that the money which was earmarked for primary education was spent for primary education. And I say again that in any of these schemes people who are said to know something about this matter have been opposed to earmarked grants. And one of the reasons is that it is only when you give a general grant that is not earmarked, a grant to be spent by the province as it, in its own judgment and within its own jurisdiction, chooses to spend it, that you are protecting provincial autonomy.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Noseworthy: On the point the minister has raised: Has any province indicated that it would not be willing to accept from the federal government a grant earmarked for education, to be spent on education?

Mr. Garson: I am sure my hon. friend did not intend to cast any reflection upon my mental ability when he asked that question. But, had it not been he who asked it, I would have been almost insulted by it.

Now, I think for these reasons that in a matter which is regarded by many provinces as about as important a constitutional provision as there is in the British North America Act I, for one, would deprecate any interference with an arrangement which has worked very well for eighty years, since confederation. Perhaps my hon. friend might postpone his resolution, or any representations on this matter, until a later time when he would be in a better position—and I hope that time never comes—when he might be in a better position than he is now to say that the provinces are unable to cover these expenditures instead of the position now when, in point of fact, under the tax agreements they have been showing surpluses of something of the order of two-thirds of a billion dollars.

Mr. Graydon: Would the government do it then?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Knight: Might I ask a question before the hon. member proceeds? Is the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) aware that after his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), made a similar statement to the one the minister has made today, namely that there was no request from the provinces as such for federal aid to education, the Minister of National Health and Welfare—I will not say he was forced to do so—willingly retracted his statement publicly in the city of Regina because it was wrong?

Mr. Garson: By being wrong, I suppose my hon. friend means that the provincial government of Saskatchewan had made a request?

Mr. Knight: I don't know.

Mr. Knowles: It came from the minister's own successor in Manitoba.

Mr. Knight: I shall supply one of my colleagues with the statement of Mr. Campbell, the premier of Manitoba.

Mr. Garson: In all fairness, Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend wishes to quote some general statement like that in rebuttal to something I have said, I think the proper thing to do is to bring along the statement and do so.

Mr. Knight: Yes.

Mr. Noseworthy: You will get it.

Mr. Garson: I am exactly half an hour late now for my other engagement. I am sorry I cannot do my hon. friend the courtesy of remaining in the house.

Mr. Knight: Perhaps the Minister of National Health and Welfare would put us right.

Mr. Garson: I will depute him to do that.

Mr. Martin: I would want to study that very carefully.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this motion, as I have in other sessions when such a motion has been before the house, I want to point out that there may be a difference of opinion as to the way in which words are to be interpreted when we are asked to support a motion that consideration should be given to the advisability of expanding and equalizing educational opportunities across Canada by the granting of financial assistance to the various provinces for that purpose. It does not seem to me that it is necessary to define in the most minute detail the manner in which the provinces are to be placed in a better position with respect to the financing of education. I take this motion as an attempt to obtain an expression of opinion from the members of the house that in the opinion of this house it is desirable to seek a way in which the provincial governments and the municipalities under them will find it possible to meet the increasing demands of education which are their responsibility.

While the motion does not specifically deal with the municipalities, I recognize that no hon. member can discuss this subject without a full understanding of the place of the municipalities in dealing with this problem.

Mr. Knowles: And the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) did not touch on it.

Mr. Drew: I do not feel it is necessary for me to suggest that the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) in presenting this motion contemplates the position of the municipalities. Everyone who has had any practical responsibility for education knows that it is at the municipal level that the basic responsibility rests.

Mr. Graydon: That is where the pinch comes.

Mr. Drew: As has been pointed out, that is where the pinch comes today. Unfortunately the whole speech of the Minister of Justice on this subject completely failed to deal with the position of the municipalities. That is where the problem really rests at this time. As I am sure every hon. member knows, there have been repeated requests from the representatives of the municipalities that in some way their plight with respect to mounting educational costs should be recognized and dealt with.

I propose to deal with the subject not so much from the point of view of the manner in which money might be made available but rather from the point of view of the need of some action to deal with the subject, particularly by the combined consideration of the dominion and provincial governments to find some way in which municipalities across Canada may be able to relieve the burden which is now imposed upon the municipal taxpayer and particularly upon home owners in those municipalities.

It is only necessary to mention the fact without enlarging upon it. The very foundation of our society, the society we seek to strengthen and build by education itself, rests upon the home.

In so far as governments at every level can by their action improve the position of the home owner, they should seek to encourage the owning and improvement of homes, pride in homes and the happiness that may be found in those homes because it is there that the real strength of our society will be found. I was impressed by the fact that the Minister of Justice on a number of occasions spoke of the willingness or unwillingness of the federal taxpayer to meet this responsibility if any heavier burden were placed upon the federal taxpayer. Who is the federal taxpayer, Mr. Speaker? There is no such thing as a separate human entity. The federal taxpayer is the provincial taxpayer and the municipal taxpayer. They are the same human beings. In every community across Canada those who pay taxes pay to the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion government.

So far as they are concerned it is only a question of whether the taxes are taken by one body or another, and most taxpayers from their own experience would prefer to see the larger amount being handled closer to home. They have found that the closer the collection and supervision is to their own point of payment the greater economy there is and the less extravagance of the nature we have seen so plainly exposed in the house during the past couple of weeks. After all, it is not only the spending of money that is important, it is how the money is spent. What we should be seeking is to get the money paid in a way that will produce the greatest economy and efficiency and the results that are most desirable for the Canadian taxpayer, federal, provincial, or municipal, but the Canadian taxpayer right across Canada who regards education and health as the two most important problems for governments at every level.

When the Minister of Justice speaks about the surpluses that have mounted year by year, he ignores the fact that this is very largely the result of the inflation which has been promoted in this country by the methods employed by the dominion government. That inflation has had a great deal to do with the mounting levels of receipts in dollars by the name of dollars. In real money the story is somewhat different, but the story is not different from the point of view of the necessity for increased facilities for education in each community.

I do not intend to engage in a debate as to the general financial methods of the dominion government, although the Minister of Justice has sought to place that before us as an issue at this time. Nor do I propose to extend the discussion that has taken place already so far as the Minister of Justice is concerned, about the comparative advantages of the dominion government's methods and those of the government of Saskatchewan or of any other province. I prefer to deal with this from the point of view of the importance of education, the needs of those who must accept this responsibility, and my own hope that members of this house will see fit to indicate their belief that there is an urgent need—and I repeat "urgent need"—for consideration of this subject which is certainly imposing very serious problems upon every municipal government and every school board in this country at this time.

I am glad that this debate has been brought on now, because it comes forward at a time when it is possible for us to express opinions in anticipation of education week which runs from March 1 to March 7 inclusive. That national effort to impress upon the people of Canada the fact that education is everybody's business does deserve our commendation and support. I believe it will be helpful to those behind that effort to know the attitude of the legislators in this house now in regard to this subject. Also it will be helpful to them to know the view of the provincial legislators and the municipal councils in regard to this subject.

The basic theme of education week, which will be recognized right across Canada in about five weeks, is to impress upon all Canadians that education is everybody's business—not the business of the dominion government, the provincial government or the municipal government; not the business of the federal taxpayer, the provincial taxpayer, or the municipal taxpayer; but rather the business of every Canadian. And, as Canadians, we should co-operate in every way we can to advance the cause of education right across this country of ours.

No one recognizes better than I do, from personal experience and personal responsibility, the need for drawing a clear distinction between such measure of co-operation as may be extended by the dominion government and the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial governments and the provincial departments of education for the over-all policy of education within the provinces; and of the school boards and the municipal governments under the provincial governments for education at the local level. I may be forgiven for reminding hon. members that I had for some years direct responsibility as minister of education in one of our provinces.

Mr. Graydon: You did a good job, too.

Mr. Drew: I had personal contact with the needs of the municipalities and the points of view they expressed. Without in any way raising this as an issue at this time, I need only remind hon. members that I demonstrated my own belief that the municipal taxpayer must be relieved of the burden for education in a very substantial measure.

It was while I was minister of education in one of our provinces that a very substantial part of the cost of education at the municipal level was assumed by that provincial government. I still hold the same opinion. I believe that one of the most important responsibilities of the combined levels of government at this time is to find a way in which the heavily burdened municipal taxpayer will be relieved of the crippling burden of taxation for education and health at the municipal level, which at this time must be placed so largely upon homes and real property.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: I believe this has two purposes, first of all to give flexibility in revenue, which cannot be possible when the position of the home owner is considered. He may not be a home owner but may be one who rents a home, because both are taxpayers. It should also be considered from the point of view of encouragement of a greater number of people to buy and own their own homes. I think it can be properly and safely said that the greatest protection of our concept of a free society is to have the largest possible number of Canadians owning their own homes and having them as the centre of their whole social system. I might add that it is a way in which they have a stake in their community, which gives them an added interest in the efficiency and economy that will be practised by their local municipal government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this subject is assuming rapidly increasing importance. Right across Canada statements are being made by responsible citizens that there is immediately ahead of us the threat of a great shortage of qualified teachers for our schools. If that is so—and I find it difficult to doubt that it is so in view of the sources from which those statements come—then it is time for each one of us as a Canadian citizen, even if we completely divorce that position from our responsibility in this parliament, to take a very great and immediate interest in this subject.

The most important factor in education is the teacher. The most important factor in the development of the character of our youth, after the fundamental education which they receive at their mothers' knees and in the churches, is to be found in the standard of education given by teachers across Canada. I think every hon. member of this house will agree that there is a debt of gratitude owed by all Canadians to the unselfish service given to the cause of education by teachers who very often have not been recognized as they should be by the salaries they have received.

It is not merely the academic qualification of the teacher which is important in implanting in the minds of our youth the right approach to the life ahead of them, it is also the spirit and the character of the teacher. The character of our teachers has fully justified the confidence that has been placed in them. It would be impossible, however, for the spirit, the buoyancy and the confidence in our system not to be shaped in some measure by the extent to which those teachers feel that their great responsibility is appreciated by those who fix the level of their salaries.

I have said before in the discussion of this subject, and I do not apologize for repeating it now, that next to those who guide our religious faith there is no calling to which a Canadian can devote himself which plays a more vital part in the life, the character and future of our people, than does the teaching profession. It is many, many centuries ago since it was said by a very wise Greek that the foundation of every state is the education of its youth. Never was that more dramatically true than it is today. The kind of country that Canada is to be ten years, twenty-five years, one hundred years from now, is going to be determined in a very substantial measure by the kind of education we give our children in our schools.

May I emphasize one vitally important fact recognized by every educator and by everyone who understands the place of education, whether it be in the home, the church or the school. It is in the earliest years of receptive thought that some of the most important guiding principles of life will be established in the minds of our children. Very often in the distant years ahead it will be the principles implanted today in the mind of some young child which will determine whether or not that child will resist temptation, or will accept the responsibilities falling upon him in some great task, or will avoid the pitfalls that are bound to be before everyone. In giving education, we are not merely providing a means by which our children will earn a living and gain some measure of material happiness. We are shaping their whole future; we are shaping the way in which they will meet all the trials that every human being in this and other countries must face today, and will continue to face in the years ahead.

We are not just speaking of academic attainment as a result of education. We are speaking of the character of our people. When we talk of many other things, and seek legislative measures to deal with problems connected with them, we sometimes ignore the fact that most of these problems could be best dealt with by the fundamental education we give our youth. We will have before us shortly the new draft of the Criminal Code containing provisions in regard to offences by young offenders. We are in the habit of speaking of that problem as juvenile delinquency. The most effective way to tackle juvenile delinquency is to be sure that all children, wherever they live and whatever the circumstances of their parents may be, will receive the kind of education that will give them the ethical standards to resist the temptations that are bound to be in their path.

We shall be dealing also with a section of the Criminal Code concerning drunken driving. Far more effective than any law in determining the way in which our people will live, and the manner in which they will face problems of society in this and other respects, is the sense of obligation they will have developed in their own minds to their fellow citizens. The men and women who have been taught as children to remember their obligation to others will be much less likely to get behind the wheel of a car, with all its dreadful possibilities, in a condition that does not meet the responsibility imposed upon them by that simple act. The same thing is true of all the problems we meet in our daily life, and in respect of which we are called upon to deal from time to time by legislative action. All this I repeat because of the necessity of placing in the hands of municipal authorities and the school boards adequate revenues to bring into the teaching profession the very finest brains and the very best spirit to be found amongst the young people of Canada.

Then may I deal with another subject which is related to this; that is the excellent work being done by home and school organizations right across Canada. At this time over 200,000 Canadians are actively engaged, through this and related organizations, in advancing the cause of education in every province of Canada. There are also the parent-teacher organizations where, from the special knowledge gained by teachers in their own field, they are able to encourage a better understanding of this great problem. I point out also to the minister the importance of adult education in relation to this whole subject of education, because adult education is largely made possible by the broad standards of education developed at the primary level.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the question arises as to how we are to encourage into the ranks of the teaching profession the very best of our young university and high school graduates. The question arises also as to how we are to provide the very best educational facilities possible in this country of such tremendous opportunity. This afternoon the discussion has dealt in some measure with the difficulty of drawing the distinction between the provincial responsibility and the responsibility of the dominion government. I am not suggesting for one moment that anything should be done which will in any way, indirectly or directly, encourage the dominion government to invade the field of education. I agree with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), and others who have spoken on this subject on earlier occasions, as I have asserted at dominion-provincial conferences. I have attended, that there is no subject of provincial jurisdiction in regard to which the provincial governments will more jealously assert their prerogative. I hope they will continue to do so. Our unity as a nation depends upon the extent to which we recognize the position of the provincial government in the field of education and do not, directly or indirectly at any level, seek to interfere with that responsibility.

Education, for reasons so obvious they need not be repeated here, was left to the provincial governments at the time the provinces of Canada joined to form one nation in 1867. When the Minister of Justice today warned us that we must be cautious in this respect and that it would be unwise to undertake a system of grants in aid which would force the dominion government to exercise some measure of control over the expenditure, I wonder whether that same observation applies with equal force to every other place where the dominion government is now making grants of one kind and another. That is exactly the point I have been seeking to make in this house on a number of occasions with regard to other grants. I believe that the best way for us to assure the continuing strength of our federal system is to make sure that the provincial governments and the municipal councils within those provinces have adequate revenues so they are able to carry out their tasks without any possibility of intervention at any time by the dominion government.

That was the concept of confederation that we accepted in 1867. It is the genius of our form of confederation. It is the basis upon which national unity has been established here. When the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) told us that at present there are agreements which have been found satisfactory to the provinces—and may I say that I realize why he is not now present; he indicated that it was necessary for him to keep some appointment—and that Ontario, which recently signed the agreement, finds it satisfactory, I would remind him of something which I hope he has not forgotten, namely that most of the provinces have stated—and certainly the government of the province of Ontario has done so in the most emphatic terms—that these agreements are not a satisfactory solution of the problem. In signing this agreement strictly as a temporary measure the premier of Ontario said that at best it was only a stopgap, and that steps should be taken immediately to find a system by which the provincial governments and the municipalities would have adequate sources of revenue.

Not long ago I saw the report of a speech by the premier of Nova Scotia to the bar association of that province in which he said that the time had come when the people in this country must decide whether there is going to continue to be a federal system in Canada. He left no doubt about his own belief that if we follow the present course of stripping the provinces of their real provincial authority, the federal system in Canada cannot continue. Similar statements in different words have been made by the heads of other provincial governments. My own belief is that the one way in which to deal satisfactorily with this subject is to seek a reallocation of the taxes which are given to the provincial governments and to the municipalities under them, with independence of revenue which is consistent with their independent responsibilities in their own field, and that this be done without further delay.

It is all very well to point out that the provincial governments are receiving large sums of money from the dominion government under agreements whereby the provinces gave up, for the time being, their historic tax fields; I refer to the great basic fields of the personal income tax, the corporation tax and other taxes which have been the subject of agreement. What the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) refrained from dealing with was the fact that, having obtained agreements in this respect, the dominion government continues to invade still further the general field of taxation, so that the percentage of the tax dollar available to both the municipal and the provincial governments becomes smaller and smaller.

In 1951 the dominion government collected 77 per cent of every dollar paid in taxes by Canadian taxpayers. Last year it would appear that they collected 78 per cent. The figure is going up all the time. Year by year the percentage of the tax dollar available to the provincial and municipal governments becomes less and less. This fact has the effect of forcing back upon the home owner, the tenant and the small businessman in the municipality a larger and larger burden for education and health within the municipality. One of the most urgent needs of the Canadian taxpayer at this time is for governments at all levels to bring about a readjustment of taxation which will relieve the burden of the municipal taxpayer.

I support this motion not with the thought that there may be complete agreement as to the way in which this objective will be worked out. I thought the hon. member for Saskatoon was extremely fair in the way in which he placed before us his own belief that it was not necessary to define in too great detail the procedure by which this proposal is to be put into effect, but rather that we should seek from the members of this house an expression of opinion that at every level of government there be that appropriate consideration of this subject which will make it possible to provide the educational standards that we would wish to see in every part of Canada. He spoke about Canadian children in every part of this country. I believe that is the way in which we should approach the matter. I have indicated my own belief that nothing which is done here at any time must minimize in the slightest measure the full responsibility of the provincial governments for the vitally important subject of education and, under them, the municipal authorities who operate under provincial laws and who deal at the local level with this tremendously important subject in the building of a strong and good society.

Without seeking to draw differences between one party and another as to any political doctrine they may express from time to time with respect to financial or other matters, but having regard to the vital importance of education at this time, to the place of the teacher in the building of this nation, to the schools and the physical requirements of education itself I would therefore hope that all of us will say in no uncertain terms that, with a full recognition of the constitutional responsibilities of the provinces and the municipalities, we want the dominion government which now absorbs so much of every tax dollar to do what they can to bring the governments together to see whether there is not some way in which we can broaden the basis of education for the people of Canada.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, we have had the opportunity of debating this resolution on three previous occasions. Much credit is due the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) for the persistence which he has displayed in pressing toward a very important objective. In approaching the resolution, I should like to think in terms of an objective. The resolution is quite clear as far as I am concerned. It merely asks the government to take into consideration the advisability of expanding and equalizing educational opportunity across Canada by the granting of financial assistance to the various provinces for that purpose.

The hon. member for Saskatoon indicated clearly that across Canada from coast to coast support for the objective or the proposition is growing, and it is not support emanating merely from any one political party. It is a feeling which members of school boards are supporting. The ratepayers themselves generally are supporting it. Certainly the teachers are supporting it, as are all others who have given careful and serious consideration to the present problem which confronts us in connection with financing education.

I was rather amazed at some of the arguments advanced today by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) in an effort, I presume, to indicate to the Liberal membership in the house that they should not support the resolution at this time even though possibly the vast majority of them do in their own minds agree with it. As a matter of fact I was somewhat interested when the hon. member for Saskatoon indicated that certain persons who did not belong to his political party suggested that it might be wise to climb on the bandwagon at this time because this thing is going to happen sooner or later.

The Minister of Justice devoted considerable time last year to another resolution couched in the same language. At that time he made it perfectly clear that as far as certain truisms, as he called them, were concerned, all hon. members are in agreement. At page 616 of Hansard of March 20, 1952, he said:

> From what has been said it is clear that certain points of agreement have emerged. It is hardly necessary for example to repeat all the truisms about the great importance of education in our national life.

Well, I would concede, Mr. Speaker, that there would be no disagreement among us in this house as far as that matter is concerned. He goes on to say:

> Nor is it necessary to argue at great length that teachers' salaries in general are inadequate; for their inadequacy is clearly established by the relative economic unattractiveness of the teaching profession.

In the light of the information which was placed on Hansard on March 19 of last year by the hon. member for Saskatoon, I would doubt very much whether any hon. member would disagree with that assertion. I wonder how many hon. members gave consideration to the table which the house granted the hon. member permission to have included in Hansard. May I refer to one column, Mr. Speaker, headed "Median salaries of teachers in all schools, 1950." I know the general situation has improved somewhat since that time, as far as certain teachers are concerned, but there has not been any substantial improvement. In one province the median salary of teachers is $1,083; in another $1,341; in another $2,109; in still another $1,689; in another $1,580; in another $2,279, and the highest is $2,668. The last one I give is $966, which is the lowest. Surely, Mr. Speaker, there is not another professional group in Canada whose median salaries are anywhere near as low as those. There is no group in the country of organized labourers whose salaries are not substantially higher than those listed here; yet, Mr. Speaker, there is not a group of people in the country who are performing a more necessary or more important service for the country.

When speaking last year the Minister of Justice said at page 617 of Hansard:

> It may be stated that the general agreement in this house upon most of the principles which have been enunciated so far in this debate affords a much more satisfactory basis for examination of the facts than would be the case if we were in disagreement on those principles.

Well, that is fine. According to my way of thinking that is a statement of fact, but it is so significant that last year the Minister of Justice centred practically his entire argument upon what he called "a vital attack upon provincial autonomy." That seemed to be the keynote of the speech which he delivered on March 20 last. Well, it was a specious argument, Mr. Speaker, because there was no vital attack upon provincial autonomy at all, and it was asserted time and time again that there was no intention to interfere with provincial responsibility in the field of the administration of education.

I may also point out that last year the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) carried forward into his speech the keynote which was established by the Minister of Justice. The Minister of National Health and Welfare said in 1951, in referring to the constitutional position: "The provinces have been given exclusive jurisdiction in the field of education. National unity is predicated upon it."

I recall that in closing his speech the Minister of National Health and Welfare said that "we believe that the best way of giving every child in this country the best possible opportunity for education in accordance with her or his talent... is to do it within the terms of the constitution. We believe it is better to do it in that way than by following a suggestion which cannot be accepted"—he was very specific in that—"because it is a matter wholly within the competence of another legislative authority and alien to our own."

It was pointed out to the government last year, and it was also pointed out to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, that under section 92, subsection 7, of the British North America Act the establishment, maintenance and management of all hospitals, outside of marine hospitals, falls exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provinces. Look at what has happened in that particular field, Mr. Speaker. The federal government is making grants to the provinces. It is true they are earned grants; in other words, they are matched dollar for dollar, and there has to be general agreement as to the nature of the edifice that is to be constructed. Those grants are performing a very valuable service. They are appreciated, and they enable the provinces to provide a much higher standard of hospitalization and general health service for the people. But the point is that we cannot forget that under the British North America Act the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Liberal government could not have given one dollar in grants to the provinces to assist in hospital construction had they followed the argument used by the Minister of National Health and Welfare last year and the argument used by the Minister of Justice last year and referred to again today.

It is an established fact, the constitution to the contrary notwithstanding, that the provinces and the federal government have been able to get together, even where these fields of exclusive jurisdiction existed, to permit the federal government to make grants to the province to enable them to do certain desirable things. And it could be done just as effectively and as easily in this field as in the field of national health and welfare.

I was particularly interested in hearing what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said today about a grant that is being made for the construction of a school in Winnipeg. The minister appeared to be thrown back on his heels when that was brought to his attention. His "out" was: Well, after all, a certain amount of federal authority is bound to be exercised in connection with the construction of that school.

If the provinces and the federal authorities agree that that shall be the case so far as capital construction is concerned, then certainly the principle could very easily be carried into this general field of education. And may I assert that through grants for capital construction—call them earned grants if you will—the federal government could perform a most valuable function and be of inestimable assistance in this whole field of education by giving consideration to that very aspect of the matter.

This resolution does not tie the government down to any specific course of action. It does not bind the government to make grants for elementary education to provincial departments of education, in turn perhaps to be matched and turned over to local authorities. It does not tie the government down to that at all. Its objective could be reached, in part, through assistance in capital construction, as is the case with respect to hospitals, and with the same end result. This could be done without interference in the administration of schools, any more than today there is interference in the administration of hospitals because earned grants have been made for the construction of or for additions to hospitals.

Since the resolution does not tie the federal government down, I shall offer a suggestion we have offered on previous occasions, namely that it should remove the sales tax from vehicles used in conveying children to schools. In other words it should remove that tax from school buses. Those buses would have to be used exclusively for the purpose intended. There, however, is an example of how the federal authorities could enable the provinces to move toward that objective.

Then of course we have the question of the sales tax and import duties on many of the publications used in the schools. Surely that would be one method of contributing toward the attainment of this objective. But today the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) developed another tack when he said that any move toward making grants to the provinces to effect the objective set forth in the resolution might create a serious unbalance so far as federal-provincial financial relationships are concerned.

Throughout the entire speech by the minister one would almost be obliged to assume, if he did not know otherwise, that the existing agreements between the federal government and the provinces are satisfactory, that they meet the requirements of the provinces, and that they are fair. I deny that suggestion most vehemently. All hon. members know that during the war the provinces willingly moved out of certain tax fields in an effort to achieve victory in military conflict. They were assured that this was but a temporary arrangement. Yet when the war was over they were pressured into a continuation of those agreements. And because the federal government can go into the entire tax field it has been able to pull a squeeze play on the provinces and, in cases, compel them to enter into agreements, even though the terms of those agreements were not satisfactory.

I was interested in a discussion which took place while the Minister of Justice was speaking. He referred to a cancellation of debt in Saskatchewan to the extent of $38,500,000. Of course my mind went back to the fact that we, in my province of Alberta, had also accumulated a huge debt as a consequence of drought and depression. The farmers of my province had accumulated terrific debts; but there was no federal cancellation of them. Perhaps this was because there had been a change of government in that province. The burden was left upon the provincial government in Alberta to cancel debt to the extent of $22 million. I well recall that in the report of the Bank of Canada for 1937 it was stated that the position in my province had improved so materially that the bank would not have been justified in recommending such cancellation. That was political hogwash; we know the reason for it. However, I mention that only in passing.

Education

Under the division of constitutional authority and responsibility as it existed at the time of confederation, things may have been reasonably fair. But as the years have gone by greater and greater responsibilities have been placed upon the shoulders of provincial and municipal governments. It is my conviction that where responsibility exists there should also exist the authority to carry out that responsibility.

The minister spoke in terms of high budgets in the provinces. That is true; but I know of no province in western Canada wherein the percentage increases in grants for education have not exceeded by far the percentage increases in provincial revenue.

Even though it annoys some people, I think I may be forgiven for referring to the province from which I come. It is as natural for me to do so as it was the other evening for the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald), when he referred to Alberta instead of Manitoba. After all, he comes from Alberta, and is presumed to be more familiar with it. I know that in my own province in the fiscal year 1935-36 the gross grant for education was approximately $1,450,000, whereas in the fiscal year 1952-53 it was approximately $9,850,000, or an increase of approximately seven and one-half times the figure for the first year. Yet in that period of time provincial revenues had increased by approximately only four and one-half times the former amount.

This specious argument about taking something away from one department and giving it to another is, as someone near me suggests, rather silly. One knows that provincial governments have minimum commitments to meet in every field and that, in respect of education, it is imperative that we acquire the best possible types of roads over which so many of our children are transported when moved to and from schools. Many of these things are interlocked. There are minimum requirements below which no provincial government could go in the provision of service to its people in any specific department. Let any government anywhere in Canada undertake to slash its public works appropriations by 50 per cent in order to provide these additional millions for education, and see what would happen. Let us be realistic about this sort of thing. The federal Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will repeatedly stand up and defend his surpluses on the grounds that there is a national debt and it is necessary to make provision for it. Yet apparently the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) regards that type of argument, when applied to the provincial field, as being rather specious. To me it is nonsense to say that the same principle that applies here does not apply in the case of the provinces.

I fully realized before this debate started that those in agreement with the resolution would advance substantially the same arguments they advanced last year. I think maybe those of us who have supported the resolution have in the main been arguing in much the same way as we did last year. There is good reason for that. I think the arguments we used last year were sound, and they are still sound. They were good enough for the debate last year, and they are equally good this year. I also assumed that those opposed would submit arguments very similar to those used last year. In the main that has been the case with the exception that the emphasis has been transferred from what was indicated as a vital attack upon provincial autonomy to this question of creating a financial unbalance under the present provincial-dominion tax transfer agreements.

When I approach the subject of federal aid to education I do not like to think of any part of Canada as such at all. To me it is a problem which we should be big enough to face objectively and in relation to Canada as a whole. It is quite true that one province may not receive very much in the way of grants. It would depend entirely upon the formula which was determined. But it may be that another province, for example the one that is paying a median average salary of $966 to its teachers, would be deserving of and would obtain a substantial grant. I would not object to that at all, because after all that is the basic fundamental in the process of endeavouring to establish the highest possible degree of equality of educational opportunity.

We have also referred to one or two other matters with respect to which we have endeavoured to tie in at least a certain degree of federal responsibility. Let us take the question of immigration. Immigration policy is in the main a federal matter. I put it that way because I fully realize that it is within the competence and jurisdiction of a province to facilitate the influx of immigrants provided they are of British origin. To that extent the provinces can enter that field. However, so far as those who are not British subjects are concerned, they are the responsibility of the federal government. That matter comes within the jurisdiction of the senior government. But once these immigrants enter Canada they are absolutely free to go to any part of Canada they desire to go to in order to settle. The consequence is—and I have seen it in effect—that for some particular reason you find a heavy influx of immigrants into a particular area. Did you ever stop to realize the problem which is created in providing educational facilities for them? True, there is a lot of responsibility upon provincial governments to help to bear the burden created but, looking at it purely from the municipal point of view, in many cases it has become a burden of almost staggering proportions.

I have seen the mill rates paid by ratepayers in certain school districts in Canada, and it is an astonishing thing to me that people can continue to be home owners. In so many municipalities the item of school tax exceeds the combined total of hospital and municipal taxes. Sometimes it is almost double the levy for these other purposes. Therefore it is my contention that there is federal responsibility. Today we often hear it said that the population of Canada is bound to increase substantially, as it has already done as a result of federal immigration policies. Let me repeat that while a province has nothing to say about the number of such persons who may settle in any given area within the province, certainly there is a moral responsibility, anyway, upon the federal government to see to it that certain of the burdens created are met in part at least.

There is a second point that arises, and it certainly brings federal responsibility into sharp focus. I refer to the establishment of military installations in Canada and the bringing to local communities of the wives and families of many of the personnel serving at nearby stations. That has created a tremendous problem for some of our local municipalities. It is an unequal burden. Certainly a province can go so far in assisting to alleviate it, but I cannot see why the full responsibility should be upon the province when it has nothing to do with the location of the military installation, and more particularly because the defences of the nation are primarily a national responsibility.

A previous speaker referred to the limited field of taxation enjoyed by municipalities, and this matter is now developing into an extremely serious situation. It is my understanding that a municipality is limited to a property tax, business tax and poll tax. Many municipalities have presented figures indicating that they have just about reached the end of their rope. They must either acquire additional revenues from all senior governments or their field of authority must be extended within the municipality to enable them to acquire the finances necessary to carry out the responsibilities imposed upon them by law.

It has been said, Mr. Speaker, that the federal government has already gone into the field of education. That is true. It was interesting to hear the Minister of Justice skate around that. I realize fully that it is not too difficult to make almost any kind of argument that one may desire to make in support of or in opposition to a particular proposition. But I wondered what the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) was thinking as he sat behind the Minister of Justice and heard him advancing the arguments he put forward today. I have heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare take a stand diametrically opposed to that taken by the Minister of Justice when he was justifying federal participation in health services.

Apparently it all depends upon what you are trying to prove or disprove. I tried to analyse the expressions on the face of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I have known him for many years and have never yet been able to do so. However, when this particular argument was being developed before us today I thought I would be able to ascertain his thoughts. I think I know what they were.

You know, Mr. Speaker, speaking of going into this field of provincial government jurisdiction reminds me of certain debates I read in Hansard going back some years prior to the introduction of old age pensions, for example, and prior to the acceptance by the government of the day of any responsibility in that regard. They argued as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) argued today. But let me emphasize that in every case where the provinces and the federal government have agreed that a certain objective is desirable, where they have been able to come to an agreement as to the method of procedure in reaching that objective, they have been able to reach it. A lot of these problems are wholly imaginary, defences drawn upon to justify a certain course of action or failure to take a certain course of action.

We know, and Canada is appreciative of, what the federal government has done in the field of vocational training, for example, and what it has done by way of assistance to universities. True, those are all matters of assistance towards education. They were desirable and we supported them when they came before this house, and we will continue to support them. The very fine distinction which the minister tried to draw today between these expenditures and other expenditures for educational purposes to me just simply narrowed itself down to an argument that did not have any foundation at all.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is not very often that I finish a speech of mine by quoting a Liberal, but this particular Liberal happens to have some pretty good ideas sometimes and I think he has a better idea as far as this resolution is concerned than most other Liberals in this house. I speak of the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). I have always admired the hon. member for Spadina because it occurs to me that when he has an idea he has the courage of his convictions and is ready to express those convictions.

An hon. Member: Apple-polishing.

Mr. Shaw: I have always admired the hon. member for Spadina for many reasons, and particularly because he does not hesitate to take issue with his colleagues when he feels a certain conviction with respect to any proposition. I think it was in the debate last year that the hon. member for Spadina had this to say; I have the clipping out of Hansard but I have not the date marked on it. The resolution was exactly the same resolution that we now have before us. He said:

> The resolution before us speaks of equalizing educational opportunity. The problem, as has already been stated by members in this house, arises because our country's wealth is unequally distributed. But we must not lose sight of the fact that education is no less a concern of the poorer provinces. Inequality of educational opportunity is the result of economic inequality and not inequality of will. In my opinion federal aid to education will make it possible to raise the salaries of some of the teachers who have been notoriously underpaid for a great length of time. I have always felt that the community should look to the teacher, and the teacher should be proud of her profession. Salary increases have been neglected for a long time. On the last occasion when this subject was before us, some of the figures that were given in this house as payment to teachers for years of service were almost scandalous.

I quote that paragraph, although in my view his whole speech was worthy of being repeated in this house. I trust that he feels the same way toward this subject now as he did then. After all, I do not think that throughout his whole speech last year the hon. member for Spadina bothered his head about going into all the details the Minister of Justice goes into and taking all of these devious trails which are, I think, designed to lose us in the underbrush. He just dealt with the proposition, and it was as clear as could be.

I think we would be well advised, Mr. Speaker, since this resolution does not commit the federal government anyway, to decide upon the broad objective. Is it desirable or is it not? I think we can leave out Saskatchewan and Meadow Lake and any of these other things that one might think savour of politics. Let us decide on the objective. The government are not committed; and if they decide to go forward after all, they and the provinces will decide the method of approach.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that my colleagues and I in the Social Credit group support this resolution.

(Translation):

Mr. J. H. Rousseau (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight); in fact, if I were living in his province I would vote in favour of his resolution.

However, since I live in the province of Quebec, I say immediately that I shall vote against the resolution.

In the province of Quebec, education comes under the sole jurisdiction of provincial, municipal and school authorities, and I could even add, religious authorities. It has been so from the very beginning of the province and that system has produced marvellous results if we compare the present situation with what it was in the early days.

In our province, education comes under the department of the provincial secretary, which has authority over the Public Education Council—Conseil de l'Instruction publique—made up of the superintendent, of one member of the government, of catholic bishops and of protestant clergymen. All that to show that in the province of Quebec the rights of everyone, whatever be his nationality or religion, are protected. By the way, I must say that protestant and English-speaking minorities of the province of Quebec are treated as fairly as the majority.

Am I saying these things to draw a comparison with what may have happened in the past in certain provinces with respect to my French-Canadian compatriots? Such a conclusion may be drawn from my remarks. However, I have always thought that generosity played a great part in the conduct of the affairs of the world, and if we, from the province of Quebec, have been generous towards certain elements, it is to be hoped that the same generosity may be displayed by other provinces, where sometimes our feelings have been hurt.

As I say, comparing the situation at the very beginning of the province, in the field of education, with what it is now, we find that we have now our universities, our colleges, the various business schools, schools of navigation, and so forth, as well as our primary schools.

At the beginning, salaries were extremely low; however, the standard of education has always been high. Why? Because we have always believed that when teachers fulfil their task through sheer devotion to duty, more skill is displayed and better results are obtained than when one's salary is the only incentive.

In 1760, after the conquest, though only 60,000 French Canadians remained in the country, education was essential for this nucleus of heroes wanted to remain alive as a racial group.

Have they succeeded? I answer yes. If teaching continued in Quebec in those days, it was thanks to women of gentle birth who had remained in this country and thanks, also, to our parish priests. I spoke of people of gentle birth. It has been claimed that none remained in the province of Quebec after the conquest, but the truth is that many had remained. In every family now, there is still some noble blood. In any event these gentlewomen taught without remuneration, as well as the priests who gave children lessons in arithmetic, grammar and catechism, not to speak of loyalty. Here is an example of this.

In 1866, during the Fenian raids, when the Americans had decided to capture Canada, had the French-Canadian clergy not enjoined the faithful to remain loyal to the British crown, Canada would no more be a jewel in this crown, but we would have been absorbed by the United States of America.

These facts were reported in 1916-17 by the then premier of Quebec, as guest of the Empire Club in Toronto. It was he who revealed these facts which were later repeated in another lecture. At that time it was seen that noble blood still flowed through the veins of every Quebec family. The people in Toronto said of our premier of the time that he knew what he was talking about, that he was an authority.

It was then that this famous Bonne Entente movement came into being and it has never ceased to gain ground. I do wish to pay this tribute to the Catholic clergy, without whom, as I say, we would have been absorbed by our great neighbour to the south.

And now, having managed to stay alive as a racial group we nevertheless live in complete amity with our English-speaking compatriots. As I was saying we are now beginning to understand each other better, so much so, in fact, that our English-speaking friends are now beginning to speak our language. As far as French is concerned, the results are so extraordinary that when prominent visitors come from France to visit us, they feel themselves to be in another France when they pass through the province of Quebec. Moreover, English visitors to our country are always glad to note that, for some years past, citizens of both nationalities have been walking hand in hand.

Mr. Speaker, those are the reasons why I shall vote against the resolution moved by the hon. member for Saskatoon, even though, as I said at the beginning, I congratulate him on his good intention. But in the province of Quebec, we are intent on keeping education under the exclusive direction of the governmental, municipal, school and religious authorities. Every government that has been at the helm in our province, regardless of party affiliation, has expressed the same view, and that is why I say again that I shall vote against the hon. member's motion.

(Text):

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Speaker, will you call it six o'clock, or shall I proceed?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, the resolution that is before us, which has been moved by my deskmate the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight), is extremely simple. One is really surprised that such a simple resolution should call forth such great opposition from the government benches. All this resolution asks is that we in this house express an opinion as to whether or not the government should take into consideration the granting of financial assistance to the provinces for the purpose of expanding and equalizing educational opportunity. The resolution simply asks the house to express its opinion as to whether or not it is advisable for the government to consider the making of such financial grants to the provinces for the purpose specified.

That resolution is based on the premise that every Canadian child has a birthright. That birthright is an educational opportunity equal to that of any other child in this country. That birthright is an equal educational opportunity whether that child be English or French; whether it be protestant, catholic, jew or gentile; and regardless of race, colour, the economic status of its parents or the part of Canada in which it is born. That is the premise upon which we ask this house to consider whether or not this government should grant financial assistance to the provinces in order to enable them to give Canadian children what is their birthright.

The resolution is also based on the premise that today there exists a crisis in education. I do not need to emphasize the importance of education in the building of Canadian citizenship. Its importance, I take it for granted, is accepted by every member of this house. What we are faced with is a crisis. A conservative estimate prepared for Canadian education week shows that in 1955, two years hence, there will be a shortage of 25,000 teachers in Canada. The shortage of teachers in Canada has been increasing every year. By 1955 there will be need for another 1,000 schools to be built. Some municipalities are already finding it extremely difficult to build those schools. Classrooms are already overcrowded and the overcrowding is getting worse.

As has been pointed out by the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew) and others, some steps must be taken to meet this crisis. If we are to continue to provide educational opportunity for Canadian children we must take some steps which will enable us to staff the schools with properly qualified teachers and to provide sufficient classrooms to accommodate the pupils who are coming to our schools. There has already been pointed out in this house the difference which exists in educational opportunity as between the provinces, in so far as that equality or inequality of opportunity can be measured by the expenditures which have been made for education. In 1950 the median salary of teachers in all schools ranged, as has been pointed out, from $966 in Newfoundland to $2,668 in British Columbia. I think most of us will realize that so long as you have that difference between the salaries which are paid to teachers in different provinces, you are not going to have anything approximating equality of opportunity. You cannot secure in Newfoundland, for less than $1,000 a year, the best and brightest of the young people of that province that we require to enter the teaching profession. If the teaching profession is to attract our best young people, we must be prepared to do something in those provinces that are still paying in the vicinity of $1,000 to $1,500 for teachers.

There has been a persistent decrease in the number of teachers attending our training schools. Last year that decrease was shown in every province in Canada, and ranged from a drop of 10 per cent in Ontario to one of 37 per cent in Prince Edward Island. There was no single province in Canada that was not affected by that reduction in the number of people attending the teacher training schools.

Those are the facts that we must face. In view of the importance of education, it would seem to me we should be able to face those facts without having regard for political expediency, without having regard for politics, race or religion. It would seem to me that in this house we ought to be able to put the interests of young Canadians first in our discussion of this subject; we should be able to rise above politics, above race, above religion in discussing this question.

In that respect the speech made this afternoon by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) was very disappointing. That speech will be a disappointment to everyone interested in education in this country. It will be a disappointment to the tens of thousands of school teachers across Canada from the provinces in the east to our province on the west coast. That speech will be a disappointment to every school board across this country. It will be a disappointment to a great many national organizations which over the years have been supporting federal aid to education.

The minister's speech this afternoon was based on one premise only, namely political expediency. The minister refused to face up to the crisis that confronts us in our educational systems across this country, and to place in paramount importance the needs of the young people of Canada. He raised a number of objections. It was interesting to find the minister going back to the Rowell-Sirois report and taking therefrom arguments to be used in his stand against this resolution. It is strange indeed how the minister and the government can use this report when it suits their purpose, and completely ignore it and other reports when that suits their purpose. The minister pulled out of the Rowell-Sirois report this afternoon the objections which the authors of that report made to federal aid for education. To my knowledge it is the only time the minister has ever gone to that report for any positive direction on any policy.

I know something about that report. I had the privilege of appearing before that commission, in my capacity as chairman of the Canadian Teachers' Federation, and presenting the opinions of the Canadian teachers. We were disappointed with the point of view expressed in that report; but times have changed since then, and in any case the authors of that report recognized the validity of some of our arguments. They recognized that the demands of education have gone far beyond those which existed when the British North America Act was adopted. They also pointed out the importance of equal educational opportunities, and at page 51 they said:

> It is our hope that provision can be made for the fiscal needs of all provinces, including within those needs provision for the education of the young.

While the Rowell-Sirois report does not recommend specific grants for education, it does express the hope that the federal government will make available to the provinces such financial aid as will enable those provinces to meet the costs of education and provide equal educational opportunity within the provinces. That in reality is all that we ask in this resolution. All we ask is that the government give consideration to granting financial aid to the provinces to enable them in turn to provide equal educational opportunity to our Canadian children.

The minister placed a great deal of importance upon the fact that the federal government could not give grants to the provinces for education without at the same time exercising some control over education within the provinces. The federal government has been providing millions of dollars for education within the provinces in one way or another, and we have yet to hear in any province a single voice raised to the effect that the federal government is, by reason of those grants, interfering with provincial rights in the matter of education. The Minister of Justice was simply raising this argument because this government does not want to provide such federal assistance to the provinces; or is it, with a federal election in the offing, afraid of the political effects of any such grants?

If this government has the interest of young Canadians at heart it will consider ways and means by which it can come to the assistance of the provinces in this matter. The minister asked, where is the federal government going to get the money to pay for federal aid to education? During the war we never hesitated for a moment to find money to educate our soldiers. We had to open what amounted to public schools in some of the army camps in order to teach some of our young men to read and write so they might be able to follow the instructions which were handed out to them. We had to undertake the provision of elementary education in some of these camps. We never hesitated to train young people for work in the munition plants. When war comes we can find money for education or for any other purpose. If this government wanted to find money and allocate it to assist the provinces in providing better education for the youth of this country, they could do so.

The minister tried to tell us that the provinces are able to provide better educational opportunities if they so desire. He may be in a much better position to judge that than I am. What I do know is that in the province of Ontario the municipal taxpayers are still called upon to bear a very large share of the cost of education. What I do know is that in some of the suburban municipalities of Toronto we have found it difficult to have new houses built because those municipalities were unable to bear the extra cost that would be involved if large numbers of new homes were to be built there. Upon occasions private contractors have been required by the municipalities to include in the cost of the homes the added cost of building schools, with the understanding that this would be added to the selling price of a home, so that a purchaser would absorb not only the cost of the land, the interest on his mortgage and local improvement charges but also the cost of building schools in the municipality.

It may be that provincial governments are in a better financial position than they were. But if they are, they are not coming to the relief of municipal taxpayers to an extent that will relieve those taxpayers of this overburden, and provide equal educational opportunity for all our children.

I pointed out that much is being done now by the federal government, and that it has been done without any interference with provincial rights. But we have had to have recourse to many subterfuges to obtain that assistance. We make large contributions to education through the Department of Labour, and try to kid ourselves into believing that this is not a contribution to education. We are told that because it is made through the Department of Labour, therefore it is a contribution to labour. The Department of Veterans Affairs makes heavy contributions to education. There again we are told this is not an assistance to education but that technically it is to assist our veterans. The Department of National Defence makes contributions to education, but we kid ourselves into believing that these are not educational grants, that they do not interfere with provincial rights, that they simply help our Department of National Defence.

The Department of National Health and Welfare contributes in a number of ways to educational projects. But we camouflage that by placing these expenditures under this department, and thereby convince ourselves that we are avoiding any interference with provincial rights in the field of education. The national research council, with its scholarships for educational purposes, enters the picture. Here again we are told this is not a direct aid to education. The Department of Citizenship and Immigration is also in the picture. This department finds it is quite constitutional to assist immigrant children and adults by helping to provide schools for them. Yet the department appears to take the view that it would not be constitutional for the government to assist native-born Canadian children through regular educational channels. The Department of Trade and Commerce, particularly through the educational division of the dominion bureau of statistics, makes its contribution. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and other activities connected with the federal government, either directly or indirectly make their contributions to education.

I have here the table referred to by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) which shows that all the provinces, through the Department of Labour, have accepted federal grants for youth training in the last three years in an amount well over a million dollars. Every province in Canada has taken advantage of this. I find, for instance, that Quebec took the largest share, amounting to $350,000. Ontario accepted $180,000. The truth is that every province accepts federal moneys for youth training. Yet we are asked to believe that, in some way, this differs from federal aid to be given to a regular school system.

While these large sums can be spent for youth training, apparently without any interference with provincial rights, if one suggests the making of grants to secondary or primary academic schools, then there is the suggestion that in some mysterious way there will be some interference with provincial control of education.

We give grants to train persons for gainful employment, and the provinces appear to have no objection to accepting federal moneys for this purpose—provided, of course, that such gainful employment is not such as would be secured from an academic course of studies. We are told that if the expenditure is for academic education then, on constitutional grounds, it must be ruled out. We see that in the last three years nearly $6 million has been paid out of the federal treasury to assist vocational schools, and these sums have been accepted by all the provinces of Canada. I have not heard it suggested anywhere that the giving of this assistance for vocational education has interfered in any way with provincial rights. The suggestion is made that if the money came through the Department of Labour it could not be classified as educational aid.

Then in the last three years we have provided nearly $4 million in payments to provinces by way of capital expenditure on vocational schools. For the life of me I cannot see the difference between providing money to build vocational schools which train plumbers, automobile mechanics and the like, and making grants to schools that provide training so that one may become a lawyer, a doctor or a school teacher. These are some of the subterfuges we have to accept so that the federal government may make grants for education without, at the same time, appearing to interfere with provincial rights.

Education in Canada has suffered for a long time—as a matter of fact I suppose all through our history—because of the rivalry between race and race, religion and religion. I am told that the people of the province of Quebec do not want to accept federal aid. They fear that in some way the state will interfere with religious training in their schools. I find that in Ontario a large section of the province is afraid that if federal aid for education is extended, the Roman Catholics in Ontario or Quebec are going to benefit by such assistance. What is happening in the province of Ontario is that in order that the province may take advantage of federal grants for vocational schools at the secondary school level, the standards and requirements have been lowered for entrance to such secondary schools. Thus each year thousands of pupils are entering the secondary schools who can thereby be assisted by the federal grants that are made at the secondary school level —I am referring to vocational schools— whereas if they were kept back in the grades below grade 9 they would not be assisted at all by federal grants.

Is it not time in this country that we should consider the question of educational opportunity on its own merits? Surely it is just as important to a French-speaking Roman Catholic child living in Quebec to have a good education as it is to an English-speaking Protestant child living in Ontario. Surely we are able to forget our political differences in this house on the question of education. Surely we are able to forget our language and religious differences and unite to give to every Canadian child what is his birthright, the best educational opportunity that Canada —not Ontario, not Quebec, not Newfoundland—can provide.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, this is a most interesting and important subject, and I feel that the time is fast approaching when we will have to do something about it besides just talk. The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) has brought this subject to our attention on a number of occasions, and each time it has been talked out. This afternoon the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) presented arguments which I assume he considered were strong enough to persuade the house not to pass the resolution now before us. He pointed out particularly, as we all know, that education is something which, under the British North America Act, belongs to the provinces. I believe he quoted section 93 which says in part:

In and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education—

I am sure we all agree with that. That is as it should be. From reading our history books we know that if such an arrangement had not been made at the time of confederation by the fathers of confederation, it is very doubtful whether we would have the country that is Canada today. I know every hon. member here gives wholehearted support to the principle laid down at that time, and that no hon. member would wish to see it changed. However, I believe we can still support the resolution without feeling that it detracts in the slightest from the spirit or the letter of the British North America Act.

Hon. members who have spoken have pointed out that Canada is one country, and although we have ten different educational systems we all agree that equal opportunity should be given to each and every young Canadian. In the days of confederation education was not such a must as it is today. We remember that in the early days education was more or less looked upon as a sort of luxury for only the rich people, or for some of our professional people. It was felt that the majority of our citizens could very well get along without any advanced or even elementary education. As we progressed, elementary education in our schools took on the concept that there were three subjects which it was necessary for every child to know, reading, writing and arithmetic. I think this still should be the basis of our education in Canada today.

In addition, however, we all know that in the last twenty-five or thirty years we have advanced along technical lines. Today a boy or girl in a chosen walk of life must have a technical education. The farmer today must know far more than he knew a few years ago. The man who works in the forests, the mines or anywhere else must have a far better education today than twenty-five, thirty or forty years ago.

This leads me to mention costs. If we are to have better education it means greater cost to the people, the provinces and the municipalities, and that has been the case. In the early days only a very small portion of our taxes went for education. Today education is the biggest problem with which provinces and municipalities have to deal. It has become such a problem in my own province of New Brunswick and its municipalities that it is practically impossible for the people to bear the burden that has been placed upon them.

Mention was made this afternoon of the training of teachers and the great scarcity of teachers in Canada today. Someone said there is a shortage of 2,500 teachers in our schools. We also have this problem in New Brunswick, and today in many schools we are using locally licensed teachers who are very poorly trained. We also are using married women who, I may say, deserve great credit for having responded to the call and given up their work in their homes to go out and help with our education.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that if this resolution passed and consideration were given by the federal government to the matter of education it would be of more benefit to some provinces than to others, particularly those which are known as the poorer provinces of Canada. I also feel, speaking for the maritime provinces if I may, that we have a special claim for more aid than the rest of Canada, aid from the federal treasury in the matter of education. It is a well-known fact that thousands of our young people who have attended our schools and universities have had to leave our province and go to other parts of Canada to make a living. We have no estimate of the cost of the loss of those young people to our part of the country but there is no question in my mind, Mr. Speaker, that it has cost the maritime provinces millions of dollars in the past to educate young men and young women who have gone to Ontario, Quebec and western Canada. As I say, I think for that reason we have a special claim against the rest of Canada in that regard.

I will just quote the resolution, Mr. Speaker:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of expanding and equalizing educational opportunity across Canada by the granting of financial assistance to the various provinces for that purpose.

I contend that the words "expanding and equalizing educational opportunity across Canada" presuppose that education in certain provinces is not as good as it is in others, and that educational opportunities in certain provinces are not as good as they are in other provinces. There is no doubt in my mind that some of the richer provinces of Canada could and should help themselves. There is no reason why the federal government should give much help to the rich province of Ontario or to the proportionately still richer province of Alberta; but there is every reason in the world why provinces like Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Newfoundland should receive special attention in this regard.

I would also like to point out in this connection, Mr. Speaker, that I feel we in the east have another strong argument for more assistance in the matter of education. It will be remembered that since confederation the three maritime provinces have not been able to extend their boundaries. In 1867 when the act of confederation, the British North America Act, was passed there were great lands known as the public domain of this country which belonged, as we thought, to every province in Canada. Since confederation the boundaries of Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and the new provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and even British Columbia, have been extended away to the north. We all know the great and almost unlimited wealth that has flowed to those provinces as a result of this extension of their boundaries. I claim that is a second reason why we in the east, circumscribed as we are, who have contributed so much to the progress and development of this country, deserve special consideration in this regard.

I would also like to point out that in my opinion the federal government has a special responsibility and obligation in connection with education. The federal parliament is responsible for the defence of this country. We know that during the last war when they were seeking recruits for the armed forces, many of the young men in Canada were turned down because they did not have sufficient education. If the government of Canada is going to call on its young men to operate tanks, airplanes and any of the other technical equipment used in war today they should also be responsible in the same way for seeing that these young men are qualified from an educational standpoint. There is also the question of federal civil servants, many thousands of whom are recruited from different parts of Canada. The federal government requires quite exacting standards of education of its civil servants and, if all parts of Canada are to be equally represented in the civil service of this country, they must all have equal opportunity of providing themselves with that education.

I spoke a moment ago about the poorer provinces. There is no question in my mind that the time must come, and must come soon, when these provinces which are so heavily taxed at the present time will have to receive further assistance in order to carry on their different services. I might say that my own province of New Brunswick is the most heavily taxed province in Canada today. If you look at the statistics for 1950 you will find that the per capita debt of Quebec was only $92.24. The province of New Brunswick had a per capita debt of $286.62. Anyone can see the great disparity between those provinces in the matter of per capita debt. I could go on and quote figures for the other provinces to show that disparities exist between them.

There is also a comparison of debt charge to revenue in the different provinces. The figure for Alberta, for instance, was 6·6 per cent, and that was the lowest in Canada. The New Brunswick figure is 23·8 per cent, one of the highest in Canada. This great discrepancy is one of the reasons it is difficult for some of the provinces to bear the burden which they are trying to bear.

I said a moment ago, and I think I can repeat, that a rich province should not receive aid. The minister this afternoon mentioned something about an item of $5 per head of population, or some amount of that kind. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that money should be distributed in that manner. It should be distributed, if an act is put through this federal house, according to the needs of the different provinces. If one province needed $1 per head, that is the amount that should be paid to it. If some other province needs $5 that is what they should receive.

I might say that while we are having so much difficulty raising money to look after the schools in our province, I do not think our schools have been neglected. I know that in previous debates in this house the maritime provinces have been held up as a horrible example. Well, anyone who is acquainted with the educational history of this country knows that in years past we have made as good provision, if not better, for the education of our young as any other province in Canada. I might say that in recent years in the province of New Brunswick we have built many fine schools. There are no better schools in Canada than you will find in our province. We have also increased the salaries of our teachers, and today I think the minimum salary of a teacher in our province is $1,200 a year. I forget what the average salary is. We have also improved the equipment in our schools. But in order to keep up the schools in the province it has been necessary to neglect some of our other services. For instance, our roads or some other public services of that kind have had to be neglected.

I do not believe it is necessary for me to labour this point, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) has pointed out that there are many precedents for assistance from the federal government to the provincial government. He spoke about the vocational school assistance, as well as the assistance for veterans and the money which is now being paid to the universities of our country as a result of the Massey report. To my mind this is indeed a responsibility which the federal government must assume within a short time. Again I say I do not believe there is any necessity at all for the federal government to interfere with the rights of the provinces in so far as schools are concerned. As a matter of fact the provinces would not stand for such a thing.

If we are to have well educated people in Canada, if we are going to give the boys and girls in Canada the education to which they are entitled, then the provinces must have the money to provide this education. How it is to be done I do not think poses any great problem of statesmanship. Surely in this House of Commons, in the government of this country, the means can be found. I am sure that if it is the will of this house, a way certainly can be found.

(Translation):

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, the motion we are now debating surely has one good point, that is to bring the attention of members of the house to the important matter of education.

I understand that the majority of the previous speakers stressed particularly the dangers that may arise from the constitutional point of view. I have no intention of lengthening the debate on that aspect of the matter, although I may say a few words about it towards the end of my remarks.

I would like to digress for a moment and say something about the danger facing education as well as the way in which we seem to shrink away from our responsibilities towards the young people it is our duty to educate.

I have here an item published in the Toronto Star, giving the results of a survey made in the United States regarding for instance the religious guidance given our youth. The man who made the survey found that 20 per cent of our young people are well educated, especially in the United States, while 20 per cent only are recognized as having religious principles.

This survey shows that, far from being radical, the young people seemed little concerned about giving their own opinion; they are especially, to a certain degree, and in the broader sense of the word, conservative with respect to the principles on which they could base their answers to the questions that were asked. According to the report, less than 20 per cent of those who were questioned, that is, 1,935, whose ages range from 18 to 29, answered that they found little guidance in religion in deciding either how to live, or what political principles to adopt, for instance, with regard to relations between races. This survey showed also that there is nothing to prove that those who believe in God will show more tolerance towards other races than those who have no religious principles, that is the agnostics; as a matter of fact, the latter are more inclined to think that all races should be considered equal. That certainly is not the Roman Catholic theory; we hold that the human being is a noble being, that every man is holy, be he white or black.

As far as opinions about sex are concerned it would seem that our young people tend to seek a better understanding of these matters. About one-third of those interviewed believe that there should be no hushing up of theories about sex. According to them this is neither necessary nor desirable.

I am still on the subject of education, Mr. Speaker. Here are some statistics because I do wish the house to understand that we have enormous responsibilities towards our young people, especially as concerns the guidance our teachers must give them. Our teachers must instruct our young people, they must take charge of them when our boys and girls leave home to go to school or college.

With regard to politics—still according to the inquiry—the more the young men get away from religion, the less they consider that the Democratic and Republican principles are adequate to meet the nation's needs. Of course, if on account of some shortcoming in our educational system, our professors do not attach enough importance to the advice they give to young people in regard to various forms of governments that may exist in the world, for instance in regard to social security, government controls or state paternalism, it is imperative that the competent authorities guide our professors in these particular fields, so that they may acquire a more detailed knowledge of the various kinds of governments and political theories, in order that they may be in a better position to show our young people how to be better able to judge the good or bad influence they may derive from certain political theories.

There are many who believe, for instance, that there is an enormous difference between the philosophy of nazism and the communist philosophy. I shall quote Marx and Hitler to prove that the difference exists rather as to details, but not as to principles.

According to Marx, the democratic concept of man is false because it is Christian. Democracy claims that each man is a sovereign being. That is the dream and illusion of Christianity.

As for Hitler, he says: to the Christian doctrine claiming that each man has an immortal soul, I oppose with perfect clarity the redeeming doctrine of the nullity and insignificance of the human being.

I said a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, that our education must absolutely be directed in such a way that our young men and women may have a more detailed knowledge of the different economic and philosophic systems, in order that they may profit from the benefits that our democratic institutions may provide them. It results therefrom that, in addition to the social science studies contained in our programs, some particular stress should be put on the study of social security, not only from a material point of view, but also from the intellectual, spiritual and moral angles. Indeed, these courses should only be taken after sound primary studies, during which priority must be given to spiritual and moral values.

To prove the point I have just made, that education should be as sound as possible, but chiefly to give a spiritual and moral trend to our education, I shall quote from a speech made by Dr. Jean Spekkens, a professor of French at the University of Ottawa, about the 20th of March, 1952, I believe, before the members of the Richelieu club of Ottawa. Dr. Spekkens, a Dutchman who came to Canada not quite six months ago in order to teach French at the University of Ottawa, said: "The danger resulting from the too rapid growth of industry is that the student is taught too much practical knowledge, while not enough interest is taken in his intellect."

Dr. Spekkens sums up his remarks by saying that, on the whole, the teachings and advice given to students should lean towards the elimination of materialism and the raising of intellectual standards.

Consequently, even if we have to consider the constitutional aspects of our educational problem, one must consider also the result which it may bring forth in the minds of our youth, so that when these young people succeed us in the management not only of public affairs, but particularly of social security, they may be in a position to give that general leadership which can make a people good and strong and lead it towards a philosophic and moral system consistent with our institutions as we see them today.

It is my understanding that a member from the province of Quebec, speaking on this subject of education tonight, is bound to at least express his opinion on the motion now under consideration, which I shall read once more:

—the government should take into consideration the advisability of expanding and equalizing educational opportunity across Canada by the granting of financial assistance to the various provinces for that purpose.

If I am not mistaken, the general idea is that the provinces and the municipalities of the country need more money in order to devote greater amounts to education. Evidently, I am not in a position to know how critical the situation of the other provinces is: I am conversant only with the situation in my own province. My province benefits from the existence of a fund for education, a fund which is well-filled through the collecting of taxes which are supposed to be applied to education.

Under our federal system, the provinces are supposed to enjoy full autonomy in the important field of education. I think, and I suppose the majority of the members of this house share my view, that to act otherwise would be to sow seeds of discord among the population of our country and to endanger our nation itself.

The rights of the provinces are supreme in the field of education. The citizens of Canada ask but one thing, that the provincial authorities make an intelligent use of their rights and of their autonomy and that they keep politics out of that vital matter.

The word "education" should never be used to hide political motives. The money collected for education should never be used for any other government program, even though provincial authorities deem advisable to use the money for highway projects, as happened in the past. Should there be a surplus in the fund earmarked for education, let us give it to universities who need the money badly. I would like to quote an item from Le Devoir reproduced in Le Soleil of December 31, 1952. You will see what Le Devoir, which is an independent paper or, at least, is considered as such by the majority of the readers and of the people, has to say about the federal grants which were made last year and offered again this year to universities of the provinces. In quoting Le Devoir I do not believe that I am quoting a paper which gives its undivided support to the federal government.

To refuse such necessary assistance—

That is the grants which the federal government wants to give universities.

—would prejudice the very principle which we are seeking to uphold, i.e., autonomy in the field of education. If our universities were richly endowed —or if they had enough money to live instead of merely existing—the problem of federal aid might never have been raised. It is only after surveying the financial situation of the universities that the Massey commission asserted its conviction that the problem is one for the whole nation to consider. Had the universities not been so hungry, they undoubtedly would not have accepted, through sheer greediness, the gift offered by Ottawa. They would have repeated, "Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes". Because one may be justified to steal to save one's life so our universities accepted the money which they needed. To solve the financial problem of the universities would be to safeguard autonomy against coercion. By allowing it to subsist we might ward off centralization for a time but we make it inevitable, because poverty is a bad counsellor.

The same paper, speaking of the question of pupils and teachers, said this—and I am again quoting the August 21 issue of Le Soleil:

If the provincial state does not wish to see the colleges take federal subsidies, it must immediately revise its system of grants and adapt it to changing times. Colleges, like everybody else, need money; whether they be in charge of the laity or the clergy. The state will soon have to help them out to a far greater degree that it does now.

Education

The Sherbrooke Tribune speaks in the same vein of rural schools. There is much talk nowadays of the pressing need of municipalities for provincial or federal grants in aid of education. The Tribune then says this:

Rural schools, like large urban institutions, will soon be reopened. It so happens though that, in a large number of places, there is a shortage of teachers. This shortage would certainly not exist if, in certain rural districts, there was not such an attempt to scrimp and save on the remuneration of those who, by taste as well as by special training, formerly looked to a teaching career.

The Three Rivers Nouvelliste, which is read by a great many members, wrote:

Many who remained faithful to the career (the teaching profession) are only too willing to desert it for better paid employment. Teaching is often in the English provinces only a stepping stone. Thousands of examples could be mentioned. The situation is not quite so critical in the province of Quebec. That is due mostly to the contribution of the teaching orders. But even the teaching orders admit that they have not enough members to comply with all the requests which are made to them.

Therefore, there are two things to remember: our educational institutions—our universities, our colleges and our rural schools—need much more money to increase their contribution to education. Besides, if the federal government cannot, as they did last year, extend grants to universities; if the universities cannot, for reasons that I do not wish to discuss here, accept federal grants, then let it be said, as Le Devoir has done. If our purpose is to preserve autonomy by opposing all federal grants to universities, then let the provinces themselves consider larger financial help to the universities. Our provincial educational fund is quite large and, if and when a surplus exists, we could offer more to universities which thus would no longer be obliged to accept federal money.

Clearly, as a representative of the province of Quebec and as an out-and-out autonomist, I cannot vote in favour of this resolution, whereby we are asked "to equalize educational opportunity across Canada by the granting of financial assistance to the various provinces for that purpose."

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, I believe in autonomy. My acts are in accordance with my words when I think of the autonomy of my province in the field of education, and if there is an autonomy which is to be respected, it is that one; if we want education to receive the grants it needs, let us be serious, so that the autonomy granted the provinces under our constitution may be well used, well felt; it should be considered and observed not through the glasses of politicians, but through those of citizens who really believe in provincial autonomy.

We sometimes have some trouble; my French-speaking and Catholic compatriots sometimes have educational difficulties because of the provisions of our constitution. Tonight I shall not discuss the merits or demerits of certain claims made by my compatriots. The fact remains that they are in a difficult situation in certain districts as far as the teaching of French is concerned. That should not exist in a country like Canada. I believe it a fundamental principle that the taxpayer should have the right to enjoy whatever services are derived from the taxes he pays. Therefore, such a clause should be included in any declaration of human rights. We should also be determined to respect it and have it respected.

What purpose would there be in having a declaration of human rights, unless it embodies that fundamental principle, unless we are determined to enforce that fundamental right of the taxpayer to benefit from grants made by various governments. Such a situation should not be because the taxpayer has a right to his share. The province of Quebec gives a striking example of the fullest understanding of what should be an educational system in a province where there are rather marked ethnological differences.

A few years ago I quoted a statement from the secretary of the Protestant Board of Education of the province of Quebec, Mr. W. T. Percival, director of the Protestant schools in that province. He is reported by the Ensign as having said, on May 20, 1950, that education, in the province of Quebec, is just like a fairy tale. He was referring to the tolerance between Protestants and Catholics. He said that the development of Protestant schools in the province of Quebec could very well be likened to a fairy tale. Why is that so, Mr. Speaker? Because we respect the rights of minorities in the field of education and teaching. Therefore in a country such as ours our French-speaking citizens should really not have to press any claims with regard to their right to receive instruction in their own language and also to receive their part of grants in aid of education, whether their children go to public or denominational schools.

Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that, when we have any claims to press, or when we are in some trouble, some of our compatriots give up. I do not really know what to think about all this, and I will pass no judgment. It is sad to hear them, sometimes, not only in the field of education, but also when we meet with certain difficulties from a financial or constitutional point of view.

The other day we heard a lecture given by one of my compatriots who said: Must the province of Quebec leave confederation? I do not think that the province of Quebec must leave confederation; that would be the end of Canada and of confederation.

I do not wish to speak too much or elaborate too much on this lapse on the part of one of our public men.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we have here a striking example. When an army commander sees his army engaged in battle, no matter how serious the battle, no matter how numerous his enemies are, if he is courageous, he does not leave the battlefield, he does not ask his soldiers to leave the battlefield; on the contrary, he goes on fighting and, like Henry IV, he says: "Follow the plume of my helmet, it will always lead you to victory". This commander tells them not to leave the battlefield, but to go on fighting in order to achieve victory and "pour emporter le morceau" as we say in French.

The province of Quebec has been part of confederation since 1867. It has always played a leading role and it continues to do so. I would not like it to be said in any quarter that the French Canadians are quitters, that the moment they meet with difficulties they are prone to say: We are going to secede from confederation.

Mr. Speaker, since 1867 this question of autonomy has always been discussed, and the province of Quebec has done so in the most objective way possible. We are still alive, we have kept our institutions, we speak, sing, discuss politics in French, and we speak English as well as French. We are still free. Since 1867, this question of autonomy has come up regularly.

Mr. Speaker, before speaking of autonomy we should begin by making good use of it. We should first know what it means. Tonight we are speaking of education, a matter that is closely connected with autonomy and in regard to which autonomists are always ready to uphold their rights.

Therefore, I cannot vote in favour of the motion, because I believe we should wait and see how the provinces will act, whether they will decide to accept federal grants to their universities, their colleges—grants to the educational fund as we say in my province. Let the provinces speak. It is not up to us to tell the provinces they should accept this or that arrangement. It is not up to us to tell them that we, in this house, have adopted a motion which would request the government to distribute to our schools grants for educational purposes and see that these were properly apportioned. Consequently I am opposed to it. If there is one thing the people from the province of Quebec for the most part have no wish of doing it is to show signs of weakness by wanting to go their own way. If we have discussed the question, a thorny one admittedly, it is only because I and most of my compatriots do not fear to go forward. No, the province of Quebec entertains no thought of slacking. That is not her style, as she has always shown.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this motion will at least have one good effect. It will have enabled us to speak our minds clearly, fully, with no political reservations, to discuss objectively and ask our leaders in the province of Quebec to keep up the struggle from the point of view of autonomy, but on a higher plane. That is what this motion has allowed us to say in this house.

(Text):

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak briefly on the resolution before us at this time, which envisages aid by the federal government to the provinces and therefore presumably would include aid in respect of education at all levels, from the secondary schools up to and including universities.

Although I could not follow the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) as well as I should have liked, I know he did cover educational problems at various levels, including those of the universities in his own province.

This afternoon the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) suggested that, in so far as the burden of education in respect of high schools and secondary schools is concerned, the cost must fall upon the municipalities and provinces, and that within the framework of the tax agreements the provinces will have to find the money with which to finance the necessary educational projects. In that connection I was struck by what is contained in the daily bulletin of the dominion bureau of statistics which, I have no doubt, was received by all hon. members this morning. Glancing over it, I saw on the first page this amazing statement, that the secondary school enrolment in Canada, exclusive of Quebec, is expected to double in the course of the next twelve years. In 1951 the number of students in the secondary schools of the nine provinces was 296,900. Last year it was 298,000. In 1953 it is expected to be from 305,000 to 313,000, and in 1964 somewhere between 569,000 and 611,000.

If the bureau is correct in its estimate, and it usually is, we will see within the next few years a doubling of the school population in this country at the secondary school level. I think every hon. member will admit that today municipalities and provinces are finding it most difficult to finance their present burdens. If the school population is to be doubled, how can they finance with the revenues now available to them?

I suggest that these figures in themselves show the absolute necessity for a reconsideration of this whole problem, and for intervention by the federal government to assist the provinces. I am not reiterating what was said today by my leader and others when I say that what I suggest would in no way impinge upon provincial autonomy. What is the use of provincial autonomy if the schools are so crowded, as they will be within the next few years, that they cannot provide the facilities with which to educate our children?

This is a time for vision, imagination and courage. Due to war conditions, increased marriages, heavy employment, and immigration policies, we are finding a tremendous increase in our population. Some means must be provided whereby this increased population can be served, and I suggest this resolution is one step in that direction.

I know that in my own province today teachers are not paid on the scale on which they should be paid, or a scale sufficient to attract the necessary number of men and women to that profession. Each one of them could earn more money in some other field. How can we have a strong and virile educational system when our school teachers do not earn as much money as mechanics or tradesmen who, entitled as they may be to a proper wage, do not have to spend the time required by teachers in acquiring professional knowledge, nor do they have to carry the same responsibilities. We must always keep in mind that we place the training of our youth upon the shoulders of our teachers. These are the statements we make so often and, while I do not wish to repeat old clichés, I do say it is time we did something more than repeat these statements. It is high time we did something to improve the situation.

In my province we pioneered in establishing the first free schools in this country. We blazed the trail in matters of education, and in many ways we are still doing it. I know one hon. member who now serves in this House of Commons who knows intimately the problems with which we in Nova Scotia are confronted. I say without hesitation that that problem cannot be solved unless we receive federal assistance at some level such as that proposed in the resolution.

I have already made reference to the grants to universities, and the basis of distribution of those grants. In that connection I should like to refer to an editorial which appeared the other day in the Halifax Herald. I do not propose to quote it at length but, inasmuch as other newspaper reports have been placed on the record to set out the educational problem, perhaps I might be permitted to quote briefly from this editorial. It says, in part:

> As the days pass without a sign from the federal authorities, the anxiety of Nova Scotians over the distribution of federal aid for higher education naturally deepens. The fear is that, unless the authorities recognize the disparity which has existed and adopt a fairer system of distribution, our universities will have to operate for still another year with less assistance than those in other provinces.

And then it says:

> Nova Scotian universities have not asked for special consideration, but merely for parity, for fair play.

Our universities are not subsidized by the state, but depend upon private support. In a relatively low-income area support should be forthcoming from the state, and those grants should be on a basis of a strict payment per student, rather than on a basis of 50 cents per head of population, as now obtains.

I dealt with this matter at some length on an earlier occasion and shall not go into it in detail now, more than to say that I hope when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) introduces his budget he will announce that a new system has been inaugurated whereby grants will be paid per head, per student, rather than on the basis of a certain amount per head of population as it is now. The method I suggest is the one that was followed by the government in financing the education of our veterans. I am sure it takes pride in its record in that regard, and I am sure, too, that the universities and students concerned found that it was a most satisfactory procedure.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nowlan: My hon. friend says "hear, hear". I hope he will say that to the government, and see to it that it changes the basis upon which it is now operating, so that it may give aid to students in the manner I have indicated. Certainly if that is not done, then the least that must be done is to change the provincial basis under which we now operate and with which I dealt a little while ago. The universities just cannot carry on today with the moneys that are available to them, nor can students go to university. I have figures here taken quickly from the Massey report which show the situation so far as students are concerned in both secondary schools and universities. That report, as many of us will remember, stated that out of every 100 students entering common school only 22 finish high school and only three graduate from college. The report goes on to say that of those who dropped out, 54 per cent did so for economic reasons. In other words these students could not afford to finish high school and go on to college. That is a situation to which attention should be paid.

When you look at another table in the Massey report you find that so far as colleges are concerned—I only have the figures which the report uses, from 1943 to 1949; I have not gone beyond that—the income of universities derived from students increased from 34·3 per cent to 48 per cent, and it was still increasing. You find that the income derived from endowment had fallen from 15·9 per cent to 8 per cent, and that the income from provincial governments by way of grants had fallen from 40·5 per cent to 32 per cent. Yet at the same time the amount the universities were paying out per student had decreased from $515 in 1943 to $433 in 1949. Despite the depreciated value of the dollar and the lost purchasing power, the actual dollars spent by universities per student had fallen from $515 to $433. So you have the amazing situation that the students were paying more, that their actual proportion had increased from 34·3 per cent to 48 per cent, yet they were receiving substantially less. The reason for that of course is that the universities just could not get the money elsewhere. They have been raising fees and raising fees until students can scarcely pay them.

That brings into focus one particular matter which I should like to mention, the reference in the Massey report to scholarships for students. That is one way the government can aid the educational system at the moment. We will remember that the Massey report urges the government to inaugurate a system of national scholarships whereby worthy students can receive aid and go on to university. If that happened it would reduce the load of the universities because their plant and equipment are there, and the more students they get the easier it is for them to operate. Such scholarships would go a long way toward solving, at least on a university level, the problem to which the resolution refers. It is a direct recommendation of that report, Mr. Speaker.

This is a matter which demands immediate attention. When you scan the figures I have given showing increased costs you realize how difficult it is for students to continue with their education today. As we are entering educational week and the attention of the nation is focused on that, I would suggest and urge that the government carry out that recommendation and announce this spring a system of national scholarships for students throughout the nation.

Mr. J. H. Harrison (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, earlier in the day I was informed while in my office that some reference was made to me by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight).

Mr. Gibson: Don't pay any attention.

Mr. Harrison: At the time I was attending to certain matters of importance to some of my constituents, but I came down to the house to see what the—

Mr. Laing: Fuss.

Mr. Harrison: —trouble was all about. I was not able then to read a transcript of the hon. member's speech, and by the time I entered the house he had passed the point in his remarks where he was alluding to me. I was not able to see a transcript until after supper. However, I have now given it a cursory examination and I think it requires an answer. I think he found it to be somewhat a matter of mirth that I did not take his motion exactly at its face value, and that I had perhaps suggested in other places that there might be some political intent in addition to the very fine spirit conveyed by the wording of the actual resolution.

I am in complete agreement with the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) when he says that at some future time this very desirable resolution will likely be implemented, or that something will be done along this line. However, I have searched in vain in the remarks of the hon. member for Saskatoon and other members of his party for a solution to the problem and a way of making this most desirable motion effective. The only thing I have heard from any of these hon. gentlemen is that we should pass on some money from the federal treasury to the provincial governments and that they should be allowed to spend it without any supervision whatsoever.

I take issue with that, and I have certain reasons why I think it should be taken issue with. The principle of taxation without responsibility is not a very good one. The idea of asking the federal government to tax the people of the country and hand the money on to somebody else without any supervision of the spending is not a good thing whether the money is for education or something else.

