The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REGULATION AS TO DAY ON WHICH CLAIM WEEK SHALL BE DEEMED TO BEGIN

Mr. PAUL E. COTE (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table copies, in English and French, of order in council P.C. 1907, of April 29, 1948, amending unemployment insurance benefit regulations, 1947, to provide that after May 31, 1948, Monday shall be the day upon which a claim week shall be deemed to begin. It is expected that this uniformity will work out much more fairly for those covered under the act.

POSTAL SERVICE

CARRYING OF MAILS BY AIR—IMPROVEMENT AND EXTENSION OF RURAL SERVICES

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to inform the house of what I consider to be an important milestone in the progressive development of the Canadian postal service. Everyone no doubt has seen the recent speculation in the press concerning the inauguration of what is known as "all-up" mail service. All-up mail service is an arrangement whereby letter mail, whether prepaid at air mail rates or not, is accorded air conveyance within Canada, if its delivery to the public can thereby be expedited.

I am glad to announce that we have reached a satisfactory conclusion to our extended negotiations with Trans-Canada Air Lines and that it is hoped to inaugurate all-up service over its network on or about the first of July, 1948, on an experimental basis to ascertain whether such service can be maintained in Canada at reasonable cost and with the desired degree of efficiency.

It is our intention, beginning on that day, to route by air, whenever it is advantageous to do so, all letter mail bearing four-cent Canadian postage for delivery to any place in Canada. We shall, of course, also continue to carry all mail by air which is prepaid at air mail rates of postage.

Any letters weighing more than one ounce, that is, letters which require more than four cents postage, will be transmitted by air only if they are prepaid at air-mail postage rates; otherwise they will be sent by surface transportation as at present. It was considered advisable to set a limit of one ounce on letters which will go by air because there are many unknown factors involved in the scheme.

An ordinary envelope, $9\frac{1}{2}$ inches by $4\frac{1}{8}$ inches, weighs about a quarter of an ounce with one sheet; with two sheets it weighs under half an ounce; with seven sheets the weight is under one ounce. A smaller envelope, $6\frac{1}{2}$ inches by $3\frac{5}{8}$ inches, with two sheets weighs about a quarter of an ounce; with five sheets, slightly over half an ounce; and with nine sheets, under one ounce. So that more than ninety per cent of all letters will not have to be prepaid at seven cents.

We hope to be in a far better position to decide after the experimental period is over what further extensions could be made without endangering the success of the project.

That is, generally speaking, the scope of the significant step which we propose taking on the first of July this year. We hope to be able to extend the same scheme to all other feeder lines which now carry air mail only, but we have not as yet completed our consideration in this regard. I shall defer my remarks on that matter to a later date.

I would like to mention that we also propose to introduce various improvements and extensions in the case of mail services in the rural areas. We appreciate that rural areas may not feel the benefit of the all-up mail service to the same degree as the more populated centres. We therefore propose to continue the extension of service to the rural population, a thing we always keep in mind in the Post Office Department.

AERONAUTICS ACT

ORDER IN COUNCIL AMENDING AIR REGULATIONS

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Pursuant to section 6 of chapter 28 of the statutes of 1944, which is an act to amend the Aeronautics Act, I table herewith copy of order in council P.C. 3141 of April 6, 1948, amending the air regulations.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY—FREIGHT RATES FROM CHURCHILL AND HALIFAX

Mr. KNIGHT:

1. Have freight rates over the Hudson Bay railroad on commodities other than grain been raised during the recent year?
2. If so (a) why; (b) how much; (c) in what respects?

Mr. KNIGHT:

1. Were recent reports correct in stating that ocean freight charges between Churchill and British ports had been reduced?
2. If so, what was the amount of the reduction?
3. What is the ocean freight rate on a thousand feet of lumber (ship load quantities) (a) from Churchill to a British port; (b) from Halifax to the same port?

Mr. CHEVRIER: In view of the fact that I answered these two questions during consideration of the estimates of my department the other evening, I wonder if the hon. member would be willing to drop them.

Mr. KNIGHT: I agree with the minister in regard to the first question but not in regard to the second one, which as a matter of fact asks something quite outside of his department.

Mr. CHEVRIER: As far as that question is concerned the hon. gentleman can get the information just as quickly and as easily as I can, because I would have to get it from the shipping companies. I think the purpose of placing questions on the order paper is to obtain information which an hon. member cannot get elsewhere.

Mr. KNIGHT: The purpose of the question, as far as I am concerned, is that the answer may become a matter of public record. That is why it was placed on the order paper.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not in a position to give the answer, because I have not the information, and neither has the government. I would have to obtain it from the ocean steamship companies, and I suggest that my hon. friend can get it from them as well as I could.

Mr. SPEAKER: Questions dropped.

GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCTION—PRIVATE CAPITAL INVESTMENT

Mr. MENARY:

What percentage was private capital investment of the gross national production in Canada for each of the years 1945, 1946, and 1947?

Mr. McILRAITH: The following table shows the percentage which gross private capital investment was of gross national product in Canada, for 1945, 1946, and 1947:

Gross domestic investment	Percentage of gross national product 1945	1946	1947
New housing*	1·8	2·9	3·5
New construction (except housing) and new machinery and equipment†	5·6	8·5	12·0
Investment in inventories	–2·5‡	3·3	5·9
Total	4·9	14·7	21·4

*Does not include construction by Wartime Housing Limited.

†Includes investment by private business and publicly owned public utilities.

‡The value of inventories declined in this year.

MINING—NEW INVESTMENT IN DURABLE PHYSICAL ASSETS

Mr. MENARY:

What is the estimated new investment for mining in Canada for the year 1948 in durable physical assets excluding, if any, direct government investment, and what was the actual, or if not yet available, estimated actual for the years 1945, 1946, and 1947?

Mr. McILRAITH: Estimated expenditures on new investment by the mining industry in Canada in durable physical assets excluding any direct government investment:

1945	$16·7 million
1946	33·6 million
1947	66·3 million
1948	76·6 million (forecast)

POSTAL SERVICE—SALARIES OF LETTER CARRIERS

Mr. LOCKHART:

1. What was the schedule of salaries paid to letter carriers in 1938?
2. What increases in salaries have been granted such persons since 1938?
3. What steps are being taken at the present time to increase salaries of letter carriers?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

1. $1,020-$1,140-$1,260-$1,380-$1,500.

2. The effective dates of the increases and the increased salaries paid were as follows:

1st July, 1944—$1,200-$1,320-$1,440-$1,560-$1,620 plus cost of living bonus.

1st April, 1946—$1,320-$1,440-$1,560-$1,680-$1,800 plus cost of living bonus.

1st September, 1946 (consolidation of salary and cost of living bonus)—$1,644-$1,764,$1,884-$2,004-$2,124.

1st October, 1947—$1,620-$1,740-$1,860-$1,980-$2,100-$2,160.

The adjustment effective 1st October, 1947, provided that employees in receipt of salary at the rates of $1,644-$1,764-$1,884 would receive an immediate increase of $216 per annum, those at $2,004, an immediate increase of $156 per annum and those at $2,124 an immediate increase of $36 per annum.

3. No further action is being taken at present.

CHARTERED BANKS—LOANS FOR CAPITAL INVESTMENT—CASH RESERVES

Mr. MENARY:

What was the total amount for all chartered banks in Canada of (a) loans for capital investment; (b) cash reserves, as of December 31, 1945, 1946 and 1947?

Mr. BELZILE:

(a) Not of government record. The Bank Act does not require the chartered banks to make returns concerning loans for capital investment.

(b) Deposits by chartered banks with the Bank of Canada and Bank of Canada notes held by chartered banks:

December 31, 1946	742,330,862
December 31, 1947	720,070,193

IMMIGRATION—CHINESE

Mr. CAMPBELL:

1. How many wives and families of Chinese Canadian citizens have been allowed entry into Canada during the past two months?
2. Has the immigration office been opened and staffed in Hong Kong?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. None for the two months prior to May 1. Records for May not yet available.

2. Yes; office reopened April 6, 1948.

DESERONTO POST OFFICE—BOXES

Mr. STOKES:

1. Has any report been made to the Post Office Department regarding a large number of post office boxes being out of order in Deseronto post office?
2. If so, what steps are being taken to remedy this situation?
3. Is the department going to furnish more boxes for this office?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

1. Yes.

2. Additional details being obtained.

3. Yes, if detailed report indicates need.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

IMPORTS OF DRIED PEACHES AND CANNED FRUITS—BRAZIL NUTS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Since the first of January, 1948, what has been the value of imports into Canada from the United States of (a) dried peaches; (b) canned peaches and apricots; (c) mixed fruit in cans; (d) brazil nuts?
2. Were special import permits granted therefor and if so under what circumstances?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Return tabled.

INDIANS—PIAPOT RESERVE—SURRENDER OF LANDS

Mr. MacNICOL:

1. How many acres of land were surrendered by the Indians on the Piapot reserve to the crown for resale to soldiers under Statutes of Canada 1919, chapter 71?
2. What was the average price per acre payable to the band for said lands?
3. What disposition was made (a) of the money payable to the band in such surrender; (b) of accumulated interest thereon?
4. Did the surrender include minerals?
5. How many acres of the said lands were sold to soldier settlers?
6. What was the average sale price per acre?
7. Did sales to soldiers include minerals or are the minerals retained by either the crown or the soldier settlement board?
8. Were any portions of said lands transferred by the crown to the soldier settlement board?
9. Did such transfer include minerals?
10. For what purpose were the said lands and/or minerals transferred to said board?
11. Are the minerals held in trust for the Indians or for whose benefit are they being retained?

MARSHLANDS

RECLAMATION AND DEVELOPMENT—ASSISTANCE TO MARITIME PROVINCES

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to assist the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island in the reclamation and development of marshlands in the said provinces by the construction and reconstruction of works necessary therefor and the purchase of required machinery and equipment. Works may be undertaken only on the recommendation of an advisory committee to be established under the act and upon terms and conditions agreed upon with the province concerned prior to the first day of May, nineteen hundred and fifty-five. The Minister of Agriculture is empowered to appoint necessary temporary officers and employees to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund with provision also for the payment of expenses of members of the advisory committees.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL LIBRARY

MOTION FOR REFERENCE TO JOINT COMMITTEE ON LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State) moved:

Whereas representations have been received from numerous organizations including the Royal Society of Canada, the Canadian Library Association, the Canadian Historical Association, the Canadian Political Science Association, the Canadian Social Science Research Council, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the Canadian Congress of Labour, as well as the Provincial Library Association, recommending that consideration be given to the establishment of a national library for Canada; and

Whereas it is further recommended that as a preliminary step action be taken to provide a catalogue of books already available in the various libraries throughout Canada;

Therefore be it resolved that the representations already received and any further representations that may be received concerning the establishment of a national library for Canada be referred to the joint committee on the library of parliament for consideration and report.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the Secretary of State should give some explanation of this resolution. I should like to know what action the joint committee on the library can take in the matter.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): As the motion states, Mr. Speaker, various representations have been received from organizations throughout Canada as to the advisability of establishing a national library. The recommendations that have been received do not envisage a library being started by the erection of an enormous building. It is considered that the matter should be given careful study and that possibly as a first step arrangements might be made to provide a catalogue of books already available in libraries throughout Canada. It is recommended that the matter should receive careful study, and the government considers that the body to look into the proposal in the first instance is the joint committee on the library of parliament, which would consider the recommendations already received and make a report to parliament, after which the further steps to be taken may be determined.

Mr. CHURCH: Why refer it to a committee? Why does not the government take action?

[Mr. Bertrand (Laurier).]

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I must say I doubt very much whether this is an effective way to deal with the proposals that have been made to the government. I was on the joint library committee for a long time; I looked forward to a meeting of that committee, but I do not remember one having been called. Perhaps that was partly owing to my own neglect in not pressing for it a little more strongly, but I do not believe this is an effective way of dealing with the problem.

I have no doubt that neither the government nor this house would be prepared to build a huge library building, but I have often thought that one of the first steps to be taken toward making the city of Ottawa a capital worthy of the country would be to have an appropriate national library here. In fact I would go a step further and say we should have an appropriate cultural centre, which would include a national theatre, an art gallery, and so on. It seems to me that this step will simply shelve the matter, and that we shall hear very little more about it from this committee.

I believe other steps should be taken. We have a number of people in the country, known to the government and to members of the house, who might be sufficiently public-spirited and interested to serve on a special committee which would have very much the same objectives as are embodied in this resolution. It seems to me a committee of persons interested in literature, the arts, and so on, would give the country much better service in this regard than the kind of committee to which it is proposed to refer this question, because, as I say, having been a member of the library committee and knowing the difficulty of getting the committee to meet, I think this action will merely shelve the matter and nothing constructive or effective will be done.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect I would repeat that before we speak of a national library the present library of parliament should be made fireproof in order to protect the treasures we have there, which are exposed to destruction at any time. This is the first step, and it is urgent. I have said for years that it is urgent, and I thank the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) for supporting my contention, which seems to be sound in every respect.

Mr. RODNEY ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the library committee may I say that this motion came up in that committee during the war, and was shelved until such time as the war ended and consideration could be given to it. I was in favour of taking some suitable action, and I believe my position had the support of the majority of the committee.

While I agree that the joint committee on the library of parliament may not be the proper body to carry out all the work at this stage, I believe this proposal would be a proper first step, in order that some day we may have a suitable national library in Canada.

Mr. CHURCH: May I ask the minister if he has any proposed plan?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): We have no plan for a building, no.

Mr. CHURCH: It is more important than national parks.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): In reply to the observations of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), I would say that if the committee meets and decides that a special committee should be appointed, it will be in a position so to recommend in its report. I had thought they would possibly do that; I had not considered that they would themselves undertake to draw up a program.

Mr. CHURCH: That will bury it for this session.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the government intend to present to this committee when it meets any considered policy of its own?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The resolution before the house is that the committee shall consider the resolutions and proposals, and any other proposals which may be brought in, and that it shall then make its recommendations in its report to the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it that the proposals which from year to year have been made from this side of the house will be considered too.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ATLANTIC COAST—UNITED STATES BASES IN NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. DICKEY (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance to the constituency of Halifax of defence and allied matters along the Atlantic coast, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent). If the decision of the people of Newfoundland is for confederation with Canada, and if that decision is carried out, will it affect in any way the ownership of defence bases in Newfoundland territory which are now occupied by United States forces, or will Canada acquire any interest in such bases?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): My information is that United States bases in Newfoundland are held under 99-year leases as from 1941, under treaties between the United States and the United Kingdom. Any change of tenure, in the event of union of Newfoundland with Canada, would of course require new treaty arrangements with the United States government.

NATIONAL HOUSING

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO POWERS OF APPROVED LENDING INSTITUTIONS, ETC.

The house resumed from Wednesday, May 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe for the second reading of Bill No. 280, to amend the National Housing Act, 1944, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Nicholson.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, last night when the house adjourned at six o'clock I had hoped I might have concluded my few remarks. It so happened, however, that at the adjournment hour I had been referring to New Zealand and Australia. I had in mind the fact that I had read many references as to how these socialistic members of the commonwealth had dealt with their housing problems. From my own observations of a few short years ago I am prompted to say that their problem is not solved. The problem there is just as intense as it is here. It may be that they have on their statute books legislation which will help them solve their housing problem more quickly than it can be solved here. Their geographical position gives them some advantage in that they do not know what it means to live under circumstances such as those described yesterday by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews), where sometimes temperatures drop to as much as thirty degrees below zero. They do not have to prepare for winter to the same extent that we do in this country, nor do they encounter many of our difficulties.

Mention has been made of building priorities of one kind or another. I would ask the minister to correct me if I am wrong in the statement that we have priorities in connection with the acquisition of nearly everything we require in the building of houses, whereas in New Zealand those priorities are applied to the extent of only fifty per cent.

I realize that in some respects we must be even more drastic than we are today in the diversion of building supplies to enterprises other than housing. I have in mind two classes which should have priority, and it is on behalf of these that I speak this afternoon. The first would include all those honourable, gallant and distinguished young men who came home to us after saving our way of life and our democracy. Therefore I put veterans in the first category. In the second I place those men and women who find themselves adapted to industrial occupations and who of necessity are anxious to live close to their place of employment. Of necessity they find themselves living in slum areas in the vicinity of industrial plants.

Speaking first of veterans, as I said a few days ago, and a few years ago as well, by their very training in their adolescent days, by the fact that they left school to go overseas, by the fact that their fathers were tradesmen and craftsmen, they cannot be forced out into rural areas to be made into farmers. I do not for one moment deprecate that particular idea. I remember the eloquent words of the hon. member for one of the Hurons when he told us that there were many vacant houses in the farm areas of Ontario. I remember the hon. member for one of the Renfrews saying the same thing. I see my Nova Scotia friend smiling. How many empty dilapidated farm houses are there in the maritime provinces which could be occupied by Canadian citizens? Many thousands.

I am going to digress for a moment. Coming home on the S.S. Aquitania I travelled with 12,000 war brides. They had been told wonderful stories about Canada. Some of them were leaning over the rail to catch the first glimpse of the coastline of the maritimes close to Halifax. One said to me, "What a wonderful country! Marble bathrooms!" She said, "Is that one of them on the hill, that outbuilding?" I said, "Perhaps it is." "Swimming pools in front of the homes." There was a little fisherman's shack on the side of the hill with the ocean in front. "Is that a swimming pool?" "Perhaps it is." Many of these people were disillusioned. They had been told what they should have, what they must have.

To those who have these dreams in regard to houses I refer the words of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) as recorded in yesterday's Hansard. He told us of the great joy and pleasure he had had out of building his own house many years ago. In my opinion, except for the veterans we are not responsible for all these people unless they are handicapped or living in slum areas. If we could instil into their minds some of the Victorian ideas of the hon. member for one of the Renfrews who spoke so eloquently last year with regard to house building, their problem might be solved. Let them get out and build for themselves. Let them get themselves covered, as my hon. friend did, by the work of their own hands. Then this country of Canada will go ahead much faster than it is progressing at the present time.

Except for one circumstance there would not be the shortage of supplies that there is now. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario since the session started, there has been great industrial expansion. In order that there may be no misunderstanding I shall refer to some of these. How many hon. members took advantage of the invitation to visit Toronto? Those who did saw our waterfront. They saw evidence of the expenditure of $20,000,000, to be followed by another $10,000,000 in the next two years. All this large construction work is using up materials. I am referring to that area along Fleet street where you saw the Victory Mills, which are expending $10,000,000 on plant for the production of Orange Crush, 7-up and other drinks not of this kind but perhaps worse than this and some even better than this. Then there is the large plant of Standard Chemicals.

I have no objection to the building of large plants such as that to be constructed by Lever Brothers, who will expend $10,000,000 within the next two years and consume thousands of tons of building materials. Let us have industry. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario referred to the abundance of our resources. Let us build these while we may, but the fact remains that when you are building these you cannot build houses for the workers who will carry on these industries.

No doubt those workers will be well paid, but where are they to live? Are they to live in Regent's Park, one of the slum areas? I hope not. These industrial areas are being built up right in front of the greatest slum area in Toronto. The traffic is so congested that these workers cannot get on a bus to go home if they live a mile or two away, too far to walk. The fault lies in having these industries in the midst of a slum area in a large city like Toronto. The same condition obtains in many other cities. They could be built more cheaply and everyone would be better off if they were located ten, fifteen or twenty miles beyond the city limits. They should not be crowded up in the city where of necessity slum areas will be created.

I know that this bill provides that eighty-five per cent of the bricks, labour and supplies that go into a house are to be financed in one way or another, whether by the municipality, by the province or by the dominion. But I also realize that there are being concentrated in the centres of our large cities thousands of employees who would be much better off if they could live outside the cities, such as half way between Toronto and Hamilton, as some have done, or away to the east of Toronto near Pickering, or up where Maclean-Hunter are spending $6,000,000 or $8,000,000 at a location twenty miles north of the city limits. I thank them for the wisdom they have shown in doing that. Those who have established large industries in the centres of our cities are doing something which is not for the general advantage of those communities, because they are encouraging people to live in slum areas.

A word with regard to materials. It is unfortunate in my opinion that this administration in its wisdom has seen fit to allow double depreciation. Any way you look at it, these companies have sufficient reserves. I direct the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to the fact that many of them are able to plan building expansion programs. If I could make a plea to these people today it would be to ask them to slow down their expenditures on new construction until such time as house building could catch up with the demand. They are using up supplies of all kinds. I do not know, but I would hazard a guess from my own observation that for every dollar spent in the construction of dwellings, close to $2 is being spent by these industrial organizations. If there were some method of putting the brakes on industrial expansion until private enterprise could overtake the slack in housing requirements, it would be a good thing for Canada. If for a few years we do not expand our industrial and factory buildings of all kinds far beyond our requirements but rather extend house building and house ownership among our people, two or three decades hence these industries will be able to expend their reserves in industrial expansion. In this event the workers, instead of being discouraged and disheartened and anxious to join with others to squeeze the last possible dollar out of their employers, will be anxious to devote all the money they can save to building a house for themselves. If we speed up home ownership we shall be doing something for the general advantage of Canada.

In 1939, seventy per cent of the people in my community owned or were on the way to owning their homes. I challenge this administration to say that that is so today; I do not know myself, but I have an idea that that percentage does not now prevail. The trend is the other way. My people are solid citizens, but if they do not own the houses in which they live, or if they are not imbued with the idea of doing so, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, where will their progeny be two or three decades from now?

With regard to supplies, they are not being distributed in proper proportions. Let us have more supplies for the building of houses, even if it is necessary to cut down on industrial expansion. I was glad to hear the minister say yesterday that barbed wire production is to be suspended for two months so that the steel wire may be used in the production of nails. Personally I think that the man who first produced barbed wire should have been hanged with it, because it has done more damage to livestock than any other single thing. Let us make more nails, so that there will no longer be that excuse for the lack of housing. I am willing to let the eighty-five cents of the dollar be spent to help construction, but I do not feel disposed to go all out for the amendment which has been proposed to this bill and which would establish practically the public ownership of homes and houses. One of the great virtues of the Canadian people is the ambition in their hearts and minds which makes them ready to work hard and for long hours to own something for themselves. There are not enough people in this civilized world who have that inspiration and that ambition. Let us not in this chamber be a party to anything which might impair that virtue of the strong men of the north, namely, the ambition to go out and build a house for themselves and rear a family in that home.

The bill provides for slum clearance. The city of Toronto may be said to have given some leadership in slum clearance. They have talked about it now for four years, and every public man there is buttonholed by persons who want to know when the public bodies charged with responsibility for slum clearance are going to set to work. Let this administration take an inventory of all the slum clearance projects in Canada and then get down to business and make a start by clearing Regent's Park. If we have any responsibility here for that, and I think the minister will agree that we have, he will find not only the city of Toronto but even the Ontario government willing and anxious to co-operate in the fullest measure on slum clearance. The minister will not deny that. Then let us make a start and show that we can do something somewhere, even if that somewhere happens to be in the confines of the great city of Toronto. But of course we in the city of Toronto are willing to go along with others.

I am in a rather awkward position. I have asked that the government go slow in industrial expansion. Yet on May 14 I had to sit quietly in my seat and listen to Canada's great Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) enunciate an expansion project which will consume building materials and take out of the market many thousands of bricks, much mortar and a certain amount of labour. Nevertheless it is a project that I must approve, if it is necessary. It is not a project of industrial expansion. It has to do with hospital accommodation. It is a young project—that is, it is eighteen years old. Not a dollar has been spent upon it in those eighteen years, but now $3,000,000 worth of bricks and mortar is to be used for these purposes. It may seem that I am inconsistent when I ask the minister, as I have asked him in days gone by, to go ahead and build a certain project which has had the privilege of giving yearly over 100,000 days of hospital service to civilian and soldier patients who were incapacitated and in hospital through no fault of their own. We were pleased to hear the Prime Minister rise in his place and announce that his administration, in co-operation with the Ontario government and municipal governments, would provide $1,000 per bed for active treatment patients who had come to the hospital for treatment.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he is departing from the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker. When I notice in the bill that assistance is to be given in the construction of houses up to a maximum of eighty-five per cent of their estimated cost, and when I notice, sir, that corporations are invited to take over the projects when they are completed and paid for under the guaranteed contract, and so forth, I am trying in my humble way to point out that there are some organizations which might interfere with the carrying out of the provisions of this bill. The hospital project I mention is competitive in the use of materials which could be used for housing. Therefore, sir, if I have your indulgence I should like to make one or two comments. They will be included in two sentences.

Mr. GRANT: Louder.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): My hon. friend says "louder," or something else. I remind him, Mr. Speaker, that when the angel Gabriel descends from heaven and places one foot on dry land and the other on the ocean and declares that the world shall be no more, my hon. friend will cry "Louder, louder!" Meanwhile it is his hard luck if he cannot hear what I am saying.

Now, sir, I shall continue with my two sentences. Within the next year or two this administration is going to give $1,000 per bed toward the construction of a hospital extension which in the finished state will have cost close to $3,000,000. My community, the corporation of the city of Toronto, will contribute to that hospital program $5 for every $1 that the government contributes. That is one sentence. My second sentence is this. I would ask the omnibus minister of everything that is worthwhile in the House of Commons, now the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the man charged with responsibility for this bill, to do as he did for us before. Let us have the building supplies for our hospital so that we in turn can give hospital service to our fellowmen.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I have not taken part in the debate on housing so far this session. I wish to say that I have made it a rule of life to try to get on with people, whether individuals, corporations, railways or municipalities.

With regard to Bill 280, which is before the house for second reading, I believe that there should be read into it the cause and effect of the proposals it makes. Lack of housing is not a local matter; it is not a national matter; it is an international matter. It is a world matter which has been brought about by two long wars and a depression. No allowance was made for the subsequent increase in population. Transportation, electric light, power, water and sewers are municipal services, along with other agencies, which are necessary in any solution of the housing problem in the larger cities of this country.

I remember away back when we did not own the Toronto street railway. We had a privately-owned railway in only half of the old part of the city. What was done between 1915 and 1921 was this. We built civic car lines in the new part of the city. Let us suppose that the old city is on one side and the dividing line of Toronto is in the centre. We took over the Toronto street railway in 1921 when their franchise expired. I was much pleased with the 104 members who were in the city the other day, because as they travelled about our city and out to Oakville they saw the tremendous strides which have been made in housing, even during the period between the two wars and after the last war. I was surprised to see it myself because I had not seen recently as much of the surrounding district as I had before the last war started.

I am in favour of the government carrying out its present plans or any arrangement it has with the municipalities for slum clearance and other matters having to do with housing, because without adequate housing there would be no public health, notwithstanding the health security programs announced by federal and provincial and civic authorities. The first duty of a government, as I see it, is to look after the health, wealth, peace, happiness and prosperity of its citizens. All the various statutes, plans, blueprints and other remedies which have been proposed by municipalities, provinces and the federal government, cannot be carried out because of the lack of materials and of labour. It shows that in a national sense we have been unable to make, on a percentage basis, any real contribution to solving our national housing difficulties. For the reasons I have given, to provide housing should be the national function of the government.

We are in very difficult days. At a time like this, when we are in an emergent condition, the federal power should deal with the situation. In my opinion housing should be a national problem because the government have almost unlimited methods of finding revenue. They have also control over immigration, tariffs and trade, banks and banking. They can bring anyone they wish into this country. That power is given to them under section 91 of the written constitution which this country obtained in 1867.

Through the medium of Bill 280 another housing act is to be passed, amending the National Housing Act, 1944 and 1945. In this bill are set out the powers of approved lending institutions. They may take steps to safeguard mortgage securities and indebtedness. The bill also gives powers to enter into contracts with builders, and to guarantee rentals from rental housing projects. The terms and conditions of such undertakings are also given. The bill deals with rents for rental housing projects in the form of mortgages, terms of contracts and transfers. It deals with the transfer of property of Wartime Housing Limited to the new corporation. In spite of all these many statutes which have been passed since this housing matter was first brought up, there is still a national housing problem in the urban, rural and suburban areas. Things have been so mixed up by all these various statutes that the municipalities are in a quandary.

I would give some constructive suggestions to the minister and to the government. I have had a great deal of experience, notwithstanding what the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Timmins) said. Probably I have had a vaster experience than anybody in the house, because I dealt with one of the largest agencies of housing, namely, transportation. We took over the street railway which served only the old city. We built a new civic railway for the new half of the city and linked the whole city up in the new system. I do not know any constituency which owes so much to the vision of public ownership as ward 6, which is part of the constituency represented by the hon. member for Parkdale. I remember when they had no harbour improvements on the waterfront in that ward. They had the Mimico section of the York radials, running from the old Sunnyside level crossing—a death trap. They had the Toronto suburban running through wards 6 and 7 to Guelph. In 1920 these were all included when we purchased the York radials, and that was a great aid to housing. I described what happened in my friend's own district. The most important thing was the building of a railroad, city car lines in the new part of the city north of Bloor street and St. Clair avenue. We built the city car line system from 1915 to 1921 and it had a beneficial effect on housing. Practically the whole district of wards 1, 6 and 8 and the north Toronto district were built up by it.