It has been suggested that we follow such a procedure in other cases, and that is quite correct. So far as health is concerned we hand money over without supervision, but education is something a little bit different. Education, particularly in the province of Quebec and in other parts of Canada as well, is very closely allied to religion. In fact I defy anybody to draw a distinct line between the two. In order to bring this matter to your attention a little more strongly, I should like to refer to an incident that occurred in my riding. I am trying to show why we cannot give money willy-nilly to the provinces. In my riding last year we had a teacher who was employed by the larger school unit as an extra teacher. He went around and filled in where teachers were absent from work for one reason or another. I was told by the parent of some children whom he went to teach one day, together with other children, in the town of Glenbush, that in the course of his remarks he told them there was no God, that they were wasting their time going to church, and that they could spend it much better in some other ways. Protests were made by the parents of these children, but apparently they were disregarded.

The point I wish to make is that if the federal government is going to tax the people of this country in order to be able to hand money over to a province which cares not whether that type of thing is taught to children in our schools, then I think the people who are paying federal taxes will rise up in arms before they will allow a thing of that kind.

The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) said he found some enjoyment in the fact that I had mentioned that I thought there was some political intent. Possibly we have not his developed sense of humour, but I gather that there was not any great applause or show of humour in this house at that remark. I would suggest that possibly the C.C.F. party is amenable to that idea, that that kind of thing should be taught in the schools. If they can show me otherwise; if they can show me any possible way this very desirable motion can be put into effect, I will be very pleased to support it; but I cannot support the idea that we pass money along to any province without some safeguards. I think the object lesson I have just quoted is a good case in point to show why we should not.

I might also add, concerning the particular remarks I mentioned, that the parent told me that the gentleman mentioned made a mockery of religion and a mockery of church with these children. The parent said his children were quite put out about it and so was he; and I do not blame him in the least.

With respect to the other allegation the hon. member for Saskatoon put on record this afternoon, I think perhaps I can find some further support. Certainly I am not the only person who thinks there might be some political intent. Just recently we have had some outbursts from the premier of Quebec, a gentleman who might have considerable to say before any changes are made in our educational set-up. Mr. Duplessis says:

> Education has guaranteed survival of Quebec's religion and language traditions and could never be surrendered.

That is fairly emphatic. Another headline reads:

> Duplessis says "Encroachments" question of "Life and Death".

Well, I think he has his eye on the motion of the hon. member when he says that; and I just wonder whether the hon. member for Saskatoon does not himself subscribe to the idea proposed by the school teacher in Glenbush. Some weight might be lent to the suggestion that he does, because I have here a report from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix which says that the hon. member for Saskatoon went to the town of Meadow Lake and asked the people there to support that gentleman in the forthcoming election and elect him to this house. That would lend some support to the idea that possibly the hon. member for Saskatoon supports that gentleman's ideas. He at least supports him, although the latter is an avowed atheist. He picks this gentleman, or his convention does, and he immediately supports him and tells the people of Meadow Lake that he is the man they should send to this house.

Mr. Knight: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Harrison: You may ask it.

Mr. Knight: First of all, has my hon. friend any evidence that this particular occurrence took place in the school, or is it merely gossip or hearsay? Secondly, has he any evidence to show that I have any acquaintance with the gentleman who was nominated and any acquaintance with his religious or other opinions?

Mr. Harrison: I have no evidence that the hon. member knows what his religious beliefs are, but I have evidence here to show that the hon. member went to Meadow Lake to support the gentleman; and having been very closely allied—

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege, the hon. gentleman is basing his whole case on hearsay. In the first place he says that some gentleman was nominated—

An hon. Member: That is not privilege.

Mr. Knight: —at Meadow Lake. According to hearsay he told children somewhere that there was no God, or he made some other irreligious statement.

An hon. Member: What is the question?

Mr. Knight: My hon. friend presumes I knew of that, and he said that in spite of it I supported the gentleman. My only contact with him was because there was a convention there and I went to make the main speech in the evening after the people of Meadow Lake, constituents of my hon. friend, nominated their candidate. I have no idea of his religious views, any more than I have about the religious opinions of my hon. friend.

An hon. Member: Tell them what you said about the maritimes.

Mr. Knight: I could tell you lots of hearsay and gossip but I would not think of doing so. I would not stoop to it.

Mr. Harrison: The hon. gentleman wanted to know the name of the gentleman who was nominated. If he does not know who was nominated there, he should.

Mr. Knight: I don't want the name, I want evidence.

Mr. Harrison: I want to make this speech now, and you can make yours tomorrow.

Mr. Knowles: It is not a speech, it is just gossip.

Mr. Riley: Tell us what he said about the maritimes.

Mr. Harrison: I want to explain again some of the humour of the member for Saskatoon. Here is an idea of it from a headline in the Saskatoon Star-Phœnix:

> Knight says maritimes fear-ridden.
> Residents of the maritime provinces do not enjoy the right of free speech, according to R. R. Knight, C.C.F. member for parliament for Saskatoon.
> Speaking at a public meeting of the Saskatchewan branch of the C.C.F.—
>
> "I think in Saskatchewan today we are the freest people on the North American continent," declared Mr. Knight. "When I think of the state of political fear in which many people in eastern Canada live, I am thankful that I live in the west."

Mr. Riley: We are thankful he lives there too.

Mr. Harrison: It goes on:

> —on many occasions—people would like to go to the C.C.F. meetings but the night is not dark enough—

Mr. Riley: The night is not dark enough for us to listen to him.

Mr. Harrison: That is some of the hon. gentleman's humour.

To deal somewhat one-sidedly with another matter with which he dealt—and it cannot be otherwise because he was a spectator on the sidelines—I will refer to a letter that was sent to me last year by the Saskatchewan school trustees association. I will also mention the very fine deal the hon. member said the Meadow Lake riding was getting in the way of educational grants from the provincial government. I think the hon. member for Saskatoon said we were getting 72 per cent of our educational cost from the provincial government. If those figures are correct there is some reason to question why the people of the town of Meadow Lake are called upon to pay 42 mills for educational purposes, while in the surrounding area they pay 38 mills on agricultural lands. Those are correct figures because I got them from a member of the larger unit board.

However, to put the record straight I will deal with the letter which the hon. gentleman quoted this afternoon. He said that 20 members of parliament had been sent this letter, and when I said I was waiting for my copy he could not understand it. The Saskatchewan school trustees association could not understand it either, and they know a lot more about it than the hon. member. I know a lot more about it, too, and I am the only one in possession of all the facts because the letter finally reached me and I know how it came here. The letter that he put on Hansard was dated March 25 at Regina. Oddly enough it reached here on March 24, a day ahead of the day it was written.

Mr. Gibson: An advance copy.

Mr. Harrison: This particular letter, Mr. Speaker, asked me to apologize in the house for something I had not said; and I think the school trustees association are convinced of that now. I wrote to them and cleared the record on it. I gave them chapter and verse, and so far all I have had from them is a very nice letter from the secretary saying he had received it, and taking no issue with it whatsoever. So I can take it from that, I think, that my letter was fairly correct.

The main reason that I did not get my copy of the letter was that they sent the other 19 Saskatchewan members' letters to the House of Commons. We were sitting at that time, and I had allegedly made this speech to which they took exception. My copy of the letter was sent to Meadow Lake, a place in which I do not live even when I am home. This letter went to Meadow Lake and then to Medstead, where I do live. It was then forwarded to the House of Commons, but by then I had gone home for the Easter recess so it followed me on to Medstead. I finally got this letter, which is dated March 25, 1952, on April 15.

I believe I covered the points fully in my reply to this letter. Since the hon. gentleman has put the other letter on the record, perhaps I had better read this reply into the record. It is addressed to Mr. Z. M. Hamilton, secretary treasurer, Saskatchewan school trustees association, and it reads:

> Your letter of March 25 with copy of your press release of March 22, finally reached me on the 15th of April. A glance at your copy will immediately show the reason for the delay in its reaching me. Similar letters sent on the same day by your office to 19 Saskatchewan members were received here on the 24th of March, a day before they were officially written. In every one of these 19 cases they were addressed to the House of Commons—for some reason, best known to your office, mine was dispatched to the town of Meadow Lake—

Mr. Knowles: They think you should not be here.

Mr. Harrison: I am omitting some of the parts because this letter is lengthy.

> After reading your press release here in the house on March 24, I waited patiently for your letter for a couple of weeks before I made any statement, as I did not want to be guilty of the same offence which you committed, namely, discussing something that I had never seen. At that time, however, seeing no letter had arrived, it was necessary for me to put the record straight in view of your hasty and incorrect conclusions drawn in your press release. Had you read my speech first, I have no doubt but that you would never have put out the press release that you did, because nowhere in my speech can you find anything, either directly or implied, as even remotely suggesting that the school trustees association had anything to do with the 1,558 schools either closed or without qualified teachers in Saskatchewan. I was attacking provincial government policy, and provincial government policy only, which basically was the inability of school boards to go out and bid for qualified teachers' services—in other words, by placing ceilings on the wages of various classes of teachers, they had short-circuited the system of "supply and demand" to the end that in six years time we had 558 school rooms open, which were without a qualified teacher, but instead, a sitter.
> As a school trustees association, you are quite likely familiar with the conducting and marking of efficiency contests. In the light of this I would like you to assess the press release that was carried so unanimously by your executive meeting. The first essential in criticizing anyone or anything is to properly identify them so that people will know who or what you are talking about. The first thing your press report does is to identify one J. L. Harrison, as M.P. for Meadow Lake. No such man has ever sat for Meadow Lake or any other constituency in Canada since confederation. I trust that you will say that this is a typographical error. It is still an error, and error No. 1. Error number two, is your statement that my speech was false and malicious, causing great injustice to school trustees and teachers in Saskatchewan. As school trustees were never mentioned, and the only thing I suggested about teachers was that boards be allowed to compete for their services on a market of short supply, it is hard to imagine how anyone could construe this as being one detrimental to the teachers. Your third error is that, "Mr. Harrison is ignorant of the true situation of education in Saskatchewan and the benefits obtained by his home town of Meadow Lake". Meadow Lake is not my home town, but is 85 miles away from it. This you will also wish to claim as an error, and I am prepared to allow it as such. Assuming that Meadow Lake is my home town, however, as you do, the fourth error still remains, that I am ignorant of the benefits obtained by Meadow Lake. Let's just see who is ignorant here, or whether we both have the same understanding of the word "benefits". Certainly the people of Meadow Lake are not aware of these benefits; and far from being ignorant of the situation, I took the trouble to inquire, as late as February before coming down here, from a member of the larger unit board, as to the status quo in Meadow Lake, and got the following information: The town of Meadow Lake has a mill rate for school purposes only, of 42 mills. If this is beneficial, those members of your executive who are so unanimous about everything, should make it their business to go to Meadow Lake and explain it to the people there. For my part, I defy you to find any town in Canada outside the borders of Saskatchewan, that has a mill rate even approaching 42 mills for school assessment only. I was further informed by this member of the larger unit, that the surrounding hamlets were assessed at the rate of 40 mills for school purposes; and something which no one outside of Saskatchewan can believe, is that farm property owners are assessed 38 mills for school purposes. If you knew of these figures when you talked so glibly in the press of the beneficial situation existing in Meadow Lake, then you have a very different idea of what the word "beneficial" means, than I have. If you are going to tell me now that you did not know of these figures, then my question immediately is, who is really ignorant about the situation at Meadow Lake, myself, as you claim in the press, or your association? I think you had better justify the figures to the people of Meadow Lake or admit that you are ignorant of the situation. The fifth, and I think the worst error is, publicizing the fact all over the country that you are writing all Saskatchewan members of the House of Commons, including myself, asking me to apologize for something I have never said, and then shipping my letter off to Meadow Lake. I do not think that you would want to tell me that you did this intentionally, and I do not think you did, myself. The most charitable view of it that can be taken is, that it was another error.

If the foregoing had been entered in one of your efficiency contests, I have no doubt it would get a rating of zero. If not, I would be interested to learn what standards you use.

I am always quite ready to render apologies when I have mistakenly wronged someone, and I don't have to do that very often. Frankly, however, on the record, I ask you, who should apologize to who? If you are fair, your answer will be clear.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it is not usually in order to read into the record such long quotations. I think the hon. member should perhaps give the general tenor of the arguments contained in that letter or document, and not put the whole of the document on Hansard.

Mr. Harrison: The first letter, to which this is a reply, was placed on the record in its entirety. Possibly there are some parts of this letter that I could skip, and quote the concluding paragraph. I am putting the letter on the record to keep the record straight, as it should be if the matter is to be discussed at all. I believe my hon. friends will agree with that. I shall quote the concluding paragraph:

In all the foregoing, sir, nothing is aimed at you personally, as I am quite aware that you are a hired secretary, and therefore have to do what you are told.

The letter finishes on that line of thought. He replies as follows:

I would like, at this time, to express to you my appreciation of the last paragraph of your letter where personal reference has been made to myself.

I believe that clears up the matter so far as we are concerned. The matter of federal aid is something which, on its face and as put on the order paper by the hon. member, is desirable. As soon as my hon. friends across the way will introduce some system of making it effective, other than just handing money over for someone to run around the country and preach atheism, I shall be glad to support the measure.

Mr. Knight: That letter is proof that we need federal aid.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will consider the following measures: First, the motion standing in the name of the Prime Minister relating to Mondays and Wednesdays; then the motion in the name of the Minister of National Revenue concerning the setting up of a committee on broadcasting; then third reading of Bill No. 45; then the resolution in the name of the Postmaster General to amend the Post Office Act; Bill No. 103, to amend the National Defence Act; Bill No. 102, respecting the royal style and titles; Bill No. 105, respecting the liability of the crown for torts and civil salvage; Bill No. 38, respecting the Saint John Bridge and Railway Extension Company; Bill No. 19, to amend the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act. These are small bills.

Then we shall take up Bill No. 39, to amend the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation Act; Bill No. 40, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways. If we have time left, we shall take up Bill No. 44, to protect the coastal fisheries.

Mr. Graydon: You may bring in the budget after eight o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: Are we to be dissolved tomorrow night?

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, January 27, 1953

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

DEFENCE EXPENDITURE

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina) presented the first report of the special committee on defence expenditure, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Before the motion is carried I have just a word to say. If we revert to times gone by, in Hansard of July 3, 1935, at page 4198 there appears the following discussion:

Mr. Pouliot: —the comptroller of the treasury's office is no good and I protest against this vote—

Mr. Mackenzie King: —the comptroller of the treasury took over certain of the functions which formerly belonged to the Auditor General.

Mr. Bennett: No, several of the departmental functions in connection with disbursements.

Mr. Mackenzie King: The expenditures in that one branch are getting to be very large.

Mr. Bennett: It has control over all the disbursements of the country.

Mortuus adhuc loquitur!

Well, sir, I want to bring to the attention of members of the committee the fact that since Mr. Bennett, not by legislation but by order in council, changed the auditing system of all departments by centralizing them under the comptroller of the treasury, no minister except the Minister of Finance is responsible for any expenditures in any department.

It was not Liberal policy, it was Tory policy, and I opposed it bitterly at the time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The motion before the house is to concur in the first report of the special committee on defence expenditure. The committee report is a recommendation to the house that the committee be empowered to print from day to day 750 copies in English and 200 copies in French of the minutes of proceedings and evidence, etc., and to sit while the house is sitting. I do not believe such a recommendation would permit a general discussion of the matters which have been referred to the committee or a discussion of the procedure in the committee.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker, if you permit me, what I said was the preamble of the argument that I am going to make now. It will be very short and to the point.

Mr. Fulton: Tell us what you have been doing for the last seventeen years if you objected to that policy.

Mr. Pouliot: I will tell the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) that this was one of the most onerous legacies that a subsequent government inherited from the late Mr. Bennett. I know it hurts the Tories, but I am going to make my point. What I am saying is strictly in order, as you will see, Mr. Speaker, and as hon. members will see. I am not a miracle man. I cannot make the blind see, nor can I make the deaf hear. I know that it hurts, and I am sorry. I do not say this to hurt anyone; I say it to tell the truth and to guard against any injustice being done to either one of the Ministers of National Defence.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the hon. member now to discuss the motion. The motion is that the committee be empowered to print from day to day 750 copies in English and 200 copies in French of its minutes of proceedings and evidence, and such papers and records as may be ordered by the committee to be printed, and that standing order 64 be suspended in relation thereto; (2) to sit while the house is sitting. It is only those two matters which can be discussed at this time.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker, there is more to it.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Pouliot: I want the evidence to be taken by the committee to be in accordance with the elementary rules of justice, and I do not want the committee to sit while the house is sitting to commit any injustice with regard to anyone. It is for this reason, sir, that I bring to the attention of the hon. gentlemen, especially those who will serve on the committee, the fact that hundreds of accountants in the Department of National Defence are not under the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). They are under the comptroller of the treasury since Mr. Bennett centralized the whole business of government payments.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Pouliot: I know they will not understand. I have said what I wanted to say, and I thank you, sir.

Motion agreed to.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON MONDAYS AND WEDNESDAYS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Monday, February 2, and on Wednesday, February 4, 1953, and every Monday and Wednesday thereafter to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all other business except introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I do not propose to debate this motion, but it occurs to me to wonder whether the Prime Minister has given any consideration to the suggestion that, instead of taking away both Mondays and Wednesdays at this stage, he might devote the Mondays to government business and leave the Wednesdays for a period of another two or three weeks. At this stage of the session, Wednesday is only a half day and there are a lot of private members' motions remaining on the order paper. Speaking as one who has been fortunate enough to have his motion called, I can say that I know there are others who have not had such good fortune. I am sure these members would appreciate it if Wednesday could be left for the time being.

Mr. St. Laurent: It has been the practice in some of the former sessions to take away the Mondays first and then afterwards the Wednesdays, but that has always been when the Mondays were being taken very much earlier than has been the case this session. There have been more days allotted to the application of the ordinary rules this session than for a very long time hitherto. I think there has been an ample opportunity for the discussion of all those notices of motions that members really wish to have discussed. There are two hours remaining when the public bills and orders can be reached if private bills do not occupy all the time allotted. So far private bills have taken up very little of those two hours, so I would imagine there would be no serious inconvenience in proceeding now to the extent which is being proposed.

Prior to Thursday, very little inroad has been made on the long list of government business that has been on the order paper since the opening of the session. We do not like to be arbitrary, but it was felt at this time it was not being arbitrary to propose this motion.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I think it is fair, on this motion, to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) a question. It will be recalled that last July when the question of the adjournment of the 1952 session of parliament until the autumn, and the commencement of the 1953 session in the autumn of 1952, was proposed by the government, I asked him as to the reason for it. The Prime Minister indicated that the purpose of calling parliament so early was to conclude the session at the end of April or the first of May so that those who would be going to the coronation would have an opportunity of doing so. May I ask if that is still the aim of the government with respect to the present session.

Mr. St. Laurent: The government still hopes that will be possible.

Motion agreed to.

BROADCASTING

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue) moved:

That a select committee be appointed on broadcasting to consider the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to review the policies and aims of the corporation and its regulations, revenues, expenditures and development, with power to examine and inquire into the matters and things herein referred to and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, and to send for persons, papers and records; that the committee have power to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable or necessary; that the committee have power to meet while the house is sitting; that the committee shall consist of the following members: Messrs. Beaudry, Boisvert, Breton, Carter, Courtemanche, Decore, Diefenbaker, Dinsdale, Fleming, Fulton, Gauthier (Portneuf), Gauthier (Sudbury), Hansell, Henry, Jones, Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth), Knight, MacLean (Queens), McCann, Murray (Cariboo), Mutch, Richard (Ottawa East), Riley, Robinson, Smith (Moose Mountain), and Whitman. That standing orders 64 and 65 be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: Mr. Speaker, we have again proposed the appointment of a special committee on radio broadcasting. Regarding the study of all the aspects of the national system the terms of reference are practically the same as those similar committees have had in former years. There is, however, one change in the wording of the notice of motion. As hon. members will note, the resolution reads:

That a select committee be appointed on broadcasting to consider——and so on. Formerly, the word "radio" was inserted in front of the word "broadcasting". It was our former conception in years gone by that broadcasting consisted solely of sound broadcasting or what is known as radio. Within the last few years, however, there has been in this country a new development in the matter of television, so that when we put in the word "broadcasting" without the word "radio" in front of it, that procedure naturally broadens the scope of the investigation or inquiry that will come before the committee; and it is proposed that they examine into the matters pertaining both to sound broadcasting and to television.

The last committee that sat on this particular subject was in the fall session of 1951. There had previously been an examination in 1950. The committee in 1951 brought in its report. Its sessions were not perhaps as long as usual because of the fact that at that time—in the summer of 1950 and from then on—there had been sitting a commission which had been set up on the development of the arts, letters and sciences and which was commonly known as the Massey commission. That commission had its report ready about that time, and the committee on radio broadcasting made a thorough examination of all the recommendations which were made in that report. The committee itself brought in its report on Friday, December 14, 1951. While it is not my purpose at this time to review extensively the recommendations and the findings of that committee I might, however, bring to your attention some of the recommendations which were made. One in particular was recommendation No. 8 which is as follows:

> Your committee shares the view of the royal commission and of the previous committees of the house that the national broadcasting service carried on by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is essential in the development of our national life in Canada, and is efficiently performing an extremely valuable and important function. It has been impressed by the variety and extent of the services being provided by the corporation, and by the complexity of the problems which Canadian conditions impose.

Then the report went on and dealt with the other recommendations, one of which was:

> It also recommends the initiation as funds become available of a second French network corresponding to the English language dominion network, the establishment of a French network station in the maritime provinces and increased service of French network programs by transcription to French language stations in the prairie provinces.

The committee recommended the desirability of improving the program services. They made recommendations with reference to the financing of the corporation. They were favourably impressed by the activities of the international services, and in the consideration of the representation of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters they made certain observations. There then came up another important question and their recommendation was this:

> That the grant of the privilege of radio broadcasting in Canada continue to be under the control of the national government; that the control of the national broadcasting system continue to be vested in a single body responsible to parliament; that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as now constituted be that authority and continue to provide directly by its operations and indirectly by its control of the operations of others a national broadcasting service free from partisan influence.

I am merely bringing these matters to your attention, Mr. Speaker, and I think perhaps the most important one, in the light of developments since 1951, was their recommendation with reference to television. That recommendation was No. 23 in the report and it was as follows:

> Your committee is strongly impressed with the vital need for the development of a television system that is essentially Canadian and which gives expression in this new form of broadcasting to Canadian ideas and aspirations. It agrees with the royal commission that the situation must be avoided under which commercial pressures will lead to the major part of the material on Canadian channels being non-Canadian. Your committee supports the recommendations of the royal commission regarding television development and your committee recommends that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation proceed as soon as practicable with the extension of television coverage.

What I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, is the fact, that as a result of this investigation by the radio committee in 1951, considerable progress has been made with reference to the implementation of their recommendations. For instance, we have now established a French network in western Canada and also preparations have been made and work is now being done in connection with the French language station down in the maritimes. In addition to that, a number of low-power relay transmitters, as they are called, have been installed in northern Ontario and in northwestern Canada as well as in northwestern Quebec, in order that coverage may be added in those particular regions.

That committee made it a point to visit our facilities in the city of Montreal at the Radio Canada building there, and I am sure they were impressed with the advancements which were being made in the development of that centre. I would suggest to the committee this year, when they meet, that they again avail themselves of the opportunity of visiting Montreal or Toronto or perhaps both, and seeing the advancement that has been made there both in the physical attainments and in the technological advancements there have been both in sound broadcasting and in television. You will remember also, Mr. Speaker, that in our discussions in 1951 there was reference to certain amendments to the Canadian Broadcasting Act. At the time when we had the debate on the setting up of the committee we joined together both the resolution with reference to the amendments to the broadcasting act and the resolution setting up the committee. May I recall to your memory just what those changes were in the broadcasting act. Two more governors were added to the board of governors which formerly consisted of nine; the board of governors since that time has had a membership of eleven.

Newfoundland, having come into confederation, was entitled to a representative on the board. That member has been appointed and has been functioning on the board ever since.

The second thing that we did under the amendment to the act at that time was to give the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation greater borrowing powers without having reference to the cabinet. Their borrowing powers were increased from $10,000 to $25,000 on any one project. The tenure of office of the chairman was changed. Then we set up an appeal section. We also made it possible by the changes for the chairman of the board, who was appointed by the government and who was not considered as an employee for pension purposes, to be considered as an employee, and he is eligible for pension.

I do not need to say very much more with reference to that, except to point out, as hon. members know, that the C.B.C., being a crown corporation, is probably subject to a great deal of criticism from all parts of the country and from all types of bodies. But still the C.B.C. has a great number of friends. I do not know of any other public institution which receives resolutions from as large a number of influential bodies as does the C.B.C. The federation of agriculture, which is one of the biggest organizations in the whole of the country, as well as the Trades and Labour Congress, different labour bodies, women's institutes and a great many others send in resolutions commending the policies of the C.B.C. I admit that perhaps we do not get the support of wealthy and powerful newspapers and chambers of commerce. While we are not entirely indifferent to them, I think that the other bodies which do pass resolutions commending the work of the C.B.C. are a good deal more influential. In addition to that, they do represent a greater body of public opinion. Of course the C.B.C. has difficulties. Any organization that undertakes a large amount of work in this country, as does the C.B.C., is bound to have difficulties and criticism.

When we are discussing the C.B.C. we should keep in mind that they have to operate on five time zones from one end of the country to the other. They have to operate in two languages; they have to set up different systems and different networks in order to meet the needs of this country. In addition to the trans-Canada network and the dominion network, it is necessary also to have a French network.

I might recall to hon. members the fact that the C.B.C. has been the subject of investigation ever since its inception. There was the Aird report of years ago, which still is good reading, with reference to the basic principles on which the C.B.C. was founded. From year to year there has been a periodic examination by the radio committee of the House of Commons, and then in 1950 the commission to which I have made reference was set up, namely, the commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences. Its report has become known as the Massey report. The government has followed, and intends to follow, fairly exactly I would say, the recommendations that have been made in that report, because there was never in this country a more extensive and exhaustive report made with reference to broadcasting than was made by the Massey commission. What we asked them to do, and what we are following, was to lay down principles upon which the government could formulate its policy with reference to the C.B.C. I want it distinctly understood that in the matter of internal management there is absolutely no interference on behalf of the government. When it comes to a matter of large expenditure, under the act these things are referred to the government for either endorsation or rejection.

I have always been in favour of private enterprise. Perhaps some people will wonder why I advocate and support the C.B.C. Well, I do it for this reason, that radio broadcasting and television are a natural monopoly. There are only a certain number of frequencies with reference to sound broadcasting, and what we call channels with reference to television, that are available, and if there were not control over them, and some governing body to do the controlling, the whole matter of broadcasting, either sound or television, would soon be chaotic. And so it is when you have a natural monopoly of this kind, it is in the best interests of the great majority of the people of Canada that there should be a governing body so to regulate things that they accrue to the best interests of the greatest number of people.

That is about all I have to say with reference to sound broadcasting. Hon. members will recall that on December 8 I made a statement in this house with reference to government policy on television.

That statement can be found in Hansard of that date at page 409. It was the first item of business of that day. I am not going to read it again; I am going to point out some of the important features in order to refresh our memories when we get into the discussion on television. I said at that time:

—the government has been giving careful consideration to the development of television broadcasting in Canada. In its consideration it has had in mind the report of the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences. The commission recommended that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation proceed with the production of television programs and with plans for national coverage. It spoke of extension of national coverage both through publicly and privately-owned stations. It said that no private station should be licensed until the C.B.C. had available national television programs and that all private stations established should be required to serve as outlets for national programs. It emphasized the need for direction and control of television broadcasting in Canada to prevent Canadian stations from becoming mere channels for broadcasting material from outside Canada and to encourage Canadian content.

The government believes, with the royal commission, that television should be developed in Canada with the aim of benefiting our national life and that it should have the structure and the means required by Canadian conditions to ensure an adequate amount of suitable Canadian programs for Canadians as well as using some material from outside the country. Television will undoubtedly play a considerable part in the lives of many Canadian families. It is bound to have a strong effect on the growing minds of young people watching it in their own homes. The government believes it should be so developed in Canada that it is capable of providing a sensible pattern of programming for Canadian homes with at least a good portion of Canadian content.

We said at that time:

Therefore, it is proposed to ask parliament to approve a loan to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the purpose of building stations on the Pacific coast, in the prairie provinces, and in the Atlantic provinces. These would be established in the Vancouver, Winnipeg and Halifax areas. Thus, in addition to the stations at Montreal and Toronto, and that to be built at Ottawa, there would be publicly-owned stations with some production facilities at least in each of the main regions of the country.

We announced at that time that the government would be in a position to receive applications for licences for private stations to serve areas not now served—and this is very important—to serve areas not now served or to be served by publicly-owned facilities already announced. The government then, at that time, indicated to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that it was prepared to consider applications for such licences as may be recommended by the corporation, after having cleared, of course, with the Department of Transport. At that time I said:

The objective will be to make national television service available to as many Canadians as possible through co-operation between private and public enterprise. Under this plan the private stations licensed will carry national program service, besides having time for programming of their own. There will be plenty of opportunity for enterprise by private interests in television broadcasting, and at the same time provision for wide extension of the national service. Since the objective will be to extend services as widely throughout Canada as is practicable, no two stations will be licensed at the present to serve the same area. A television station can serve only a comparatively small area. Canada is very large and it will require a good many stations before television can be brought to the people in most parts of our country.

That works both ways, of course.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister permit a question arising out of the statement he has just made?

Mr. McCann: Perhaps the hon. member would permit me to complete this part of my observations. That works both ways. If the C.B.C. sets up a television station in, we will say, the city of Toronto, and will not allow a licence there for a private station at the same time, that, of course, gives protection to the C.B.C. But if a licence were given in the city of Kitchener, serving a community of perhaps half a million people, a similar protection would be given in that no other licence would be given in that area at this time.

So that, as I say, in my judgment it works both ways, in that it protects the C.B.C. on the one hand and the private stations on the other. I have mentioned Kitchener. The C.B.C. has not designated that as an area to be served by them, so that it will be one available for private stations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: From the last few words of the minister's observations it would appear that the Kitchener area is not one designated as an area to be served by the C.B.C. The question I wish to ask is this: In view of the fact that that designation covers not only stations now being erected or shortly to be erected, but also those to be erected in the future, what about the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta? Has it yet been decided whether they are to be C.B.C. areas, or whether private enterprise may enter in those provinces.

Mr. McCann: In Manitoba we propose to erect a C.B.C. station in the city of Winnipeg, as has already been announced. Determination has not been made, for instance, with respect to Alberta. But, supposing we did erect a station in Alberta, I presume it would be, perhaps, in the city of Calgary. That leaves a splendid area in the Edmonton community for private broadcasters. They could serve that large area through some origination of programs and by programs which are prepared by the C.B.C. and offered to them by means of kinescope recordings. It would serve also as an outlet for C.B.C. programs in the event that technological advances make it possible to bring those programs to that particular city either by means of microwave relay, or by cable.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about Saskatchewan and British Columbia?

Mr. McCann: We might hope that probably Saskatchewan could be supplied with programs, on the one side from Manitoba or on the other from Calgary, if there are certain advances made. If not, we would have to give consideration to the establishment of a C.B.C. transmitter in the province of Saskatchewan.

However, those are matters under consideration. I might point out that television is terribly expensive, and it will be hard to get public opinion to support a development at this time to the extent that we would wish. My own policy would be, so far as any advice that I might give is concerned, that we have got to go slowly on this, and take advantage of such technological advances as come along.

Mr. Graydon: Does that not mean that Saskatchewan would be a no-man's-land?

Mr. McCann: No, you cannot put it that way. Saskatchewan has never been neglected, so far as this government is concerned.

Mr. Cruickshank: What about British Columbia?

Mr. McCann: I have made the announcement that we are building—we have already acquired the land—a television station in the city of Vancouver.

Mr. Cruickshank: To be built when?

Mr. McCann: To be built just as soon as plans can be drawn for it, and the transmitter can be supplied.

Mr. Cruickshank: 1970?

Mr. McCann: No, not 1970. We believe that by the end of 1953, or perhaps before that—in the early fall—we will be operating in the city of Vancouver.

Mr. Cruickshank: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. McCann: Would the hon. member let me finish my statement, first.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On the basis of what the minister has said, it is planned to do something in British Columbia by the end of 1953. Is it right to say that, so far as Saskatchewan and Alberta are concerned, there are no plans for 1953, or the immediate future?

[Mr. McCann.]

Mr. McCann: Plans are not yet finalized with respect to Alberta and Saskatchewan. But they have been considered, and as soon as policy is determined with respect to those two provinces in the matter of the erection of television stations, it will be announced.

Mr. Brooks: What is the situation in New Brunswick?

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, I should prefer to have the questions after I have finished what I have to say. I can quite understand that hon. members are inquisitive; and sometimes, too, they may feel that if they can break up what one has to say it will be to their own advantage. I am just as familiar with those tricks as is the hon. member for Lake Centre. However, under the circumstances I think we will just let that go by the board.

Mr. Graydon: I think you had better.

Mr. McCann: May I now return to the matter about which I wish to speak. I have given the policy of the government regarding the licensing of television stations. I should like now to review briefly the development of television broadcasting in this country, and refer to some facts in connection with it.

As hon. members will recall, television was one of the subjects the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences was asked to study. The government, however, did not wish to delay all action until the commission could make its examination, and report its findings. Therefore at the time the commission was set up the government authorized the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to proceed with plans for production centres and transmitting stations at Montreal and Toronto, as the first steps in the Canadian system.

Loans were authorized to finance these projects. The C.B.C. was able to go ahead, starting in 1950. Shortage of steel and all other materials and equipment following the outbreak of the Korean war held up these projects considerably and, in fact, delayed their completion for about a year. These centres went into regular operation in September of 1952. I, personally, have visited them and have seen the production of programs taking place. I would hope that other members of the House of Commons who are interested in this subject would do the same. It is only by seeing, at first hand, that anyone can grasp the immense effort and the complicated organization that is necessary to produce a live program. Early in 1951, in the light of the steel situation, the government decided to stop authorizing any new broadcasting stations for sound or television at a time when steel was being withheld from so many other purposes. Those restrictions were lifted at the end of December, 1952. In recent months, due to the improvement of the steel situation, the government has given consideration to the question of television development.

I have already said that it was decided to ask parliament for a loan to enable the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to establish further stations at the capital and also one each in the Pacific, prairie and Atlantic regions. We also gave careful consideration to the part which private stations should play in the development. In this connection I should like to remind the house of some of the things which the royal commission said in dealing with television, and I should like to quote from the report where it deals with television at page 301 as follows:

1. We were given the grave responsibility of making recommendations on the principles upon which the policy of Canada should be based in the field of television, this new and unpredictable force in our society. Our recommendations, however, as well as the evidence we bring forward in support of them, can be short and simple. They follow from the fact that the considerations leading us to recommend the continuation of a national system of radio broadcasting seem to us to dictate much more strongly and urgently a similar system in television. Television, like radio, is akin to a monopoly, but its much more limited channels give added importance to a system of co-ordination and control. Like radio it is a valuable instrument of national unity, of education, and of entertainment; how much more valuable it is difficult to say at present, but it promises to be a more popular as well as a more persuasive medium.

2. The position of private stations in Canadian television broadcasting requires special consideration. In radio broadcasting Canada has achieved maximum coverage for national programs at minimum cost by using some commercial programs, and by co-ordinating private stations within the national system under the control of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. We think the same principles of national control should be applied to television broadcasting but with certain special precautions. It seems apparent that the most difficult problem of television in Canada will be to provide programs in our remote and thinly populated areas; and television advertising will raise difficult questions. Even in radio broadcasting the programs of all private stations are likely to suffer from excessive control by the advertising sponsor. Only to a limited degree can the private station operator determine the character of his own programs. Because of greater capital investment and greater operating costs the unfortunate tendencies of radio broadcasting will be intensified in television. The pressure on uncontrolled private television operators to become mere channels for American commercial material will be almost irresistible. In radio broadcasting, Canadians experimented with a purely commercial system before changing to a national system.

That is away back of the Aird report.

Such an experiment with the more costly and powerful television would be dangerous. Once television were established in commercial north-south channels it would be almost impossible to make the expensive changes necessary to link the country by national programs on east-west lines of communication. Canadians will welcome good American programs in television as they now do in radio, but as we have been informed, they do not want them at the cost of a Canadian national system, provided that the C.B.C. can make attractive programs available in the not too distant future. It seems desirable to use appropriate American television programs, and to make suitable agreements with Canadian private stations.

That has been accomplished already.

These arrangements, however, should follow and should depend on the organization of a national system of television production and control.

The recommendations were:

We therefore recommend:

a. That direction and control of television broadcasting in Canada continue to be vested in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

b. That the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation proceed with plans for the production of television programs in French and English and for national coverage by kinescope recordings or by any other practicable means.

c. That no private television broadcasting stations be licensed until the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has available national television programs and that all private stations be required to serve as outlets for national programs.

The policy of the government is designed to carry out the findings of the commission which we believe are of great importance. I suggest that there is no purpose in having investigations such as the Aird commission, committees of the House of Commons or the Massey commission, unless we are prepared to give the recommendations most serious consideration and, I suggest further, to see that they are implemented. I believe that a commission such as the Massey commission represented the best talent available in this country to examine into all phases of the development of broadcasting in Canada. When we got their recommendations, which, after consideration and examination, appeared to be logical and practical to the government, I submit it would be ill-advised if we did not attempt to follow them and give them implementation.

There will be provision for the production of Canadian programs by the C.B.C. over the national service. The C.B.C., of course, will also be able to bring in some suitable programs from outside Canada, as the commission suggests. Just to bring you up to date: We have already made arrangements with the Bell Telephone Company to use their facilities at a rental of $225,000 a year in what is known as the microwave system whereby programs will be brought from Buffalo to Toronto and, when it is completed, from Buffalo to Montreal and from Montreal to Toronto.

That was not built particularly for us; it was built as one of the commercial projects of the Bell Telephone Company whereby they are able to carry hundreds of long distance lines and give better service to their telephone subscribers and the general public. However, it is available and can be used as a microwave relay length for the carrying of television programs.

There will be facilities for the production of at least some programs in each of the main regions. That means that in those places that I have designated programs will originate. At the C.B.C. centres in the main areas of Canada there will be the foundation of a nation-wide system and production facilities located there so as to be able to use Canadian talent effectively for programs that will be available across the country.

No single factor in our life in the development of art has been so important as the C.B.C. in giving opportunity to Canadian talent to find employment at good wages and good fees through the development of radio. That will be intensified and increased with the development of television. Under the policy there will be a means of bringing national programs to a wider number of Canadians, through both publicly and privately-owned stations. Of course, it will not be possible for all these stations of the system, public or private, to be joined by direct network connections, that is, by coaxial cables or microwave relays, at least for a few years. But in the meantime national service programs will be supplied by means of kinescopic recordings to all stations. Under this policy there will be many opportunities for private enterprise to take part in television broadcasting. That I think is important because a lot of people have the impression that government policy is to shut out private enterprise. That is not so. There is going to be an awful lot of opportunity for private enterprise to take part.

The private stations will be established in such a way that they will all be able to carry programs of the national television service in addition to programs of their own. Thus they will be assisted in their operations, and at the same time will serve the national interest by helping to extend national coverage and to link the country together by means of television. It has been suggested that under this policy taxpayers in other parts of the country would be paying for television operations serving only the areas where there will be C.B.C. stations. That is not so.

In the first place it is proposed that the money advanced to the C.B.C. will be in the form of loans to be repaid later out of revenues. Programs produced in C.B.C. production centres will be available under this policy to Canadians in many parts of the country through both publicly and privately owned stations.

It is the view of the government that television service should become available to as many Canadians as possible in as many parts of the country as possible rather than that those happening to live in places such as Toronto and Vancouver should have several services available to them before other important areas have any. Under the policy adopted we can look forward to a wide extension of television service and to a service that includes a good proportion of Canadian programs.

Because of the great size of this country and our relatively small population, television service to cover the majority of Canadians is bound to be expensive. Television programs are costly to produce and the cost per head in Canada, however that cost is distributed, is bound to be high; yet most people in this country would agree, we believe, that this important medium should develop a good measure of Canadian programs. From our national income there can be drawn only a certain amount from both public and commercial channels for television broadcasting. We believe that the system should be so developed that this potential support for television broadcasting should be directed as much as possible towards extending the television service throughout the country rather than doubling or trebling it in certain favoured areas. We believe the system should be developed as we plan so that a fair proportion of the total goes into the support of Canadian programs.

The policy will make possible the development of a Canadian-wide system of television stations, operating as a network, much as do the great networks in the United States. Here the stations of the network organization set-up will be publicly owned, and network programs of the whole system will be supported in part through contributions from the viewing public.

Some members appear particularly anxious to see private interests licensed in large centres which would also be served by the C.B.C. I think no doubt that from a business point of view such licences would be very attractive to any who could get them. Under such licences for big cities very profitable ventures could be operated by the fortunate licensees provided they were free to get most of their programs from outside Canada. The royal commission emphasized the almost irresistible pressure on uncontrolled private television operators to become mere channels for non-Canadian commercial material. It recommended particularly that all private stations established should serve as outlets for national service. Of course, for some time at least, the C.B.C. will not be able to supply national service to two stations in one area. That would leave any second station under the almost irresistible pressure to carry largely non-Canadian material.

There may be some people in favour of allowing Canadian television channels to be used mostly, perhaps almost entirely, for broadcasting non-Canadian material. I should like to say that is not the view of this government. Together with the royal commission we believe that television should develop in this country so that it does broadcast a good proportion of Canadian programs for Canadians, while at the same time using some good material from outside the country.

We also feel that the benefits of such television should be extended as widely as possible and as quickly as possible through co-operation between private and public enterprise. That, we believe, will come about through this national policy.

Now, it is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to dwell further on this subject. The very purpose for which we are setting up a committee at this time is that members of the committee will have an opportunity of calling before them the officials of the C.B.C. who can be interrogated with reference to their past performance, and on the matter of policy with reference to the future development of radio and television. The public also have an opportunity to come before the committee and make such recommendations as they see fit.

I think most hon. members know that right in this building last week there was a meeting of the board of governors of the C.B.C. at which there were applications for new licences and the matter of proposed regulations was also discussed. The C.B.C., I am informed, would like to see the regulations stay as they are until such time as there is opportunity for discussion before the radio committee.

Now, perhaps you are familiar too with what happened just last week in the matter of applications. There was an application from this area, from the town of Eastview. What happened? That application was opposed by the other two stations here because of the fact that it is going to limit their field of commercial activity. They quarrel among themselves.

Up in Toronto Foster Hewitt has a station, I think at Mimico. He made a broadcast by wire from Boston of a hockey match and it was a "fixed" broadcast in which he described things that never occurred. Another owner of a station in Toronto rebroadcast that on his station in exactly the same words and one man accuses the other of stealing his thunder and his broadcast.

An hon. Member: Maybe that was television mentally.

Mr. McCann: I suggest to you that, both in sound broadcasting and in television broadcasting, if there were not a firm regulatory body to control this natural monopoly, within months the whole thing would be in a chaotic condition.

I submit further that we have in this country one of the best systems of broadcasting to be found in the world. In the United States all stations are commercial stations. In Great Britain there are no commercial stations and the system is operated, owned and controlled by a commission which has been set up, the British Broadcasting Corporation. Here we have a combination of the two. We have the main system which is owned, operated and controlled by a commission responsible to parliament; and we have 134 private stations which are supposed to act along with the nationally owned system in order to give coverage to all of the people of the country.

These private stations serve a good purpose. They serve a local purpose and they are outlets for splendid programs that are given to them at no particular cost.

I am very happy that this whole matter is going to be referred to a committee where there can be the freest and fullest investigation of all parties concerned.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the minister a question? I did not want to interrupt him when he was asked a question or two a little while ago. It would have seemed to be too much of a discussion. He intimated or put forward the supposition that if television was introduced in the province of Alberta he supposed that there might be one outlet in Calgary and that would leave Edmonton open to independent television broadcasters. I want to protect the minister on this because somebody is going to draw an inference there. I want to ask him if that was purely supposition or can they infer that Calgary will be chosen for the next television station under the C.B.C.—because I do not want rivalry between Edmonton and Calgary.

Mr. McCann: It does not, I think, leave itself open to that inference. What I thought I said or intended to say was that the C.B.C.—this is an inference that you could draw from it—is not going to put main stations in both of those cities. Whichever city is chosen, the other city will be open to private broadcasting.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I believe there can be no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the house should proceed to set up a select committee on broadcasting to undertake the studies mentioned in the resolution now under discussion. Having asked the government on December 17 if it would take steps to have such a committee appointed at this session, I am glad that, after some delay occasioned by the government's failure until now to name the government supporters to sit on this committee, the resolution is now on the order paper and we may hope to see the committee set up shortly.

Sir, it is time indeed that a committee of this house did undertake such a review of the affairs and the administration of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The last time a committee of the house sat on this subject was in the fall session of 1951. In the intervening fourteen months there have been some major developments in the policy of the government and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, with reference to both sound broadcasting and television. This resolution, with the debate that it offers, let it be remembered, is one of the few opportunities we have under present circumstances for a review in general and debate on the policies of the government and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation with reference to the broadcasting of sound and television. When parliament in a short-sighted move in December 1951 proceeded to vote sums of $6.25 million each for a period of five years as annual grants to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, it precluded any debate on these items year by year in the estimates. It would have been much better, and would have ensured the maintenance of some proper degree of parliamentary control over the policies of the corporation, if, as we in the official opposition argued at that time, there had been simply an annual grant and it had been left to parliament, year by year, to vote whatever sum of money it thought appropriate for that year. Instead, the government insisted that there should be this very large cheque written for a period of five years in advance. Therefore, sir, it behooves the house to embrace opportunities like that offered by the resolution now under debate to discuss the policies of the government and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

This discussion is all the more timely, because the policies of the government and the corporation are probably more unpopular than they have been at any time since the corporation was established in its present form. It is not too much to say, sir, that the policies that have been enunciated within recent months by the government have occasioned a veritable outcry in the press on the part of the public, and even within the councils of the Liberal party.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): What is that?

Mr. Fleming: Don't you know what the Liberal party is? We will soon be able to speak of government by that party in the past tense.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Councils; what is that? That is new to me; name them.

Mr. Fleming: My friend will have occasion to be apprised in greater detail, before I have concluded my remarks, as to what was the counsel tendered by a certain important Liberal organization to this government which my hon. friend has consistently supported.

It was evident in the speech of the minister this afternoon, particularly in his closing remarks, that the government does welcome any kind of diversion to distract the attention of the public from the policies which have occasioned this strong outcry on the part of the public. In what I have to say this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I propose to lay responsibility for those policies exactly where it belongs, namely, on the shoulders of the government. It will not suffice for the minister or the government to seek to hide themselves behind the coat-tails of the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Murphy: Are you sure it is not horses' tails?

Mr. Fleming: In the course of his speech the minister struck a keynote when he spoke of broadcasting as "a natural monopoly". Indeed, that theme ran throughout his speech, as applied to both sound broadcasting and television. It was used to cover up a multitude of inconsistencies and fallacies in the contentions of the hon. gentleman. If broadcasting is a natural monopoly, will the minister please tell the house why it was that competition was permitted to exist between private stations in certain localities and stations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? Going further, will the minister tell the house why it was that, speaking of that degree of competition before a special committee on radio broadcasting in the session of 1946, Mr. Dunton, the chairman of the broadcasting corporation, in reply to a question, said that the kind of competition offered to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation by the private stations had been a good thing for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? He went further and said that competition had helped to keep the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on its toes.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Just as the opposition does for a good government.

Mr. Fleming: In reply to my voluble friend from Maisonneuve-Rosemont, may I say that it would take more than a passing reference such as that with which the minister sought to dismiss this matter this afternoon to justify what the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is doing in fulfilling government policies by pursuing its monopolistic bent. Competition has been a good thing for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation where it has been permitted to exist. Who in this house is to say that competition now suddenly ceases to be a good thing for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? Who is to say now that in the development of the field of television there should be no opportunity whatever for competition with the operations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? I shall have more to say about television later.

I wish to make one thing crystal clear, sir, because the minister sought in his concluding remarks this afternoon to confuse the issue. No one, so far as I know, has ever said that there should not be a licensing body. No one in this house, so far as I know, has ever said that there should be no regulation whatever. But, Mr. Speaker, many of us have contended that it should not be left to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, enjoying the advantages that it enjoys under legislation today, to be regulating its own competitors. The proper course that should be followed is to leave the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to operate the national broadcasting, to carry out the function that was conceived for it when it was established, and to vest in an independent regulatory and licensing body the function of exercising the necessary licensing and regulatory powers with respect to all forms of broadcasting in Canada, whether they be carried on by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or by private stations.

It will interest hon. members of this house to know that that extremely sound proposal has not commended itself merely to Progressive Conservatives. It has found, if you please, an echo within the Liberal party itself. I have before me a press clipping of November 12, 1951, containing a Canadian press dispatch from the city of Vancouver reporting on certain resolutions passed by the national convention of the Young Liberal Federation of Canada, and in which, if you please, among other resolutions, there was this one favouring "an independent administration to control radio and television, including the C.B.C."

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) and the cabinet are not in tune with the thinking of the young Liberals of this country.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): That is a laugh.

Mr. Fleming: My voluble friend the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont is a young man, but there is little indication that he, with his youth, has retained sympathy with the ideas of the young Liberals. While he has remained youthful and vigorous himself, nevertheless his ideas seem to have grown old and hidebound, like those of the government he has supported for too long.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Following the example of my hon. friend who supports the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Fleming: The inherent weakness of the whole system is that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the government are absolute in the field of control. We need not waste any time in talking about the amendments that were introduced in this house in 1951, because the form of appeal that was provided by that legislation from decisions of the board of governors to the exchequer court by leave of a judge of the exchequer court, on questions of law in cases where the board of governors had suspended a licence, covers so narrow and tiny a field that it does not make any effective invasion at all of the system of absolute control by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the government over all forms of broadcasting in Canada.

The control of this extremely important means of communication is a matter fraught with great danger. When we look at what has happened in some other countries of the world and have seen the means exercised by totalitarian governments to control the means by which ideas may be expressed and communicated, I think it is the duty of parliament in matters of this kind to be ever vigilant in restraining inroads and attempts to exercise sweeping control over these means of communication.

With reference to sound broadcasting, I wish to mention some features of the administration of the corporation and the government in recent times, though time does not permit reference to more than a few. First of all I have something to say about programs.

When we are talking about maintaining freedom of expression, let us remember that freedom of expression calls for some balance in the expression of points of view, so far as the national broadcasting system is concerned; and I think it calls for the exercise of some wisdom on the part of the governing body with respect to expressions which cannot fail to give comfort to the enemies of Christian democracy.

It is in the light of that view that I have chosen for reference only three or four excerpts from broadcasts which have gone out over the national network. In each case I have chosen programs which were sponsored by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation itself and, so far as I am aware, were paid for by the corporation. I have here the script of an address entitled "Oh Brave New World"—which went over the national Sunday evening hour from Ottawa on April 8, 1951—by Professor Arthur Phelps of McGill university; and I choose from that script some expressions, one of which is as follows:

> Canada got fat out of the last two wars and she has a good chance of getting fatter out of this one. The crusade against the enemy on the other side of the world is at the same time the crusade for good business. It is a brave new world. An American leader says "We've got the rattle-snake by the tail; let's bash its brains out". In Korea we have "Operation Killer". We are getting things done.

Then further on I see that he makes reference to what he calls "the disastrous hypocrisy of the United Nations Chinese aggression resolution". It is quite obvious that this gentleman did not approve the resolution that was passed by the assembly of the United Nations condemning communist China for her aggression in Korea. Nevertheless hon. gentlemen opposite will be able to take what comfort they can out of having voted large sums of money in advance for a five-year period to permit the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to pay men to make, over the national network, broadcasts like the one I have just read.

Then I choose another excerpt from the broadcast of "Stage 52" of February 24, 1952. This was an extremely amusing broadcast, Mr. Speaker. I am the last one who would wish to put any restraint on amusement or satire; but I think you will agree, Mr. Speaker, that the selections I am going to quote to you now go far beyond any proper satire. This purports to be a dialogue between an Eskimo and one McGatt. The Eskimo is quoted as follows:

> Uluksuk: "Missionary he teach me ten commandments. 'Thou shalt not steal'. Me say, 'What is steal?' "
> "Uluksuk, you don't know what stealing is?"
> "Me say, 'No'. He say, 'Then I teach you'. So me learn".
>
> McGatt: "So now you're a rich Christian".

Then three pages later I find this in the script:

> Uluksuk: "Ah, stealing, good Christian custom".

I suppose that commends itself to communists in this country and abroad, Mr. Speaker; but I greatly doubt whether the people of this country will relish the idea of having parliament vote substantial sums of money, for a period of five years in advance, to pay people to broadcast that kind of dialogue over the air.

I have here another script from "Week-End Review" over the trans-Canada system Sunday, February 3, 1952. It is a broadcast by Professor Keirstead. Speaking of the East, and troubled conditions in Asia and Africa, he says:

> In all these lands, the British and, more recently, the Americans, have a bad past, a sorry heritage of exploitation and of alliance with subservient feudal lords who have, in the end, incurred the just hatred of their people. Discredited as they are, these members of a corrupt class can no longer help us. Yet our policy continues in the traditional path. The United States, taking over where Britain left off, tries to bribe its way into the confidence of men who can no longer command the loyalty of their subjects. That was the American policy in China, and it cost us China. The pragmatic test is the only one which history acknowledges. Today, this same policy may cost us more than China. It is nonsense to suppose that the communists have infiltrated into a position to command the Moslem church. They haven't. But Moslem fanaticism supports everywhere the nationalist rebellions of the Arab lands. And these people, with their aspirations for freedom, look for support to the only great power which is not committed against them. Can one really blame them—or for that matter, blame the Soviet union for taking quick advantage of this unexpected and unsought political bonanza?

I wonder how many people in this country, apart from communists, Mr. Speaker, will relish the idea that parliament has been called upon by the government to vote funds again for a period of five years in advance so that broadcasts of that kind, which acclaim the attempt of the Soviet union to capitalize on the troubles that it is stirring up in Asia and Africa today, can be broadcast on a national network.

Mr. Laing: What kind of programs should parliament direct in place of that one?

Mr. Fleming: Well, I would trust, Mr. Speaker, that any hon. gentleman who has enjoyed sufficient confidence on the part of his electorate, albeit four long years ago, to be elected to this house, would be able, with a little imagination, to think of something better than communist propaganda to be fed to the people of Canada over the national network of the C.B.C.

Mr. Laing: You want parliament to direct—

Mr. Knowles: May I be permitted to ask a question? Does the hon. member think it is fair to say that Professor Keirstead acclaimed the situation to which he was drawing attention?

Mr. Fleming: Well, Mr. Speaker, in answer I can only quote to the hon. gentleman again the concluding words of Professor Keirstead. If the word "acclaim" is too strong then I shall be glad to leave the matter on the record for fair-minded people to draw their own conclusions, and I quote again these concluding words:

> Can one really blame them—or for that matter blame the Soviet union for taking quick advantage of this unexpected and unsought political bonanza.

If these are not words of acclaim they are certainly words which very carefully withdraw any element of censure from the action of the Soviet government in trying to infiltrate into the East and make trouble there, as they are doing in Asia and Africa, trouble that is costing the lives of men from the free nations of the world serving in these troubled areas.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): May I be permitted to ask a question of the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Fleming: It is always a pleasure to answer questions from my hon. friend.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): —for whom I have great respect, and who is one of my good personal friends. Where is the Canadian government concerned with that?

An hon. Member: They are not.

Mr. Fleming: My hon. friend has had a shaft of illumination, Mr. Speaker, that I had despaired of his ever gaining. He has put his finger at last on the nub of the whole problem. The whole point is that this government apparently has no concern over matters of this kind. It is so filled with thoughts of pursuing policies of the kind of which I shall have something more to say later that it invites parliament to vote money, hard-earned money of the Canadian taxpayers, to be paid out to people to make, over the national network, broadcasts of the kind I have just mentioned.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): That is an answer?

An hon. Member: That is very subtle.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): That is not the answer that I was looking for.

An hon. Member: That is very, very subtle indeed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Where is the responsibility of the Canadian government?

Mr. Laing: To direct the programs.

Mr. Fleming: It is obvious that the Canadian government has shirked responsibility here. It is going to be called upon to answer on its responsibility because it has continued to apply policies which have made it possible for this sort of anti-democratic propaganda to be broadcast at the taxpayers' expense, and has continued to ask the parliament of this country to make that money available. I did not receive any help from my hon. friend when I urged in December, 1951, that parliament should not make a five-year grant in advance, but should attempt to retain control. I said, let us vote money annually according to the views that parliament holds at the time, but my hon. friend did not give me any support then, Mr. Speaker. He was in favour of handing out a five-year cheque in advance. I pleaded with him and with other hon. members in the house at that time not to part with the opportunity of exercising parliamentary control over these matters; but my hon. friend would hear nothing. So far as his views went the C.B.C. must have this money voted five years in advance.

Mr. Laing: Would my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. McCann: They have to plan a little further ahead than you want them to go.

Mr. Fleming: Is the suggestion that the government is going on planning broadcasts of this kind? That I am sure must give great encouragement to the communist propagandists of this country.

Mr. Laing: Will the hon. member permit a question? May I return to the first statement that he made a moment ago, namely, that the government was responsible for permitting a certain type of program. I ask him again, what type of program should the government direct the C.B.C. to broadcast?

Mr. Wylie: You know the kind that they have been broadcasting.

Mr. McCann: The government does not direct any of the programs.

Mr. Fleming: I have tried to say to the hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that the responsibility in this matter fundamentally rests upon the government, because these programs are being broadcast. The government is asking parliament to make it possible to continue the same policy and to continue the provision of money that makes these broadcasts possible. If my hon. friend cannot see that responsibility resting upon the government, then, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid nobody is going to succeed in making him see it.

Mr. Laing: I think you are out on a limb.

Mr. Fleming: Well, the hon. gentleman should be a very good judge of being out on a limb because he is so far out that he will never crawl back when another election comes.

Now, sir, I have one other reference to make on the subject of programs, and it is a very recent one; in fact, it is a program in the "Capital Report" series that was broadcast from Ottawa the day before yesterday. The gentleman who was retained by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to make this broadcast was Michael Barkway who, I think I can say, is a good personal friend of mine. It is distressing to me to find him indulging in the kind of broadcast that he made on Sunday, which was straight government propaganda. I do not think any hon. member dared, in the debates in recent days, to go so far as Mr. Barkway did in this broadcast on Sunday in trying to put a decent complexion upon the behaviour and failures of the government in the matter of the Currie report, and the scandals which it has disclosed in the Department of National Defence.

Mr. McCann: On a point of privilege, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether this discussion is any reason why we should or should not set up a committee. I submit that this argument is entirely irrelevant.

Mr. Brooks: You covered a very wide field.

Mr. Speaker: On motions to set up committees in the past very wide latitude has been allowed. Last week there was a motion to set up a committee on expenditures of the Department of National Defence. At that time very wide scope was allowed. I do not know where we should stop. In the past, when motions have been made to set up committees on radio broadcasting considerable latitude has been given to hon. members to discuss the policies and the programs of the corporation. The motion is:

> That a select committee be appointed on broadcasting to consider the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—

I suppose that includes expenditures of the corporation.

> —and to review the policies and aims of the corporation and its regulations, revenues, expenditures and development.

The committee can consider almost every aspect of broadcasting. I doubt if I should be asked to stop the hon. member at this time. I am at a loss to know just at what point I would stop hon. members in discussing problems with which the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is faced, or with which it could be faced, or problems with which the government is or may in the future be faced in this connection. May I leave it to hon. members to try to discuss matters relevant to the setting up of the committee.

Mr. Fleming: I think the remarks I was making indicated the necessity and desirability of having the house set up a committee to review the operations and administration of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I was making special reference to the broadcast two days ago by Mr. Michael Barkway, who spoke at public expense on the "Capital Report" series of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Certain paragraphs of the text are to be found at page 1305 of Hansard. I draw attention to the fact that the government must be very grateful to him for saying, first of all, that the copy of the report, which has received a certain amount of publicity, was stolen. I do not know that any hon. member in the House of Commons has gone so far as to say that the report was stolen. I have heard hon. members go so far as to say that it appeared that the report was stolen.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I doubt whether the statement the hon. member has just made is relevant to the setting up of this committee. I do not think the house can decide upon that question now. I must say I have some doubt as to the relevancy of what the hon. member is saying.

Mr. Fleming: With respect, Mr. Speaker, I am not discussing a former debate. I am discussing what was said on Sunday by a man who was paid to do it by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I am saying that that was a coloured broadcast, that it is an example of the sort of propaganda the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is issuing, and that it is a very good reason why there should be an investigation by a special committee into the operations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Cruickshank: There is a committee.

Mr. Fleming: I pointed out, with respect to this particular broadcast, that it goes far beyond anything that any government member dared to say in the House of Commons. And I am sure the government must have been very grateful to have propaganda of this kind going out over a national network.

An hon. Member: Truth.

Mr. Fleming: Truth? Why did not some hon. member in the debate in the house say so, then? Here is Mr. Barkway undertaking to make statements which, Mr. Speaker, no member in the House of Commons dared to make in that debate because they were not statements of fact.

He proceeds to say that certain things in the report are false. No member in the House of Commons, not even the most rabid government supporter, has dared to say that any statement in the Currie report was false.

And then he proceeds to say that the reason a motion was passed to refer the report to a committee, and to direct the committee to take up that report as its first item of business, was that false accusations had been made in the report—that the report itself contained false accusations.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that that propaganda has served the purposes of this government admirably, and at a time when the government was feeling the need of such assistance. It was indeed fortunate for the government that there should have been a national broadcast on Sunday afternoon, and at the public expense, containing statements of that kind which cannot be supported by the facts, statements the like of which no government supporter in the House of Commons dared to make on the floor of the house in the recent debate.

I have spoken about programs. I wish to say a word now on the subject of advertising content. The whole basis upon which the Massey commission recommended an annual statutory grant to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was that it should enable the corporation to eliminate all commercial content from its programs. I say now that we have not any evidence that the corporation, although accepting the statutory grant, has done anything tangible to reduce or to eliminate advertising or commercial content from its programs. Some of us will be very interested to learn why it is that the corporation has not carried out the intent of the Massey commission report and of parliament, and has not eliminated that advertising and commercial content.

The next matter has to do with the content of programs. The minister this afternoon has used an expression that I am sure warmed the hearts of us all, when he talked about the Canadian content of programs. I am not going to yield to the minister or to anyone else in the House of Commons in my desire to see the utmost possible Canadian content in Canadian broadcasting, whether it be by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or by private stations.

I would like to say this, though, that one thing that has impeded the use of Canadian talent on private stations has been this rigid denial on the part of the C.B.C. of any opportunity whatsoever to the private stations to have networks, even on a small scale. The talent in local stations is restricted because they are denied networks.

Mr. Cruickshank: I have been all across Canada.

Mr. Fleming: I was referring to talent.

Mr. Cruickshank: I have been all across Canada.

Mr. Fleming: If the corporation wishes to achieve some mathematical increase in Canadian content by eliminating certain programs and inviting private stations in their place to put on talks which will build up Canadian content, in terms of time, I doubt if they are going to make much of a contribution to the development of Canadian talent in that way. If they wish to do something for Canadian talent, I have indicated one way in which they can greatly assist in the development of that talent.

I come now to the not unfamiliar subject of the $2.50 licence fee for radio receiving sets.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: I hear the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) say "hear, hear", and I am glad to find him in support of the elimination of this nuisance tax.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear, hear; I introduced it.

Mr. Fleming: I know the hon. member is not alone among government supporters in the house who view with disgust the continued imposition of this $2.50 nuisance charge. Let me say that the government will hear about this nuisance tax until it is abolished. Can there be any sense in continuing a nuisance tax which yields $5,800,000 in a year and costs $700,000 to collect?

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: It is the most costly of all taxes to collect. The cost of collecting it runs at about 12·2 per cent. The net yield from the tax is about 87·8 per cent. If we had to face expense at that rate in collecting other taxes, the house would throw up its hands in horror. Nevertheless the collection of this tax goes on. The government continues to impose it. Then the Department of Transport a little over a year ago came up with a new idea. They were going to eliminate the house to house canvass and substitute a staff of fifty full-time people who were going to be responsible for collecting this tax. It is about time that the government followed the only sensible course that could be followed with respect to this nuisance tax, and eliminated it.

I said that to my knowledge a number of silent Liberal members in this house disapprove very strongly the imposition of this nuisance tax. They are not alone in their party in that respect because at the meeting of the National Liberal Federation in this city on October 27—I wish the hon. and voluble member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Fournier) had remained here because this is a subject that I wished to bring to his attention—we find that that largely attended meeting passed a resolution, which I quote from the Canadian Press dispatch of October 27, as follows:

> Recognizing that the use of radio has become universal in Canada and a necessity of modern life, the advisory council recommends that the government give consideration to the immediate abolition of the radio licence fee.

I do not pretend that that resolution gave any comfort to the Minister of National Revenue, nor do I pretend that it brought any comfort to the heart of the minister when, as we read in the press, he had a stormy and rough ride before that federation when he sought to justify government policy in continuing to impose this $2.50 nuisance tax and to continue monopolistic conditions with respect to television in Canada.

Mr. McCann: I was not there at all when that was discussed.

Mr. Fleming: Then the press reports must be wrong. It was the policies which the minister had defended so vigorously elsewhere that came under the condemnation of the Liberal federation, just as they would have if the minister had been present.

There is one other matter that I should like to mention before leaving the subject of sound broadcasting.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is a good time to be away at a time like that.

Mr. Fleming: It was just as well that the minister was not there.

In the recently issued report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1952, we find him dealing with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at page 53 as follows:

> The operating surplus of $3,691,779 from sound broadcasting and the $369,225 deficit from television broadcasting may not be regarded as strictly correct, because
> (a) the $14,813,598 income of the corporation and
> (b) the disbursement of $243,353 for loan interest
> are related in the statement to sound broadcasting only, although pertaining to both sound broadcasting and television.
> The correctness of the corporation's liability under the pension plan for past service of employees, reflected in the books by a final payment of $109,255, has yet to be established.
> Included as an expense of the year is a charge of $12,000 for the estimated full cost of a deferred pension in favour of the chairman, in respect of the period November, 1945, to December 31, 1951. It was indicated that the matter was still under review, but as the records now are, doubt must necessarily be entertained as to the power of the corporation
> (a) to absorb the cost without contribution by the chairman;
>
> (b) to vary the approved pension plan without the concurrence of the governor in council.
> Should it be that the action taken is in conflict with section 3(7) of the act, a situation would result which would be unsatisfactory alike to the corporation and the chairman. The matter is accordingly drawn to the notice of the board of governors.

I am sure that this is the first time that it has come to the attention of the house that the C.B.C. took upon itself the power to vote this substantial sum of money to cover the past due liability of the chairman to the pension fund and to do it apparently on a basis that involved a departure from the pension plan applicable to employees and without contribution on the part of the chairman. I suggest that when the committee is set up it should make it its business to inquire into that comment by the Auditor General.

I wish to come now to the subject of television. The minister has said something this afternoon about the importance of television. I am sure that in the world in which we live there are few influences of greater or more growing importance than television, along with radio broadcasting, in the influence they exert on the minds of the people, and particularly on the minds of the young. It is for that reason that I do not think that the house could spend time to better advantage than in carefully considering policies with respect to television.

A release by the dominion bureau of statistics on November 15, 1952, points out that between September 1949 and July 1952, 106,607 television sets were sold in Canada. I suppose that in the light of those figures it is not unfair to estimate that today in Canada there must be at least 150,000 television receiving sets, and the number is growing daily.

The development of television in Canada is years behind the stage of development attained in the United Kingdom and the United States. The reason is that the government has prevented the development of television in Canada. That is the complete reason. The government did it deliberately. We well know that applications for television channels by private applicants have been pending before the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for at least seven years. During all those years the government refused to entertain the applications. It was the policy of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, as it was the policy of the government, to prevent anyone entering the field of television.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Dog in the manger.

Mr. Fleming: It was a dog-in-the-manger attitude. They would not do it themselves in those days, and they would not let anybody else do it. It was sheer paternalism on the part of the corporation which led them to say to those who were quite prepared to take all the risks of investing their capital in the development of television in Canada, "Oh, no, we won't let you do it; we know better than you what is good for you; we won't let you do it because you may lose some money even though you might develop television."

So those precious years have passed, and it is only in recent times that the corporation has begun to develop television on its own account. The government deliberately retarded progress. Then along came the Massey report. The fact that the Massey commission was sitting for a year and a half prior to the writing of its report gave the government another excuse for delaying action.

Then the Massey commission made its report and I should like to make an observation about that report. I am sure that all members of the house have read the report with respect. In times past we have debated some of the recommendations made in that report, and some of us expressed and continue to hold a preference for the views expressed on many matters, including radio broadcasting and television, by Dr. Surveyer in his minority report. We accepted those as being the views of a man who by technical experience was better qualified to make recommendations with respect to the technique and system of broadcasting and television in Canada than the other distinguished members of the royal commission.

I wish also to make a general observation about the Massey report. No matter how much respect we may have for the members of the commission or for the views they express on subjects pertaining to Canadian culture, there is nothing in this royal commission report that is sacrosanct. It seems to be the view of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) that, if he breathes the words "royal commission", debate ceases to have any effect and whatever is found in the majority report of the Massey commission must be accepted as final. Well, Mr. Speaker, I for one am not prepared to accept it as final. I am prepared to approach such recommendations with a measure of respect, but I still reserve the right to consider those recommendations; and in this particular case I very much prefer the recommendations of the minority report by Dr. Arthur Surveyer.

Let us have a word about the cost of television in Canada, the cost of development by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. To date it has had these sums placed at its disposal: First of all, $4½ million; then another $1½ million, in 1950, and another $2 million in 1952, or a total so far of $8 million. In the face of all that we have two stations in Canada giving television service to the people of their communities. The only people who are receiving any service in Canada today from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation are people who live in Montreal and its immediate vicinity and in Toronto and its immediate vicinity. Those are the only people who so far have enjoyed any of the benefits the minister has proclaimed this afternoon.

Now, the minister has again trotted out that phrase of his, "natural monopoly", to justify the arid, sterile policy the government has been following with respect to television. I say to him that while sound broadcasting, as I indicated earlier, is far from being a natural monopoly, television broadcasting is very much farther removed from being a natural monopoly because of the effective horizon. Any television station has a very limited effective range. That range is normally about 60 miles and in some cases as far as 80 miles. How can it be said that television is a natural monopoly in Canada? It is absurd on the face of it to suggest that.

Mr. McCann: Because of limited channels.

Mr. Fleming: Limited channels, Mr. Speaker? We have great numbers of channels available for television broadcasting in Canada today, channels which are not being used. There are great numbers of them. The fact of the matter is that one channel does not preclude, as it does in the field of sound broadcasting, the enjoyment of the same channel by other television stations as long as they are removed from the effective horizons of each other. It is utter nonsense, Mr. Speaker, for the minister to suggest that we are restricted by a limitation on the number or use of channels. There are many, many channels available today for television in Canada but it is government policy to deny the present use of those channels. I am sure that United States companies operating along the border are going to feel quite at liberty to set up television stations along the border to serve Canadian communities just over the border, even though those same channels are assigned to Canada, because they are not being used today. There are, I am told, many situations of that kind.

Yes, this continued sterilization by the government of the development of television in Canada is fraught with very grave dangers for the whole future of the development of television in Canada.

Now, sir, I have said something about the government's old excuse for its wretched, dog-in-the-manger attitude, and I have spoken of the delays in the development of the C.B.C.'s television operations. When it finally made up its mind after the Massey commission wrote its report it did run into some difficulties in procuring equipment due to shortages of steel, but let us remember that those long delays occurred and the corporation was obliged to postpone its estimated date for the commencement of operations in Montreal and Toronto not once but a number of times, and for long periods. When the government is building up rosy hopes in the minds of residents of Vancouver, Winnipeg and Halifax, I would suggest to the residents of those very estimable cities—

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: —that they be not too quick to infer from these government blandishments that they are going to have television service very soon. Because if their experience is anything like the experience of the other two cities which have that service, they are likely to wait a disappointingly long time for the inauguration of the service.

Now, what of government policy today? After this long period of complete sterilization of the development of television, now the government comes forward with what was dressed up to be a new television policy. Oh, the whole country was agog while waiting for the enunciation of the new television policy! How we crowded into the Senate chamber last November 20 when the speech from the throne was read, with great expectations, Mr. Speaker, of hearing the announcement of this great, brave new television policy; and this was the dud we had to listen to:

> At the time television broadcasting was started in Toronto and Montreal in September, the Prime Minister announced that parliament would be asked to provide for the establishment of three additional public television stations, one in the maritimes, one on the prairies and one on the Pacific coast and that active consideration was being given to the role of private enterprise in television broadcasting.
> You will accordingly be asked to make provision to enable the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to establish television stations in the Halifax, Winnipeg and Vancouver areas. My ministers have indicated to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that they are now prepared to consider applications for licenses of private television broadcasting stations which may be recommended by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—

Note that, if you please, Mr. Speaker, in the face of what the minister had to say this afternoon about the hands-off attitude followed by the government.

> —to serve areas which could not be served at this time by public stations, with the objective of making television as widely available throughout the country as may be feasible through appropriate co-operation between the corporation and private agencies.

I give that quotation from a lamentable passage in the speech from the throne.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the objective is to make television as widely available throughout the country as may be feasible, this policy enunciated in the terms of the paragraph I have just read is most certainly above all other policies calculated to defeat that objective. The policy of the government today, with the further outline given to the house by the minister on December 8, is just this: that the government will take unto the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation the choicest of all cities so far as revenues are concerned and size of population, and will then, in a grandiose gesture of generosity, permit private enterprise to operate in the smaller localities where there is the least chance of those communities being able to sustain the expense of television broadcasting. They follow that up, if you please, by saying that they will not allow two stations in any one place. That is a further development, Mr. Speaker, of the policy of the C.B.C. denying service to smaller communities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: There might be a great deal to be said, Mr. Speaker, for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation extending television service to areas where, if these absurd government controls were removed, service would still not be available. Does the government need to inaugurate costly service in communities where, if the government would remove the fetters it has imposed on private enterprise, there would be plenty of broadcasting available today? No, the government is not satisfied, and is so dominated by this monopolistic mania that has directed its policies from the beginning with regard to television, that it is going to use the money of the taxpayers of this country—be it a grant or be it a loan, for this purpose it is the money of the taxpayers of this country and they must pay it—to provide broadcasting under C.B.C. auspices in communities where, if the government would remove the fetters, there would be television service under private auspices and at private risk.

There is another aspect of this arrogant and obtuse policy, and it is this. Even in those areas into which the C.B.C. has entered, they will allow no other station. In Montreal and Toronto, the government says that these areas will be permitted only one television outlet. It is absurd, Mr. Speaker, when you look at the way television has developed in cities of the United States of comparable size. But, sir, it suits the policy of this government that, because it has established one station in Montreal, it will allow nobody else to establish a station in Montreal; because it has established a C.B.C. station in Toronto, it will allow nobody else to establish a station in Toronto.

Mr. Ferrie: Good.

Mr. Fleming: Well, here is the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie), who apparently is quite content to apply that policy of monopoly—

Mr. Ferrie: That is right.

Mr. Fleming: —and I tell him that policy of monopoly is the policy that breeds regimentation, that breeds restriction in the exercise by our people of their rights as free men.

Mr. Ferrie: It breeds co-operation.

Mr. Fleming: My hon. friend's idea may be to extend the size and power of government monopoly, but I can assure him that in that respect his ideas and mine are poles apart. I see no vindication of freedom in the assertion of government monopoly, and stupid government policy at that.

I have spoken of the way in which the government has thrown to private enterprise, in these smaller communities, a bone from which the C.B.C. has stripped all nourishment and meat. The people are going to be allowed to wait for television. What does it matter to this arrogant government if the people are made to wait for television service? A government that can say, "If we want to get away with it, who will stop us?" is obviously one that would say, "If we want to get away with sterilizing the development of television in this country, who will stop us?" It may be that we in the opposition are not numerically strong enough to stop them in this obtuse and wicked policy which they are following today. However, there is a day of reckoning ahead, and there is one sovereign force that can stop this government that thinks it can get away with anything it chooses. That sovereign force is the public at the ballot box. There is a day of reckoning ahead, Mr. Speaker.

I have one or two observations to make on two immediate aspects of this matter of television, Mr. Speaker. I did note that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), in the tour he made of the west last September, was quick to speak of the way in which a new station was going to be set up in Vancouver. But it is worth recalling the following further report from Vancouver on September 3 as follows:

> Mr. St. Laurent would not say how big a licence fee would be charged television set owners or even, in fact, whether the operation will be financed on a licence fee basis. But he made it clear that nothing would be payable until after the end of the government's budget year on March 31.
> "How the payment for these services should be made is a question which is still under consideration", he said. "The government is, however, of the view that the remaining months of this fiscal year should be regarded as an experimental period in which experience will be gained in the handling of this new national service."

I do not profess to be a prophet, but I observe with some interest the date that the Prime Minister selected as the date before which there would be no licence fee imposed on television sets. I am just sufficiently familiar with the tactics of this government in previous years and in previous elections to be willing to hazard a guess that unless the government is driven by fear into postponing the election for a very long time—

Mr. Cruickshank: Sit down.

Mr. Fleming: —a licence fee for television receiving sets will not be established in the lifetime of the present parliament. It will be left until after the election, and it will be one of the many problems left on the doorstep of the incoming Progressive Conservative administration.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: Let us look a little more closely into this subject, because the following day in Ottawa the chairman of the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was interrogated on this subject. Reference was made during the interrogation to the statement made by the Prime Minister in Vancouver the previous day, that parliament would be asked at the next session to authorize a loan to the C.B.C. for the construction of television stations on both coasts and the prairies. Let us bear this in mind when the government seeks to spur the appetites of those communities that do hope to receive television.

> Today, A. D. Dunton, C.B.C. chairman, said it is difficult to forecast how long it will take to bring the stations into operation. It may be one year or two years from this fall.

When we hear the Minister of National Revenue today conjuring up hopes that the people of Vancouver are going to have television service before the end of 1953, and bearing in mind that in all likelihood we are going to have a general election in 1953, for my part I prefer to accept the informed prediction of the chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as to when this service will be available in these communities, Vancouver, Halifax and Winnipeg. I note that he says it will be a year or two from the fall of 1952.

Then, sir, on this subject of development, I wish to mention what was said by the National Liberal Federation at its meeting three months ago. In a report by the Canadian Press from Ottawa on October 28, we read this:

> On the heels of its request yesterday for the abolition of radio licence fees, the 235-member council today asked for "the development of television in Canada by private enterprise along with the C.B.C."

The report also proceeds to say that "this resolution was adopted, according to delegates in the closed meeting, over the objections of revenue minister McCann". If the minister was not there in person, certainly his views were well understood. There you have a clear expression of opinion that is more closely related to the feelings of the people of this country than is the government today.

Now, sir, how good and how popular is the television service that the C.B.C. is providing in the two centres in which it is operating today at public expense? I have before me, sir, the reports of the Elliott-Haynes survey, a recognized survey which gives in parallel columns the degree of listener interest shown in the Toronto area by those listening to television programs over the C.B.C. as well as those over the private station which is available to Torontonians, WBEN-TV, from Buffalo. These are the results of listener interest according to this survey in September:

	CBLT	WBEN-TV
September	36·0	64·0
October	22·2	77·8
November	25·9	74·1
December	22·9	77·1

You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that the people who have television receiving sets in the Toronto area prefer, in the proportion of seven to two, the programs they receive over the Buffalo stations to those available over the C.B.C. television station in Toronto. Will you also observe, Mr. Speaker, that the popularity of the C.B.C. station is not rising. It started out in September at 36 per cent; by December it had gone down to 22·9 per cent.

Mr. Cruickshank: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, and I want to be corrected if I am wrong. When discussing this new item of television, are you allowed to speak for an hour and twenty minutes?

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) is not allowed to do so but the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) is.

Mr. Cruickshank: I want a ruling, Mr. Speaker. Are you or are you not allowed to speak for an hour and twenty minutes?

[Mr. Fleming.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): I think the hon. member will find that, under standing order 37, the hon. member who has the floor is not limited to the usual forty minutes.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Fraser Valley is not enjoying what I have to say, I do not insist that he stay in the house. I will say this to him, however, since he is speaking about the length of speeches. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) confided in me this morning that he was going to speak about ten minutes; then he talked for about fifty-four minutes.

Mr. Cruickshank: But he is a minister; the hon. member is not.

Mr. Fleming: Oh, I see. Isn't that lovely? This totalitarian complex has affected even the hon. member for Fraser Valley.

Mr. Cruickshank: I want an answer to my question.

Mr. Fleming: However, I shall press on.

Mr. McCann: Why does the hon. member not be fair? I said that I would be ten minutes and I spoke for forty minutes.

Mr. Fleming: Fifty-four by my count. I have another interesting report to which I wish to refer. It is the Gallup poll of public opinion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: I am not sorry to see that the hon. member for Fraser Valley has taken his stormy departure from the chamber.

Mr. Laing: If two more leave, we shall have to adjourn.

Mr. Fleming: I wish to refer to this Gallup poll. I may say that I do not repose any unquestioning faith in Gallup polls; I do not say that they are infallible or that they are always right by any means, but I am interested in this particular one. It was issued on November 22, 1952, and it polls public opinion on this question:

> As you probably know, at the present time, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (C.B.C.) has complete control of television programs and broadcasting in Canada. Do you think private stations should be allowed to broadcast television programs, or should it be left to the C.B.C.

Here is the vote:

	Per cent
Private stations should be allowed	57
Should be left with C.B.C.	24
Qualified opinion	3
No opinion	16

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, you clearly see that on the part of those who were prepared to express a clear-cut opinion on this subject, 57 out of every 81 said they wanted private development of television.

An hon. Member: Is that in Ontario?

Mr. Fleming: No, that is a national poll.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make reference to a point which has been made by the minister about what has been done by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in the development of Canadian talent; and so far as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation are developing Canadian talent they will certainly have my support in so doing. But I say, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is not encouraging the development of Canadian talent when it stifles the development of television in the way it has been doing. Lest anyone should think that the minister could by any chance be right in pretending that radio artists support this exclusive and monopolistic policy of the C.B.C. and the government, I read this press release of a statement issued by the agent of the American federation of radio artists, A.F.L., at Windsor on July 6. It states:

> Canadian radio artists cannot fail to be concerned by the statement attributed to revenue minister McCann on Friday, in which he was reported to have told the House of Commons that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation will not license privately-owned television stations until it has stations of its own operating in every province of Canada.
> This will have the effect of depriving Canadian talent in most regions of all opportunities of gaining experience and a livelihood in this new medium.
>
> It means, furthermore, that for years to come, any Canadian performer will be entirely at the mercy of the C.B.C. as to whether he appears in television at all, for if the C.B.C. is unable to employ him, or worse still, if he incurs its disapprobation, he will be deprived of any other outlet for his talents. Should this view appear too pessimistic, it must be regarded in the light of experience with Canadian radio and the C.B.C.
>
> Since the establishment of publicly-owned radio in Canada in 1932 under the C.B.C.'s predecessor, the Canadian Radio Commission, it has taken twenty years for the system to achieve relatively complete coverage of the country as a whole, with the means at its disposal.
>
> If the extension of television service is to be similarly delayed, and private stations afforded no opportunity of entering the field, it may be assumed that many of today's radio performers will be lucky if their grandchildren see them on television.
>
> Since it has been indicated that the C.B.C. will afford the advertising agencies less latitude than exists in radio in producing and presumably in casting their sponsors' programs, the preservation of a monopoly in the hands of one body for perhaps twenty years will further deprive the art of the benefits of healthy competition.
>
> When we are forced to rely on distilleries for the encouragement of Canadian theatre, it appears strange that the enormously greater costs of television are expected to be met from the public purse when there are others willing and ready to assume the burden. We are already six years behind on this continent, and twelve years behind Great Britain where, it is interesting to note, parliament has approved the eventual entry into television of private enterprise, after thirty years of state monopoly in sound and television broadcasting.

This is my final observation, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: Five o'clock.

Mr. Fleming: Notwithstanding what the Massey commission said, we now know that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has entered into contracts and arrangements by microwave relay to put United States programs of both the National Broadcasting Company and the Columbia Broadcasting System over the facilities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The Massey royal commission recommended that we have our own development of Canadian talent on Canadian programs. What has become of the Massey report now?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order. It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of public and private bills.

FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES

PROVISION AGAINST DISCRIMINATION ON ACCOUNT OF RACE, CREED OR COLOUR—BILL WITHDRAWN

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 4, an act to promote fair employment practices in Canada.—Mrs. Fairclough.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members are aware, this bill in substantially the same form has been on the order paper for several sessions and unfortunately has not, until this session, reached the stage of second reading at an opportune time.

I might say that at the beginning of the present session I was both surprised and pleased to hear, in the speech from the throne, that it was the intention of the government to introduce a similar piece of legislation. That bill now appears on the order paper as Bill No. 100. I have examined Bill No. 100; and since it covers substantially the same ground as that covered by Bill No. 4, in so far as I was able to discover, it is my opinion that no good purpose would be served by proceeding at the present time with Bill No. 4. I therefore beg leave to withdraw Bill No. 4.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): May I acknowledge the graceful withdrawal on the part of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) of Bill No. 4, to make way for Bill No. 100 now on the order paper in my name. I would also like to express the hope that Bill No. 100 either does or can be made to meet her wishes in this matter.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Has the hon. member leave to withdraw the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 54, STATUTES OF 1947-48—VOLUNTARY REVOCABLE CHECK-OFF OF UNION DUES

The house resumed, from Friday, January 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles for the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (voluntary revocable check-off).

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, when the consideration of this bill was last before the house I had begun a few remarks in relation to it. When the debate adjourned I had been referring to this legislation and to the history of the consideration of similar bills in this house. I had pointed out that it was my view, and a view shared by many hon. members, that a subject matter of this kind was something that should be left to the process of collective bargaining. I had pointed out that my main concern with regard to this matter was as it affected the employees of our two great national railway systems, and the steps I had taken in an attempt to do what I could to see that both parties concerned, management and labour in this particular industry, considered their positions with respect to the check-off from that point of view rather than to await or expect any legislative action on the part of this parliament to deal with it.

In his very complete and excellent speech on this matter the last day the house considered it, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Cote) referred to the recent settlement of differences between the railway management and the non-operating employees, and the new contract which had been entered into between the railways and the unions representing those classifications of their employees; and he pointed out that as one of the terms of this recent agreement the employees had been granted a form of union security, the check-off, on what I believe to be a very much more favourable and more satisfactory basis than would be provided under the provisions of the enactment which is before the house this afternoon and which in virtually identical form has been before this house in previous sessions.

I believe that the conclusion of this agreement between the railways and the unions representing their non-operating employees is a vindication of the position that has been taken in this matter by the Minister of Labour and by hon. members who have indicated views similar to those expressed by him and by the parliamentary assistant. It is certainly a vindication of the position of a former minister of labour, the late Humphrey Mitchell. I remember very well the excellent way in which the late Mr. Mitchell, when he was responsible for the Department of Labour, dealt with matters of this kind, not only in this house but in the committee which during 1947 and 1948 considered with such care the provisions of the national labour code which was enacted into law by this house in 1948. I know we all enjoyed the rather rare but always interesting contributions that Humphrey Mitchell used to make to the debates in this house. He spoke very forcefully indeed on a measure similar to this one on several occasions during my time here in parliament.

It must be obvious to all who are interested in and understand the labour movement that the position he took in those days has certainly been vindicated by the events of this year which were referred to in his speech the other evening by the parliamentary assistant. It is a vindication also, I believe, of the attitude that has been taken in this house and expressed on a number of occasions by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald), who I think has as much personal experience in labour matters as any hon. member.

The hon. member for Edmonton East has expressed his views on this particular proposal on several occasions. I was delighted to know that when speaking earlier in this debate he was able to point out how satisfied he was with the kind of union security which he had hoped for, and for which he had worked, and which he urged had been brought about by the process of collective bargaining. He expressed his satisfaction that this house had never fallen into what he considered would have been the error and which I consider would be the error of legislating into effect a form of union check-off which would not give the kind of security desired by him, by other hon. members and by other people who believe in the value and the strength and the service of labour unions, the kind of union security to which they are entitled and for which they should work.

I think that position, the position of the hon. member for Edmonton East, the position of the late Humphrey Mitchell, the position of the present Minister of Labour, the position of the parliamentary assistant and others, which has been so clearly stated in the house, is the correct one, and it is the position which I believe receives the support of a very large majority of the members of unions who will be affected by legislation of this kind.

The late Humphrey Mitchell always used to say that what governments can give governments can take away, and he did not want to see essential elements of working conditions, conditions of labour and all that sort of thing, which he regarded as matters for collective bargaining, brought into the realm of the kind of thing about which we legislate in parliament.

I support that view. That is the reason for the stand I have expressed on many occasions in the house, and which I repeat today. I think the probabilities are—and I would hope this would occur—that the step taken to establish the Rand formula check-off for the non-operating unions of the railways will gradually be extended and adopted in respect of other employees who would be affected by this legislation. I should think that, in that event, the end result would be much more favourable, both from the point of view of labour and of management, in all the industries which come under the provisions of our national labour code.

In referring to the national labour code I think I should draw attention to the interesting and, I think, valuable suggestion made by the parliamentary assistant in his speech on this bill, to which I have already referred. He suggested that as the labour code was enacted into law by parliament in 1948, and a period of five years from that time will have elapsed shortly, consideration should be given to having the legislation referred to the committee on industrial relations at some early date so the committee could study the legislation in the light of the five years of experience we have had and management and labour have had in the working of that labour code.

Mr. Knowles: Would that be before or after the election?

Mr. Dickey: Perhaps the hon. member has more information than I have about future events of that kind. However, I do not think our views on whether or not this is a valuable suggestion would depend upon the intervention of an election. I should think most members would be prepared to consider that proposal as one which could be brought into effect at an appropriate time, whether or not there should be an election in the meantime.

My only purpose in calling it to the attention of the house is to record my support of that suggestion, and I would hope that other hon. members who may take part in the debate would indicate whether they think this suggestion merits consideration or otherwise. It appears to me that the committee on industrial relations is the proper one to deal with matters of this kind; and a reference of the labour code to the committee, with proper publicity and some warning, would give all interested parties an opportunity to prepare submissions which could be placed before the committee. In this way a thorough and complete study could be made of the legislation as it stands on the statute books, and an investigation could be made as to the way in which it has operated. I am sure we would receive very valuable suggestions which we could use as an indication of amendments which might be made to improve or to expand the present provisions.

The proposal of the hon. member who sponsors the bill is, as has been pointed out, one which amounts to an ad hoc amendment of the labour code, in a way which obviously would not be in accord with the general scheme and principle of the legislation.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), who immediately preceded me in the debate, as I understood him attempted to make the point that the opening sections of the labour code do, in fact, dictate to both management and labour what must be done and that, in effect, these sections are achieving the same kind of imposition of procedures on both management and labour as would flow from our putting into legislative form a proposal for the check-off, or some other form of union security.

I would point out to the hon. member that in my view there is a very wide difference between the provisions of legislation which creates the necessary machinery for two parties to come together to bargain on matters of common interest, and any attempt by a legislature or any other authority to dictate the terms of an agreement which would be entered into between those parties, using that particular mechanism. It is just as if our general law, which provides for the enforceability of contracts, were to be amended to require that a certain provision be a part of every contract in order that it might be enforceable.

There is a great difference between the setting up of machinery by the appropriate government authority to do certain things, and the imposition by a government authority of certain things that must be done through that machinery. It is for that reason that I think this proposal is contrary to the underlying principle of our labour code, and that we should not amend the labour code in this regard without considering the whole basis of our legislation and, if necessary, making appropriate changes in its principle to permit us properly to adopt suggestions of this kind.

That is the sort of study that I think the committee could give to this legislation. I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will be a member of that committee, and that his advice and arguments will be of great assistance to the committee in coming to a conclusion. I see that the hon. member wishes to ask a question.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, if the hon. member will permit me to do so. I was going to ask the question which I think I usually ask at this point in this speech, but there is a little variation in the hon. member's remarks, so I shall change my question. In view of the hon. member's suggestion that this is a matter that might well be considered by the industrial relations committee, why not let that committee give consideration to this measure at this session? After all, it is a standing committee. The hon. member has said that I may be a member of that committee; I am a member of it, and I know it has not met for quite a while. Why not give this bill second reading and let it be referred to that committee so it can be considered at this session?

Mr. Dickey: The suggestion made by the parliamentary assistant was that this course be considered, and I am sure it will be considered. It is not my responsibility nor that of the hon. member to decide whether or not it is possible to do it at this session or whether it should be left over for another session.

Mr. Knowles: What stands in the way?

Mr. Dickey: As I pointed out to the hon. member, that is not our decision. I know, as he knows, that there is a pretty heavy program of work for both standing and special committees at this session. I would think it would be a matter of some difficulty to fit in another important committee. I think this is a matter of great importance. If it is to be considered at all, it should be done in such a way that everyone who wishes to make representations to the committee will have the opportunity to do so. I think it would be somewhat difficult to expect that members of the general public or interested bodies would be in position, without having more warning than could be given at this stage, to make the kind of representation they would like to make, not just on this small matter, but on the whole working of our labour code and its record of performance from the experience that we have had. Another point is that perhaps we are a little premature. The five years will not be up until September. When that five-year period has run its course I think could be the proper time to consider this matter in some detail.

I might point out that that was one of the recommendations made by the late Humphrey Mitchell when speaking either on a similar bill at a previous session or on some other proposed amendment to the labour code. He said he hoped that after we had five years' experience with this legislation there would be an opportunity for a thorough consideration by the committee.

The purpose I had in mind in rising was, first of all, to express my great satisfaction at the outcome of the negotiations which resulted in the establishment of the Rand formula check-off in connection with the non-operating employees of the railroads by means of collective bargaining rather than by legislation, and to reiterate what I think are the specific reasons why we should not at this time approve of the bill presented by the hon. member. That is why I for one will once again express my opposition to it.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if the hon. member would permit one more question before he sits down. Before he points it out himself, may I say it is the same question I have asked him in previous sessions, only at a different place in his speech. If this is a principle which he cannot accept in connection with the federal labour code, why is it that it seems to be a perfectly proper principle for a number of provincial labour codes, including the labour code of his own province of Nova Scotia?

Mr. Dickey: As I have pointed out to the hon. member, I think some of the provincial labour codes proceed on quite a different principle than that adopted in the national labour code. I think the argument suggested by the hon. member's question is the kind of argument that should be presented to the industrial relations committee, if and when we get a chance to reconsider this whole matter.

Mr. Knowles: Are you not going in a circle now?

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to prolong the debate on this matter because I have spoken on this question several times. This is not the first time this bill has come before the house. I should say that on each occasion it has come before us we have supported it for a number of obvious reasons which I shall give in a few minutes.

It has been said by speakers on the government side of the house that the proper way to deal with a bill of this kind is to refer it to the industrial relations committee. I recall back in 1948 that this very question came up before the committee. Of course I realize that the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) was not minister at that time, the minister then being the late Hon. Humphrey Mitchell.

This question has been given lengthy consideration in the committee on a number of occasions. I remember it was given a thorough going over in the industrial relations committee in 1948, and the committee voted in favour of having a voluntary revocable check-off provision included in the legislation. When the bill was reported back to the house it was the then minister of labour who caused that provision to be rescinded. If the same attitude is to be taken when the committee is next set up as was taken at that time, no good purpose can be served in even having it referred to the committee. The attitude of the government, as it has been presented to us during this debate, does not seem to have changed from what it was at that time.

I cannot understand why there should be so much government objection to having a voluntary revocable check-off provision in our labour code. The compulsory check-off is included in the legislation in Alberta having to do with our teachers. To my knowledge there has never been any objection either from teachers' organizations, from school boards or from anyone else about that legislation. I understand that similar legislation has worked quite satisfactorily in Saskatchewan.

I think I am safe in saying that all of the mining contracts in Alberta contain a voluntary revocable check-off provision. It is true that that is not by legislation but by negotiation, but the provision is there just the same and there has been no complaint in that regard. I feel quite sure there would be no complaint in connection with the mining contracts if that provision were in the legislation. Both types, the compulsory check-off and the voluntary check-off, are working there, and certainly no objection has ever been raised.

It is all very well to say that this should be done by negotiation. The government has pointed to the new contract which was entered into on December 19 between the non-operating employees and the railroads as indicating the method that should be followed. Mr. Speaker, as I well remember when I was teaching in the province of Alberta, there were a very small number of us who continued to pay our fees to the Alberta teachers' organization. A great many of those people who were teaching—and this applies to all types of labour—would only pay their dues when they found themselves in need of assistance from the association. That point should be remembered.

Anyone who has had anything to do with labour organizations, be they teachers or miners, knows that you just cannot carry on an organization without proper financial assistance. The railways say: Well, it should be a matter of negotiation and the unions should collect their own fees; but, mind you, the railways themselves are in a very preferred position when it comes to getting their financial revenue. They even have the interest on their investment guaranteed by legislation. They should be the last people in the world to object to the voluntary revocable check-off. Their profits are guaranteed by legislation. Every time there comes a raise in pay they just come back to the government and say, "Well, this is it. You will have to give us higher freight rates in order to meet these obligations."

It is most difficult indeed for any workers' organizations to carry on unless they have a very definite means of getting financial assistance. There is no doubt in anyone's mind that the labour organizations have given in the past and are now giving a service to their members which has resulted in raising their standard of living very materially. It is they who have improved the working conditions of working people in this country more than any other type of organization. Everyone acknowledges that, and these unions can only function if they have some means of raising the necessary funds to carry on. They have found by experience that it is most difficult to carry on in the manner in which the government would have them carry on.

As I said a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to talk this thing out. I have no objection whatever to its being referred to a committee, though I am a little bit dubious about what action will be taken on it there, when I well know that a majority of members on the committee will be Liberal members who favour the government's stand on this question. However, I suppose it is the proper place for it to be referred; therefore I am not taking any more time except to say that I am in favour of it, and if it should come to a vote, I shall vote in favour of the bill.

(Translation):

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of making my maiden speech tonight, and I hope that you will not consider the few opinions I am about to express as being my maiden speech in this house.

(Text):

I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that I hope no one will take these few remarks as being my maiden speech. However, industrial relations is a question that does interest me particularly. I think it is a rather important subject, and I would like to voice a few of my opinions.

I do not believe that anyone has really been opposed to the voluntary revocable check-off proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). There is nothing radically wrong with the principle, and no one on this side of the house objects to it. However, there can be some question about its efficiency. As the hon. member himself has stated, this particular principle of the voluntary revocable check-off does exist in most of the provinces. As it is applied in practically all industries where unions are authorized by their respective labour commissioners, I do not believe that anything would be added by having federal legislation on the subject. As the hon. member says, the motion can do no more than give a minimum amount of union security, so the purpose of the motion itself would not avail a great deal for union security of which everyone is in favour. The particular principle already exists in the different provinces and is applied in practically all the large industries of the provinces.

There is one other question which to my mind is rather important, and it is a question of policy. I have not been here sufficiently long to know what the exact policy of the government is on this subject but I personally feel that the federal legislature, as a matter of principle, should keep out of business and industry as much as it possibly can. I am not alone in saying this. If you will permit me, I would like to read some pertinent remarks that I have taken from the Montreal Gazette of January 21, 1953, entitled "Hands off Industry—Chamber".

Canada's businessmen today asked the federal government to keep its fingers out of industry as much as possible.

Further down it says that:

—in Canada the relationship between business and government is something unique in the world, valuable and worth keeping.

To maintain this relationship business should refrain from looking to the government for solution of its problems and difficulties—

I believe there is much in that statement. I believe it is a fundamental principle, and that we could condense it by saying that when trouble arises between unions and employers it should be settled between themselves if at all possible. Afterward, if the parties cannot come to any agreement, the most natural person or organization that should be consulted or that should intervene is the provincial government. That has been done. In most labour codes they have the subject matter of today's discussion, a section regarding the voluntary revocable check-off. It is the parties I have mentioned, to my mind, whose duty it should be to solve the problems of industry in the different provinces. There they know more of the problems of the particular industry than the federal government knows.

That is what I have to offer by way of comment on this motion. I believe that, as a matter of policy, the federal government should only in case of absolute necessity, but not as a general practice or policy, invade the field of industry, which to my mind should be left under the control of the provincial governments. May I say that since the voluntary revocable check-off exists in the provinces; since it applies to most industries throughout Canada; since it can give only a minimum amount of union security, then I do not see any point in passing this bill. I feel that I should vote against such a measure.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin), who has just taken his seat, put his finger on the crux of this situation. He has pointed out that many of the provinces have provided for the voluntary revocable check-off in industries over which the provinces have jurisdiction. The federal labour code applies to those industries which are interprovincial in character, and therefore do not come within the legislative competence of the provincial governments. The people who are employed in those industries, such as communications and so forth, are therefore a group of people who might be termed second-class citizens, because of the fact that they do not come under provincial jurisdiction, and because of the fact that their unions have to deal on a national basis for many of their benefits.

Now, I believe the most important reason for the voluntary revocable check-off is that it does bring the employer and employee together on a basis of recognition. While forcing the employer to give recognition to the union, after a time it removes the feeling of animosity that existed before this measure of security was obtained. When an employee makes an assignment of his wages for any other purpose, it has been honoured by the employer. In the case of income tax collections for the federal government it is not even necessary to make a written assignment of your wages. The assignment of a portion of an employee's wages each month for the payment of bonds has been accepted as a good policy. Deductions are made for other purposes, such as housing loans and welfare societies; and in cases where employees band together for the purpose of insuring their health, they may have the premiums deducted from their wages. When an employer refuses to honour a written assignment for another body, an organization just as important as the employer organization, then it necessarily causes a feeling of resentment and does not act in the best interests of labour relations. Some employers refuse to accept this principle, yet in the provinces where the principle has been accepted we find the very best of labour relations and the unions enjoy some measure of security.

I would say to the house that there is a very limited amount of compulsion in the voluntary revocable check-off. I should like to read into the record a section of an agreement which is in force between the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company and local 651 of the international union of mine, mill and smelter workers. I should like to quote section B of article 21, but before doing so perhaps I should quote section A:

> The company shall honour a written assignment of wages to the union.

As I pointed out before, that gives a measure of recognition and leads to harmony between the company and the employees. The company honours other assignments, so it agrees to honour an assignment of wages for union purposes.

Section B reads as follows:

> An assignment pursuant to section A shall be substantially in the following form:
>
> To The Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada Limited.
> Until this authority is revoked by me in writing, I hereby authorize you to deduct from my wages and pay to local 651 of the international union of mine, mill and smelter workers fees in the amounts following.

That is the assignment which, under this legislation, would require an employer to deduct union dues. For those who maintain that there would be less compulsion if this matter were left entirely to negotiation between the company and the employees, I should like to read a quotation concerning union security by Chief Justice Sloan. I understand that the union had asked for a union shop, and the matter was referred to a mediation committee headed by Gordon Sloan, Chief Justice of British Columbia. As a consequence of the decision of that committee, the following article now appears in this agreement from which I have quoted:

> The company shall during the life of this agreement deduct, as a condition of each employee's continued employment, the sum of $2 from the first pay cheque due in each calendar month to each such employee and remit the same prior to the tenth day of the month following the month in which such deduction is made, to the financial secretary of the union. The company will, at the time of making each such payment to the financial secretary of the union, name the employees from whose pay such payment has been deducted.

This has become known as the Sloan formula, and is very similar to the Rand formula which has been adopted in some industries in Ontario. I simply wanted to point out the difference between this voluntary revocable check-off and other forms of union security. In common with many other Liberal members, perhaps all the Liberal members from British Columbia, I believe that this legislation will be a benefit to those in industries affected by it, and that it should pass at this time.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to say a few words on this matter but I do not think I could complete what I have to say by six o'clock. May we call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The time for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume, at eight o'clock, consideration of the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

BROADCASTING

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McCann that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

> That a select committee be appointed on broadcasting to consider the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to review the policies and aims of the corporation and its regulations, revenues, expenditures and development with power to examine and inquire into the matters and things herein referred to and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, and to send for persons, papers and records; that the committee have power to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable or necessary; that the committee have power to meet while the house is sitting; that the committee shall consist of the following members: Messrs. Beaudry, Boisvert, Breton, Carter, Courtemanche, Decore, Diefenbaker, Dinsdale, Fleming, Fulton, Gauthier (Portneuf), Gauthier (Sudbury), Hansell, Henry, Jones,

Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth), Knight, MacLean (Queens), McCann, Murray (Cariboo), Mutch, Richard (Ottawa East), Riley, Robinson, Smith (Moose Mountain), and Whitman. That standing orders 64 and 65 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, may I have your indulgence for a moment. Matters have arisen during the dinner recess which make it desirable that those of my colleagues and I who can be out of the house, without interfering with the business here, do give those matters consideration. I apologize to our colleagues in the house for our absenting ourselves, but I am sure there will be a full quorum.

Mr. Low: We will take care of it.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) had been deploring the monopolistic position of the C.B.C. vis-à-vis the private radio stations in Canada. We of course cannot agree with the hon. member for Eglinton in that regard. As to the report of the royal commission, we find ourselves in agreement with it rather than opposed to it.

In the matter of the private stations I think our view would be expressed by that report at page 283, where it says:

> The principal grievance of the private broadcasters is based, it seems to us, on a false assumption that broadcasting in Canada is an industry. Broadcasting in Canada, in our view, is a public service directed and controlled in the public interest by a body responsible to parliament.

I would suggest, sir, that the C.B.C. is not a competitor, in the ordinary sense in which that word is used, of the private radio stations. It is not just one rival amidst a group of rivals. At page 284 the report of the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences has this to say, which expresses our view:

> The statement that the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is at once their judge and their business rival implies a view of the national system which has no foundation in law, and which has never been accepted by parliamentary committees or by the general public.

The broadcasting set-up that we have in Canada was established, as hon. members know, by the government of the late R. B. Bennett in the following terms as reported at page 2826 of Hansard of 1932:

> That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the constitution of a commission to be known as the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission, for the purpose of acquiring, operating, regulating and controlling radio broadcasting in Canada.

Then there is the idea of an independent regulating authority to which the private stations would appeal if they found it necessary, presumably against decisions taken in regard to them by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation itself. I am afraid we cannot even go as far as that, because that again would do the very thing which it has been suggested in the quotations I have read should not be done, namely bring the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation down to the level of those private stations. By that action you would destroy the possibility of public radio doing a good job for the people of Canada. You would bring down to the level where it would be merely the commercial rival of the private stations, a corporation which, according to the purpose of the act passed and the resolution which I have read, was to have as one of its functions the actual control of radio broadcasting in Canada. You will notice that I did not use the term "public ownership". I said "public control" because as I see it the private stations have a very distinct and useful function in radio broadcasting in Canada, but that I shall develop in a minute or two.

The result of the setting up of such a regulatory body would change the whole function of the C.B.C. You would then have the picture of the C.B.C., which functions as a regulatory body according to the act, being in the position where it would have to compete for business with the private stations, and by so doing and by that concession to commercialism, as I see it, there would be a consequent and growing inferiority in the matter of programs.

We welcome the setting up of such a committee as is envisaged in the present resolution, in which we may review the work and activities of the C.B.C. We think it is a democratic process to have a corporation of this kind whose actions can be scrutinized year by year by the elected representatives of the people.

In the name of my party I would reiterate our position in the matter of public control of that body. As they were meant to do, and in conformity with their proper function, private stations have given good service in various places across Canada. I think there is a place for them, particularly in a country as widespread and as far-flung as Canada. But we must not forget that the privileges private stations have enjoyed have not been given to them as of right but, as it were, as an act of grace; and they must not presume upon that fact. They are not rights at all, in terms of the broadcasting set-up, but rather strength which they have accumulated by that act of grace on the part of the Canadian people.

Our friends in the private radio stations talk a good deal about freedom of speech. I would imagine that all hon. members would favour that. But in commercial broadcasting, by the very nature of things work is done for private profit. Most of the time allotted by these stations has to do with the making of money, and that is perfectly all right for a private station. The general result, however, is—and I believe I am correct when I say "is" —certainly the general result would be, under the set-up as they see it, too great an allotment of commercial time, with a resulting disadvantage along other lines.

Surely there must be some equitable division of time allotted for political broadcasts. That is to say, there should be an allotment of time which would not be dependent upon the possession of money, or the lack of it, as might well be the case in respect of some political parties. Under a system of public control surely we would expect a situation wherein all public opinion would be represented; and we would see to it—as indeed we are seeing to it—that in broadcasts there would be represented all shades of opinion, and that these opinions might be aired with justice and equity. Both sides of any question would be heard.

I suggest that if there is a purely commercial set-up it is only natural and human that those who have the most money to buy radio time would have the greater use of radio. On the other hand those who had not the money would not be able to avail themselves of radio time. That would be the ultimate conclusion under a broadcasting system controlled completely and totally by private hands rather than in the public interest or, as we have it today, under mixed public and private control.

In the middle west programs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation are very popular indeed. I can speak, of course, more particularly of that part of the west from which I come. Programs such as "Farm Forum", the Wednesday night program, and others are received with great favour. We know there is some criticism of the C.B.C. I have never known anything worth while against which there was not a good deal of criticism. This would apply not only to an organization but also to a man in public life.

I realize there is some criticism of the C.B.C. as an agency under public control. We suggest, however, that much of that criticism is the result of propaganda—very efficient propaganda—carried on by those who would profit by a lessening of that control.

I am glad the C.B.C. gives opportunity for the development of local talent in the arts of music and literature. I believe I would be expected to say that in my part of Canada there is a gap in the C.B.C. service, and I refer to the area in the heart of Saskatchewan. I welcome the setting up of the committee because it provides an opportunity to question officials of the C.B.C. as to when they are going to bring to the prairies the production studio we have been promised. We have been told by those who plan such things for the C.B.C. that this matter has first priority. I shall carry my representations a little further and say that my own city of Saskatoon would be the ideal location for such a production unit. I shall not develop this point at greater length, because it was not my purpose in rising this evening to do so. Let me point out briefly, however, that geographically Saskatoon is in the centre of the province, it is the centre of culture in the province and is the seat of the provincial university.

But enough about local matters. Let us pass on for a moment to television. When compared with radio, television has even greater powers for good or evil, if I may so describe those powers. Because the television channels are much less numerous I should think that public control would be even more essential.

As one who has interested himself in educational matters, and particularly the guidance of young people, I have been interested in statistics from the United States which show the number of hours that children in that country, either with or without their parents' consent, spend watching television. Let me say at once that if our television programs are not a good deal better than some I have seen in the United States, or coming from that country, so far as the youth of our country are concerned we would be better without it.

This does not mean that we are not able to build good programs. On the contrary it seems to me that it is simply a matter of taste, and of control by people in charge who will give us the kind of programs we want. I suggest that no group of people are better qualified to give that control than are the people's representatives in the House of Commons.

Let me compare programs from the United States with those I have seen in Great Britain. Let me admit at once that I did not see many over there, but I did see some. I have in mind particularly the programs in Great Britain televised for the young people of that country. In my opinion those programs were excellent both in their educational and entertainment values. They have a wide variety and I do not suggest for one moment that they should be Sunday school classes.

Despite what has been said by previous speakers, I am glad that this is one publicly-owned corporation which has been given a chance. I am glad that the corporation is going into parts of Canada where television can be successful. In the past when the government has favoured public ownership of this sort at times, it has gone in and taken over where private enterprise has failed or has attempted to operate in parts of the country where it was impossible for either public or private enterprise to make good. But here is a publicly-owned corporation in which we are all interested that is being properly looked after and given a chance to be a success.

The radio licence fee has been mentioned by others, and perhaps I should say a word about it. I think the general view throughout the country is that there should be no licence fee as such. It is a costly matter to collect and is a nuisance. I believe there are still certain black-out areas in Canada, for example in central British Columbia, where the people would not be getting value for their money if they had to pay a fee. I have no doubt that through the good work of the technicians of the C.B.C. these areas are becoming fewer in number, but I believe some still exist. I would not wonder if the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) had something to say about this as he has on other occasions.

I do not think this radio fee is any longer an issue. If an election is in sight I predict that our Liberal friends will do away with this particular nuisance tax before going to the country. I will close with these words in order to let someone else take up the subject.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, we in this corner of the house are happy to support the motion for the setting up this year of a radio committee. In fact in previous times we have advocated that this should be a standing committee.

I should like to say a few words in reply to the minister who spoke this afternoon. For the most part we agree with many of the observations which the minister made. In this connection may I say that we are not opponents of the C.B.C. in the sense of opposing the corporation. We like to be fair in all things. I am not going to stand here this evening and rip the C.B.C. to pieces, and I certainly am not desirous of bringing this matter into the general political arena.

We believe that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has a very important place in radio in Canada. We do not oppose the C.B.C., but we do oppose certain radio policies which have been written into the laws of this country. We maintain that it is the law of the country affecting radio policies that needs to be changed. We believe that the C.B.C., being in a competitive radio field, should not have powers of regulation and control.

This afternoon the minister stated that many people and many powerful organizations in Canada had sent in resolutions of commendation of the present radio policy and the work of the C.B.C. As far as commendation of the corporation is concerned, perhaps that is all to the good. The minister told us also that there was some criticism, and that too is to the good. I do not think even the C.B.C. would say that criticism was not sometimes good. However, there is a difference between criticism of radio policy that might be levelled at the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and what might be levelled at independent sponsors of radio.

Criticism levelled at an independent sponsor indicates to that sponsor that he must be ready to adjust his program, or else. That is not necessarily so when criticism is levelled at the government-owned and subsidized corporation. It does not necessarily have to pay a great deal of attention to such criticism because after all the life of the corporation is dependent to a large extent upon the public treasury. That difference in respect to criticism I think should be noted.

There is another thing I should like to say in respect to the minister's observations this afternoon. He had a good deal to say about the virtues of broadcasting, but I would remind him that much of what he said, which I suppose he intended to apply to the corporation, could be said about broadcasting in the independent field of radio. Those virtues can be applied to all radio; they are not confined to the publicly-owned Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

I do wish to say a word about what I consider to be the proposed tightening up of regulations affecting independent stations in respect to religious broadcasting and about any proposed changes that may be under consideration for tightening the regulations in respect to political broadcasts. I wish to say a word there because it does appear to me that this tightening of regulations seems to be aimed at religious and political broadcasting while there may not be the same regard—in fact the evidence that was pointed out this afternoon by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) would indicate that there may be a loosening of the regulations—in respect to other types of broadcasting. He referred to some of the programs that had recently been broadcast over the networks of Canada.

There is one responsibility that the publicly-owned broadcasting company has, and it is a responsibility that we must not forget. It is a responsibility toward the homes and the family life of our Canadian citizens. Let us remember that every radio program or television program goes into the homes of our citizens, and that is a very, very important thing. Let us not forget that as it is such a powerful medium for shaping public thought and public morals, radio should be guarded with the greatest of jealousy to see that the programs which go into our homes will tend to elevate and bring our Canadian nation to a place of respectability.

Now, I have had several comments by way of criticism, and although I do not want to be harsh I am passing them along. I have heard some criticism in respect of a broadcast known as "Stage 53" which was broadcast a few days ago. I think the name of it was "Lily's Story". I did not hear it, but my information is that Lily was described—I think perhaps by the commentator, I am not certain, but it does not make any difference who it was—as a "pale slut". I do not think that is a good thing, a good phrase—

An hon. Member: It is not parliamentary.

Mr. Hansell: No, it is not parliamentary and it certainly is not the right thing to go into the ears of boys and girls and the young people in our homes. Lily, who was supposed to be a pale slut, is involved in this story which went to the effect that a Chinese cook attempts to seduce this teen-age Canadian girl whose name is Lily—and she is a pale slut. I don't know whether the Chinese cook succeeded according to the story, as I did not listen to it, but I am told the story ended with this girl becoming a chambermaid and marrying a Winnipeg widower.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hansell: There are a few inquiries coming in my direction. I cannot give you the address of the Winnipeg widower. These broadcasts have been made, but I think good common sense should be used with respect to the type of drama that we pour into the ears of our young people.

Mr. Low: Until after midnight anyway.

Mr. Hansell: The leader of this group says until after midnight anyway, while this broadcast was at an hour when young people were liable to be listening.

We have all heard the criticism, although I am not going into the matter, of the television program "Hilda Morgan". Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I am not a radio fiend and I do not seem to hear these broadcasts. Perhaps other people are not as busy as I am, because I never seem to have time to tune in some of these programs.

Mr. Knowles: It is surprising the ones you do tune in.

Mr. Hansell: My information comes to me from people who protest these programs. I read in the paper the other day of a broadcast that was contemplated on the birth of a baby and that the commentator, I think, was expected to be in the delivery room at the time of the birth. I do not know what he would say but, frankly, I do not think that is the sort of thing that is necessary at all. As the leader of this group says it is getting pretty sordid. Why is that necessary? Just why is it necessary to broadcast a thing like that?

An hon. Member: What is wrong with it?

Mr. Hansell: There is a lot wrong with it. My hon. friend interjects—

Mr. Knowles: You do not mean that the birth of a baby is sordid?

Mr. Hansell: No, not the birth of a baby, but the matter of commenting on it from the delivery room and making a public exhibition of a thing which I regard as somewhat sacred and something that should not be treated as a piece of showmanship.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hansell: I say it appears to me that the regulatory body, which is the C.B.C., contemplates tightening regulations on religious broadcasting but continues to perhaps flout public opinion respecting dramas with a distinctly immoral tinge.

I want to have something to say about the tightening up of religious broadcasts. I understand they are tightening the regulations with respect to any suggestion from religious organizations that their broadcasts are supported by voluntary contributions, except with special permission of the C.B.C. Now, I am a preacher—

Mr. Diefenbaker: And a good one. I have heard you.

Mr. Hansell: I have done a little broadcasting but I have never had a very big church, and I do not expect that I ever will. I have a small congregation, and frankly, a congregation the size of mine could not afford to put over a regular religious broadcast if it was not permitted to indicate that such broadcast was supported by voluntary contributions. I can quite understand the desire to stop any racketeering along this line, and if it is to stop racketeering, then I am with the C.B.C.; but I do not contemplate that that is altogether the reason for the tightening of the regulations.

A good many religious broadcasts are dependent upon voluntary contributions by the listeners. Why should that not be so? I see nothing wrong with that. I quite admit that you would not want the broadcaster to spend half the time attempting to bleed the people, but a simple announcement that this broadcast is supported by voluntary contributions would be sufficient. I see no harm in that. There is a very important and vital principle here, and it is the principle of freedom—not necessarily the freedom to suggest that the broadcast is supported by voluntary contributions. It goes deeper than that. It is denying the people of Canada the freedom of contributing to the things they want to support; that is what it denies.

I would say the same thing with regard to political broadcasts. I do not see why political broadcasters should not be able to suggest that the program is supported by voluntary contributions. I know something, too, about what it costs to run campaigns. I think we are all aware of the fact that powerful parties have money to spend on that sort of thing, whereas new parties do not. Why should a political broadcast not be carried on on its merits? If its merits appeal to the people and they wish to support it, why not? I think that is the very element of freedom that we want in Canada.

Before dealing with that particularly, might I go back to these religious broadcasts. Imagine, if you please, the clergy of the country, the churches of our country, the bible schools of our country and those who desire to present to the people what they believe is the word of God and what they believe will strengthen the moral and Christian fibres of the country. Imagine such broadcasters having to go to the C.B.C., the regulatory body, and beg and say, "Will you please give me permission to tell the people that I am poor and my broadcast is supported by voluntary contributions?" Can you imagine a thing like that in Canada? I am glad the minister said the suggested regulations were not going to be put into effect until the radio committee had met. Nevertheless, according to the press, that is what the C.B.C. contemplates doing. Frankly I cannot imagine such a thing in a free country like this.

The leader of this party asks, what are the reasons? I do not know what the reasons are. They are beclouded, they are nebulous. If some religious organization were out plugging for money every minute of the broadcast time, it would be a different thing.

[Mr. Hansell.]

I have not heard any of them do that. There is a certain amount of commercial broadcast time that can be devoted to advertising the things the broadcaster has to sell. In some of these broadcasts a great deal of time is taken in the promotion of their wares and in attempts to induce people to spend their money. Whether or not the people are getting their money's worth out of it, I do not know. In so far as religious broadcasts are concerned, the proposal is that they cannot ask for money or even mention that they are supported by voluntary contributions, without first going to the supreme high potentate of radio, the C.B.C.

I believe, too, that the regulations in respect to political broadcasts should be loosened up a little bit. I am not saying that we should necessarily go too far along that line. I do not believe that political broadcasting should be a racket, either. I believe it should be carried on within the confines and the ethics of good broadcasting. But we do find that the regulations do not permit dramatized political broadcasting. I do not know what would be regarded as dramatized political broadcasting. I do know this, if my memory serves me correctly, that in the early days when Mr. Aberhart first went on the air with our Social Credit political organization, he made some political broadcasts. All he did in those broadcasts was to open them with an alarm clock ringing, and as this alarm clock started ringing a voice would say, "People of Alberta, wake up; it is time to wake up." He had to withdraw that. He had to take the alarm clock off the air because it could be interpreted as dramatizing a political broadcast. I think that is going too far.

The regulations will not permit political broadcasts by the process of question and answer, either. I believe that the regulation is entirely too severe. There is no reason why two people cannot go on a program with one person asking the other a question for clarification, such questions as are asked by everyone. Such a method is more interesting, and it gives life to the program. It is done by the C.B.C. forum, and it is done during press conferences. Nearly all these forums and conferences have some political significance. They discuss some subject that is of interest to the people of Canada, and it has its reflection in political activities somewhere. Yet that method is not to be permitted. I believe that such a regulation is far too stringent, and certainly is an encroachment upon the liberties of the people.

I should like to say one or two things in respect to political broadcasting in the light of the introduction into Canada of the most powerful medium of broadcasting known to modern times; that is, television. At the moment, I am not going to discuss television policy. I am in complete accord with many independent radio people who contend that the channels for television should be opened to independent broadcasters. It is certainly true that the fields of television the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation have kept for themselves are unquestionably the most lucrative ones. I am well aware of the fact that those fields are also the most densely populated. I do not know what their policy is going to be as they further extend television. This afternoon the minister indicated that if there was one C.B.C. television station in the province of Alberta, perhaps the rest of the province would be free for the development of independent television stations. I do not know whether there is going to be any fight between the city of Calgary and the city of Edmonton as to who is to get the first television station; I hope there is not.

Mr. Knowles: Maybe they will put it in Macleod.

Mr. Hansell: It is not likely that they will put it in Macleod because Macleod is not a large city, and it would not likely pay there. I am, however, going to say this. Besides the city of Calgary and the city of Edmonton, there are other good-sized places. There is the city of Lethbridge with a population of 22,000 and the city of Medicine Hat with a similar population. I trust that these areas are not going to be forgotten.

What happens, of course, is this. When the C.B.C. takes the most lucrative fields, independent radio can only develop fields where they are likely to go broke. It is said: Oh, that is all right; but let us remember this. One of the great arguments for the perpetuation of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is that it can give service in areas where private radio stations cannot be built, and all that sort of thing, and that argument should be applied to television.

Of course I know they cannot do it at the moment. I am not so foolish as to believe that they can erect television stations all over this country. I know that it costs a tremendous amount of money to erect those stations. I also know that it costs a tremendous amount of money for any sponsor to be able to put a program over television. When it comes to any organization, such as a religious organization or a political organization, eventually wanting to get on television, what are they going to do for funds if they are not able to tell the people of Canada that their television broadcasts are supported by voluntary contributions? I do not suppose there is in Canada a religious organization that could afford to go on television and at the same time support the work that they are already obligated to support.

As for political parties, I should like to know what small party in Canada could afford to go on television in an election campaign. I am fairly sure that the party to which I belong could not afford it. Somebody behind me mentions free time. That is giving the wrong impression. There is some free time. But in political campaigns there are also paid political broadcasts, and you can get just about as many of them as your campaign funds will stand. What is going to happen when television comes along? How can a small party compete, for instance, with the Liberal party or the Conservative party? Imagine powerful political parties with, I was going to say, millions of dollars, but I will reduce it to thousands.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, no; you were right the first time.

Mr. Hansell: I think I was right the first time; but if I were called upon to prove it, of course I have not access to the necessary information. But if my judgment is correct, knowing the advertising that goes on in political campaigns I would suggest that they have millions. I was recently responsible for one political campaign; and the daily papers in that province in which the campaign was carried on were coming out every day with full pages of political advertising, particularly on behalf of the Liberal party.

Mr. Knowles: What good did it do them?

Mr. Hansell: I went around getting the price of advertising for full pages, and when I was told the price I looked at the fellow who gave me the information and said, "I don't talk that language". I am a poor man. I was tempted to put a little want ad. in the personal column suggesting—

An hon. Member: "Votes wanted".

Mr. Hansell: Yes, "votes wanted"; "Social Crediters appeal to you for your votes. This advertisement is in correct proportion to the size of our slush funds".

An hon. Member: You mean the agony column.

Mr. Hansell: But I did not even do that. I did not put one advertisement in the daily newspapers in British Columbia.

Mr. Thomas: It was not necessary, either.

Mr. Hansell: Some political advertisements were put in by political candidates but as far as I was concerned—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think hon. members should discuss the subject matter of the motion which is before the house. It is broadcasting, not newspapers.

Mr. Hansell: Really, Mr. Speaker, I should not have made that mistake. I must be getting old and in my dotage. In my enthusiasm I had forgotten all about radio at the moment. But I was saying this. Imagine powerful political parties, with thousands or millions of dollars to spend, being the only political organizations that could use such a powerful medium as television. Imagine, if you please, a candidate in an election being the owner or manager of, or a large shareholder in, a television station. What an advantage he would have over the poor fellow who could not possibly afford a television broadcast.

Mr. Knowles: You had better work out some public policy on the matter.

Mr. Hansell: I do not know that I look forward to television in political broadcasting anyway, because after all you have to show yourself—

Mr. Knowles: Then you will have had it.

Mr. Hansell: The Liberal party has some pretty handsome gentlemen as their candidates—

Mr. Knowles: They used to be when they were young.

Mr. Hansell: They have a few handsome candidates in the constituency of Macleod. What chance would I have with my puss? I would be through, that is all there is to it.

An hon. Member: What about the Conservatives?

Mr. Hansell: I think the Conservatives have some pretty handsome gentlemen. Look at how the handsome Conservatives, for instance, could appeal to the women's vote. What chance will the Liberals have then? Why, those two parties could put on the squeeze play and where would we small fry be then?

Mr. Knowles: Whom are they going to squeeze?

Mr. Hansell: Well, Mr. Speaker, I suppose we should get through with this foolishness. However, it is not all foolishness. Some of the things I have been talking about are in reality pretty serious, and that is freedom of expression, freedom on behalf of the public to support that which they choose to support with their pocketbooks. Under the present system they are forced to support with their pocketbooks perhaps something they do not like, because we tax the people not only in radio licences but every time we have to subsidize the C.B.C., whether the people like it or not. The one thing that we can keep free is the people's freedom to support financially the things they want to support.

I say these things are serious to me. I think they are serious to the Canadian people. They are serious if they will think them through. May I say to the minister that we shall support his resolution setting up the committee. I can also say to him that he will find us co-operative in attempting to make suggestions and bring out the truth in order to give the Canadian people the best type of broadcasting and television that is possible in Canada.

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Since I will be a member of the committee that is to be set up soon, and since I have been a member of radio committees since 1945, I think I may be permitted to say a few words on this matter. In the past we have had pretty interesting sessions of radio committees, during which I have sometimes criticized the C.B.C. In that criticism I have tried to be as constructive as possible and as pleasant as possible, but at the same time I have tried to speak my mind frankly, and I have tried to help not only the C.B.C. but the people of Canada at large.

I believe that with the good co-operation of the House of Commons and of the board of directors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—I did not mention the co-operation of the minister because we have had that for a long time—we can arrive at such an achievement as will give the people of Canada almost complete satisfaction in the operation of this publicly-owned service.

This afternoon we heard some criticism of a couple of scripts put on by the C.B.C., especially in the west. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) referred to a dialogue between a Mr. McGatt and an Eskimo. He concluded that this dialogue showed that the person who was carrying on the dialogue with the Eskimo was giving the impression that he was criticizing Christianity. I think the hon. member for Eglinton was a little lacking in a sense of humour. He did not quite catch the humour in the dialogue between the Eskimo and the other person.

He also criticized a script read by somebody who was talking about the present situation in Asia. The hon. member criticized that script because he said the speaker was putting the blame on the back and shoulders of the United States, saying that the United States was responsible for the present situation in Asia. May I tell my hon. friend that I recently read a book on the matter written by a good Englishman from England. The whole book consisted of a series of statements having to do with the responsibility of Britain, the United States, France, and the Netherlands for the present situation in Asia. Because the writer said that, I do not believe we should be surprised if Russia takes advantage of the present situation, or think he was being vehemently critical especially of the United States. I believe the speaker on the radio was just stating facts, and that he was saying to his listeners that naturally the U.S.S.R., which is so close to that part of Asia, has been taking advantage of the present situation and of the mistakes made in the past by the powers that are foreign to Asia.

I want it perfectly understood that if I am supporting the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the setting up of this committee and most of the policies of the C.B.C., I am not opposing altogether at the same time all the requests and the points of view of the privately-owned stations. No, I think they have their own interests to take care of, their own interests to defend. I think their criticism is welcome provided that it is constructive, and is offered in a pleasant way. I do not oppose them altogether. I say that at the present time Canada needs this organization, the C.B.C., functioning as it does presently under the direction and administration of the board of directors.

Of course sometimes regulations have to be passed which do not please everyone. Scripts have been put on the air of which, at times, I have not approved. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) will remember my criticism of the scripts dealing with Bertrand Russell and Anna Freud. I believe that took place either last year or the year before. I strongly opposed the presentation of the views held by those people. I would still oppose any such presentation; and every time a script of that kind is brought to my attention I shall oppose it. My criticism was that those scripts should not have been presented on the air, especially over the C.B.C. stations.

But if there have been mistakes made by the C.B.C., I am sure that mistakes have been made, too, by the privately-owned stations. We must not heap all the sins of the world on the shoulders of the directors of the publicly-owned organization. We must establish a dividing line of responsibility between the privately-owned and publicly-owned systems.

Mr. Fleming: I think my hon. friend would agree, though, that when an objectionable script is used, it is much more serious when it is put over the national network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation than if put out only over some private stations.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): That would depend on certain things, of course. It would be most important that scripts of that kind should not be put on the air from a powerful privately-owned station serving, we will say, a million or half a million people. I would understand, of course, that if these objectionable lectures are put on the air over the national network they would reach more people than they would if put out over a privately-owned station, even though a big one.

I must repeat, however, that mistakes have not been made only on one side; the sins have not been committed only by the C.B.C. Sins and mistakes have been committed by the privately-owned stations, too; and my hon. friend knows that.

Although in the past I have criticized what has been done by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, I still maintain that we need it. It is important that the operations of the corporation shall continue. It is important that this publicly-owned system shall continue to give the good service it has given the people of Canada in the past. There can be no question about that.

Upon reading the Massey report I found three good reasons for supporting broadcasting by the C.B.C. One of these reasons is that Canada has a small and scattered population in a vast area. Second, this population is clustered along the rim of another country many times more populous and of far greater economic strength. The third reason is that the majority of Canadians share their mother tongue with that neighbour, and this leads to a peculiarly close and intimate relationship. We are close to the United States.

Let us suppose that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation did not exist. My view is that if it were not in existence at this time it would have to be created at once, due to the vast financial strength of our neighbour to the south. If we did not have good programs put out by the C.B.C., neighbouring stations in the United States would draw Canadian listeners.

The C.B.C. is managed by human beings, and it cannot be perfect. At the same time, the privately-owned stations are in the same position; they are bound to make mistakes, too. But anyone who has a reasonable knowledge of radio broadcasting throughout the world will admit that the organization of the C.B.C., not only in Montreal but in the whole of Canada, is second to none in the world. My hon. friends have seen that organization in Montreal, and they know that what I say it true.

We are a small population in a vast area. For example, one station in the city of New York can reach a population equal to that of Canada. Large amounts of money can flow into the purse of a privately-owned station in that city, because it will have great numbers of listeners, and the commercial material in the broadcasts can be made more interesting. Those who advertise over such a station realize that the more people who listen, the greater will be the results from advertising.

In Great Britain the British Broadcasting Corporation reaches a population of 50 million through the use of 975 miles of landline. In Canada we require 15,000 miles of telegraph and telephone lines to provide a national broadcasting service to our 14 million people. One can easily understand the difficulties which confronted the C.B.C. when it was created in 1936. Imagine the courage and far-sightedness that must have been exercised by the organizers of this publicly-owned organization. At first sight they had to realize that we must have some organization capable of covering large and far-removed areas. The privately-owned stations would not be interested because, from such areas, they could not derive enough income to cover their operational expenses.

I believe we can imagine what would have happened by taking the railways as an example. Perhaps the cheapest way of communication by rail between Montreal and Winnipeg could have been by way of Chicago. Not only would it have been cheaper; it would have been easier, and perhaps shorter. But it would not have been an all-Canadian railway system. To have that all-Canadian route we had to have help from public funds, as well as some kind of arrangement with the privately-owned system.

In radio the condition has been the same. We had to have the co-operation and help of both the publicly-owned and privately-owned systems in order to provide more facilities for those who wanted to go into this business. They needed sufficient facilities in order to start a very profitable business. That is what happened. No one can say that the C.B.C. has put privately-owned stations out of business since its inception. The number of privately-owned stations in Canada at the present time is proof that after all the regulations of the C.B.C. are not as stringent as some say they are and will continue to say they are.

There is another angle from which this problem of radio broadcasting can be approached, the angle concerning education, culture and even national unity. Because of our nearness to the United States we are exposed to and endangered by its powerful financial organization. We must realize that we have something to preserve in our culture which is superior because of its duality. We must not allow United States culture to get the best of our listeners in Canada. Our listeners should not be subjected to the expansion of United States culture and at the same time forget our Canadian culture which has been achieved through Providence and because of the courage and broad-mindedness of the two principal races who have lived in Canada since the opening up of this country. The Massey report has this to say at page 276:

> On the other hand, radio, as one of the most powerful means of education, may be regarded as a social influence too potent and too perilous to be ignored by the state which, in modern times, increasingly has assumed responsibility for the welfare of its citizens.

Those who invest money in broadcasting do not want to lose what they have invested. It is normal that they should want it to be a paying proposition, and there should be no quarrel about that. In order to make the greater profit they want to serve as many people as possible so that what they advertise will be most interesting. That is natural and normal. But who is to cover the vast areas with small populations if the C.B.C. is done away with? No one will cover those areas because it will not be a paying proposition to broadcast there. The C.B.C. has entered that field. I am sure that all right-thinking Canadians, those who do not want to offer futile criticism, will agree with me when I say that if the C.B.C. had not been created it would have to be created now because we need it in the worst way.

I admit that the publicly-owned system is supported by the taxpayers' money, and that that money should be spent according to their best wishes. The C.B.C. has made mistakes, and in the past I have offered criticism of its operations. I may have criticism to offer in the future. But I believe that in the long run the C.B.C. has a most commendable record as far as its work and achievements are concerned. I am sure the people of Canada at large support the work done by the C.B.C. for the Canadian people.

I am sure that I will not scandalize anyone when I say that I shall support the motion. I am not a socialist, nor do I believe that the more we have in the way of publicly-owned enterprise, the better it will be. I am in favour of private enterprise. But in certain fields, in this instance the broadcasting field,

I believe that a government-owned system is best. In that way the people are given the best programs possible.

The other day I read an article criticizing the new regulations about the use of Canadian talent. Canada is an ant-hill of talent and I think the more of this talent that is used, the better it will be for Canada and the more we will be doing to preserve our duality of culture.

I repeat that I will support the setting up of a committee. As far as my conscience allows me to do so, I will support the C.B.C. in the future. But I shall hold myself free, as we do in the Liberal party, to criticize when I think criticism should be made.

Mr. Casselman: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): My hon. friend says, "oh, oh." I understand that "oh, oh", because it comes from the whip of the Conservative party.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house has listened with interest and in large measure with approval to the most thoughtful speech just delivered by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier). One may disagree with some of his ideas, but at the same time I think we must admire an attitude which is so fair and reasonable in the discussion of this problem, as the hon. member has exhibited on other occasions in the past.

I intend to endeavour to follow the hon. member and deal with these matters in a dispassionate manner. As I listened to him concluding his remarks and making an appeal on behalf of freedom, I could not but agree when he referred to the difficulties Canada experiences by reason of being adjacent to a great nation to the south, with all its power and influence. I realized once more something of the challenge and the responsibility of maintaining in Canada that duality of culture to which he referred. I also accept and concur in the sentiments which he expressed.

Freedom is a subject that is always of interest. History shows that throughout the ages there has been a continuing contest between those who demand freedom of speech and those on the other hand who fear the use of that freedom. I am going to make some reference to freedom a little later on in connection with the C.B.C. I believe the time has come for a declaration additional to that made by the committee on a previous occasion in respect to that concept of freedom which is so much misunderstood today.

I want to make it clear, and as I said I am going to make reference to it later on, that in my opinion freedom in essence is the embodiment of the principle of the sacredness of the personality of the individual, and from that concept flows the idea of freedom of religion and of speech and of thought and association.

I think that periodically we have to make a declaration, each for himself, that freedom denies that we should be told what we are to read or hear or speak or write or think, except in so far as limitation of those rights is necessary in order to secure and assure the freedom of others. For if we ever come to the view that freedom consists in thinking what the majority believes or directs shall be thought, we shall have indeed defeated the concept for which democracy stands.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is a tendency today—and it grows and attacks governments, and it attacks individuals as well—for people to believe that for which they stand is right, and that for which those opposed stand is wrong.

When I say these things I do not say that the use of freedom should permit or allow its abuse, for after all freedom consists in limiting the right of each of us in the interests of and the assurance to all of us of a like degree of freedom. If we ever arrive at a point—an unthinkable position—where each of us has to think what the majority demands, then we have indeed defeated democracy.

I believe that freedom can only exist where there is freedom of the mind, and that freedom can withstand wrong and evil only so long as it recognizes the right of each human being to find truth for himself. Democracy will not survive unless it depends for its living vitality on the persuasiveness of argument rather than uniformity of thinking determined directly or indirectly by the state. Freedom can only survive if each of us has freedom to inquire and to discuss; but freedom does not cover the right to speak disloyally, blasphemously or slanderously.

From time to time we have to do our thinking regarding freedom. A committee such as the radio committee is one that I am always proud to serve on, for in that committee there is a freedom from partisanship that too often bedevils some of the other committees set up by the house. There is freedom to think there, to disagree, to argue, and to discuss; and all of us within the same party do not have to have the same viewpoint regarding freedom. After all, freedom knows no bounds of party.

I am one of those who fear for this nation if we ever arrive at a point when the governor or the board of governors of the C.B.C. are going to determine what I shall hear and when I shall hear it. I want to have the right to hear the exposition of views whether I agree with them or not. Providing that the delicacy of people is not shocked, or their religious sensibilities are not disturbed, I hope the day does not come in this nation when the C.B.C. will be in a position to determine for me what I shall hear over the air of this country. If we allow ourselves that luxury it will not be very long before the views expressed there will be the views of the government of the day, and the opportunity for public opinion to be created by hearing all sides will have been denied. I say that by way of opening.

I listened to the minister today with great interest. He mentioned that I tried to trick him by a question, but that was farthest from my mind. I was trying to get information about what was going to happen and what was in the mind of the minister. He dealt with his stepchild with geniality, and throughout with pride. He pointed out that the C.B.C. has many friends; that he numbered himself among that host of friends; that it has much on the credit side of the ledger, and we all admit that. But, sir, changes have taken place within the last year or two that have also achieved a very unusual number of debits on the other side. I think one of the reasons for that is the fact, pointed out by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) this afternoon with his usual comprehensiveness in discussing the matter, that now that the C.B.C. is freed from any direct responsibility to parliament to secure funds, it has also freed itself from doing some things that parliament has a right to demand that it shall do.

I believe criticism has been on the increase during the last year, and it is not criticism restricted to private radio stations, or to the press, or to chambers of commerce to which the minister referred. Criticism is becoming more general than ever before, and I think the reason is that there has been a tendency —and I speak wishing that I did not have to say the things that I am about to say— for the C.B.C. to become more absolute in its domination over private stations. It has revealed an attitude of mind in the promulgation of, or at least in threatening to promulgate, new rules, and also in allowing some of its programs to develop a sort of idolatrous adulation of some of the things this government does.

That is a trend, and unless we bring it before parliament it will continue. I am not going to single out any particular person this evening in what I am saying. I believe that some recent broadcasts, and it has been particularly noticeable in the last six months, by some commentators bear all the evidence of an endeavour to build up the government and some of the ministers of the government in a manner that is detrimental to maintaining the non-political character of the C.B.C.

The news summaries by the C.B.C. are unbiased, as I see them. They are worth while, and they are listened to by the people of this nation. But some of the commentaries on the news by alleged independent commentators have shown that praise, however unjustified, of the government is not a disqualification of those who would make these commentaries and who do make them. The minister says there is no interference whatever by the government, and I will accept that statement. But there can be unconscious interference, which may be just as effective as conscious interference. I have noticed in the last year particularly that, with a number of exceptions, the commentaries on Sunday could not have been more effective as Liberal propaganda if the government had consciously intended that they should be such.

I believe in free speech, but freedom of speech does not consist in a national body or a national institution placing before the people, as unbiased commentaries, adulation amounting almost to idolatry, however commendable that may be to those in this country who enjoy power.

Mr. Pouliot: Constant criticism is another excess.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is right. My hon. friend speaks with authority on that, and I agree with him entirely in that interruption. Now, returning once more to the regulations—

Mr. Pouliot: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Today the regulations are out of date; they are obsolete. With few exceptions they go back to 1936, before the day of television. A little later on I am going to make a reference to television. I am all in favour of a Canadian national feeling. I am in favour of Canadian programs but, Mr. Speaker, the regulation that is about to be passed—if well-informed C.B.C. sources may be taken as correct in their assumption— that the Canadian content of programs must be increased by 48 per cent, indicates to me that the C.B.C., realizing that that cannot take place under present circumstances, is using its power against the tax-paying private station in a manner that is most unfair. How is a single station going to carry out a policy such as that?

Mr. McCann: Those are still matters for negotiation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I appreciate that. I said it was in a period of suspended animation. But according to well-informed sources in the C.B.C., this is the regulation that is going into effect. However laudable the purpose may be of providing talent by edict, the result of this regulation, if carried into effect, will be unfair and unjust to the private stations of this country.

The minister says it is a matter of negotiation, and I agree. But I want to contribute my views at this moment so that, in so far as negotiation is concerned, my own views and those of many other Canadians on that subject will be known. I quote from the Vancouver Sun, which has never shown any particular desire to criticize this government. The editorial, appearing on October 31, 1952, read as follows:

> C.B.C. thwarts talent
> The eve of television development in Canada is a good time to expose the C.B.C.'s pretentious boast that it is the hothouse and forcing-bed of Canadian culture and entertainment talent.
>
> It is just the reverse.

Then it goes on to say:

> Private broadcasters say this situation effectively discourages the development of Canadian talent.
>
> "There is no competition for talent," they point out, "since it must either work within the terms established by the C.B.C. at C.B.C.'s prices or have no field in nation-wide Canadian broadcasting."

That is the view generally held.

Mr. Rowe: What paper was that?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was the Vancouver Sun. I did not read all the editorial. It becomes more definite as it goes on, and uses some language that might not be regarded by the government as parliamentary. It does point out that a regulation such as that leads to other regulations, and such regulations will ultimately lead to the regimentation of private broadcasting stations in this country, if indeed the purpose of this regulation is not the achievement of that end.

Imagine what the newspapers in Canada would say if they were directed that they must publish editorials, 50 per cent of which dealt with Canadianism. How long would they stand regimentation such as that? When the C.B.C. was originally set up it was intended, in spite of what the government would assert today, that private stations could operate in co-operation with the C.B.C. In support of that statement I have the authoritative words of one of the first governors of this body. These regulations are not in effect yet, but my view is that they are dangerous in their potentialities. They would place the private stations in this country in the position of being pawns in the hands of the government competitors.

The minister endeavours to brush all this aside by saying the regulations are necessary. Certainly they are. Who argues against them? But regulations should be fair; they should be reasonable. If these regulations are brought into effect they will indeed provide an argument in support of those of us who believe that, as today there is a board of transport commissioners that determines disputes as between the government-owned railroad and the privately-owned railroad, so there should be a body similar in nature, if not the same body, in order to determine disputes as between the C.B.C. and the private stations. Last year the minister brought in legislation to provide for an appeal to the exchequer court.

Mr. Fleming: That was in 1951.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes; in 1951. That was a sop. What is being asked for is not a right of appeal such as that, commendable and effective as it may be within its narrow compass. I say that a regulation such as the one I have been discussing is strong support of the need for a semi-judicial body to control the C.B.C. and to prevent injustice and unfairness from being perpetrated upon the private stations by the C.B.C. acting as both litigant and judge, a position that is a denial of every principle of right and justice.

I now pass on to a question that has been dealt with at considerable length today, namely that of television. I listened to the minister, and I tried to be impressed by his argument. In Saskatchewan we find that we are to be the forgotten province. There is nothing for us. We are not even worthy of a dam. But now, in addition to that, we are to receive no consideration in connection with television. Private companies everywhere are willing to establish television.

Mr. McCann: Where in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not know where in Saskatchewan.

Mr. McCann: No; you do not know.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not know that. If the minister is able to answer that question, I will be able to ask him a couple of questions. When I tried to get answers today he said the questions had tricky propensities about them.

Mr. Rowe: He did not know; that is why he asked you.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As a matter of fact, the attitude of the government toward television has placed Canada farther back in television than any other nation similarly placed. I do not understand this dog-in-the-manger attitude. If the government is not going ahead with television, why stop someone else from doing it? My hon. friend says: Will anybody establish a station in Saskatchewan? Give them a chance. Will the minister now rise and say that if any private company is prepared to establish a television station in Saskatchewan, it will be allowed to do so?

Mr. McCann: Not that I know of.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am asking whether they will be allowed to do so.

Mr. Rowe: Not that he knows of, the minister says.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, as far as I know no applications have been received from private individuals in the province of Saskatchewan. Should an application come from somebody in the province of Saskatchewan, it will be given consideration.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCann: There is nothing to laugh at about it. The hon. member asked for an answer and I am giving it. Should an application come from somebody in the province of Saskatchewan, it will be given consideration by the Department of Transport and by the governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

An hon. Member: Pass the buck.

Mr. Rowe: The operators are not laughing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Television applications have been receiving that same kind of consideration for the last two years. Thirty-four of them have been held in abeyance, some of them for two years; yet my hon. friend says the same consideration will be given to any applicant in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Rowe: That will be 1965.

Mr. McCann: The hon. member will be gone by then.

Mr. Rowe: So will the minister. Don't worry about that. Your whole party will be gone.

Mr. McCann: The hon. member will still be driving race horses.

Mr. Rowe: No; they will still be on the payroll.

Mr. Fraser: This government have only horses.

Mr. Rowe: The minister will be able to ride one.

Mr. McCann: Don't you ever think it.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, these highly interesting interjections should be broadcast by the C.B.C.

Mr. McCann: The proceedings ought to be televised.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What I am trying to point out is this, subject to the assistance I am getting from both sides of the house. As television expands, radio recedes. Wherever television is allowed to establish itself, ordinary radio broadcasting in effect ceases.

Mr. McCann: Oh, no; that is not the experience.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Of course the minister speaks as an authority. I am just going to quote the former head of the National Broadcasting Company, Mr. Merlin H. Aylesworth. He said "Radio is doomed". A little later he said: "Radio is the only American industry that died in its infancy". He goes on to point out that when television finally is established, people cease to use the ordinary radio. What is our position today in Canada? We have promises for the future. The private broadcasting stations are placed in the position that they may establish places where the pickings are no good. That is, in effect, the policy.

Mr. Fleming: The minister nods his head to that statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister agrees. I am glad to have his approval of what I have stated. In effect the position is this. The C.B.C. exercises a selectivity in examining all parts of the country; and having decided that some time in the future they may do something—and they do not yet know when they are going to start in various provinces —they say: This area looks profitable, so we are going to set it aside as an area in which we may establish, but until we decide, no one in that area shall have television. To me, Mr. Speaker, that is a denial of every right of private enterprise.

Mr. Fulton: And of the Canadian people.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is a denial of the right of the Canadian people to hear Canadian programs. Instead, they are being forced into the position mentioned by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) a moment ago, namely of being obliged to accept United States programs, to turn on their television sets to hear what the United States has to say rather than having a government or a broadcasting corporation that is prepared to go ahead in Canada and assure Canadians of some of this Canadian unity of which we hear so much prated.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Diefenbaker the debate was adjourned.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow is private members' day.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, January 28, 1953

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1953-54

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1954, was presented by Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STATEMENT ON THREATENED RAILWAY STRIKE

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): In view of the importance of the matter, Mr. Speaker, may I make a brief statement to the house concerning the present railway dispute. Since the short statement I made a week ago today, hon. members will have seen reports in the press of the various meetings on the part of the negotiating committees in Montreal. They will have noted also from these reports that serious efforts were being made to find a solution to the problem. You will note that last night wires were sent to me from both groups of committees, outlining the discussions yesterday which indicated that some progress had been made but stating that they were not able to continue negotiations last night.

In acknowledging those wires this morning I decided that, rather than do so by sending a wire, I would telephone the leaders of the negotiating committees and ask them again if they could not find a solution by free collective bargaining. If I may be permitted, sir, I shall read to the house my summary, which I think is a fair one, of the message I conveyed, on the one hand to Mr. A. J. Kelly, who is associated with Mr. L. C. Malone on behalf of the men—Mr. Malone was near Mr. Kelly when I telephoned—and on the other hand to Mr. Donald Gordon, president of the Canadian National Railways, who was in consultation with Mr. W. A. Mather, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, when I telephoned between 11 and 11.30 this morning. My summary is as follows:

Your wire of 27th January is acknowledged and I am making further reports on the whole matter to meeting of my colleagues this morning. In meantime a review of reports on your negotiations yesterday would indicate that a good deal of progress was made in finding common grounds in respect to matters other than wages. Before asking cabinet to consider what attitude the government should take, as Minister of Labour, I would like to feel that every means for free and unhampered negotiations have been considered and reconsidered. Will the heads of your committees please confer by telephone or otherwise as soon as possible and I shall telephone by 2 p.m. today to learn results. I am anxious that full advantage be taken of the resources of unhampered collective bargaining.

I did telephone Mr. Gordon and Mr. Kelly at about two p.m., Mr. Speaker. They told me that a meeting had been arranged for three o'clock this afternoon. I indicated to them that I should like to get in touch with them before the house closes at six o'clock so that we might expect to have a report on any progress that might be made.

QUESTIONS

NATIONAL DEFENCE—BRIGADE TRAINING AREA

Mr. Brooks:

1. What sites were inspected in connection with the proposed brigade training area for Canadian troops?
2. What are the names of the persons who made the inspections?
3. Has a report been made in each case to the Department of National Defence?
4. If so, will the report be made public?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. With the expansion of the Canadian army, since the beginning of hostilities in Korea in June, 1950, and the contribution of the Canadian forces for the defence of western Europe under the North Atlantic treaty, it has become increasingly necessary to have an area in Canada large enough to permit the training in active service operations of a brigade and even larger formations. If possible, this area should be on the Atlantic seaboard so that it could be used for mobilization, final training and embarkation of formations that might be sent overseas to take their place in the forces of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to prevent or stop aggression. Such an area should be located in a place where the climate permits training all the year round and where the ground has the characteristics that might be found in western Europe, with roads and other physical features permitting the employment of armoured and other vehicles and artillery and other weapons. Using existing information and also the results of new examinations, sites were looked at in various parts of Canada but particularly in the maritime provinces, including areas in the neighbourhood of Guysborough, Annapolis and Lunenburg in Nova Scotia, Tracadie, Sussex, Utopia and Gagetown in New Brunswick.

2. These inspections were made by officers of the Canadian army and officials of the Department of National Defence.

3 and 4. The reports which were made to the Department of National Defence were intended for the confidential advice and action which resulted in the selection of Camp Gagetown as having more of the desired characteristics than any other area and also as involving the displacement of less persons than any comparable area. In accordance with the established practice they will not be made public.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—WOOD SOLD, MONCTON, N.B.

Mr. Robichaud:

1. How many car loads of scrap wood and/or firewood were sold or offered for sale, by the Canadian National Railways, at or in the vicinity of Moncton, New Brunswick, during the years 1951 and 1952?
2. Was such wood sold by tender or otherwise?
3. At what price per car load was such wood disposed of?

Mr. Benidickson:

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Year 1951—81 cars.
   Year 1952—53 cars.
2. Sold by tender.
3. It is not the policy of the company to make public the amounts tendered for the purchase of company material sold as a result of calling for tenders.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—"CANADIAN ARMY JOURNAL"

Mr. Pearkes:

1. Does the Department of National Defence publish a booklet entitled Canadian Army Journal?
2. If so, who is the editor?
3. How many copies of each number are issued?
4. Are the copies paid for, or are they issued free?
5. If any copies are issued free, how many?
6. How many persons are employed in the preparation and issuance of this publication?
7. What is the cost, annually, of the Canadian Army Journal?
8. What were the numbers of each issue printed for the months of October 1952, November 1952, December 1952, and January 1953?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Yes.

2. There is an editorial board of army officers. At present the editorial board consists of the director of military training, the director of administration, the director of operations and planning, and the director of public relations, army.

3. Each issue consists of 19,000 copies.

4 and 5. Each issue of the Canadian Army Journal is distributed free of charge to all active and reserve force officers; C.O.T.C. contingents; cadet services of Canada (officers and instructors); to unit libraries (active and reserve force); officers, N.C.O.'s and men's messes; secretaries of the dominion of Canada rifle association and provincial rifle associations; military institutes; corps associations; to public libraries to be available for officers of the supplementary reserve; external affairs (for high commissioners, embassies, legations etc.); war office, United Kingdom; United Kingdom army schools; editors of U.S. armed forces journals; to members of parliament on request and to members of the parliamentary press gallery.