Talk about what was done by those who came into the house a few years ago! I am disappointed in some of the young men who have come into parliament recently. I venture to say that if some of them had had the control of the city of Toronto when I was head of the city council, Mackenzie would have got a renewal of the street railway franchise, because there was only one man in the council who opposed it, and one newspaper—the five other newspapers gave their support to the purchase deals. The action that was taken at that time, however, went a long way toward solving the housing situation in our city. The light and power franchises were taken over by the city and the Toronto Transportation Commission started with a civic system of buses and radials. The metropolitan railway on Yonge street from Lake Simcoe to the C.P.R. north station was taken over also in 1920-21. The Scarboro section of the York radials from Woodbine, on the Kingston road to West Hill was also made part of the T.T.C. civic system. The whole York radial was acquired by the city and all its various sections. The Mimico section, Sunnyside west of the Humber to Mimico, at the level crossing at Sunnyside, was developed after these franchises were removed. In that district there was only one road, which was very narrow, and that was the Lake Shore road.

I have been discussing cause and effect in the housing situation and the condition that existed between the two wars. Those hon. members who visited our city the other day got a bird's-eye view of the results of the inauguration of the street car system and the taking over of radials, waterfront improvements and so on, all of which contributed to the prodigious development of that city.

In the district I represent in the House of Commons today, Broadview, and in the Greenwood and Danforth districts, tickets on the new civic car lines in the early days were six for ten cents. The result of the transportation system which we established was the erection of thousands of houses. The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) will bear me out in that assertion.

All that work was done without any federal or provincial help at all. We inaugurated car lines, radials, buses, water service, sewers, police protection, health regulations and other benefits for the people in those districts, and the result was that many of the returned soldiers in Davenport and all the other ridings from East Toronto to the Humber started building houses for themselves, beginning with a cellar in the summertime, and then putting up one story. Neighbours would come and give assistance and in that way they would help to build a second and a third story. I am simply giving you cause and effect so far as housing is concerned.

My sole purpose in speaking this afternoon has been to try to give the minister some constructive suggestions. I am one member of the House of Commons, and I do not speak for this party; far from it. I leave that to some others who claim that they represent it. I will say this, however. I do give the minister some credit for what he did during the war and even after, as I see what was done in our city. I am one of those who try to get on with people and to work with governments as with individuals.

I would remind hon. members of what took place in this house in June 1923. I was then chairman of the harbour board. I had a meeting until 3 a.m. with the government as to a settlement of the Toronto viaduct case with the two national railways. I acted for the city and harbour and discussed the matter with the then Liberal government. The result was that I marked it down from $37,000,000 to $30,000,000. Present were Sir Edward Beatty, then president of the C.P.R.; Sir Henry Thornton, president of the Canadian National, and Mr. Graham Bell, who was deputy minister of railways. I represented the city and harbour board and I showed them all the facts in connection with the viaduct and my plan for closing certain streets and cutting down the whole cost to $30,000,000.

An act of parliament was passed at the end of June 1923 and work was later begun on the viaduct. The new Union station was finished, and extensive harbour improvements were carried out for twelve miles to the Humber river. Transportation by civic car lines, cheap power and other civic services in Toronto and suburbs are the main reasons for the success of housing after the taking over of the street railway.

In connection with the proposed purchase of the old Toronto street railway, it was supported by five of the six newspapers; only one paper, the Toronto Telegram, was opposed to it, and in the city hall only the present member for Broadview and one other opposed it. Had the deal gone through the people of Toronto would never have been able to take over the street railway or the radials, nor would they have been able to remedy the deplorable conditions that existed in our city and harbour or to give the services which hon. members saw for themselves the other day. I was the mayor and I piloted the civic bill for the T.T.C. through the legislature and nominated and chose the first T.T.C. commission. It brought about a vast housing improvement and made of Toronto and district a city of homes.

We need a steam suburban service in Toronto. Look at the service they have in Montreal and its aid to suburban housing. The use of commutation tickets between Toronto and Brampton, Oakville and other points should be extended.

After the first war, under private enterprise, many persons, including returned soldiers, built their own houses in the suburbs of the city. A great deal of building was done between the two wars, and much has been done also since the close of the second world war. The other day I was surprised to see the great development that had taken place on the Lake Shore, the Dundas highway, ward 7 and the Kingsway through to Oakville, in the matter of housing, mostly by private enterprise.

According to the report of the assessment commissioner, during the period of the two wars and until recently some seventy per cent of the people in Toronto city owned their own houses. It might be a small cottage, or it might be a two or three story house. Everyone wanted to own his own house, including the industrial workers, because of the cheap electricity, power, light, transportation, and the other public utilities.

I do not want to see our city become a city of apartment houses. In 1926 and 1927, and again in 1935, 1936 and 1937, I introduced a resolution concerning housing and reconstruction. One day it was debated from three p.m. until eleven o'clock, and again all the next day; and, as I said then, I do not always believe in cleaning out slums, though that should be done in some districts. I should like to see the contracts between the city and the federal government carried out to the limit, because I think the development around Regent street is a very good proposition. But as I said on other occasions, when you clear out slums a great many people do not want to leave the district. They are near their work and their friends, and if you clean them right out of the district they have to pile on street cars to get to work. That would make the position of our transportation system, which is overcrowded at the present time, even more deplorable. Persons getting on these cars and buses have been badly injured; others using the transportation system have been killed by motorcars.

I have seen some of these apartment house and housing projects. Not long ago I was in the city of Cleveland, and I saw some of the houses that have been built there. Some are occupied by returned soldiers; all kinds of people are mixed up together. The buses are so crowded you cannot get on them, even on Sunday. In a five-acre lot there must be several hundred of these houses, with thousands of people housed there. There you will find all kinds of people, some of them recent arrivals from Europe who cannot even speak our language. The people there are getting sick and tired of these small prefabricated houses. They tire of them in no time and want to move out, and certainly that is not a situation we want in our city.

I admit that in the district in the United States which I have mentioned they have done a valuable work and the houses are very good. They are well equipped with plumbing, like the houses of some of the ministers; they are sanitary; the rents are low, and all the rest of it. As I say, I do not want our city to become a city of apartments. It was not so between the two wars and long before, since the time of the hon. member for Danforth and the other hon. members who are here from Toronto. I believe we should continue to be a city of homes, particularly among the industrial workers.

If I had my way I would revive the old housing plan we had after the first war; the minister has something similar at the present time, I believe. Under that plan Canada lent money through the banks. Before the second war started Canada had lent $85,000,000, and of that only one-eighth of one per cent was lost.

I think there is a great deal to be said for the amendment which was proposed by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Timmins); subventions, bonuses and subsidies are all right as far as I am concerned. I believe subventions and subsidies should be given to the municipalities. For low-rental houses that was done during the time I was head of the city council; buildings were assessed for about half their cost, under an amendment to the assessment act, and that led to a good deal of construction. But that has been abused, and I notice in the newspapers that some changes have been proposed. I would support some federal system like that under which the municipalities would get certain aid. It has been suggested there be provincial aid so that no taxes be imposed for two or three years, and other suggestions have been made by the provinces.

I should like to see the old principle continued of lending money through the banks. The purchasers obtained clear title, and the money was lent at a very low rate of interest. House plans were handed to them free, and as I say some $85,000,000 was lent under that scheme. A great deal of Leaside, parts of Toronto junction and right through north Toronto were built up in that way before the second world war.

There is only one amendment now before the house, because, as you ruled yesterday, Mr. Speaker, a subamendment cannot be moved until the first one is disposed of. I believe the time is past for any more conferences. The municipalities are sick and tired of conferences. Almost every train I have been on during this session has been carrying people to Ottawa to attend conferences. You cannot build houses with conferences. The day for conferences has gone by. The Ontario legislature has adjourned for the year; the city of Toronto has adopted its budget, and so have most of the York municipalities. Toronto some years ago gave assistance through the exemption of certain dwellings under the assessment act, and I believe we should give credit where credit is due for what has been done in the matter of housing—not enough at all, but it is a start.

I believe the government have done some good work. I have seen some of the houses they have built, and some of the apartments. In view of the scarcity of materials and labour this is a start in the right direction, and I am fair enough to say so. I do not believe they have done all they might, but here we see cause and effect; the lack of labour and lack of materials. Personally I think something should have been done to halt the construction of some of these large bank and theatre buildings, where I believe they pay more for their material and their labour. As a civic official I had some experience with carpenters, bricklayers, lathers and plasterers, and I have been told they get better pay when working on banks, apartment houses, theatres and buildings of that kind than when working on small houses; and in addition their work is steadier. That may or may not be true; I do not know.

Then I think some assistance should have been given to make more use of Toronto island. I know what has been done at Belle Isle and along Lake St. Clair boulevard to help solve the housing problem in Detroit. The climate of Toronto island is good; sometimes in the winter it is as warm as it is in the city. If the government had carried out the proposal to build two bridges or a tunnel, that island could be used all year. As it is it does a great deal to lessen the housing problem during six or seven months in the spring and summer.

I believe one of the main reasons for our housing problem—I know because it has affected me—is found in the abuses of our housing control system. I had to part with some property I once owned. I did not need to sell it, but I disposed of it because I could not be bothered with the control system. You got a tenant in who signed a lease for no boarders; he turned the house upside down, let it go to rack and ruin, put in things not allowed in a residential district, profiteered and violated his lease; yet under the control system you could not do anything about him. So I parted with that property at a considerable sacrifice. If we could have some modification of that absurd control system I believe it would help the housing problem, as no one now wants to own real estate with such abuses. Under controls real estate has been permanently injured. It is an impossible system because it prevents private enterprise from building the smaller homes. Under our controls returned soldiers cannot get into houses they have bought with their credits and gratuities. So I believe that as soon as possible we should eliminate the control system as it applies to small houses. As the hon. member for Brandon said the other day fifty per cent is the law in New Zealand; it should be sixty per cent in Canada. For this year there should be a suspension of the building of skyscrapers for theatres and buildings of that kind; and the labour and materials used for that type of building should be diverted to housing projects up to sixty per cent. It is true that the materials used may not be the same in all respects as for banks and theatres, but those costly buildings do lead to higher labour costs and higher costs of materials in connection with the building of small houses.

I believe the doctrine of paying bonuses, subventions and subsidies is a good one; if it is applied properly it would solve all economic needs of all the provinces. As I said earlier, I did not intend taking part in this debate, nor have I done so to any considerable length. But I can tell you this, that we in the city of Toronto have been a very happy people. Those who visited our city the other day would find there a kind-hearted people, a people who have a keen interest for their country in their hearts. Our city was built by people of that description—people of all classes from all parts of the world.

The city council has been committed to a certain program in connection with Regent street, and many other matters, and I hope the federal power will carry it out. I understand from the minister's bill that if any individual applies to the new corporation under Bill No. 280 he may obtain a loan up to ninety per cent. That fact has not been very well advertised either in the newspapers or over the radio. I suggest that there should be more extensive advertising of that fact. If it were known many people would apply immediately. We have something over four months before the early part of the winter—because we realize that immediately after the Canadian National exhibition, early in September, the fires have to be lighted again in our houses. I do not know where many people will be next winter, in view of the great number of applications for possession and ejection which have been and are now being made before the county court judges. Not a day should be lost in building with labour and materials made available. The only way to solve the difficulty would be to have a sufficient number of small houses built immediately. I do not believe in the building of too many larger apartment houses. I would urge that so far as possible the government should get on with the work and have a large number of small houses built in the next four months —and there are only four months in which to do this.

I believe Toronto has done more than any other city in Canada along the lines I have stated in providing splendid municipal service. It has gone a long way in connection with the ownership of public utilities. It owns its street transportation system, and hon. members will be familiar with the Toronto transportation commission. Then, it has been most active in the development of good roads, and has paid forty per cent of the cost of the Toronto-Hamilton highway. The city has contributed to the operations of the York highways commission, which has built a magnificent highways system of fifteen miles in the Toronto area, and which now should be revised as only enabling and assumed by the province.

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended entering the debate on housing, nor do I presume to be able to tell the minister anything about it. I do enter the debate, however, to take issue with the right hon. gentleman in respect of certain statements he made last night, and which, incidentally, he did not substantiate. I should hope he might consider substantiating them today.

I shall now proceed to give the other side of the picture, and shall refer to certain community enterprises which have been entered into jointly. I presume the minister would describe them as subsidized enterprises. They have been entered into jointly by the province of Saskatchewan with the assistance of the federal government.

The minister made certain statements about this housing and its success, or lack of success, when he spoke last night. I presume he was referring to certain community apartments which were built or remodeled in my own city of Saskatoon, and also in the cities of Regina and North Battleford, and other places in the province.

At page 4178 of Hansard the minister said, in connection with this subsidized housing:

> The government has considered subsidized housing. It has built subsidized houses—

And then he goes on to give an illustration. Speaking of this housing project, he said:

> The management of the buildings was left to the province of Saskatchewan and the rentals collected are the property of the government of Saskatchewan. That would be an excellent place for a socialist government, which gives lip service—

And I would rather he had left out the word "lip".

> —to subsidized housing, to practise a little of what it preaches. What are the facts?

Well, sir, I propose to give the facts on one side, and the minister, if he cares to, may give the facts on the other. The quotation goes on:

> Rentals for the housing,—

And it is these lines to which I take exception particularly:

> —largely paid for by the federal government, operated by the socialist provincial government, are somewhat higher than in corresponding localities in the rest of Canada. That is a clear indication that our socialist friends love to give lip service—

And there, quite properly, the minister was interrupted by vociferous objections from certain representatives of this group with such expressions as, "Give the figures". Then the minister said, "I know the figures" and again, "I know the facts". The minister may have them, but he did not give them. Therefore I should like to give certain of the facts on the other side of the argument.

Shortly after that, the minister said:

> We know all about subsidized housing. The difficulty with subsidized housing is that it does not build any more houses.

I shall not go into that general argument; but I will say that these particular houses did give shelter to a great many people all of whom, I believe, were veterans of the last war. While I have not the figures for other cities—although I believe they are comparable—I know that in my own city of Saskatoon 185 family suites were provided. There are 370 adults living in those community apartments. They have been organized co-operatively, and govern themselves. They have an elected council. There is a communal dining hall and cafeteria providing meals for the residents. There are 125 small children, none of whom I believe has yet attained school age—although I am not sure of that statement. There is a supervising nursery provided for the children, and they also receive weekly medical health check-ups.

I would bring particularly to the minister's attention the fact that the rentals for these apartments range from $15 to $35 a month.

Mr. HOWE: That is the highest return for an investment of anything I know of.