6. Three.

7. The total annual cost of publishing the Canadian Army Journal is $35,000.

8. Although normally published monthly, a consolidated issue is made when it is not possible to publish monthly. The issues for October, November and December of 1952 were consolidated into one issue of which 19,000 copies were printed. The January, 1953, issue is now being prepared and will be issued in the same quantity.

CENTRAL MECHANIZATION DEPOT—TIRES

Mr. White (Middlesex East):

1. How many tires for cars are stored at central mechanization depot, London, Ontario, and when were these purchased, by years?
2. How many tires for trucks are stored at the above-mentioned depot and what years were these purchased, by years?
3. How many tires for other vehicles are stored at central mechanization depot, London, and when were these purchased, by years?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. The total number of tires for cars stored at central mechanization depot, London, as at 31 December, 1952, was 565. Of this total, 492 were new tires, 49 were reconditioned (these are issued before new tires), and 24 were non-serviceable returned by units to be reconditioned in the army tire plant. All the new tires were purchased during the calendar year 1952.

2. The total number of tires for trucks and vehicles using truck tires such as buses, station wagons, trailers, and artillery equipment stored at central mechanization depot, London, as at 31 December, 1952, was 20,130. Of this total, 15,944 were new, 3,900 reconditioned and 286 non-serviceable. Of the new tires, 1,928 were purchased prior to 1949, 1,616 in 1949, 4,503 in 1950, 1,728 in 1951 and 6,169 in 1952.

3. The total number of tires for other vehicles stored at central mechanization depot, London, as at 31 December, 1952, was 4,021. Of this total, 3,620 were new, 342 reconditioned and 59 non-serviceable. Of the new tires, 568 were purchased prior to 1949, 410 in 1949, 1,647 in 1950, 256 in 1951 and 739 in 1952.

KOREAN FORCE PERSONNEL—EMBARKATION LEAVE

Mr. Shaw:

1. Were members of the Korean force stationed at Camp Borden in the month of December, 1952, granted Christmas or embarkation leave during December?

2. If so, was provision made by the Department of National Defence to pay the railway and berth fares between Camp Borden and the homes of said members?

3. Were service personnel granted such leave obliged to provide any undertaking respecting the repayment of sums provided to cover the cost of the berths and tickets?

4. If so, what was the nature of such undertakings?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Personnel stationed at Camp Borden in the month of December, 1952, warned for duty in the Far East, were granted Christmas or New Year's leave, except for a small number who were not eligible for a variety of reasons (in detention, in hospital, etc.). A number of personnel combined their Christmas or New Year's leave with their embarkation leave.

2. Free transportation, meals and berths were provided for those who took embarkation leave. Free transportation is not provided for Christmas or New Year's leave. Personnel who did not take embarkation leave at Christmas or New Year's will be eligible for it at a later date.

3 and 4. No.

OIL EXPORT BY PIPE LINE

Mr. Goode:

1. Has any oil company asked permission to export oil by pipe line to the United States, west of the Rocky mountains?

2. If so, has permission been granted?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. No. An application has, however, been received for the construction of a pipe line for export purposes.

2. Answered by 1.

DEFENCE ORDERS, 1951-1952

Mr. Nowlan:

What was the total value, by provinces, of contracts and defence orders placed by the Canadian Commercial Corporation and/or the Department of Defence Production for each of the calendar years 1951 and 1952?

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Speaker, if I may, I should like to answer this question orally. At various times in the past questions such as this have been placed on the order paper by hon. members, and the minister, the former parliamentary assistant, and I have explained in this house why it is not feasible to table an answer. The most recent statement of this position was made by the minister on May 30, 1952, and appears at page 2777 of Hansard as follows:

> A question has been raised as to why we do not publish figures showing the value of projects placed in the various provinces. The simple answer which I have given on several occasions, is that we see no value in giving such figures inasmuch as they in no way reflect the impact of the defence program on the various sectors of the country. They do not take into account the large proportion of subcontracting which is inherent in this type of work. They make no allowance for the source of raw materials going into the contracts, and in many cases they are misleading because contracts placed at head offices in Ottawa or Montreal are often carried out in company plants which may be located as far away as the east coast or the west coast.

This explanation applies directly to the present question. I should also point out that full information regarding the letting of all contracts over $10,000 is made public by the publication every two weeks of complete lists of contracts awarded. This information is available to all hon. members.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. Knowles:

1. Were any cabinet ministers, deputy ministers, government officials, or any other person or persons, permitted to see a copy of the 1952 report of the Auditor General, at any time prior to its being tabled in the House of Commons on Monday afternoon, January 12, 1953?

2. If so, what are the names of such persons and on whose authority were they permitted to see this report?

3. On what date or dates did any such persons see this report?

4. Were any cabinet ministers, deputy ministers, government officials, or any other persons, given a copy of the 1952 report of the Auditor General, or any digest or summary of its contents, at any time prior to its being tabled in the House of Commons on Monday afternoon, January 12, 1953?

5. If so, what are the names of such persons, and on whose authority were they given a copy of this report, or any such digest or summary?

6. On what date or dates were such persons given a copy of this report, or any such digest or summary?

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, this question relates to a document prepared by the Auditor General, who is not a government official but an officer of parliament. Since the report is printed under the authority of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and is tabled by that minister, it is of course obvious that it must have been seen by officers of his department before it was tabled in the house.

I do not think it would be appropriate for the government to address to the Auditor General the questions raised by the hon. member with respect to other departments. The Auditor General is always available to appear before the public accounts committee when his presence is desired, and it is open to any hon. member to address to him any question he may see fit to put to him directly.

However, with respect to this question the Auditor General, on his own initiative, has sent me a memorandum which I perhaps might read to the house in order to supplement this answer. It is as follows:

Ottawa, January 26, 1953

Memorandum to the Prime Minister:

Re Question No. 61 of Order Paper for January 26.

Mr. Knowles asks a series of questions with respect to the handling of copies and "any digest or summary" of the 1952 audit report to the House of Commons. The Minister of Finance is out of town today; therefore I address this memorandum to you.

The report is bound with volume I of the public accounts. Before the book was tabled on January 12, copies were delivered by the printing bureau to the Department of Finance, the audit office and, perhaps, to the joint parliamentary distribution branch. In addition the queen's printer distributes to the official mailing list and also stocks copies for sale. Consequently, a number of departments are involved.

Audit Office

The statutory direction is to make a report to the House of Commons. Consequently, all copies of the printed report which are delivered to the audit office are safekept by the assistant auditor general and myself until the Minister of Finance tables.

Annually, during the preparation of the report, numerous copies of the draft are in circulation throughout the audit office and, as a matter of established routine, supervisors of audit discuss some paragraphs with departmental and treasury officers in order to make certain that:

(a) the text is factually correct; and

(b) notice is being taken of all material facts.

I do not expect departments to concur in my views, but I endeavour to make certain that a fair statement of facts is given to the House of Commons. Paragraphs are brought to the notice of departments by use of clippings from either the draft text or printer's proofs. Whenever a supervisor thinks, after discussion, that a change in text should be considered, he discusses it with me and I decide.

Between August 25, 1952 (the date when I put a draft in circulation throughout the audit office) and October 27 (the date when the order to print was given) various paragraphs were brought to the notice of departmental and treasury officers. It was fortunate that we did so because, after the report was printed, a mistake was discovered by an officer of the Department of National Defence in paragraph 53 (page 23 of printed report). This paragraph deals with contributions to the services pension account and stated that a total of $7,225,000 was in arrears. The national defence officer pointed out that the correct figure was $1,225,000, and this had the effect of making certain audit comment inaccurate and also some observations in paragraph 61 (page 25), which refers to the same subject. The queen's printer co-operated by reprinting four pages and pasting them in the already bound books. As a result, corrected figures and comment appear in the report as tabled and distributed.

No one likes to refer to his mistakes, but in this instance I'm particularly appreciative of the action of the national defence officer because some paragraphs in the report may be regarded as critical of national defence methods and it would have been easy, by keeping silent, "to put me over the barrel" by reference to the mistake after the report was tabled.

If the decision is to give a composite answer to No. 61,—

That was the number it had the first time it appeared on the order paper.

—so far as the Auditor General is concerned, replies are:

1. No.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

4. Selected paragraphs in draft form were brought to the notice of officers, of agriculture, crown assets disposal corporation, external affairs, finance, national defence, national gallery of Canada, national research council and the treasury between August 25 and October 27, 1952.

5. A verbal direction of the Auditor General to supervisors of audit is to make certain, through discussions with accounting and administrative officers, that facts are accurately and fairly stated, and for that purpose they may show drafts of selected paragraphs to treasury and/or departmental officers.

6. Answered by No. 4.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question? If the memorandum answers it the Prime Minister may draw that to my attention. Do I take it from the memorandum which the Prime Minister just read that, in the case of any department to which relevant paragraphs were referred, all of the paragraphs pertaining to that department were referred thereto?

Mr. St. Laurent: No; I take it that it is paragraphs about which information from the department as to the accuracy of factual statements is required which are shown to the audit officers or treasury officers of the department, and that if as a result of that the supervisor finds that any change might have to be made he discusses it with the Auditor General, who decides whether or not a change will be made.

IRRIGATION—SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INSTRUCTIONS TO P.F.R.A. OFFICIALS

Mr. Argue:

1. Did the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture, or any other member or official of the government, either by letter, telegram or verbally, instruct officials of the P.F.R.A. not to appear before the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan river project?

2. If so, for what reason?

Mr. St. Laurent: I have the answer here. It is as follows:

1 and 2. The royal commission on the South Saskatchewan river development was established to determine "whether the economic and social returns to the Canadian people on the investment in the proposed South Saskatchewan river project (central Saskatchewan development) would be commensurate with the cost thereof" and "whether the said project represents the most profitable and desirable use which can be made of the physical resources involved".

In pursuing their inquiry, the commissioners were afforded by their terms of reference, as is usual in references of this kind, such assistance and co-operation from all the departments of the government as they thought they might need. That they received such assistance from the P.F.R.A. throughout the whole of their inquiry is evident from the numerous acknowledgments contained in their report. Hon. members can refer, for instance, to pages 9, 43 and 45, where the commissioners make it clear that their task would have been impossible without the material and researches of the P.F.R.A. and the help of P.F.R.A. officials.

This commission was established to get information which the government did not already have and to make recommendations to it. As the commissioners had access to all the records and technical advice of the P.F.R.A., it was not necessary for them to have formal appearances by federal officials at public hearings. The government shared this view and gave this opinion to the officials of the P.F.R.A.

In reaching that conclusion, the government had in mind the fact that it would not be fair to place civil servants in a false position by requiring them to appear publicly and express opinions on matters on which the Minister of Agriculture and the government as a whole had subsequently to reach decisions.

IRRIGATION—SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—ACTIONS OF P.F.R.A. OFFICIALS

Mr. Argue:

1. Did P.F.R.A. officials leave Regina while the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan river project was in that city?

2. If so, for what reason and on whose instruction?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

DEFENCE PRODUCTION—TRUCKS, TRACTORS AND PARTS

Mr. Noseworthy:

1. Did the Department of Defence Production call for tenders for a contract for trucks, tractors and automotive parts placed between November 17 and November 30, 1952 with the International Harvester Company?

2. Were companies submitting tenders required to tender on entire contract or on trucks, tractors and automotive spares, separately?

3. If so, how many trucks were purchased in this contract?

4. What firms were invited to tender on these trucks?

5. What firms submitted tenders for these trucks?

6. What was the price quoted for these trucks by each firm that submitted tenders?

7. Were any or all firms which submitted tenders asked to submit a second tender on these same trucks?

8. If so, for what reason?

9. Which of the firms submitting tenders were asked to submit tenders a second time?

10. What price was submitted in the second tender by each firm that tendered a second time on these trucks?

11. Was the contract let to the lowest bidder?

12. If not, what was the reason for rejecting the lowest tender in favour of a higher one?

ARMED FORCES—CONTRACTS FOR NECKTIES

Mr. Lennard:

1. How many contracts were let for neckties for the armed forces from January 1, 1950 to December 31, 1952?

2. How many neckties were contracted for and at what cost?

CF-100 AIRCRAFT

Mr. Fulton:

1. When was the decision first taken to design and produce an all-Canadian jet aircraft?

2. When was the first step taken by way of retaining engineers, designers, etc., or by way of entering into contract for the production of such aircraft?

3. What were the terms on which such services were retained and what were the terms of the contract?

4. When was the first CF-100 complete airframe produced?

5. How many CF-100 complete airframes have been produced to date?

6. How much money has been advanced to Avro Canada for the design and/or production of the CF-100 (if not possible to separate advances for CF-100 and for Orenda engines, what is the total for both)?

7. Have any requests been received from any other country or firm to build CF-100 airframes or complete aircraft under licence? If so, from whom?

8. Have any contracts allowing such construction under licence been awarded?

ORENDA JET ENGINE

Mr. Fulton:

1. When was the decision first taken to design and produce an all-Canadian jet engine?

2. When was the first step taken by way of retaining engineers, designers, etc., or by way of entering into contract for the production of such engines?
3. What were the terms on which such services were retained and what were the terms of the contract?
4. When was the first Orenda jet engine produced?
5. How many complete Orenda engines have been produced to date?
6. How much money has been advanced to Avro Canada for the design and/or production of the Orenda engine (if not possible to separate advances for CF-100 and for Orenda engines, what is the total for both)?
7. Have any requests been received from any other country or firm to build Orenda engines under licence? If so, from whom?
8. Have any contracts allowing such construction under licence been awarded?

CANADIAN JUNK COMPANY

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the Canadian Junk Company obtained (a) shirts; (b) any other goods or supplies, from Canadian army sources, or from any government department or agency, at any time since January 1, 1948?
2. If so, what quantities of such supplies were obtained, and at what prices?

ARMED SERVICES—PURCHASES OF DISHCLOTHS

Mr. Lennard:

What were the total purchases, giving cost, quantities and from whom purchased, of dishcloths for all branches of the armed forces, during the period from January 1, 1950 to December 31, 1952?

Mr. Dickey: With respect to questions Nos. 22 to 36 and 41 to 43 inclusive, on today's order paper, Mr. Speaker, may I say that by these questions the hon. member seeks information regarding total purchases of a wide variety of items. Collection and compilation of this information will entail a very large volume of clerical work both in Ottawa and at the district offices of the Department of Defence Production located in all parts of Canada. The starting date selected, January 1, 1950, antedates the organization of the department on April 1, 1951. It would be possible to secure the information requested for the period January 1, 1950, to April 1, 1951, from records of the Canadian Commercial Corporation. This would, however, require reference to records no longer in active use and involve very protracted delay in answering the questions. I have discussed the difficulties involved with the hon. member and he has agreed to amend all these questions by substituting the words "April 1, 1951" for the words "January 1, 1950" wherever they appear. Subject to this amendment, the questions may be passed as orders for returns and the answers will be brought down as promptly as can be arranged.

Mr. Speaker: Questions Nos. 22 to 36 inclusive and 41 to 43 inclusive, orders for returns in accordance with the statement made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey).

BEAUCE COUNTY LAWYERS AND NOTARIES—FEDERAL AGENTS

Mr. Poulin:

1. What are the names of the lawyers and notaries residing in the county of Beauce, who have acted as agents for the different departments or boards of the federal government for the fiscal years 1947-48, 1949, 1950, 1951 and 1952?

2. What amount of fees has been paid to each of them for each of the above-mentioned years and in connection with what services?

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES—RETIREMENT PROGRAMS—EMPLOYMENT PERIODS

Mr. Tustin: On December 10 a question in my name was made an order for return. I wonder whether I may have that information soon.

Mr. Bradley: I will make the necessary inquiries and get the information here as soon as possible.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

R.C.A.F. PERSONNEL BUTTONS

Mr. Lennard:

For a copy of all correspondence, quotations, and other documents, in connection with tenders A18-22A-40/1, August 29, 1951 and A18-22A-44, February 12, 1952, for Royal Canadian Air Force personnel buttons.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have received the information I desire. I ask that this motion be dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

AUDITOR GENERAL—FINANCE—NATIONAL DEFENCE—CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood):

For a copy of all correspondence and recorded communications exchanged between the Auditor

General and the (a) Department of Finance; (b) Department of National Defence, from the first day of April, 1951, to date.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, this is a motion which asks for the production of correspondence of the Auditor General with various departments of government. I have a note from the Auditor General in which he points out that it is the first time in his experience that correspondence of the Auditor General has been called for. The mover of the motion has indicated to my parliamentary assistant that the terms of the order are very much wider than he really desires; that it would call for a great deal of correspondence in which he is not especially interested. My understanding is that he is quite satisfied that the motion should be dropped and reworded.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

WOODFALLE SCHOOL, ROCKCLIFFE

Mr. Robichaud:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the federal government, or any department thereof, and any person or persons, in connection with the teaching of religion and French to the French-speaking pupils at Woodfalle school, Royal Canadian Air Force station, Rockcliffe, Ontario.

FISHERIES

SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF ECONOMIC CONDITIONS IN FISHING INDUSTRY

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of investigating the economic condition of the fishing industry in Canada with a view to recommending legislation designed to render assistance to the industry comparable to the legislation already enacted to provide assistance for agriculture.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this resolution appeared on the order paper during the last session, but I did not have a chance to introduce it in the house during that time; consequently I took advantage of the fisheries estimates to go into the matter to some extent in June of last year. At that time in reply to the remarks I had made the then minister of fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) placed certain statements on Hansard which, in my opinion, did not in any way reply to the criticisms that I had placed before the house. I want to read a short portion of the remarks Mr. Mayhew made on June 19, 1952, as they appear at page 3435 of Hansard: This is what he had to say:

Well, I am not going to say that we are doing everything for the fishermen that we would like to do. I suppose the Minister of Agriculture would say the same about agriculture. But we should at least remember this. The total value of the fisheries to Canada last year, including Newfoundland, was $200 million. On the other hand, the total value of agriculture to Canada is $2 billion. There is a vast difference. If you compare the $10 million that we have—

That was the expenditure of the department. I continue:

—with the $60 million that agriculture has, you will see that it is not too far out of line . . . .

That statement would, in my opinion, indicate to the house that the Minister of Fisheries at that time was of the opinion that the assistance which was given agriculture was in no way much greater than the assistance which was given to the fishing industry. I explained that in my opinion there was a vast difference. I made a breakdown of the moneys that were voted for each department, which I mentioned on page 3426 of Hansard of that same day. As I say, I made a breakdown—perhaps estimated—of the moneys that were voted for the Department of Fisheries, and this is what I had to say:

The total vote for the fisheries department this year is nearly $10 million. If that figure is broken down it will be found that five-sixths of it or approximately $8,500,000 go to the employees of the department, leaving one-sixth, or $1,500,000, for other purposes connected with the industry; and five-sixths of this remainder, of $1,500,000 does not apply in any way to the province of New Brunswick. I refer to $700,000 for seal skins; $342,500 for bait service for Newfoundland; $240,000 for fisheries support board, Newfoundland, which leaves $160,000 for bounty payments for all the maritime provinces and $150,000 for the construction of draggers in all of the maritime provinces. With regard to the province of New Brunswick, my estimate would be that we would receive less than $100,000, including the bounty payments which cost the taxpayers of this country not one single penny.

In reply to a question which I placed on the order paper some time ago with regard to loans under the farm loan board and the fisheries loan board for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1952, I received the following reply on June 4 from the Minister of Finance: Under the farm loan board, $4,238,400; under fisheries, $800. In other words, for every single dollar fishermen were granted, agriculture was given $5,298.

Mr. Cruickshank: Why not?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte):

This may be considered to be a fair distribution by some people in this country but I am sure the great majority of Canadians would not look upon it in that light.

I would want it distinctly understood that I do not favour a subsidy because, while in many cases subsidies are beneficial, the benefits go to the processors rather than to the primary producers. I mention that because I have seen it happen. But I do wish strongly to recommend floor prices—which have never applied in New Brunswick in respect of fish products. The only application was in wartime, and at that time instead of a floor it was a ceiling. That ceiling was placed there to protect the canners, not to protect the primary producers.

I firmly believe that if that ceiling price could be maintained in a time of war—and it was maintained rigidly—then the fishermen have every right to expect the maintenance of a floor price under similar circumstances. Again I assert most emphatically that I do not believe in subsidizing the fishing industry, whereby processors or canners might take advantage of such subsidies, rather than have the benefits going to the primary producers.

I wish to place on record again some of the assistance that has been given to agriculture. When I spoke last June I did not place all these details on record, but I believe at this time I shall do so. I have here a table showing agricultural assistance in the post-war period. This is printed by the Department of Agriculture and gives the information to the end of March, 1949, the latest I could get. The table sets out subsidies and assistance to agriculture as follows:

Feeds: Freight assistance policy; Feed assistance—plans A and B; Coarse grains; Drawback payments; Processing feeds; Sugar beet pulp.

Fertilizer and lime: Fertilizer subventions and freight allowance; Lime.

Dairy products: Fluid and concentrated milk, butter and cheese; Cheese export; Cheese premium and factory subsidy.

Livestock and livestock products: Hog premiums; Hog freight assistance; Hog breeding; Bacon export; Freight assistance on feeder cattle and lambs; Sheep raising; Wool; Egg export.

Fruits and vegetables: Apples; Berries for jam; Vegetable canning crops; Potatoes; Potato storage warehouse construction; White and yellow-eye dried beans; White beans; Dehydration.

Seeds; Compensation to farmers for cultivation of milkweed; rebate on flax scutching machinery; the wheat acreage reduction program; the prairie farm income payments scheme; the Prairie Farm Assistance Act; cold storage warehouses; honey.

Then, in addition to all these I have put on record, I believe it was in 1951 that $65 million was paid by the Department of Agriculture to the Canadian wheat board for distribution among the farmers of western Canada. Then, there were payments made in connection with the Fraser valley flood which, again, amounted to a large sum of money.

Mr. Cruickshank: Oh, come off!

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Then, assistance was given in connection with wheat it was not possible to harvest in the fall of 1951. Let me say to the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), who has just interrupted, that I am not mentioning these things in any critical sense. I put the facts on record only so that hon. members may compare the assistance given to these two industries.

I am not making any criticism in respect to the assistance given in the Fraser valley or in any part of Canada. Indeed, I endorsed that assistance; I stood in the House of Commons and voted for it.

Then, assistance was given to the owners of cattle affected by the foot-and-mouth disease last year in Saskatchewan. We see that $20 million has been given to the apple growers of the Annapolis valley in Nova Scotia. I placed on record on the earlier occasion the fact that half a million dollars is given to the maple sugar producers of this country, by way of an annual grant.

I have read in the press recently an announcement that consideration is being given to a higher floor price for eggs. Again let me emphasize that I have not placed this list on record in any critical sense whatever. That assistance is being given, and it is beneficial to each and every one of us. I have voted that assistance of this kind should be given, and I would vote again to have it given, if I were called upon to do so.

I use these facts only for purposes of comparison, and to show, by the figures, that the fishermen of this country have received very little consideration, when compared with those who are engaged in agriculture. The only thing I ask is that they be considered in the same way.

Then, with regard to the problems which fishermen encounter from day to day in the province of New Brunswick, and particularly in my own county, I feel certain that a great percentage of those problems might be solved without the payment of a single dollar of subsidy, and without its costing this country one dollar.

Again in this connection I wish to quote from Hansard of June 19 where I explained the difficulties encountered by these fishermen in this day and age. Some of them are great problems, and mean the difference between keeping our young men at home, and in the industry, or having them go away to seek employment in other parts of Canada. That is the part that worries us most. We all like to keep our young men at home, in our own province or county.

On this earlier occasion, after I had set out some of the conditions, I said, as reported at page 3430 of Hansard of June 19, 1952:

I firmly believe that if anyone is prepared to criticize he should be in position at the same time to offer some constructive solution to the problem involved. For that reason I shall now suggest what in my opinion is the only course to follow in order to bring some semblance of stability to an industry which is now in a depressed condition and whose future is most gloomy indeed. In doing so I am confident that the course I shall suggest will be endorsed by every sardine fisherman in southern New Brunswick and in the state of Maine.

These sardine fishermen on both sides of the border must insist that the fisheries departments of the United States and Canada, together with the canners in both countries, get together immediately so that an opportunity will be provided for representatives of these fishermen to present their views and work out a plan whereby fishermen would be given a fair return for that which they produce. This has been accomplished in the past during the world wars and it was the only period in fifty years when fisherman and canner alike knew where they were going.

A stable price would benefit not only the fishermen, but the canners as well, and many canners I am sure will agree with that statement. A stabilized price would not cost the taxpayers of either country a single dollar.

During the periods I have mentioned, when prices were regulated by government action, no subsidies were paid by the government of either country. For example, the margin to the ultimate consumer as between sardines at $10 per hogshead and $20 per hogshead would be approximately 50 cents per case of 100 cans, or one-half cent per can. That differential would appear to be insignificant in so far as the consumer is concerned. It is a fundamental principle from the standpoint of the producer that this differential may mean the difference between stability and prosperity, on the one hand, and depression and chaos on the other.

That reminds me of a movement which has recently taken place in Saint John and Charlotte counties. These fishermen are attempting to form some kind of union. The movement has been in evidence during the last four weeks. They believe that collectively they will be in a better position to approach the Department of Fisheries and the government for some assistance in the way of floor prices in order to stabilize the industry. In my opinion that idea just will not work and I should like to explain why I have formed that opinion.

The particular section from which I come depends upon United States markets for the sale of two-thirds of what we produce. If we on the Canadian side of the border have a set price and try to compel United States canners to pay that price, they may resent that action being taken here. We have seen years when they were able to buy their total requirements from their own waters. Sardines are caught in the state of Maine just the same as in the counties of Charlotte and Saint John. If we had an established price the fishermen in the state of Maine would take full advantage of that. If there was a plentiful supply of sardines they would go to the Maine canners and say, "We are prepared to sell our sardines cheaper than the price set by the Canadian government." That would completely deny us our United States market.

For that reason I want to refer to the paragraph which I just quoted from the speech I made last year, that the only way that this problem can ever be solved is internationally. Fishermen in the state of Maine are just as desirous as those in Canada that this action be taken. I want to impress upon the department and the government that this has been long delayed. I believe it is something that could be brought about without a great deal of trouble. The officials of the two fisheries departments could meet with the canning operators and discuss this problem and I believe firmly that the matter could be adjusted so that those who year after year have continued in this business without any stability whatever might know where they are going.

It is most discouraging to these producers to start up in the spring, put the last dollar they have back into the water and have to borrow some on which to go along to make preparations for another season, and then before those structures are completed to have the price of sardines drop by 50 per cent and in some cases a great deal more.

There is another problem facing the fishing industry to which I should like to refer, the cost of food servicing. It is quite apparent from my experience that those who have never produced a single ounce of wealth in this country expect unreasonable profits from that which is created by the sweat and labour of our primary producers. This applies to the agricultural as well as the fishing industries and to many other industries as well. I should like to refer to an article from the Lethbridge Herald which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of January 21, only a few days ago. This reads:

Egg Price Spread

Should it require 21 cents or 61¾ per cent to get a dozen grade A large eggs from the farmer producer to the city consumer? Egg prices have dropped lately and producers have been wondering. In Edmonton the producer gets 34 cents a dozen for grade A large, the wholesalers are charging 44 cents to retailers, and the retailers are charging 55 cents to consumers. We suppose if eggs dropped to 21 cents to consumers the producers would have to give them away in order that the costs of wholesaling and retailing might be paid. We're wondering if we're not going a little bit crazy in this matter of food servicing costs.

That is a matter that could be debated at some length. This problem is faced not only by the fishing industry but by the agricultural industry and many others. Only a few days ago I picked up a drug journal which indicated that the profits offered were nothing less than fabulous. Headlines guaranteed 42 per cent or 44 per cent profit on certain lines. The article I have just read indicates a 61¾ per cent mark-up on a dozen eggs from the time it leaves the producer until it is in the hands of the consumer. There is something wrong somewhere when it costs so much to merchandise an article.

I want to emphasize that those who reap that benefit in nine cases out of ten have never produced an ounce of wealth from the day they were born. But they are ready to take out every single bit of profit in order to crowd that farmer-producer down as far as it is possible to get him. I mentioned this same condition when I spoke last year and perhaps I should quote a short portion of my speech as reported at page 3432 of Hansard of June 19, 1952. After making several suggestions as to how assistance might be given to the fisheries, I then had this to say:

> At the same time a full scale investigation into the spread between prices paid fishermen for groundfish such as cod, pollock and haddock and consumer prices might be in order. That might also apply to the prices consumers are obliged to pay in all parts of Canada for fish products. The great spread between the prices paid the producer and those paid by the consumer is something that should have been investigated long ago. The variation is too great between what the producer receives and the price that is being asked today of the consumers in this country. Such an investigation, I am sure, would bring to light a differential of most unfair proportions.

Two years ago fishermen in the county of Charlotte were catching pollock, one of the best fish we produce in Canada, and selling them for one-half cent per pound. The following winter I paid seventeen cents a pound for the finished article in my own home town. Many hon. members and many people may argue: If there is that great range of profit between the raw material and the finished article, why is it more fishermen do not finish the article themselves? I can say without any thought of contradiction that the great majority of these fishermen have not facilities for taking care of the fish. It means quite an investment in fish sheds, hogsheads, tons of salt and all that goes with it. In a great many cases you would have to wait at least three, four or five months before you received a single dollar because it would take that length of time. By the time the fish are split, salted and ready for sale three, four or five months have passed. It is utterly impossible for fishermen to go that length of time without any recompense. Again I want to make the point that in nine cases out of ten where I have asked for assistance to build fish houses by way of loans, in order that the fishermen might do the very thing I have described, the requests have been turned down completely. Year after year I have tried to have some provision made whereby fishermen could be given assistance in cases such as I have outlined, and in nine cases out of ten such requests have been ignored.

I might also add that as a rule it is the little fellow who has been turned down. If any assistance was given it was extended to those who perhaps might have been able to get by without it; but those who actually needed it, those who were producing, were the ones who did not receive the assistance to which I believe they are entitled. There are many fishing villages down there where after a bad storm the fishermen have lost their fish houses and every bit of gear they had by which to make a livelihood. When the storm was over it was all gone. Perhaps the boat was gone too. But there is no provision whereby I can come to the government and get any assistance. It is just not granted. If they go to a bank for money and have no security it is utterly impossible to get assistance there. That is the position in which they are placed. I want hon. members to compare that situation with what has happened when terrible things have occurred in the field of agriculture. In every case—and I support it 100 per cent—assistance has been given. A way has been found to get the farmers out of their trouble.

I am glad that a way has been found. I do not mean to be critical in any sense of the word, but I do feel that discrimination should not be shown. Look at what has been done for the gold mining industry. I have supported such action and have never criticized it. In every other industry where primary producers have been involved, with the exception of fishing, a way has been found to help them out of their difficulties. The fishing industry, however, has been ignored over the years. I have every hope that conditions may improve and that we will consider that fishermen should be treated in the same way as other primary producers.

I should like to refer briefly again to fishermen's insurance and to quote briefly from page 3427 of Hansard of June 19, 1952, when the estimates of the Department of Fisheries were before us and I spoke on this matter. On that occasion I said:

> During this session we have heard many suggestions with regard to some type of insurance to protect all types of fishing equipment. Before I get too far away from my main subject, I should like to suggest a way in which an insurance plan might be established, which would give the fishermen some protection, and at the same time the fishermen themselves would be contributing. In no way would this place any financial burden on the taxpayers of this country. I refer to the $160,000 which is paid in bounties and distributed among thousands of fishermen each year in payments ranging from $5 to $10, regulated of course by the number eligible for payment and by the number of applications received. This bounty is of little assistance to the industry, and although I am not familiar with insurance rates I am convinced that $160,000 would pay the premium on an enormous amount of insurance and give those fishermen a protection which is considered very necessary in other industries but has never applied to the great part of the fisherman's property used in his hazardous calling.

It might be necessary for the government to supplement this payment by some amount, but I suggest it to the department for their consideration, and also to get the reaction from the fishermen themselves. I believe it would be a move in the right direction, and would be endorsed by the majority of the fishermen in the maritime provinces.

After I made that statement the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) spoke on the subject at some length and endorsed the statement I had made. Then the Hon. Mr. Mayhew, who was then minister of fisheries, replied, and his remarks can be found at page 3435 of Hansard of June 19, 1952. He had this to say:

The hon. member for Charlotte brought out the idea—and it was referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton South—that the $160,000 that is paid as a bounty should be used for insurance purposes. In the hon. member's own riding there are 146 boat owners and 181 fishermen working on the boats, or a total of 327 men, in the county of Charlotte who are getting some of this money. In the whole of the maritime provinces there are 14,358 men. It would be very difficult to get all of these men to agree to cancel their right, which amounts to a little more than $6 apiece; it amounts to $9.55 each. That is what it amounted to last year.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South said that it was a variable amount. It is not exactly a variable amount; it is the interest on $4 million. That is the amount on which the interest is based. I think it would be difficult to get an agreement from the 14,358 fishermen that their money should be used to pay for insurance—

It would be very interesting to know whether, at the time the arrangement was made for bounty payments to fishermen, all the 14,000, if there were that many at that time in the maritime provinces, were interviewed collectively or otherwise to secure their permission to use this money for that purpose. From the minister's statement it would seem that it would be utterly impossible at the present time to use the money for any other purpose without the permission of the 14,000 fishermen in the maritime provinces. The amount is on the record for the little county of Charlotte from which I come, and in the particular year referred to by the then minister of fisheries the fishermen of that county received about $3,000. That sum would not pay for one small boat if it were lost tomorrow. Surely there must be some way that members of the House of Commons can amend the regulation so that the money can be used for insurance rather than for the purpose to which it is being put at the present time.

[Mr. Stuart (Charlotte).]

I agree that if the majority of the fishermen were opposed to the idea I would not support it myself. I offer it as a suggestion. It seems absurd to me to think for one minute that in order to amend the regulation each individual fisherman in the maritime provinces will have to be consulted. I believe that is the job of members of parliament and I believe we have every right to do so if we wish.

The men who follow this hazardous calling are proud, independent citizens seeking a livelihood from the harvests of the sea. They do not ask for nor accept assistance from any source if conditions are such that a fair return may result from their long hours of toil. Owing to the lack of organization, which has been attempted on many occasions without success, and the complete failure of the old law of supply and demand to solve the problem, I most sincerely appeal to the Department of Fisheries and the government to regard the problems of these rugged individuals in the same light and with the same sympathetic consideration and understanding that has been accorded other primary producers in Canada. Let us as Canadians make every effort to have these fishermen included within that group whose standard of living has been so greatly improved by the guidance and assistance of this federal organization.

Mr. A. M. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I could not allow this opportunity to pass without rising to reassert my entire support of the fishermen of the maritime provinces and particularly of my native county of Gloucester. I wish to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart), on presenting this resolution to this house, and I must tell him at the outset that I am entirely in accord with it. It pleases me a great deal to be once in a while on the same side as the hon. member for Charlotte.

This resolution, Mr. Speaker, is of particular interest to my constituents and to me, for several reasons. First, it is of interest because of the importance of the fishing industry in our economy; second, because of the great losses suffered by the fishermen throughout the years in gear, vessels and men. Finally, it is of interest because this resolution is patterned, at least in its broader lines, on certain remarks and suggestions which I made in my maiden speech in this house on June 19 last, which remarks I repeated in my speech of December, 1952. I have always championed the cause of the fishermen. As I said in my maiden speech, I am a descendant of French Acadian fishermen, and I am proud of my ancestry. I have always classified the fishing industry as one of the most important, if not the most important, in my native county of Gloucester.

In view of the new gigantic mining development in the vicinity of my town of Bathurst in the county of Gloucester, just lately come to light, I feel that in the very near future I may be able to stand in this house and mention the new Gloucester zinc, lead, copper and silver mines, not only as the most important industry in my constituency and my province of New Brunswick but as the biggest discovery in its line in the whole history of Canadian mining. Nevertheless, the fishing industry will continue to be a most vital cog in the economic gears of my county and province. I fully agree with the following paragraph in the last bulletin of the fisheries council of Canada, and I quote:

> Unlike most of our basic resources, our fisheries of sea, lake and stream are self-renewing, and will provide work, wealth and food in perpetuity if carefully managed and protected.

I have stated the main reason for my support of this resolution, and that is because of the importance of the industry in my constituency.

At this stage, may I be permitted to digress from my main thought by saying that when I came to this house last June I had a great preconceived admiration for the western members of this house, and I still entertain that same admiration. Why? Because, Mr. Speaker, long before coming into this house, through reading Hansard and by following the newspapers, I found that the western members, be they Conservative, Liberal, C.C.F. or Social Crediters, whenever there was a question of interest to the agricultural industry in the west, always jumped in the same dory and rowed together until they made port. I congratulate them on so doing. Although I am a young member here and a novice and perhaps should not make any suggestion, yet may I be permitted to suggest to the hon. members from the maritime provinces, notwithstanding their political affiliations—and I appeal also to the members from the Pacific coast without any reservation as to political affiliation—that they join together in presenting a united front so that eventually we may be able to obtain from this house some of the things the member for Charlotte has suggested. I repeat what I have said before, that the fishermen of the maritime provinces particularly are the forgotten children, the orphans in the family of Canadian confederation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have underlined the importance of the fishing industry in my constituency. I shall not repeat what I have said before along those lines. May I, however, quote from the best available information as to the value of our fleet. We have a fleet of new dragger type vessels operating from the county of Gloucester consisting of 31 class 50 feet and class 60 feet vessels, at an aggregate value of $682,000 and with a total complement of 133 sailors. We have also about 850 motorized and sail schooners and smaller boats, of an aggregate value of $212,000 with a total complement of 1,700 sailors. Hence, we have vessels to the value of almost $1 million, with a complement of 1,833 men employed as sailors or fishermen, operating from my county. This figure does not take into account the thousands and thousands of dollars invested by our fishermen in lobster traps, in our famous oyster fishery, in our nets for herring, salmon or mackerel; nor does the figure of 1,833 men employed as sailors take account of our young men employed in fishing our famous oyster farms and beds, in clam digging, or the hundreds of men and women employed in our fish processing plants such as our lobster canneries, our clam canneries and our freezers. These figures, and the addition I have made to them by referring to the rest of our fishing population, will give this house some idea of the importance of the industry to my county.

Passing now to a subject which has been touched upon by the member for Charlotte, I should like to mention the losses sustained by the fishermen of Gloucester county. I have mentioned this subject to the house whenever the opportunity arose. I am very pleased, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) is in the house. I am pleased to say to this house that I have had nothing but co-operation from the minister and his department in the probably all too numerous demands I have addressed to him. It is impossible to give a complete picture of the losses sustained by our fishermen throughout the years. There were no statistics kept 25 or 30 years ago, whereas our fish inspectors and fish supervisors in my county are doing a good job in keeping track of everything now. I believe that we have now the best available information so far as all branches of our fisheries are concerned.

May I also say—and this may be of interest to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) —that conditions have changed over the years. In former years, Mr. Speaker, all or practically all of our vessels, schooners and fishing boats, were owned by companies—such as Robin, Jones and Whitman or such as the Loggie companies—and the schooners and fishing boats were rented to our fishermen, fully equipped. They were rented to our fishermen for a certain annual rent or consideration. Hence the companies were assuming all risk of loss. When there was a broken cable, a torn sail or even when there was a total loss, the whole thing was absorbed by the owners or the companies. But there has been a marked evolution in fisheries in our county.

Through the help of these co-operatives and, through strict economy on the part of our captains and of our sailors, I think I can safely say that today our fishermen own most if not all of the vessels and fishing gear in my county. We are now faced with the situation that when we have a loss, either minor or major, the captain or the ship owner must bear the loss. Someone may say: Why not carry insurance on those ships against marine risk and against fire risk? My reply would be that if you would just take the trouble to consult the table of standard rates of insurance on those ships, you would immediately conclude that our fishermen simply do not have the means to do so.

May I refer to some of the major losses in the Gloucester county fishing fleet since the turn of the century. In 1900 we had, in the gulf of St. Lawrence, this awful storm which caused the Gloucester county fishing fleet the loss of nine fishing schooners and of thirty-five fishermen who were drowned at sea. In 1914—the year of the outbreak of the first war—there was another terrific storm in the gulf; and again our Gloucester county fleet was penalized by the loss of six big schooners and twenty-two fishermen who lost their lives on that occasion. Of course in those days no claim was ever filed for loss because, I suppose, nobody knew how to do it. In any event, no claims were filed and consequently nothing was ever paid to these fishermen.

In 1921, Mr. Speaker, an incident occurred whilst I was attending college and during the summer holidays while I was myself on a schooner owned and captained by one of my late uncles. While we were attempting to make Shippigan gully during the height of a storm in June, I personally witnessed a spectacle which I shall never forget; I cannot forget it. At the very entrance of Shippigan gully, at the bar—that is the sand bar but it is called "the bar" in fishermen's language —I saw a St. Simon schooner hit the bar and break in two with the resulting loss of the lives of Captain Doiron and his crew of four.

Now that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) is in the house I make to him a special appeal for the necessary credits so that the famous Shippigan gully will be properly dredged at the earliest possible opportunity. If the Minister of Public Works will only consult with the officials of his department, he will find that this important entrance in the northern part of the province—it is really the funnel or the link between the gulf and Chaleur bay—has not been touched by a dredge for at least thirty years.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Robichaud: During the Christmas recess several captains of draggers were at my office and they said to me: Robichaud, you must come with me next summer—and I will—out of Shippigan in order to see for yourself the pitiful conditions with which we are faced. Some of these draggers—in fact most of them—oftentimes have to come in from a distance of eighty to ninety miles at sea, in the dark, during the thick of a storm and enter Shippigan gully, which is a narrow one. You may not appreciate as I do the danger with which such trips are fraught; but I am making to the Minister of Public Works a special appeal that this Shippigan gully matter be fully investigated and that the necessary dredging be done at once so that we shall not have any more casualties amongst our fishing fleet.

In the years 1949, 1950, 1951 and 1952, according to the best available information, I am told that our total losses in fishing gear, nets, lobster traps and so on amounted to $24,800. Last year our bay inshore fishermen suffered extensive damage to their fishing gear. This matter has been brought to the attention of the Department of Fisheries and I must thank the Minister of Fisheries for the ruling which has recently been made. I wish to refer to the damage caused by the dragging operations of our draggers in Chaleur bay to the fishing apparatus and gear owned by the inshore fishermen. Last year and the year before, Mr. Speaker, our inshore fishermen lost thousands and thousands of dollars in gear which was swept away when draggers came too near to shore and dragged everything away, including nets, trawls and lobster traps. In all fairness and justice it seems to me there should be some way or means of remunerating these inshore fishermen for these losses. They lay their trawls, set their nets, set their lobster traps, mark them with buoys and a post which is six or seven feet above water; and these draggers come along, drag all along the coast and carry everything away. Is this encouragement to these hardy toilers of the sea, our inshore fishermen?

At the end of December, 1952, or the beginning of January 1953, there was a big fire at the Blanchard machine shop in Le Bouthillier P.O., in the parish of Caraquet. This machine shop is the only place to which our dragger captains and owners could bring their motors or the parts of their motors or dragging gear to be repaired during the lay-off in the winter season. I have here a list of losses sustained by our dragger owners and captains on account of that fire and amounting to over $20,000. The lowest figure on this list is $150 and they go as high, for one dragger captain, as $4,000, which means that he lost his diesel motor completely. Again it may be said: Why do the captains not insure against fire? Again I repeat—and I know whereof I speak—that our captains simply cannot afford to pay the standard rates of fire insurance against their boats, vessels and gear.

I should like to cite another concrete and specific instance of loss which our fishermen sustained and for which they were never compensated. Some two years ago, during the height of a storm in Chaleur bay a big boom of pulpwood was broken by the storm. Hundreds and hundreds of cords of pulpwood came ashore. The nets of our salmon fishermen in Petit Rocher, Beresford and Nigadoo suffered damages amounting to thousands and thousands of dollars. Their claims were submitted to the pulp mill companies who owned the pulpwood, but of course they put up their hands and pleaded that it was an act of God and that was the end of it.

I submit that facts like these, matters like these, damages such as I have related to this house, which are not the result of my imagination, but concrete, specific cases which have occurred in my own county, should be considered by the Department of Fisheries whenever any agency is set up such as has been suggested by the hon. member for Charlotte.

Hon. gentlemen will recall that last year I rose in my place in this house as a green member—I am still quite green, but not as green as I was then—and I put a question to the then minister of fisheries, the Hon. Mr. Mayhew, and asked him whether any claims had been filed, or whether there was any possibility of our fishermen getting any remuneration for the losses they had suffered through storms. Reference to Hansard will reveal that the answer given to me by the then minister of fisheries was to the effect that no claims had been filed. I now bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, and particularly to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries, a particular instance of a claim, and a big one, which was filed in due form in 1950. Of course that was before the present Minister of Fisheries occupied his position. It was filed by the fishermen of Northumberland county, which is our neighbouring county. I am sorry that the hon. member representing Northumberland, N.B. (Mr. McWilliam) is not in his seat today, because I feel sure he would corroborate what I am about to say. The total losses suffered by the smelt fishermen of the county of Northumberland during December, 1949, and January, 1950, amounted to the gigantic sum of $81,256. This was substantiated in toto, Mr. Speaker, by a detailed statement of fifteen pages containing the names and addresses of all the fishermen who had suffered damage; the number of nets, the size of nets, the number of leaders lost and the total of each individual claim were submitted to the Department of Fisheries in the summer of 1950. A suggestion was also made at that time by the central committee of the Northumberland county fishermen that a special commission should be set up by the Department of Fisheries consisting of a chairman appointed by the federal government, with representation on the commission from the Department of Fisheries, and one member to be appointed by the fishermen themselves.

The purpose of the proposed commission was to inquire into the then existing conditions of the fishing industry of the neighbouring county of Northumberland. It was also further suggested that one of the commission's first duties would be to inquire into and decide whether the enormous losses suffered by the Northumberland county smelt fishermen during the season just past were the normal hazards of the trade, or whether they might be considered in the nature of an act of God. My information is that the proposed commission was never set up; nor were the Northumberland smelt fishermen ever compensated for their great losses of smelt fishing equipment in December 1949 and January 1950.

The attitude—and this is what I want to bring to the attention of the house—the attitude of the Department of Fisheries at that time was one of the so common pass-the-buck attitudes which I have had occasion to observe on the part of the government during the few short months that I have been here. The decision rendered in the late summer of 1950 by the Department of Fisheries was to the effect that whilst the losses were unquestionably serious to the fishermen, the said losses—and mark these words—the said losses do not appear to have reached the extent which could be classified as a calamity of national significance, and that any compensation which might be paid would fall into the category of relief which, generally speaking, according to the ruling we received from the Department of Fisheries, was purely a provincial responsibility.

I was very much surprised to see that word "relief" in the departmental ruling, because I thought that this government looked upon the word "relief" with holy horror. But what astounds me, Mr. Speaker, is that no consideration is given by the departmental authorities to claims submitted for losses by fishermen unless and until they reach the stage of a calamity of national significance.

As the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) has suggested, why should we not be put on a par with the western farmers? He has voted in favour of assistance to the western farmers, and if I have the opportunity to vote to assist the western farmer I shall do so. But we are simply asking this house to give our fishermen fair, just and equitable treatment, and not make fish of one and flesh of another.

May I now deal with the question of more recent losses. I am glad that my colleague, the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Leger), is in his seat. May I refer to the Evangeline, our French newspaper of Moncton, N.B., of January 20. I find an article relating to the losses of the smelt fishermen of Buctouche in the county of my hon. friend. According to this article the smelt fishermen of Buctouche bay have lost more than 60 nets carried away by the ice through Northumberland strait. The minimum loss, according to the article in the newspaper, is set at $6,000, with a possibility of reaching a maximum of $10,000. These figures, Mr. Speaker, are in addition to the losses of the catch before the nets can be replaced.

I have attempted to give concrete evidence, specific instances, of losses suffered by our fishermen by storms and moving ice. Ice does not give any advance notice before it moves. These losses have been suffered by our fishermen not only of the county of Gloucester, but in the neighbouring county of Northumberland and some in the sister county of Kent.

I now come to the resolution itself. My analysis of this resolution, which I heartily support, reveals that its object is to obtain legislation to render to the fishing industry assistance comparable to the legislation already enacted in favour of agriculture, and to attain this end some investigation must be carried out, as the resolution suggests, and it ought to be conducted into the economic conditions of our fishing industry. In my opinion the investigation mentioned in the resolution should not be carried out by a commission or a fact-finding board or a board of inquiry, call it what you may, composed solely of departmental employees.

I have nothing but the greatest respect and admiration for the biologists and the technologists of the Department of Fisheries. They really have performed, in the field of fishing, feats which border on the miraculous. As concrete evidence of my assertion may I refer to an article in the same French newspaper of New Brunswick, the Evangeline. I do not know whether any of the hon. gentlemen have read this article. I find in this French newspaper of New Brunswick, in its issue of January 20, 1953, an article which deals with the treatment of trout with aureomycin. This article reveals that recently the piscicultural establishment at Jasper national park has produced a more vigorous trout by adding to its ordinary food this magic drug known as aureomycin. It is reported that during thirteen weeks in the Jasper national park fish hatchery small quantities of aureomycin were given to some 3,000 small, young trout. After that period of time the young trout which had been thus treated were, on the average—and this is very interesting—a quarter of an inch longer than those which had been provided only with their customary ration. Moreover, according to the article, the normal death or loss rate among the latter group was three times greater than among the young trout whose food had been treated with small doses of aureomycin. This is one more instance of the miraculous feats performed in the study of fish by biologists and technologists in the Department of Fisheries.

In my submission, however, in order to conduct a thorough and practical investigation into the economic difficulties of the fishing industry of Canada, the Department of Fisheries would be well advised to have representatives of fish dealers and some practical and experienced fishermen serving on a board of inquiry or commission, to work alongside departmental experts. Great care should also be exercised in order that every important branch of the fishing industry in Canada may be represented, and properly represented, on such a fact-finding body. I contend that the cod fishermen or the salmon fishermen can give no practical assistance to the sardine fishermen, and vice versa.

Granted, therefore, that every important branch of the industry be properly represented, with due regard to the particular problems attendant upon each major producing area in our dominion, I feel we would at last have a real, practical and sensible board of inquiry or investigation.

On such a board, experts in biology and technology would have the opportunity to marry their knowledge with the practical experience and common-sense suggestions offered by men in the trade. Under these conditions I believe the Canadian fishing industry could naturally and logically expect great results.

Commissions composed of so-called experts and technicians, however high and numerous their qualifications may have been, have been touring Canada and will no doubt continue to do so at great expense to the Canadian taxpayer, and have always reminded me—and this long before I came to this House of Commons—of a famous saying of one of our French fabulists: "La montagne qui enfante une souris." When stated in English this means: "A mountain brings forth a mouse." I suggest therefore to the Department of Fisheries that should it give favourable consideration to this resolution—and I hope it will—it should bear in mind that the fishermen of Canada will expect concrete results and not mere empty propositions; practical effectiveness rather than theoretical deductions in the study of their problems. Perhaps when I say this I should confine my observations to the fishermen of Gloucester, and I shall do so. They will not accept any vague proposition.

The fishermen have many problems. In order to reach this goal the Department of Fisheries should therefore make a special effort to democratize any board of inquiry or commission it may consider setting up. By bringing such board or commission closer to the fishermen of Canada it would assure a report which would be really beneficial to the fishing industry throughout the country.

In order to be logical, after having offered certain suggestions perhaps I should go further—dealing always with the resolution—and amplify some of the nice points my good friend from Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) has underlined. What are the remedies for the pitiful situation of the fishermen about whom my hon. friend has spoken—as a matter of fact, the fishermen of Canada?

There may be many remedies, but I have a few I should like to suggest to the house and bring to the attention particularly of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) and his department. In my maiden speech in the House of Commons on June 19, 1952, I said:

I therefore feel justified in asking the Minister of Fisheries to give immediate attention to the matter, with a view to setting up,—and this is the important point—a system of federal aid to compensate our fishermen for the heavy losses they sustain through storms.

Since there is no hesitation in granting aid to farmers and stock-breeders during epidemics, why not give assistance to the fishermen who are constantly victims of the worst plague there is—and I know something about it—storms at sea.

Again, speaking in the house on December 1 last I made this suggestion, as it is reported at pages 230 and 231 of Hansard:

Before concluding my remarks on the question of fisheries, may I again stress the necessity of providing fishermen with some form of remuneration for losses sustained through storms. I am informed that a plan is now under advisement by the Department of Fisheries to establish a permanent program of insurance as well as loans—interest free, I hope—to storm-stricken fishermen. May I advocate the elaboration of a system following the broad outline of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act which has proved to be highly beneficial to western farmers. I am also in favour of extending the plan now under study so as to embrace some kind of cheap contributory insurance not alone on the fishing equipment but on the lives of our fishermen as well. After all, there is in my submission no more hazardous occupation than that of those hardy and courageous toilers of the sea who risk everything and face the ever-recurring dangers of storm and sea in order to develop the fishing grounds of Canada's Atlantic and Pacific coasts, which are recognized as the richest in the world. Hence special consideration should be given by our government to the welfare of Canada's fishermen; and a protective scheme of assistance and insurance is indeed long past due.

May I now refer to a system of social security which, I am told, has been in vogue in France for a number of years, a system I would advise the Department of Fisheries to study with great care. This system of social security in France is concerned not only with fishermen but also covers the young men in the merchant marine of that country.

After I had spoken in the house in June of last year a friend of mine, Mr. H. M. Rive from Caraquet, N.B., a man who, because of having been brought up in the fishing industry, is an expert in fisheries questions, a man who has specialized in that industry during his lifetime, wrote an article in our weekly paper in Gloucester, the Gloucester Northern Light in which he referred to the system in France which affords social security to the fishermen and merchant marine of that country. This article dated July 7, 1952, states—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order. I must call the hon. member's attention to the fact that his time has expired.

Mr. Robichaud: I would be only a few more minutes.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Robichaud: Thank you.

Referring to this system of social security in France the article states:

The first condition is that the prospective candidate for either career must have attended school until the age of 13. On applying, his name is entered in a register opposite a number, which will ensure his identity for life, after he has served a month's apprenticeship.

At the age of 50, he is entitled to an annual pension, provided he has fished or followed the sea for 300 months. At his death, his wife continues to receive half the pension, and the children under 16, an allowance of so much a day, as long as the mother remains a widow.

Provision is made also for what is called proportional indemnity in case of death before 50, and for a provident indemnity in cases of sickness or injury, while engaged in his particular work. His personal belongings, also, are insured against loss by fire, shipwreck or any other cause, incidental to his occupation.

I hope the Department of Fisheries will study this scheme of social security for fishermen which has been in force for a number of years in France and which I am told is working very well.

Before resuming my seat I should like to direct attention to a recent threat to our famous lobster industry. A British United Press dispatch to Evangeline, our daily French newspaper published in Moncton, New Brunswick, states that a bill is to be introduced very soon in the Massachusetts state legislature to compel exporters of fresh lobster meat to pasteurize their product rather than to preserve it by refrigeration as has heretofore been the practice. I submit to the Department of Fisheries that most of our fresh lobster meat exporters will have to go out of business if that bill goes through.

This article of January 21 states that this same bill provides for the exclusion of Canadian fresh and frozen lobster from the Boston market, which is the most profitable market we have. I have a question on the order paper about this, but I am bringing this up at this time as I believe it is of urgent importance. I ask the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) to tell the house what steps have been taken to block this measure.

A similar bill was presented some years ago in the same state legislature. The fishermen of the maritime provinces organized themselves without any help from Ottawa. They hired a lawyer in Boston and the bill was blocked, but we cannot be hiring Boston lawyers every day. I think this is a matter for the attention of the federal government.

I thank the house for letting me have a few minutes extra. I am heartily in accord with the resolution submitted by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart). I hope the principles that we have underlined and the concrete suggestions which we have submitted to the Department of Fisheries will receive favourable attention. I know the Minister of Fisheries has the development, the expansion and the future of the industry at heart.

[Mr. Robichaud.]

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I support the resolution moved by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart). I am sorry that my deskmate, the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), is not here because he is a member of the fisheries committee and has always been most prominent in taking up cudgels on behalf of the fishermen. I congratulate the hon. member for Charlotte upon bringing forward this resolution, which reads:

That, in the opinion of the house, the government should consider the advisability of investigating the economic condition of the fishing industry in Canada with a view to recommending legislation designed to render assistance to the industry comparable to the legislation already enacted to provide assistance for agriculture.

I want to assure the hon. member and other fishermen in the house that I am in favour of their getting as much assistance as agriculture gets. I do not think it should be only one way. This investigation would not be ahead of time because I know of many fishermen who are going broke today. The two previous members who spoke are fishermen, and I have not their experience. I have gone out on the herring fishing boats on the river Clyde as a boy, and I have been out on the lakes of Manitoba once or twice, but that does not justify me in saying that I am a fisherman.

I wonder if the hon. member who introduced this resolution intended it to apply to the prairie fisheries. As the hon. gentleman knows, fishing on the prairies is under the provincial governments but the problems there are the same. When the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) speaks in the debate I hope he will clear up that point. I should like to see the prairie fisheries included in the investigation suggested by the hon. member.

There may be some hon. members who have never been west and who may be interested in knowing that in Manitoba we have lakes over 400 miles long, where the storms are bigger than any I have seen on the Atlantic. The fishermen out there are facing difficult times. They are getting a very low price for their fish, and I think it only right and proper that some form of floor or guaranteed price be provided as is done in the case of agricultural products, so they may obtain a fair return for the services they render.

Someone may say that if a floor price is set there will be too many fishermen. That cannot take place on the lakes in Manitoba because the catch is regulated; there can be only so many fish caught each year. During the war we had a guaranteed and set price and the fishermen got a square deal, the processors got a square deal and the consumers got a square deal. I do not think there would be any harm in bringing something like that back again.

I think the fishermen could help themselves a great deal by co-operative methods. I have suggested to former ministers of fisheries that in the grant made for co-operative education something should be provided for the co-operative education of the fishermen of the prairie provinces. Up to the present time I have never been able to get anything for Manitoba or the other two prairie provinces.

The new Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) is progressive, and a go-ahead type. I will not praise him any more because, knowing his past history, I do not think it would agree with him. However, I hope that one of these days he will give some consideration to seeing that we get a few dollars out of what is set aside for co-operative education.

I do not want to take up a lot of time. I support the motion, and if anything is done I want it to apply to prairie fishing. I should like to see guaranteed prices. As I have already said, the catch is regulated so that there would not be too many fish caught, or too many people getting rich quickly.

We have terrific storms on lake Winnipeg and lake Manitoba. The fishermen there also lose their boats and gear and run into all kinds of difficulty. We subsidize people who dig for gold. I think people who produce food are more entitled to assistance than people who dig for gold. I want to endorse the resolution again, and when the minister replies I hope he will tell me whether the resolution can apply to prairie conditions.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word or two on this matter. I had not intended to speak, but the mover of the resolution brought the Fraser valley into the debate. As you will notice, Mr. Speaker, I do not have a prepared speech as did all others with the exception of the last speaker. Probably one reason I have not is that I understood the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to intimate yesterday that the date of the election has not yet been set. Therefore, unlike the two speakers from the maritimes, I did not come down to the house with a prepared speech in an endeavour to convince the electors of my riding that I should be returned.

Apparently one can talk about anything on this resolution, Mr. Speaker, and I want to congratulate the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) who looks as young today as she did thirty years ago when I first knew her.

We in the province of British Columbia are proud and privileged to support this resolution because we are confident that it, or any other resolution having to do with the betterment of the conditions of fishermen, will be made effective under the present Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair). My main reason for speaking is that the mover of the resolution, who comes from a very small riding in the maritimes, brought up the same matter last year, and whether or not he meant it he implied that agriculture was enjoying a preferred position. I defy him or any other member to point to any member representing an agricultural riding in any province of Canada who has not supported the fishermen on every occasion.

An hon. Member: Keep on doing so.

Mr. Cruickshank: We intend to. Incidentally, more salmon are spawned in my riding than in any other two ridings combined.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cruickshank: Do you want to dispute that? Did you not know it? Did you ever hear of the famous Fraser river?

Mr. Robichaud: I have seen it. That is more than I can say of you with respect to the baie de Chaleur.

Mr. Cruickshank: I want to point out that we produce more fish in the province of British Columbia than any other five provinces in the Dominion of Canada combined, and the Fraser river is the spawning ground of the salmon. Maybe you did not know that. When these members come here and say that those interested in agriculture are opposing them, or intimate that they are—

An hon. Member: No, no.

Mr. Cruickshank: All right; you will have an opportunity to make your speech. I will make my own and I will not take 55 or 60 minutes to make a re-election speech in order to say that a rowboat must be replaced if it turns over and goes down. I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that when a farmer loses his manure spreader by fire he replaces it himself. He does not come running to the government to have it replaced. The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) implied that this parliament gave $10 million—I do not know whether he quoted the figure—at the time of the Fraser valley floods. Apparently the hon. member for Charlotte has never seen the great Pacific where the real fish come from that are shipped to the old country and elsewhere and not to the House of Commons.

Mr. Riley: You never tasted good fish.

Mr. Cruickshank: Since I came here I have seen a lot of them.

Mr. Riley: We have some poor ones.

Mr. Cruickshank: Another member from the maritimes is heard from. In particular, when I hear them talking about lobster—

Mr. Riley: The best salmon in the world are in my riding.

Mr. Cruickshank: I came here in 1940 before my friend was old enough to be nominated, and at that time we spent $54,000 to advertise lobster in an endeavour to clear the market. If you go downtown in Ottawa now or at any time of the year and try to buy a lobster the price is so high that if I were selling them I would be able to retire and give pensions not only to the members of the house but to the page boys as well.

Mr. Sinclair: Are you against good prices for lobster fishermen?

Mr. Cruickshank: I am in favour of all fishermen getting their just deserts, and we expect that from the minister, coming as he does from the province of British Columbia.

Mr. Riley: That is what the maritime members have been asking for.

Mr. Cruickshank: Now, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Knowles: What is this, a party caucus?

Mr. Cruickshank: The junior member over here, with all the geniality—

Mr. Riley: Who loves you.

Mr. Cruickshank: —of his race and name wants to assist me, but the Minister of Fisheries happens to come not from Ireland but from Scotland, and for that reason the fishermen will get due pay for everything they produce. I want to point out something to the hon. member for Charlotte who is a very good friend of mine. I think "Charlotte" is right although I get confused because there is another Charlotte around this town whom I do not like.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order.

Mr. Cruickshank: I have said nothing wrong, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member said that this money was spent in the Fraser valley for agriculture. I want to point out to the hon. member that the third city of Canada, the gateway to our greatest potential market, Asia, is served by two transcontinental railways whose lines were out of use for a month and a half because of the floods. The hon. member said the money was spent to aid the Fraser valley farmers. Nonsense. It is the same kind of nonsense that was uttered by my friend over here who talked about a little boat turning over and wanting the government to insure it.

Mr. Robichaud: I should like to have seen you in that little boat.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Mr. Cruickshank: Maybe you would like to see me in it, but I have no intention of getting into your little boat.

Mr. Robichaud: I should like to see you seasick.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Riley: He is always seasick.

Mr. Cruickshank: My friend may want to see me seasick, but let me assure him that I was never so near to being seasick as when I was listening to him.

Mr. Robichaud: You were the other night.

Mr. Cruickshank: Leave me alone, because I am not going to take this stuff. I know I speak for every farmer member in the house when I say they believe that the fishermen should be assisted. As I understand it, the hon. member for Charlotte wants floor prices. Is that not correct? Is that not the meaning of your resolution? I understand he wants equal treatment with agriculture and everybody else. He wants floor prices.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, all I asked for was that the same consideration be given those engaged in the fishing industry that is given to those engaged in agriculture.

Mr. Cruickshank: I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. member that I am entirely in accord with that and will be glad to vote for it. However, I also want to point out that apparently my friend does not believe in his own motion in its entirety. He spoke of sardines, and I understand sardines require oil. My friend the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) believes we should bring in cheap oil, of all things, in which to preserve sardines. I want to quote a rather interesting article from the Ottawa Journal. It is a good newspaper if you cannot get any other. In the Journal of Monday, January 26, 1953, I find this headline, "Oleo, dynamite, in car bring arrest." The article reads in part:

> Police held today a 46-year old man after his car was found here Saturday containing margarine, dynamite and detonating caps.

What a combination! You do not need to put a dynamite cap in margarine to make you sick. Here is my friend, right here in this house, stating that we should bring in this cheap oil in which to preserve this idiotic little fish called the sardine.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Cruickshank: Yes.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Does the hon. member believe in high tariffs or free trade?

Mr. Knowles: Most Liberals do.

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member for Fraser Valley believes in free trade all across the board, not just one way. I have heard the hon. member speaking here—but I shall be called to order if I mention these frigidaires. I do want to say this. I have almost as many fishermen in my riding as he has in his. I am quite sure I have more than my hon. friend across the way.

An hon. Member: You are wrong.

Mr. Cruickshank: We will count them. Certainly, the fishermen in my riding show better judgment in their selection of a representative at Ottawa. I want to say that the fishermen in my riding believe that your fishermen and my fishermen should have equal rights or assistance, whether by law, by subsidy or any other way, but we do not want you to go around saying the farmer is getting any more benefits than the fisherman.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): It is not my intention to take very much time this afternoon, but on behalf of the Social Credit party I want to support in its entirety the resolution that has been moved by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart). I am greatly surprised that a similar resolution was not moved many years ago. Being one of those who has lived practically all his life on the land, I am not in a position to go into details in connection with the fishing industry. But having crossed the Atlantic some years ago in one of the largest ships afloat at that time, I recall the tossing around we got. Having visited Halifax last summer in company with many other members of the house, I had the opportunity of taking a short ride around the harbour. I can understand what these fishermen have gone through when storms overtook them during the course of their daily work.

I know, too, what we prairie farmers have suffered in the past because of conditions over which we had no control, and over which we still have no control. I appreciate, as do all farmers, the assistance given us under P.F.A. and similar legislation. I do not want anyone to feel that we want that kind of legislation enacted for farmers alone. I believe the fishermen are also entitled to similar legislation. We have an entirely different set-up, of course. Having had the opportunity of seeing the fishermen at work unloading their boats, and of visiting a fish plant in Halifax, personally I would not change my place as a farmer with any fisherman along the coast. I expect the same conditions obtain on the west coast.

Rather than take up a lot of time, as I know there are many members who are interested in fishing and who want to speak on this resolution, I shall take my seat now and assure the hon. member for Charlotte of my wholehearted support for this resolution.

Mr. J. L. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I, too, should like to join the other members, Mr. Speaker, in offering my congratulations to the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart). It is gratifying to see that this session we have had two afternoons devoted to a debate on fisheries, whereas normally we just get one day to discuss the affairs of perhaps the most important department of government. It is certainly the most important department to those of us who live in the maritime provinces. We have a great many debates on agriculture around this house, but very few on fisheries. I sometimes think that perhaps the same consideration is not given to fisheries that is given to agriculture by members of the cabinet. I should like to point out to the members of the cabinet that the Lord was fairer. They will recall the miracle of the loaves and fishes, and I am quite sure they will recall that He treated the loaves and fishes in the same way. Perhaps that is a good thought for the cabinet to keep in the back of their minds.

Fishermen are very independent people, and I believe we are quite proud of that fact. Perhaps they have been too independent in the past. It seems to me that they do not realize the truth of the old adage that the squeaking wheel gets the grease. Certainly since I came down here in 1945 I have heard a great many squeaks from members representing agricultural ridings, and perhaps not enough from those representing the fishermen.

Now we have a new Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair). I have the greatest confidence in him, and believe he will bring a new approach to this problem. I might just point out to him—I do not know whether or not there is anything indicative about this—that both he and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) are fortunate enough to have been named "Jimmy". Whether or not there is any connotation to that word that might have something to do with prying money loose from the treasury board, I hope he works it to the greatest possible extent.

At one time you and I, Mr. Speaker, had the good fortune to visit a prairie town in company with our good friend the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher). There was not as much activity in that town as there is in the average fishing town. Fishermen always seem to have to rush around in order to make a living. On the occasion when we went to this prairie town, it reminded us of Goldsmith's deserted village. We ran into our good guide and mentor who said, "I know where the boys will be; they will be down at the curling rink." We went down there because it was the only place in town completely surrounded by expensive automobiles. We went in there and met some charming people, friends of his, and also some Liberals, I think. There was a furious argument going on as to the relative merits of Cadillacs, Buicks and Chrysler Imperials, and whether they were good for hunting ducks or touring Mexico. I said to the hon. member for Moose Jaw, "Where is your statue?" He said, "There was no war around here to which we have to raise a statue." I said, "No, but surely you must have a statue of the Minister of Agriculture; surely these people would not be so unappreciative that they would not have a statue of him." He said, "No, they have not." I can tell the Minister of Fisheries that if he does one quarter as much for the fishermen as the Minister of Agriculture has done for the farmers, he will live forever in bronze in every small fishing village.

Let us take a look at pork, for instance. We got into a little trouble in the pork business a short time ago because of the United States embargo. This cabinet acted with furious speed, I thought with almost unseemly haste. They acted, first of all, to ensure that the producer of pork got a profit. That was fine, and I was glad to hear it. They made sure that the packer who canned that pork got a profit. Then the government turned around and sold that pork to the Canadian consumer at less than cost. Well, perhaps one could argue that was a virtuous thing for them to do.

What happened when the salmon canners got into the same position? We were cut out of the United Kingdom market by a virtual embargo because of the United Kingdom's lack of dollars. The government did not step in in any way to try to stabilize that market and to prevent the distress selling that actually took place. As a result one of our largest fishery co-operatives in British Columbia went bankrupt. That was an unfortunate circumstance for a large number of fishermen there. I may say that every large fishing company in British Columbia lost large sums of money this past year. After all, when a company out there loses—as many individual companies have—more than a million dollars this year, the government actually loses 52 per cent of the amount in taxes. I do not have any trouble in pointing that fact out to my friend the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). For a small sum of money this government could have put stability into that market and could have prevented the distress selling which actually occurred and which created these losses as a result of which I say the treasury here lost a great deal of revenue. I think we could have been wiser in the way we handled that matter last year. With the representations that my good friend the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) will be able to make to the cabinet in the future, I hope such things will not happen again.

The fishing industry does not want to be spoon-fed. Those engaged in that industry are extremely independent and highly capable. But I should like to see the same consideration given to them that is given to the agricultural industry. In British Columbia we had a surplus of 500,000 cases of fish—I refer to canned salmon, the best in the world—and it is lying there as a threat to the market. In the agricultural industry, however, the Canadian government have stepped in and I believe they are now the proud possessors and owners of about 40 million pounds of butter in this country. Just the other day I read in the paper—whether I have inferred too much from what I saw there I do not know—that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) suggested that this 40 million pounds of butter be kept from the market in order to stabilize the price of butter.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is that not good business?

Mr. Gibson: I think probably it is excellent business; but I certainly wish the government of Canada owned that 40 million pounds of canned salmon in British Columbia.

Mr. Cruickshank: Get after the minister.

Mr. Gibson: Then in case the price dropped to a disastrous level for the Canadian producer the government may say: We will hold our salmon off the market. If it is a good thing in the one case it is certainly good in the other.

I was only trying to make a practical approach. I am not trying to disparage anything that has been done for the agricultural industry or to say that it should not have been done. But at the same time I should like us to assist, if we can, the Minister of Fisheries in bringing before his colleagues the way the members from the fishery ridings feel with regard to matters of this kind.

There are many aspects of the fishing industry, and they cannot all be discussed in one short debate like this one. I apologize for having taken up this much time when I know there are many other hon. members who wish to speak. Now that we have this new Minister of Fisheries I am sure the government will listen to his representations and do everything they possibly can for the fishing industry.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by complimenting the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) on bringing this resolution before the house. Since practically all my constituents are fishermen, I should be remiss in my duty if I did not rise in my place to support this resolution and endorse the constructive suggestions put forth by my colleagues.

I am sure my constituents would also wish me to take advantage of this opportunity to express to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair), to his colleagues in the cabinet and to the officials of his department their sincere gratitude for what has already been done in their interest. Without the deficiency payments on shore-cured fish in 1951 and 1952 the families of many of our shore fishermen would have had to go without sufficient food, clothing and fuel, and the fishermen themselves would have been forced to leave the fishing industry altogether in order to seek more remunerative employment.

The bounty of $165 per ton for certain classes of fishing boats is enabling many fishermen to provide themselves with suitable vessels essential to the use of modern methods of fish production. The success of the experiments with the long-liners which were carried out by the federal government has caught the interest and the imagination of our Newfoundland fishermen, many of whom are now providing themselves with this type of boat.

The discovery of rich, new inshore fishing grounds by the fisheries research department has opened up easily accessible sources of supply hitherto unknown. This has been an added incentive to encourage fishermen to modernize their fishing methods. The research department is at present engaged in an experiment with the artificial drying of light salted fish. If a satisfactory solution to this problem can be found, and one that is economically feasible, it will be one of the greatest single contributions ever made to the welfare of our Newfoundland fishermen. Along with these there have been many lesser achievements such as the expansion of the patrol service and particularly the protection of the inland fisheries by increasing the staff of river guardians.

I think it is right to mention these things because human memory is short and we are prone to forget our benefits and remember only our needs. Though much has already been done, a great deal more remains to be achieved. We need far more river guardians not only in my own riding but throughout the whole province of Newfoundland, particularly along the salmon rivers of Labrador. Our patrol service needs to be improved by the use of faster and more suitable vessels.

We also need to concentrate more on fishery research and conservation. We need to locate and learn about the movements of the large schools of herring which frequent the shores of our province and which we know to exist. The herring industry alone is capable of being developed so that its value will exceed that of all other fish caught in Newfoundland. We need more experiments with the curing of different varieties of fish, with the canning of fish and also with fancy cured fish. This will take considerable time and will require a great deal of money; but these projects are primarily a federal responsibility.

We need also more research with respect to salt-cured fish. What is a light salted fish? What is a heavy salted fish? Fishermen in various parts of Newfoundland have different answers to this question. The answer is all the more complicated because the salinity of the salt used is hardly ever uniform, even for the same grade of salt. Definite answers to these questions must be provided before standardization of quality can take place.

I am one of those who believe there will always be a market for salt-cured fish. People who live in hot climates lose a great deal of salt from their bodies due to excessive perspiration. This salt is essential to health and must be replaced. The cheapest source for replacement is salt-cured fish in which the salt is combined with high-grade protein which is also an essential to health.

Some economists advise us that the salt cod market is not economical and that we should get out of it as quickly as possible. The answer is that we cannot get out of it even if we want to; but I do not think we should want to because those people in hot countries need fish for food; and if they are poor people, they need cheap fish. I think we should put people's needs first. I believe that if we have the courage and the faith to put the motive of feeding hungry people ahead of the profit motive, then other factors will come into play which the economist does not ordinarily take into consideration and which will automatically provide the profits which the producers need.

I do hope also that some means will be found to provide unemployment insurance for our fishermen. A beginning in this direction could be made by making eligible those fishermen who are employed on monthly wages.

Above all, Mr. Speaker, we need a better deal for the primary producers. The farmers and the fishermen have very much in common; they are both primary producers. These primary producers are the people who run the risks, take all the hazards and endure all the hardships. Very often they risk their lives and everything they own. We want them to have as good a deal as possible. Scientific research can do much to minimize the hardship and reduce the risk, but before the fishermen can be in a position to take advantage of those benefits some capital assistance will be necessary.

The fishing industry is the second largest food producing industry in Canada, and though its market value is much smaller than the value of farm products, yet it is of sufficient importance to justify the consideration that has been requested for it today.

Again I should like to express my gratitude to the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) for providing this opportunity to debate this resolution and to focus upon the fishing industry the attention that its importance warrants.

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise to support this motion by the hon. member for Charlotte, because the underlying ideas that are expressed in it have already been mentioned by me in this house on more than one occasion. I too am of the opinion that this government should pass legislation designed to render assistance to the fishing industry comparable to the legislation already enacted to provide assistance for agriculture. I too think it would be a good idea to establish a board to investigate the economic condition of the fishing industry of Canada with a view to making the necessary recommendations.

I am particularly interested in problems concerning fishermen because, as I discovered recently when looking up some figures, although my county is not by any means the largest in the province, it is the county in the province of Quebec which has the most fishermen. All problems that concern fishermen are therefore of vital importance to my constituents.

The fishing industry is also very important to Canada, as I had occasion to point out in a speech I made in the house on April 27, 1950, as reported at page 1940 of Hansard, as follows:

> The fishing industry in our country has become very important indeed, particularly in view of the fact that we now have Newfoundland as our tenth province. At least seven provinces are vitally interested in the fishing industry. There are, of course, Newfoundland, the three maritime provinces, Quebec, also Manitoba because of the extensive fishing industry in lake Winnipeg—

I was interested to hear some of the members from the west support this resolution this afternoon because of that. I continue:

> —and the province of British Columbia. When seven provinces in our country are vitally interested in the fishing industry, then I say the government ought to do as much for that industry, on a smaller scale of course, as it does for agriculture. The organizations having to do and dealing with fishing ought to have the same scope of action as those which deal with agriculture.

We find in the statutes of 1944-1945 the Agricultural Prices Support Act. In the same statutes we find the Fisheries Prices Support Act. These two statutes are practically identical.