Mr. KNIGHT: I presume there are other comparable communities in the cities of North Battleford and Regina. I should like to give what might be called personal testimony to this sort of thing, because we have the evidence of my hon. friend and colleague, the member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), with respect to his son, a returned soldier who is married and who has one child. Those people lived at this apartment in Saskatoon, which is known as community apartment No. 7.

By the way, I should explain that these houses are reconverted from air force buildings brought in from air force field No. 4. This man and his wife, who lived at the apartment, paid $20 a month rent—and I would ask the house to note that that amount covered heat and light. They paid $42 a month for the board of the three of them—I suppose the board of the child would not be costly. In any event, the sum total for those three people, including laundry service, light, heat, food, a nursery service which would have allowed the mother, if it had been necessary, to go to work to help the family—all this was provided for $62 a month. I should be interested to hear the minister's comparative figures of lower cost accommodation elsewhere.

This is not the only case that I am thinking of. There is in the employ of this House of Commons a stenographer who lived with her husband, a veteran, in a community apartment house at North Battleford. They paid $30 a month for a three-roomed suite, and this included light, heat, water and laundry services. They have no children and she, too, could have gone out to earn part of the family income. I do not think this socialist government, which the minister speaks of in a rather derogatory manner, is doing too badly. This subsidized project is providing accommodation for people which cannot be obtained—and I say this with due respect to the minister—in any other place in Canada.

Mr. HOWE: I call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that all the subsidizing is by the federal government.

Mr. KNIGHT: I am not suggesting that we should not have subsidization by the federal government; I am suggesting that we should.

Mr. HOWE: I was suggesting that not much subsidizing is being done by our friends in Saskatchewan.

Mr. KNIGHT: I have put the case as I see it. I wanted to get that on the record, because I do not think the minister has been fair in what he has had to say about our government or about the accommodation we are providing for these boys. This lady to whom I was speaking this morning who lived in the North Battleford project tells me that there is a long list of people who want to get into these apartments. These are the only apartments in this country that I know of where a veteran can live on the present veterans allowance and be able to attend university.

Mr. McILRAITH: Has the hon. member the capital cost of the building?

Mr. KNIGHT: I have not. I presume that that information would be in the department and be more readily available to the hon. member.

Mr. McILRAITH: I was asking a serious question because I wanted to follow the hon. member's argument.

Mr. KNIGHT: I know that the Saskatchewan government paid the same price as any other purchaser for war assets. I do not know whether the Saskatchewan government was subsidized in their purchase of these air force buildings.

Mr. HOWE: They were subsidized for the cost of fitting them up as apartments.

Mr. McILRAITH: I presume that the cost the government paid was eight per cent, but I want to ask the hon. member if he knows whether that is so, or did they get the buildings for nothing?

Mr. HOWE: They got them for nothing.

Mr. KNIGHT: Those figures are more easily available to the hon. member than to me. I do not know the facts, but I presume that the Saskatchewan government paid the same for the buildings as anybody else paid. I know they had tremendous difficulty in getting some of these war assets from the department.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I will not be astonishing anybody in the house if I say that I am opposed to the amendment. I am opposed to subsidized housing for the same reason I am opposed to socialism. I do not believe it is in the interests of the people that their dwellings and homes should be owned by the government. I believe that that would give a new control to the government over the lives and activities of the people which would be a serious infringement upon the liberty and freedom to which we attach so much importance. However, there is nothing novel in this point of view and it is not the reason which prompts me to take part in this debate.

The building of houses is taking place principally in the industrial centres. Earlier in the week I came from Toronto by air, and I saw the great number of houses that have been built just outside that great city and also the housing developments that have taken place within the old city itself. The clamour for housing arises from the industrial population. There has been some natural increase in that population, but the principal increase is the accretion to the urban population resulting from the industrial activities of the war.

When Canada was engaged in the war she made a most substantial contribution to the allied cause through the production of industry. As a result people who had lived on the land and in smaller centres came to the factories, which were largely, if not entirely, concentrated in the great cities. The soldiery returning from the front came to the cities, some of them with wives whom they had married abroad. They took up residence in the cities. To a considerable extent it is due to this accretion from the land and from the smaller centres that the great demand for housing has taken place.

I have not the figures before me. but the population of the province of Saskatchewan suffered a substantial reduction, while the population of centres like Vancouver increased at the expense of the rural areas. Greater Montreal now has a population of nearly a million and a half and Toronto must have a population largely in excess of what it was at the beginning of the war.

I am glad that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is conducting this bill through the house, because it enables me to ask a person who should know a question which I think anyone interested in a long-range housing program must ask. Since the war, Canada has greatly increased her industrial plants and it is the constructors and the future operators of those plants who are seeking housing today. If the people in those categories were properly sheltered the housing problem of Canada would be solved. Not infrequently the ministers refers to a long-range program.

I think it is relevant in determining a long-range housing program for Canada to know the likelihood of finding markets for this greatly expanded industrial machine. What proportion of Canada's total production depends upon foreign markets? We were told at one time that the United States consumed its total production less about seven per cent. We were also told that Canada had to export nearly forty per cent of her production or encounter unemployment and the trials and tribulations that go with producing goods which can neither be consumed nor sold.

I am assuming that the minister will be able to tell the house what proportion of Canada's production has to be exported to maintain full or nearly full employment in Canada. Where are the markets to be found that warrant, in the first place, the great increase in our industrial plant, and where are the markets to be found that warrant the construction of homes in the great centres of Canada for an industrial population that must depend for its existence upon the finding of those markets which can take from the Canadian producer the fruit of his labours? I hope that the minister, out of the abundance of his knowledge and experience, will answer this question fully.

Canada at the present time seems to be entering into international arrangements which are making it more difficult for Canada to trade. Canada has had in the past—and to them she owes her prosperity in so far as it was derived from her industrial activities—sheltered markets. I speak of the preference which we enjoyed in many markets as a result of the British preference. That benefit was so considerable that wise men from other countries came to Canada with large amounts of money which they invested in plants in the hope of sharing in the benefits of the Canadian position.

But those times have changed, and Canada has found it necessary to enact laws, applied by the foreign exchange control board, which deny to the foreign investor, who brought his money here to build plants that he might enjoy the benefit of Canada's foreign and sheltered markets, the right to take home that money. This goes to show that the investment is not considered as safe as it was a few years ago.

Moreover, Canada has entered into agreements at Geneva which tend to reduce Canada's tariffs on a number of commodities which are manufactured by her rivals for the markets of the world, and in particular by the United States. Britain, under the form of government which she now has, is not a serious competitor because life in Britain has become costly and prices under her present system of government have gone so high that she is incapable of competing successfully in the markets of the world with many nations.

It seems to me therefore that a long-range housing policy should be directed to finding abodes for people in places in which they can live when markets fail. How can we expect to enjoy foreign trade? Europe is bankrupt, and Canada, in my view, is suffering today from inflation, largely because she is making goods which she is giving to Europe. A great deal may be said of this policy from a humanitarian point of view, but from an economic point of view it is disastrous, because Canada gets no goods in return for those she sends away, with the result that our people cannot find goods to satisfy their longings, and prices of those goods which are available rise constantly. In consequence we have this spiral of rising prices.

Moreover, under the Marshall plan, to which Canada is subscribing, Canada is sending to Europe not only goods that can be consumed but capital goods, the very purpose of which is to set up manufacturing establishments to produce goods in competition with our own. I have no status to discuss housing in all its intricate details. I profess to know very little about the costs of sewer pipe, shingles, cement and other items which go into the construction of houses; yet I am forced to question a policy which favours the huddling together of people in large cities where they must starve if foreign markets fail. I suggest to the minister that a wiser policy would direct people to abodes nearer the land, where what is called, sometimes with a sneer, subsistence farming is possible. I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that probably ninety per cent of the world's population is yet devoted to subsistence farming. The government should not neglect this relationship between the individual and the soil from which he derives food, shelter and clothing.

I know it is not popular to oppose any policy of housing at a time when there is a great dearth of housing, and when, as has been pointed out by many speakers, suffering, inconvenience, disease and possibly crime may be traced to inadequate shelter in the big centres. Yet, this is a passing phase; borrowing again from the minister the words "long-range policy," which he uses not infrequently, I am bound to question the wisdom of his policy as a long-range policy, because the bill before us tends more and more to make the Canadian people dependent upon markets, the existence of which is not only uncertain but nebulous.

When the minister closes the debate I hope that he will be good enough, out of the wealth of his experience and information, to devote a few sentences to the aspect of the question which I have attempted to lay before the house.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): I wish to say only a few words on this question, but I was very much interested in the speech of the hon. member who has just taken his seat, particularly the first sentence he uttered, which, if I remember correctly, went something like this, that he is opposed to subsidized housing for the same reason that he is opposed to socialism. I hold in my hand Hansard of May 5, in which the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) made a rather good speech on the subject of housing. It is unfortunate that the two speeches from the Progressive Conservative ranks in this respect cancel out each other. I should like somebody in that group to tell us what the party policy actually is, because ours is stated in the amendment before the house. I want to quote from the record where the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard took the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) to task for having made a statement at an earlier time. I will quote directly from page 3644 of Hansard, where the hon. member said:

> I want to call the attention of the house to a statement made recently by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) in a public speech. He said:
> "No government of which I form a part will ever pass legislation for subsidized housing."

I do not know if he was speaking on behalf of the government in that speech or not. At that point somebody interjected: "Shame!" Then the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard continued:

> That was a dogmatic and definite statement, and I think it is the mainspring behind the minister's recession from his enthusiasm in approaching this problem two years ago. That statement indicates a fatal refusal to face realities in this field.
> There is nothing necessarily socialistic about subsidizing housing for the low-income groups.

Take the two speeches together. One hon. member said that there is nothing socialistic in subsidizing low-rental housing, and criticized severely the government for having backed up on that policy. The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) opposes that policy because it is socialistic. Is it any wonder that much of our housing legislation is as confused as it is? I should like to put on the record what the amendment before the house actually is, in order that it may indicate what the vote will be about. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) is in these words:

> That Bill No. 280 be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house the government should give consideration to providing subsidized low-rental housing.

In other words, the question before the house is whether, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the subsidization of low-rental housing or not. I have in mind the action taken about two years ago by the government in giving certain concessions to a company known as Housing Enterprises. In our area we had some personal experience with that company which, because it came under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, was given the privilege of buying up certain airports, tearing them down and using the material for setting up housing units. The local authorities, who were interested in housing, were not given the same type of concession; yet this company, which was, after all, a private company set up by the insurance companies of Canada, collected much valuable material, much of which the company resold to other people at a handsome profit. In the end, after a certain bit of wavering activity, they folded up and nothing much came out of it. In other words, the policy of the government to date appears to me to be not one of subsidizing low-rental housing but rather of subsidizing private companies which are in the business of lending money to build houses to make profit.

The house will have to make a decision on that sooner or later. Either we are in favour of the government assisting directly in the building of low-rental housing for the purposes of the people, or we are not. When this amendment is put it will be interesting to note how my hon. friends of the official opposition vote, in view of the two directly contradictory speeches we have heard from that side of the house, one saying that subsidized housing is socialistic, and therefore he is opposed to it, in spite of the fact that it has been done in England for many years—

Mr. HACKETT: And see where they landed.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: As far as house building is concerned, I think the record of Great Britain compares very favourably with the present situation in Canada.

Mr. McILRAITH: Not very.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: We must remember that there was a little bit of destruction carried on in that country during the war, which we did not have here. But if we take their peacetime construction, both before and after the war, under the coalition and the labour governments, I think we shall find that their house-building program has been extraordinary, considering everything.

I believe enough evidence has been introduced in this house to show that, regardless of what we may think in terms of public or private enterprise, houses are not being built as fast as they are needed, and people with modest incomes are not able to rent even the houses which are available. Therefore the only answer seems to be subsidized housing, or else a lot of people will go without roofs over their heads.

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may take a few minutes of the time of the house to deal with one or two points raised in the course of the debate. First of all, I should like to make a short reference to the statements made yesterday about Wallis house.

Mr. MacINNIS: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, was it not ruled yesterday that any reference to that was out of order? I was not in favour of the ruling, but I think that was the ruling which was made.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I do not recall.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I was discussing the matter, and was asked by the minister and by Mr. Speaker to discontinue, and I did not proceed with my discussion. I had my argument here. I understood the Speaker's ruling was that I was not allowed to continue.

Mr. GOLDING: Your leader did.

Mr. McILRAITH: On the point of order, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) discussed the matter at some length. He spoke after the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I merely wanted to let the house know what I thought might be of some interest to it with regard to that project. I am not defending the project nor advocating it as an ideal project. I think the house, in view of what was said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, should have some information about how that project is administered, who administers it and under what authority. It was merely to complete the record. My recollection is that no point of order was taken.

Mr. FLEMING: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am not concerned with the particular issue, nor would I wish to curtail participation in this debate by the hon. member; but if you will refer to yesterday's Hansard you will see, at page 4163, that this was definitely made a point of order, and it was made a point of order by the minister himself. At page 4163 some reference is made by the hon. member for Mackenzie to the question and the minister intervenes:

> Mr. Howe: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the federal government has nothing whatever to do with the operation of Wallis house, and I suggest that any discussion of that matter is entirely out of order.

There follows further discussion and the minister asks what that subject has to do with the bill before the house. There is still further discussion in which the minister participates, and Mr. Speaker says, at page 4164:

> I would call the attention of hon. members to the fact that the bill before the house is an act to amend the National Housing Act, 1944.

There is further discussion, and at the bottom of the first column Mr. Speaker said:

> May I call the attention of hon. members to the explanatory note in the bill. It states—

And then he quotes the explanatory note and concludes:

> That is the principle of the bill before the house, and I think hon. members should confine their remarks to that principle.

Whether the point of order was properly taken at the outset or not, whether the ruling made was correct or not, it must work both ways, and it is not for the parliamentary assistant to override a ruling made on the objection raised by the minister.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have read the references made on this question by hon. members yesterday; I have also read the remarks of Mr. Speaker, and I cannot find that Mr. Speaker made a ruling to the effect that any reference to Wallis house was out of order. In fact, after Mr. Speaker had made his remarks, I find, at page 4165 of Hansard, that Mr. Coldwell referred to Wallis house and said he had seen conditions there, and no point of order was raised at that time. I therefore rule that the hon. member for Ottawa West may continue with his remarks.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister is going to raise another point of order on you.

Mr. NICHOLSON: He just got in, in time.

Mr. McILRAITH: The hon. member for Eglinton seemed greatly concerned about it, but if he had read a little more of Hansard to the house he would see how ridiculous and unfair his position is. Be that as it may, hon. members can draw their own conclusion—

Mr. NICHOLSON: It was the minister who raised the point.