But in 1947 the government decided they had not gone far enough so far as agriculture was concerned, and in that year they passed the Agricultural Products Act, the long title of which is "An act to provide for the sale and export of agricultural products". In my speech on April 27, 1950, I said with reference to the Agricultural Products Act:

> This statute gives the minister, subject to regulations made by the governor in council, authority to—
> (a) sell or export agricultural products to the government of any country or any agency thereof pursuant to any agreement made by the government of Canada with the government of such country or with such agency and for those purposes may purchase agricultural products and make such arrangements for the purchase, sale or export of agricultural products as he considers necessary or desirable;
> (b) on behalf of the government of any country or any agency thereof purchase or negotiate contracts for the purchase of agricultural products;

Paragraph (c) does not apply. I continue:

> (d) enter into contracts for the storing or processing of agricultural products.

Under that legislation some very good contracts have been made with other countries for the sale of agricultural products, but I believe we should have something similar for fisheries. If we had it I say it would help in finding markets for fishery products of the country, and I am sure it would help in overcoming the low prices that fishermen now get for their output.

As has been said already in this debate, Mr. Speaker, the fishermen are primary producers, and as such they should be placed on the same footing, I respectfully submit, as other primary producers.

Amongst the fishermen in my county, and not alone amongst the fishermen—I find in talking with hon. members who have fishermen in their counties and who represent fishing constituencies that the same feeling exists amongst them—there is the feeling that our fishermen are not getting a fair deal. There is a feeling that they are not getting a fair share of social security. Everybody in this country, apart from the fishermen, seems to be getting a fair share of social security. The fishermen feel that they have been let down so far as that is concerned. For instance, they have no catch insurance. Catch insurance is something that would be parallel to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. It should be possible to start up some kind of contributory insurance that would permit the fishermen to insure themselves against a bad catch in any year in the same way that the prairie farmers can insure themselves against a bad crop.

It is very difficult for fishermen to get equipment insurance; they can hardly get it at all. I have made a suggestion to the Department of Fisheries, and I think it is a good one. There is a fishermen's bounty that is given to the fishermen every year under an old treaty with the United States, under which they get a bounty of about $9 a year. That $9 a year is of no practical use, but it could be used, along with a government contribution, as a contribution towards fishermen's equipment insurance.

We have a prices support board. When I came into the house as a new member, representing a fishermen's constituency, I had great faith in the Fisheries Prices Support Act and in the board. I thought now we have something that will help me overcome the problem that the fishermen are always complaining about, namely that the prices are not high enough. I pleaded with the board several times. I had special hearings of the board. I went before them and pleaded the case as well as I could, but I never succeeded in getting anything tangible from the fisheries prices support board. In 1951 I held out some hopes to the fishermen of my constituency. I said to them in a debate on the 24th of April, 1951, as reported at page 2363 of Hansard:

> According to the information I have, the fisheries prices support board has not yet exercised its powers to set floor prices for fish and to make payments to fishermen. I respectfully suggest to the minister that the time has come for the board to exercise those powers.
> I hope, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the survey which is now being made in Newfoundland by this government will warrant setting a floor price for fish and that the first request of the fishermen will be granted.

That was never implemented. There was never a floor price set for fish, and the fishermen of the Magdalen Islands are still waiting for some help from the fisheries prices support board. Here is something the fisheries prices support board could do right away. Even if they cannot set a minimum price for all fish, the price of cod should be set because cod is the biggest catch in the Magdalen islands, and the price has always been low. It would take someone more versed in economics than I am to explain why, when prices have been going up, when the cost of living has been going up, and meat and vegetable prices have been increasing, fish prices have been going down or have remained stationary. The problem of the fishermen in my county is the price of cod.

Most of the cod produced is not sold fresh; it is sold smoked or salted. If the fisheries prices support board cannot support the price of all cod, let them at least support the price of smoked and salt cod, which are exported to countries in which the people are not very well off, and who are able to pay only low prices. This would be an opportunity for the support board to step in and do something about this problem.

Then with regard to unemployment insurance. The fishermen feel that they have not been getting their share of social security. One of our forms of social security in this country is unemployment insurance. Away back in 1951 I held out the hope to the people in my county that they might get unemployment insurance. At that time I said this:

> As early as last spring, one year ago, I made representations to the unemployment insurance commission and the Department of Labour in order to bring fishermen under the act. The unemployment insurance commission began a nation-wide survey to secure the necessary information and data before reporting on this request. I understand that the report is in preparation and hope that the government will be able to include fishermen in the benefits of this legislation which has already been extended to lumberjacks.

I mentioned lumberjacks particularly, because they are seasonal workmen. That was in 1951. A report has been made, and it was negative. Nothing has been done about it. The report stated that in the United States and England they have unemployment insurance for fishermen, but they pointed out something about administrative difficulties which would have to be overcome.

I say that administrative difficulties are not a sufficient reason for not extending that form of social security to fishermen in this country. I am sure that if the Department of Fisheries will put its shoulder to the wheel, if members of the staff in that department will put their heads together, they will be able to find a way to overcome these administrative difficulties that have been overcome in other countries.

I insist again, as I feel it my duty to do, that the Unemployment Insurance Act should be extended to fishermen. And I say again that perhaps the first step would be to extend it to fishermen who are on wages or salary, fishermen's helpers particularly. There is no reason why they should not benefit from unemployment insurance, inasmuch as they are employees receiving wages, just the same as do other employees in Canada who earn wages.

One thing that would help the Magdalen islands particularly would be the export of fresh fish. To export fresh fish refrigeration ships, or a refrigeration ship, would be required. It would not be fair to put the whole burden on the federal government, because in my province the administration of the fisheries has been taken over by the provincial government. I make an appeal today to that provincial government, to the premier and to the minister of fisheries, and ask them not to forget the fishermen of the Magdalen islands. I would ask them to see that the necessary moneys are appropriated to supply refrigerators and the refrigerated ships required in the export of fresh cod. If this were done it would solve our problem to a great extent.

I call upon the government to give a new deal to the fishermen, particularly those on the east coast. I understand those on the west coast have their very valuable salmon crop, and I do not think there is any problem so far as they are concerned. Their economic conditions are good, when compared with the less favourable conditions of the fishermen on the east coast.

Let it not be suggested that fishermen are a forgotten race or a forgotten group of people. Let us see that they get what they are entitled to, the same as the other inhabitants of this great country of ours. They are a hardy race. They go out every day, courageously, wresting their living from the sea. They risk their lives to earn a living for their families and to supply food to the people of Canada. I say we should show some regard for these people, that we should show them at least the same regard we extend to the agricultural producers. I call upon the government to do its best for the fishermen of the Magdalen islands in particular, and of Canada at large.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who introduced the resolution this afternoon made reference to a reply he received last year in a similar debate. It was pointed out to him by some speaker on behalf of the government that the annual value of agriculture was very much greater than the value of the fisheries.

I do not think anyone can deny that agriculture is a most important industry in Canada, because it is so varied and so extensive in its operations. It has increased in importance in the last few years. There can be no doubt that it is of tremendous value to Canada.

It would be very difficult, therefore, to make an exact comparison. But that is what is being done when we compare the amount of money that is being voted by parliament to assist agriculture, and the amount being voted to assist the fisheries. It has been shown that last year $11 million was voted for the fisheries and $74 million for agriculture. It was pointed out that agricultural production was ten times as great, and that therefore the fisheries are receiving all they should receive.

It seems to me it is not desirable to have comparisons of that kind in our arguments. Are the fisheries getting the attention they need? That is the point we must consider. Everyone has paid tribute to the brave and hardy fisherman who risks his life and faces such hardship on the rolling deep. Anyone who has seen a fisherman come in from the banks in the wintertime, on a vessel caked with ice, must know the hardships that fishermen must endure. Anyone who has seen the small man in his dory, rocking in the cradle of the deep, must know something of the danger that the fisherman goes through.

Anyone who has seen, as I have, men from different parts of Newfoundland rallying in great numbers, as they did in 1939 and 1940, to enlist in the Canadian navy and in the British navy to defend the shores of this country, must realize that those men are deserving of the greatest consideration, because if we did not have the fisheries we would not have suitable men to man the ships of the navy.

I know that help has been given to the fisheries beyond that set out in the estimates for the department. The large amounts that are voted annually for the construction of wharves and breakwaters are in the interests of fishermen, and those expenditures are appreciated very much indeed.

Well then, is there any need to help the fishermen, more than is being done at the present time? I submit that there is. I have been in settlements occupied almost exclusively by fishermen, and I have seen the poor circumstances under which they live. It may be that fisheries cannot be carried on economically in those places. But whatever the circumstances are, the conditions one sees there show that these people are not receiving the attention they deserve. At the present time in Newfoundland a joint committee has been appointed by the federal and provincial governments to investigate the fisheries of that province. So I suppose the resolution is really answered, so far as Newfoundland is concerned.

Therefore I can speak only in a general way in the debate this afternoon. I feel Newfoundland has a special problem because only a few years ago the fisheries of that province were such an important factor in its economic life. Those fisheries have declined tremendously. We look forward with great interest and hope to a solution by this joint committee. A royal commission which investigated conditions in Newfoundland in 1932 found that there were 65,000 fishermen, while last year it was shown that there were only about 22,000. This is a decline of two-thirds in the number of people prosecuting the fisheries. There must be some reason why such large numbers are leaving this industry. They have left to go to work in Greenland, at Goose Bay, and at Seven Islands, the gateway to the mines on the Labrador-Quebec boundary. There was a bad year in 1949; another bad year in 1950; a not too good year in 1951. What is the use of men staying in the fisheries?

The new Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) is young, he is aggressive, and I am sure he is interested. Let us hope we are going to get some help that will put the fisheries back into the place they should be occupying in the economic life of the country. Other speakers have referred to unemployment insurance, which is most important, and to the fisheries prices support board.

The question is at what stage the powers of this board should be invoked. Should we wait until there is a calamity? In 1951 I contended that the powers of this board should have been invoked, but that was not done by the government. There has been an interesting development in connection with the fisheries in Newfoundland. The fishermen have formed themselves into a federation with provincial government assistance. I recommended in this house that the federal government should give assistance for this federation, but that was not done. This federation of fishermen has been making fair progress, but I do not know just how far an organization of that kind can go in a short time. It needs a great deal of wise direction and guidance. I do not know whether ultimately it is going to be a success but it certainly deserves to be.

I come now to the important question of marketing. The principal agricultural product produced on the prairies, wheat, is marketed through a board. It does not appear in the estimates, but the assistance given the farmers in the marketing of this product is tremendous. None of them would want to go back to the system which was in existence before. We have an organization in Newfoundland known as the Associated Fish Exporters Limited which has to do with the marketing of fish. The federation of fishermen have recently been invited to become a member of that body. I do not know whether that is the solution.

I think it was the mover of the resolution who drew attention this afternoon to the small amount of money the primary producer received for his product as compared to the amount the consumer had to pay. Along the way between the producer and the consumer are several middlemen, and a considerable sum is absorbed in profits, commissions, transportation charges and so forth. Those charges may be well justified, but the fact is that there seems to be a large gap. There is no reason why that gap should be so great; there is no reason why the fisherman should not get a larger share of the ultimate price paid for his product by the consumer.

It must be realized that the decline in the number of men engaged in the fisheries in Newfoundland is a serious matter, because we have always looked upon the fisheries as our most important industry. Despite the value of the pulp and paper industry, despite the value of the mineral industry, the fishing industry because of its extensive nature, because it is carried on by people living in 1,300 settlements around the island, because it spreads prosperity over the whole island to a greater degree than any other industry, is considered to be the most valuable.

I do not want to take up too much time this afternoon because I know several other hon. members wish to speak, and the minister will wish to reply. I should like to conclude by quoting the words of Oliver Goldsmith:

> But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
> When once destroy'd, can never be supplied.

That applies to the fishermen of Newfoundland.

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak at any length regarding the problems facing the fishing industry as I, like most hon. members, am anxious to hear the new minister reply. Therefore I gladly forgo any opportunity I may have to speak at any great length. I shall not repeat the many points that have been raised this afternoon, nor shall I refer to the many new items I had in mind. If the minister replies to all the matters that have been raised he will certainly need 35 or 40 minutes.

When he does reply I should like him to deal with the problem of the dragger regulations. As he knows, there are three points of view with regard to this matter. There is one group who contend that they should be kept beyond the three-mile limit. Another group want them kept beyond the twelve-mile limit. Then we run into the international problem. Norway has been in difficulty and Greece is now operating draggers. Russia wants to change her former line. Norway has suggested that this line be changed, and I believe this matter is now before the international court.

Will the minister explain to the house, and thus to the country, the difficulties which would arise because of the international situation should we try to change the three-mile limit now recognized by Canada as being the international limit, and extend it twelve miles out, which Canada recognizes as the limit for her own nationals. I gladly forgo dealing with the rest of the matters I have in mind in order to permit the minister to reply.

Mr. D. A. Riley (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Digby-Yarmouth (Mr. Kirk) I had prepared rather lengthy notes in anticipation of having an opportunity to engage in this debate this afternoon, but like the hon. member I am most anxious to hear what the minister has to say and perhaps learn something of his plans for the future of the fishing industry in this country.

Like all maritimers I have been greatly interested in the career of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair). When we in the maritimes received the news of his appointment it was with a deep sense of satisfaction because of our knowledge of his past achievements in public life. That has led us to believe that he deserves to be cast in bronze so that for years after his mortal remains have been interred those who participate in the fishing industry may realize that here was a great Minister of Fisheries, here was a man who put all his energies and all the great talents which he possessed into protecting and improving this important basic industry.

I was interested in hearing what the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) had to say with regard to maritime fisheries. He seemed to concentrate on the maritime fisheries because for some reason or other he delights in heaping upon the heads of the maritime members a great deal of adulation. I know he feels that in his part of the country they produce more fish, but I suspect a tinge of jealousy on his part because of the quality of the fish produced in the maritimes.

The hon. member referred to lobsters, for which I know he has a great fondness. But he does not seem to like to pay too much for them. I know that in an unselfish manner he would like the fishermen to get more money for their lobsters. If he does not enjoy paying 50 or 60 cents a pound, perhaps he would feel better if he knew that the fishermen were getting a fair return for their labours. When he was standing there engaging in a humorous dialogue with members on the other side I tried to envisage him leaning over the gunwales of an open boat about two miles from shore in the bay of Fundy on the 13th day of January, pulling in 150 or 200 lobster traps. I am sure if the hon. member for Fraser Valley were to have that experience only once he would stand in his place here and demand that the Minister of Fisheries put a floor price of $2 a pound under the delicious crustaceans which these men down east harvest.

I want some assistance for our fishermen. I agree with the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart), who has asked consistently on the floor of the house that greater consideration be given to rendering a fair measure of assistance to these men who risk their lives day after day in order to produce for the people of the country those products which are the responsibility of the new Minister of Fisheries.

There is one thing I must say with respect to the speech of the hon. member for Charlotte, and it has to do with these mechanized spiders that are hanging from the rafters or from the cobweb which is strung under the ceiling of this chamber. The hon. member for Charlotte has a clear, ringing voice. Normally he can be heard in every corner of this chamber; but I noticed that when he spoke today the hon. members in this part of the house were unable to hear him clearly. I think that the idea of hanging these mechanized spiders from the ceiling is a good one. It is good for the people who sit in the galleries, for the visitors who come here from all parts of the country in order to hear what their representatives have to say. They do not want to have to strain their ears too much in order to hear the debates that are taking place. But I have noticed that even listeners in the galleries are not hearing the voices of the members as they should. I wish I had the talent of Len Norris, the famous cartoonist of the Vancouver Sun, because day after day I could draw cartoons of people with their necks stretched out of position trying to hear clearly what is going on in the house, through the little speakers on the backs of the seats. I think that is something that should be given more consideration. The system may be sound in principle but something should be done in order to ensure that voices like that of the hon. member for Charlotte are heard as they should be heard in every corner of the house.

I have only one word to say about fisheries and the assistance given to fishermen. Last year there appeared in the estimates appropriations for a couple of breakwaters in the bay of Fundy, in my constituency. One was at Chance Harbour and the other was at Lorneville. These breakwaters were to be established, as the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) know, to provide a safe harbour for fishermen who are risking their lives day after day. But the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne)—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): On a question of privilege, I did not criticize the grants to these places, but I pointed out that the amount of money spent at these places was far greater than what was being spent in places in Newfoundland where there were more fishermen.

Mr. Riley: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. John's West must be a clairvoyant. I did not say I was going to say anything about him.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No, but you said it before.

Mr. Riley: I merely mentioned him, but now I am going to say something about the hon. member for St. John's West and his criticism. He said: Why should these breakwaters be provided for only a few fishermen along the banks of the bay of Fundy?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I did not say that and I suggest—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): —that the hon. gentleman look at the record and see what I did say.

Mr. Riley: I will not try again to repeat what the hon. member for St. John's West said. However, I want to say, and I hope he hears me, that the purpose of putting those breakwaters there was to protect lives and to ensure the continuance of the fisheries on the bay of Fundy. I have only to go back to a few weeks ago when one of these fishermen, whom this appropriation was destined to protect, lost his life because there were not proper harbour facilities there. We are hoping before this year is over—and I want to remind the Minister of Public Works of this—that these breakwaters will be completed in order to provide safe harbours to protect the fishermen next winter.

Again I congratulate the hon. member for Charlotte on the forthright manner in which he attacked this problem. I want to commend all hon. members who have taken part in the debate, because I feel that their interest in the fisheries of the country is such that it should adequately demonstrate to the Minister of Fisheries that there is something lacking, and that some assistance must be provided in order to put our fishermen in a position where they will continue to ply their calling and not desert the nets and fishing boats for the cities and their industries.

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I hope no other hon. member will raise a complaint similar to that made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, with respect to the acoustics of this chamber.

I want to make a few remarks on the resolution which was so ably moved and spoken to by my good friend the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart). I, as others have done, wish to congratulate him. So far as my riding of Vancouver-Burrard is concerned, a request has been before parliament now for four years for the granting of money to establish a seine wharfing dock. I hope that anybody who may refer to this matter in the future will not call it a fishing dock, because it is not a fishing dock in the full sense of the word. It has nothing to do with loading or unloading fish, and the people of the False creek area in particular are very annoyed at the terminology that has been used in connection with the vote of $100,000 for this project.

I must congratulate the present Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) because I received from him today a copy of a letter he sent to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier). The difficulty involved in the voting of the money for this seining dock is that several departments are concerned, Indian affairs, national defence, fisheries and public works. Every hon. member knows that it is hard enough to deal with one department, but when you have to deal with four your difficulties are tremendously multiplied. This vote has been in the estimates now for three years. I believe that the completed wharf will cost in the neighbourhood of $500,000. The amount of $100,000 will go toward the purchasing and surveying of the property. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) was kind enough to write the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) stating that he felt that all this money should be voted and the work completed this year. With that I am in complete agreement.

I should like to say, though, that the people of my constituency had a wrong impression about this until the time I had an opportunity of speaking to them just before Christmas. How they gained that impression is more than I can say. The fact remains that, regardless of political faith, all the people in that area are now desirous of having this project completed. It is difficult for a British Columbia member to admit, but about four years ago we had bad weather, with a lot of ice and snow. As a result of that, having no actual harbour facilities for these boats, the expenditures of the fishermen in repairs amounted to as much in one year as this whole wharfage project will cost in its initial stages.

I want to leave this thought with the house, Mr. Speaker. So far as these fishermen are concerned, they are not wealthy. They make fair money, but the cost of maintenance and repair is quite heavy. Their association, together with the city council of greater Vancouver and my two ministers from British Columbia, are very much in support of this project. I make an earnest and humble plea to all members of this house that we get on with the work and complete the job.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): I should like to accept the invitation extended by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud), Mr. Speaker, to those members representing constituencies in which the fishing industry plays a prominent part to add their voice to the plea that he and the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) have made today for further aid to maintain the great fishing industry of our country. I would therefore like to add a few words to the many arguments which have already been advanced today, speaking from the point of view of a member representing a constituency on the Pacific coast in which quite a percentage of the population are employed in the important fishing industry.

In 1951 we had almost a record catch of salmon. This salmon was taken to the cannery, but unfortunately owing to the acute market crisis which arose a very large proportion of that 1951 catch was held over. When the fishing boats put out to sea in 1952 the storehouses and the canneries were already filled. This difficulty of marketing the canned salmon, which is the predominant branch of the fishing industry on the Pacific coast, threatened the industry. The loss of the export market in the United Kingdom also affected the disposal of the carryover of canned salmon.

In addition to that we have been threatened with increasing competition from Japan. The Japanese tuna fleet has been putting into the Pacific ocean, and has been sending canned and frozen tuna to this continent. In fact the Japanese canned tuna or tuna caught by Japanese is also beginning to appear on the shelves of stores in British Columbia, and thus to threaten the domestic market for canned salmon.

We realize that the government, in order to help the hog industry in this country, took certain measures in connection with canned pork. Canned pork has been definitely in competition with canned salmon from the Pacific coast. The Japanese fleet has also been putting into the north Pacific ocean, and according to a dispatch from the United States embassy dated August 18, 1952, that Japanese salmon fleet had already caught over 2 million fish. This is the same species of salmon that is caught by our fishermen. It is for these reasons that the Pacific coast fisherman is facing difficult times.

There is the Fisheries Prices Support Act which was introduced in 1944. We are told in the report of the fisheries prices support board for this year of the various ways in which that Fisheries Prices Support Act could assist the fishermen. The program, as given at the end of the report, indicates that in two small instances, during the year under review, the Labrador salted codfish and the Newfoundland shore-caught salted codfish, some assistance has been given. The fishermen on the Pacific coast do feel that the time has now come when some practical means of assistance must be worked out in order to maintain the standards of living which those fishermen on the Pacific coast and elsewhere have a right to obtain.

I cannot help noting that in the main estimates, which were tabled this afternoon, there is a decrease of $1,700,000 in the fisheries estimates. I hope the fishing industry and the fishermen of this country will not be the forgotten industry and the forgotten men of Canada.

I am, therefore, pleased to add these few words in support of the resolution which was proposed by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart). I do not want to take up any more time because the house is anxious to hear the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) conclude this debate.

Mr. T. G. W. Ashbourne (Grand Falls-White Bay): Mr. Speaker, I should like to avail myself of this opportunity to add my voice in support of this admirable resolution which has been proposed by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart). I believe that fishermen throughout the length and breadth of Canada will realize that in the hon. member for Charlotte, since he brought this resolution forward last year and again this year, they have a spokesman of whom they can well be proud.

I should like also publicly to congratulate the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) on his appointment to that important post. This is an extremely important position, and he faces heavy responsibilities. He has large numbers of fishermen throughout the length and breadth of Canada looking to him. We hope he will be able to satisfy their many wishes and desires. Living as we do in an economic world we realize that oftentimes we do not have as much reward as we think we are entitled to for our labours. But in the present Minister of Fisheries I feel we have a man of resolute action who will help to build, on a sound and firm foundation, a structure for the benefit of the fishermen of Canada and of this important fishing industry to which this resolution refers.

I do not think any hon. member will question the need for federal aid to agriculture, to a lesser or a larger degree depending upon the state of the industry and its ability to return to the primary producer an adequate return for his labours. As to the fisheries and other fields of industry, assistance should also be forthcoming when it is required. As to agriculture, we find that aids have been given and floor prices have been granted in many cases for commodities which are produced by our farmers. We are all in accord with and sympathetic toward help which has been given in that way. When $65 million were voted by this house to help the farmers, we felt that it was a good move. On the other hand, when the fishermen need assistance we who represent fishing constituencies are not remiss in our duty in rising to press their urgent claims.

Coming as I do from Newfoundland, which is now the tenth province of Canada, may I say we realize that in Newfoundland we have a tremendous source of food production. God in his bountiful beneficence has blessed our shores on the Atlantic ocean with countless numbers of fish of various kinds, and other foods such as birds. Of course the birds feed upon the fish, but they are a source of food for our people. As we think of the top soil of the world being gradually used up in order to supply the needs of the growing population, we realize what a tremendous reservoir of wealth is contained in the sea. We also realize the need for conservation in order that these God-given blessings will be used to the greatest benefit, and also for the needs of the people from time to time.

As to Newfoundland, I am afraid that the benefits accruing to agriculture are something from which we are unable to profit to any very great extent. But we can and do supply our share of fish, minerals, pulp and paper and other products, which are today taking, to a considerable extent, the paramount place which in the past was occupied by the fisheries in the province of Newfoundland.

Assistance to the fishermen can be given by the Department of Fisheries in a good many ways. These have already been enumerated this afternoon by various members who have spoken, and I do not want to repeat what has been said. Hon. members have pointed out how the department has helped in the past in Newfoundland, and what assistance the department has given.

We have these bountiful banks but we notice that, coming from the other side, the trawlers from France, Spain and Portugal are fishing these banks and taking back for their people this important food. Fish which we had often in the past supplied to such important customers as Portugal, Spain and Italy is to a great extent being produced by their own people at the present time. While we cannot blame them for that fact, we realize the great distress this has caused among people who have taken up the way of life of fishermen and who now have to lay down their nets and go off in search of work as carpenters or in other avenues of employment. These people who come over from the other side and fish on our banks are sometimes encroaching, we think, upon the territory which should be reserved for our fishermen. There may be a need for the department concerned to investigate and to decide whether or not the territorial limits of Canada should not be extended coastwise.

As I represent the important riding of Labrador, I should like to say that down there we have a tremendous coast line. Unfortunately, since confederation the Labrador fishery has declined to a greater degree than previously, although that decline was apparent before we entered into confederation.

As to the long-liners with which experiments are now being made, I hope some day they will become high-liners, because the investigation carried out by the Department of Fisheries has been the means of exploring further fishing grounds and of opening up other banks to which fishermen can proceed and catch a larger type of codfish; and it seems to me it is the larger fish that is in demand. We can readily understand that.

Unfortunately, on the whole, on Labrador the run of fish is of small size. It was my pleasure this year to catch some myself when I was down there. In fact, one morning before breakfast I got up and threw a jigger overboard; after a few jigs I pulled in a codfish. One of the United States tourists who was also on this ship was fortunate enough to get a codfish weighing 31 pounds. He has its head mounted. That shows what the United States tourist thinks of this fish. There is no lack of fish on the Labrador. These fish come in. It is only a matter of getting traps and fishermen and being able to take them. They come in in search of food. This year and the year before the fishery in Newfoundland was fairly good, brought about I believe to quite an extent by the inshore winds which prevailed before the fish left their feeding grounds and came to the shore. When you take into account the winds, the tides, the storms and the other hazards which the fishermen have to face, it is a calling beset, as has already been said, by great danger and also by much hard work.

I had prepared quite a speech on this resolution but I see that time is going on, and no doubt the minister wants to make a few remarks. I shall take the opportunity on another occasion to resume my remarks, but in the meantime I should like to say that since the minister is going to Newfoundland in a few days to address the board of trade down there, I wish him bon voyage. I believe he will hear from the people of Newfoundland, and since he will be there he will be able to see things firsthand and get their reaction.

The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) has already mentioned the Walsh report. We are all looking forward to it. It will soon be put into the hands of the government. As has been said before, the fisherman is an independent type of man. Sometimes when he is just moving along in his boat he is not looking to be rescued, but he is not moving at great speed. Then some of his friends come along and they think he should be moving a little faster, and because they have a more powerful boat they take him in tow. I think the fishing industry needs to be taken in tow by the federal government and given the assistance that it requires by research, by science and in every other possible way so that as a result the efforts of the fishermen may be brought to fruition and their produce accrue to the greatest benefit of the Canadian nation.

Mr. R. E. Anderson (Norfolk): Since we are considering this resolution, I would not want the minister to overlook the fact that the fresh water fish business of Canada is big business, too. Port Dover on lake Erie in Norfolk county is said to have the largest fresh water fishing industry in the world. It produces roughly $1½ million worth annually. I should like the minister to keep the fresh water fishermen of Norfolk county, and of all Canada, in mind; and I am in favour of this resolution.

Mr. Cruickshank: Before the minister speaks, may I say a word?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has already spoken.

Mr. Cruickshank: On a question of privilege, I understand that my name was mentioned, and I should like to reply before the minister speaks.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Cruickshank: May I move the adjournment of the debate?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Did the hon. member rise on a question of privilege?

Mr. Cruickshank: Yes.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member can scarcely move the adjournment of the debate on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: No. He does not propose to move the adjournment of the debate. I understood he had a question of privilege he wanted to put.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Speaker, as I understand it we adjourn at six o'clock. I am informed by some of my friends that my name was mentioned by an hon. member, and I should like to answer him if I am not permitted to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Speaker: Under the rules of the house the hon. member can speak only once in this debate. Is it the wish of the house that I should call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Balcom: May I adjourn the debate?

Some hon. Members: No.

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, it was suggested during the course of the debate that if I did well in this department, at some time or other I would be cast in bronze. If I could answer all the points raised during the afternoon, and particularly in the last few minutes, perhaps I would merit that.

I am very happy because of the course the debate took this afternoon. My only regret is that it is not Monday so that we could have the whole day on it, because it has given the members from the fishery ridings a very good opportunity to raise points in connection with the industry. I do regret that any dollar comparison should be made with the help given to agriculture, because the help should not be given on that basis. Both agriculture and fishery are extremely important primary industries, and help is given on the basis of need rather than on a comparative dollar value.

As hon. members noticed, I have taken voluminous notes of what has been said, and I would suggest that on the opening item of my estimates I might answer the points made, and thereby give members from fishing sections a chance to speak again when the actual items are called.

During the course of the afternoon very many aspects of fishing have been discussed and discussed well, and I look forward to having an opportunity to return to them on the first item of my estimates. I do thank not only the members from the fishing ridings but those members whose ridings which are not fishing ridings for the interest and the support they have displayed in the development of the fishing industry. With that understanding perhaps the hon. member would withdraw his motion, the understanding being that I will reply on the estimates.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Yes.

Motion withdrawn.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STATEMENT ON THREATENED RAILWAY STRIKE

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to revert to motions and complete the statement I made this afternoon? The two parties to the railway negotiations met at three o'clock and discussed the proposals from the point where they left off yesterday. Certain clarifications were made, and at about 4.15 o'clock the negotiating committee representing the unions asked to have an opportunity to discuss those new clarifications with their larger body, and thereafter they would seek to confer again with the railway management, this day if possible.

I have just been talking to Mr. Kelly, and also Mr. Gordon. Mr. Kelly tells me that this larger committee is having those discussions now, and he will be able to tell me a little later in the evening whether or not they will seek to renew discussions with the railway management. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think we might leave it there for tonight.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will consider the following measures: First, third reading of Bill No. 45; the resolution to amend the Post Office Act, and after the first reading of that bill we will ask to revert to government notices of motions and proceed with the motion to set up a committee to consider the bill to amend the Post Office Act; then Bill No. 105, respecting the liability of the crown for torts and civil salvage; the resolution to approve the convention for the high seas fisheries of the north Pacific ocean, signed by Canada, the United States and Japan and for carrying out Canada's obligations under the convention; Bill No. 44, to protect the coastal fisheries; and then, if we have time, we shall take up three resolutions in the name of the Minister of Resources and Development, being Nos. 21, 22 and 37 on today's order paper.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister whether the house is going to have an opportunity to resume the debate on the motion to set up the radio committee?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Not tomorrow.

Mr. Fleming: When is it expected?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, at an early date.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, January 29, 1953

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

PRIVILEGE, MR. CRESTOHL—ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. One of the qualifications for becoming a member of this house is to be a Canadian citizen. I am a Canadian by naturalization. I am now apprehensive, Mr. Speaker, that the rights of members of parliament who are Canadian citizens by naturalization, and the rights of every other naturalized Canadian, are being seriously encroached upon by one of the provincial legislatures.

Second reading is now being debated by the Quebec legislature of a bill which tends to create a distinction between citizens of Canada; that is, between those who are Canadians by birth and those who are Canadian by naturalization. This is being done by amending the provincial election act to compel Canadian citizens by naturalization to produce their citizenship certificate before voting.

Mr. Graydon: If anything was ever out of order, Mr. Speaker, this statement is.

Mr. Crestohl: If the hon. member will have patience for a moment or two, he will see my point of personal privilege.

This is a discrimination between Canadian citizens by naturalization and native-born Canadian citizens who are not obliged, under the proposed arrangement, to produce their birth certificates before voting.

I consider it to be an encroachment upon my status as a member of this house and I believe that steps should be taken, or that a statement should be made, to provide that provincial legislation cannot and should not differentiate between the rights of citizens of Canada, inasmuch as the status of citizenship is a matter which falls wholly within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STATEMENT ON THREATENED RAILWAY STRIKE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be allowed to make a brief statement about the dispute between the Canadian railways and the Canadian Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

Spokesmen for both groups were here this morning and had a long interview with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and myself. At our suggestion they are meeting here at Ottawa this afternoon at three o'clock to continue the negotiations which were in process when they received last night our invitation to come up to Ottawa to let us know just what the position of each party was.

Mr. Graydon: Does the chance of settlement look good?

Mr. St. Laurent: As long as the spokesmen for the interested parties are negotiating, I should not like to say anything that might have any bearing upon the outcome of their negotiations.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister arising out of his statement with respect to the railway dispute. Perhaps I might be permitted to say I agree with the Prime Minister that, so long as the parties are negotiating, we should not discuss the subject matters in dispute.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Knowles: However, there is one question which does arise with respect to the relationship between the executive and parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member, I understand, is now about to put his question?

Mr. Lesage: At last.

Mr. Knowles: Will the Prime Minister say whether there is any truth in the report that the government has considered, if negotiations fail, taking action by order in council under the Emergency Powers Act; indeed will he assure parliament that any action taken will first of all be referred to parliament?

Mr. St. Laurent: Similar questions have been asked me by newspapermen, and I have told them that we do not attempt to burn bridges until we get to them.

Questions

QUESTIONS

SECURITY REGULATIONS, ATOMIC PLANTS

Mr. Cardiff:

What changes, if any, have been made in security regulations affecting non-Canadians, in regard to atomic plants in Canada, since January 1, 1952?

He said: I should like to have this question dropped for rewording.

ST. MARGARETS, N.B., RADAR STATION

Mr. Robichaud:

1. What is the total amount which has been expended to date on, or in any way concerning, the St. Margarets, New Brunswick, radar station?
2. What have been the annual amounts expended on, or in any way concerning the said radar station, in each and every year, including the year of its inception, to and including the first eleven months of the year 1952?
3. Were any contracts awarded to any individuals and/or firms, in connection or in any way concerning the said radar station, during the year 1952?
4. If so (a) what were these contracts for; (b) to whom were they awarded; (c) what was the amount of each contract?
5. Were tenders called for any or all of these contracts?
6. If so, what individuals or firms submitted tenders, and what was the amount of each tender submitted?

LAURENTIDES NATIONAL PARK—RADAR STATION

Mr. Gagnon:

1. What amounts have been voted by parliament towards the construction of a radar station in the Laurentides national park, Upica district, Lake St. John, province of Quebec?
2. What sums have been spent up to the present?
3. What are the names of the contractors?
4. What amounts were paid to each one, and what was the nature of the work?
5. Did the cost of the undertaking prove to be in accordance with the estimates?
6. Has the said station been tested? If so, with what results?

"OPERATION PINE TREE"

Mr. Pearkes:

1. Is the government proceeding with Operation Pine Tree?
2. If so, what funds have been spent on this project to date?
3. What is the estimated cost?

Mr. Claxton: I should like to make a statement with respect to the questions asked by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) and the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon). These questions ask the cost of radar stations and they purport to give the location of radar stations. One of the questions asked by the hon. member for Chicoutimi is:

Has the said station been tested? If so, with what results?

The hon. member for Nanaimo in question 12 asks the amount that has been expended and the estimated cost of Operation Pine Tree, by which I assume he refers to the general radar defence system of Canada.

As every Canadian bomber pilot knows, one of the things first in importance for effective bombing is to be able to locate and know everything possible about the enemy's radar defence.

This information is useful for a number of reasons. With it, attacking bombers can take the line of approach where radar coverage is least effective. If the attacker has sufficient knowledge of the location and character of the radar defences, he can try to put them out of action by jamming, by bombing and by sabotage. For these reasons, actual or potential enemy forces go to great lengths to obtain this information.

Giving the cost of various stations would help an enemy to decide whether or not each station was simply an early warning station or whether it was also a station for ground-controlled interception, a very important thing for him to know.

Also, giving the amounts expended and the estimated costs of several stations would enable an enemy to estimate with pretty fair accuracy the degree of readiness and the time when each station and the complete system would be in full operation. It would also enable him to say how long it would take to build additional radar defences, should a new type of aircraft or other new feature increase the threat of bombing attack.

The radar defences of North America are planned and will be operated jointly by the United States and Canada, and the United States air force and the R.C.A.F. agreed that the numbers and names of sites and stations, the equipment, the progress of construction and operational data would not be revealed.

Some time ago I addressed a letter to representatives of the newspapers across Canada asking their co-operation in this and generally speaking that co-operation has been forthcoming.

There is another reason why such information should not be given officially by the government. Giving it would enable a potential enemy to assess the accuracy and efficiency of this system of intelligence.

For these and other reasons which might be mentioned, it is not considered to be in the public interest to give information that would assist a potential enemy in obtaining information of this character about our radar defences. Consequently, it is not in the public interest to answer these questions.

Mr. Pearkes: In connection with my question, no details are asked for. I simply ask for the over-all amount of the taxpayers' money which is being spent on a certain project known as Operation Pine Tree. I would ask that that total amount and the estimated amount be given.

Mr. Claxton: The same objection applies there, Mr. Speaker, because if it is possible for a prospective enemy to estimate the cost of a single station—and I suggest that it is a very simple thing indeed for him to do—then he can divide the total amount by that cost per station and arrive at the extent and the density of the coverage for the whole country. Therefore that question is equally objectionable.

Mr. Pearkes: I have not asked for the amount of any single station, only the over-all amount.

Mr. Graydon: May I be permited to make one comment to the minister in connection with this. It may happen that as time goes on questions of this kind will be placed on the order paper quite unintentionally by hon. members. I wonder whether there is not some way in which that can be circumvented. Could it not be done by some liaison between the minister and those who might decide to ask questions, because it seems to me that the minister has taken the wrong way of dealing with it today, if I may say so. I say that to him in all kindness. What I refer to is his identification of Operation Pine Tree today with our radar set-up. I think that comes pretty close to giving away secrets.

Mr. Claxton: I am afraid the hon. member for Nanaimo has already done that, and I had no course, I think, except to assume from the form in which the question was put that it referred to radar defence. This word has also appeared quite unofficially and without authority in the press, and I am afraid that the restriction on the use of the word is no longer effective. Therefore I have not done anything that would help the enemy. But the answer I gave to the hon. member for Nanaimo with regard to this matter is the correct one; that is, that if anyone knows or can estimate the cost of a single station, then he can divide the total cost of the whole operation and arrive at the number of stations and the extent of coverage in the country, which is an important thing for an enemy to know, and which so far we have avoided giving.

With regard to the question asked by the hon. member for Peel, it would be elementary in the knowledge of every hon. member that information of this kind would be of assistance to the enemy; but I am available and it would be very easy indeed for any hon. member, who has a thought of putting down a question which might involve matters of security, to ask me, and I could also refer him, if that was desirable, to the chief of staff concerned.

Mr. Pearkes: On a question of privilege, I must point out that when I framed that question and submitted it to the proper authority in this house I had no idea that Operation Pine Tree was in any way connected with radar operations in North America, and I did not know what Operation Pine Tree was.

Mr. Robichaud: In connection with my question, would the minister have any objection to giving me confidentially the information which I sought in my question?

Mr. Claxton: I shall be glad to give consideration to that, and of course I shall be glad to give the hon. member for Nanaimo on a confidential basis the information he seeks as well.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister a question? Does the statement which the minister has now given to the house indicate also that the government will refuse to give to the defence expenditure committee information respecting the over-all cost—I am not speaking now of detailed cost—of matters of this kind?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I doubt if I should allow that question. Is that not a question which should be asked in the committee, and not here?

Mr. Brooks: May I mention the fact that on January 19 the minister did answer a question similar to that asked by the hon. member for Gloucester. I asked:

> How much money has been spent, on a cost plus basis, on the construction and development of the radar station at St. Margarets, New Brunswick, from its beginning until the present time?

The answer was:

> $3,223,688.73 on a "cost plus fixed fee" basis.

Mr. Claxton: I am quite familiar with the fact that that question was answered by the Department of Defence Production. It was that answer which caused us to review the whole question. I have had it reviewed not only here, but in Washington, and the result is as I have indicated to the house.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

WORKING FORCE, OTTAWA-HULL

Mr. Knowles:

1. What is the total number of persons in the working force in the Ottawa-Hull district?
2. What is the total number in Ottawa?
3. What is the total number of non-government employees in the Ottawa-Hull district?
4. What is the total number of non-government employees in Ottawa?

Questions

5. What is the total number of non-government employees in the Ottawa-Hull district on a five-day week; on a five-and-a-half day week?

6. What is the total number of non-government employees in Ottawa on a five-day week; on a five-and-a-half day week?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle):

1. The total number of wage earners in the Ottawa-Hull district is 104,432 (as at the census date, June 1951).

2. The total number of wage earners in the city of Ottawa is 82,096 (as at the census date, June 1951).

3. The total number of non-government employees in the Ottawa-Hull district is around 65,000. This estimate is derived by subtracting some 40,000 government employees from the figure for wage earners in the Ottawa-Hull district as at June 1951. This has been necessary because no figure of government employees is presently available for the census date.

4. It is not possible to answer this question on the basis of available information because it is not known what proportion of the 40,000 government employees working in the Ottawa-Hull district work and live in the city of Ottawa.

5. No precise figure is available. The annual survey of wages and working conditions carried out by the economics and research branch, Department of Labour, for October, 1951, covered non-government employees, mostly in firms employing 15 or more workers, in the Ottawa-Hull area in the following industries: manufacturing, construction, trade, public utilities, service, transportation and communication.

Of the 27,500 workers included in the survey, 12,100 were on a five-day week and 15,400 on a week of more than five days. The major industries not included in the survey were banks and insurance, and steam railways and ancillary services.

6. The above-mentioned survey covered approximately 23,400 non-government employees in the Ottawa area, of whom 10,800 were on the five-day week and 12,600 on a week of more than five days.

FISHING BOUNTY

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

What were the amounts spent for the annual fishing bounty, in the fiscal years since April 1, 1949, and how much was distributed in each province?

Mr. MacNaught:

	1949-50	1950-51	1951-52	1952-53
Nova Scotia	$ 80,894.75	$ 85,369.40	$ 88,118.20	$ 19.10
New Brunswick	22,082.00	20,878.50	20,343.50	56.20
Prince Edward Island	10,232.50	8,438.40	11,035.10	20.10
Quebec	46,006.60	45,216.50	40,500.35	79.85
	$159,215.85	$159,902.80	$159,997.15	$175.25*

*Payment of the bulk of claims is made in March of each year.

NATIONAL DEFENCE "BACKGROUND MATERIAL"

Mr. Knowles:

1. Who prepared the material for the mimeographed document entitled Department of National Defence, background material, in connection with defence references in the report of the Auditor General for the year 1951-52?

2. When was preparation of the material for this document commenced, and when was it concluded?

3. Where was the document mimeographed, at what time and on what day was it mimeographed?

4. Who issued or released this document, and on whose authority was it issued or released?

5. At what time was the first copy of this document given to anyone outside the Department of National Defence?

6. What are the names of the persons who were given this document on Monday, January 12, 1953?

7. Which of these persons asked for a copy of this document?

8. Which of these persons were given a copy of this document without asking for it?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Campney:

1, 2, and 3. On January 1, 1953, the front page of the Ottawa Journal carried a story purporting to state what the report of the Auditor General would contain, with reference to the Department of National Defence, and the Minister of National Defence, anticipating that this would give rise to inquiries by the press, instructed that background material on the observations of the Auditor General relative to defence be prepared as soon as the department received a copy of the report. As stated in the memorandum of the Auditor General, tabled by the Prime Minister yesterday, proof of the relevant pages of the Auditor General's report was shown to a number of departments including national defence; and the background material was prepared after the receipt of these pages. The drafting of the background material was completed on Monday, January 12, and copies were mimeographed in the minister's office that afternoon.

4, 5, 6, 7 and 8. At about 6:15 p.m., Monday afternoon, copies of this material were released with the authorization of the Minister of National Defence to those representatives of the press who asked for it.

CANADIAN FISHERMAN'S LOAN ACT

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. Have any loans been made under the Canadian Fisherman's Loan Act in 1952?

2. If so, where were loans made and for what amounts?

Mr. Lesage:

1 and 2. The records of the Canadian farm loan board are maintained on the basis of a fiscal year ending March 31. In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1952, one loan in the amount of $800 was granted in the province of Prince Edward Island under the provisions of the Canadian Fisherman's Loan Act.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

IMPORTATION OF BEER

Mr. Brown (Essex West):

1. What restrictions are in force on the importation of beer into Canada?

2. Has there been any importation of a beer known as "malzbier" brewed especially for children? If so, from what country and in what quantities?

3. Is there any restriction on the importation of a slightly sweet drink known as "malzbier", containing alcohol, from Germany or any other country?

4. Is there any restriction to the importation of any syrup or beverage produced from barley, hops, yeast and water or any one or combination thereof?

5. Has there been any importation of any brew containing alcohol known as "lollipop" beer? If so, from what country and in what quantity?

CANADIAN EXPORTS-IMPORTS

Mr. Laing:

1. What has been the value of (a) exports; (b) imports, by Canada, in each of the fiscal years 1930 to the present?

2. What has been the budgetary surplus, or deficit, in each of the fiscal years since 1930 to the present?

Mr. Bradley: Return tabled.

D.V.A. HOSPITALS—MAIDS

Mr. Bryce:

What wages are now being paid to ward maids and kitchen maids at the following hospitals: (a) Camp Hill; (b) Sunnybrook; (c) Deer Lodge; (d) Shaughnessy?

POST OFFICE

COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AMENDMENTS—RURAL MAIL SERVICE

On the order:

Government notices of motion—the Postmaster General—Resolved, that a special committee be appointed to consider the bill, an act to amend the Post Office Act, and also the regulations, general administration and operation of the rural mail delivery service; with power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to print its evidence and proceedings from day to day, and to report from time to time its observations and opinions thereon and that, notwithstanding the provisions of standing order No. 65, the committee shall consist of twenty-seven members to be designated by the house at a later date.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Last night, when I announced the business of the house, I mentioned that we would proceed with the resolution which would serve as the basis for amending the Post Office Act, and that I would ask permission to revert to government notices of motions so that we could set up the committee to study the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Will it stand until later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order stands.

BUTTER

FREEZING ORDER—REFUSAL TO SELL BUTTER IN STOCK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Minister of Agriculture or the parliamentary assistant. As announced in the press yesterday, why has the government passed a freezing order refusing to sell some 35 million pounds of butter now in stock to the prevailing trade of the country?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): First of all, with regard to the 35 million pounds, there are only about 30 million in stock. In reply to the second question, the hon. member can rest assured that the trade does not need to worry about this butter. We have now sold the 1951 butter we had in storage, and we are only taking stock of 1952 storage. The trade is not yet suffering, and the consumer can rest assured that the price will not rise in respect of what we are doing at the present time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CURRIE REPORT

REFERENCE TO ALLEGED CANCELLATION OF RADIO BROADCAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue. What was the reason that a subject for "Citizens' Forum" that was to be put over the C.B.C. this evening, namely a discussion on the Currie report, which was decided upon as a subject by the advisory committee to the Citizens' Forum, was cancelled, and the substitution of another subject made?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend gave me notice of this question, and I have made inquiries of the C.B.C. with respect to it. I am informed that the C.B.C. had not scheduled a forum on this subject, so there is no question of its being cancelled. The topic was suggested some time ago for this week by the Citizens' Forum advisory committee, but the corporation decided not to try to arrange a panel on this subject at this time.

Mr. Fleming: Why not?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was right.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would like to ask the Minister of National Revenue whether the C.B.C. informed him as to why they made the decision that the Currie report would not be suitable for discussion over the C.B.C. at this time.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, that is a matter within the judgment of the corporation, as to what programs they put on. To answer the direct question, I have not been informed of their reasons, if any.

Mr. Fleming: Can you guess them?

Mr. McCann: I am not guessing out loud.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the minister for that answer.

FISHERIES

EFFECT OF UNITED STATES LEGISLATION ON CANADIAN LOBSTER TRADE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Fisheries. Is the Department of Fisheries aware that a bill, soon to be submitted for approval to the legislative assembly of the state of Massachusetts, is designed to compel our Canadian exporters of fresh lobster meat to pasteurize such lobster meat in lieu of refrigeration, and to prohibit all shipments of Canadian fresh and frozen lobster to the profitable Boston market? If so, what steps are being taken by the Department of Fisheries and/or by the government to protect the interests of our maritime provinces lobster fishermen and exporters so seriously threatened by the proposed American prohibitory measure?

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): The department is aware of the fact that there is a bill before the Massachusetts state assembly dealing with a proposed amendment to lobster canning legislation. It is what we would call, in this country, a private member's bill. It was introduced two years ago and defeated by that assembly.

The department is studying the implications of the bill, in the event it should pass. I think however that there is very little this parliament can or should do about action which may be taken by the assembly of the state of Massachusetts.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

AIRCRAFT—INQUIRY AS TO PRODUCTION SCHEDULE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Defence Production. My question arises out of a statement in Monday's press, a copy of which I sent to the parliamentary assistant. It reads as follows—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest the hon. member should not read the statement. I understand he has sent it to the minister.

Mr. Noseworthy: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Then the hon. member may proceed to ask a question.

Mr. Noseworthy: The question is this: Will the parliamentary assistant comment upon that statement?

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, no comment.

Mr. Knowles: Just like a minister!

[Later:]

Mr. Noseworthy: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Defence Production if he can tell us whether the report is correct to the effect that in spite of a $100 million subsidy for the construction of the CF-100, the schedule is still behind?

Mr. Dickey: The Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) made a detailed statement with respect to this program when his estimates were being considered at the last session and hon. members will find this at pages 2742 and 2743 of Hansard of May 30, 1952. It will not be possible to make a statement dealing with this program on a question of this nature. The only brief answer which could be given would be to disclose the current and projected production schedules, which, I am sure all hon. members will agree, it would not be in the national interest to make public. A detailed statement, similar to that made last year, will be made by the minister on his estimates or on some other appropriate occasion in the house.

THE CORONATION

VISITORS ATTENDING CEREMONY—LACK OF TRANSPORTATION FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State. Has the government promised assistance to the Canadian Pacific Steamships line in assuring transportation to those Canadians who had booked passage for the coronation on the Empress of Canada, and now have to find other means of transportation?

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I want to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. It is understood that the Canadian Pacific Steamship Company is using its best endeavours to provide accommodation in other ships for those who had reservations on the Empress of Canada. In any event it should be recalled that a press release issued by the coronation committee of Canada on December 5, 1952, stated that the committee regretted that it could not look after steamship, aeroplane, or hotel reservations for Canadians desiring to attend the coronation in London.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Since his answer of a week ago can he state what further consideration, if any, the government has given to the early construction of the South Saskatchewan river project?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The government has not had an opportunity to give further consideration to that project since the hon. member asked his question a week ago.

Inquiries of the Ministry

OLD AGE PENSIONS

PROCEDURE FOR COLLECTION OF ALLEGED OVERPAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is there not some step that this government can take so that the pressing of needy old age pensioners for repayment of alleged overpayments under the former Old Age Pensions Act may be stopped, particularly in Manitoba, where this inhuman practice is still being pursued?

Mr. Speaker: I doubt if that is a question which should be asked on the orders of the day.

Mr. Knowles: May I—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Knowles: —suggest—

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Since the question has been asked and as my hon. friend may find it desirable if it is not answered to suggest that I do not want to give an answer, I think I had better deal with it forthwith. I thought the hon. member was going to rise and commend the government upon the progress it was making in the field of social security. If the situation is as the hon. member says that is a matter over which this parliament or this government has no control. That is a matter that comes exclusively within the competence of the provincial legislature. These are debts owing by individuals to the crown in the right of the province. If I may say so with great respect, I think my hon. friend knew that even before he rose.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question? Can the minister say whether this practice is being pursued in any other province than Manitoba?

Mr. Martin: What is the question again? I want to make sure so that I can give a correct answer.

Mr. Knowles: I asked the minister if he can say whether the practice referred to in my question is being pursued in any other province than Manitoba?

Mr. Martin: No.

Mr. Speaker: Although the question has been asked and answered I am still of the opinion that it is not the type of question that should be asked on the orders of the day.

Mr. Knowles: The matter is very urgent to those who are affected.

Post Office Act

COMPANIES' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

LIMITATION TO COMPANIES WITH OUTSTANDING BOND ISSUES

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill No. 45, to amend the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1933.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

POST OFFICE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CONTRACTS FOR CONVEYING MAIL

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Post Office Act to provide that the Postmaster General may, in certain cases, enter into contracts for conveying mail involving an annual expenditure of one thousand dollars or less, and may also, under certain conditions, while a contract is still in force, increase the amount payable thereunder during the unexpired term thereof.

Mr. Graydon: I take it that the minister will make his statement at this stage, which I think would be preferable.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, the main purpose of this resolution is to introduce a bill which will authorize the Postmaster General to increase the amount payable under a contract for the conveying of mail during the unexpired and subsequent length of the terms thereafter under certain conditions. I may say that during the consideration of the estimates of the Post Office Department in June, 1952, I referred to representations that had been made by members on both sides of the house asking that a special committee be set up to discuss payments and procedures relating to rural mail delivery service. I indicated that I would recommend the setting up of such a committee.

The bill which will be introduced and which is the subject matter of this resolution deals with increases of payment during the lifetime of any contract, no matter whether it is a renewal or other type of contract. The provisions of this bill will relate to all types of contracts for the conveying of mail, that is, rural mail service, service between post offices, service between railway stations and post offices and the like.

The representations made by hon. members were not restricted to adjustments in the rates of payment but also referred to matters having to do with the regulations governing rural mail delivery service and the administration and operation thereon. It is my intention when this resolution has been accepted to ask the house to revert to notices of motions so that I may move the resolution standing in my name to set up a special committee. I hope that this will meet with the approval of all members on all sides of the house.

Since the last session the department and its officials have been working on this matter. A great deal of time and thought has been given to the subject and I trust that this bill to amend the Post Office Act will meet with the approval of all members so that the situation which has been complained of in the past will be duly corrected.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Graydon: The minister's statement was a rather brief one and I think that perhaps as the discussion progresses he will have to amplify his remarks with respect to some of the provisions of the bill to be introduced. This resolution envisages the introduction of a bill to amend the Post Office Act, which by the way was amended in 1951. On the surface the resolution indicates some confusion with respect to the provisions of the prospective bill. The Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) indicates in the resolution that he desires to have legislative powers to enter into contracts for conveying mail involving an annual expenditure of $1,000 or less without tender. In view of the legislation amending the Post Office Act which was passed by the house and assented to on the 30th of June, 1951, and more particularly section 23, subsection 1, thereof, it would seem to me that the resolution is a move to reimplement legislation which has been passed by the parliament of Canada previously. I say that because I find that section 23 of the amended Post Office Act of 1951 contains these words:

When the Postmaster General conceives that the public interest will be promoted by such a course, he may enter into contracts for conveying mail involving an annual expenditure of $1,000 or less, if the amount to be paid for the services to be performed under the contract does not exceed the amount ordinarily paid for services of a like nature under contracts made after inviting tenders.

I realize that the resolution is in general terms and that when the bill is before us we may have a clearer idea of the difference between the section I have read, which was passed in 1951, and the prospective legislation to be introduced when the resolution carries. However, as it appears at the moment the indication is that what the government is doing is asking for legislation similar in terms to that passed at the session two years ago. In addition, there is a new provision which we will know more about when the legislation comes before us in bill form. The intent of it is that under certain conditions, while a contract is still in force, the Postmaster General may increase the amount payable thereunder during the unexpired term thereof. The resolution is of course delightfully vague with respect to whether the reference is to contracts of $1,000 or less or to the entire gamut of contracts regardless of the amount of the accepted tender. Those are matters concerning which we will have to have further information as we proceed with the discussion of the resolution and when the bill comes before the house.

At this stage I should like to make a few random remarks with respect to the proposed legislation. During the war years, when the rural mail carrier was having great difficulties, as he has been for many years, the government hit upon a plan under the War Measures Act of introducing a system of supplementary payments for mail carriers. It was meant as an emergency measure and was implemented on a partial scale across Canada and made applicable to various routes throughout the country. The effect of it was that where the annual mileage rate for a rural mail route—I am calling on my memory at this time to be my witness and I am afraid one's memory is not always a very good witness—was less than $50 a mile the matter would be reviewed by the department. One difficulty that arose came about because, instead of notifying each rural mail carrier across Canada and telling him of the provision under which he was entitled to apply, to the best of my knowledge not a single rural mail carrier anywhere was notified directly by anybody in the Post Office Department with respect to what his rights were and what he was entitled to receive under the supplementary payments legislation.

The result was that across Canada there must have been not hundreds but thousands of rural mail contractors who missed out, if you like, on the benefits available under that provision. Some members of parliament and others, possibly those in the rural mail carriers' association, did notify some mail carriers as best they could but in a haphazard and hit-and-miss way. There was by no means full coverage. The result was that those who got attention from their members of parliament, from the rural mail carriers' association or from some other quarter, were the ones who received an increase in their contracts, and the other poor fellows, who did not seem to have any friends at court and who never learned anything about the provision, carried on at the old rate. When they made application afterwards to have the provision made retroactive so that the mistake could be rectified they were told by the government that it was too late then, that the money had gone into the treasury of Canada, and of course no mere rural mail carrier could be allowed to tamper with anything so sacred as that. An obvious and serious injustice was done to many mail carriers from coast to coast.

That was the first stage. Later further supplementary payments were provided for under emergency legislation after the war ended. Then for a time supplementary payments went out of existence altogether. What the rural mail carrier has always been anxious to do is to get some redress for the almost impossible situation in which he finds himself as a carrier of Her Majesty's mail. When other people do business for Her Majesty and do various things for the government not very many of them have to put up with a tender system under which they have to come back every few years to find out first of all whether the government wants them. In the second place, they are faced with a situation where they have to try to get their tenders low enough so that they will be accepted. The result is that, while people in other branches of the Post Office Department have a regular and orderly method of employment, the rural mail carrier has not.

Over the years a number of members of parliament have called for a committee, and it has not always been those on one side of the house because I think throughout Canada and in the House of Commons there is a desire to see that the rural mail carriers get a very much better deal than they have in the past. I believe it is five or six years now since I first asked on the floor of the house that a committee be set up to deal with their problems. Later the request was enlarged to include the whole of the ramifications of the Post Office Department. I have received various answers as to why it could not be done. None of them were very convincing. Of course, no argument of the government necessarily convinces a member of the opposition the first time it is made.

An hon. Member: Quite right.

Mr. Graydon: Yes, and a lot depends, of course, on who is making the argument on the other side.

Now that we have at least received a promise of a committee to deal with rural mail and post office problems, I want to say this to the government. When that committee is set up—I have no desire to debate that now because it will come up later today—I hope that the committee will be privileged to hear evidence of those men across Canada who, day in and day out, through fair weather and foul, carry the mail. I hope they will be allowed to come and be permitted to give testimony before this committee about what they think is the best way of solving the vexed question of rural mail couriers' contracts.

All through the years we have had a number of members of parliament discussing the matter from time to time and saying what should be done—some on one side and some on the other. I think the time has now arrived when the people who are most involved, the people who know most about the situation, should be called to give their evidence so that we in parliament may be in a position to judge how it should best be handled. In the past, Mr. Chairman, our rural mail couriers found, when the supplementary payments system had expired, that they were without any possible way of having their contracts from time to time revised unless they were to throw up their contracts and ask for new tenders. That, of course, made for inconvenience, made trouble, and very often did not meet the situation.

What the minister did in 1951 in an attempt to cure the evil had the effect of compounding the evil to some extent because, not only was he given extended power, which means a power of patronage, although it was not a full carte blanche authority to deal with all rural mail contracts, but only those up to a thousand dollars. I know that I am speaking to a number of members of parliament here who in a minor way perhaps understand just how patronage does work in some parts of Canada. The intention with respect to this legislation was to extend the power of the minister, the scope of arbitrary decisions of the minister and the department, but the advantages that may come to the rural mail courier from time to time by virtue of elasticity—and I am quite free to admit there are some advantages—may be outweighed by the disadvantages. Parliament will have to watch and very carefully protect the situation so that the rural mail system will not get into patronage where it would be, of course, mired in that slough for years to come. There must be a way and there is a way out of this dilemma. I do not think the rural mail couriers want to be the objects of what is just plain ordinary party patronage. I am quite sure they do not wish to be in their present position with regard to the tender system, unsatisfactory as it is. I think it is important that, before we attempt to size up the situation and form a judgment with respect to whatever legislation comes before this house by way of an improvement for the rural mail couriers, we ought to hear what they say. That is my main plea this afternoon. Before the government asks the House of Commons to consider and decide upon this bill that is now being introduced, before it goes through—and no doubt the majority of the house will see that it does go through—we ought to have the benefit of evidence taken before the special committee inquiring into the Post Office Department.

I have no doubt that the minister intends to follow that procedure and if he does I shall be content; but I do want to point out to him and to the house that the problem of the rural mail courier has been a festering sore in our whole departmental set-up ever since I came into parliament and for a long time before. Parliament will not be the worthy institution that it is if it allows this sore to fester any longer. There is no need for it to do so if, when the committee is set up, the people who know something about the ramifications of the rural mail contract system have an opportunity to give firsthand evidence about how it should be solved. If that is completed satisfactorily I think we may well say that it will be a very good day's work for parliament.

I want to point out to the minister that when he moves, as he is doing now, toward an extension of the patronage system in connection with the post office, I think that he ought to stop, that he ought to look and that he ought to listen to those who will give evidence in the committee before this bill is passed. He should make an effort to find a satisfactory solution so there will not be just ordinary patronage, so that it will not be just one of these poverty-stricken systems of contract by tender that we have had before. The tender system has made great difficulties for those who have been operating the routes. In the final analysis we may come out of this committee with some legislation that will wipe out the scandalous situation which has existed for so long. If that is the result we shall not only have earned the plaudits of those people who so faithfully carry Her Majesty's mail across Canada in the rural districts; we shall also have met the wishes, desires and approval of the general taxpayers and citizens across Canada.

I would like to say to the minister that I fancy there may be a disposition on the part of the house to reserve their judgment on this resolution until the bill comes to us, until we know what the terms actually are, and also until such time as the committee makes its report on all of the evidence that is adduced.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, my purpose in rising is to ask one or two questions to clarify certain phrases in the resolution. Do I understand that the provision:

—the Postmaster General may, in certain cases, enter into contracts for conveying mail involving an annual expenditure of one thousand dollars or less—

—means that the Postmaster General may without calling tenders deal with such contracts?

My second question concerns the provision that the Postmaster General may:

—under certain conditions, while a contract is still in force, increase the amount payable thereunder during the unexpired term thereof.

I had thought that referred to contracts that were let by tender where it transpires that the person tendering tendered too low or where costs during the term of the tender have increased so that the courier can no longer carry on at the initial figure in the tender.

The Postmaster General might answer those questions when he speaks to the resolution. I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Peel. Probably I have not given so much attention to this matter as he has given it because he represents a rural area, at least in part, and my constituency is entirely urban. This question of rural mail deliveries is therefore not so important with me personally. But for many years I have considered that the present system of letting tenders for rural mail delivery left much to be desired. It is my opinion, at any rate, that in the great majority of cases those who tendered did so at too low a figure and that if they were not delivering the mail at a loss, in any event they did not get much out of it.

As far as I can see, there are only two ways by which this rural mail delivery can be provided for, namely either by the Postmaster General acting directly—which is what we call patronage—or by the tender system. There may be other ways but they do not occur to me just at the moment. While I strongly object to the patronage system, I must admit that the old system has not been satisfactory. When we have the committee set up and can bring before it those who have been delivering mail in the rural districts, if we can be given information that will provide an answer to this question, the committee will certainly be well worth while.

Like the hon. member for Peel, I do not want to discuss the resolution to set up the committee but perhaps I could say this; and if I say it now I certainly will not say it again. I am indeed glad that a committee is going to be set up—it is something that should have been done long ago—and I hope some good may accrue from it.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I have wondered why mail carriers obtained their positions through examination. There is no question about mail carriers from city post offices or on the trains. Why should rural mail carriers get their positions by contracts? I do not know how the minister could choose. Suppose four men put in tenders for the contract, that the lowest man gets it, and then six months afterwards he finds it does not pay. What is the minister going to do? Is he going to raise the contract? That would not be fair to the other man who put in a higher tender.

Mr. Hodgson: Nevertheless, that is what they do.

Mr. McIvor: I suggest to the Postmaster General that this plan of letting rural mail carriers get their position by contract be wiped out, that those who apply for the job be examined in every possible way, and that they get a decent wage. I know of a man at the lakehead who is not getting enough to keep him going and he is asking for an increase, because things have changed. But as far as we at the lakehead are concerned, I must say that we are well pleased, in some cases, with the officials at Ottawa. We had one man who, for many a long year, carried the mail over the same route and he was allowed to keep the contract because it was only fair to him and his family, having regard to the fact that he had a wife and twelve children to keep. My suggestion is that the plan be altogether changed and that the rural mail carriers be chosen in the same way as other mail carriers are chosen.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Chairman, having repeatedly brought before the House of Commons certain complaints which I have had with respect to conditions surrounding rural mail deliveries, I naturally welcome the suggestion on the part of the minister and the government to have a committee set up. I have repeatedly asked for such a committee although I believe that upon most occasions I had expressed the hope that the terms of reference would extend considerably beyond rural mail delivery service. However, since we are taking this step it is quite possible that in the near future we may have an opportunity of considering the post office generally in a committee having terms of reference which are adequate to meet the situation.

It is a fact, in my estimation, that the rural mail delivery service is a most important one to those who are obliged to depend upon it for their mail. On the other hand there is probably no more difficult task that one can undertake than that of delivering mail, particularly in the foothills areas of the Rocky mountains. I have been troubled at times by certain conditions which I have noticed are often associated with the letting of a contract for mail delivery service. I need mention only two or three of these.

I well recall that upon one occasion a certain post office was opened. The owner of the store who would have the post office located within his establishment was, if I may use the word, "pressured"—or at least an effort was made to "pressure" him—into delivering mail free of charge over the ten-mile route on the ground that it would naturally be helping his business establishment anyway. How widespread that sort of thing might be, I do not know. Fortunately the fellow to whom I refer was just wise enough or smart enough to refuse to be "pressured" into that position.

In the second place, I am rather afraid that too much consideration is given to propositions like this: If you are an energetic sort of person, you can carry a few passengers or you can pick up some farm lady's groceries and thus make sufficient additional income to enable you to live in a sort of way, along with the money which you will be paid normally for the carrying of that mail.

Mr. MacInnis: No; along with the money that you may lose.

Mr. Shaw: Yes, along with the money that one may lose, as the hon. member for Vancouver East suggests. It is an established fact, of course, that there is no other department of government in which patronage exists to a greater extent than it exists in the Post Office Department. Possibly that situation is inevitable. Probably it does not extend to the same degree into this field of rural mail delivery. If it is at all possible to keep away from a situation in which patronage may predominate, I rather feel that is what we should do. Of course the prime factor throughout is that the Canadian people are entitled to a service; and in establishing that service we may have to indulge in certain things which normally we might not agree to.

In the establishment of these rural delivery routes and the calling for tenders I have noticed, upon more than one occasion, that all tenders have been thrown out. I have examined some of those tenders; and being thoroughly familiar with the routes over which those men must travel, I could have sworn that the man had something wrong mentally when he tendered at that figure. Yet so frequently we find the department simply throwing it out because, in their estimation, it is too high. It might be possible in the committee to go into that aspect of the matter and to endeavour to bring about a more realistic attitude of mind toward the subject in general. By the throwing out of tenders certain areas have been completely deprived of mail delivery service. I could name two or three such areas, and if I were on the committee—I am afraid I shall not be on it—I would be almost inclined to bring forward these two or three cases and endeavour to have the department justify failure to accept one of these tenders, and thus supply a very important service to the people of the community.

I shall not take any more time except to repeat that I am pleased the committee is to be set up. I am inclined to believe personally that the minister is conscientiously endeavouring to find a solution to a most difficult problem, and I am sure the committee members will help. I have no doubt that evidence that might be procured from witnesses will contribute a great deal also toward a satisfactory solution of the problem.

The Chairman: May I remind hon. members that the resolution that is now before the committee is not the one which will constitute the committee. That will come later. This one is merely the resolution that precedes amendments to the Post Office Act. Since we are in committee of the whole on the resolution perhaps I might remind hon. members of citation 439 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, which reads:

> The object of the resolution recommended by the crown is to give the house a first opportunity to discuss the advisability of making a certain expenditure. The details of the projected measure are not then disclosed and debate is confined to the resolution which should not be lengthy, although care must be taken that the terms used are sufficiently wide to cover the whole of the bill which will be subsequently introduced.

Now that the spokesmen for each of the opposition parties have expressed their views on the problem generally, perhaps I might ask hon. members who would like to speak about the conditions of the post office mail couriers generally to reserve their remarks until the next resolution comes before the house. At this stage we are merely studying the advisability of making the expenditure which is contemplated by the minor amendments to the act which are proposed by this resolution.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I am going to restrict myself to your suggestion. I have but a few comments on the need for improving the conditions and increasing the allowances paid to rural mail couriers. As to the need there can be no argument. Throughout the years, as the hon. member for Peel has said, we on this side of the house have advocated the setting up of a committee to consider this and allied matters connected with the Post Office Department. We naturally welcome the decision on the part of the Postmaster General to do—

The Chairman: May I ask the hon. member, having in mind what I just said, to refrain from discussing the committee resolution, because the one that is now before us reads:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Post Office Act to provide that the Postmaster General may, in certain cases, enter into contracts for conveying mail involving an annual expenditure of one thousand dollars or less—

Mr. Diefenbaker: If you had waited until I had concluded the sentence you would have seen the purpose of it, Mr. Chairman. This matter is one that will be discussed in that committee, and will be particularly appropriate to it. Indeed, it is one of the requests made by the rural mail carriers' association to parliament, and it is because they requested it that I concur that this matter can be best discussed in detail in the committee.

I might refer to the letter that was received by members generally from S. H. Webster, Acton, Ontario, the secretary-treasurer of the association, in which he says:

Our association executive felt that couriers should again have the privilege of remuneration adjustment without having to throw up their contract and retender.

The letter is dated May 5, 1952. I know from the affirmative nod of the Postmaster General that that letter had something to do with the introduction of the present resolution, in an endeavour to accept in effect what was suggested by the association. The letter goes on:

Also, that the suggestion voiced in earlier sessions of parliament for a committee to study rural mail in its entirety was the best method yet proposed to place rural mail delivery and the service on a footing commensurate with its importance.

In order to find out the feelings of individual couriers a letter has been sent to all the mail routes across Canada, and while answers are still coming in, the response has exceeded all expectations.

Our Postmaster General has been advised of the result of this survey with a request that if possible it be considered during the present session.

When the minister replies to the remarks that are now being made I should like him to place on Hansard the recommendations made by the association, and the particulars of the survey referred to in the letter. During the years I have felt, as hon. members generally have, that the couriers have not been receiving fair allowances. In the past the only provision made for any increase was a provision that, in the case of a cancellation, a resignation or a re-tender, increases might be given. During the war provision was made, under the emergency legislation of wartime, to grant increases.

I have said that I agree with the need and approve of the general principle contained in the resolution. I want to add one word of admonition or advice. Every precaution must be taken against the use of the powers contained in this resolution to discriminate against some or to favour others because of political considerations. This may well be an election year, and the granting of power to the Postmaster General, however estimable that gentleman may be, that enables him on his own determination to grant to one and to refuse to another has in it dangerous elements. A suggestion has been made that political considerations sometimes enter into these matters. I am not going into examples of patronage in the Post Office Department at this time, but within the last two years I know of several instances where obvious political partisanship has prevailed. Those instances occurred before the hon. gentleman became Postmaster General. Nonetheless they existed, and on a later occasion perhaps I shall refer to them in detail. At the moment I approve of the principle and of the need and ask the Postmaster General to apply it without regard to any other consideration than the best interests of public service.

What is being done will be acceptable to hon. members not only on this side but on all sides of the house and to the Canadian people as a whole. What has to be guarded against is that these powers—and they are wide ones—shall not be used so as to produce for the government of the day a juicy melon to be apportioned. That is one thing that must be guarded against. I know the minister has no such course of action in mind. Nevertheless a power is granted; and it is just as true today as it was 140 years ago when Lord Acton said that all power corrupts, and that absolute power corrupts absolutely.

What the rural mail carriers of Canada are asking of the government, and will ask of the minister in particular, is that in administering the tremendous trust which will be given to him it shall be administered with equality to all carriers without bias or prejudice, and without any consideration other than the public service.

I would like also to add that, in making provision for the right to increase tenders already granted, further consideration be given as well to increasing the number of routes. In Saskatchewan we find ourselves in the position that during the five-year period between 1946 and 1951 there was a decrease in that province to the extent of 168 rural mail routes. I believe that decrease has continued since 1951.

I make a special appeal to the minister on behalf of Saskatchewan, particularly the people in the rural areas of that province, in asking that every consideration be given whereby a fair and reasonable allowance will be provided for the carriers, and that rural mail services will be made available, to the degree that existed seven or eight years ago at least.

I shall not say anything further at this time, more than to repeat once again the support we have given through the years to doing something to remove injustices found all too frequently among these carriers, when they have not received fair and proper allowances. We would ask that, so far as possible, the increase should be made general, and not restricted too extensively to certain areas. I could point out examples in Saskatchewan where there has been a right to an additional amount over and above the amount of the tender, where carriers should have been entitled to increases, but did not receive them.

As the hon. member for Peel has said, many carriers did not know anything about their rights to apply for increased allowances. One might say that they should have been able to read what had been done. This may be so. I know of a carrier who had no idea whatsoever that any right had been granted by statute in 1951, and prior to that by order in council. I suggest that a general notice should be sent out—and it would not be a costly thing—by which all carriers would be informed. The legislation could be sent to them with the notification that they were entitled to further consideration, that a law had been passed, and that consideration would be granted if the public interest so demanded.

I have nothing more to add, except to ask the minister to place before us the recommendations of the rural mail carriers association, an association which has done so much to raise the standards of its membership, an association the executive of which has been reasonable in its representations, conciliatory in its attitude, and at all times desirous of contributing its part for efficient public service by its membership.

Mr. Laing: Mr. Chairman, I wish first of all to compliment the very popular Postmaster General upon a very popular resolution. I do not share the concern of the hon. member for Lake Centre, who seems to think that the Postmaster General may be too generous and too political. I expect he will be neither.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not express any concern. I just asked that he should not be.

Mr. Laing: Well, the hon. member for Lake Centre is very proficient in raising warnings, some of which have been valuable. However, I was far more concerned and impressed by the representations of the hon. member for Peel, because I know something about the background of some of the rural mail couriers, a great number of whom operate out of the city of Vancouver into the adjoining municipalities.

I have felt that in large measure they are people who are retired or semi-retired, or people who obtain income from other sources. There has been a great tendency for these people, many of whom know very little about costs, to put in quotations on these small but important jobs that are altogether too low.

I would hope that out of this resolution a formula would be devised which might remove some of the elements of competition. There comes to my mind the thought that perhaps a committee could be set up in a local area. I know that in Vancouver we could get together a committee of two or three people to assess the value per mile of operating any particular man's vehicle. The routes are specific as to mileage. If a man knew when making his quotation what he should expect for the operation of his vehicle I think we would have less objection to his competing on his own personal income. I have in mind in the city of Vancouver a man who has a contract today for the picking up of the mail at the drop boxes and from the railways, and delivering it to the Vancouver post office. Today he is being employed on an hourly basis for his trucks. He is receiving only 30 per cent of the total amount, per hour, for each of those trucks; the other 70 per cent goes to the labour operating the trucks.

There was a time in Vancouver when the situation was exactly the reverse, when 30 per cent went to the employee operating the truck, and he received 70 per cent for operation. This present situation is bad for the man who has the contract. I know the minister will have difficulty in working out a practical formula. But surely we can do a lot better and be more fair to these people than we have been in the past. I welcome the resolution.

Mr. Wright: I should like to place one or two questions before the Postmaster General, which he may answer now or later. How many rural routes are there in operation in each province? How many are on a twice-a-week basis and how many on a daily basis? How many people are served by those routes in each province?

The hon. member for Lake Centre has indicated a decrease in the last five years in the number of routes in Saskatchewan, brought about largely by the fact that the system used there has been based upon the old horse-and-buggy days. It is archaic. The amounts paid for the service given are not worth while. In the general revision we are now going to have with respect to rural routes in operation, something should be done in western Canada to put rural mail delivery on a sound basis.

Old routes were from 25 to 30 miles and could be served with a horse and buggy or horse and cutter. Many of the roads were not in too good condition and that was the only way in which the people could be served. But today more modern equipment is available and if the rural mail carrier can keep busy every day he can cover a greater area and render much better service to his customers. As a result he will have more for himself and be able to provide a better type of equipment.

I hope that these matters will be taken under consideration by the committee. I am sure that when the questions which I have asked the Postmaster General are answered we will find that as far as Saskatchewan is concerned there is very little in the way of rural mail delivery at the present time. What there is is mostly on a twice-a-week basis.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Chairman, I wanted to say a word or two on this matter. On several other occasions I have taken advantage of the opportunity offered to express to the house and the Postmaster General the hope that a better system of rural mail delivery would be worked out. I agree with what was said by the hon. member for Peel and the hon. member for Lake Centre. I am not going to go into details, but I do contend that the need for a change is long overdue. The working out of an arrangement that will be mutually satisfactory will present quite a problem. Other speakers have referred to patronage. As far as my area is concerned I do not think that that enters into the picture and I hope that that condition will continue in the future.

Possibly an arrangement could be worked out on the basis of mileage, plus the number of boxes, plus the type of road. The matter of the extension of rural routes should be considered. I know the minister will correct me if am wrong, but I believe the arrangements governing the extension of routes, say in Saskatchewan or the western provinces, are such that when extended they are extended for greater distances than they would be in Ontario. I have heard that such is the case, although I am not sure.

It will be remembered that rural mail delivery was commenced many years ago. The hon. member who has just spoken referred to the use of the horse and buggy and the horse and cutter. We have long passed that stage and I do not think it should be so difficult at the present time to extend our rural routes. I think all people in the country should have the advantages of rural mail delivery if it is humanly possible to provide it. This is the sort of thing the Post Office Department should be considering.

I am sure the minister realizes that no other department of government touches so many people. Even the newly-arrived immigrant is interested in receiving mail from his homeland and the instructions and other information sent through the mails to new Canadians. I think the minister can do a great deal to improve the understanding of his department by the people of Canada.

There are many new housing developments being carried out adjacent to our cities and it has not been found possible to provide postal delivery service the same as is provided in the city because of the absence of sidewalks. Some of the new modern housing areas do not contemplate the installation of sidewalks. These are some of the things that have to be worked out. I see the parliamentary assistant shaking his head, but this is still a problem for the department.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): It was simply because this is out of order; it is not provided for in the bill.

Mrs. Fairclough: How do we know? We have not seen it.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): This is a resolution.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I am hoping that, when the committee meets, interested parties, including representatives of the rural mail carriers' association, will be called in so that we can hear their side of the story.

The Chairman: Before we go any further may I say a word? Hon. members often say that the rules are outmoded and complain that sometimes debate is permitted to go on for some time when it is really out of order. Before I am accused of having permitted a debate which is out of order to continue too long I should like to ask for the co-operation of hon. members. If they will look at the order paper they will see that the resolution which will be debated immediately after this one is adopted provides for the setting up of a committee with a view to examining the amendments proposed by this resolution. Therefore, there is not a single speech that has been made on this resolution which could not be made on the next one.

I think this provides a perfect occasion for the exercise of restraint. Once this resolution is passed, hon. members will have ample opportunity to discuss at any length they wish, on the other resolution, the matters they are now discussing. I leave these remarks for the consideration of hon. members.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I intend to remain in order. I am interested in the provision that permits the first speaker for each party to be in order and then the rest of us to be out of order. I must say that I have listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Peel, which I understand were out of order. But I do support his proposal and I think he adopted a very good attitude towards this whole problem.

I am interested in rural mail delivery as I represent a rural riding in which there are many difficult rural mail routes. I am glad to see a resolution being introduced which indicates that the government is beginning to realize the inequalities and unfairness of the present system. I had intended to say a little more, but I am going to take your advice and I will say no more on this resolution.

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Chairman, I am going to take your command or advice, whichever you call it, and say very little at this time. I think the whole set-up is wrong. I think this whole matter of tenders and everything else should be handled by the civil service commission. I have personal knowledge of patronage being practised in my riding, not only recently but in the years gone by.

I understand that this resolution is being brought in more or less at the request of the rural mail carriers' organization and I hope that it will result in improvements in this system.

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Chairman, I am going to abide by your advice and say only one thing. I am sorry to see that this is going to be put in the hands of the Postmaster General. I do not want to see the day when you have to be a Liberal before you can haul the mail. I do not want to see the day when you will have to be a Conservative, when the Conservatives are in power—

Mr. Hodgson: Oh, no.

Mr. Bryce: Oh, yes. It leaves the whole thing wide open to political patronage. The Postmaster General is given the power to say what a man will get or who will haul the mail. I have nothing against the Postmaster General as he is a good friend of mine, but I am thinking of those who may follow him and who may be really bad. It says distinctly here that the Postmaster General may appoint a mail carrier when the contract is for $1,000 or less. I think they are pretty nearly doing it as it is. I know a fellow who hauled the mail for four years and then lost the job. Another person tendered and got it, and I know how he got it too. I wrote the Postmaster General and asked him when the route would come up for tender again. The effect of his letter was that they did not need to ask for tenders and that the fellow who got the job was doing all right. That may be all right but they did not take that into consideration in the case of the fellow who had the job before. They called for tenders. I do not want to be out of order but I regret a step that will leave the matter open to political patronage. I think we should get away from that.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I do not believe the set-up is wrong. The civil service commission has enough work to do at the present time, and if the matter were turned over to them, it would be too much for them. In the second place, may I say that no political considerations enter my mind when I deal with the Post Office Department or the mail carriers. It may mean that I have to do a little more work but I am ready to do it for my mail carriers. I am sure the measure would not have been brought forward by the Postmaster General if its purpose was not to improve the situation of the mail carriers.

Mrs. Fairclough: Before the resolution is carried by the committee, will the Postmaster General clarify it by explaining to the committee in what respect the bill to be introduced will differ from section 23 of the legislation passed in 1951? Would he tell us in what manner this resolution complements the other, because at first reading it would almost seem as if we were being asked for permission to do what has already been done.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): I shall say only a few words in order to clarify the situation because I believe that a little confusion has arisen. First of all, I must thank the members who have already spoken and who are ready to co-operate in this matter. The bill to be introduced amending the Post Office Act does not change the act at all except in those respects mentioned in the resolution. The purpose is to allow the Postmaster General to readjust the remuneration received by mail contractors. Some of my hon. friends complained about patronage and said in support of their complaints that we must maintain the tender system. We are keeping the tender system. Nothing in the law is changed so far as the tender system is concerned.

Someone said that we do not actually operate the tender system in respect of contracts under $1,000. That is true. According to the law the department has the power to enter into contracts when the amount involved is under $1,000, but I would say that in 95 per cent of all contracts under $1,000 the procedure is the same in that tenders are submitted by contractors. There has been a general complaint from all sides of the house that provision should be made to readjust the remuneration paid under mail contracts. I can remember my hon. friend (Mr. McLure) referring many times to a contractor in his riding who had submitted a tender $5 less than the other man but lost the contract. He said that the man had had experience, had expended money to buy a car, and that it was an injustice to him. This is one of the injustices we want to correct by the bill to be introduced.

Take, for instance, a contractor who has carried out his contract for three years and ten months. We would be ready now, as we have the power to do, and as was suggested by my hon. friend who spoke a few minutes ago, to renew his contract. If he has given good service, if he has gone to the expenditure of a considerable amount of money, and is obliged to submit a tender again, we do not see why we should not renew that contract. It is permissible to do so now, but on the other hand we do not want to oblige that man to renew the contract if he is certain of losing money. That is why the bill is to be brought forward. The purpose is to find a way to readjust the amount paid to the contractor in such circumstances so that he can continue to serve his country and not lose money while doing so.

At the present time we have the power to readjust the amount of money in contracts under $1,000 but the method of doing so is not very satisfactory. It is done by taking the average of similar contracts obtained by tenders in an area. We take the average. I do not want to go into the details. It will be up to the committee to find the best way to do it. We think that the plan on which the department has worked will give satisfaction to the committee. We want to be in a position to readjust not only contracts under $1,000 but all contracts with the exception of those mentioned in article 29 having to do with the railroads, Trans-Canada Air Lines and so on. If it is a good principle to adjust contracts, the amounts of which are under $1,000, it is equally just, if we can find a way to do so without discrimination, for all contracts of a similar nature whatever amount of money is involved.

The hon. member for Lake Centre referred to the association. We have received constant demands from many sources over the last five years. The association also wrote us and suggested that we should try to find a way to readjust objectively. What we have in mind is exactly that, to readjust not because in the minds of the officials a particular amount is the one which should be applied but because objectively from the information we receive from the labour department and all other sources the amount is fair having in mind comparable services performed in the area. Generally speaking that is what we intend to do. I cannot go into all the details on the resolution as to how it will be done.

It will be up to the committee to call any person whom they think should be called. I not only have no objection but I invite the committee to call every officer in the department, every person from the association, and any other interested parties who can give them information. I think such a course will be in the interests of the committee and what we are seeking to achieve, the betterment of the legislation, so that there will be no discrimination or unjust patronage according to the meaning that we usually give to that word. We in the department do not want people to feel that they do not receive justice and a proper appreciation of their claims from the Postmaster General. What we have in mind is to try to be in a position to give justice to all those who are serving the country in this way and who are a part of a big system. We feel that every citizen in the country must be looked after and must feel that he belongs to the same family. We are trying to give adequate treatment and service to all those who belong to the Canadian family.

I must thank all those who have spoken so far because they have said things which I really appreciate. It is my continuing wish and hope that I may be able to respond to the feelings they have expressed. I do not wish to do anything that may be described as furthering political patronage, making differences between this mail contractor or that mail contractor because one is a Liberal, another a Conservative or another a follower of any other political ideas. That is not what I have in mind. I want to approach the problem openly and broadly, and to find a solution to the difficulties which have existed for many, many years.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will wait until the resolution is passed to revert to notices of motions.

Mrs. Fairclough: I believe the Postmaster General has pretty well explained what I had in mind but I wonder if he would confirm my understanding, which is that in the last part of this resolution all contracts are covered, not just those under $1,000.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): All contracts except those covered by section 29, which deals with railway and aviation transportation for which we already have the power to enter into contracts without tenders.

If I may summarize, we are keeping the law as it is. We are keeping this legislation as it is. The amendment is made only in an effort to find a way of readjusting the contracts of those who are losing money and who would not continue to serve the country with the best equipment.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the minister one question arising out of what he said about rural mail couriers coming to give evidence before the committee. I would not want to be unreasonable in anything I suggest with respect to the matter, but I take it that those who might be witnesses, to give the committee some of their good advice, would be called in the normal way and would be paid their fare to Ottawa and back to their ordinary residence. Those people could not afford to come otherwise.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): I think it would be unfair for me to try to make suggestions to the house. It will be up to the committee to decide what means they shall take to call witnesses, officials and other persons.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Hear, hear.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 107, to amend the Post Office Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the minister leave to revert to notices of motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

POST OFFICE

COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AMENDMENTS—RURAL MAIL SERVICE

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to consider the bill, an act to amend the Post Office Act, and also the regulations, general administration and operation of the rural mail delivery service; with power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to print its evidence and proceedings from day to day, and to report from time to time its observations and opinions thereon and that, notwithstanding the provisions of standing order No. 65, the committee shall consist of the following members: Messrs. Ashbourne, Beyerstein, Boucher, Brisson, Bryce, Cardiff, Cardin, Coyle, Cruickshank, Dinsdale, Dumas, Dupuis, Garland, Gour (Russell), Green, Hosking, Langlois (Gaspe), MacKenzie, MacLean (Queens), McCulloch, McWilliam, Noseworthy, Robertson, Robichaud, Spence, Ward and Welbourn.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I take it, Mr. Speaker, that the minister is not going to make a statement in connection with the motion to set up a committee. If he were I would gladly yield to him.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): I do not intend to make a statement.

Mr. Graydon: I think you are wise. Sometimes the less you say on these things, the less trouble you get into. I pass that on as good advice to the minister. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) follows it to the letter.

An hon. Member: Why do you not follow it?

Mr. Graydon: I could include some more. There are one or two things in connection with this motion that I would like to say. I had thought that a committee of this kind would not be confined entirely to the amendment which is now about to be made pursuant to the resolution which has passed. I thought the committee would have the power to deal with matters relating to the department as a whole.

If I were minister of this department—and I would not think that would ever happen—I perhaps would be taking the same position as the minister is taking. However, if the minister were standing where I am he would probably be taking my position.

I think it is fair to say that there are a number of things in the operation of the post office which do need cleaning up. Mere revision of the Post Office Act, which took place in 1951, does not necessarily do that. There are many outstanding problems in connection with the delivery and dispatch of mail in rural, urban and suburban areas which would seem to me properly to be the subject of review by a committee of this kind. I am not urging the matter especially at this time except to say that I think the house is entitled to have included in the matters referred to the committee things which are additional to rural mail contracts. With that I am going to rest my case as far as that feature is concerned.

The situation with respect to rural mail operations was dealt with by me at some length today on a previous resolution, and I have no desire to continue that discussion; but there are some other things I want to say to the minister. With regard to what I had in mind about enlarging the powers of the committee, I was thinking particularly of that great and growing section of Canada which is known as suburbia, in other words those sections, particularly on the fringe of great metropolitan cities, where people now find it attractive and convenient to live. They move out of the city and have their homes in the suburbs.

In my own county of Peel there has been a movement which has gained momentum particularly in the years since the close of the second world war. It has reached a point where we have a city of almost 30,000 people at the south end of Peel. That has brought all the growing pains that come to a new settlement of that kind. With those growing pains we have had a good many problems with respect to rural mail delivery and I want to bring that matter, that specific case, before the minister today if I may.

I should like to have seen the motion made broad enough and the committee's powers made extensive enough so they could have reviewed the whole question of suburban mail delivery. It really comes in between strictly rural delivery to the farmers and the letter delivery service which many of the urban municipalities enjoy. In the United States of America some improvements have been made both in the thinking and the procedure in the post office department, and those improvements have made for certain changes in connection with delivery in suburban places. I thought it would be a good thing for this committee to have the opportunity of discussing those changes and, if possible, finding a solution to some of the problems confronting these people in the suburbs.

These problems are real ones because in some cases the people are obliged to go a long way to the post office. They are unable to get rural mail delivery, in many instances, because of the fact that the settlement is not one that adapts itself to rural mail delivery. They therefore find themselves in between the two. They are neither rural nor urban. The result is that the suburban people of this class sometimes suffer and have great difficulty in getting their mail from time to time.

In the Lakeview and Port Credit areas in my own county the situation has been partially rectified by the establishment, or at least the promise of the establishment, of a letter delivery service. I want to take this opportunity of thanking the minister for what he has done in that connection to relieve an extremely serious situation which was developing in those fast-growing areas of Toronto township. But I want to say this to the minister. When he is dealing with matters of this kind, and when he is instituting letter delivery service to take the place of rural mail service or of postal service which comes from the post office itself, I hope he will instruct his department to do two things in future, as a result of these experiences we have had there.

One is this. I hope he will not wait until 90 per cent of the people or of the houses in the area have those articles of hardware known as letter slots in which to put the mail. Human nature being what it is—and the minister knows this—as soon as people know that the mail is going to be delivered say a week from Monday they will rush out to the hardware store and get slots, and right down the street they will be all ready that day. But that will not happen if the minister does as he has done in this case and says to the people in an area: Just 52 per cent of you have slots now, and we will make another survey in a few months. You find now that in the Lakeview-Port Credit area the percentage is something like 68.5 according to the minister's latest calculation and he is going to have another survey in March.

In all kindness I suggest to the minister that he ought to start these walks now. I he does so; if he tells the people there that in the course of a couple of weeks they will have mail delivery, and that if they do not have a slot in the door they will not have any delivery, he will find a slot in every door in the Lakeview-Port Credit area. I only mention that fact because it is a matter of the transition from a rural mail and post office area into that of a house to house delivery area.

In addition to that, may I say this to the minister. When he is taking over these rural areas he may find some blind spots here and there where the policy of the department gets rigid and where they say the letter carrier should not be asked to go along those streets because there are not as many houses as there are on some others. When you give letter delivery service or rural mail service to an area I think it is good business, and a matter of fairness and justice, to see that even those blind spots are taken care of and that everybody in the area has service.

I point out to the Postmaster General that in the Lakeview-Port Credit area there is the Queen Elizabeth garden subdivision which started off with something like 10 houses, then got up to 200 and now has nearly 400. Because it happened to have an entrance from Cawthra road, which is a main highway, and is not on that road itself unless things have changed in the last couple of weeks these people are not going to have any letter carrierd service at all. That situation exists in many other parts of the country. When you put in a letter delivery service you are going to find a great many gaps, and that fact is going to cause a great deal of trouble because the situation is unjust and unfair. Even though you have to make your regulations a little bit elastic, go ahead and give service to that whole district, every house in it, and you will find that the results, having regard to public relations, will be great, both for the government and everyone else.

I make that plea to the minister, knowing that he is receptive and that he welcomes reasonable and sound suggestions. I would also ask him not to just let it remain on Hansard but, when he goes to his office after this debate, to get in touch with his officials and see that the thing is done. Do not just leave it on Hansard where it will remain six weeks from now, and have someone come along and say, "I raised a question and the minister said he would try to look into it." I know the minister wants to do the right thing in these matters, and I make that urgent plea to him this afternoon. I am confident that he is going to do what I request.

I want to say that we welcome the setting up of this committee. I hope its terms of reference may be enlarged to take in some of the problems I have mentioned this afternoon in addition to matters with respect to rural mail couriers. As a parting word may I say to the minister that despite the fact that I know neither he nor the Minister of Public Works—oh, here he comes now. I can never make a statement about the Minister of Public Works without having him arrive from behind the curtain. In any event I hope the minister will bear this in mind. I know he will not have anything to do with this committee. No minister ever does. All these committees are independent. The ministers hardly know they are set up, I understand. But somehow or other the committees unconsciously rather like to do the things that the ministers find are the proper thing to do, within bounds and within reason, of course.

I do not want to interfere with the committee in any way; but when the minister is talking just naturally to some of the members of the committee, even in the corridors, he might just suggest that these rural mail couriers, in whatever numbers are needed, have their travelling and living expenses granted to them when they come down here to give evidence. These people are just going on the thin edge of nothing economically, the whole lot of them; and it is tantamount to not getting their evidence at all if you make them pay their own way down to Ottawa. I think some allowance ought to be made. I have looked through the public accounts and I have found that there are a good many people across Canada who are allowed living allowances and travelling expenses. It seems to me that the rural mail couriers could be included in that great and growing body who at least are not asked to take anything out of their own pockets, in order to help the country.

Therefore I suggest to the minister and to the committee that everybody will be watching the work of the committee, because it is most important. I talk to many people who do not come from rural areas and who know nothing about rural areas, who think that this is just one of those side issues that does not amount to very much. I want to tell those people that this is a very important issue, and that in settling the problem of the contracts for carrying our mail in the rural areas this committee will be taking on a very heavy burden. I wish it well in the work it will do. I do hope the minister will take some notes, if his parliamentary assistant has not done so already, on three or four of the things I have mentioned so that I shall not have to come back later and ask the minister whether he has dealt with the things I mentioned two weeks ago.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, for a number of years we in this group, in association with other members on the opposition side of the house and also some members on the government side, have urged the necessity for the establishment of a committee to study this question of rural mail couriers. Therefore we are very pleased indeed to support this resolution, and look forward to the committee having a full opportunity to go thoroughly into the long-standing grievances of the rural mail couriers of this country.

Before proceeding with the brief remarks I wish to make in connection with this resolution, I want to congratulate the minister on the improved morale in the Post Office Department since he has taken over. I come from British Columbia. I do not know just how he has managed it, but I have met a lot of people who have said to me: "I think that Postmaster General is a pretty good guy", and so on and so forth. He must have a system of public relations that is quite effective, and I extend my congratulations.

I come from a rural area which is made up of many mountains and lakes which present some particular and unusual problems so far as the delivery of rural mail is concerned. I must say at this stage that I have not particularly noticed any political patronage so far as the awarding of contracts for the carriage of mail is concerned, possibly partly due to the fact that the remuneration the department pays is low in relation to the average earnings of the working people in my constituency. But it is a difficult country to cover; it presents some unusual problems. Rural mail is carried by bus, by car, by truck, by barge, by launch and by steamer. For a short time it was carried by air to two isolated points as an experiment, which proved unsuccessful.

I have had a long residence in that district, and I have noticed the particular difficulties that the carrying of rural mail presents. However, I want to be fair. I have discussed this matter with the minister's officials, and I fully realize the difficult problem it is. But the tender system is not entirely satisfactory, and I know the mileage system presents difficulties. Even a salary system presents difficulties. That is why I welcome this committee which will have an opportunity to go into all these questions and into the experience of the officials of the department, and I trust that the rural mail couriers will have their representatives there to present their views. That is very important.

I want to give just briefly, Mr. Speaker, some examples of the unfairness that does exist under the tender system. I think of my district and of a certain workingman who had a small truck. He secured the mail contract between two points about a hundred miles apart. He gave most efficient service; he was well liked in the district. He was courteous, and usually kept the deliveries on time, sometimes under very difficult winter conditions. Then a tender was called for, and a man already successfully established in a considerable business tendered; and because his tender was a few dollars lower than the tender of the man who had operated the route for some time he received the contract. He then turned around and hired someone at less than average wages for that type of work to drive the truck. In my opinion that is one instance of the unfairness of the tender system, and I do not quite know how you are going to overcome it.

In another instance a man took a tender for carrying the rural mail by launch. He had a quite substantial launch. He spent some money in improving it and carried the mail between two or three points some thirty miles apart. Because these isolated communities are served only by a steamer service twice a week he was able to bring in certain supplies required by individuals in the community, and also to carry parcels backward and forward. On several occasions his stout, seaworthy launch—one of the few in the district—was able to take sick people to hospital, and on emergency trips. After carrying on that service at a very reasonable price—a low price, I should say—to the satisfaction of everybody concerned, tenders were called for. Somebody else came into the picture and created confusion, against the wishes of all the people concerned in these communities. The matter was discussed for months and months. The man wants to build an even better boat, but he does not know what to do. Finally the whole situation became so difficult and there are so many, shall I say, intangible factors involved that the department reduced the mail service to those communities from three times a week to twice a week by giving this contract, for the present winter months, to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

I do think that there is unfairness under the tender system for two reasons. In many cases the contract goes to a man whose tender is slightly lower than the tender of the man who has satisfactorily performed the work for years. In the second place, the present system provides no security for men who sometimes have given years of devoted service to the communities they have served.

I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) when he was strictly out of order on the other resolution and when he was in order on this resolution, and I must say that on the whole I agree with what he had to say. I think he made a very reasonable factual presentation of the position so far as the rural mail couriers are concerned.

We in this group are very pleased indeed to see this resolution specialize on these particular problems. We can also support his other suggestion as well. We wish the terms of reference had been somewhat wider to permit an examination into general post office operations. However, having attained one objective by having this resolution placed on the order paper, we shall have to continue to advocate the second objective and trust that it will receive the favourable consideration of the Postmaster General as the days go by.

I bring these matters to the attention of the Postmaster General. I am speaking with some knowledge. Even before I came into this house I was interested in community organizations, boards of trade, farmers' institutes, and bodies of that sort; therefore I have a pretty good knowledge of the complexities and difficulties of this problem. In associations that I have been connected with we have often discussed ways and means of correcting various mail situations. I admit again that it is a very difficult problem, but I trust that as a result of a thorough examination of this problem by the committee and with the advice of the officials of the department, when this committee reports its recommendations will make provision for a great improvement in the conditions under which the rural mail is carried in this country.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, like those who have spoken before me, I am also in favour of this resolution and only wish that it had been introduced and acted upon many years ago.

The problem of the rural mail courier is one that has taken up quite a little time in the house, and I am glad to see that we have at least secured a minister who has listened to what we members here have to say. I also want to thank him for putting into operation a rural mail route which was put out of business a little while before he came into office, simply because a few dollars were involved. At the present time none too much is being paid.

I believe the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) made a good suggestion when he said to the minister that the expenses of witnesses brought here should be paid, because the expense of coming here might prevent some valuable witnesses from putting in an appearance and giving evidence. We have paid plenty of money by way of expenses to other witnesses, and I hope these expense moneys will not be denied representatives of the rural mail carriers' association.

The system of tendering has been given approval in some places while in other places it has been discredited. If all mail carriers were good businessmen the situation would be somewhat different. However, many of them have been enticed into putting in tenders at figures much below the value of the work involved. The result is that shortly after they begin working they find they are losing money, and on some occasions this results in the giving of poor service. The result is that the people on the route must suffer because of the low tender.

In my home town I know of one carrier, Mr. George Martin, who is on his route six days a week. When I was home at Christmas he suggested something which might be of interest to the committee. He pointed out that some school district buses are paid on a mileage basis. That is, on a paved road the rate is so much per mile, on a gravel road it is slightly different and on a dirt road another rate is paid. This might be considered with profit by the committee. Then I suggest there should be consideration of the density of population or the number of boxes per mile. This might be helpful to the committee.

I would ask that the committee and the minister give careful consideration to increasing the service from two to three deliveries a week. So far as I know in my constituency we do not receive more than two deliveries a week in any section of the territory which, at the present time, is somewhat in excess of 6,000 square miles. On the other hand people in cities and towns have daily mail service, and we hope provision will be made soon whereby they will have it twice a day.

I think therefore the committee might properly consider giving delivery three days a week in the rural areas. We must remember that the people in the country districts are, in practically all cases, primary producers and, as such, they should have their fair share of the services for which they are paying.

Then there should be some type of security for those people who spend many years of their lives delivering mail over rural routes. Perhaps this would not apply to those who have worked for only a short time; but there are many who have spent the best years of their lives in the delivery of mail, and I suggest the minister might consider making available to them the form of pension given to other members of the post office staff.

I do not wish to take up further time, but I felt I should make these few observations in the hope that they might be of interest to the committee.

Mr. F. S. Follwell (Hastings South): Mr. Speaker, I have withheld any remarks I wished to make until this time, when we have before us the motion to set up the special committee. At the outset I should like to say to the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) that, coming from a constituency that has both rural and urban residents about equally divided, I find it necessary to take up many problems with the Post Office Department on behalf of those people. Let me say to you, sir, that I have had the utmost co-operation and success in dealing at the local level with postmasters involved, then with the district inspector, and then with the Postmaster General or his parliamentary assistant, as well as other officers of the department.

When I have discussed with the Postmaster General problems connected with expanding communities in suburban areas, such as were described by the hon. member for Peel (Mr.

Graydon), he has been most receptive and, on each occasion, a daily mail delivery service has been put into practise.

Referring now particularly to the rural areas, may I say that I am deeply gratified that finally this matter has reached the point where a committee of the house is to be set up to deal with injustices under the act. One particular amendment that I suggest should be made would be to that section of the act which would seem to prohibit delivery of mail to residents living just off an established route. In bringing this matter to the attention of the minister's officials it has been pointed out to me that it is necessary to have an extension in order to service these people. In my constituency, and I am sure in every constituency across Canada, many who live in rural sections are not receiving regular mail service because of the fact that they are just off a travelled route. While I am not sure, my understanding is that, unfortunately, in order to have an extension of half a mile or a mile in the length of a route it must be established that there are a certain number of boxholders in that district. I have been informed that there most be three to a mile.

An hon. Member: Four.

Mr. Follwell: Someone says it is four. I have been confronted with this problem on several occasions. I believe it was the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) who said that we are past the horse and buggy days in the matter of mail delivery, that in these days we do not need to use the horse and buggy or horse and cutter. My only observation would be that a year or so ago I took up residence on a rural route and now receive my domestic mail from a box on that route. I find that, particularly at this time of year, the mail carrier must use a cutter, and that he finds it tough going. In my view he does not receive a bit too much pay for the job.

The hon. member for Victoria, Ont. (Mr. Hodgson) made reference to patronage in his constituency. That may or may not be true. However, it has been pointed out to me that back in the period between 1930 and 1935, when there was another government in office, patronage was rampant not only in the Post Office Department but also in other departments of government.

Mr. McLure: Name them.

Mr. Follwell: The hon. member asks me to name them. I must admit it was a little before my time. I am talking about something I have been told by members of the opposition. I have found in my dealings with the Post Office Department that everything is treated as a straight business proposition and there is no patronage at all. I have been able to secure some redress for those who have contracts under $1,000.

The service required on rural mail routes is increasing all the time. The number of boxholders on practically all routes is increasing. People are moving from the city to the country, and new Canadians are moving into Canada and going to live in areas served by the rural mail routes. The department takes the view in letting contracts that the national average of boxes per mile must be taken into account. That seems to me a wrong principle. On some routes there may be only a few boxholders, while the other routes may cover many boxholders. I think the committee would be well advised to consider such matters as this.

I should like to bring to the attention of the Postmaster General the lack of accommodation in the post office buildings in Belleville and Tweed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the proposed amendments which are to be studied by the proposed committee, and to conditions which relate to rural mail service.

Mr. Follwell: What I was about to say has some connection with the rural mail carriers. Rural mail carriers operate in all directions from Belleville, and they must sort their mail and take directions from the postmaster there. That applies also to the village of Tweed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member wishes to speak about the condition of distribution centres for rural mail he would be in order.

Mr. Follwell: I should like to point out that the distribution centres are sadly overtaxed. The post office in Belleville was built many years ago to serve rural and urban communities of only a few thousand. Belleville is now a rapidly expanding metropolis with a population large in comparison to what it was when the post office was built. The accommodation has been added to by a little extension to the building here and a little extension to the building there and the putting in of a mezzanine.

The post office at Tweed has become quite active, its revenue being much higher than that of post offices in other villages and towns where new buildings have been erected for the purpose of serving the rural mail carriers. I am pleased that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) is here, and I ask him to consider including an item in the supplementary estimates to cover the construction of new post offices at these two points.

I join with the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) in suggesting that the terms of reference of this committee should be broadened so that it can consider the whole letter carrier situation. I am speaking particularly for the carriers in my area who are members of the federated association of letter carriers. At the present time the remuneration they receive has no relation to the job they are doing. They are expected to be on the job six days a week and carry the mail whether it is snowing and freezing or 90 or 100 degrees in the shade. When compared with the rates received by those in industry we find that the letter carriers are not being treated on a comparative basis.

Letter carriers in the United States receive $4,300 a year as compared with approximately $2,850 received by the letter carriers in this country. I point out further that the letter carriers in the big country to the south work a 40-hour week whereas the letter carriers in Canada must work a 44-hour week. There is some suggestion that the two-a-day mail delivery will be restored. If that is done it will mean that the duties of the letter carriers will be much heavier than they are at the present time. I ask this committee which is to be set up to consider bringing the pay of letter carriers into line. As hon. members know, the letter carriers constitute the public relations department, not only for the government but for parliament as well.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has been referring to letter carriers, which is a considerable distance from rural mail delivery, the subject of the resolution.

Mr. Follwell: I should like to conclude by suggesting to the Postmaster General that this committee consider all phases of the rural mail service and possibly be given an opportunity to look into the wages being paid to our letter carriers.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I have been waiting patiently all afternoon to take a small part in this discussion on rural mail delivery. I want to bring a particular matter to the attention of the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) this afternoon because I know he has a special interest in the area which I represent, after having received such a cordial welcome during his visit there last July. I understand it was the first time in a good many years that we had been honoured by a personal visit from the Postmaster General.

I agree in a general way with the remarks of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), but the problem I wish to put before the minister—perhaps we will be able to discuss it later in the committee—is almost the reverse of the difficulty the hon. member for Peel mentioned. He referred to the problems that have arisen with the development of suburban communities. On the prairies we have the reverse process. As our rural areas have tended to become depopulated and our farms to increase in size, there has been a tendency for some of the rural routes to become uneconomic to operate.

This matter came to my attention quite recently in a specific case when the rural delivery service from the town of Alexander, Manitoba, was abruptly stopped. Apparently the tender submitted for the particular contract was $1,250, but the Post Office Department thought the route could not be operated on an economic basis for more than $1,000.

As I listened to the discussion this afternoon, particularly on the resolution which was before us, it occurred to me that the solution being sought might in some way assist in this problem that is peculiar to the prairies. The matter will have to be considered in the committee; but if the present trend continues and our farm population continues to move towards the cities or suburban areas and as a result farm units become increasingly large, then it may mean that there will have to be further cancellations of service if the situation is only going to be considered on the basis of economic distribution. Such a result of course would not increase the attractiveness of life in rural areas. No doubt the minister is aware of this situation. I think it is of sufficient importance to command the attention of the committee.

I do not know whether I should mention at this time matters pertaining to what have been described as distribution centres, but they are of interest to me. If I can refer to the post office at Brandon as a distribution centre for rural areas, I should like to point out that there has been an appropriation on the books for the past three years—this concerns the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) too—for the expansion of facilities in that city. There has been some considerable delay in carrying out the contemplated program. During the minister's delightful visit to Brandon I think he had a chance to realize the situation, and no doubt the appropriation that has been on the books for three years now will be used in the very near future to correct it.

Mr. T. J. Kickham (Kings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) on bringing in this motion providing for the setting up of a committee to consider ways and means of assisting rural and urban mail carriers. In my constituency they are practically all rural carriers.

In 1951 I brought in a resolution asking that rural mail carriers receive greater consideration from the Postmaster General. Discussions were carried on with the former postmaster general by myself and other members, and in the session of 1951 legislation was passed making provision for assistance to veterans receiving $1,000 or less. That assistance has proved to be generally quite satisfactory. The committee now being set up will have discussions on ways and means of assisting rural mail carriers now receiving $1,000 or over, and I am quite sure the revision of the legislation that is to be made will be as satisfactory as were the amendments to the Post Office Act of 1951.

As I sat and listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Hastings South (Mr. Follwell), I fully agreed with what he said about doing away with the present restrictions on the service to rural people who reside on byroads that are not now served by regular rural mail routes. I believe the minimum requirement now stands at four boxholders per mile. In many cases that is working a great hardship on people living off established mail carrier routes. The tendency in rural farming and fishing areas today, especially in farming, is toward larger holdings because the mechanization of farming has brought about the absorption of smaller farm holdings. Therefore the result is that there are fewer residents per mile. When you consider the service the Post Office Department renders to people living in urban areas, who have two and three mail deliveries a day, while on the other hand there are people in rural areas who are not being served at all, or other cases where the woman of the household has to walk two miles to a mailbox, to me it is just not fair. We need these people in the isolated areas. They are producers. I feel quite confident that when this matter comes up for discussion in the committee the Postmaster General will give these people the fullest consideration.

(Translation):

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, to conform with the very judicious advice given a few moments ago by the chairman, I felt it my duty to refrain from speaking at that time. I trust, however, that I may be permitted to say a few words on the motion to set up a committee.

Previous speakers have spoken at some length about the situation of rural mail couriers, which it is desired to readjust by a method that might be more satisfactory but that could also prove somewhat dangerous for the minister himself, in spite of the fact that he is a man of good will.

The Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) will not deny, I am sure, that, as a rule, rural mail couriers are not sufficiently paid for the work they perform. It is easy to say that they themselves set their own price. However, because they are free to quote a price according to their own judgment, things are not always as simple as that.

What usually happens is that someone in the postal district where tenders are called decides to send in his own tender. He has learned somehow or other what was the amount of the contract of the previous mail courier. Once his contract is secured, he soon realizes that the scope of his responsibilities is much more extensive than he first imagined. His plight becomes unbearable. He makes this situation known to his member who, I imagine, passes his request on to the minister with the grievances of the man concerned. During the period which preceded the nomination of the present minister, as far as I know, the minister used to answer invariably, "Very well, if the holder of the contract is not satisfied, let him drop his contract and it will be up to him to put in a new tender". That was not a solution to the problem. Let us hope that the procedure for obtaining a contract under the bill, which has just been read for the first time, brings about a practical solution to this problem.

I would like to add only a few words in connection with another aspect of this question, which I will no doubt be able to discuss since the committee we are being requested to form will no doubt be able to look into the operation of rural mail services.

I am thinking now of the extension of rural mail service to rather distant parts of some concessions. In these concessions are sometimes to be found two, three or four farmers who do not enjoy rural mail delivery and who are therefore in a very difficult position indeed.

I understand that the minister is bound by the present regulations and that he can do no more, in spite of his good intentions. Unless I am mistaken there must be at least four or five residents over a one-mile stretch before these people become entitled to rural mail delivery. The farmers, moreover, it must be remembered, do not enjoy the privilege of going to the post office on Sundays since these are now closed. Formerly they were open before or after high mass, sometimes in the afternoon and certainly in the evening, so that these people could be sure of meeting there to transact their postal business and many other things. But this is all over now. On the other hand the farmers do not have as many occasions of going down to the village as they had in former days. They generally sell their produce on their own doorstep and the things they buy are generally delivered there too. So that they must make a special trip of four, five or six miles to post a letter or get their mail, which they now receive quite frequently, for today our farmers read the daily newspapers.

For these reasons, I think that the rural mail service should be extended, that there should be a means of making a thorough survey of the situation, precisely during the proceedings of a committee such as the one we propose to establish. There should be a means of correcting this anomaly so that the farmers, even those who live in remote areas, may receive their mail if not every day at least every second day.

You will allow me here to quote a fact. A group of four farmers have established themselves on the land of their forefathers on land which had been opened up a few generations ago. Now one of these farmers sold his land and settled elsewhere for the one and only reason that he had no access to a daily postal service.

I trust that, knowing the minister's good will, it will be possible, when this matter is studied in committee, to correct this situation.

(Text):

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I think it is a matter of very great satisfaction to all members of parliament and to all parties in the house that the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) has finally acceded to the oft-repeated request made not only by members of the opposition but by other parties as well to discuss this matter in detail, particularly as it applies to the general administration of rural mail delivery and the problems of the couriers. I think this is the first time a real attempt has been made to deal with this matter, which has never been given the attention and consideration that it should have received. It involves a group of people that have served this country and the postal department very ably.

I think I express the views of members who have a knowledge of the responsibility, the work and all that is involved when a rural mail contract is signed. When we think of the thousands of people who day by day loyally carry Her Majesty's mail during winter and summer, through sunshine and storm, we realize that these people feel that above all the mail must go through. We must consider that in carrying out their duties these people handle millions of dollars worth of securities and papers. We also must associate with them, Mr. Speaker, those who serve urban municipalities in a like capacity. We find that there have been very, very few cases where mishandling or misappropriation of funds has been charged against those people. I think it is very commendable that such is the case.

An hon. Member: There are no horses in the mail bags.

Mr. Catherwood: I think it has been proved that these people have been honest and loyal in carrying out their duties.

As was mentioned by the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White), the post office does serve all the people of Canada, regardless of whether we are rich or poor, regardless of our station in life; we are all treated alike in the service we get from the rural mail couriers.

I trust that the committee will go into all aspects of the work very thoroughly, and deal not only with the service of the couriers but with the other services which can be rendered by this department.

I hope serious study will be given to the possibility of bringing in a recommendation that rural mail couriers should come under some form of civil service provision. That may not be possible, but every member of parliament who represents a rural constituency knows of individual cases where these men have been carrying the mail ten, twenty and thirty years or even more but are not in a position today to even buy a late model car with which to carry out their duties. I think it is an indication that, as we all agree, these men are not receiving sufficient remuneration. It does seem to me that for service in this field some more permanent policy should be put into effect to at least in part compensate them for their years of work. A system might be inaugurated whereby after five years of proven service a pension plan would be open to them. A general scheme might be worked out uniformly on a mileage basis with due consideration being given to conditions in the locality or municipality.

If we could eliminate the tender system that is presently in effect I think we would be taking a step which would greatly advance the situation, considering all the responsibilities and the duties which mail couriers are called upon to perform.

There are many other details which I hope and trust will be gone into very carefully by the committee which has been set up for the purpose. We realize that the problems are most perplexing and most difficult. They will not be solved too easily. This committee have a big job to do, and they will be required to undertake a full analysis of the many factors which will arise during their deliberations.

I cannot help but feel that this legislation is a step forward, and I hope it will at least partially solve the situation that should have been faced years and years ago. I trust also that it will eliminate the unfavourable factors that have been associated with the Post Office Department, in connection with political aspects which in many cases have not been conducive to what we consider good and above-board principles.

I would like to emphasize the statement made by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) when he said that every facility should be extended to these people in order that they may come and give evidence which will assist the Postmaster General and the committee. Knowing the Postmaster General as we do, I am sure he will give them a favourable reception and that after their suggestions are heard action will be taken. As a result, Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in supporting a recommendation to set up this committee.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am glad of the opportunity this resolution gives to say a few words with regard to matters concerning mail deliveries in the rural areas.

I am quite sure everyone in the house has had the same experience I have had, that when we take these matters up with the Postmaster General, particularly the present incumbent of the office, we receive pleasant, courteous and agreeable replies to our representations. They always appear to be approached in a sympathetic manner. I think it is correct to say—at any rate it is my own experience—that we are encouraged by these replies to hope that at last we have found a really sympathetic Postmaster General and that we are going to have all our requests accepted.

But unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the realization does not always measure up to the anticipation which this extremely pleasant attitude has aroused. If therefore I am somewhat critical this afternoon of affairs with respect to the rural services, I hope the Postmaster General will not take it amiss but will realize that I am sincere when I say that we appreciate his courtesy, that we are quite ready to believe that the lack of universal success in getting our requests accepted is probably not his fault, that if it were left to him alone we would get them all, but that he is not able to do all he would like to do for us.

Nevertheless, that does not alter the fact that—in my experience, at any rate, in my constituency—the service to rural areas is far from improving to the extent which I believe it should improve, particularly when viewed in relation to the improvements in service and the speed of service in the more settled districts, but has in fact followed a retrograde course.

I have before me notes and correspondence that I have been having with the Postmaster General concerning five rural mail problems in my constituency. In the first of these there has been a reduction in the service. The second one is an effort to restore a service which was taken away twenty years ago. In the third one there has been a complete elimination of a service in existence for thirty years. In the fourth one, as the result of an alteration made in the general set-up of one service, there has been the elimination of another service, this time after forty years. And in the fifth one there is the threat of the elimination of a rural service. This state of affairs is spread throughout the whole constituency; it is not just in one area. You can therefore see, Mr. Speaker, that there is cause for concern and complaint on the part of the residents of the rural districts of my constituency with respect to the mail service which they are receiving.

I want to take this opportunity of impressing upon the minister the need of the people of these particular districts for a restored or an improved service. I have in mind, first, the matter of mail service to Beaton, which lies at the head of the Arrow lakes. It is served by a ferry boat which runs three times a week between Arrowhead and Beaton. There used to be a thrice-weekly mail service. That service has been reduced in recent months from three times a week to twice a week; and that reduction, may I say, Mr. Speaker, has taken place in the face of the fact that there is a great increase in the mining activity in that area.

I have had letters from the chamber of commerce in the district and from others concerned in the mining business, and they have impressed upon me the great inconvenience that reduction causes. I passed this information and these requests on to the Post Office Department, and as I say, we have had sympathetic letters; but so far, unfortunately, although a review has been promised, we have had no results. I want therefore to take this opportunity of laying before the Postmaster General the case of this service which at the moment is being investigated by his inspector in Vancouver, and to ask him if he will give it his own personal attention and give the necessary instructions that the service be restored from twice a week to three times a week.

The next area is at a place called Chezacut. It is in the district known as the Chilcotin, one of the finest ranching areas in the province. It is an area which lies well beyond the limits of ordinary settlement. I am not going to say that it lies beyond the limits of civilization, because that would be going too far; but in so far as we have a frontier area left in our part of the country, it is a frontier area. The people living at this point are some sixty miles from the nearest post office. I am informed that up until 1933 there was a regular service between Redstone and Chezacut. That service was discontinued in 1933. The result is that there are several families, with at least 25 children—that was the information I received in 1950—

Mr. Brooks: Individual families?

Mr. Fulton: There are several families, and a total of 25 children.

Mr. Robichaud: That is better than the Frenchmen.

Mr. Fulton: It is a virile country. These families and children are without mail service. When I wrote the Postmaster General about this matter, again I received a letter which promised an immediate investigation; but unfortunately the investigation resulted in a report which informed me that the Postmaster General decided it would not be possible to restore this mail service. The reason he gave us was that on account of the mileage that it would be necessary to cover and the fact that there were not very many families in the district, the result would be—and I quote from his letter—that "we would show a considerable deficit as the cost of this service would be far in excess of the expected revenue".

I do not want to get into a discussion of general principles here—I will do that in a moment or two—but I just want to pause to suggest that when you are considering services to rural areas, it is not proper to place the matter exclusively on a financial basis and say that unless the service will show a profit or at least will not operate at a deficit, we will not give the service; because that attitude results in a situation which makes it almost impossible for families to live in those districts, particularly families with children where it is necessary sometimes to get word out in a hurry, in the case of emergencies, or where it is necessary to carry on correspondence courses for education. The people simply cannot get their children educated; they cannot bring them up with the amenities and facilities they should have, when most services are denied as a result of erroneous insistence on the necessity of showing an operating profit before inaugurating or continuing rural mail service.

The third case concerns Heffley Creek rural route No. 2, which is another case in which the service has been discontinued. This service was in existence continuously for some thirty years until it was cut off this summer. By constituents there, I am advised that the service was "cut off abruptly this month"—that is the month of July—"with just a note in the mailbox stating it was to be the last delivery". My correspondent goes on to say that he has four children who depend on the mail delivery for their correspondence lessons. Well, I took this matter up with the Postmaster General, and as a result of these inquiries I received a rather unusual letter from him in which he gave as the main reason for the discontinuance of the route the fact that the road conditions were poor, on account of which the courier had asked for an increase in the amount of his contract. He previously operated it for $364 per annum, $7 per trip. When the contract expired a renewal was offered, but he refused it and submitted another tender at the rate of $600 per annum, which he subsequently agreed to reduce to $550, and the department felt that that was too high. They went on to say that one of the reasons given for the rate, according to the tenderer, was the deplorable condition of the road which the tenderer said resulted in large bills for the repair and maintenance of his car.

The Postmaster General went on to say that the residents who wanted the route continued should improve their road if they really wanted a rural route. The Postmaster General does not appear to appreciate the conditions. What he is doing is to require the people, who live there as individuals, to maintain some thirty miles of road, which is of course entirely a provincial responsibility.

In British Columbia there is no longer the system of the old days—and it had its advantages—whereby the farmers living in the country areas had the opportunity of working out their taxes by doing a certain amount of road work. That system has not been followed for some time by our provincial administration, and there is no way in which the farmers, who are busy enough as it is at any rate, can keep up the road.

This seems to me to be another case in which the department just does not recognize the difficulties under which the inhabitants of those rural areas are living. The fact that the road conditions are poor and the conditions of life are strenuous is, I submit, an additional reason why every effort should be made by all governmental authorities to do what they can to bring to the people the amenities which will make their life a little less hard, and generally make conditions under which they live a little more pleasant. Certainly the regular receipt of mail is one of the things to which people in rural areas most look forward. Here we have a condition where instead of their circumstances being improved, and everything possible to improve them being done, they are compelled to accept a worse state of affairs as the years go by, and the service which they enjoyed for thirty years has now been discontinued.

The fourth case concerns the mail service in the Ashcroft-Clinton area, the gateway to the Cariboo ranching country. Here a mail service which was in operation for forty years has been discontinued. This state of affairs came about as the result of a change in the mail service on the Cariboo highway. We had been pressing for a matter of some five years for a daily service to the main post offices on the Cariboo highway, from Ashcroft north. On September 15 last, after these lengthy negotiations, the department suddenly announced its decision to implement this service. I might say that they announced it by means of informing the residents in the Clinton area that they would no longer be receiving their thrice weekly service which they had received by a rural courier. That was the first indication that they or I or anyone else had that the decision had been arrived at to institute this daily service, by bus from Ashcroft, to the main post offices on the Cariboo highway.

The reason given for the discontinuance of this rural service is that the department will not maintain two parallel services, one a rural service to the boxes along the highway, while at the same time there is what you might call a main line service from Ashcroft, dropping off mails to the main post offices along the same route.

Well, it may be difficult to argue against that, at least in theory, but there are two observations I should like to make. The first is that I do not think it was proper that this decision should be made and implemented without any warning to anyone concerned that the result of the change—that is the institution of the daily service by bus to the main post offices—would be the discontinuance of another service. That fact had simply not been discussed. Secondly, it means that all the other rural points dependent on service from Clinton as their central post office have had their mail service changed as well, because the decision to institute the daily main post office service covers only first-class letter mail. Previously, in the area from Ashcroft to Clinton, there was the three times a week service, and in other cases once a week rural service, which carried all classes of mail, parcels as well as letters. That has been discontinued, and parcels have to go by train, with long delays, and letters only are carried by the daily service to Clinton. One of the rural services has been discontinued as a result, and with respect to the other services they receive only letters; they have to wait a very much longer time before they get their parcels.

A petition has been submitted to the Postmaster General asking that this matter be taken care of by providing that the daily service to the main post offices, which would include Clinton, should carry all classes of mail, and that a separate rural service be instituted covering the points between Ashcroft and Clinton formerly served three times a week. Whatever the method adopted, Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that the result of the change has been that a service to a rural area which contains a very large number of people, which had been in existence for forty years with reasonable satisfaction, has suddenly been discontinued.

I sent a petition to the minister covering one portion of this area, asking for the reinstitution of the rural route. I have received the usual courteous answer, but so far have had no action. Sometimes it seems to me that it takes the minister's department a very long time to get their reports, because it is well over six weeks since the matter was referred to him. A report was promised, but I have had no further word.

The final case I want to bring to the minister's attention concerns rural route No. 1 at Pritchard. Here again is a case of a route which has been in existence for many years, now threatened with discontinuance because the contractor finds it impossible to continue operating at the present rate. I must say that the residents of that route appreciate the fact that a temporary authorization was granted for the continuance of the route at a higher rate, but that arrangement is not permanent. It is merely continued at the Postmaster General's pleasure, and might be cancelled at any time. What we want there is authority for the contract at a rate which will enable a tenderer living in the area to operate without loss. Just because the costs of operation have increased—the population has not gone down; in fact it has increased somewhat—is, I submit, no justification for discontinuing a service which is essential to those who live there. A contract must be awarded at a rate which will enable the carrier to operate with safety and certainty.

Mr. Speaker, these are five problems which concern the residents of rural areas in my constituency, so far as their mail service is concerned. I submit that each one of these could be satisfactorily settled by the application of the general principle which I maintain should apply, namely that those living in the rural areas of Canada are now entitled to priority in the matter of their mail service.

After all, the cities and urban areas in Canada would not exist if it were not for the rural areas lying behind them. If it were not for the produce of the farms, the forests and the mines of Canada we would not have any cities, because there would be no justification or occasion for them. Yet rural areas in most cases have inadequate service and exist under conditions of great hardship. Now they are beginning to find their conditions made even worse because, at least in those cases I have outlined, they have been deprived even of those meagre mail services they formerly had.

Keep in mind that city life has all the amenities. People in the cities do not have to expose themselves to an equal extent to the rigours of winter. They have all conveniences right at their doorstep. They have the advantage of mail delivery and parcel post, regular deliveries from the shops, and the like. They do not have to drive through snowdrifts on rough country roads to obtain the very necessities of life. Yet these cities, already enjoying an adequate mail delivery service, suddenly found themselves, a year or two ago, in receipt of the de luxe all-up air mail service, a service provided only at the expense of the whole country which of course includes the rural areas. I have not been able this afternoon to find the figure among my papers, but I recall that I did receive from the Postmaster General figures showing the increase in cost to the Post Office Department as the result of this all-up air mail service.

I am not suggesting that this service should be eliminated. But I do suggest that if it is to be given at the general expense of the country, including the taxpayers in rural areas; if our cities are to be given this super de luxe service when already they were enjoying a quite adequate service, then surely the rural areas should be provided with an adequate service instead of the meagre and, in some cases, totally inadequate service from which they have been suffering for so many years.

This argument of course has double application to cases such as I have outlined this afternoon, where an already meagre service is either going to be discontinued, or made more inadequate through having the deliveries reduced from three to two each week.

I repeat that if the cities of Canada can be given this super service at the general expense of the taxpayers, including those in the rural areas, upon whom the cities depend, then it is time—more than time—that adequate service be provided for those who live in the rural areas, without whose willingness to endure hardships and to go to the country and produce the things we all require there could be no existence for those of us who live in the cities.

I am sure if this problem were put to any individual living in a city he would say, "Surely; I agree with you. Let us give the farmers, the ranchers, those working in the mines and the forests an adequate service." Let us cut out this penny-pinching which results in destroying in some cases even the amenities of mail service they already had, and let us get on with improving rural service generally.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, I have only one problem to mention in connection with rural mail delivery. Perhaps we might call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw to the attention of the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) and the committee which is to be set up under this motion a condition under which the rural patrons of the post office do not receive the same consideration as city patrons. This motion is to set up a committee to investigate the regulations and the general administration and operation of rural mail delivery services, and I feel that this is a proper place to call the attention of the Postmaster General to the anomaly which I will now describe.

When first-class mail is posted in a post office it is delivered for three cents when it can be handled through that post office. But in the case of a rural post office, where there are no walks by letter carriers, a letter to be called for at that particular office or delivered by a rural mail courier must have a four-cent stamp placed upon it. I feel that that is a discrimination against the rural patrons of the Post Office Department. The principle is that if a letter passes through one office only it is delivered for three cents irrespective of the method of delivery. In the cities it is delivered by letter carriers performing their usual walks; in the country districts it is delivered by rural mail carriers using a car or a horse and buggy in order to deliver mail to the patrons of that particular post office.

This works a particular hardship upon that large class of patrons who live in what was described by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) as suburbia, that borderland between rural and urban communities. Let me give an example of a condition which exists throughout the dominion, and I use the city of Victoria, British Columbia, as my example.

A letter posted in the post office there to be delivered to 2000 Quadra street will be delivered by a letter carrier on his walk for three cents. But if it is addressed to 2100 Quadra street it will be delivered by a rural mail carrier and must bear a four-cent stamp. The line which is taken as the limit of three-cent postage does not conform at all to the city boundary, it is an arbitrary line which was drawn a number of years ago by the Post Office Department. It was suitable in those days, but the environs of the city of Victoria have built up tremendously, and unless one had a map with that particular line drawn upon it he would not know when he passed from the three-cent to the four-cent area.

One of the main difficulties is that a business or professional man living just over the border must pay additional postage due every time he receives any mail with a three-cent stamp upon it. Many of the city streets run through this imaginary line. A correspondent addressing a letter might consult the city or telephone directory to find an address; and if the address was 2000 Quadra street his letter would be delivered for three cents. But another person looking up another address and finding it to be 2100 Quadra street would make it necessary for the professional or businessman who might be living at that number to pay extra postage due if only three cents were placed upon the letter.

I am using this just as an illustration. I am not suggesting for one moment that 2100 is actually the number of a house on that particular street. This is the condition that exists in Victoria, and I think a similar condition exists in every rural post office throughout the land. If you deliver a letter at a rural post office, unless it is to be called for at the post office it can be delivered only by a rural mail carrier. Although it goes through only the one office it must have a four-cent stamp on it. Surely the principle is that if a letter is posted in one office to be delivered to a person through that office it should require only three cents. If it is to go through two offices, naturally there should be a four-cent stamp upon it.

Surely the matter of delivery is not of prime concern. If it is possible to deliver a letter for three cents through one city post office to addresses in that city, that letter being delivered by hand at the door to the person to whom it is addressed, surely the same privilege should be granted to the rural patrons of the post office. When they receive a letter which only goes through one office it should be possible to carry it to them for three cents, no matter what the method of delivery is.

I would therefore ask the Postmaster General to give this matter his consideration, because there is an anomaly there. There is great difficulty with the borderline cases where the Post Office Department has drawn an arbitrary line between letter carrier delivery and rural courier delivery. A person writing a letter cannot tell where that line is, and it is a hardship on the residents of the kind of area which was described as suburbia today by the hon. member for Peel.

These people are very definitely handicapped because they have to pay the amount of the postage due stamps, and in the case of business and professional men it sometimes amounts to quite a large sum. I cannot help feeling that it is only fair that rural patrons who receive their mail through one office should not be required to pay more for the delivery of their mail through that one office than a city resident has to pay for the delivery of his mail through one office. I hope the Postmaster General will give the matter very careful consideration.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief. I want to speak on behalf of the rural carriers in my riding. I am not worried, as was the previous speaker, about whether my pre-election speeches will be delivered at any particular rate. It is rather amazing to me that a member coming from a district adjacent to Victoria would want anything delivered except an obituary notice, which would be customary in the city of Victoria.

I do want to say that I think the system is wrong under which rural carriers are operating at the present time. I do not know what the solution is, but I believe a committee of the house might consider the matter and arrive at some decision satisfactory both to the public and to the carriers. Unlike my friend from Nanaimo, I am not worrying about whether it costs three or four cents to send my speeches to my constituents because I would prefer, as I think he should, that they do not get there.

I think the present system is not good for the public or the carriers. I know that in my own riding people have bid for carrier routes at rates at which they could not carry out their contracts profitably. I think they bid on them knowing that they could not be carried out at the rates at which they tendered. What the solution is I frankly admit I do not know; and I am perfectly sure that the hon. member for Nanaimo, with all his vast carrier experience, both pigeon and otherwise, does not know the solution. However, I believe the matter could be referred to a committee.

I want to say that I think the present system on the contract basis is entirely wrong, and that a committee should be set up to study it.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take very much of the time of the house because this subject has been thoroughly discussed. Neither do I wish to embarrass the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote), but may I say that I agree with the many kind things that were said about him this afternoon. I am sure that his genial manner and pleasant smile are going to help him a lot in his portfolio. I also feel he is not likely to fall into some of the errors that his predecessor committed.

I am pleased that a committee is to be set up. Such action has been recommended before in the house, and I think a committee can do a lot of good. People from all parts of Canada will come before the committee to express their views on this most difficult problem, and I know that good results will attend the work of the committee.

There are many problems, and having listened to the members who spoke this afternoon one realizes that the problems are the same in practically every constituency, particularly the rural ones. My own constituency is about 80 per cent rural, and I think it has as many rural mail routes as any other constituency in Canada. The great problem in the past has been the difficulty of the courier in obtaining suitable compensation for the work he was doing. I think this situation has been brought about by the keen competition for these jobs. Why there should be such keen competition is hard for me to understand because, as has been pointed out here, it is a very difficult and important job, and the mail couriers certainly have to cope with the weather and many other difficulties.

I agree with what was said this afternoon by a number of members from rural constituencies about people in the rural districts not receiving the same treatment as those in the cities. To my mind there is no reason in the world why a city district should have two daily mail deliveries whereas in some country districts they only have three mail deliveries a week. I think that is most unfair, and as long as that situation prevails there is going to be a great deal of dissatisfaction throughout the country. I also believe that, while the present system of obtaining mail couriers is obsolete and unsatisfactory, we must be very careful not to institute a system which will be on a patronage basis. I think such action would lead to much difficulty and abuse. When the committee meets I am sure it will give this matter very serious consideration.

I should also like to point out to the minister with respect to rural mail delivery that I believe one of the reasons a good many people are leaving the country districts today, especially the back country areas, is the fact that they are not receiving sufficient mail service. People in the cities have their radios and now their television sets, and they have two daily mail deliveries; but people in the back areas are only getting mail two or three times a week. They cannot have their daily papers and this all works great hardship on them.

I am not going to worry the house this evening with the many problems I have in my own constituency. There will be opportunity to do that later. I have already brought many of them to the attention of the department and some have been corrected, while others have not. I would like, however, to read to the house a typical letter which I received some time ago which illustrates, I think, the problem there is in the country. This has to do with . . . . rural route No. 2. The writer says:

> We have had no mail driver on this route for the past four months. Our mail driver gave up the route because it did not pay him. I understand that a tender went in, approved by the local executive, but that Ottawa would not contract. I presume that the authorities figure it on a mileage basis but it is more than that.
> The driver leaves at ten a.m. in order to have the mail at ..... by eleven o'clock. Then he has to wait for two trains and the sorting of the mail, getting home about five p.m. Thus, it takes his whole day for a thirty-mile trip.

That is an indication, Mr. Speaker—and there are many—why you cannot stick to any hard and fast rule as far as mileage is concerned. This man spends his whole day and he should be entitled, as I am sure the minister will agree, to a full day's pay. The result in that district was that they could not get a man to drive the mail on the basis that is now in effect. The writer goes on to say:

> I believe we have a right to the same service that we are helping to pay for in the rest of Canada and ask that you advise us at your earliest convenience what we are to expect for we have been slighted too long.

That is just an indication of the feeling of many people in many sections, not only of my own province but I am sure all across Canada.

As I said at the outset I am certainly well pleased that the minister is setting up this committee, and I believe these many problems will need to be carefully considered. I also feel certain that some solution can be found.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of points that I would like to bring to the attention of the minister with respect to our particular part of Canada. One of them has to do with air service. I think you should use aircraft more than you do now in servicing these rural routes. An aircraft based at the international airport in Vancouver, running due north through the Cariboo, I am prepared to say, could on a daily run carry all the mail more cheaply than it is being carried today, shuffling it over the railways, back to Edmonton, up and down the P.G.E., the C.P.R., the C.N.R and the other railways, carrying mail clerks and adding unnecessarily to the cost of getting mail over the rural routes. I hope you will study that suggestion and either make contracts or put on your own mail plane from the international airport at Vancouver to say Whitehorse and back, on a daily schedule, so the mail may be delivered promptly and smartly from the central office to those industrial districts along that route.

I think the minister might well consider establishing a base rate for all road transportation of mail. The public utilities commission in British Columbia will establish the cost of hauling goods from one point to another, at so many cents per ton mile. For motor transportation it could be accurately established and it might very well be considered, when calling for tenders, whether the department could say that the base rate would be so many cents per ton mile. From there on it would be a matter of efficiency and people could compete in any way they liked, but we should not send the mail at less than the actual cost to the man doing the work.

Up in our district it is difficult to get couriers to carry the mail from the central office out into the country. They are throwing up their contracts because they do not want to work for nothing. After all, the cost of gasoline, tires and so on is standardized. Everybody knows what they cost. Even hourly labour rates are well standardized. The department could say that in a certain area the base price would be so much. If the work could be done for that, all right; if not, more would have to be paid.

As I say, a good many of those people delivering mail in my area are doing so just out of a sense of duty and service. They are losing money on every load they carry. In that connection I would say that the British Yukon Navigation Company is carrying mail on the Alaska highway from railhead to points in the Yukon at very much less than the actual outlay they are forced to make in order to carry that mail. They are doing that as a service to people along the way.

The government of Canada should not depend upon charity. We should pay these men a fair sum for the work done, and it can be reckoned very easily these days when costs are so well known.

I want to commend the department for the good work which they are doing. I think the minister is following in the footsteps of that great Liberal, Sir William Mulock, who introduced penny postage and who was such an ornament in this house and such a figure in world history when he occupied the position which is now so honourably occupied by the minister.

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, a good many members have entered this debate, and it has now become a wide open debate on postal matters. I suppose we can deal with pretty nearly any part of the Postmaster General's department which may have come to our attention.

The resolution to set up a committee to deal with postal courier matters and other things in connection with the postal department is one for which we on this side of the house have agitated for a number of years. Now we have the support of both sides of the house, and we have the assurance of the Postmaster General that he is in favour of this committee which, particularly, will study rural mail couriers to see that those men, who are great servants of Canada, get what is fair and just treatment.

We all know what the mail couriers have gone through in the years of service which some of them have given. We all know how niggardly they have been treated with regard to salary, but they have not been niggardly in the time they worked, in order to make even their small salaries. We know that no other class of servants of the government has given such service as have these mail couriers who are now being given consideration by this house. We hope to see that they receive something in the way of salary which will be adequate remuneration for the good work they are doing.

When speaking about postal matters, the first thing that comes to my mind regarding my own constituency is the post office building that has been promised to us for over ten years. It is dangling again because of the fact that an election is not far away.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I presume the hon. member is only making a passing reference to post office buildings.

Mr. Knowles: That is all the government is doing about them too.

Mr. McLure: I just thought that possibly it would be well, Mr. Speaker, to remind the house that I had not forgotten the promises that have been made for ten years or more. That is all I shall say about this dangling of the new post office building.

There are several things I want to speak about tonight and bring to the attention of the new Postmaster General. One is the manner in which we have been treated as a postal area in connection with mail couriers. As a postal area, the province of Prince Edward Island has not had the attention it should have had. For instance, we do not have a divisional controller, nor do we have a postal zone like Nova Scotia or New Brunswick. Instead of having a postal area and a post office division of our own, we are hitched on to the province of New Brunswick. We have the same set-up, nevertheless we have no control, as it were, of our wants.

At the post office at Charlottetown we have some of the best postmasters and inspectors, and the whole staff are excellent as I know the Postmaster General will find out if he has not already done so. We have an excellent staff there. Yet if some rural post offices want some little item in order to complete their rural post office work, they come in and, instead of being able to get it right there in Charlottetown, they have no say in the matter. The first thing they say is: We have to find out from Saint John, New Brunswick. They write or telephone to Saint John and the Saint John man says: No; there is the controller at Moncton to whom I have to go. So they go again from Charlottetown to Saint John, then from Saint John to Moncton, and then the Moncton controller has got to go back to Ottawa. Probably by that time they have forgotten all about what they needed, and nothing more is heard about it until another person comes in.

Mrs. Fairclough: The usual runaround.

Mr. McLure: I mention this matter because we, as a province, should have the same treatment as the other provinces receive. We should have control of our own postal affairs. We have been neglected in this matter. It seems to me that the Liberal party, knowingly or otherwise, like to take these things away from our province, if they can possibly do so, in order to make it smaller.

I want to call to the attention of the Postmaster General the fact that his predecessor went one better than that when he was advertising postal matters all across Canada and in the United States. What did he do but get out a map of Canada and leave Prince Edward Island off the map altogether. All hon. members will remember that incident. It cost a great deal of money to rectify that error, because the contracts had been made and the government had to cancel the contracts and pay for them without getting the advertising.

I now want to deal for a few minutes with another little matter that I desire to bring to the attention of the Postmaster General, namely the stamp vendor's position in the post office at Prince Edward Island. There is a stamp vendor there who has been employed by the government for a number of years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is under a misapprehension.

At the opening of his remarks he was quite right when he said that he could discuss postal matters in a general way. But I want to restrict him by adding "only inasmuch as they refer to rural service". I should therefore like him to confine his remarks to that aspect of postal matters.

Mr. McLure: I was under the impression, Mr. Speaker, that earlier today when the first resolution was before the house for consideration a limit was set, and that those who kept within those bounds were all right at that time. I understood from Mr. Speaker that when the second resolution came up for consideration the sky was the limit as long as the discussion was on postal matters. However, I am quite agreeable to leaving this matter open.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I should clarify what I said this afternoon. If the hon. member reads the resolution which is now before the house he will find that the first two lines are as follows:

That a special committee be appointed to consider the bill, an act to amend the Post Office Act—

The resolution which we studied this afternoon was one preceding the introduction of this particular amending bill; I therefore suggested that those who wanted to say anything about the amending bill could perhaps say it on this resolution which is also to be sent to the committee for study.

Mr. McLure: I would take it, Mr. Speaker, that we are to confine ourselves more to the rural mail couriers, and that we can elaborate possibly a little bit more on that matter. However, I think at some stage during this debate there should be a time when we would be able to bring forward certain matters that are worrying us, more or less, with regard to the postal department.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): That can be done on the estimates.

Mr. McLure: I hope we shall not have to wait until the close of the session to bring these things to the attention of the house.

A few moments ago I was speaking about the mail couriers and saying what a wonderful class of citizens they are. I am dealing more particularly with the constituency of Queens. In that constituency the great trouble we have always had with reference to mail couriers' contracts has been the great discrepancy between the various mail routes. No matter how much alike they were, in the granting of contracts these differences came into the picture. As an illustration, let us consider contracts for routes covering only eight miles. They were only small contracts, yet in those contracts there was a difference of as much as $120 a year. That was on an eight-mile contract. Then we come along to the nine and ten-mile contracts. Here the discrepancy goes up according to the people who have the job of driving the mail. The discrepancy goes up to $210 on a distance of ten miles, with the lowest-paid courier serving 50 per cent more boxes than were served by any two of the others put together. Yet he is paid $210 a year less.

I want the Postmaster General to remember some of these things when this committee is set up; and I want him to see that the committee endeavours to get as fair a remuneration as it is possible to get for each mail route. Now we come to the twelve and thirteen-mile contracts. Under this system that we have there is a difference of $250 on a considerable number of contracts. Surely there should not be that much difference. On a fourteen-mile route we have a difference of $320 per annum on a small contract of $900.

These discriminations between the different contracts and contractors run as high as $650. These contractors give practically the same service. Some of them work on highways on which they can use automobiles possibly ten months in a year. I hope the committee will take that into consideration. Some of the contractors I have mentioned must have not only a small truck to deliver mail in the summer time, but in the spring they must have a horse and buggy, or a horse and wagon, and in the winter time they must have a horse and cutter. Therefore they all have a certain amount of expense. When the expenses of most of the couriers are calculated, together with the cost of everything they have to buy, such as feed for the horse, horseshoeing, harness repairs of different kinds, as well as the expense of an automobile, and so forth, very few of them make a decent daily wage.

Why are we limited in what we may say in regard to these contractors when we are discussing this new legislation that has been sought and is to be introduced, that will put into the hands of the Postmaster General the right to bargain with the mail couriers on all contracts under a thousand dollars, and some over that amount as well? This is giving too much power to one man. No matter how good a man he may be, power is being put into his hands to enable him to work in the interests of the party to which he belongs. He cannot help but take into account the interests of his own people when it comes to making mail contracts.

I am not going to labour this question any longer. There are many things I should like to say but I will abide by your decision, Mr. Speaker. I hope that later on the Speaker will permit me to say what I have to say to the Postmaster General. I now want to give him a word of advice. We had a Postmaster General not so long ago who on several occasions promised us that a committee would be set up, but it was never done. We now have an hon. gentleman who in his first speech to this house as Postmaster General told us that he was going to have it set up. He is therefore in right with all the people across this country who favour working in the interests of the mail couriers.

I have one further word to say to him. I should like to see him cut clear entirely from politics because my memory of his predecessor amuses me, especially in connection with his political career. He has been promoted to something higher, and we have to leave him in peace. I hope our present Postmaster General does not follow in the footsteps of his predecessor.

(Translation):

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to prolong the debate, but as I am not on the committee—and I am not blaming anyone for that—I would like to make a few suggestions now.

First, when the time comes to award contracts, we often receive representations, especially when the said contracts concern two adjacent territories, because there is a discrepancy of $200 or $300. It sometimes happens that people put in such or such a bid because the roads are bad during the winter. Quite often, also, the rural mail courier has to beat his own way in the morning after a storm; that is not very interesting. That man must have a better horse or better equipment. That is why the amount of his tender is a little higher.

Secondly, sometimes there is a request for a box at the end of a road and the minister replies that the distance is too great between the last box on the route and the one asked for. Therefore, I would ask that the distance prescribed be increased because the man who happens to live too far from the last box to be able to get one himself seems to be somewhat neglected, and although he might have the best disposition in the world, he feels inclined to criticize the department; however we do not want this to happen because the department does its best to please everybody.

Thirdly, when there is a request for sorting frames used in preparing the mail to be delivered the next day, it seems only fair to me that those sorting frames be sent to the post office as soon as possible, so as to make things easier for the couriers and enable them to do a good job.

Fourthly, we would ask the public—and we have the right to do so—to co-operate with the rural couriers so that, in winter, when the snow piles up, the latter are not obliged to shovel a path to the owner's mail box. As often happens, even if the courier asks the owner to clear his walk, the owner does not bother to do so. We would like the department to ask the general public to make the work of the rural mail courier somewhat easier since the latter is deserving of much attention and much praise for the way in which he goes about his business.

Now, again, there is the matter of one mail route in one parish encroaching upon another parish. For instance, there are people in Les Ecureuils who have to have their mail addressed to Neuville since they are served by the Neuville courier, whose circuit extends to the parish of Les Ecureuils. It seems to me there should be a way of preventing the rural mail route of a parish from extending into the neighbouring parish, and even more so when a route passes from one constituency to another.

These are the only remarks I wished to make, Mr. Speaker. I hope that I have not taken too much of the time of the house and that the minister will forgive me for having detained him for a few minutes.

(Text):

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, there are three things I want to say. I have found that the salaries paid to those who work in rural post offices are very low, amounting to $13 and $15 a month. We know that an expert woodcutter, cutting wood in the bush, can earn more in a day than would run those post offices for a month. We do not think they get enough.

The second thing I notice is that this is legislation to amend the Post Office Act so that we shall have deliveries twice a day. I will not push that very far, but we need that in the cities and the Postmaster General knows it.

As I mentioned this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I think this way of choosing civil servants by contract has become obsolete. Why cannot these men or women be chosen in the same way as other civil servants are chosen? They have responsible jobs. Why can they not be chosen by examination? I hope this suggestion will be considered.

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take much time in the discussion of this motion. I find myself deeply interested in it, and it is one with which I can say I agree.

I could spend some time in bringing to the attention of the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) problems of my own constituency, just as other members might do. Thus far my contact with the Postmaster General has been most pleasant indeed. I am sure no one could have extended greater courtesy to me. I have not bothered him much because not long ago he told me legislation would be brought down which he hoped would meet many of the problems not only in my constituency but across Canada as a whole.

I believe this motion to set up the committee is a move in the right direction, provided the members of the committee really get down to business and make an effort to find a method for the proper appointment and payment of rural mail couriers. This is not going to be an easy matter, because I suppose that conditions vary throughout the country. Different conditions will be found in different constituencies. Perhaps it will not simply be a matter of setting down a basic rate per mile.

In my own constituency, for instance, in the summer the rural mail courier can carry out his task without any great difficulty. But in the winter time he faces an entirely different situation, and it is not unreasonable that, to be properly compensated, on his thirty-mile route he should receive more money than would another rural mail courier with a route of fifty or sixty miles. The man in my vicinity may have to plow his own road a good part of the time in the winter months. When the snow is blowing he is not going to have good roads. On the other hand, on other routes the roads would be plowed and there would be no difficulty of this kind.

All these points must be considered. As the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) said this afternoon, I hope the committee will consider the requests of rural mail couriers from outlying districts. Not only should they appear from the Ottawa area; they should come from both the east and the west, so we may find out some of their difficulties. These will not be easily solved. It is my view, however, that in setting up a committee we are going about it in the right way.

If I understood the Postmaster General correctly, the bill introduced this afternoon will not become law until after the committee has made its recommendations. If it were to go through in its present form I am afraid it would prove to be only a temporary solution. While I am very much in favour of an upward adjustment of the fees or remuneration of rural mail couriers, I feel there must be safeguards. These will have to be considered by the committee and dealt with in its recommendations. Not only must there be safeguards for the couriers; there must be safeguards for the public as well. At the moment I have on my desk a petition in this connection. I have in mind a case where the regular mail delivery is on Wednesday but, because of a storm, the roads are impassable. Then Thursday is a holiday. Friday is another stormy day, with the result that the people in that area have received only one mail delivery that week instead of three. This is not uncommon.

In some areas the delivery is daily. Yet there are other areas just as thickly populated, and entitled to just as good delivery, where they have only three deliveries in a week. The committee will have to get to the bottom of these conditions. As was suggested by the hon. member for Peel, it would be preferable to have a percentage of the witnesses come to Ottawa. They could be chosen from various areas across the country, and permitted to tell their story to the committee.

I could make some comments about discrimination, and many other subjects. However, after having listened to other hon. members who have spoken in the debate I think there is no need to repeat what they have said. I can state, briefly, that I am very much in favour of setting up the committee, and I express the hope that it will go into the situation thoroughly. I am of the opinion that the Postmaster General is looking for a solution. Having talked with him I am satisfied that he is sincere in this matter, and that he wishes to bring down legislation which will remedy the conditions from which the rural mail couriers are suffering. It is imperative that they be treated fairly in the matter of the compensation to which they are entitled.

I believe that is all I wish to say, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. G. T. Fulford (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to delay the proceedings of the house for more than two or three minutes, because I feel that everything that could be said on this subject was said this afternoon. The debate will have shown the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) the arduous task ahead of the committee in separating the wheat from the chaff.

Excellent ideas have been put forth in the debate. I think all hon. members representing rural constituencies owe a debt of gratitude to the minister for setting up the committee. I do not think there is one of us who is not worried over the inequalities of the present system. Each of us has in the back of his mind some solution to overcome those inequalities; indeed, we have heard them discussed today.

I trust the present system will be superseded by one that will give the rural mail couriers a fair return on their investment, a fair return on the amount they put into their cars and equipment, or the sleighs they may have to use in the winter months. I trust some formula can be devised, based upon the length of the route, the number of boxes along the route, the condition of the roads and the like. When a man seeks a contract or is given the duty of delivering the mails he will then be assured of at least an honest and fair return on the amount he must lay out for equipment and for the time he must spend at his work.

Urban mail carriers are required to pass a civil service examination. As far as the appointment of rural mail couriers is concerned, I think we should do away with the objectionable patronage that enters into these appointments and have civil service examinations set for these people, bearing in mind always that they should receive an adequate return on their investment and for the time required to carry out their duties.

(Translation):

Mr. A. M. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, on the subject of this resolution, to which I give my entire support, I wish to point out to the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote), inasmuch as this resolution, which relates to the functioning of the rural mail delivery, applies to my riding, first a deficiency in the rural mail delivery in the constituency of Gloucester and, secondly, a gross anomaly in the present system.