Mr. McILRAITH: —from the parts he read and the parts that were not read. The fact remains that yesterday the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar did speak at some length about it and left what I consider an incomplete picture of the conditions there.

I thought it only fair, since the house is voting money for emergency shelter, that hon. members should know just how that emergency shelter is administered and where that authority dealing with the actual control of the tenants lies. If hon. members are not interested in that, I am not concerned in pressing the matter at all.

Perhaps I can deal with some matters that are squarely in order, even in the opinion of all hon. members opposite. Wallis house, I might add for the benefit of some members who were not here yesterday, is an emergency shelter undertaking in the city of Ottawa, housing fifty-four families. Perhaps I will not say more about it now. It seems to me that when we are on the bill we should deal with some of the responsibility for it, since it has been raised and given wide publicity.

[Mr. Fleming.]

There is this, however, about emergency shelter generally, and it is well to recall to the chamber just what emergency shelter authority is and how it arose. It arose in 1944, at the end of the year, under the wartime prices and trade board, and it was later transferred, as of January 1, 1946, to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The purpose of it was simply to provide a coordinated agency to assist the municipalities in seeing that maximum use was made of available housing units, and in providing temporary emergency accommodation for families who, through no fault of their own, were without accommodation.

The point I wish to make is that it was never the intention of the emergency shelter administration that emergency shelter units should be regarded as semi-permanent homes for individual families. It was rather intended to assure people who found themselves without shelter that they would be kept warm and dry while they tried to find more permanent accommodation.

Through emergency shelter the type of thing that was done was (a) to lease to the municipalities, on nominal rentals, surplus crown-owned buildings located near congested areas which were suitable for conversion into temporary emergency accommodation, and (b) to make definite grants to municipalities to assist in financing initial costs in converting or building emergency shelter units.

Up to the present time some 8,500 emergency shelter units have been created, and commitments to the municipalities have been in the neighbourhood of $4,650,000. The original value of crown-owned buildings leased to municipalities on a nominal rental for emergency shelter purposes is about $8,250,000. In addition to assisting municipalities, there was some rather active work in assisting universities with the special problem they had with married veteran students.

Some thirteen universities had been assisted in providing a total of 1,439 units. The federal government contributed $1,075,000 toward the cost of providing these units of building—that is, crown-leased buildings—to the universities for emergency shelter purposes at an original value of $1,250,000.

I thought these statistics would be helpful in getting the discussion of emergency shelter back upon its base.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Has the hon. member the rents charged in Saskatchewan as compared with other provinces?

Mr. McILRAITH: I have not them here.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I thought either the hon. member or the minister would place them on the record to support the minister's statement yesterday regarding Saskatchewan rates.

Mr. McILRAITH: I have not rents here at all. In fact, I have very few notes. They are much more sketchy than I would have wished if I had had more opportunity.

It is interesting to recall here exactly what number of houses was provided by the dominion government through direct efforts last year. The figures are: Wartime Housing Limited, 5,421; emergency shelter, 3,751; housing enterprises, 2,847; and by army, air force, navy and transport department, about 1,000, making a total of 13,019 houses provided directly by the dominion government last year.

Mr. HACKETT: What was the total?

Mr. McILRAITH: I am coming to that. In addition to that, and the other houses built last year, the dominion government, through the low-cost housing veterans priorities, provided direct assistance in getting materials for an additional 16,896 houses. As to the total number of houses built, the figure in Canada in 1945 was 48,000; in 1946 it was 67,000, and in 1947 it was 79,000. Hon. members will notice that the figure I have given for 1947 is different from any previously given. The revised figure from the bureau of statistics is 79,000 houses for last year. The preliminary figure used in most of the discussion and debate has been 77,000. The explanation of the difference is simply that they have completed the revision of their work.

Mr. HACKETT: Would the hon. gentleman care to give the breakdown by provinces for 1947?

Mr. McILRAITH: I could get it, but I am afraid I do not have it here; I am sorry.

It seems to me that the whole trend of the debate has been to belittle what has been done in Canada. I rather take the position that the effort in Canada has been quite good; but in taking that position I want to make it clear that I am fully aware of the shortage of housing and the urgent need for more housing. Yesterday we heard so much about all the rest of the world in relation to housing, and it was certainly a great picture, I began to wonder why I was born in Canada. I always had the naive feeling that it was rather a fine place in which to be born, and that I owed a great deal to my ancestors for having come to this country. I took the trouble to get some statistics as to housing in other countries for 1946 and 1947, and I have them here. They show the number of completions in those years, the population, and the number of completions per thousand of population, which I think is the fairest method of comparison.

	Completions	Population	Completions per thousand
Canada
1946	67,194	12,283,000	5·47
1947	79,000	12,582,000	6·29
Australia
1946	25,300	7,449,000	3·40
1947	36,500	7,581,000	4·81
New Zealand
1946	9,500	1,761,000	5·39
1947	11,000	1,803,000	6·10
United Kingdom
1946	243,851	47,175,000	5·17
1947	237,000	49,748,000	4·76
United States
1946	476,400	141,229,000	3·37
1947	900,000	144,002,000	6·25
South Africa
1946	7,219	2,363,000	3·06
1947	8,705	2,397,000	3·63
Sweden
1946	40,800	6,719,000	6·07
1947	40,000	6,785,000	5.90

From an analysis of these figures it will be seen that Canada has provided more housing on a per capita basis than any other of these countries. As I say, I do not want to be misunderstood on that. I appreciate that there are problems in Great Britain, where there was great destruction of plant; and I also appreciate that there is a housing shortage. I am not trying to minimize it; I am merely making the point that in comparing our own construction effort with that of any of the other countries—and I have tried to select the ones I thought would be comparable—our effort appears to be and is, I believe, better than that of any other country.

Mr. BENTLEY: Have they as many trees in Britain as we have?

Mr. McILRAITH: No; but they do not have the frost in the wintertime, either.

Mr. GRAYDON: In order that the statement may be complete, would the hon. gentleman also put on record—I fancy he may have them on his file—the promises made by government speakers during the 1945 campaign as to the number of houses they would build?

Mr. McILRAITH: If the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) will take those promises and forecasts of housebuilding in this country he will find it extraordinary how they have been lived up to, notwithstanding the remarks—

Mr. JACKMAN: Why should it be so extraordinary?

Mr. McILRAITH: I will tell the hon. member, through you, Mr. Speaker, what is so extraordinary about it. On a great many occasions in this house I have had the pleasure of listening to one of my hon. friend's colleagues, from the city he represents, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming)—

Mr. FLEMING: The world's greatest constituency.

Mr. McILRAITH: — and from him I have heard stories of what little had been done in this country in comparison with other countries. I was so much impressed with those speeches that I took the trouble to check up. I found, as I have said quite frankly, that the forecasts and the actual record of accomplishment are almost identical. For instance, I point out to hon. members that last year the forecast was 80,000 houses, and I am advised that the figure of actual construction is 79,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: But that is not the election forecast; that is the House of Commons forecast. I am talking about the election forecast.

Mr. HOWE: You pay attention to the present election; they need your help pretty badly.

Mr. McILRAITH: If the hon. member for Peel wants to deal with elections I shall be glad to do so. However, there are one or two other things I should like to mention. We speak of the housing problem here as though the only authority having anything to do with it were the dominion government. The plain truth of the matter is that the direct responsibility of the dominion government in the field is fairly limited. Rightly or wrongly, property and civil rights were left, under our constitution, to the provinces, and they also have a responsibility. I am one of those who believe that the housing needs of this country can be met only through co-operation on the part of all levels of government having responsibility. That means simply the dominion government, the provincial government and the municipal governments. The municipalities have their problems in connection with taxation and so on—

Mr. NICHOLSON: But the hon. member would admit that the federal government should give the lead in convening these conferences?

Mr. McILRAITH: No, I will not admit that it should give the lead, but I do say most emphatically that it has given the lead. I pointed out to the hon. member a short time ago in my remarks that last year the federal government built directly, of its own volition, 13,000 houses, and provided direct priority assistance for some 16,000 more; and in addition it made money available for a great deal of other building; a very substantial amount of money, indeed.

I come back to the question of co-operation. Hon. members directly opposite have seemed to talk about elections. The simple truth of the matter is that in meeting this most difficult type of problem, a type which requires co-operation from three levels of government, municipalities in the main have co-operated very well. I suppose in a country of this size it is inevitable that one would find a municipality somewhere where co-operation is not as good as it might be. In the main, however, they have tried to co-operate. Sometimes they have been a little slower than some of us might have wished; but I think it is fair to give them credit for trying to do something in co-operation with the dominion government.

The record of provincial governments is something I invite hon. members to think about a little bit. I hope that, with the years that lie ahead, it will increase rather than decrease; if indeed it is possible for the small quantity which has been forthcoming in the past to decrease at all.

It is not my intention here to make any remark which in any way could be used as giving any provincial group the right to come out and say, "How can we co-operate with anyone in the dominion parliament who is making remarks about lack of co-operation?" But I would invite hon. members from Ontario, who were so vociferous a minute ago, to recall what the record of that province is. I invite them not to take my word for it, but to read the legislation of the province of Ontario on the subject. It is on record in our library here.

In Ontario they have had two bills—rather interesting ones. One of them is called "An act respecting provision of services by the province and municipalities to persons occupying dominion crown lands". Perhaps I should say no more about it because, after the bill was passed, the premier of the province undertook that it would never be proclaimed. I leave it to hon. members to read the bill and to see what interpretation they put upon it. It is not exactly called co-operation.

Then there is another bill, Bill 125, which was passed just on the eve of the announcement of the election in the province. It is a very short bill, taking all of a page and a half—a most extraordinary thing. All I can say about it is that I hope it works. I hope it does something to assist in this very difficult problem. For my part, if there is any way to help the province to do anything to assist in meeting a difficult problem, I mean to do it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Call a conference of the provinces first. That would be the first thing.

Mr. McILRAITH: I would point out to the hon. member for Peel that he would do well to read that bill, and then to read the statements made through the press at certain meetings of a party with which he is familiar. He will find quite a divergence. I hope that the press reports are right, and that the bill is all wrong. Sometimes when I read the bill and then read the statements incidental thereto, upon introduction in the Ontario house on April 1—and I do not know whether that date has any significance or not—I can only hope that the bill is all wrong and that the newspaper statements are all right.

In any event, the point I am seeking to make is that it is a mistake for any member of this House of Commons to think a maximum by way of production of houses in Canada can be achieved without continual co-operation of the provinces, the dominion and the municipalities.

Mr. GRAYDON: Why do you not call a dominion-provincial conference and have the whole thing cleaned up? That is at the bottom of it all.

Mr. McILRAITH: The hon. member for Peel persists in asking me that question—and it may have been asked thoughtlessly or, on the other hand, seriously. And if he asks the question seriously, I would ask him only to seek to recall to his mind the experience of the last dominion-provincial conference and the actions of certain leaders from certain provinces at that conference, and since.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Including Nova Scotia.

Mr. JACKMAN: And officers of the federal government.

Mr. McILRAITH: I am delighted to note the interest of hon. members opposite from the province of Ontario in this matter. I am delighted, too, that they have pressed me a bit on it this afternoon, because it will be interesting to note that they do not come back at me with this bill, which is the actual legislative record of the provincial government of Ontario, which they so ardently support. They do not say anything about that. But they do come back at me with all sorts of other questions.

Mr. BENTLEY: Do not judge Canada by Ontario.

Mr. HARTT: That is right.

Mr. GRAYDON: The only strange part of it was that your party supported it. Did it not? That is not easily explained away.

Mr. McILRAITH: Perhaps it is difficult to explain away; but I would just say in reply to that that they must have taken the word of the one who introduced it.

Mr. GRAYDON: It must have been agreed to by your own party. That was Farquhar Oliver's bill, the same as anybody else's.

Mr. McILRAITH: They relied on the remarks of the minister introducing it. I have those remarks here, if the hon. member wishes to hear them. But I would just point out to hon. members from Ontario, that in Ontario today veterans who are in need of housing are invited to make, and in fact are making applications for assistance in getting loans for the construction of houses. There may be some indirect way of providing those loans to the veterans under that provincial bill. But certainly there is no direct way under the bill. It just is not there. Those veterans are making application—

Mr. GRAYDON: Farquhar Oliver supported it.

Mr. McILRAITH: Yes, I know; and the hon. member for Peel may interject all he wishes, but he cannot get away from the seriousness of the position that a few thousand veterans in one province of this country are being invited to make application for direct loans, and are making those applications, and the authority for making them may not exist.

Mr. GRAYDON: And Drew will give it to them; don't worry.

Mr. McILRAITH: That cannot be explained away by the light, flippant remarks of the hon. member for Peel. It is far more serious than that; and, so far as I am concerned, I will content myself by saying that I hope there is some indirect way of seeing that those loans are made available. For my part I mean to do everything I can or of which I know, by way of co-operation, to get out of the bill any value there is in it, for the benefit of the people who need houses.

Mr. GRAYDON: Why raise obstacles to it, then?

Mr. McILRAITH: I am not raising obstacles to it.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are.

Mr. McILRAITH: I am seeking to bring this debate back to the motion before the house, which is a simple motion for second reading of a bill dealing with the federal government's responsibility in connection with housing. It is an amending bill.

There was some discussion this afternoon of the confused and difficult question of subsidies for housing. No one has yet defined exactly what is meant by subsidies for housing. However I was interested in the debate, and particularly in the few remarks of the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Knight). He spoke about some housing provided in his native city, and gave some examples. I did not know he was going to deal with those particular projects, or I would have sought to have the figures here. I am sorry I have not those figures with me. I asked the hon. member for them, because of my keen interest in his argument. I think, however, it may at some time or another be desirable to subsidize in some way some types of housing; although I never have been quite sure of what is meant by "subsidize". I think what the hon. member had in mind was a direct grant toward capital construction; I believe that is a fair estimate of what he had in mind. He spoke about the project, but made no reference to the capital cost of it. I am speaking from memory and have not checked the figures, but my recollection is that the project of which the hon. member spoke consisted of a building which was provided by the dominion government to the province free of cost and that the dominion made a grant in addition toward the cost of converting the building into suitable living accommodation. If there were anything paid for the building I presume it would not be more than eight per cent of the cost.

While the hon. member was asking for a direct subsidy for housing, he made what I considered the most perfect argument I have ever heard against subsidies for housing. He made a better argument than one would expect from a person who was flatly opposed to subsidies in any and all forms in any and all circumstances.

I could not help noting the example he gave of the married couple who were living in the housing accommodation which he described in rather good terms. This was serviced housing accommodation, with light and heat provided at a rental of some $30 a month. He mentioned that the couple had no children, that the husband was working and that the wife was able to go out to assist the family finances by working. From the nature of her position she would receive a salary of about $175 a month.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Not while living in the unit.

Mr. McILRAITH: That was the assistance she was able to give toward the family finances. In any event, the two were able to work and they had this accommodation, with heat and light provided, at $30 a month.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It was some time ago that she lived in the accommodation, not now.

Mr. McILRAITH: In any event, she seems qualified to earn $175 a month. Even though she were getting considerably less, the point is that people with an income like that were living in subsidized housing, the capital cost of which, along with a substantial part of the cost of conversion, had been paid by the dominion taxpayers, by taxpayers in income brackets down to a minimum exemption of $750.

Mr. FLEMING: Why did you not raise the exemption?

Mr. McILRAITH: I am thinking of the effect upon the working men and women of this country who have to pay income tax to an extent to provide a project of that kind to give low-rental housing to persons with that income.

Mr. NICHOLSON: He was a student veteran.

Mr. McILRAITH: I qualified my remarks at first; but I have never in all my experience heard, even from the most ardent opponents of subsidies, any example of a more unfair use or abuse of subsidized housing. I simply point that out.

Mr. NICHOLSON: You just have not the facts.

Mr. McILRAITH: Since the second great war, taxpaying has been a hardship on a good many of our people; and to state a proposition in the bland way in which it was stated, that accommodation should be provided for people with that level of income and in those circumstances, is not the best argument that could be made for subsidies. There may be other arguments that could be made that might be good, but I just wanted to bring the house back to a sense of reality on this question of subsidized housing and to show just what it involves with all its ramifications. I want to thank the house for its courtesy and indulgence in allowing me a few minutes longer and I hope I have added something to the debate.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words at this time. I spoke on this question before and I had intended to leave the rest of my remarks until the bill was in committee and we were discussing it clause by clause. The parliamentary assistant during the course of his remarks stated that the condition of housing in Canada was exceptionally good.

Mr. McILRAITH: Not the condition of housing, no.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Should I say the progress of construction?

Mr. McILRAITH: Yes, as compared with other countries.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I think there is another point of view in that regard. I agree with the parliamentary assistant when he says that there has been good progress in the construction of homes, but I am a firm believer that it is better to build one good house than two poor ones. I have made that statement on several occasions. During the first few years of this program the houses that were built were nothing but a shame and disgrace.

After the program had been in effect for two or three years and there was sufficient time to know what type of house was being built, I recall vividly drawing to the attention of the government the condition of some of the houses which had been built in Hull and which I had personally visited. I think I was possibly the first one in this house to criticize the type of construction that was being carried on, particularly in western Canada and more definitely in Calgary. I recall that the minister stated at that time that the facts which I had brought forth were not true; yet the parliamentary assistant will recall that we have spent millions of dollars in repairing houses that were classed as new houses.

Mr. HOWE: Is the hon. member referring to the program covered by this bill?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Not particularly. I was speaking of housing generally.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member should make that clear.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I will agree with the minister when he says that my remarks do not pertain specifically to the bill under discussion, but it has been drawn to my attention that they are just as close to the topic under discussion as were those a while ago of the parliamentary assistant.

Mr. MacINNIS: That would not be very close.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Having had experience with the houses that were built in the past, I thought the minister of reconstruction should pay particular attention to the type of house that is now being built. Coming a little closer to the minister's question, I would draw his attention to the type of wartime housing built last year. I visited some of the houses which had been built in Calgary along the railroad tracks, and at that time I did not think the way the houses were being prefabricated was good for the housing program. I am convinced that that type of house will not stand up. I think the change that has been made, where the individual has more control over his house, will result in a better type of house. I was never and am not now one of those who think the best type of house can be built by mass production. My view is that you cannot build a whole side of a house and then transport it a long distance on a truck, erect it and nail it into position, and have as sound a construction as when you build step by step right on the foundation.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) was advocating a worse type of house.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I cannot help that. He was speaking on his own responsibility.

Mr. HOWE: Your party will have to get together.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am speaking of the type of house that is being built by the government. The hon. member for Lethbridge was speaking of the type of house that should be built—two very different things. I think the fault was that the government did not have enough competent inspectors, but under this new program which the minister is now proposing the same inspectors, in many cases, will supervise the construction. Unless a change is made in supervision and inspection, I am quite sure that the houses built will not be up to the proper standard.

When the parliamentary assistant was discussing the houses he said that Canada should not be compared with Great Britain, and I agree because conditions in the two countries are not comparable at all. Great Britain is having difficulty in getting materials and has a great shortage of labour. But we in this country, if our resources were channeled into the proper courses, would not have difficulty in getting supplies for building private homes. The fact is, however, that too much material is being channeled into commercial construction.

I agree that some capital construction is necessary, but not to the extent of eliminating private home building, which is what is happening now. As a result, we are running into a great shortage of nails, soil pipe, plumbing and other requisites. We have no shortage of labour for a construction program. Someone has said that you need first-class carpenters, at $1.25 an hour, to build a house. I do not think you do. Certainly the men who are being employed on government housing are not all first-class carpenters. A great many apprentices are being used, as I know from actual experience. I am not criticizing that, because I believe you can and should use many apprentices in this type of work, always provided that you have proper supervision by competent builders. A very large number of people in this country are now unemployed and they could be put to work in the construction business. So there is no comparison between Canada and Great Britain. We have the materials, all the wood materials, at least, and nearly all the metal materials required. The step which the minister announced yesterday of the suspension of the production of barbed wire for two months to encourage the production of nails will help to relieve the nail shortage too. Se we have all the requisites for a building program which would be satisfactory to Canada.

A word about subsidizing. I know that subsidization is not a permanent cure, but I suggest it as an emergency program to meet an emergency condition. There is a tremendous shortage of houses, and subsidies would help to offset the tremendous increase in building costs. It is safe to say that building costs have increased from fifty to 100 per cent. The cost of labour and of materials of all kinds has also increased. I do not think there will be much increase in home building, especially by private individuals, until some method of assistance, subsidies or otherwise, is devised whereby construction costs will be offset. Unless a person is right up against it, he would be almost foolish to build under present-time costs. Yet where is he to live, particularly if he has a family, if he does not go ahead and build his own house? I do not believe you can build the ordinary five-room or six-room house under present conditions for less than about $8,000; I am speaking of the private individual who has to buy his lumber and other materials in small quantities.

Mr. MacNICOL: No working man can afford that.

Mr. JOHNSTON: No working man has sufficient capital to do it.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend says that no one can build houses today. Is he aware that more houses are being built at this particular moment in Canada than ever were built before at one time in the history of Canada?

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am quite aware of that fact, but the minister must acknowledge that everyone who is building a house will go into debt and will be in debt for that house for the next twenty-five or thirty years. The minister will not say it is sound policy for people to be forced to go into debt for the next twenty-five or thirty years.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend was saying that no one could build a house today.

Mr. JOHNSTON: He cannot, on his own resources, and if he gets a house through some government plan he has to pay for that assistance.

Mr. WARREN: Is the hon. gentleman interested in knowing that I know a man who built himself a house, and a good house, for $475.

An hon. MEMBER: It must have been just before an election.

Mr. WARREN: No. There are ways of doing things, if you have initiative. If the hon. member wants to know more about it, I will tell him.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I shall not comment on my hon. friend's remarks because I know from experience that it is impossible to build a house in a city for $400.

Mr. WARREN: I am not talking about the city. If my hon. friend wants the story I will give it to him.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The ordinary common plumbing in a five or six thousand dollar house in the city costs $450.

Mr. WARREN: I still have my story if you want it.

Mr. JOHNSTON: In reply to the minister's remark that more houses are being built today than ever before, I do not think he will deny that those who are buying these houses are going into debt. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) told us in his budget speech last year—and there has been no change in conditions since—that over half the married people in Canada are living on an income of less than $1,500 a year, and the people to whom we are trying to make houses available under this plan are in that income class.

Mr. WARREN: May I add that the man built this house in his overtime while he was working eight hours a day.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I did not get the question. Was it a question?

Mr. WARREN: It was an addition to my contribution.

Mr. WYLIE: A $64 question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I thought the hon. gentleman was endeavouring to ask a question. Let me say to the hon. member—

Mr. WARREN: I will describe the house if you want me to. Give me the time, some of your time, and I will describe it.

Mr. JOHNSTON: When we realize that the people to whom we are trying to give houses are people in the low-income brackets who cannot afford to pay high and exorbitant rent—

Mr. WARREN: $475 is not too much.

Mr. JOHNSTON: If you go out and demonstrate some of the $400 houses you will have something to talk about.

Mr. WARREN: I will take you up on the first opportunity and show it to you.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I should like to see it.

Mr. WARREN: I will show it to you.

Mr. JOHNSTON: It might be the type of house in which you would like to live, but not the kind I would advocate for those who went overseas and fought for this country.

Mr. WARREN: It is a good house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member not to interrupt without the permission of the hon. member who has the floor; and I would ask the hon. member who has the floor to address himself to the Chair.

Mr. WARREN: I thought the hon. gentleman wanted some information.

Mr. JOHNSTON: If the hon. gentleman will sit down I shall be able to address you, sir.

Mr. FAIR: Knock him down.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That would be a pleasure. When we consider that the type of house we are talking about is one that would be suitable for the man in the low-income bracket we see that he must have a salary of around $2,000 a year. Yet the Minister of Finance said that more than half of the people of Canada, if they are married, cannot afford a house in which to live because they do not have sufficient income. That is a drastic picture to be painted by a cabinet minister, and one of the top cabinet ministers at that. How are we to supply that fifty per cent of our population who are in such low-income brackets with houses if we do not assist them by subsidization? I am not in favour of subsidization as a permanent plan, but I am advocating subsidization as a temporary measure to get over this crisis.

Mr. FAIR: To get a roof over people's heads.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Yes; to get them some place in which they can live in a little bit of decency.

Mr. WYLIE: And that would not be a $450 house.

Mr. WARREN: The house I am talking about is up to that standard.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The type of house you are talking about would not pass the inspection of anybody—

Mr. WARREN: It would pass the inspection of anybody in this house.

Mr. JOHNSTON: —because all you would have in it would be a sewer pipe.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. FAIR: I thought it was a backhouse.

Mr. SPEAKER: I suggest to hon. gentlemen that if they have some questions to address to each other they should allow second reading of the bill and ask their questions in committee.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I have just one more thing to which I should like to refer. I should like the parliamentary assistant to the minister to take particular notice of this, because the minister is not in his seat at the moment. I am sure the parliamentary assistant would not want this condition to exist. I do not think the minister would want the condition to exist whereby anyone who participates in this government plan under the very bill that we are discussing today would lose his equity in his house. I say to the parliamentary assistant, and I am sure he knows it, that under the contract, which these companies force a man to sign, it is possible for him to lose every cent of equity he has in his house. Under the contract which he is forced to sign, a man can make every solitary payment except the last one, and he can be kicked out of his home. He can be deprived of all his equity and he can be deprived of the right to go to court as well.

Mr. McILRAITH: He has a legal right—

Mr. JOHNSTON: Under the terms of the contract which he signs—the minister mentioned it the other day, and I shall discuss it in greater detail when we get into committee—a man can be deprived of his equity in his home. I bring that to the attention of the parliamentary assistant at this time so that he may look into it.

Mr. McILRAITH: The hon. member is missing one point. It is a legal right—it is too technical to discuss here—of relief against forfeiture in the courts, and so on.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The only legal right that man has is to go to court to ascertain whether or not he has broken one of the covenants set out in the agreement. Once it is determined that he has broken any single covenant in the agreement, that is as far as his rights go in the courts. There is no disputing that fact. The parliamentary assistant shakes his head and says he does not think that is right.

Mr. McILRAITH: The point I am making is that the hon. member is dealing with the contract. He is completely ignoring the old rules of equity in the law courts. It is too technical to argue without preparation.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The thing I am objecting to is this—

Mr. McILRAITH: If the hon. member will deal with that factor as well it will help.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The thing that I am dealing with is this. Under the agreement which the man signs he signs away his legal rights. When it comes before the court, the court of necessity must take into account the terms of the agreement. It cannot do otherwise. The only right he has in court is to ascertain whether or not he has broken any of the covenants. He has that right. Once the court decides that point, he has definitely signed away his rights under the agreement.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend the member for Ottawa West, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. McIlraith), made a very interesting speech in the house this afternoon. He indicated that his purpose was to bring the house back to the discussion of the bill; he set the house a remarkable example by proceeding to discuss such things as the inequities in the present income tax, the inadequate exemptions, in his condemnation of which I join him, elections, the election campaign under way at the present time in one province, and he got around to the thorny subject of dominion-provincial relations and eventually returned, in the last sentence or two of his speech, to a discussion of the bill once more.

So far as the bill itself is concerned, there is so little in it that one could not expect a lengthy speech upon it, or a lengthy debate. There is not enough in the bill to justify the expenditure by the house of time and effort in a lengthy debate upon it. But there is in the subject of housing in general, and particularly in the housing conditions that still exist in Canada, much that ought to occupy the attention of the house.

May I say this in general with regard to the legislation. Year after year during the lifetime of the present parliament, the government has brought down amendments to the National Housing Act. In every case the attitude of the house has been this, and I think I describe it fairly: Whatever you require in the way of legislation we will gladly give you if you will only put this legislation to work and make it serve the construction of more needed houses for Canadians.

I do not think that on any occasion the house has refused any request on the part of the government for legislation, for anything that could properly be required for straightening out the provisions of the housing act, or clothing the government with whatever powers it asks for in connection with housing conditions.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are two very different things involved in this problem, so far as the government's responsibility is concerned. One of these things is legislation giving the government powers to meet the problem, and the other is the determination that ought to be applied by the government in the exercise of those powers and their application to the problem. Certainly, looking at the legislation submitted by the government to the house for enactment in the past three and a half sessions, one cannot say that there are any serious shortcomings in the legislation, in the view of the government, because it has asked only for minor amendments and the house has gladly given whatever the government has asked.

As a matter of fact, on many occasions the house would gladly have given the government more powers than it asked for in connection with the housing problem. But there has been at all times a sad and conspicuous lack of determination on the part of the government really to grapple with this problem in the way it must be grappled with if there is to be any hope of adequate relief for the people of Canada from the housing conditions under which they have long suffered.

Our great problem has been less an inadequacy of legislation than an inadequacy of effort on the part of the government. We have seen an abundance of evidence lately, yes, and for some time past, of the consciousness of the government of its own lamentable failure. If it would only apply to a constructive solution of the housing problem some fraction of the astuteness, some fraction of the zeal and the stubborn determination which it now exercises in finding excuses for its own lamentable failures, we should be much further ahead toward the goal of decent housing conditions for Canadians.