I said a deficiency. According to the figures in the last report, or the directory published last December by the Post Office Department, 9,721 family heads are served in my constituency by your department. Of this number, 782 family heads get postal service through rural mail delivery. We have only 7 rural routes in the vast county of Gloucester which is unquestionably the largest rural constituency in the whole province of New Brunswick.

As I say, we have only 7 rural routes and only 7 per cent of our postal population, if I may use such an expression, is served by rural mail delivery. That is, in my opinion, a deficiency, and that is why I do urge the hon. minister to pay special attention to Gloucester county whenever representations are made to him for the establishment of new rural routes or new rural mail delivery systems. Frankly we have been rather sadly neglected up to now, as can readily be ascertained by the department's own figures.

I therefore wish to call the minister's attention to the case of the Canobie district, to which I have already referred in a letter which I wrote him on November 24 last. I would call the minister's attention to the fact that in the Canobie area there is, at present, one district that enjoys rural mail delivery. Now in this district there is one place called Springfield whose people have no service at all. There are no boxes in that district. There are 5 farmers, 5 families without any postal service at all. Moreover, there are in that same district 13 new settlement lots; this means that in the very near future there will be 18 farmers in the district of Springfield which, up to now, has had no postal service.

[Mr. Fulford.]

The same situation prevails in the western section of the Canobie district, known under the name of Doucetville. There is not a box at Doucetville. There are nonetheless between 10 and 12 good farmers without any postal service. The people from both Springfield and Doucetville must walk a distance of nearly a mile to get their mail in the boxes of neighbours who are charitable enough to allow the mail of these people who have no postal service to be deposited in their boxes.

In reply to my letter, the minister stated that my requests would receive serious consideration, but to date no decision has been made. I believe it is about time we had a formal decision from the department, so that we may know whether something can or cannot be done for those people who, I repeat, are without any service.

May I also bring to the minister's attention the very special case of two islands, Shippigan and Miscou islands, situated in the northwest part of my constituency. The situation there is quite unusual and, during certain periods of the year, especially in the spring and in the fall, mail services are completely inadequate. For those reasons I beg the minister to give special consideration to the matter when a request complying with the requirements set forth in the postal regulations is made to his department for the establishment of a rural mail service on Shippigan and Miscou islands.

There is another special case to which I want to draw the minister's attention; it is the case of the present post offices at Sormany, Nicholas Denys and Madran. These three post offices are located in a district which at present draws considerable attention from all those who are interested in the stock market across Canada, because they are located in the district where gigantic mining developments have taken place recently in the northern part of New Brunswick. I believe that in the near future requests will be made for the establishment of a rural mail delivery service in this new mining district and I do hope that the matter will be given special attention when that request is made.

There are other concrete cases which I would like to bring to the department's attention. I shall mention but one. It is the case of the new settlements of Allardville, D'Aulnay and St. Sauveur, where, as yet, no rural mail delivery service has been established; before long, a request will be submitted to the department to that effect.

I said there existed an anomaly in our district, and here it is. When I began these remarks I pointed out that, all told, 9,721 heads of families, according to the department's own figures, enjoyed postal service. Now 1,879 of these are English-speaking and 7,842 are French-speaking. That is to say that, taking the population of my constituency as a whole, 19·2 per cent are English-speaking and 80·8 per cent are French-speaking. Nevertheless rural mail delivery, which serves 782 heads of families, can be broken down thus: 443 English-speaking heads of families have it at present as against 339 that are French-speaking. That is to say that the current rural mail delivery system in the county of Gloucester serves English-speaking heads of families in the proportion of 56·6 per cent, whereas our French-speaking heads of families are served in the proportion of 43·4 per cent only.

Compare, Mr. Minister, this proportion or rather this disproportion with the figures I gave you a moment ago concerning the heads of families who are served by the postal services, and you will have there what I had reason to call, at the beginning of my remarks, an anomaly. I would therefore suggest that the department rectify, as soon as possible, this situation, which is quite abnormal, in the rural postal service of this great Acadian constituency of Gloucester in the province of New Brunswick.

(Text):

Mr. L. Philippe Picard (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to suggest to the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote), and any other members of the house who may want to be enlightened on the question of rural mail services, that they should consult Hansard of February 20, 1947. They will find there the remarks I made on that occasion, which I believe are as apt and to the point today as they were then. If the Postmaster General has actually read them I think he will agree with me. I see no purpose therefore in repeating or enlarging upon them, and if more hon. members would follow the same practice with respect to many other subjects I am sure our debates would be shortened.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word on this subject because I represent the largest constituency in area in the southern part of Ontario. It is sparsely settled in many districts, and I think there are at least as many rural mail routes as in any other constituency in the province. I have many grievances that I could air, but I do not like to thresh old straw. I do not think that does any good. I have said before that I think the hiring of mail couriers should be done by the civil service commission, but there would be no use of my making that suggestion now or bringing forward a resolution to that effect because with the large number of Liberal members in the house I would not get very far with it.

The government has indicated the way it wants to handle this matter; and be that as it may, it cannot help but be an improvement over the old system. I realize that it gives the minister much more power than previously and much more opportunity for patronage, but even at that the situation cannot be any worse in the future than it has been in the past so far as my riding is concerned. I think the minister knows something about it. Most of it took place before his term of office began. So far as patronage is concerned, I cannot find very much fault since he took over the portfolio. I was pleased when I heard the minister say that there was not going to be any favouritism or patronage as a result of the proposed legislation, and that so far as the rural mail carriers were concerned everything was going to be done as fairly and equitably as possible and for the benefit of Canada as a whole.

It is a big problem because Canada is a large nation and we have so many diversified areas. In my riding we have some mail routes that do not go off paved roads, whereas in some of the more sparsely settled areas the roads are very narrow, hilly and rocky, and in some places it is almost impossible to travel over them with a car. Some of the mail carriers have to keep a car for the summer and to provide horse-drawn vehicles in the winter months.

I understand that the committee is going to be set up to recommend to the minister ways and means to pay the rural mail carriers on an equitable and fair basis. That is a big job, and if the committee goes into every mail route in Canada it will not be finished its work by this time next year. It will have to set up some sort of system whereby it will deal with certain classes of roads.

I want to say to the minister that I believe in my riding we have the best group of mail carriers in Canada. In fact they could not be any better. We have people who have carried the mail for twenty years and have never missed a trip winter or summer, rain or shine. Not one letter or parcel has ever gone astray on these routes.

I think the policy of the government has been that when the four-year contract for a mail route expires the contractor gets a renewal provided he is satisfactory and does not want any more money. However, that has not always taken place. Patronage has come into the picture. I can cite many cases, and I do not have to go out of my own riding to do it. I hope that situation will be changed. When a man is satisfactory, does not ask for any more money and can produce a petition signed by every mailbox owner on his route indicating that they want him to have the route, I hope the department will pay attention to these things and will not listen to the president or chairman of the Liberal association in a little corner of the riding who will only take the department off on a downhill road that is no good for anybody.

Mr. Larson: Liberal chairmen always listen.

Mr. Hodgson: I hope they are listening in my riding tonight. They have been anything but fair, and I want to tell you that it has not done them any good. Every time you change a mail carrier don't forget that there are four or five other applicants for the contract. When you pick one the other three are dissatisfied, and that has happened on a couple of occasions in my riding. They displeased many more than three. I think that is something the minister should take into consideration, and I hope he will not be like his predecessor.

I came to Ottawa to see his predecessor one time not so very long ago, and I remained here for two days. During that period I called him on the phone at least every hour trying to get an appointment, but he was too busy. I told him if he was too busy to see me for five minutes I was going to put a placard on my back and walk up and down in front of the office until he would see me. Then he said he could talk to me on the phone for a minute. When I put my case to him over the phone he said, "Oh, my officials, my officials, my officials."

An hon. Member: Three times?

Mr. Hodgson: I hope the minister will run his department and not let his officials run him down the hill. Sometimes they are all right and sometimes they are all wrong. That is not good for the government either.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer. The hon. member for Hastings South (Mr. Follwell) spoke today and said that he had obtained extensions of mail routes on the basis of three boxes to a mile. I was very glad to get that information, because just yesterday I received a letter from the minister's department turning down a request for service on the basis of three boxes to less than a mile. The letter said that government policy was four boxes to a mile. In the last few years I have received several letters from the Post Office Department all stating that the basis was four boxes to a mile. Therefore I say now that patronage can be a bad thing, because apparently some ridings can get service on the basis of three boxes to a mile.

Mr. Follwell: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit me—

Mr. Hodgson: You sit down. I did not ask you any questions.

Mr. Follwell: On a question of privilege, if I may be permitted to speak from this side of the house, I am sure the hon. member will recall—if he will look at Hansard he will see it—that I said I was of the opinion it was three to a mile. I said I did not know how many it was to the mile. I referred it to the Postmaster General. I did not get an answer from him but someone on the other side of the house said "three to a mile". The hon. member immediately said that it was four to a mile in his constituency.

Mr. Cardiff: I was the one who made the statement, and I have one that is three to the mile.

An hon. Member: Patronage!

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hastings South (Mr. Follwell) also went back to something that happened in 1930; but look at the young gentleman. He doesn't remember what happened in 1930, and I think he had to admit that before he finished his speech tonight.

Mr. Follwell: Quite right.

Mr. Hodgson: Nevertheless I do believe there are certain places where they should accept three boxes to a mile. As a matter of fact there is a place in my riding where I would like to get a route at three boxes to a mile. That is desirable where elderly persons live, especially when the mail courier is willing to deliver that mail without any additional cost. It is something that should be considered.

I am not in favour of this bill having to do only with contracts under $1,000. If you are going to give the minister a bit of leeway, well, give him some leeway. Why stop at $1,000? Make it something worth while because most mail routes are over $1,000.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): If my hon. friend will allow me, I think there is a little confusion. We intend to do exactly what he desires, to readjust contracts not only under $1,000 but all contracts except those covered by section 29.

Mr. Hodgson: I am glad to have that explanation because over at Beaverton last September they took the mail contract away from the fellow who had had it for sixteen years. He never missed a trip and never lost a letter, but they gave it to another fellow on a contract at practically the same price. The fellow who had it for sixteen years had it sixteen years too long at the price he was being paid; and the fellow who got it last September has had it too long at the price he is getting. I am going to have a talk with the minister about a little increase for that fellow, because I certainly think he needs it.

There has been a new set-up for mail distribution in about one-third of my riding since the minister took over his office. I want to say that we appreciate that very much. It is something I have been after for five long years, but I never got any place until we got the genial minister in the proper chair and in the proper job. He got busy and did something about it, and we have a better mail service in one-third of my riding than we have had since confederation.

There are some more improvements that should be made, and I spoke to the minister about them. He said that I should get the matter in shape and come over and talk to him about it. The improvements are not going to cost any more money; there are just a few little things that could be shaped up. When we get this bill through the house, get this legislation set up, and have all the information and advice that the committee can give, we will be able to chat about these things and probably get around to doing something about them.

I did want to go into deliveries of mail in the towns, and I was wondering how it would be set up. Is it to be according to the population of the towns, or revenue, or just what will it be when we get the two deliveries a day? For instance, in the town of Lindsay we had two deliveries until recently.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The committee is being set up to consider the operation of the rural mail delivery service. I do not think the committee would have power to go into city deliveries, and in any event this resolution does not affect delivery within cities.

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Speaker, I abide by your ruling. Nevertheless the hon. member for Hastings South went into letter deliveries in Belleville and the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) discussed deliveries on trains and airplanes.

Mr. Speaker: I think if the hon. member had brought that to the attention of the Speaker, those hon. members would have been called to order.

Mr. Hodgson: It happened that you were not in the chair, sir.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that would not have made any difference.

Mr. Hodgson: I abide by your ruling, sir. I think if there is any change it has to be a change for the better, and I am glad to say that I am in favour of the resolution.

Mr. Auguste Maltais (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly not my intention to follow the hon. gentleman who preceded me in all the political matters about which he spoke. My comment will be very brief because some of the points I had intended to make have already been covered by my colleague the member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier).

One point I would like to submit for the consideration of the committee that will be set up is the fact that sometimes we meet with difficulties when we try to obtain a rural route in some of the villages in my constituency. It would appear to me that when the Postmaster General has to make a decision regarding a mail route it must be determined whether the locality concerned is to be considered a rural region or an urban region. At Ste. Anne de Beaupre, a town in my riding, we have a community that is considered to be an urban district, yet closer to the village there is what is considered to be a rural district. The department claim that under the present regulations they do not qualify as an urban area.

May I suggest that some scheme could be arrived at, or some system of delivery, which would be neither a rural courier's route nor a city service, but something in between. I hope the regulations which will be established will have such a degree of flexibility as to permit people who want a particular type of service to receive that service.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief. I wish to repeat my appreciation for the approach to this motion taken by all members. I wish also just to say a few words to my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) who spoke in French regarding a considerable number of special cases.

(Translation):

I wish to assure my hon. friend that we examine carefully all cases. I know that a case may appear particularly worthy to the hon. member who submits it but, when that case reaches the department, it is added to all the others that must be considered on their respective merits.

Committee on Post Office

I am sure that my hon. friend saw nothing more than a coincidence in what he calls an anomaly in the proportion of English-speaking and French-speaking people who get mail delivery. If I understood him correctly, he is not blaming anyone; otherwise it would be an insinuation inconsistent with my hon. friend's character.

(Text):

Sir, I want to conclude by saying that this problem is more complicated than we might think. Evidence of that is already before this house, because nearly all members have a solution or a partial solution. I am sure, however, that with the atmosphere of objectivity which members have created, and with the explanation and testimony of officials and others, the proper solution will be found. I wish to thank every hon. member in the house, and all members who have participated in this debate. I am sure something good in the form of legislation will come from this committee.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand that it is the wish of the house that the names of those who will serve on the committee shall be announced this evening?

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Yes. I move:

That the committee consist of: Messrs. Ashbourne, Beyerstein, Boucher, Brisson, Bryce, Cardiff Cardin, Coyle, Cruickshank, Dinsdale, Dumas, Dupuis, Garland, Gour (Russell), Green, Hosking, Langlois (Gaspe), MacKenzie, MacLean (Queens), McCulloch, McWilliam, Noseworthy, Robertson, Robichaud, Spence, Ward, and Welbourn.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is unanimously agreed that these hon. members will form the committee.

Motion agreed to.

CROWN LIABILITY

TORTS AND CIVIL SALVAGE

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 105, respecting the liability of the crown for torts and civil salvage.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister not going to make a statement?

Mr. Knowles: He is just waiting for an invitation to do so.

[Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville).]

Mr. Fulton: He now has it.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, this bill is the most far-reaching and is indeed the final step in making the federal crown in Canada liable in tort for damages for which, were it a private person of full age and capacity, it would be liable in respect of a tort committed by a servant of the crown or in respect of a breach of duty attaching to the ownership, occupation, possession or control of property, or in respect of motor vehicle damages sustained by any person by reason of a motor vehicle owned by the crown. The bill also has other purposes to which I shall allude later, but its main purpose is to make the crown, in respect to the matters which I have mentioned, liable to the full extent to which it would be liable if it were a private person of full age and capacity.

It is appropriate, I think, in discussing the principle of this bill to link it with the history and the development of the rules governing claims against the crown for redress in those cases where a subject feels himself aggrieved. In their historic origin our courts were the king's courts which were created to hear and determine suits brought between subject and subject in accordance with the rules of the common law. Since these courts had been created by the king and, in a very real sense, represented the monarchy in the exercise of its judicial function, it was not possible for a subject to sue the king in the king's own courts.

However, once in a while even in those times, subjects had legal claims against the crown for which their only hope of redress was by petitioning the king for justice. Since these petitions involved points of law which the king was not in a position to consider personally, the practice grew up under which he authorized certain courts to consider whether such petitions should be granted, by an order or fiat addressed to his own courts directing in effect: Let justice be done. It was only in this way that issues between the crown and subjects were brought before the courts and there determined in accordance with the rules of the common law.

It was thus that two principles emerged, the first of which was that claims might be asserted against the crown in the form of a petition; the second of which was that such claims could not be entertained until a fiat had first been granted. These principles of the English common law were first given statutory form in Canada by this parliament in 1876 when Hon. Edward Blake, the minister of justice under the Alexander Mackenzie government, introduced the Petition of Right Act of Canada to that effect. Until this government introduced a bill in 1951 to abolish the fiat, the granting of it continued to be the sole basis upon which petitions of right against His Majesty in the right of Canada could be decided in this country.

Although certain claims might be asserted against the crown in this way, the crown was very far from being in the same position as a private individual in respect of its subjects' claims generally. The only claims that could be made the subject matter of a petition of right were those in which the land, goods or money of the subject were in the possession of the crown or in which the claim arose out of a contract entered into by or on behalf of the crown.

That was the position in 1887 when this parliament enacted that the Exchequer Court of Canada, which had previously been established as the court in which laws relating to taxes and revenues might be enforced, should also be the appropriate forum for the hearing of these petitions of right. This legislation of 1887 also introduced a fundamental change in the law. Prior to that time, as I have said, claims against the crown arose where the lands, goods or money of the subject were in the possession of the crown, or arose out of a contract entered into by or on behalf of the crown. Claims against the crown could not be brought in respect of any tort—that is any wrongful act—not involving a breach of contract for which a civil action would lie. The reason an action could not be brought in respect of a tort or wrong was upon the ground that in law the king could do no wrong and therefore could not be liable in tort. But this act of 1887 gave the exchequer court jurisdiction to hear and determine every claim against the crown arising out of any debt, injury to the person or to the property, or any public work resulting from the negligence of any officer or servant of the crown while acting within the scope of his duties or employment.

Thus for the first time in Canada—and to the great credit of Canada, for the first time in the English-speaking world—actions in tort based upon the one tort of negligence only were permitted to be taken against the crown. I think that it is fitting that for this enlightened legislation we should pay our respects to Hon. John Thompson who was the minister of justice under Sir John A. Macdonald, and who subsequently became Sir John Thompson and prime minister himself.

As an indication of the enlightened attitude of Canada in this respect, it may be noted that it was not until 60 years later that the United Kingdom and other commonwealth countries permitted proceedings against the sovereign for torts.

With slight amendments from time to time this rule established in 1887 has prevailed until the present day. Actions against the crown in tort are still confined to negligence although, as I pointed out on a previous occasion, to say only that they are so confined may to the layman be misleading as to their scope unless one points out that a large percentage of actions in tort—possibly as high as between 90 and 95 per cent—are actions based upon the negligence of servants of the crown.

In Canada the law as amended by this legislation of 1887 continued substantially without change until 1950, when this government introduced the Statute Law Amendment Act by which it was provided that action might be brought against crown corporations in the provincial courts. This legislation in itself was a radical departure from existing law and existing legal theory; for before that time legal proceedings against the crown in the right of Canada could only be taken in the courts of His or Her Majesty in the right of Canada. The 1950 act therefore, in permitting actions against the crown in the right of Canada to be taken in the courts of His Majesty in the right of the provinces, made these crown corporations amenable to the jurisdiction of all Canadian courts in much the same way as ordinary corporations.

In the following year, 1951, by an amendment to the Petition of Right Act we abolished the necessity of securing a fiat before proceedings could be brought against the crown. Proceedings may now be taken against the crown as of right and without first obtaining the crown's consent.

The bill now before you represents perhaps the most far-reaching change of all. Its purpose is to place the crown, in so far as actions in tort are concerned, in substantially the same position as a private individual. Upon the passage of this bill the crown will be liable not only for all torts committed by agents or servants of the crown, but also for torts that may be committed without the intervention of a servant or agent, namely torts arising out of the ownership, occupation, possession or control of property including motor vehicles. The list of actions that are generally recognized as coming within the classification of "torts" are as follows: (a) negligence; (b) nuisance (c) trespass; (d) assault; (e) false imprisonment and false arrest; (f) malicious prosecution; (g) libel and slander; (h) deceit; interference with contract rights; (j) trover and conversion; (k) slander of title; (l) infringement of patent.

Making the crown liable for torts committed by its servants will make the crown liable for those torts I have just mentioned wherever they are committed by a servant while acting within the scope of his duties. Of these as I have already stated, the tort of negligence is the most significant, and next to it that of nuisance.

The extension of the crown's liability for breach of duty arising out of ownership, possession or control of property would make the crown liable as occupier to invitees, licensees and occasional trespassers in accordance with the ordinary rules of law; it would extend to the crown liability for nuisance or negligence committed otherwise than through the medium of a servant of the crown. For example, the crown would be under a duty to prevent injury to adjoining property from a building, from the escape of noxious and dangerous things, from the presence of dangerous things, from interference with riparian rights and, generally, for nuisance and negligence in respect of the management of crown property.

In the above respects Canada is now extending the liability of the crown in Canada in the same manner in which the United Kingdom has extended the liability of the crown in the United Kingdom.

At this point I think I should interject some words of reassurance to the taxpayers of this country. While these provisions will probably result in some increase in the amount payable by the crown to persons injured, it should be noted that many of the claims which will arise under this present legislation are now being paid on an ex gratia basis, notwithstanding that there is no legal liability, because it has been felt that there is a moral one. Therefore it is not expected that the total liability from a financial point of view will be increased too greatly. It is not expected, for example, that the liability of the crown in respect of all the new causes of action against the crown which are created by this bill will be anything like as great financially as those based upon the negligence of the crown's servants.

There would, of course, be no liability in any case where anything was done under the authority of a statute. Nor is it intended to impose liability in respect of the ownership of property unless the crown is, in fact, controlling and administering the property. For example, in the Northwest Territories, and to a lesser extent in the provinces, the federal crown owns wild or unoccupied lands. In respect of such lands it is intended to make the crown liable only where the crown has, in fact, assumed control and is in some way using or administering the property.

It is also proposed to exclude liability where the crown has abandoned the use of a particular work. For example, the crown might, as a public convenience, construct a wharf in a remote area but, because the need for it no longer exists, the crown might cease to maintain it. It is intended to make provision for a public declaration of abandonment in order that the crown would not be obliged either to continue to maintain the work indefinitely or to demolish it.

This brings me to the second main provision of the bill, which is that it makes applicable to the crown the ordinary laws relating to salvage services rendered in assisting any crown ships or in saving life therefrom or in saving any cargo or apparel belonging to the crown, in the same manner as if the ship, cargo or apparel belonged to a private person. Here again this provision is a counterpart of that contained in the United Kingdom crown proceedings act.

The third main provision of this bill is that permitting small claims in negligence up to a limit of $1,000 to be taken in the district or county courts that would have jurisdiction if the action were between subjects. This will enable the issue to be determined locally and result in a saving of costs, and will enable small negligence claims to be disposed of quickly. All other actions of course will continue to be brought in the Exchequer Court of Canada.

May I say in conclusion that the step being taken in this bill follows logically from the development of our whole legal history and particularly from the measures which we enacted in this present parliament in 1950 and 1951. In all these matters we have to keep in mind two important factors. On the one hand there is the obvious consideration that the citizen as a litigant should have an economical and effective method of pursuing his claim against the crown. Against this must be balanced, however, an equally important consideration, namely that in the interests of the general body of citizens as taxpayers this litigation against the crown should be carried on as economically and efficiently as possible.

This is the third important piece of legislation in this regard which the government has brought forward in the last three years. We have gone into this process gradually in order to make sure step by step that we were providing reforms for the litigant without imposing any undue burdens upon the taxpayer. Our experience with the legislation which we passed in 1950 and again in 1951 in this respect has been very favourable. Our impression is that the present legislation will remove virtually all of the restrictions upon litigants who desire to sue the crown without imposing a new and costly burden upon the taxpayer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would move the adjournment of the debate and would suggest that, in view of the fact that the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) will not be here tomorrow, it might stand over until the beginning of the week.

On motion of Mr. Diefenbaker the debate was adjourned.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STATEMENT ON THREATENED RAILWAY STRIKE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I might have the consent of the house to revert to motions for a couple of moments, I would be glad to announce to you, to the house and to the country that collective bargaining is still an effective instrument to deal with labour relations in this country.

The representatives of the Canadian railways and the representatives of the brotherhood who had been negotiating for some considerable time to settle the renewal and revision of the collective agreement governing their relations have agreed upon terms for the renewal and revision of that agreement; and the instructions that the members of the union would withdraw from service at six o'clock on the 2nd of February are being cancelled at this moment. The railways are also withdrawing the notices of embargoes on shipments of perishable goods.

I think it would be appropriate to add—and I feel that this would be in the name of all the members of this House of Commons—that we are highly appreciative of the public-spiritedness of those who have been negotiating on behalf of the railways and on behalf of the brotherhood. They have fully and magnificently recognized their responsibilities to the Canadian people whose servants they are, as we are, and whose interests are as dear to them as they are to us and to those we represent.

I think they have done a magnificent job, and that it is a credit to Canadian democracy that matters about which there were honest and sincere and pretty widely diverging views could be settled when honest men of good will got together and did their best to discharge their responsibilities to their fellow citizens.

That has been done; and I think it is a bright page to be written into the history of labour relations in this country.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) if he is in a position to give us, in general, the terms of the settlement arrived at?

Mr. St. Laurent: I would prefer that that should come from those who have made the settlement. It has been their responsibility, and they have discharged it magnificently.

I can say that there are two points which have been mentioned to me, that perhaps had to be mentioned to me. One was that there is an increase of the order of 12 per cent going into force, with an appropriate retroactive date to be determined by the parties.

There is for a certain group of yardmen, I believe it is, a forty-hour week, to go into effect on the 1st of October next, evidently with adjustments which will have to be made in the wage scale so that the take-home pay will not be seriously affected by that change in the hours.

The adjustments with respect to the application of the forty-hour week are matters upon which there still remain diverging views on the part of the representatives of the men and the representatives of the company. They have both agreed that I am personally—not as Prime Minister, not as head of the government—but that I am personally to select a person to decide, as referee, what those adjustments will be, both parties agreeing to abide by the decisions of that referee.

As that is a matter which will not require to be implemented before October 1, 1953, both parties told me that there was no immediate urgency in announcing the referee, but that they hoped it might be done within a reasonable time. I was naturally highly flattered by the confidence they both expressed.

I asked them if they had any suggestions. They preferred to make no suggestions, but to leave it entirely to me to make the selection, without any suggestions or recommendations or objections. They said they preferred to have me use my own best judgment in selecting a person to do that for them, and that they were going to be satisfied to abide by whatever adjustment that referee decided was the proper adjustment in the circumstances.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we of this group would like to join with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in the well-deserved tribute which he paid to the parties who have carried on these negotiations, and who have shown the public spirit to which the Prime Minister referred tonight.

I am sure we are all delighted, not only that an agreement has been reached but that it has been reached through the process of collective bargaining, without any outside interference. That is perhaps the most important aspect of the announcement made tonight by the Prime Minister, and we applaud it very happily. We are naturally interested—and I think that goes for all of us—in the details of the settlement. I was afraid at first, when the Prime Minister began to reply to the question of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), that he would not be able to give us any of the terms tonight. However, he has been able to give us a good deal of information.

That information does seem to suggest that a basis of settlement agreeable to both sides has been worked out. I wonder if the Prime Minister is in a position to say whether or not the terms agreed upon include any reference to the changes in rules which did, for a long time, stand in the way of a settlement. Is that subject in the category of matters that have been agreed upon, or is it in the category of matters to be dealt with by the person whom the Prime Minister will name?

Mr. St. Laurent: The only matter to be dealt with by the referee I am to appoint is the matter of adjustment required by the institution of the forty-hour week. There are other matters about which precise decisions have not been arrived at, but the parties have agreed that they trust each other sufficiently to be able to work those out without there being any danger of their interfering with the completion of a collective agreement.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will take up Bill No. 44, to protect the coastal fisheries; the resolution in the name of the Minister of Resources and Development respecting the conservation of water resources; also the resolution in the name of the Minister of Resources and Development respecting the establishment of the historic sites and monuments board of Canada; the resolution in the name of the same minister respecting the revision and consolidation of the Yukon Act; then Bill 47, to amend the Territorial Lands Act; and if these matters are disposed of, we will consider the resolution to amend the National Housing Act.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 30, 1953

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES—REFERENCES TO HON. MEMBER FOR QUEENS-SHELBURNE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a question of privilege which is one on which I am sure every member in the house would like to rise; in other words, may I say how delighted all of us are to see back in our midst once again the hon. member for Queens-Shelburne (Mr. Smith). May I add that it is even a greater source of delight to us all to see him in such excellent health.

Mr. P. C. Black (Cumberland): Since I come from Nova Scotia I want to join with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in welcoming our fellow member from that province. I speak on behalf of all the people of Nova Scotia in welcoming him back to the House of Commons. We are very happy to have him here and delighted to see him looking so well.

HOGS

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN PRICE AFTER MARCH 1

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) but in his absence and in the absence of his parliamentary assistant perhaps one of the cabinet ministers will answer. Was the Minister of Agriculture expressing government policy the other day when under pressure he stated that hogs would advance in price four cents a pound after March 1?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I do not know of any such statement having been made by the Minister of Agriculture.

YUKON

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF SOUTHERN BOUNDARY TO 55TH PARALLEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): May I direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters), notice of which I have given him. Have any representations been made by organizations in the Yukon to extend the boundary of the territory south to the 55th parallel, thus including parts of northern British Columbia? If so, can the Minister indicate the nature of the representations?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, I have received a resolution passed by the monthly general meeting of the Whitehorse board of trade, held on the 6th day of January at the city of Whitehorse in the Yukon Territory. The resolution expresses concern lest what is referred to in the resolution as the entirely undeveloped northwest areas of British Columbia become "a vacuum between the industrialized south of the province and the fast-growing Yukon Territory", and indicates a desire to promote the welfare of the people living in those areas by extending the southern boundary of the Yukon Territory to 54° 40′.

I note that copies of the resolution were sent to the premiers of British Columbia and Alberta but to date neither of these governments has expressed its views on the subject to the federal government.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister whether the government is contemplating any action in connection with this suggestion?

LIBBY DAM

INQUIRY AS TO COMPENSATION FOR CANADIAN LAND AND WATER RESOURCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the recent press statements by United States authorities that they are prepared to proceed with the Libby dam project, will the minister inform the house whether the United States proposals are sufficient to assure adequate compensation for the use in perpetuity of Canadian land and water resources?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of his question, which is of course of particular interest to the province of British Columbia. I should like to make a short statement in reply to it.

The hon. member is referring to an application which was submitted in January, 1951, on behalf of the United States government for the approval of the international joint commission of the construction of the Libby Dam project. This project would involve the construction of a dam on the Kootenay river at Libby, Montana, and the creation, upstream, of a reservoir flooding the Kootenay valley in Montana and for a distance of 42 miles in British Columbia.

Under the boundary waters treaty of 1909, a project such as this, which would affect the level of waters on both sides of the boundary, requires the approval of the international joint commission and of the governments of Canada and the United States. The government of British Columbia is also, of course, concerned in the matter since the project will involve the use and development of resources within the province. In a development of this sort consideration must be given not only to the question of compensation for property damages but also to the larger question of appropriate arrangements to ensure that those entitled to the benefits to be derived from the use of Canadian natural resources—in this case the people of British Columbia in particular and the people of Canada in general—should receive those benefits in full measure.

In putting the Canadian interest before the international joint commission, the Canadian government has therefore been concerned to ensure that benefits will accrue to Canada commensurate with the contribution which Canadian resources will make to the developed project. This is the matter that is at issue before the commission now, and I hope that it will be resolved soon. The development and use of natural resources within their boundaries is, of course, a matter within the jurisdiction of the provincial governments. The Canadian government is making every effort to see that the needs and rights of the people in the area concerned are fully met and that the government of British Columbia is given every opportunity to present its views to the international joint commission so that the interests of the people of British Columbia can be fully protected.

I understand that, following recent discussions with the Canadian chairman of the international joint commission, the government of British Columbia, continuing studies initiated by the previous government of the province, is seeking the advice of a committee representative of public and private interests as to the policy to be recommended to the international joint commission with regard to compensation and to the distribution of the benefits of the project to those entitled to them. I can assure my hon. friend that the Canadian government, whose approval is also required before any project such as this can be undertaken, will ensure that the interests of the people of British Columbia will be given full consideration.

WHEAT

CANADIAN CRACKED WHEAT CONTENT IN U.S. FLOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has any protest been made by the government to the United States authorities with regard to the bad effect on Canadian wheat sales caused by recent actions of certain United States importers who are reported as having used Canadian cracked wheat in flour for human consumption in that country?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may take the question as a notice. I should like to prepare an answer. The hon. member did send me notice of the question, but I did not receive it until just before the sitting opened. I should therefore prefer to leave it until Monday before answering.

DELIVERY QUOTAS IN WESTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Could he inform the house what progress is being made in raising delivery quotas in western Canada, and when it is expected the fifteen-bushel quota will be general? Is it expected that the fifteen-bushel quota can be raised before the end of the crop year?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Delivery quotas in the province of Manitoba have been at 15 bushels per seeded acre for all grains since December 9, 1952. As of today, the delivery quotas for all grains at all stations in Alberta have been raised to 15 bushels per seeded acre.

In the province of Saskatchewan good progress is being made in raising delivery quotas towards the 15 bushel per seeded acre level. As of yesterday, the delivery quotas in effect for wheat at Saskatchewan stations were as follows:—

5	bushels	per	seeded	acre — nil
8	bushels	per	seeded	acre — 27
10	bushels	per	seeded	acre —520
12	bushels	per	seeded	acre —382
15	bushels	per	seeded	acre —180

The Canadian wheat board anticipates that prior to the end of the crop year it will be possible to increase delivery quotas to more than 15 bushels per seeded acre at all points in the three prairie provinces and the board is working towards that objective.

P.E.I. CAR FERRY SERVICE

BORDEN-TORMENTINE FERRY—OWNERSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. It has been brought to my attention that in a recent report from the labour department there is the statement that the ships Abegweit and Prince Edward Island of the Borden-Tormentine route are owned by the Canadian National Railways. I hope the editor of that report will have the correction made at the earliest possible moment.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I will be very glad to see to it that any necessary correction is made at once.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ASSESSMENT OF INCOME TAX ON PENSION FUND REFUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue or of the Minister of Transport in connection with Canadian National Railways employees who are receiving refunds on account of moneys paid to the old pension fund. They want to know whether or not the government has considered making it unnecessary for them to show as income in 1953—

Mr. Knowles: 1952.

Mr. Diefenbaker: 1952—the total amount received that year, because it was gathered together during the year. Can the minister say something about that, since there seems to be a difference among the various income tax branches in the dominion as to their interpretation of that provision?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, [redacted] matter which I think might more properly be answered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). Under the present law, income is taxable in the year in which it is received. While the matter has been given some consideration, it has not been given final consideration. It would be necessary to have a change in the law in order to spread it over a number of years.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister permit a further question? One of the income tax offices right here in the city says it is not income in the current year. Others are in a different position. How does this difference come about?

Mr. St. Laurent: Someone is making a mistake.

Mr. McCann: Yes, someone is making a mistake. And I have no knowledge of the matter being treated except upon a uniform basis throughout all our offices.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Canadian National Railways employees want to know about it.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Transport? Can he say whether he has completed his study of this question following the representations made to him by Mr. Hutchinson; and has he taken the matter up with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott)?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The answer to the first question is yes. I have completed the study of the brief sent to me by Mr. Hutchinson, and I have replied to Mr. Hutchinson along the lines that I think the only method of granting relief as requested by him is by way of an amendment to the Income Tax Act—which matter is now under study by my colleague the Minister of National Revenue.

I think the point the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) raised a moment ago arises from the fact that some of the refunds are made in 1953 and others in 1952. So that, because of that, it might well be possible that the income tax offices to whom he referred are not dealing with the same thing.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister if he is prepared to answer my second question? Has he made representations to the Minister of Finance concerning this matter?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes; the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister of Finance and I have been discussing the matter.

FISHERIES

PROTECTION OF COASTAL FISHERIES

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 44, to protect the coastal fisheries.

Coastal Fisheries

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the main purpose of this bill is to protect Canadian fisheries in territorial and inland waters from encroachment from foreign fishing vessels and to regulate the conduct of foreign fishing vessels in our territorial and inland waters.

This bill is a revision of the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, chapter 43, which was first enacted in 1868 in an act intituled "The Foreign Fishing Vessels Act". This act was amended several times over the years, the last of which amendments was made in 1913.

The present bill is largely one of clarification and revision. A few obsolete provisions of the present act are removed.

Under the present act the governor in council may issue permits to United States fishing vessels to enter Atlantic ports to purchase bait, ice, seines, lines and all other supplies and outfits and for the transshipment of catches and the shipping of crews. The governor in council, however, has no power under the present act to grant similar privileges to fishing vessels of any other foreign power.

Previous to the entry of Newfoundland into the union certain privileges and arrangements had grown up whereby fishing vessels of foreign powers, particularly of Portugal, were permitted to enter Newfoundland ports. At the time of union the governor in council was given authority by section 9 of the Statute Law Amendment (Newfoundland) Act, being chapter 6 of the statutes of 1949, to issue permits to fishing vessels of foreign powers to enter Newfoundland ports. The governor in council has no power to issue permits to the fishing vessels of any foreign power to enter Canadian ports on the Pacific coast.

The present bill will give the governor in council power to issue permits to the fishing vessels of any foreign power to enter any port in Canada. This power, however, will in no way affect the reciprocal port privileges on the Pacific coast for fishing vessels of the halibut fleet, which are regulated by treaty between Canada and the United States.

The present act purports to exclude from our territorial waters foreign fishing vessels. There is, however, no definition in the act of what constitutes a fishing vessel. It is doubtful whether, in its ordinary sense, the term "fishing vessel" could be construed to include vessels hunting seals or taking marine plants in our territorial waters. There is also serious doubt whether the present act would exclude vessels that are not engaged directly in fishing, that is fish processing vessels or even mother ships, which do not engage in actual fishing but which store or transport fish caught by catching boats. It was therefore thought desirable to include in this bill a proper and complete definition of the term "fishing vessel."

The present act provides for forfeiture only as a penalty for foreign fishing vessels entering our territorial waters. In days gone by this was probably all right, but today, having regard to the value of trawlers, it is far too drastic a penalty. This bill therefore provides fines as alternative methods of punishment. By way of revision this bill provides a simplified procedure for seizure and forfeiture of any foreign fishing vessels. The procedure in the present act was deemed to be too cumbersome, involving great delays and expense.

Under the present act enforcement was vested not only in Canadian but also in British naval vessels and officers. The present bill provides that enforcement shall be the responsibility only of Canadian vessels and officers. The present act was designated as the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act. Since the act is no longer used for purposes of customs administration but entirely for fisheries protection against encroachment of our territorial waters by foreign fishing vessels, it was deemed desirable to change the name of the act accordingly.

The present act only excludes fishing vessels which are "foreign or not navigated according to the laws of Great Britain or of Canada" and which are not permitted to come in by "any treaty or convention or any law of Great Britain or of Canada". This bill would bring the law into conformity with the present status of Canada within the commonwealth and all fishing vessels, except Canadian fishing vessels, would be prohibited from coming into our territorial or inland waters unless permitted by a treaty or law of Canada.

The present bill has come to us from the Senate where it received very thorough consideration. It is intended that when this bill has had its second reading it will be referred to the standing committee on marine and fisheries.

Mr. MacDougall: Would the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries answer a question which is perhaps made necessary by my [illegible]g him correctly. Did he say that mother ships were not considered to be fishing vessels, or did he say that they were considered to be fishing vessels?

Mr. MacNaught: What I said was that under the present act, which this bill consolidates, revises and amends, it was not clear that a mother ship would be included in the term "fishing vessel." For that reason it was deemed advisable to include an all-embracing definition in the bill.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to what the parliamentary assistant has said in regard to this bill, and while the language is not exactly the same it bears some resemblance to that which was used in the "thorough investigation" he says took place elsewhere. I have studied that as well. The hon. member has stated that this is an act to protect the coastal fisheries of this country.

There is no part of the country more interested in a bill of this kind than Newfoundland. The coast line of Newfoundland must be about 3,000 miles in length, and with the addition of the Labrador coast line it must total close to 4,000 miles.

There is a long and interesting and what has at times been a quite exciting history to this piece of legislation. Hon. members may not derive, from the information and explanation given by the parliamentary assistant, just what is the nature of this particular piece of legislation. Therefore, with the indulgence of the house, I should like to state a few facts of this history.

As everyone knows, in the early days there were no laws governing fishing rights on the coasts of Newfoundland or of any other part of Canada. Fishing vessels from England, Spain, France, Portugal and the Basque country used to come over here and use the harbours until the English took charge and started to make regulations for the conduct of these vessels in the country. Traditionally these countries sent out their fishing vessels year after year for centuries, the only interruption being by serious international wars, particularly the Napoleonic wars and later in our times the two world wars.

As the governments on this side of the water acquired more power they took to themselves the right to make regulations. In particular, Newfoundland decided that since they were concerned with the fisheries around their coasts and on the banks near to Newfoundland they should be consulted whenever any treaty was being drawn up between England and France or with any other foreign power. Unfortunately Newfoundland was not always consulted and situations arose which created consternation, indignation and sometimes near riots in Newfoundland.

One agreement made between Great Britain and France caused a tremendous stir in Newfoundland. The legislature was indignant and protested. Another time the masters of United States fishing vessels thought they had the right to come into Newfoundland harbours and take bait fish to use in their fishing vessels on the banks. They used a certain kind of seine which had been prohibited by Newfoundland legislation, and not only that but they used it on a Sunday, which was an illegal day for fishing in Newfoundland. As a result we had a famous incident in the district known as Fortune Bay. Newfoundland fishermen interfered with United States fishermen and the United States government claimed compensation.

In Newfoundland we have supplies of bait and the foreign fishing vessels are very anxious to come and get that bait because up until a few years ago all vessels fishing on the banks were using trawls. These were long lines that extended for half a mile and up to five miles. They were sunk down underneath the surface of the water and every six feet or so there would be a hook dropped down. These lines would be stretched out and codfish would be caught in that fashion. Each hook had to have a piece of bait, and it was necessary to have fresh bait. It was no good bringing salted bait from Europe because the fish did not like salted bait. They were very particular and wanted fresh bait.

Therefore when these fishing vessels would cross to this side of the ocean they would come to Newfoundland to get a supply of bait and it became a very profitable enterprise for many of our fishermen who neglected the cod fishery to go into bait fishery. Many men were engaged in the bait business. I have often heard my father speak about the bait fishery in Fortune Bay. The fishermen would go there, catch large quantities of bait and sell it to the French vessels in St. Pierre or to other foreign fishing vessels, for use on the banks. But the Newfoundland government, probably representing the majority of the opinions of the fishermen, decided against that policy and passed a law prohibiting the export of bait fish.

The parliamentary assistant has referred to the Foreign Fishing Vessels Act which was passed in 1868, and which I have here. In addition to a similar act in the Newfoundland statutes we have another act called the Export and Sale of Bait Fishes Act. The two go together. What we were trying to do was to prevent foreign fishing vessels coming across from Europe to Newfoundland ports and getting supplies either of bait or of other goods such as nets, lines and hooks necessary for the fisheries. The two things bait and other supplies went together. In addition, the fishermen could also export bait. They could catch bait and export it to these foreign fishing vessels when they were a few miles off the coast, and the purpose of the government was to try to prevent any trade of that kind with foreign fishing vessels so that they would not be put in practically the same position as the fishermen of Newfoundland.

Why were they doing that? Traditionally these countries had been using the Grand Banks for centuries, but because of the development of a national spirit on this side of the water we in Newfoundland felt—and I suppose the fishermen of the maritime provinces felt the same way about it—that, since we were so close to this natural resource, this great supply of fish, we had greater rights, or if we did not have greater rights there was no reason why we should go out of our way to help fishermen who had come across from Europe so that they could be in the same position as Newfoundland fishermen.

Portugal, Spain and Italy were great importers of Newfoundland codfish, and certainly up until the beginning of the first world war took tremendous quantities of Newfoundland fish. They were our principal export markets. During the first and second world wars it was not very easy to export salt fish to those countries, but since Portugal and Spain were neutral countries, large quantities of salt codfish could still be sent to them. However, since the second world war and because of the development of the bad exchange position, neither Spain nor Portugal has been in as good a position as formerly to purchase our fish. Spain particularly, on account of having undergone a civil war, was in no position to buy and has bought very little fish for many years. Portugal, however, did.

During the past fifteen or twenty years all countries have been paying more attention to the prosecution of the fisheries, and Italy, France, England, Spain and Portugal have embarked on a deliberate policy of increasing their fishing fleets. So far as Portugal is concerned, it still has a large fleet of what we call bankers in Newfoundland. These are vessels which use dories. One man goes out in a boat and catches fish by the use of the trawl that I described a little while ago. The other countries particularly, and Canada as well, now use vessels which are called trawlers. The trawls are not like the small hand trawl but are machine-operated trawls, and the vessels using them are better known to the trade as draggers. By trawling or dragging a big net across the smooth bottom of the banks they take in huge quantities of all kinds of fish that are there, big and small.

Until a few years ago the policy of Canada was to prevent vessels of that kind being operated off the Atlantic coast, but the government of this country could not prevent the Spaniards, the British, the French, the Portuguese and the Italians using their draggers, and they have been using them and catching great quantities of fish. Canada also uses draggers. In 1951 the fishermen of Newfoundland, as I mentioned the other day, formed a federation. I believe it was the secretary of the organization who a short while ago criticized the policy of the government in permitting foreign fishing vessels, especially those of the Portuguese, to come to Newfoundland and get supplies not only of bait but of other things that they need to carry on the fisheries, and then catching large quantities of codfish to take home and because of this purchasing less Newfoundland salt codfish.

It seems to be a foolish policy for the government to permit foreign fishing vessels to come here and be fitted out and assisted in every way in catching codfish to be cured in Portugal while at the same time the Portuguese market for salt codfish has been declining. I understand that the position taken by the Portuguese is that at the present time they cannot get the kind of fish they want. They say they want larger fish than the Newfoundland trade is able to supply. Most of the large fish are used in supplying fresh and frozen fillets for export to the United States. Therefore there is only a small quantity available for sale to the salt codfish markets.

Recently the Portuguese did purchase a mixed quantity of 35 per cent large and 65 per cent small fish, but only under pressure. I have heard no statement from the parliamentary assistant with respect to what the attitude of the government is going to be on this matter. All we have is a bare statement similar to what was given in the other place which gives no more information than can be ascertained by looking at the bill that is before us with the explanatory notes on the side. It seems to me there is not sufficient information contained in the bare statement of the parliamentary assistant for the house to get a proper understanding of this legislation. I know that this is going to be applicable to all of Canada, but how far, practically, will it be effective in other parts of Canada, apart from Newfoundland? Foreign fishing vessels coming from Europe seldom use ports other than Newfoundland. I understand some of them went into Sydney up until July 1 when that was stopped. I do not know how the practice originated and it would be interesting if either the minister or his assistant would tell us how they came to do that if it was illegal. What is going to be the policy of the government in regard to a matter of such vital importance to Newfoundland? The minister or the parliamentary assistant might also tell us what is going to be the position in so far as Newfoundland is concerned especially. I know this concerns the Pacific coast but I would like to know how it affects us in Newfoundland at the present time.

We would like to know what countries have the right by treaty to go into Newfoundland waters at the present time? I understand that United States vessels have that right although they do not exercise it. Have any other countries got that right? Are the other laws to which I referred as being in effect in Newfoundland, the Foreign Fishing Vessels Act of Newfoundland and the Export and Sale of Bait Fishes Act, going to be continued in force? I understand that, under the terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada the laws in effect regarding fisheries are to continue for five years, except that by agreement with the provincial government they may be altered. Has there been any agreement or is there any intention of altering those laws regarding those fishing vessels entering Newfoundland, or the export of bait fish?

I said a few moments ago that we had a wonderful supply of bait fishes. They have some of these bait fishes in other parts of Canada as well. First of all there is herring, a fish that is quite common and which can be found along the maritime coast as well as that of Newfoundland. Then we have caplin. I am not sure but my hon. friend from Gloucester could perhaps tell me whether they have caplin in New Brunswick. Caplin are small fish, something like smelts. They come in millions all along the coast of Newfoundland and are very useful bait for certain periods. Then, of course, we have the squid, which is the most valuable bait of all. I think it is found chiefly in Newfoundland waters.

Recent developments in connection with the abandonment of fishing vessels pure and simple—that is, using hooks and line—is something upon which we should have a pronouncement some time or other. I understand that, following the Maclean report back in 1929, Canada is against the use of draggers. At the present time there is an attempt being made to have an international agreement upon the question to what extent they can be used. There is no doubt about it, they are going to have an effect on the quantity of fish—codfish and haddock—available for marketing.

There is another type of fishing going on out there which the Spaniards are using. It seems to me, if we prohibit foreign fishing vessels from going into our ports that by the use of mother ships such as the parliamentary assistant has referred to or by the use of St. Pierre and Miquelon as a base for supplies, they could get around the difficulty of supplies even if they could not get bait. The Spaniards are using these pairs of small fishing vessels which are reputed to have already depleted the fisheries in the Irish sea and along the Spanish coast.

There is another feature about the policy that seems to be adopted by the government at the present time which I would mention. In 1950, when the government decided that it would assist the fisheries of Labrador and Newfoundland by invoking the Fisheries Prices Support Act, the minister stated that anyone who went to Labrador fisheries would do so at his own risk. As a result, many vessel owners sold their vessels and today there is little fishing done along that long stretch of Labrador coast from Blanc Sablon to Cape Chidley, a distance of 1,000 miles. What is going to be our attitude about foreign fishing vessels coming over here and going to Labrador when, as sometimes happens, they do not find fish on the Grand Banks? We are not using that fishery ourselves; we have discouraged our fishermen from going there. But are we going to allow foreign fishing vessels to go there?

The Portuguese government has a definite policy of assisting their fishermen right from infancy. They have a housing scheme for their fishermen; they have schools to train their fishermen, and they train them from childhood up until they take their place with fishing vessels as full-fledged fishermen. They teach them navigation, how to make nets and to do other things connected with fishing. They show an interest in fishermen with which the policy of this country cannot at all compare. The Portuguese fishermen are fine men, as I have said, and they come into our ports and we have a good deal to do with them.

Finally, it seems to me that we should have a pronouncement from the minister or his assistant on these matters that I have mentioned. What is going to be the policy of the government in regard to these fishing vessels? While I know that it is not in order to make a specific reference to any particular section, it seems to me that the section dealing with the regulations is so broad that i does require comment. If the parliamentary assistant would only look at one subsection of the act he will see that it certainly raises questions.

The governor in council may make regulations—

—for vessels to enter Canadian territorial waters—

—for any purpose specified in the regulations.

Well, surely, a regulation or a provision of that kind in an act is too broad altogether. The regulations included in an act should have some definite purpose that is disclosed in this house when the bill is introduced. However the matter is going to be referred to the committee and perhaps this point will be further discussed there.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should just like to say a word on this bill.

This resolution, introduced by the parliamentary assistant, is one of great interest to the province of Nova Scotia. I wish very briefly to thank the parliamentary assistant for the information that he has given to the house on this very important matter. As I understood what he had to say, this legislation which will follow the motion, and the regulations which the governor in council will be empowered to make under the bill, will open the way for the removal of an anomaly with respect to foreign fishing vessels using Atlantic ports, a matter that has caused some concern in our province. I know that the Nova Scotia Liberal members of this house have, in the past, made very strong representations to the minister and to the department respecting this matter. We are very pleased with the indication that action will be taken to rectify the situation.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): I do not intend to prolong the debate on this bill, Mr. Speaker, because I understand that it is going to be considered by the standing committee on fisheries. There are, however, one or two points that I should like to bring to the attention of the house at this time. This bill deals with the protection of the fisheries, and its scope is therefore restricted to our territorial waters. In my province some of the best fishing grounds, which would be called inshore fishing grounds, lie outside territorial waters about 15 or 20 miles off shore. I realize that the very best way to obtain protection of those fisheries is by an international agreement with the countries concerned. For that reason, I am following with a great deal of interest the progress that is being made in this direction by the northwest Atlantic fisheries commission. We know from experience, however, that international agreements take a long time to negotiate. In the meantime, I feel that some thought should be given to the extension of our territorial waters.

Some years ago Norway submitted a case to The Hague court, which tribunal I believe handed down a ruling which endorsed the principle of headland to headland in delineating the territorial waters of that country. I doubt if even that ruling would afford very much protection to the fishing grounds in my province. In any event, I believe it is worth giving some thought to, and I should like to see that principle applied by drawing a line from Cape Sable to Cape Race. This would ensure the protection of the major part of the fisheries in the Atlantic provinces. If that does not prove feasible, I think the time will come when we shall have to give some thought as to whether or not we might extend our territorial waters to the continental shelf.

Now, when the former minister of fisheries was introducing his estimates last year, I believe it was June 19, the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) mentioned that foreign ships were permitted to have free entry into Newfoundland ports, while at the same time they were excluded from the ports of Halifax and Sydney as well as other ports in the maritime provinces. In reply to that question, the minister pointed out that this was due to an old ruling which had been allowed to lapse during the years of war, and was being more strictly enforced. He promised that the situation would be taken care of when the bill was revised, as is being done in the measure we have before us.

When he was replying to the member for Cape Breton South, if I remember correctly, the Minister of Fisheries expressed the hope that these permits which foreign countries would have to get would be used as a sort of bargaining power between the countries concerned and ourselves. When the member for Cape Breton South raised his question, I think he had in mind the fact that certain firms in the maritime ports were placed at a disadvantage in comparison with Newfoundland firms at St. John's. I believe we all agree that all firms in all parts of Canada should have equal rights and no firm should have one advantage which does not apply to the others. The relationship that existed in Newfoundland was not only an advantage to the merchants of St. John's; its main feature was the bargaining power which it gave us with Portugal, to whom we sold the major part of our salt fish.

I believe the time has come when we must again begin to use some of our bargaining power with Portugal. The friendly attitude which we felt that Portugal always had for us seems to be deteriorating in these later years. We find that they are now driving a much harder bargain than they used to do. They insist upon having the choicest fish, and insist upon fish from Newfoundland of a higher standard than they are prepared to accept from other countries. Last March I had to bring before this house a situation in which some Portuguese draggers were dragging in territorial waters and becoming a menace to inshore fishermen from my riding. Also, we have reason to think that some of these Portuguese trawlers offer such high prices to the Newfoundland fishermen for bait that they are no longer interested in getting bait for sale to our cold storage plants, which are the only source of supply for our Newfoundland fishermen. I believe that these points might well be borne in mind, and that the principle of bargaining might well be considered when these permits are being issued.

The only other point I should like to make, Mr. Speaker, is that any comparison between the advantages enjoyed by merchants or business firms in the maritime ports with those enjoyed by the merchants in Newfoundland ports tends to set up a sort of conflict of interest between the two provinces. I suppose in a competitive system such a thing is normal, and so long as it remains on that level between firms in one province and firms in another province I do not think we should worry too much about it. But the thing that worries me now is that we have removed that situation from the local level of individual firms and placed it on a provincial level, and now it becomes a conflict of interest not between firms but between one province and another.

If a situation should ever arise in which Newfoundland, in order to export its fish, or in order to ensure European markets for fish, should wish to have those permits rescinded, I can see that the people in the maritimes would raise some opposition to it. That would be a situation which would tend to mar the unity of purpose and the unity of interests which should exist between one province and another in this great nation of Canada.

I have just one more point, Mr. Speaker, and that is this. While we are considering the protection of the fisheries I should like to point out that we need to protect our fishing grounds not only from foreign draggers but also from local draggers, because on those small inshore fishing grounds the local dragger can do just as much damage as a foreign dragger. These are very small areas, and once they have been dragged over for twenty-four hours or forty-eight hours the ground is not of much use to the inshore fishermen.

I think that covers most of the points that I had in mind and I trust that the minister will find it possible to give them some consideration when this bill goes before the committee.

Mr. A. M. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, this bill to protect the coastal fisheries does not affect any principle of any particular interest to the north shore of the province of New Brunswick, inasmuch as it is a rather rare occurrence that we have foreign vessels coming into our ports. When they have come it was to obtain a supply of bait.

As I said at the outset, it is a rather rare occurrence that foreign vessels come to our ports, but I have listened with interest to the exposé made by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacNaught), the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries, and I understood that the main purpose of the bill was to prohibit foreign vessels from entering Canadian territorial waters. Yet, from a cursory examination of the proposed legislation which I have made, it strikes me that the proposed bill goes farther, and that in certain instances—if the departmental officers of the Department of Fisheries will read this bill over again they will realize it—the legislation directly prohibits the entry of a Canadian vessel into our own territorial waters.

I realize that at this stage of the legislation, according to parliamentary procedure, I am not supposed to refer to any particular section of the bill. I will do that when the bill reaches the committee stage. But I invite the hon. member for Prince and the legal officers of the Department of Fisheries to study this bill again and I am sure they will realize that there are prohibitions in this bill as against the master in command of a fishing vessel, and a fishing vessel, according to legal interpretation, without any specification is general and could mean my vessel or my brother's vessel in Shippigan. It is in view of the fact that, according to its context, the proposed bill hits or could probably hit the Canadian fishermen that I rise on this occasion to bring this matter to the attention of the departmental authorities because, as the hon. member for Prince said in his remarks, higher fines and stiffer penalties are provided for infractions of this legislation by foreign vessels. I hold no brief for masters of foreign vessels, but I certainly would like the department to clothe with as much protection as possible our Canadian fishermen. In my submission, there are dangers and apparent dangers, from the wording of this bill as it now reads, for the masters of our own Canadian vessels.

There are certain sections of the bill which make the entry of even a Canadian vessel into our own territorial waters an offence, and the same penalties in such a case would apply against the master of a Canadian ship just as they would apply to the master of a foreign ship. I submit, sir, that that is unfair.

I said a moment ago that the fines were considerably increased, and so they are. In some instances the fines provided by the former act are increased over fifty times what they were, and in other instances twenty-five times what they were heretofore. Again I say, as regards the masters of the foreign vessels I am not concerned, but I do say that such an increase in penalties for possible violations by the masters of our Canadian vessels is totally unfair.

Then, Mr. Speaker, there is also an attempt —I would not say it is intentional—in the terminology of this bill to take away from an accused, for instance, the master of a Canadian vessel who commits an infraction of this law, the possible defence that he would have of lack of intent. We have similar legislation in our Criminal Code, for instance, with respect to obstructing a peace officer. Hon. gentlemen know that this offence is triable in several alternate ways, first, by indictment; second, by summary trial, and third, by summary conviction. But the point I wish to make at this stage, Mr. Speaker, is that the offence provided by section 168 of the Criminal Code for obstructing a peace officer is prefaced by the important word "wilfully". Hon. members know that "wilfully" is synonymous with intentionally or deliberately.

The hon. member for Prince will admit that there is a similar infraction provided for in the bill now before the house, that of obstructing a protection officer. As I said before, when the bill reaches committee stage I shall refer more particularly to the section in question. The word "wilfully" is omitted from the offence of opposing or obstructing a protection officer, and I submit that this is most unfair, especially to any of our Canadian masters of ships, or seamen who might be taken to court on the offence of obstructing a protection officer under the proposed legislation.

Ever since I have been practising law, I have noticed that there is a general tendency in federal legislation to take away as much as possible from the individual certain rights and privileges which he has been guaranteed under both British and Canadian jurisprudence from time immemorial. Every new piece of legislation that comes before this House of Commons, and those coming before some provincial legislatures, seem to try to take away, bit by bit, rights which we have enjoyed for centuries.

I submit that one of those rights is taken away by this very bill, through the absence of this most important word "wilfully", and I am sure counsel who have acted in defence will realize the importance of the word "wilfully" in a penal statute. Hence I submit, for the attention of departmental officers, especially the legal officers in the Department of Fisheries, the points I have made, and suggest that they should reread the whole context of the bill. I am hopeful that they will agree with me in what I have said about the word wilfully, and I think they will also agree that possible offences are created by the bill which would apply not only to foreign captains but, in certain circumstances, unfortunately to the masters of Canadian ships. This is so because of the generality of certain sections where reference is made only to a fishing vessel, without the reference being prefaced by the word "foreign".

As I said before, realizing the limitations placed upon me at this stage in procedure, I do not believe I can discuss the matter further. I see my hon. friend, the hon. member for Prince, nodding his head, so that I should think he is already seized of the point I have made at this stage. I would hope that the necessary corrections would be made in this piece of important legislation, before it is submitted to committee. If the corrections are not made, it will be my duty on behalf of the captains of our Canadian fleet to rise again and to bring more fully to the attention of the house the points I have in mind at the present time.

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to go over the ground already covered by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne), or by my colleague the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter).

This bill will have far-reaching effects on the fishing industry in the province of Newfoundland. As I see it, the bill itself is not as important as the authority it will give in the matter of making regulations. The regulations will be the deciding factor in the reception accorded the bill by the authorities in Newfoundland.

In that province we shall have a serious situation if the regulations are enforced so as to debar foreign vessels from coming to our ports for supplies. It will affect adversely the pleasant relations we have had with foreign countries for hundreds of years. Anything that will upset the friendly relationship existing between Newfoundland and Portugal for decades will be a serious thing for Newfoundland. We sell and have sold large quantities of salt fish to Portugal. Although we want to be in a position to bargain with them, we do not want to be in the position of dictating to them.

If the regulations to be made as a result of the passage of this legislation are used in a dictatorial manner, they will be detrimental to the relations which have always existed between Portugal and Newfoundland. And what applies to Portugal applies also to Spain and possibly to Italy.

At the present time a situation is developing on the Grand Banks off the coast of Newfoundland pointing to depletion. As some hon. members will know, the Grand Banks have been the breeding ground for countless millions of fish for decades. It is the feed brought up by the gulf stream and deposited on these banks which feeds the fish and nurtures them. From that breeding ground countless millions of fish come to the shores of Newfoundland year after year.

There is now evidence that depletion is taking place in certain areas of the Grand Banks, and if this continues it will certainly affect shore fishing in Newfoundland. We need some protection there. The only way I can see to bring this about is by international agreement with those countries which use large draggers and up-to-date modern trawlers which are coming in increasing numbers to Newfoundland waters, and fishing in our waters, or off the coast of Newfoundland, year after year.

Anyone who will go to St. John's in the summer can see them by the dozen, running up to a tonnage of about 2,000 tons. They can catch, cure and store huge tonnages of fish—and they have been doing it. We do need protection, so far as the Grand Banks are concerned, or depletion will take place in that area as it has taken place off the coast of Nova Scotia, and the coast of New England in the United States.

If our regulations are made so as to give us bargaining power whereby we can make agreements with those foreign countries which fish in our waters, then I am all for them. But if we use those regulations as a means to dictate to other countries what they shall do, then I say we are in danger of upsetting the friendly relationships we have had with those countries for many years.

It is the policy of Portugal to be self-supporting in its supply of fish. Because of intensive fishing by the Portuguese they do not need such great quantities of fish from Newfoundland. We may have a point in the regulations whereby we can induce them to increase their purchases from us by giving them certain concessions in connection with getting supplies, and fishing in Newfoundland waters.

As I see it, the bill is all right; but what will come from the bill, and what regulations will be used to make our position as a fish-producing and exporting country better than it has been, is what is really important.

Then, making reference to territorial waters, or the three-mile limit, it is possible that some hon. members may not know this demarcation was brought about by the international court at The Hague many years ago because of action taken by the then government of Newfoundland. However, I shall not discuss that in detail at this time.

I find upon reading the bill that it gives power to designate what shall be coastal waters. What do you mean by that? Are you going to make it twelve miles or twenty miles? Are you going to stick to the three-mile limit? Internationally, three miles is the recognized limit. We have had no answer to that question and perhaps we will get it in committee.

This bill and the regulations which will follow will have far-reaching effects on the fisheries of Canada, particularly those of the province of Newfoundland. I do hope that when it is before the committee it will be given the closest scrutiny so that we will have legislation which will be worthy, not only of the province of Newfoundland but of the whole of Canada. I think it is time that we had such legislation, but it must be scrutinized from all angles so that no province in this great country will be penalized by what we do here.

I listened with considerable attention to the parliamentary assistant and I realize that there are many points that need to be clarified. If he can clarify them to my satisfaction I shall be very happy. The people in Newfoundland are viewing this bill with some concern and they are taking it quite seriously. They will want to know what regulations are contemplated under the powers granted by this bill.

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, there are a few observations I should like to make with regard to this bill and in making them I shall not labour points that have been raised already. As I understand it, this bill seeks to extend the territorial water which may be designated for the purposes of the act. I think that is a most important point. Our coast line, especially on the Atlantic, is most irregular and if our territorial waters are to be interpreted as being within three miles from land, foreign vessels would still be permitted to enter many of our bays and waters which we look upon as being territorial waters. It seems to me most important that action should be taken to extend our territorial waters for the purposes of this bill as far as international law will permit so that our coastal fisheries may be protected in the way intended by the bill.

A second point comes to my mind which may have been provided for already. I refer to deep-sea sports fishing. I do not see any mention of that in the bill and I am wondering if restrictions will be placed upon this type of fishing, which is most important to certain parts of the maritimes where tourists from many countries come to do deep-sea fishing, particularly tuna fishing, out of the smaller fishing ports along the coast.

The third point that comes to my mind is in connection with the operation of Canadian fishing vessels by foreign interests. I am not legally trained, but as far as I can see the decision as to who may or may not fish within our territorial waters will be made upon the basis of the ownership of the vessel involved. I may be wrong, but it seems to me that a provision of that kind could be got around by some foreign interests leasing a Canadian registered vessel which could be operated within our territorial waters for their own interests, the fish being taken to their own country. Those are my main points.

With the indulgence of the house I should like to mention in passing one other matter which has some relation to this subject. Recently there has been considerable publicity in the press to the effect that the U.S.S.R. has been quite worried over the fact that a small island in the maritimes has been purchased by fishing sportsmen from south of the international boundary. The U.S.S.R. seems to be worried that the poor fishermen on that island are having their rights taken away. Perhaps the minister could put them straight by indicating that none of the sovereign rights of this country has been forfeited to any capitalist from any other country.

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take just a moment to express appreciation, on the part of the fishing interests in my constituency, of this particular bill. When it first came up in the Senate some seven weeks ago it received a certain amount of publicity in the newspapers. During the Christmas recess several people who are interested in the fishing business in Yarmouth and Digby counties spoke to me about this bill and indicated that they thought it was good legislation. They thought it timely that a bill which had been passed eighty-five years ago and had not been amended in the last forty years should be amended and clarified. In fact, several of them spoke to me to this effect: During the last three or four years it would appear from reading Hansard and the newspapers that there is more interest on the part of members of the house in our fisheries and the problems facing this industry than there has been at any time during our lifetime.

It certainly did my heart good to realize just what interest has been shown in the last three or four years, and progressively during each of those years, and that that should be realized by the people of those constituencies which are keenly interested in the fishing industry.

There is one particular part of this bill—Mr. Speaker, I shall be careful not to refer to the sections—which is of great interest to the people living along the Digby Neck and on the islands in Digby county. For a number of years they have been worried over the fact that United States draggers are fishing along that coast. I have referred to this time and time again in the house and have had innumerable interviews with the Department of Fisheries. I know that the department is keenly aware of the problems involved. One of the chief difficulties is indicated by the claim made by the fishermen living along that shore that, after daylight, that is during the hours of darkness, these foreign fishing vessels fish within the three-mile limit.

We all know how difficult it is to decide just where the three-mile line is off the shore. But these fishermen know the coast quite well. It is frequently said of them that they can be out on the water completely surrounded by fog, not being able to see land at all, and by looking over the side can tell exactly where they are because they have a mental picture of the type of bottom under the water. I think that is true of many of these fishermen who fish these waters.

They are worried over the fact that these foreign draggers may be coming within the three-mile limit. The Department of Fisheries is attempting to patrol these waters and I believe they will continue to do so. I suggest that the patrol vessels be sent in during the hours of darkness. I believe that the provisions of this act covering penalties for infractions of the regulations, providing for seizure, confiscation and detention, will have a salutary effect upon those who it is claimed are now fishing within the three-mile limit and disobeying the international laws in that regard.

The hon. member for Prince Edward Island has just referred to articles in the Soviet press indicating worry in connection with what is happening on Outer Baldonia, a small island in my constituency which is perhaps only four or five times the size of this chamber. Their concern is received with great amusement by the people of this country, and certainly by the people of that area. For his own edification and that of the hon. members of the house, may I say that no one lives on the island. It is an island not far from the famous Soldier's Rip where fishermen of several countries go to engage in the sport of fishing for the huge tuna. No fishermen live on the island but a few sportsmen go there for a few days each year. They have had a great deal of fun in the setting up of this mythical kingdom of Outer Baldonia. I think we have succeeded in giving the press of a certain totalitarian country a certain amount of amusement. They may not think it is amusement but it certainly is to the free world. I do not think it does any harm to Outer Baldonia or to the constituency of Digby-Yarmouth to have a little free publicity, and along with the good points in this bill I think it will be of benefit to the constituency and to the fishing industry of the area.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, those who have taken part in the debate this afternoon have all represented constituencies on the Atlantic seaboard. This bill, though possibly designed largely to meet conditions on the Atlantic coast, will also apply to the Pacific coast. Therefore I feel it is only right that I should say a few words with respect to the application of the bill to the Pacific coast, particularly as it will be a long time before we will have an opportunity to discuss it in committee of the whole inasmuch as I understand it is to be referred to a special committee. No great help will be given to the fisheries industry of the Pacific coast unless Canada defines quite clearly her territorial responsibility over the waters adjacent to the coast.

At the present time there is no clear-cut definition even of the so-called three-mile limit. Up to a few years ago the line from which the three-mile limit extended was taken by general international agreement to be from the low-water mark which follows the various indentations of the coast line. I think it was in December a year ago that the Norwegian government appealed to the international court respecting the definition of their territorial waters and particularly how the base line should be drawn along their coast. As a result of the Norwegian claim a number of points were selected along the coast line. Sometimes these were on the coast, sometimes on islands, and sometimes even on rocks at a considerable distance from the mainland of Norway. These points were then connected by straight lines running from point to point and by the use of these straight lines the waters claimed to be territorial waters of Norway were designated.

On the Pacific coast the strait of Juan de Fuca separates the southern portion of Vancouver island from the state of Washington. Under an international agreement a straight line was drawn down the centre of that strait. When you clear cape Flattery, a point in the northwest section of the state of Washington, the description of the territorial waters then ceases. But a practically straight line can be drawn from a few miles to the west of Victoria, certainly from the entrance of the strait of Juan de Fuca, which would run in a northwesterly direction clearing the headlands of the west coast of Vancouver island, clearing Queen Charlotte islands and joining with the international boundary line in Dixon strait.

The advantage of a clear definition of territorial waters by a very nearly straight line is that it would be possible for protective craft to recognize if there were foreign vessels poaching in those waters. Fisheries protective craft would be able to see that the regulations imposed by Canada were being carried out in these clearly defined waters. Unless it is possible to define our territorial waters clearly, it will not be possible to establish full jurisdiction over them, and until we can establish jurisdiction over these waters, which are frequently inhabited by fish that we harvest at various times, it will be impossible to provide adequate protection for our fishing industry.

There are two great areas of inland water which are excluded from being considered as territorial waters if the three-mile limit following the indentations of the mainland coast of British Columbia is accepted. These are of course Queen Charlotte sound and Hecate strait. A very high percentage of the fish harvested on the Pacific coast frequent these two bodies of water at one time or another. I consider that it is imperative that these waters should be included and designated as Canadian territorial waters. We must have jurisdiction over them if we ever hope to provide adequate protection for the fishing industry of British Columbia. At least 50 per cent of the salmon caught for canning purposes are caught beyond the so-called three-mile limit. Fish which are beyond territorial waters are fair game for the fishing vessels of any country. Therefore I feel that the first thing which must be done is to define our territorial waters, the waters over which we can and will exercise jurisdiction. Otherwise we cannot begin to offer protection to our fishing industry.

There is one other point I would like to refer to in this bill. There must be adequate means for enforcing the regulations which are made. This bill indicates steps which will be taken when vessels are seized for infractions of the rules and it is noticeable that there are different regulations for seizure and forfeiture of foreign vessels on the Atlantic coast than exist on the Pacific coast. I suggest that what is sauce for the goose is also sauce for the gander. If vessels from European countries are being seized for infractions of the regulations on the Atlantic seaboard, and are being tried by Canadian courts, then surely the same sort of provision should exist for foreign vessels infringing on the regulations covering Canadian territorial waters on the Pacific coast. If those vessels are seized, their captains and masters should also be tried in Canadian courts instead of being handed over to a foreign country for trial. I feel that the provisions which exist on the Atlantic coast should be applicable on the Pacific coast.

I will finish by once more emphasizing the fact that unless our territorial waters on the Pacific coast are clearly defined no real protection can be given to our fishing industry. Clear definition of those territorial waters must be made from a more or less straight base line. The best and in fact the only line which can be acceptable to the fishing industry of British Columbia is a line which includes as territorial waters those great fishing grounds of Queen Charlotte sound and Hecate strait. It is a simple process to draw a straight line on the western shores of Vancouver island to Queen Charlotte island. I am not sure whether it is necessary to go as far into the ocean as the edge of the continental shelf but it is essential that a clearly defined line be drawn on the west coast of those islands.

Such a line could not interfere with any international shipping because international shipping coming from Asia would be clear of those territorial waters until it entered the strait of Juan de Fuca. Ocean liners crossing the Pacific are still considerably west of the continental shelf as it runs north from the strait of Juan de Fuca paralleling Vancouver island on the west coast.

I hope that most careful consideration will be given to this bill when it goes before the standing committee to ensure that full protection is given to the fishermen of British Columbia by defining these territorial waters and by making them include grounds which our fish frequent and where so much effort, time and money has been spent in conserving different species. I also hope that consideration will be given to having the same means of enforcing the regulations applicable on both east and west coasts of this country.

Mr. W. F. Carroll (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to say very much on this particular bill but I do agree with those who say there is a muddle so far as our territorial waters jurisdiction is concerned. I think the time has arrived—it arrived some time ago—when there should be some sort of international convention at least between the United States and Canada regarding jurisdictional limits of the two countries.

I do not like to take up time with particular cases in matters of this kind but I do suggest that, as far as the island of Cape Breton is concerned, we have very poor protective service for our territorial waters. In November, I think it was, three unfortunate fishermen at Petite de Grat, which happens to be in my constituency, lost trawls to the value of some $700. They were wise enough, intelligent enough and observant enough to get the name of one of the American vessels that was there. They made their complaint, as I think they should have done, to the officers in Halifax, and I have no doubt that those officers took the matter up here. Nothing was done about it. I wrote to the department the other day, and I must say that as far as the officials are concerned, in Ottawa and perhaps everywhere, the department is splendidly managed. In my letter I pointed out that these were poor people, that they had small boats—small trawls—and I got an answer to the letter to the effect that the fishing protective boat went out and looked at the situation. It appeared as if the American trawler which had destroyed their nets was within the three-mile limit but the government boat was not sufficiently equipped to indicate, by cross bearings, exactly where the trawlers were. The department said they had another case at Yarmouth, and I think it was the case brought by the hon. member for Digby-Yarmouth (Mr. Kirk). They said that they had asked the Department of External Affairs to warn the United States vessels to keep off our shores.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is good enough. I think there should be some way of reimbursing these people. They have the name of that vessel and there should be some way of reimbursing these poor fishermen without their having to go to the necessity of bringing an action. As a matter of fact, they are not able to do that because of their financial situation.

I have been looking over this bill and I do not know exactly what the department proposes in matters of this kind. Section 6, of course, says:

> Whenever a protection officer suspects on reasonable grounds that an offence against this act has been committed, he may seize
> (a) any fishing vessel—

And so forth. That is all very well when the protective vessel finds the offending vessel within the three-mile limit; but what is going to happen when the vessel goes in there, does damage to these poor fishermen, and then leaves the jurisdiction of Canada? I think something should be done about that.

I am not finding fault with the officials of the Department of Fisheries, but I do rather find fault with the gentleman who wrote me that letter. I wrote back to him and asked him what was the good of having protective vessels on our coast if they were not sufficiently equipped to be able to indicate where the three-mile limit ends or begins. I am bringing this matter to the attention of the minister and I hope something will be done to alleviate the difficulties of these particular men I speak about.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am not finding fault at all with the departmental officers in Ottawa or anywhere else, but I do believe they should at least take a little more interest in such matters as I have brought before this house. I do not know what they have done in the case mentioned by the hon. member for Digby-Yarmouth. I understand that the burden is being put on the people who lost their equipment to bring action against the vessel that destroyed the equipment. Well, I do not think that is good enough, either. I believe there should be some other way of reimbursing people whose equipment, trawls, nets, and so on, have been destroyed by United States trawlers.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): This bill, Mr. Speaker, is described in the explanatory note as one to replace the present Customs and Fisheries Protection Act. For the first time we have the word "coastal" appearing in the title of the bill. It is to be known as the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act. It is described as an act to protect the coastal fisheries. Now, those words "coastal fisheries" are not defined in the act, but there is a reference to Canadian territorial waters. I suggest to Your Honour that the foundation for the whole bill is the definition of Canadian territorial waters. If the definition is not clear, then there is great uncertainty about the whole bill.