If, for instance, the minister would be as astute in pressing forward toward the goal I have referred to—the building of more houses and encouragement of the building of more houses in Canada—as he has been in trying to find these excuses for not doing what the house has asked him to do, then indeed we would be in a much happier situation than at the present time.

These excuses on the part of the minister and of the administration in general have taken several forms. First, not in time perhaps but first in its glaring and surprising features, is this. The government now repudiates responsibility for the problem. It fell on shocked ears in the House of Commons on July 12 last when the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply uttered these words, to be found at page 5517 of Hansard of 1947:

> The government takes no responsibility for solving the entire housing problem for this country. It is perfectly ridiculous to suggest that it is a government responsibility. Every city has its own housing responsibility, as has every province. The government is responsible for the returned men, and its responsibility stops at that point.

I do not think any reasonable member of this house will deny that there is some share of responsibility attaching to the urban municipalities, where these housing problems are most acute, and to the provincial authorities as well. But for a minister of the present government, elected on the promises on which this government slithered into office by a minority vote in 1945, to rise in this house and say that the federal government is responsible for the returned men only and that its responsibilities stop at that point, is to utter nothing more or less than a shameful repudiation of government responsibility and of the promises made by this government to cozen the votes of the electorate in 1945.

First of all, let us take the minister's words at their face value. At least he does admit the responsibility of this government for the housing of the veterans. Perhaps he considers that generous, in the light of the spirit of the remainder of the remarks I quoted from his speech. If the government had only met the housing problems of the veterans of this country most of the criticism that has been properly levelled against this government might well have been spared. Everyone who has any first-hand knowledge of housing conditions in this country, particularly in great urban centres, knows perfectly well it is upon the veterans that the brunt of the housing problem has been cast. It is to these veterans that the government made its most extravagant promises; it is to these veterans that the government owes its most sacred obligations; and it is these veterans the government is letting down most severely in its failure to meet the problem. Yes; even within the limits the minister of reconstruction placed upon the responsibility of the government there has been a most lamentable and colossal failure.

I said I would deal with the minister's words at their face value. That is what we find when we take the minister's limitation upon his own responsibility. But should we accept the limitation the minister places upon the responsibility of the government? I say we should not. For the government to say it has no responsibility in general for housing conditions; for it to say its responsibility stops with the veterans, is to be false to the promises this government itself has made.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, as you well know, the housing problem is national in its scope and extent. It is not confined to any province or to any particular municipality. And much of the problem in its most acute forms in the urban centres has been created by reason of the policies of the federal government. We are still seeing these conditions of an emergent and critical nature.

Parliament itself has recognized the federal responsibility. It recognized it years ago by the enactment, in the first place, of the Dominion Housing Act and, later, of the National Housing Act. This government has had plenty of power to deal with this problem. It has had sweeping powers. Our criticism is that it has not used those powers. Had it wanted more powers the house would have been glad to give them on request, provided that the house could have seen some reasonable likelihood of the powers being used to the general advantage in meeting these housing conditions.

But, Mr. Speaker, to those who value the standards of public life which place the fulfilment of promises on a sacred level, the greatest failure on the part of this government must be measured in terms of its own promises in 1945. Those promises were referred to this afternoon in a question or two by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon); and the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith), the parliamentary assistant to the minister, sought to brush them aside by suggesting—he surely cannot really have persuaded himself that it is so—that the promises had been fulfilled.

You know, Mr. Speaker, as every member of this house knows, that the promises made by this government in respect of housing during the 1945 election campaign have not been fulfilled. There was no talk then about limited responsibility on the part of the government. You know what the electorate would have replied to any such statement had it been made by a minister of the crown, whether by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), in the light of his campaign speech in Massey Hall in Toronto, or in the speech made during that campaign by the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), to the effect that the drive for tanks would now become the drive for houses.

Those were the promises. They have not been fulfilled. Apparently this government has forgotten them or would like to forget them; but I conceive it to be the duty of this house to see to it that the government is not permitted to forget them, and certainly that the people of Canada do not forget them. Neither of these ministers nor the minister of reconstruction would have had a very pleasant reception had he gone before a meeting of electors during the campaign of 1945 and said, "There is a very limited responsibility on the part of the federal government in regard to housing. Our responsibility is confined to the housing of veterans." Do you think this government would have come back to office? Certainly to state that proposition is to supply the answer. Not one of these ministers would have had the temerity at that time to make the assertion with respect to limited responsibility that the minister of reconstruction made on behalf of the government on the occasion to which I have referred.

And what of those promises? Well, here is one I hope the house has not forgotten, one that figured prominently in the campaign advertising of the Liberal party in 1945. Here we find a young couple portrayed standing in front of this beautiful, charming home. The young bride in rapture exclaims, with her hands clasped: "What! You're buying that lovely little home for only $13.82 a month?" Why, you could not get anything much better than a henhouse today for $13.82 a month.

[Mr. Fleming.]

How about some fulfilment of these promises? Oh, yes; and there is a great deal of padding in this campaign literature. I think I should read what appears at the bottom of the picture, by way of reply to the enraptured exclamation of the young bride. The answer is: "Yes—$13.82 a month pays interest and principal on a $3,000 home under the Liberal new housing plan." The advertisement goes on:

Yes—it's true! You can have an attractive home of your very own. Putter around the garden. It's all yours to live in and enjoy.

Well, the gardens are pretty empty. They have the gardens, apparently, but they cannot have the houses.

What a break for young couples . . .

Yes, what a break the young couples have had from this government in the matter of housing!

. . . and older folk who never thought they could afford to own their own homes.

These Liberal government plans are now a FACT.

The plans may have been a fact, but the houses have not become a fact.

They are laws already on the statute books—

You see, they were quite satisfied then that they had all the powers required to get the houses built.

—not visions of some ideal "state" twenty-five years away.

The man who wrote that sentence was a master of understatement. At the rate this government is going it will take fifty years and more to fulfil these promises.

They are for you—and now.

Think of that!

The Liberal government has a real, working plan.

I think we would all like to see it.

It advances twenty-five per cent of the loan. You pay a new low rate of interest. You can take thirty years to pay for your home, if you wish.

Then we read:

Other Liberal plans include new farm homes, modernization of your present home, low rental housing, and slum clearance.

Think of that; what a far cry from 1945! What has been done by this government in the way of slum clearance? Then comes this statement, which in the light of conditions in 1948 must shock the conscience of those who have consciences:

We are planning for at least 600,000 housing units, and perhaps 1,000,000. No matter where you live you will be able to reside in a comfortable home of which you can be proud.

That is a sample of the campaign promises of the Liberal party in 1945. What has happened since has been a deliberate repudiation of the responsibility that was inherent in those promises; yes, and a falsification of those promises in the light of their non-fulfilment by this government since.

I wish the government would tell us just how bad the situation is. Why is the situation as bad as it still is? Well, one reason is that the government has failed to use the powers it had. Hon. members will recall that historic day, the first day of April, 1946, when the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply came into the house and announced the end of any attempt to control the channeling of building materials into particular building projects, thereby throwing away the opportunity the government itself had to channel available supplies of building materials into the erection of houses, and giving rise, in inevitable consequence, to the use of those precious building materials in the erection of theatres and many other kinds of projects that could well have awaited fulfilment of the government's plan to house veterans and others.

Not only did that foolish mistake result in the absorption of building materials in forms of construction other than the building of houses, but it absorbed much needed building labour. There has been a great dearth of building labour. That is one reason. If the government had really taken seriously its own promises of 1945, and measured up in any degree at all to its responsibilities as a government in the years which followed that election, then it certainly would have seen that building materials available and building labour available were at the disposal of those engaged in the building of houses.

Today we heard an interesting comparison of figures from the minister's parliamentary assistant. He was most anxious to compare figures in Canada with figures in the United Kingdom. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you and to every fair-minded member in the house that that is not a fair basis of comparison. A fair basis of comparison, and a proper way in which to judge the failure of the government with respect to housing, is to compare what this government has done with what this government might have done if it had used the means at its disposal, and if it had had the necessary will and determination to grapple with this problem.

It will be remembered that on July 22, 1946, the minister made an interesting statement about the housing deficit. He pointed out at page 3672 of Hansard how serious the housing shortage was. He said there was an immediate emergency shortage of 150,000 houses, and even assuming that the government's objective of 60,000 houses in that year were attained, by the spring of 1947 the shortage would have become twenty per cent worse.

When are we to have any similar report from the minister as to conditions since that time? It is high time we had such a report. I asked the minister in the house on July 15 of last year to give the house an estimate of the emergency housing deficit; not the number of houses required for good, standard housing accommodation, but the actual immediate emergency housing shortage for people who did not have proper roofs over their heads. The minister did not choose to give the house any such information. I asked for it, but it was not forthcoming.

I ask the minister now to give the house the best information available as to the actual emergency shortage of housing in Canada. I know, for instance, that in my own city conditions are as bad as ever they were. In today's press I find that the welfare commissioner, reporting to the civic welfare committee at the city hall in Toronto yesterday, stated that the Toronto housing situation is just as bad as ever, and that between 6,000 and 7,000 families are living in accommodation that is unsatisfactory. Yes, we shall be glad to hear from the minister some adequate report on this present shortage of houses.

I spoke about one excuse the minister has been conjuring up. I turn to the other; and it is really an extension of the first one. It is this. The minister is very anxious for any opportunity to blame the provincial governments and the municipalities. Hon. members will recall the readiness with which he was prepared to scrap that portion of the 12,000 houses plan which was announced in Vancouver last fall, when he saw an opportunity of picking a quarrel with the Premier of Ontario over a bill that was before the Ontario legislature at the recent session, known as the crown tenants and provincial-municipal services bill.

Mr. HOWE: Dominion crown tenants.

Mr. FLEMING: The municipalities have done more than this government has chosen to give them credit for. The fact of the matter is that far too much of the burden of this problem has been cast upon the municipalities, a portion far beyond their legal powers to meet, far beyond their financial resources to cope with.

And while this government is making its position plain in opposition to assistance, either in the form of a rent reduction fund or capital contributions, it is worthy of recollection that the government has had no objection at all not only to permitting municipalities to contribute subsidies but—yes—to compelling municipalities to contribute subsidies, if they wanted any of these government-built houses made available to them.

Remember that these houses were made available to municipalities only on the basis of the municipality offering land free of charge, and providing municipal services; yes, and then being content with a return in lieu of taxes which did not begin to compare with the tax that the houses in question would have paid if they had been privately constructed and privately owned.

Yes, the municipalities have been called upon to bear an unfairly heavy share of the load; and this government is responsible for imposing on the municipalities conditions so grievously heavy and onerous that they have been beyond the powers of many municipalities to meet.

I spoke a moment ago about legislation, about one housing bill before the Ontario legislature at its recent session. The parliamentary assistant this afternoon chose to go out of his way to disparage the nature of the bill passed by the Ontario legislature—and, incidentally, unanimously enacted with the participation of all parties in the house, including the Liberal party, or what little there is left of it in the Ontario legislature; he chose to disparage the bill—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would call the hon. member's attention to the fact that on second reading of the bill, hon. members should discuss the principle. I think I have been too generous in the latitude I have allowed; but if the hon. member would read the explanatory note on the second page of the bill he would find that what he is saying is out of order. Then, if he will read the amendment he must also find that his remarks are not directed to the amendment.

Mr. FLEMING: Mr. Speaker, you know the very great respect in which I hold your views and your rulings. But I may remind Your Honour that when you were not in the chair this afternoon the parliamentary assistant was permitted to discuss this Ontario bill referred to, and in disparaging terms. I do not propose to discuss the bill in detail, but it was referred to in this chamber this afternoon.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member knows perfectly well that the debate cannot continue along that line. I would ask him to confine his remarks to the principle of the bill, or to the amendment before the house.

Mr. FLEMING: Mr. Speaker, I seek to give the house the alternative this party would offer to the people of Canada for the kind of policy which this government has laid down for itself, and which it is proposing to follow out. It has been mentioned in the debate; and this bill, and the amendment to it, are to be measured in the light of that policy. The anticipated efficacy of the bill can be measured only in the light of the experience this parliament has had in connection with government administration of housing legislation in the past. I think you will appreciate the relevancy of the reference that I sought to make a moment ago. It is high time that this government assumed the responsibility of taking the initiative in calling into conference the provinces and the municipalities with a view to mapping out a program to meet this housing problem.

I want to point out, in reference to the legislation in Ontario, how it demonstrates the desire of the Ontario legislature for a meeting on this question and to assist in every way possible.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will realize that in this house we deal only with federal legislation, not provincial legislation. I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the bill under consideration.

Mr. FLEMING: I shall leave it at that. I only wish the same ruling had been given by those who were in the chair in your absence. Disparaging remarks should not be permitted to be placed on the record without an opportunity being given to correct and answer them.

Mr. McILRAITH: The hon. member should remember the argument he used earlier this afternoon on the point of order.

Mr. FLEMING: The parliamentary assistant is chuckling over the fact that he got his remarks on the record while I cannot get mine on. That is his idea of fairness.

It is apparent to all by this time that for this government to sit back and not make any attempt to enlist general co-operation when general co-operation is available on the part of the provinces and the municipalities is to fail again. Apparently the government is quite content to fall back upon this worn-out excuse of not being able to do some things because of the constitution. Apparently it would rather have those excuses available for doing nothing than to cut through the knot and call a conference with a view to obtaining co-operative effort by the municipalities and the provinces.

An hon. MEMBER: George Drew.

Mr. FLEMING: They would be glad to come. The government that someone over yonder has just referred to would be glad to come. It has indicated at all times its desire for a resumption of the dominion-provincial conference to discuss this and other questions.

We have lost much valuable time in the last several years because of confusion between a short-range and a long-range policy. What we must have at the present time is a policy that will apply to the present emergent and critical conditions, measures designed to cope effectively with them, united with long-range plans which will have as their objective the clearing out of slum areas and the correcting of substandard housing conditions throughout Canada.

That cannot be done by any one jurisdiction, whether federal, provincial or municipal; it will require the best co-operative effort on the part of all. This government is sorely lacking in a sense of responsibility when it simply sits back and makes not the slightest effort to call a conference for that purpose. Earlier in the session, on March 18, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply was asked whether any steps had been taken to call such a conference and the answer given by the minister was, "No".

Why has there not been such a conference? The municipalities have been asking for it; the provinces have been asking for it, but the dominion government sits with folded hands and does nothing. The program that the Progressive Conservative party offered yesterday will alone bring about a solution of this long-range problem as well as effectively grapple with the immediate critical shortages. That is embodied in the proposals which were put before the house yesterday afternoon.