It does seem to me that the most important question to be considered by the standing committee on marine and fisheries is this question of what are Canadian territorial waters. It is quite appropriate that that should be decided by the marine and fisheries committee, because "territorial waters" involves our fisheries more than any other activity in the country. I cannot quote from the bill itself, but if hon. members will refer to the interpretation section they will find that there is nothing definite there about this question of Canadian territorial waters. I believe that the only conclusion anyone could reach, if the bill remains as drawn, is that the three-mile limit is to be the test. I do not believe that is satisfactory in the year 1953.

During consideration last year of the draft international convention for the high seas fisheries of the north Pacific ocean, this same committee considered the problem of Canadian territorial waters. The question gave the committee some difficulty, and I notice that in the report tabled on June 10, 1952, there was a reference to that question in these words:

> Your committee was also aware of the great importance of further extending improved international co-operation and good will so that in the near future such matters as the territorial waters' limits, after thorough study and investigation, may be resolved.

I urge that the committee go into this question thoroughly in its sittings during the present session.

The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) has outlined very clearly our wishes concerning the territorial waters of the Pacific coast. We believe that the line should be drawn in such a manner that the water between Vancouver island and the Queen Charlotte islands, which is known as Queen Charlotte sound, and the strait between the Queen Charlotte islands and the mainland of British Columbia which is called Hecate strait, should be declared by Canada to be Canadian territorial waters.

I do not believe we are likely to make much progress in meeting this question of what are and what are not territorial waters unless this committee on marine and fisheries takes the lead. I hope that will be the course followed in the committee during this session.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order. May I remind hon. members that if the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacNaught) speaks now he will close the debate.

Coastal Fisheries

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): I wish to thank all hon. members who have taken part in this debate this afternoon. Their remarks have been very helpful, and will no doubt be useful to the standing committee on marine and fisheries when it considers the bill section by section. Most of the members who took part in this debate agreed that the matters brought up by them were largely matters that could be dealt with only when the bill was referred to the committee.

At this time I wish to state that the minister would have liked to have been able to remain in the house during this debate. Unfortunately, he had to leave to catch a plane. It was remarkable that he had to leave during the remarks by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne), because the plane he was going to catch was one which would take him down to the hon. member's province. I am sure the hon. member will understand the necessity for the minister leaving the chamber while he was speaking.

The hon. member for St. John's West asked that certain policies be defined at this time. I am sure that he will agree that that is not possible. Circumstances will vary from time to time, and it is for that reason the bill is drafted in such a manner that it permits the governor in council to grant permits for foreign fishing vessels to enter our ports. Therefore the hon. member will understand that it is impossible for me to state now what the policy of the government will be under changed circumstances that are bound to arise over the years.

I want to assure the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) that the technical point he raised will be given every consideration by our legal officers. If they have merit, then amendments will be suggested accordingly.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Before the parliamentary assistant resumes his seat, is he in a position to answer the question I asked him as to whether there are any countries which, by treaty, have rights on our coast now? Can he tell me when the act is to come into effect, when it is given the royal assent, or at some future date?

Mr. MacNaught: My understanding is that a bill of this nature comes into effect when it receives the royal assent. On the other question asked, I am afraid that any answer I might give would not have a great deal of value. In my opinion, and it is only my opinion, there are no countries which have rights on our coasts by treaty with the exception of the United States.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson).]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on marine and fisheries.

WATER RESOURCES

ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES FOR CONSERVATION PURPOSES

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize grants of assistance to provinces for the conservation of water resources under the terms and conditions specified in the said measure, such grants not to exceed thirty-seven and one-half per cent of the projects and to be paid out of moneys appropriated by parliament for the above-mentioned purposes; and to provide that all officers, clerks and employees required for carrying out the provisions of the measure shall be appointed in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister make a statement?

Mr. Winters: Hon. members will recall that the federal government has extended financial assistance in the past to various projects of a major character which were designed to conserve the water resources of an area and which also were of benefit in reducing the hazard of serious floods. Among these was the Shand dam in the Grand river watershed in Ontario, where federal government participation through the Department of Public Works from 1939 to 1942 was part of the over-all program designed in part to assist provincial governments in relieving unemployment. In 1950-51 assistance was also extended in the case of the Luther marsh dam, through the Department of Public Works. This dam, also in the Grand river watershed, was regarded as a necessary adjunct to the Shand dam.

In 1951-52, through the engineering and water resources branch of the Department of Resources and Development, the federal government participated in the cost of constructing the Fanshawe dam on the Thames river north of London, and through this department we have also informed the government of Ontario that the federal government will similarly participate in the proposed Glen Allan dam on the Conestogo river. These projects were all considered on their merits. They were regarded as special cases to which federal assistance, on behalf of all the taxpayers of Canada, could reasonably be given because of their nature and magnitude.

The bill referred to in this resolution seeks authority to provide a legislative basis for federal assistance for water conservation projects of a major character across Canada. The projects which would receive assistance under the bill would be, in general, of a similar type to those I have already mentioned, and federal government participation would be considered only upon an appropriate request from the provincial government concerned.

It should be emphasized that the conservation of natural resources within the provinces is primarily a provincial responsibility, and that this proposed bill does not in any way seek to establish any change in jurisdiction or responsibility. The federal government would have no proprietary interest in works towards which it might contribute.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, the outline given by the minister indicates to the house a general conception as to the nature of the assistance to be given under the terms of a bill, the resolution preceding which has just been read by you, sir. The minister went on to explain that it provides for federal assistance to water conservation projects of a major nature and of a general similarity to those to which he made reference. I feel that this is a most important resolution for this country. Apparently within its ambit will come all those water conservation plans for which the provinces will be responsible and to which the federal authority will give assistance because they have federal or national potentialities. Naturally that brings one to a general discussion of the very important subject of water conservation.

All of us will remember, Mr. Speaker, that some years ago we in the province of Saskatchewan were pressing particularly for consideration of the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project. The stand taken by the government, through the Minister of Agriculture, was that in so far as the dam and its construction were concerned they could be considered as a matter of national importance, but the responsibility for irrigation and for providing the facilities for irrigation rested primarily upon the province. The minister has borne out that point of view by his short remarks in introducing the resolution. The only change in attitude that I can see as between that enunciated some years ago by the Minister of Agriculture and that comprised within the terms of this resolution is that in connection with water conservation projects the dominion will now provide thirty-seven per cent of the cost of designated projects.

Since the minister has pointed out some of the projects to which this would apply I naturally conclude that it also covers irrigation from a water project that will assist agriculture particularly.

Mr. Winters: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the bill which is forecast by this resolution does not embrace irrigation projects or irrigation policy. It is designed to further projects of a nature I outlined, and limits its scope to water conservation and those aspects of forest conservation in the watershed area which are an integral part of any water conservation program. I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution will not lead us into a discussion of a project such as that envisaged by the South Saskatchewan development. I think that could more properly be discussed under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act item in the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture, at a time when he is in the house to discuss it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I can understand the applause from the government benches for the argument advanced. I am going to suggest that this resolution should include irrigation as a necessary water project for this country. Whether or not it is included I wish to bring before the house and the country the need of a resolution such as this to be of assistance to irrigation generally throughout the dominion.

Mr. Winters: It is not in this one.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Surely the minister is not going to take the stand that we are to be confined to whatever he defines at the moment as the ambit of the resolution, and be denied the opportunity of presenting the point of view of people generally, and in particular those in the province of Saskatchewan, that such a resolution as this will be either effective or ineffective depending on whether or not water conservation is to include this most important branch, namely irrigation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The minister has risen on a point of order, and he has indicated both in his opening remarks and in the remarks in support of his point of order that this resolution deals with assistance to provinces for the conservation of water resources under the terms and conditions specified in the said measure.

The measure which will follow the adoption of this resolution will further identify the projects. The minister has given a general picture of the type of projects to be considered. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) cannot go beyond the scope of the resolution now before the house. I do not suppose at this stage I should invoke a ruling which was made earlier by Mr. Speaker, but hon. members will recall that a discussion took place —I think it was this session, or perhaps a previous session—as to whether or not a resolution such as this is even debatable. It is debatable, but the debate should address itself to the negative of the motion, which is that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole.

Hon. members will recall that Mr. Speaker asked the co-operation of hon. members at that time. I am not going to apply that ruling, but I will tell the hon. member that in the discussion of the resolution, he cannot go beyond the type of projects which have been identified by the minister in his opening remarks.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, may I speak on the point of order and point out that the ruling by His Honour the Speaker last year was made on June 18, 1952, and is found at page 3375 of Hansard. If hon. members will recall, there was a quite protracted debate on the point of order, which had taken place on several days.

The question as stated was whether or not there could be a debate with Mr. Speaker in the chair. It had nothing whatever to do with the debate that took place after Mr. Speaker left the chair. It was purely a matter of opening up that debate; and the ruling was as follows:

> After giving this matter my careful consideration I have come to the conclusion that if there is no objection to the consideration of the resolution in committee of the whole, the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair should be put without debate. If any members are opposed to the resolution, and do not think that it should even be considered in the committee of the whole, or if they require additional information before agreeing to the motion, they should be given an opportunity to speak on the motion. The minister should endeavour to answer the objections which have been raised and to give the information requested.

The minister did not raise the point that there should be no debate in this case. The minister rose in his place and made his statement. And, having done so, I submit that any hon. member is free to get up and point out his objection to the resolution, and to make a speech such as the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has been doing.

The resolution reads:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize grants of assistance to provinces for the conservation of water resources under the terms and conditions specified in the said measure—

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

And so on. Surely I am entitled to get up and say that I believe this measure should be broad enough to include a scheme for British Columbia, for instance, and that we are not to be met with a ruling by Your Honour that the minister can say that the bill when it comes in will not have anything in it referring to British Columbia, and that therefore the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra cannot say anything about such a scheme.

A ruling of that kind by Your Honour, I submit, would restrict the debate entirely out of all reason. And I submit the hon. member for Lake Centre is within his rights in discussing conservation measures on the South Saskatchewan river which he believes should be undertaken under this plan.

One reason we should be allowed to do it is that we always have hope that, as a result of representations we make to the government, the bill may be changed; that provision may be made to meet our suggestions. But if we are to be met in every case with the statement by the minister, "Your suggestion has not any value, and therefore you must keep still," surely that ruins the whole efficacy of debate at this stage.

I submit the hon. member for Lake Centre is perfectly in order in making his suggestion with regard to water conservation on the South Saskatchewan river.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I did not think the question would be brought up at this time. However, I recall the discussion that took place when it was brought up by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and the ruling given by Mr. Speaker. At that time we had a committee, as we have right now, to consider the procedure of the house. At this session we did not think any member would take the position that we should reverse what was done at the last session.

Forgetting for the moment that you are a lawyer, it will be noted that the motion is that Mr. Speaker do leave the chair, and that he leave the chair for some purpose. That purpose is to consider—what? It is to consider a resolution. The actual motion is not to consider the resolution; it is that Mr. Speaker do leave the chair, and that the committee consider the resolution.

For anyone who is not a lawyer this is the simplest language I can use.

Mr. Knowles: Who is being the lawyer now?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am speaking like an ordinary member of parliament, and I think anyone who is listening will understand my simple language. I will put the question to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green): When I move that Mr. Speaker do leave the chair—

Mr. Knowles: What for?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): To go into committee.

Mr. Knowles: What for?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): —so that the committee—and you are just completing my sentences—so that the committee may consider certain proposals in the resolution, the motion is not that the house should consider the resolution at this time, but rather that the committee of the whole house should consider it. When I say this I am not being technical in the use of either the English or the French language. It is just so the ordinary man and woman in the country will understand what I am saying.

You gentlemen say: "Oh, no; you have a resolution on the order paper which reads—so and so. We are bound to have that discussion while Mr. Speaker is in the chair." That is your point of view. Why do you want the discussion at this time? Let the motion that Mr. Speaker do leave the chair be put now, and in a minute the hon. member for Lake Centre will want to be on his feet. He can make all the statements he wishes to make, so long as they are relevant to the resolution. And, in committee, if what he says is not relevant, Mr. Chairman will call him to order, because he is familiar with the procedure.

But why all this argument, that you wish to have Mr. Speaker in the chair to consider something that is not before him? There is no resolution or motion before the chair right now, except the one that he do leave the chair to consider something?

Mr. Green: What is he to consider?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The resolution; but not with Mr. Speaker in the chair. The chairman, in committee of the whole, is to consider it. That is all we are doing. If we asked to consider the resolution while Mr. Speaker was in the chair, probably we would use that language. But we are not using it. And we would have to change the rule to permit debate at this stage on the resolution, because it is not before Mr. Speaker at all.

Mr. Green: May I ask—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Would you be patient enough to let me conclude? Perhaps if I were in the opposition I might argue something like the hon. member is doing. What you gentlemen want is a discussion, with Mr. Speaker in the chair, of the whole field of water conservation. If you have some pet project or something in mind, that is what you want to discuss. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has just mentioned that he wants to speak about the South Saskatchewan development; he wants to speak about irrigation; he wants to speak about power development.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is misinterpreting what I want to discuss. The South Saskatchewan irrigation project is something that should be discussed under this resolution, and that is what the minister is trying to prevent my doing.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We agree. That is what I am saying, that the hon. gentleman wants to discuss the South Saskatchewan irrigation and power development.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not power development; irrigation and water conservation.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): All right, irrigation if you will. If I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to tell me what the motion is I know you will say: "It is moved by the Minister of Resources and Development that I do now leave the chair."

Mr. Green: To consider such and such.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker will not consider it; it will be the committee of the whole with the chairman presiding. You do not consider this with Mr. Speaker in the chair. I understand that what you want to do is to discuss with Mr. Speaker in the chair something that is not before the chair, and then you want to repeat that same discussion in committee of the whole.

Mr. Green: The minister is not making the decision as to what we want to do.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I have seen so many of your decisions in the past that I can read your mind clearly right now. I am sure you will not contradict this statement.

Mr. Green: I will contradict you right now.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Parliamentary procedure under our standing orders say that there should not be redundancy and repetition. This is not a Sunday school or a school, it is a parliament. I think it should satisfy any member of parliament to discuss and debate a matter at length at the right stage of the procedure. I am not going to take up too much time, as perhaps hon. members would be through with their debate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would my hon. friend permit a question? Would it be proper in committee of the whole to discuss the South Saskatchewan river dam?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): When we get to that bridge we will not burn it, we will try to cross it or not cross it. When we are in committee of the whole will be the time to take up that question. The committee on procedure discussed this problem at length, although I know that opinions were divided. If you want to follow the standing orders as they are now I do not think you can debate the merits of the resolution at this stage.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before the debate goes any further perhaps I may be allowed to say a word arising out of the remarks made a moment ago by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). He referred to a ruling that I had mentioned earlier which was made by Mr. Speaker and which appears in Votes and Proceedings of June 18, 1952. The point as to whether or not a debate should take place with Mr. Speaker in the chair is not at issue, because debate has taken place. The Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) has not made a point of it. He made a statement and the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) rose and was delivering a speech when he was interrupted by the minister rising on a point of order. His point of order was as to the extent to which debate would be allowed on this resolution. That is the second point which was covered by Mr. Speaker's ruling of June 18, 1952, and I quote from page 534 of Votes and Proceedings as follows:

> The question on which there is some difference of opinion is the extent to which debate is to be allowed. This question was considered by Mr. Speaker Glen on the 23rd February, 1942 (Hansard p. 800). At that time he ruled that the debate should be directed to the negative of the motion and should be general with no reference to details.

This is the point at issue at the moment. The motion before the house is that the Speaker do now leave the chair; and according to Mr. Speaker Glen's ruling and Mr. Speaker Macdonald's ruling of June 18, 1952, the debate should be directed to the negative of the motion, that is, that I should not leave the chair for the house to consider the advisability of making the expenditures contemplated by the resolution and by the measure which is to follow the resolution.

Now, what is the limitation that the Speaker should apply when this point is raised as to the extent to which debate is to be allowed? The debate should be directed to the negative. The minister has said that the measure which will follow this resolution will deal with, and he mentioned one, two, three, four, five dam projects. I do not recall the names of the projects that he mentioned, but I was listening carefully when he was mentioning them. The resolution which is before us provides for various grants of assistance to provinces for the conservation of water resources under the terms and conditions specified in the said measure.

This is where the limitation on debate is to be found, as I understand it. I do not want to bar hon. members from discussing projects they would like to discuss, but I am bound by the rules. As I understand the situation and as it has been explained, I must ask the hon. member not to go beyond the scope of the projects which are contemplated here and to direct his remarks to the negative of the motion which is that I do now leave the chair.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, may I point out that that ruling might be correct if the resolution had referred to the five dam projects, but it does not do that at all. It refers in general to the conservation of water resources. Your Honour is now ruling on the basis that the minister can get up and virtually say that this resolution is to cover only the five projects. Surely that is not right. Since in the course of this debate we still will have to decide whether or not we believe Your Honour should leave the chair, we are entitled to have a debate on the resolution in order that we may know whether or not we believe it is right that you should leave the chair. It may be that the resolution is too restricted and for that reason we might be well advised to vote against it; but to cut off debate or restrict debate in this way by allowing the minister to get up and say that the bill is going to refer to certain projects only and therefore we can discuss those particular projects only, I submit is not within reason. For example, I have here a report of the minister—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I may interrupt the hon. member to say that what he has just said has convinced me more than anything else that whoever advocates that no debate should take place at this stage is right. If the hon. member will read the Speaker's ruling, to which he referred a moment ago, he will see that it was as follows:

> At that time he ruled that the debate should be directed to the negative of the motion and should be general with no reference to details.

Mr. Green: That was overruled.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member will look at the rule he will see that in a money resolution no reference is made to the details of the measure which is to come later. In other words, a resolution which precedes a money bill is one which indicates only briefly what the measure is going to be. The resolution provides an opportunity for hon. members to decide whether it is advisable for the Speaker to leave the chair to consider the resolution, that is all.

Mr. Knowles: There are a few words that I would like to say on the point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will consider this further but I doubt whether I will change my opinion. As it is five o'clock we will now consider private and public bills.

CRIMINAL CODE

LIABILITY OF DIRECTORS OR OFFICERS OF CORPORATIONS

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 6, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Combines Investigation Act (liability of directors).—Mr. Argue.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, since this bill was first drafted certain changes have been made both in the Criminal Code and the Combines Investigation Act, and I am advised that the bill should be drawn in a somewhat different manner. If it is agreeable to the house, I would ask permission to withdraw the bill for the purpose of redrafting it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to withdraw his bill at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT TO ELIMINATE LEVEL CROSSINGS IN FUTURE CONSTRUCTION

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo) moved the second reading of Bill No. 106, to amend the Railway Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is one which should have been introduced in the house many years ago. As a very young boy in the province of Ontario I remember witnessing the death of a neighbour at a level crossing. He was a very fine old gentleman with a large family. He was proceeding to town with his team and there was a light snowstorm. The train bore down upon him and he met his death. I suppose since that date twenty others have died at the same crossing. One of the advantages of coming a long distance to attend the House of Commons is that as one travels across Canada one sees very many phases of the life of the country, and the level crossing menace is one which is growing more horrible as the days go by.

At the town of Deroche in British Columbia there is a level crossing, and thirty years ago a whole family of six was killed there. That was the Macdonald family who were descendants of John Sandfield Macdonald, a great man in Canada at the time of confederation and before. The mother and her family of six were wiped out at that crossing, and every year since fatal accidents have been occurring at the level crossing at Deroche. It is all right to give a great deal of attention to the raising of freight rates and the salaries of the employees of the railways. These are very necessary things, and as important matters they must be dealt with. But it is equally important that we should give more attention to the protection of the lives of the people of Canada so far as level crossings are concerned. I believe there is a field there where the leaders of the labour unions should take a very active part in arousing public opinion.

I have a letter here from a mother whose little girl was killed at a level crossing in Ontario at a point near Woodstock. If I were to read it to the house it would bring tears to the eyes of all present, especially those who have children of their own. It is a crossing which is not properly protected. I have noticed that boards of trade and other public-spirited groups across the country have erected crosses at level crossings to mark where fatal accidents have occurred.

I was in the county of Perth the other day and while there had occasion to notice a particular crossing near the residence of the member for that beautiful constituency. We got over it safely, but it is a very dangerous crossing. It is elevated high above the level of the surrounding countryside. I am enough of an engineer to believe that the cost of putting a subway under the track would be less than it cost to provide the earth fill necessary to raise the pavement up to the level of the track.

I have made some inquiries as to the number of fatal accidents in Canada last year, and I find that in the first ten months of 1952 the total number of people injured at level crossings was 453. Of this number 166 were killed and the total number of accidents was 357. Some of those involved died and some were crippled for life. That was the harvest in the first ten months of 1952 at level crossings throughout Canada.

I am eager to assist the construction of better transportation facilities in every way, and I know that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) works day and night towards the same end. In British Columbia we managed after some years to persuade the government of the province, assisted by the government of Canada, to extend the Pacific Great Eastern Railway into the northern part of the province. In November of last year eighty miles of construction were completed and a celebration was held at the city of Prince George to mark the institution of rail service from the south over the P.G.E.

I know that hon. members have heard me refer many times to that railway and the need of extending it farther north, even to Alaska. I think we are all pretty well agreed now that it should be done, and even the Social Credit government of British Columbia has pledged itself to extend the railway. I personally have championed the extension of the Pacific Great Eastern for thirty years or more, and now we have an extension of eighty miles from Quesnel to the crossing of the Fraser river at Prince George. Before they started construction I said: Surely we can avoid level crossings on this splendid new rail line we are opening up in the northern part of British Columbia. Well, they thought they could and then they thought they could not.

I travelled over the line recently, and I believe there are twelve level crossings in the eighty miles. In other words, twelve opportunities are provided to reduce the number of citizens of the Cariboo by fatal accidents at level crossings.

I notice from the estimates that the government spends $1 million a year to eliminate or reduce the hazard of certain level crossings. I know it would be a very big undertaking to remove all level crossings in Canada because there are many thousands of them, but I suggest to the house it would be a very easy matter to pass the bill and start afresh on the problem. We could help to solve the problem by not allowing any more level crossings to be built where new construction is involved. It is just as simple as that.

I doubt if it would add very substantially to the cost of building railways if engineers were instructed to avoid level crossings, and we would establish the principle that to build another death trap, another level crossing, would be a violation of the statute law of this country. We are building highways in the north and west and all over this country. This bill, I hope, will also make unlawful the construction of a new highway over a railway and certainly the construction of a new railway over a highway.

You may say that the age of railways is fast coming to a close, but I think that is far from the truth. We will be building hundreds of miles of railway in Canada long after hon. gentlemen who are listening to me now are out of this house and probably called to their reward; because the very nature of our country will call for the construction of railways.

[Mr. Murray (Cariboo).]

I would say that the riding which I represent in this house is larger than that part of Ontario which lies south of a line through Sudbury and Port Arthur. Our population, of course, is scattered and there is room in that great area of Canada, in the adjoining riding of Skeena and in the Yukon, for a very large population. I visualize a day when the largest percentage of the people in British Columbia will live north of Prince George. The land is certainly there, with broad valleys and all the natural resources—mineral resources, oil, natural gas and so on. This matter of the construction of railways is very important and of considerable public interest today in my community.

There is a project designed to extend the Northern Alberta Railways westward from Hines Creek into British Columbia and on toward the area I referred to. It is not something that will be done in the dim and distant future. It is something that should be done as quickly as we can do it, because the area is already settled. In one area people are hauling their goods one hundred miles or so to the railway, even one hundred and twenty miles, trying to make a success of farming. They are hauling their goods farther than it is from here to Montreal. I need not say that construction of that bit of road would be sound business. It should be done at once, and when it is done it will be one of the most profitable sections of the Northern Alberta system.

How ridiculous it would be, Mr. Speaker, to proceed with the building of that railway and to build level crossings there so that farmers going to market would be compelled to face the hazard of death and disaster at those level crossings.

As I understand it, the first railway in western Ontario was built 101 years ago. Sir Francis Hincks, a famous man in Upper Canada in those days, was the promoter of that railway. I would like to have a list of the casualties that have occurred at level crossings between Sarnia and Hamilton or between Sarnia and Niagara Falls. The figure would be atrocious. Of course railways are always built on the best and most level property; they are built where the population is dense and by the very nature of things where traffic is greatest.

We have made so much headway in so many lines of endeavour, yet in the simple matter of protecting our people from the hazards of level crossings we remain practically as we were at the time of Sir Francis Hincks. At some crossings there is very little or no protection. At others there are rather expensive warning signals installed. I would like to see the most modern devices established at each level crossing. The electric eye sort of thing might be brought into play. Down at Windsor station in Montreal the C.P.R. has installed electric beams so that when we go there with our grips our very passing opens the door. Similarly on existing level crossings modern electronics could very easily be employed to make them safer.

This bill which we have before us will ensure that on new construction the menace of level crossings will vanish for all time in Canada. I hope and pray that all hon. members of this house, irrespective of party, will get behind it, get it into committee, and assist in having it put upon the statute books of our country.

Mr. J. H. Harrison (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have made a short study of the bill which is before us and upon which the hon. gentleman, the member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray), has been speaking. Some of the figures I have found may be of interest to the house. In all there are some 32,000 crossings in Canada, of which about 12 per cent are protected by lights or gates of some kind or another. In other words, about 3,840 are protected crossings and about 28,160 are not protected.

The bill envisages the protection of crossings that are to be built in future by making it compulsory for highways to go under or over rail lines, or parallel to them if the former is not possible. Well, Mr. Speaker, our main lines are built already, and there will not be any great change in our cross-country mode of transportation as far as railways are concerned. In short, the most hazardous crossings already exist and for them this bill does not envisage any protection, but only for those that may be constructed in the future.

So far as the riding of Meadow Lake is concerned, we are interested in the completion of a couple of short lines, and we would be pleased if we could have them completed with regular crossings. However, that is not my main criticism of this bill.

I have looked into the statistics regarding deaths and accidents, and I am quite aware of the toll inflicted on the people of this country. The bill is aimed in a very desirable direction, I agree. However, I do not think it meets the situation, and I would like to read into the record some of the figures I obtained regarding accidents last year. There were in all 357 accidents at level crossings in the first ten months of 1952. I think the hon. member for Cariboo said that 166 people were killed and 453 were injured. Statistically they do not consider it an accident unless there has been an injury or death connected with the occurrence. A breakdown of the figures shows:

Province	Total number of accidents	Total number of people killed	Total number of people injured
Newfoundland	3	—	5
Prince Edward Island	2	—	3
Nova Scotia	11	8	12
New Brunswick	14	8	19
Quebec	70	43	84
Ontario	152	70	193
Manitoba	19	7	23
Saskatchewan	26	14	27
Alberta	39	7	62
British Columbia	21	9	25
	357	166	453

(Highway crossing accidents, 10 month period January 1, 1952, to October 31, 1952.)

This is a sorry record, and if the bill introduced by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr Murray) were reworded or had some more research done on it, I believe it might be of some help. It is aimed in the right direction

However, the main thing in connection with this matter is that some cognizance has been taken of the difficulty by this government. On January 14, P.C. 1953/52 was presented by the governor general in council to the board of transport commissioners. It was framed in the following terms:

Whereas the railway-highway crossing problem in Canada as a result of expanding motor vehicle traffic and improved highways has become one of national concern in respect of the present need for protection, safety and convenience of the public

And whereas it is deemed to be in the public interest that an inquiry be made into all matters involved in the problem of railway-highway crossings which come under the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada;

And whereas section 38 of the Railway Act provides that the governor in council may at any time refer to the board of transport commissioners for a report, or other action, any question, matter or thing arising or required to be done under the Railway Act or any other act of the parliament of Canada.

Therefore, His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Transport and under and by virtue of section 38 of the Railway Act, is pleased to direct and doth hereby direct that the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada make an investigation and report on all phases of the problem of railway-highway crossings which are under the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada in respect of the present and prospective need for the protection, safety and convenience of the public, and without limiting the generality of the foregoing the board shall

(a) conduct a survey and report on the method considered by the board to be practicable under all pertinent circumstances of eliminating the hazards and improving the public convenience and the protection and safety of the public at such crossings;

Railway Act

(b) review and report on the adequacy of the railway grade crossing fund to provide for the construction of works for the protection, safety and convenience of the public in respect of railway-highway crossings; and

(c) make such recommendations as the board may deem advisable in the premises.

That covers the crossings over which the federal government may have some control. I believe there may be some doubt as to whether or not this bill infringes provincial rights. In section (2b), the bill says:

After the 1st July, 1953, no highway shall be constructed across a railway unless it be carried over or under such railway.

Highways are under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments or municipalities, as the case may be, and very few are under federal jurisdiction. If this section of the bill were enacted I believe we would be infringing the rights of the provinces or municipalities. It is a well known fact that when a railroad seeks to close a crossing the permission of the municipality or province is sought, thereby recognizing their rights in the matter. As I say, therefore, we may be infringing provincial or municipal rights in this bill.

Since P.C. 1953/52, which I read to the house, refers this matter to the board of transport commissioners there may be some question as to whether or not we should be discussing the subject at all. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that with the information before us we would be well advised to await the outcome of the report which the privy council has requested of the board of transport commissioners. This board is best equipped to look into the matter and get all the information upon which a proper bill could be based, one that would cover us to the ultimate limits that we could be covered.

I hope the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) does not take it that I am opposed to his bill for any other reasons than those which I have stated. I do feel that we would be well advised to await the report of the board of transport commissioners before taking any further action.

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): The hon. member who has introduced this bill, Mr. Speaker, comes from a wonderful part of this country where most of the development is still in the future. No doubt he wants to have that development follow a proper course, and thereby eliminate some of these hazards of life caused by railroads and highways. He is to be commended for introducing this amendment to the Railway Act. When the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) was so vividly describing the north country just now, the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne), who was listening very attentively, asked me if the hon. member was speaking about Halifax. Well, that is understandable, since they both recently visited Halifax.

Outside of this 155-mile railway into northern Manitoba, there is very little railway extension in progress. There is not likely to be much unless it is for the purpose of opening up new mining areas or areas where the immigration authorities want to have the country settled. The total cost of this 155-mile railroad is something in the vicinity of $14 million, and the railroad is expected to be completed within a few months. I have been led to believe that in the construction of this railroad special care has been taken to see that diversions have been made where necessary, and that there are as few level crossings as possible. This shows, of course, that the authorities now building railroads are very conscious of the need, and are building them as they should in 1953.

I said that this railroad might be the only one, but there are railroads to the mining areas in Seven Islands. There are no roads there, so the problem of level crossings does not arise. In speaking of the expansion of railroads, I think very little would be done unless it could be shown that it would be a paying proposition for the railroads. We must not forget that since 1923 the Canadian National has incurred 23 substantial deficits.

This bill should have been introduced about forty years ago when the automobile was just coming into popular use. Perhaps it would have been introduced at that time had the hon. member been in the house, but as we look at him we can see that he was a mere boy at that time. If former members of this house had been as conscious of the need for the elimination of these level crossings as is the hon. member for Cariboo, we would not find the conditions that exist today in the great city of Moncton, New Brunswick, where ten dangerous level crossings were created by the railways. Of those ten no fewer than eight are right in the centre of the city. In addition to these level crossings there are two ugly eyesores, overhead bridges. What these level crossings have done to the city of Moncton is to restrict its growth.

We in Nova Scotia are fully conscious of the menace of level crossings. A few years ago, on the railroad running from Halifax down to the southern shore toward the home of the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) a distance of some 40 miles, there were no fewer than 21 crossings. Every one of those crossings was a potential killer. But the Canadian National Railways, being a progressive company, has eliminated a number of these crossings, and the department of highways of Nova Scotia have co-operated with the railway in that regard. On the railroad run from Halifax to Annapolis there are at least ten railway crossings, and each and every one of them is very dangerous. I think I am safe in saying that on each one of these crossings there has been an accident in which people have been killed, and in some instances five in one family.

Then we have a railway line known as the Dominion Atlantic railroad which is a subsidiary of the Canadian Pacific. In time its crossings will be taken out either because of the widening of the highway by the provincial government or by some other means by co-operation between the provincial highway department and the Dominion Atlantic railroad.

Perhaps the hon. member's amendments should have included certain "musts" where particularly dangerous crossings exist, because the aim of this legislation is to cut down the fatalities and of course to some extent to speed up traffic, but the latter is only secondary to the saving of lives.

It is evident that the railways are anxious to co-operate because away back in 1909 the railway grade crossing fund was established. Through this fund federal assistance was provided for the protection, safety and convenience of the public where a railway and highway cross each other at the same level.

Those of you who were in parliament from 1930 to 1939 recall the large sum of money appropriated to eliminate level crossings as an unemployment relief measure. If the legislation introduced by the hon. member goes into effect money will be saved in various ways, through the elimination of signs, cattle crossings or guards, improvements of the site lines, flashing lights, bells and grade separation. From 1909 to 1947 approximately $44 million was spent on this work, and of this amount $12 million was contributed by the federal government or governments to this grade crossing fund or voted for unemployment relief. The railways paid $16,500,000, while the highway authorities paid something like $10 million. These sums of course are exclusive of the operating and maintenance costs, the costs of widening, improving or maintaining the existing rights of way and overhead bridges.

Sections 256 and 257 of the Railway Act vest power in the board of transport commissioners to order the elimination of grade crossings or their protection whenever it deems such to be necessary on grounds of public safety. Therefore we see that they are really doing something to cut down the number of deaths.

Since we are talking of level crossings, possibly this might be a good time to revive the matter of the completion of the old Guysborough railroad; for here we have an old bed already built, and what is more important, the engineers when preparing the plans of this railroad were farsighted enough to provide for overhead bridges or diversions. Unfortunately this railroad was never completed.

I hope I am in order in mentioning this, Mr. Speaker, because had that railroad been completed that particular part of Nova Scotia might now be enjoying part of the prosperity so prevalent in Canada today. Perhaps the hon. member for Cariboo, who visited Nova Scotia last summer, has decided that the Guysborough railroad should be completed. If he has, then I assure him that he will have the full and hearty support of all members from my province as he will have in regard to his bill to amend the Railway Act.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): We are in sympathy with the purpose which we believe the sponsor had in mind when he had the notice of this bill placed on the order paper. I may say that we are not too certain that this may be the most feasible, the most practicable, method of approach. We shall hear what the minister has to say in that regard. Certainly when one reads the statistics respecting railway crossing tragedies he cannot help but conclude that a responsibility rests upon us here to do whatever can be done in an effort to contribute toward the lowering of the number of these tragedies.

I am convinced that we can, through the removal of a great many of the level crossings, help to reduce the number of accidents that occur. It seems to me that a great deal of emphasis must be laid upon the importance of safety campaigns, and the assumption on the part of individual drivers of a greater share of responsibility than many of them up to this time have indicated they are prepared to accept.

After all, what constitutes a dangerous crossing? Frequently we refer to a crossing as being dangerous if the records show that a certain number of deaths have occurred through accidents at that crossing. But the evidence indicates that, conceivably in a majority of cases, those tragedies have occurred on level, open crossings where in many instances visibility extends a mile in either direction. I fully realize that the removal of as many level crossings as possible will assist in solving the problem, but certainly we must also make efforts in other directions, perhaps through educational campaigns.

The bill refers to highways, but I think it is important to keep in mind that provincial governments in Canada have recognized the necessity of removing as many level crossings as possible when they have rebuilt or constructed highways. Everywhere in Canada there is evidence to indicate that the provinces are assuming responsibilities in that direction.

The hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Harrison) has mentioned the question of jurisdiction. It may prove to be an important point so far as the legality of a bill of this kind is concerned.

As I have said, we certainly support the purpose the sponsor of the bill has in mind. We think it is an absolute tragedy that people will continue to drive into the sides of trains, that in some instances they will pass a line of standing traffic and drive into an approaching train, and this has happened more than once. We know that on occasions they will drive up to a level crossing, stop, and then start across, only to be hit by an approaching train.

It occurs to me that a substantial contribution to a solution will be found in a greater acceptance of responsibility on the part of drivers, through educational and other campaigns that can be carried on. We support the purpose of the bill. However, we would like to hear the minister's views before indicating whether we would or would not support this particular bill.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are all hoping that the minister will speak to the bill, and indicate the view of the government. However, pending the possibility of his speaking, may I take just a moment to say that we are in sympathy with the purposes of this bill. The difficulties in connection with it are obvious, and have been stated. But our hope is that the fact that there may be difficulties will not result in the house following the course of least resistance and talking the bill out.

It seems to us it would be far better to have the matter referred to some appropriate committee so the question can be fully studied. If there are sections which infringe upon provincial rights and which need to be modified or eliminated, then let us have that matter gone into. If the general direction set out in the bill needs to be modified in any way, let us have that studied as well. I hope, however, that the commendable purpose behind the bill will not be thrown out completely, and that the measure will not be voted down without any further consideration.

I think the minister should know before he makes his speech—and I hope he is going to make it—that it would seem that the house generally is sympathetic with the purposes behind the proposed legislation.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, may I say briefly that I am in sympathy with the principle behind this bill. I realize, however, that in many instances tremendous costs would be involved if we were to try to construct overhead bridges and underpasses at all necessary points in the Dominion of Canada.

Both the Canadian Pacific Railway and Canadian National Railways, as well as the trans-Canada highway, pass through my riding. This means that there are a great many crossings. I am sorry the bill does not mention the installation of wigwags on all county and provincial highways, because I believe to a great extent that would eliminate the trouble. It has been proven that where wigwags have been used the accident problem has been eliminated to a considerable extent. Of course there are always some people who will drive against a wigwag signal and be killed. I think, however, that the system of wigwags could be extended and would overcome much of our difficulty.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house will be grateful to the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) for having introduced the principle of the bill, and for having brought once again to the attention of the house the very serious matters with which it deals. I believe the house is quite familiar with the question, because it has been discussed not only in debates on private bills but in debates on the estimates for the Department of Transport, as well as on other occasions.

One of the most serious problems with which we have to deal today is that of railway-highway grade crossings. It is a subject which has engaged the attention not only of people here in Canada but, before that, of experts and specialists in the United States, where the problem is far more serious than it is here.

I commend the hon. member for his desire to deal with this matter, but I must say to him with all respect that the amendment to the section of the Railway Act which he suggests does not begin to deal seriously with the problem. The government saw fit early in the year, as was stated by the hon. member for Meadow Lake, to ask the board of transport commissioners to study the whole problem of railway grade crossings. It gave the board full power, as set out in order in council P.C. 1953/52, to make a complete and thorough investigation and study. I think it would be no compliment to the board of transport commissioners if at this stage the house were to say to it that it should do as set out in the bill.

Then there are several objections to the bill. The first I see is that it makes the implementation of this section mandatory upon the board. In other words the board would be obliged to force the railways to construct a grade separation after July 1, 1953, upon any application that was made. As it is today, the board has that power under the act. It is a discretion it has, and that discretion should not be taken away; because if it were taken away there would be no way of determining which crossing should have priority because of density of traffic or density of population or because of location.

With the section the way it is worded now I can see a situation where in an isolated part of Canada, at a place where there was little traffic, a railroad would be forced, perhaps in conjunction with the highway authorities, the municipalities and the like, to spend a large sum of money to separate a grade when there was little or no need for such separation in that particular area. I can think of a railroad building a spur line into an area which might cross a highway where there would be little or no traffic—this happens repeatedly—and the grade crossing fund or even the municipality and the railroad would be charged with the expenditure of a substantial sum of money when the grade separation was not really required.

Another objectionable feature is the mandatory provision. The board now has discretion, and it seems to me that it should continue to have discretion in these cases. I wish I had more time to deal with this matter because if I had I would make reference to a study that has been made of the railway-highway grade crossing problem by A. Kenneth Beggs of the Stanford research institute. This is an excellent document which goes into the problem very thoroughly. It gives the causes of accidents and in a series of excellent theses it proposes solutions to the problem.

The problem is a serious one. If we were to eliminate all grade crossings in Canada the sum of $100 million would barely suffice. If I had the time at my disposal I would deal with some of the causes responsible for the increase of accidents, and I would deal in part with the solutions suggested.

I think the hon. member is to be complimented upon his attempt to find a solution. In his anxiety to eliminate these accidents he has submitted this amendment to the house. I know the amendment is well-intentioned, but it deals only with a small portion of the problem. In order to deal with the whole problem the government has asked the board of transport commissioners, which because of its statutory powers is able to consider problems of this kind, to make a thorough survey of the railway-highway grade crossing problem in Canada. When the board has made its report it will then be possible to bring down amendments to the Railway Act and perhaps the grade crossing fund. It will be possible to consult the provinces, because I think perhaps one of these sections impinges upon provincial jurisdiction.

I should like to say more on this subject, but it seems to me that I have said enough to indicate to the house that it would not be advisable to accept the bill in its present form. I would hope that the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray), having succeeded in raising interest in the subject and knowing that the matter is being studied by the board of transport commissioners, would see fit under all these circumstances to withdraw the bill.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I think some good has been done by ventilating this subject, as the minister has said. Were I a member of the bar, perhaps a leader of the bar as are some of my colleagues, I would have presented a bill which would have met every point raised by the minister. I did my best as a layman. I have brought the bill forward, and I assure you that if I am spared to be returned to this house following the next election I shall bring in another bill. After consulting with eminent legal talent—and I may bring you into it, Mr. Speaker—I shall try to present a bill which will meet with the approval not only of the members of the house but of the government.

I thank the minister for his kindly consideration of this effort, which will be repeated later on. With the consent of hon. gentlemen, I ask that the bill be withdrawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Has the hon. gentleman leave to withdraw the said bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): The hour for private and public bills having expired, at eight o'clock the house will resume the business it was considering at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

WATER RESOURCES

ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES FOR CONSERVATION PURPOSES

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Winters that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize grants of assistance to provinces for the conservation of water resources under the terms and conditions specified in the said measure, such grants not to exceed thirty-seven and a half per cent of the projects and to be paid out of moneys appropriated by parliament for the above mentioned purposes; and to provide that all officers, clerks and employees required for carrying out the provisions of the measure shall be appointed in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. Knowles: Yes, Your Honour. Just before five o'clock, Mr. Speaker, we were in the midst of a considerable discussion with respect to procedure, and if I may say so it seems to me that a fair amount of confusion was developing due to the fact that two different points were under discussion. I wish to state what these two points are solely for the purpose of separating them. Having done that, I intend to direct my remarks to but one of these points, namely, the one that I feel—and I think Your Honour will agree with me—is important for the purposes of the present situation.

The point of order that was raised in the first instance this afternoon was that raised by the Minister of Resources and Development, who questioned whether any discussion with respect to the South Saskatchewan river project could be entertained under the terms of the resolution now before us. I take it the minister would raise that point of order at any stage with respect to this legislation. I wish to say now that that is the point of order about which I am most concerned. During the discussion that followed the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra or the Minister of Public Works—

I do not know which one started it—they often start things together; they are good pals at that—

Mr. Diefenbaker: And they read each other's mind.

Mr. Knowles: As the hon. member for Lake Centre says, they read each other's mind.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I might tell the hon. member that the point he has just mentioned is really the only one that concerns me.

Mr. Knowles: I agree, but perhaps since we are agreed on that Your Honour might let me say a word with respect to the other point, mainly to emphasize what you have said, sir, that I do not think it should be imported into this discussion at this time. The reason I say that is that it has been suggested that the whole question of whether or not we should have debates with the Speaker in the chair on a resolution preceding a money bill should be discussed by the committee on procedure. I have very strong views on it, as the house knows. With all respect, I do not agree with the decision made by Mr. Speaker on the matter earlier, but let us treat it as sub judice until the committee on procedure has dealt with it. So far as this debate is concerned, Your Honour permitted the minister to speak to the resolution and Your Honour likewise permitted the hon. member for Lake Centre to speak to it, so there is no question of our being allowed to debate the matter with the Speaker in the chair. That point is not at issue so far as this debate is concerned.

Thus we have cleared the ground with respect to that question, and we are down to the issue on which there is a difference of opinion and on which I take it Your Honour feels called upon to make a ruling. That is the question of whether or not in the discussion on the resolution moved by the Minister of Resources and Development it is proper and relevant to discuss matters relating to any aspect of the South Saskatchewan river project.

I should like to look at it first of all, Mr. Speaker, in a very plain manner, like the Minister of Public Works. The wording of the resolution refers clearly to the conservation of water resources. It seems to me that, unless the resolution itself narrows the projects for the conservation of water resources to certain specific ones, it should be in order to discuss any matter that any member of the house feels should be dealt with under the heading of the conservation of water resources. Your Honour has made reference to the fact that the Minister of Resources and Development said that when we get the bill —we have not got it now—it will specify certain definite projects. But we are not on the bill; we are on the resolution. In fact we are not permitted to know what is in the bill at this stage of the debate. All we have to go on is the wording of the resolution itself.

That wording is very clear. It deals with the question of the conservation of water resources. I would point out that, although the citations in the authorities on procedure are not too explicit or clear on the point, there are a number of references that come pretty close to dealing with this question. For example, in citations 439 and 440, as well as others, in Beauchesne's third edition we find it suggested that if the resolution is drawn in general terms without placing any limitation on the amount of money to be spent, it is in order to move amendments to the bill based on the resolution but going further, provided they do not exceed any other limitations in the resolution itself.

The minister can argue all he wants about what is in the bill. We have not got the bill. We have only the resolution and the resolution does not place any limitation on the amount of money to be spent. Neither does it place any limitation on the kinds, classes or categories of projects which would implement the general aim, to conserve water resources. As a matter of fact, not only does the resolution fail to fix any limit as to the amount of money, but it is worded very strangely. It says, "such grants not to exceed 37½ per cent of the projects". What the minister means by that I do not know.

Mr. Winters: I can clear that up in a moment. It should read "37½ per cent of the cost of the project".

Mr. Knowles: That is a correction that certainly should have been made long ago. But even when you have made that correction there is still no reference to the total amount of money to be spent. There is still no reference which limits the kind of project that can be brought in under the general heading, conservation of water resources. It may well be that members of the house might feel—for the moment I am speaking hypothetically rather than in terms of substance —that projects such as that on the South Saskatchewan river should be brought under this heading and should be dealt with under legislation of this kind, and since the resolution does not rule out projects of this kind I do not see how members of the house can be stopped from discussing it, from pleading with the minister, from arguing that he is the minister who should now include within the framework of this legislation some provision for the development of the South Saskatchewan river project.

We have had this point up before in other ways, but surely it is clear that since the resolution is framed in general terms it is within the competence of members to make proposals that come within those general terms. I submit that is what members are doing when they ask the right in this debate to suggest as one of the means of conserving water resources that something should be done with respect to the South Saskatchewan river project.

I mentioned earlier that the citations to which I referred, citations 439 and 440 in Beauchesne's third edition, had to do with amendments, and of course the amendments referred to are amendments to the bill based on the resolution. Nevertheless a principle is laid down in those references, namely that members can make these suggestions for enlargement of what is involved in the legislation provided they do not go beyond the terms of the resolution when the resolution is worded in general terms.

I submit that if the Minister of Resources and Development did not want a discussion of the South Saskatchewan river project under his resolution he should have worded it more carefully. He should have been more specific. He should have said what it actually meant instead of putting it in these general terms. Having put it in general terms, and having said that this is a resolution having to do with the conservation of water resources, I submit that members should be allowed to discuss the South Saskatchewan river project and should be allowed to urge, if they wish to do so, that consideration be given that project by the government under the terms of this legislation.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may I have the indulgence of the house for one moment. I do not want to repeat myself, but I am in a quandary when I read order No. 9 on the order paper. If the hon. gentlemen will look at the order paper they will see that it states:

> December 5—In the committee of the whole—the following proposed resolution:

Mr. Fulton: I wish to deal with that point.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Perhaps I do not understand the English language well enough, but I thought that in the committee of the whole we would consider the following resolution. If it were to be considered while Mr. Speaker is in the chair the minister probably would have stood up and moved that this resolution be considered, but he did not move that. He moved that the Speaker do now leave the chair so that in committee of the whole—and it is in black and white—the following resolution may be considered.

Perhaps I am all wrong, as I am not one of those lawyers who have practised lately, but I am used to reading sentences and trying to get a meaning and some interpretation of what they mean. Perhaps you will tell me that I am wrong, but I have looked up standing order No. 38 where it is said that nearly every motion is debatable if it appears on the order paper. Well, the motion just moved is not on the order paper. The motion was that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair, and that does not appear on the order paper.

Mr. Knowles: Then it should not have been moved at all.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Why did you not object at the time? You know the rules.

If we did move that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair and it does not appear on the order paper, to my mind it is not debatable; but what is debatable, and what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) argued, was that we could amend this resolution. But you cannot amend a motion that Mr. Speaker leave the chair. You can vote against or make him stand up or sit down, but you cannot amend that resolution.

I see my friend from Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) listening attentively and I am sure he agrees with me.

Mr. Knowles: Is that not the issue we are letting the committee on procedure deal with?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We are trying, not as simply as I argued this afternoon, to see what we can get out of these different sentences. You will never convince a member of parliament that when the order paper says "in the committee of the whole we will consider the following resolution", you are going to turn around and consider it while Mr. Speaker is in the chair. If we changed the resolution and said that we wanted to consider it now, I would understand that you could have a general debate. You will have that debate in two minutes, and you can amend that resolution when we get into committee.

Mr. Knowles: Can we?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You can try. Your trial in committee will probably have the same effect as it would with Mr. Speaker in the chair, but I do not think you are doing it according to the rules of the house now. I am anxious to hear the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton).

Mr. Diefenbaker: I just want to make one reference if I may.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not know if the hon. member wishes to speak on the point which was raised a moment ago by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), as to whether debate should take place with Mr. Speaker in the chair. Besides, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has stated, that is not the issue.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker says it is not the issue.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I refer you to the judgment or direction of the Speaker on June 18, 1952, as it appears at page 3375 of Hansard. There Mr. Speaker says:

> After giving this matter my careful consideration I have come to the conclusion—

It was a matter similar to this.

> —that if there is no objection to the consideration of the resolution in committee of the whole, the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair should be put without debate. If any members are opposed to the resolution, and do not think that it should even be considered in the committee of the whole, or if they require additional information before agreeing to the motion, they should be given an opportunity to speak on the motion. The minister should endeavour to answer the objections which have been raised and to give the information requested.

My submission is that, with respect to the question of the South Saskatchewan river dam or irrigation project, I intend to place before the house, and in particular the minister, some of my objections to the resolution that is going before the committee of the whole; and the only way in which I can do it is to present arguments in support of the contention I wish to advance. On the basis of that ruling my submission, with respect, is that I would be within the rules. Otherwise the minister is in the position of having a resolution indefinite in its scope. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, he could actually gag members of the house and prevent them placing before him their objections to the resolution to be considered in the committee of the whole.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say just a word in regard to this as it appears to me. The resolution reads, and I will quote the first few lines:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize grants of assistance to provinces for the conservation of water resources under the terms and conditions specified in the said measure—

I cannot see how you can take one water resource in one province and say that it cannot be discussed under this resolution. The resolution refers to "water resources" in the provinces. The South Saskatchewan river is certainly a water resource, and how can we differentiate between the South Saskatchewan river and the Fraser river or the Columbia river or any other river?

It seems to me that it is amazingly farfetched to say that you can discuss every other water resource in Canada but that you cannot discuss the South Saskatchewan river, which is one of the water resources in the dominion. It is an amazing ruling and I am wondering how it can be made.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, of course, will understand that this point upon which I am called to make a decision is a very difficult one. I would like to thank hon. members for having assisted in the debate on the point of order, and they have provided some very valuable suggestions.

I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre stated the point correctly when he said that the decision which must be made is whether or not the South Saskatchewan river project or irrigation project is to be discussed on this resolution; whether it is proper or relevant to discuss those projects on this resolution. While the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) was speaking the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) rose on a point of order. He said that the bill forecast by the resolution did not embrace irrigation projects or irrigation policy. He contended, therefore, that the hon. member for Lake Centre was out of order in discussing the South Saskatchewan river or irrigation project.

I would refer hon. members to a ruling of Mr. Speaker which appears in Votes and Proceedings of June 18, 1952, in which he said:

> All hon. members who have taken part in the discussions agree that the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider a resolution preceding a money bill is debatable. In my opinion that is the correct view so long as subclause (a) of standing order No. 38 remains in its present form.

As I said a moment ago, that point is not at issue in this case. Mr. Speaker continues:

> The question on which there is some difference of opinion is the extent to which debate is to be allowed. This question was considered by Mr. Speaker Glen on the 23rd of February, 1942. At that time he ruled that the debate should be directed to the negative of the motion and should be general with no reference to details.

My problem seems to be to decide if the debate on this resolution should be extended to the South Saskatchewan river irrigation project. The minister declared that this resolution, and I use his words, "does not embrace irrigation projects or irrigation policy."

I should like to quote further from Mr. Speaker's ruling of June 18, 1952. He said:

> I should point out that the motion is for the Speaker to leave the chair, etc. It is not a motion to adopt the resolution. However, under our present practice members have been debating it as if it were such a motion. The minister makes an affirmative statement, frequently going into details, with the Speaker in the chair, and other members follow. The result is that a full discussion of the resolution takes place at this stage. I am sure that is not the procedure contemplated by standing order No. 60, nor is it in accordance with Mr. Speaker Glen's ruling, in which I concur.
> After giving this matter my careful consideration I have come to the conclusion that if there is no objection to the consideration of the resolution in committee of the whole, the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair should be put without debate. If any members are opposed to the resolution, and do not think that it should even be considered in the committee of the whole, or—

And I wish to underline these words.

> —if they require additional information before agreeing to the motion, they should be given an opportunity to speak on the motion. The minister should endeavour to answer the objections which have been raised and to give the information requested.

May I say that it was precisely when the hon. member for Lake Centre contended that the resolution also covered irrigation projects, such as the South Saskatchewan river project, that the minister rose to a point of order and informed the hon. member that the resolution did not cover irrigation projects.

The concluding paragraph of Mr. Speaker's ruling reads as follows:

> Accordingly in my opinion the practice of the minister opening the debate on the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair for the house to consider in committee of the whole a resolution preceding a money bill should be discontinued.
> When the discussion on this subject was before the house the other night a number of members expressed concern over the difficulty which the Speaker would have in keeping the debate within the limits of the above interpretation. I realize the difficulty but all I can do is to ask for the usual co-operation of all hon. members.

Now hon. members today, like hon. members then, express concern over the difficulty which the Speaker would have in keeping the debate within the limits of the interpretation outlined in that ruling. I realize there is that difficulty, but a decision must be made and if hon. members do not agree to it they are allowed to appeal from it.

In my humble view there is a clear distinction to be made between the subject of conservation of water resources and irrigation projects, no matter how germane the two subjects may appear to be. In view of the declaration made by the minister that irrigation projects are not contemplated by this resolution and the measure to follow, and in view of the considerations as to limitation of the debate on a motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair contained in Mr. Speaker's ruling of June 18, 1952, I feel justified in ruling that the discussion of irrigation projects on this resolution is not relevant and, therefore, is not allowed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, with profound respect, but in view of the fact that your ruling denies me and other hon. members the right to discuss the South Saskatchewan river irrigation project, I wish to appeal against your ruling.

Mr. Adamson: Before you put the question may I ask whether your decision is that no question of the conservation of water will be debatable with the Speaker in the chair?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No. I explained that debate on this motion is limited in view of the considerations which were outlined in Mr. Speaker's ruling to which I have referred. I expressed the view that it is not relevant to discuss irrigation projects or irrigation policy on this resolution.

Those who are in favour of sustaining the Speaker's ruling will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those who are opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

And the members having been called in:

Mr. Deputy Speaker put the question as follows:

In the course of the debate on the motion that I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on a certain proposed resolution respecting assistance to provinces for the conservation of water resources, a point of order was raised by the Minister of Resources and Development to the effect that the proposed resolution does not deal with irrigation projects or irrigation policy, and such should not be discussed under this resolution. Mr. Speaker ruled that the discussion on irrigation projects and policy under this resolution was not allowable on the ground that it was not relevant.

From this ruling the hon. member for Lake Centre and others appealed.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the Speaker's ruling sustained. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) may continue.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I shall speak very briefly on the question of the conservation of water resources, with particular reference to the province of Saskatchewan, after which I shall move an amendment.

The situation in Saskatchewan, in so far as the conservation of water is concerned, is very serious in various parts of the province. It is particularly so in the area referred to as the Palliser triangle. It is not something that is a novelty, because it has continued for generations. Only the other day I went back to the journal kept in 1856 by Captain Palliser, the great English explorer. He dealt with this subject in his diary on October 3, 1856, when the expedition was on the west bank of the South Saskatchewan river, at the Elbow.

He makes this entry in his journal concerning the valley running eastward of the South Saskatchewan river. He said his party were assured that in flood times this valley connected with the Qu'Appelle valley. He was very much interested in the idea of water conservation and communication between the South Saskatchewan and the Red river settlement, and used these words:

> The valley containing the Red Deer lakes resembles in width that of a large river; it is said to cross the South Saskatchewan 12 miles below the Elbow and is said to run continuously and to join the valley of the Qu'Appelle by the Last Mountain lake. I was assured by the half breeds that there was hardly any obstruction beyond one low portage existing to cut off communication by this route in the spring with those lakes which are west of the Qu'Appelle river; information which is highly suggestive of a more minute engineering investigation as to the expense and feasibility of a connection—

And so on. He goes on to point out that as the years go by the need for water conservation in Saskatchewan, or in that part of Saskatchewan, will correspondingly increase. Then a little later on, in 1859, a report was made to the legislative assembly of Upper Canada pointing out that the area now known as Saskatchewan, and part of Alberta, needed something to be done in order to conserve moisture, for periodically that area found itself arid and unproductive.

Very considerable has been done under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. That act, it is well to remember, was introduced by the Bennett government, and was sponsored by the Hon. Robert Weir, the then minister of agriculture, in order to do something to improve the situation in those parts of the prairie provinces where, as a result of drought, production ceased.

How serious the situation is in Saskatchewan may be gained from a few quotations. An article in the Toronto Saturday Night by two well-known Saskatchewan editors, Eric Knowles and Phil Wade, says this:

> Agriculturally-minded Saskatchewan has never regained peace of mind since the terrible drought of the 30's which laid it in the dust.

Water Resources

Then it goes on to point out that there is need for rehabilitation and for water conservation through various means. I am not allowed to refer to irrigation; therefore I shall not. But this article refers to the restoration of lake levels and to the provision of urban water supplies, and rehabilitation in various other ways.

I think the house should have some information as to how serious the situation is in this central portion of Saskatchewan. Let me point out that in the area of 18 rural municipalities between Saskatoon, Regina and Moose Jaw, and also west of the Elbow, some indication of the degree of need for water conservation may be gained from the fact that between the years 1945 and 1950, inclusive, almost $7 million was paid under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in respect of crop failures. The following table will show the number of farmers affected, and the amounts received in each of the years indicated:

Year	Number of Farmers Affected	Amount paid
1945	4,366	$1,129,755
1946	3,661	835,618
1947	5,669	1,675,282
1948	5,715	1,793,873
1949	4,785	1,540,275
1950	2,770	831,458

These were payments made for crop failures. I suggest these figures give the house some conception of why I make an appeal in connection with moneys to be expended in pursuance of this resolution, and ask that moneys be expended in Saskatchewan where, apparently, little or no consideration is to be given, if the minister's statement made at the outset is to be taken in its entirety.

This is a serious situation. A royal commission met and dealt with the matter. It considered the need of water conservation projects in Saskatchewan. One of the recommendations it made had to do with the need of water conservation in the Pasquia area between the Saskatchewan and Carrot rivers, where, through diking, 100,000 acres in the area would be made profitable. That is all very good. That all comes within the provisions and the ambit of the resolution moved by the minister when he said there were going to be small projects and major projects and that apparently the purpose was to render, by drainage operations, certain areas available for agriculture. Let me say this—

Mr. Winters: I did not say that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister does not want it made available for agriculture; all right, available for some other utilization, forests or otherwise.

An hon. Member: To conserve it, that is all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I feel that this resolution as it stands is a mock resolution when it comes to grips with the situation that we have in Saskatchewan. Our situation is serious. Even in the last few years, in those municipalities, during productive years, I have given figures which indicate that however effective prairie farm rehabilitation has been, something more must be done.

We in Saskatchewan believe that the royal commission report is not fair or just to our province in that it does not make provision for water conservation, except for a suggestion in regard to the Pasquia plan and the one on the Qu'Appelle river. I should like to see my hon. friends from Saskatchewan who gave interviews to the press only two or three weeks ago get up in their places and demand on behalf of the people of that province what is in the heart of everyone there, that something must be done as far as the royal commission is concerned.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): On a point of order, are we going to be allowed to discuss the report of the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan? I want to know if I can accept the invitation of the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have spoken nothing of irrigation; I have spoken of the inadequacy of the report. I am surprised at my hon. friend's interest and this making one voice outside of parliament when exercising a different vote in parliament.

Mr. Ferrie: No, no.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Indeed, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend says I should not say anything about the inadequacy of that report, and the hon. member for Kindersley has said that the royal commission has a considerable amount of eyewash mixed in with it.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): I did not say any such thing. I was asking you, Mr. Speaker, if we were going to be allowed to discuss this whole program. I am just as much interested in the South Saskatchewan program as is the hon. member.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have not mentioned the South Saskatchewan project.

Mr. Ferrie: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have heard the hon. member who has the floor talking about a royal commission and he has also referred to a report.

[Mr. Winters.]

It is quite difficult for the Chair to make a decision. I have seen the report having to do with the South Saskatchewan river. As long as the hon. member speaks about a report, about a royal commission, and does not identify it; if he is satisfied that that is the way he should speak about things, without identifying them, then I am at a loss to decide whether he is really speaking about the specific report of the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan river. The hon. member knows that a ruling was given a moment ago, and he cannot transgress that ruling by speaking indirectly of something that he would have spoken about had the ruling not been given. I know he realizes that.

The hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. Smith) apparently identifies the report to which the hon. member for Lake Centre is referring as being the report of the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan river project. I ask hon. members to give me their co-operation, and that is all I can do at the moment. Debate is allowed on a motion provided it is within the rules. I ask the hon. member, if he was transgressing the ruling I gave a moment ago, not to continue doing so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have never transgressed the rules at any time, and I am amazed at my friends from Saskatchewan who read into my remarks anything in connection with irrigation when I have refrained specifically from mentioning that. They seem to have sensibilities that are easily seared by imaginary things.

Mr. Ferrie: I realize that a lawyer can make words go around and around and around. I want to know just how the hon. member can talk about the Elbow river, how he can talk about a royal commission, how he can talk about things that came down in the report and not mention the South Saskatchewan river project.

Mr. Hees: That shows how smart he is.

Mr. Ferrie: As far as that is concerned, I want to say that we are just as much in favour of it as he is.

Mr. Hees: Go and vote for it then.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think the right place to say that is in parliament instead of saying it in press reports and then voting against any discussion of it in parliament.

Mr. McIlraith: That is not what the vote was on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am amazed to find my confrères from Saskatchewan rising one and all and referring to a report about which I have said nothing in so far as irrigation is concerned, other than to point out that it deals with the Pasquia project and the rehabilitation of swamp land. Immediately my hon. friends see in that some transgression. The people of Saskatchewan want them to be saying something for irrigation instead of trying to prevent us discussing it.

Mr. McIlraith: It was the point of order that was voted on.

Mr. Studer: You said you were not discussing irrigation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was not talking about that. My hon. friends jump. Are they so sensitive? I tell them that the people of Saskatchewan are not satisfied with these two simple recommendations of that commission. They want action—

An hon. Member: What commission?

Mr. Ferrie: Is there another commission somewhere?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I did not finish the sentence. My hon. friends seem to be mind readers. They know they should be supporting the thing they are trying to prevent my bringing before you. I say that the rules prevent any discussion of the matter that you ruled out, and I refrained specifically from mentioning it. I do not like to have my hon. friends interrupt just because their consciences are pricking them because they will not take a stand on the subject. Not only should they have a voice on this, they should vote. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green):

That all the words after "that" in the resolution be deleted and the following substituted therefor: "in the opinion of this house a measure respecting the conservation of water resources should include provision for the immediate construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam project."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The amendment of course is out of order because the motion now before the house is that I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole upon a certain proposed resolution, and it is not permissible at this stage to amend the terms of the resolution itself. I should like to refer the hon. member to a ruling on the same point made by Mr. Speaker Glen which appears at page 551 of Beauchesne's third edition. I should like to read to the house the conclusion of Mr. Speaker Glen's ruling which appears at page 553. It is as follows:

Mr. Speaker ruled the amendment out of order on the ground that the question before the chair was a motion that he leave the chair and that, at this stage, it was not permissible to amend the terms of the proposed resolution.

Therefore I declare the amendment out of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I respectfully appeal.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I did not hear the hon. member.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I respectfully appeal, with deference, from your ruling.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those in favour of sustaining the Speaker's ruling will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those against will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

And the members having been called in:

Mr. Deputy Speaker put the question as follows:

Mr. Winters moved, seconded by Mr. Fournier, Hull, that I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on a certain proposed resolution respecting assistance to provinces for the conservation of water resources. Mr. Diefenbaker moved, seconded by Mr. Green, in amendment thereto:

"That all the words after 'that' in the resolution be deleted and the following substituted therefor: 'in the opinion of this house a measure respecting the conservation of water resources should include provision for the immediate construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam project'."

I ruled the amendment out of order on the ground that it was not permissible at this stage to amend the terms of the proposed resolution.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the resolution we have before us precedes a measure for the conservation of water resources under the terms outlined in the resolution, and provides for a payment by the federal government of 37½ per cent of the cost of the various projects that may come under this legislation.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, although it may be technically correct, as the minister says, that this resolution deals only with water conservation, nevertheless it cannot help but have a bearing upon the soil resources in various parts of Canada. If you are conserving water resources for the prevention of floods, surely one of the important reasons for the prevention of floods is to prevent damage to agricultural lands. That being the case I say that this resolution and this legislation is in the wrong department; not because I have not the greatest respect for the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) but because I feel that any proposition dealing with water conservation must at the same time affect the conservation of our soil resources, and should be in the Department of Agriculture.

I am very disappointed indeed with the niggardly contribution that the federal government proposes to make toward any project developed under this particular legislation. Reviewing other projects in the past, the government here took the position that it should pay the total cost of large capital works and that any subsidiary costs should be paid by the provincial authority. The provincial authority may derive some of the necessary funds from citizens who receive definite advantage from the project. In any large project that has been finalized the federal government's contribution, instead of being something over one-third of the cost, has been approximately two-thirds of the over-all cost of the project.

Other projects, and especially one other major project for Saskatchewan, if dealt with by this resolution would be most inadequately covered because the proportion of the sums involved which the federal government is prepared to advance is in my opinion very low, far too low, and would not be a satisfactory basis for the general conservation of water resources. I protest, Mr. Speaker, along with the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), the fact that in this resolution, and in the statement which the minister gave to the house this afternoon, there is no provision for water conservation on the South Saskatchewan river in the province of Saskatchewan.

It has already been pointed out how important water is to that province. The hon. member for Lake Centre mentioned a number of municipalities and the cost to the government through P.F.A.A. and other payments. I might mention 36 municipalities in the central area of Saskatchewan which over the years have cost the public treasury some $29 million in relief payments and over $15 million in prairie farm assistance. That is a total cost to the federal treasury of well over $40 million.

That area of Canada, the central portion of Saskatchewan, needs water conservation in the worst way. Certainly I feel that it is not only in the public interest in the sense that we should help our Canadian citizens living in that part of Saskatchewan, but it is also in the public interest from a financial standpoint; because unless there is adequate water conservation and utilization in that area there will be a further burden of many millions of dollars on the federal treasury in the years to come.

I hope that, while we have been unable to discuss a development that is in the minds of many members this evening on this motion that is before us now, the minister who is piloting this resolution through the house will discuss the matter with his colleagues in the cabinet and make certain we are given a chance at an early date to debate the other matter which we all have in our minds, that is the South Saskatchewan river project, so the people of Saskatchewan may also have a chance of obtaining a program and a project that would provide them with real water conservation in that area.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution comes from the wrong department. The resolution makes a mockery of water conservation when it does not deal with the project that is in the minds of most members. I say to the government that in order to discharge their responsibility, particularly their responsibility to the people of western Canada, they should provide a water conservation measure under which payments far above the 37½ per cent set forth here can be made. I would say, as a matter of fact, that any percentage less than two-thirds of the total final cost of the project is something less than the government should provide.

I am disappointed, as I have said, that this project is not in the Department of Agriculture. The agricultural institute of Canada, in a submission to the government earlier this year, made reference to this very legislation which was forecast in the speech from the throne. They contended that any conservation of water resources that affected the soil in any way, shape or form, should be dealt with by the Department of Agriculture. On page 1 of their brief, they had this to say:

> We have learned that the government of Canada proposes to present to the present session of parliament legislation concerning the conservation of water resources.

That is the legislation we are discussing now.

> It is the opinion of the institute that unless such development is entirely exclusive of actual water conservation relating to agriculture, it would lead only to serious duplication of effort, wastage of public funds and considerable confusion.

I say this resolution proves that there is duplication in the matter of water conservation. If we are to get efficient management of our water and soil resources; if we are to get adequate conservation, then the authority handling the conservation of water resources should also handle the conservation of soil resources, and that authority should be in the Department of Agriculture.

We are extremely disappointed that this resolution has not made provision for that project which is dear to the hearts of the people of Saskatchewan, no matter to what political party they may belong. We naturally hope that a member of the government will bring forward a proposition at an early date that will provide for that project. Moreover, whether or not the government decides to carry out the requests that I have made, I trust that the government will delay no longer in giving parliament an opportunity to discuss this very important matter. If the opportunity is delayed until after the dissolution of this parliament, then I feel that the people of Saskatchewan in every political party will resent what will appear to them to have been interference with the democratic right of their members to voice their opinion on that vital project.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): This debate, Mr. Speaker, has brought out a fundamental difference in outlook between two professions, that of the engineer and the lawyer. The engineer wants to do something without talking about it, and the lawyer wants to talk about it without doing anything. The difference between the two professions is this. The engineer only gets paid when he does something, and the lawyer gets paid when he talks about it so that he can talk about it again.

Mr. Fulton: I see that a lot of engineers got paid quite a bit of money for very bad advice.

Mr. Adamson: As a member of the house, and as an engineer, one finds oneself in great sympathy—if the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) had not interrupted—with the lawyers in this house.

Mr. Gibson: Don't feel sorry for them.

Mr. Adamson: Unless there is adequate discussion in this parliament there can be no action, and it is for that reason that I propose, with due deference, to take a little time.

The question of water conservation is one which affects the entire continent of North America. It is not merely a question of the construction of a few dams. It is not merely a question of localized grants to provinces and it is not, as I hope to show, purely an agricultural problem. The problem of water conservation enters the whole economic life of the country. I want to mention the case of the three prairie provinces. It is hoped that the three prairie provinces will gradually become industrialized, as have the states on the great plains in the republic of the United States of America. The economy of these states has become more co-ordinated and has not been subjected to the difficulties of a one-crop economy, with all the devastating fluctuations which take place in a country or a province with that type of economy.

The question of water and industrialization is perhaps one of which hon. members do not realize the importance. The consumption of water industrially is simply stupendous, and and I propose to give a few figures to show what the industrialization of a country means in terms of water consumption. For instance, the production of a ton of rolled steel requires the consumption of 110,000 gallons of water. This water is completely dissipated in the form of steam and in other ways. The production of a ton of rayon yarn takes 250,000 to 400,000 gallons of water; a barrel of aviation gasoline takes from 1,050 gallons of water, if made from the natural product, to as much as 15,000 gallons of water if made synthetically.

If we are ever going to help the west industrialize, the problem of the water table ground water supply is just as essential as the other minerals which will be necessary to make the west an industrial area. Therefore when we talk about the conservation of water, particularly in the west, we are not merely dealing with the taboo subject, which of course I shall not mention; we are dealing with the very basis of the economy of the whole country.

The precipitation in North America south of the northern limit of cereals is approximately 30 inches a year, and for Canada this works out to about 5 billion acre-feet of water. An acre-foot is the term used for discussing water supplies on the land, meaning a depth of one foot of water over an area of an acre. This tremendous amount of water is only partially used by man. Most of it is either wasted or is disposed of in what is known as the run-off. Irrigation, domestic, municipal and industrial use is probably less than 100 million acre-feet in Canada out of about 5 billion. The United States figure is 160 million acre-feet.

We have in North America two-thirds of the world's supply of surface water. That is a conservative estimate. The surface water is lakes, streams, and water which is, as the name implies, on the surface, but differs of course from ground water which is under the surface. The ground water supply which we have at the moment is equal to about thirty years of annual precipitation. In other words the ground water at any time is equal to about thirty years of run-off; but despite this abundant source of ground water we have in the last few years suffered a shocking drought because we have been negligent in the conservation of our water supply. We have permitted excessive run-off; we have depleted in certain sections the ground water; we have lowered the water table until some places in the province of Saskatchewan are unsuited now for industries because of the lack of ground water.

That is something we cannot let go without endeavouring to correct it. Where you have a condition of the soil brought about by carelessness, by bad management, by lack of conservation which has destroyed the ability of that area to have a balanced economy, then it is time something more than those steps which are envisaged in this resolution is done. It is for that reason that I think this resolution is inadequate.

We go on from the question of ground water to the question of evaporation. The term which is used is evapo-transpiration, and it accounts for about two-thirds of the total precipitation every year. As the climate over the last fifty years has definitely shown that it is slowly but steadily warming, the transpiration is increasing and the evaporation due to the warmer climate is much greater than it was a quarter or a half century ago; and as the trend is continuing the question of conservation becomes, with every fraction of a degree increase in temperature, a very much more serious problem.

I shall not go into the details of water use and discuss the matter in any technical terms, but let me say this. Our North American cities use approximately between 150 gallons and 160 gallons per capita per day; whereas the European cities use fewer than 40 gallons of water per capita per day. It is on that use of water that a very great deal of our income and our high standard of living is based. If we allow our surface water to run off in the excesses to which it is doing in many rivers today, or if we allow the water table to sink lower and lower and become depleted, we will endanger the metropolitan life of our country.

If you want to realize how serious that can be you have only to look back to 1949 and 1950 at the terrific catastrophe that was narrowly averted in the city of New York when the reservoirs of that city practically dried up. Despite our apparent abundance of water, the same thing could happen here. I live on a small creek that used to be a salmon river. It has not had a fish in it for 25 years. Yet in the middle of the last century it was a salmon river.

The trend is still going on. We do not see it, because we do not measure the destruction of our water supply with a scientific instrument. We say, "What a pity it is that the old swimming hole is not what it used to be." Or we say, "What a pity it is that the old creek is not full of water, and has no fish in it any more."

The reason it is not as it was before lies in the fact that we are scandalously wasteful of the greatest heritage we have, and that is our water supply. We are more profligate in the waste of water than in perhaps anything else. I speak tonight on this resolution because I feel this whole question of the conservation of water is one which must be taken as a permanent, long-term problem, not merely as a resolution brought in concerning a few check-dams.

It has to form a part of the basic thinking of this country because, Mr. Speaker, despite the abundance we have, despite our amazing riches we can, as we have in parts of Canada, destroy this great heritage.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we have been so long away from the subject matter of the resolution it might be fitting to place on record just what it states. The resolution we are discussing is as follows:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize grants of assistance to provinces for the conservation of water resources under the terms and conditions specified in the said measure, such grants not to exceed thirty-seven and one-half per cent of the—

And I understand the words "cost of the" are to be put in there.

—projects; and to be paid out of moneys appropriated by parliament for the above mentioned purposes; and to provide that all officers, clerks and employees required for carrying out the provisions of the measure shall be appointed in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

I should not like to go very far away from the excellent speech just delivered by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) before commending him. I believe he has made a real contribution to the information of hon. members and the country, and I think his warning voice is lifted not one minute too soon.

I do not hesitate to say that I am heartily in support of this resolution. Our group has felt that this was not a resolution under which we should be discussing any irrigation project at all. This resolution, as it says, is purely for the conservation of water. That is why we have supported Mr. Speaker's rulings in both cases; and our names will appear as having voted contrary to members of the C.C.F. and the Progressive Conservative party. It is not that we are not deeply in sympathy with the development of water reservoirs and irrigation systems but, according to our understanding, that kind of thing will be taken care of under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act which at the present time, as everyone recognizes, is an excellent measure and is being administered with what I consider to be great wisdom, courage and progressiveness.

I do not think it is fitting that members in opposition should be everlastingly finding fault with the government when the government is doing a good job. When it is doing well I believe in telling it so, just as I believe that when a man is living a good life one ought to tell him a little bit about it before he dies, and should not be content with sending him flowers after he dies. I am not hoping that the Liberal government will die, but I will say that, in my judgment, since it took office in 1935 this government has administered the P.F.R.A. with what I consider to be laudable wisdom and progressiveness.

Before going further may I express sympathy with the British Columbia members who have sought to have the operations of P.F.R.A. extended to their province. I see no reason why that should not be done; in fact I see a good many reasons why it should be done.

Then turning to the resolution, may I say again I believe it is a laudable one. I am not saying that it goes far enough. I do not say that the hon. member for York West was extreme in pointing out what he considered to be deficiencies in the resolution. However, I look upon it as a very good one, because it is a step in the right direction. It is a first step, and a good substantial one, when the government undertakes to pay 37½ per cent of the cost of water conservation projects undertaken jointly by the provinces and the dominion. Perhaps we shall see a better provision before long; but, as a start, I think this is a very good one, and I desire to voice commendation for it.