Mr. WARREN: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. FLEMING: I do not want to hear any more about the $450 house which the hon. member built apparently on the eve of an election.

Mr. WARREN: May I ask a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member has not the permission of the hon. member who has the floor to ask a question he must resume his seat.

Mr. FLEMING: The trouble with many of the proposals which have been put forward in the house, many of them in good faith, from other parties on this side of the house is that they have been much too general. They have not clearly outlined the purpose or the extent of the proposals. There has been no concrete plan offered, and therefore those who would want to know the implications of any proposal find that they cannot possibly accept these proposals when they are so vague and general. They are too vast to be accepted in a debate of this kind.

The situation, then, is that this government will receive at the willing hands of this parliament whatever it requires in the way of powers to meet the situation, but the house will want something from this government that has not as yet been evident. The house will want evidence of a willing determination to grapple with this problem and to accept the full responsibilities that attach to it. The house will want the government to get on with the job, both of fulfilling its promises and measuring up to the commitments it made in the election campaign of 1945.

(Text):

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, before the six o'clock recess the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. McIlraith) distorted—I do not say deliberately—certain statements I made earlier in the afternoon. I am as reluctant as anyone to hold up this debate even for the five minutes that I shall speak, but I do not like to let his words go upon the record unchallenged. Also, for the same reason, I shall stick more closely to my notes than Your Honour usually likes.

When speaking to the amendment I had attempted to show that the Saskatchewan government had provided excellent accommodation for certain young veterans and their wives in the matter of housing. To make my point I had explained that they even had in these quarters a sort of co-operative baby care management, so that I said that the mother, if necessary, could perhaps take some small job. I had in mind something like the occasional hour outside baby sitting, half a day's housework or even working in an office in order to eke out the married veteran's allowance, which has been acknowledged by most people in this house to be somewhat slim. I mentioned also the case of one lady who now, not then, is a stenographer in the House of Commons. I mentioned her case and that of her husband. The parliamentary assistant leaped onto that statement and proceeded to build out of it a fictitious argument against subsidized housing. I want to make this statement now, clear and categorical, that this lady and her husband lived in these community apartments for four months a year and a half ago, and that during the time that she and her husband were there she herself earned no money whatever. Her husband had been discharged from the air force, and was beginning to look around to get established in some work.

The parliamentary assistant made certain wild statements about the lady earning $175 a month, and on that he built up his case against subsidization of houses. Suppose she does now earn $175 a month, or suppose she earns $5,000 a year; what of it? What has that to do with subsidizing housing in the period we are talking about, a year and a half ago.

Mr. SPEAKER: If I understand the hon. member correctly, I must point out to him that he cannot discuss a matter already settled by the house.

Mr. MacINNIS: Your Honour, anything that was said on the amendment which has been voted on can be said on the main motion. The hon. member is speaking to the main motion, and he can reply, in speaking to the main motion, to statements made in the debate on the amendment, because the debate is on the same question.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry, but the question was decided by a vote on the amendment to the motion for the second reading of the bill.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member is dealing with subsidized housing, and that is the question we are dealing with now.

Mr. KNIGHT: Speaking on subsidized housing on the main motion—this is the first time I have spoken on that subject—I am making this point, as I have made it before, and I shall have finished when I do so. Accommodation provided by the Saskatchewan department of reconstruction was good and was cheap; and I am still waiting for proof, in figures, of the minister's statement, which will be found at page 4178 of Hansard, that the Saskatchewan government charged these people more for accommodation than the accommodation could have been obtained for elsewhere. He expressed that idea in the following words, which I quote from page 4178 of Hansard:

> Rentals for the housing, largely paid for by the federal government, operated by the socialist provincial government, are somewhat higher than in corresponding localities in the rest of Canada.

Once more I challenge the right hon. minister to verify that statement with the facts and figures which, on page 4178, he says are in his possession. I quote:

> I know the figures.

And again:

> I know the facts.

He is a responsible minister of the crown and perhaps he would share his knowledge with the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question? Mr. Howe moves that the bill be read the second time. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. MacINNIS: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Powers of approved lending institutions.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would the minister explain what is involved in making this change? The section provides that "section 3 of the National Housing Act, 1944, chapter 46 of the statutes of 1944-45, as enacted by section 1 of chapter 40 of the statutes of 1947, is repealed and the following substituted therefor". The hon. member for Eglinton mentioned earlier that, in every session since he came into the house in 1945, the minister has come to parliament asking for minor changes and assuring us that, if those changes were made, the job of building houses would go on. The minister should give us information as to why this change is necessary; and particularly, in connection with paragraph (b), why is it necessary to "purchase from the corporation any first mortgage or any interest therein that the corporation is by subsection 3 of section 3B of this act authorized to sell."

Mr. HOWE: Clause 1 amends section 3 of the National Housing Act by empowering lending institutions to invest their funds in the purchase of mortgages from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. As the section now stands, approved lending institutions are authorized to lend money up to the amounts specified in the various sections of the act relating to joint loans. These amounts are eighty per cent of the lending value of rental projects, and higher percentages in the case of home ownership loans. The amendment adds the power to purchase mortgages from the corporation.

The mortgages referred to are those which the corporation has, or will have, arising from two sources. The first group consists of mortgages which may be taken to secure the balance of the purchase price of wartime housing units which are, for the most part, sold on a deferred payment basis. In the first instance, an agreement for sale is entered into, with the proviso that when a certain percentage of the sale price has been paid by the purchaser, he may receive title and give a mortgage back for the unpaid balance.

The second group of mortgages that may be affected by this clause are those which the corporation takes to secure direct loans under section 31A of the National Housing Act. Last session the corporation was authorized to make these direct loans to finance the construction of a house or a housing project when joint loans were not being made by approved lending institutions.

In addition to the outright purchase of mortgages, lending institutions are by this amendment authorized to purchase an interest or share in a mortgage from the corporation. In such event, a mortgage so purchased is placed in the same position as if it had been a joint mortgage in the first instance.

As hon. members are aware, life companies and trust and loan companies are limited by their charters and by statute regarding the amount they may invest on the security of a mortgage. The amendment is necessary to ensure that they will not be violating any of their restrictions by purchasing such mortgages from the corporation.

Mr. FLEMING: May I ask the minister whether the clause in question has been the subject of discussion with approved lending institutions, and to what extent they have signified their intention of exercising the powers proposed in the section?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot answer that question. I know the mortgage companies have taken over the government's interest in certain mortgages, which they could do under certain legislation, and I have no doubt they will be glad to buy these mortgages when they are brought on the same basis as mortgages in respect of which they are in the habit of lending.

Mr. MacINNIS: Do I understand from the minister that section 1 is not only an amendment to the National Housing Act but that it also amends the clause under which lending institutions can invest and lend money?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is that the usual way of extending the rights they have under their charters? Is it not usual to put it in the charter itself, the statute that gives that power?

Mr. HOWE: It can be done either way. The insurance act could have been amended, but amending the housing act and conveying authority to the insurance companies through the housing act is just as effective.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am still not clear as to why it is necessary to make this provision. During the war the minister went ahead and built wartime housing all across Canada and there did not appear to be any trouble in financing it. I cannot see now why legislation should be passed to enable the minister to go to lending institutions to help the government carry on its financing in the field of housing. Could the minister explain why it is necessary at this stage, when war commitments are smaller than they were years ago, to introduce this idea?

Mr. HOWE: I must say I cannot accept responsibility for trying to make my hon. friend understand. There is a limit to the power of explanation, but the reason is that the government is selling certain of its houses. It wishes to reduce its commitments, particularly on houses built under wartime agreements. It also wishes to use the funds obtained through the sale of those wartime units to build other units; and in order to do that, it takes the power to sell the mortgages which the government takes or retains from the purchasers of those houses. It is as simple as that.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The other evening the Minister of Finance announced a very large surplus.

Mr. HOWE: I know all about the surplus, and it has nothing to do with this bill.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am sure you know about it; but I think the committee is entitled to more information than we have had so far as to why this is necessary. The lending institutions were not interested in building emergency housing; the government had to assume the responsibility. By and large the people who have lived in those houses are well satisfied. Now the minister is making a safe, attractive investment for the lending institutions. If that is the reason for this provision I think the minister should say so; but with the large surplus announced by the Minister of Finance, it should not be necessary to make provision permitting the government to bail out of its investment in these houses and ask the lending institutions to take over these securities.

Mr. HOWE: I have never represented that it is necessary to do so. I simply represent that it is desirable. If my hon. friend says it is not desirable then he and I must differ; that is all.

Mr. CASE: Is it intended that the government will not have any money left invested in these houses once the mortgages are sold to the lending institutions?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, Mr. Chairman, except for the pool guarantee we give on ordinary housing loans. The loans on houses which will be sold if the provisions of this bill are carried out will then be in the same position as the ordinary housing act loans.

Mr. CASE: And you have a fixed rate of interest?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. CASE: What is that rate?

Mr. HOWE: It is four and a quarter per cent.

Mr. CASE: Would this have anything to do with Housing Enterprises, for instance?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. CASE: My hon. friend says the lending institutions did not give any lead in building houses. I think they did during the war. Housing Enterprises was financed by the lending institutions in the first instance, was it not?

Mr. HOWE: No, it was financed by the government.

Mr. JUTRAS: Last year when the National Housing Act was before the house I made several representations and recommendations to the minister with a view to rendering the act more applicable in the rural portions of the country. I held then and still believe that if more home improvements were made and more homes were built in the rural portions it would alleviate to a large extent the situation in the urban centres.

One of the more concrete suggestions I offered at the time was that a competition should be conducted in this country in order to prepare a book of rural plans for publication along with the book of plans already available for urban homes. I understand that this competition was announced last fall, and at this point I should like to thank the minister and to congratulate him on the way this has been undertaken. As I understand it, this task was turned over to a committee and in turn was taken up by the universities of the three prairie provinces. I am sure hon. members will agree that no better organization could have taken the matter in hand. I was just wondering how it stands today, and I am sure the country would appreciate a statement by the minister on that point.

Mr. HOWE: As my hon. friend has said, committees were formed, one for the prairies and another for British Columbia. During the past winter in every province of Canada, under the joint sponsorship of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the individual provincial governments, a better farm house contest was carried on. Under the authority of part V of the National Housing Act, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation provided $400 in prize money in each province. The respective provincial governments assumed responsibility for the details of the contest, which is being conducted among organized groups of farm women, who are being asked to submit answers to a variety of questions as to how the farm house should be planned and equipped for maximum comfort and convenience.

While the judging of results has not yet been completed in any of the provinces, the contest has aroused a great deal of interest and a gratifying response has resulted. It is hoped that the contest will not only provide much useful information about the requirements of farm housing, but also stimulate a great deal of interest among local groups of farm people in improving the standard of farm housing.

In addition, considerable use has been made by farmers of the Farm Improvement Loans Guarantee Act for the construction of new farm houses and the improvement and remodeling of existing houses. During 1947 some 387 loans amounting to $488,000 were made under this act for the construction of new houses, and 448 loans amounting to $333,000 were made for the purpose of altering and improving existing farm houses. During 1947 also some fifty-seven loans amounting to $58,000 for the construction of new farm houses, and forty-nine loans for altering and improving existing farm houses were made by the Canadian farm loan board under the authority of the Canadian Farm Loan Act.

Mr. MacINNIS: I want to ask the minister several questions before this bill gets through committee, but I do not want him to feel that I am a nitwit if I do so.

Mr. HOWE: I have a great deal of respect for my hon. friend, and I shall be glad to answer his questions to the best of my ability.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have a great deal of respect for the right hon. gentleman, too; but other hon. members of the committee have a right to be treated in the same way, no matter how irrelevant or how silly the minister may consider their questions. They should not be considered nitwits just because they cannot understand what the minister is doing. Perhaps sometimes he does not understand it himself.

Mr. HOWE: Quite right.

Mr. MacINNIS: So if he is going to get snooty I assure him that others in this committee can get just as snooty.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is pretty unparliamentary.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is not unparliamentary at all. This may be a perfectly silly question, but I want to ask the minister if these mortgages will be sold at their face value or if they will be discounted.

Mr. HOWE: I do not think there is any provision in the act for discounting them. They will have to be sold at their face value.

Mr. HACKETT: They might be sold at an upset price in excess of their face value, might they not?

Mr. HOWE: They could be sold at a price in excess of their face value.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I should like to ask for more information in connection with subsection 2 of section 3, at the bottom of the first page of the bill, which reads:

> Where pursuant to the provisions of part I, II or III a joint loan has been made by the corporation and an approved lending institution or where an approved lending institution has purchased an interest in a first mortgage from the corporation, the lending institution and the corporation, to protect the mortgage security, may join in making supplementary joint loans to the borrower and in taking such other measures and steps as may be required in accordance with normal mortgage practice to safeguard the interests of His Majesty and the said lending institution.

Would the minister explain why this new part is being added?

Mr. HOWE: Cases do arise in which it is necessary to make a further loan in order to protect the security. There have been cases in Vancouver where contractors have failed, and where it has been found that the situation could be best worked out by the crown and the lending institution joining to increase the amount of the mortgage. This gives permission for that to be done. It is simply that it may be considered in the best interests of the owner of the property, as well as in the interests of the mortgagee and the federal government, to increase the amount of the mortgage.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. MacINNIS: No. Has the minister any information with him showing the moneys the government spent to finish the houses, where construction failed in Vancouver?

Mr. HOWE: Is the hon. member referring to the earlier or later ones?

Mr. MacINNIS: At the beginning of 1947.

Mr. HOWE: I have not that information with me. But the situation was worked out. It cost the government nothing. It was worked out by increasing the amount of the mortgage, and the funds were found in that way.

Mr. HACKETT: By the government guarantee?

Mr. HOWE: The usual guarantee, yes.

Mr. HACKETT: No, not the usual guarantee—upon guaranteeing the excess.

Mr. HOWE: It was simply brought into the pool. There is a pool guarantee of all mortgages, and the lending institutions and the government decide to increase the lending value on the house, and increase the amount of the mortgage accordingly.

Mr. MacNICOL: The government sells a mortgage, does the money go into the consolidated revenue fund, or does it go into the fund which pertains to the housing problem?

Mr. HOWE: It goes back into the consolidated revenue fund. The title to the house is in the crown.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Contract guaranteeing rentals from rental housing projects.

Mr. FLEMING: This is in some respects the principal section of the bill. There are some features of this section which call for some explanation on the part of the minister. One feature of it which, on its face, I do not like, is the extent of the power and discretion left by the section in the hands of the governor in council.

The purpose of the section, as I construe it, is to permit the corporation to enter into a contract with builders. The purpose of the contracts would be to guarantee annual returns to builders of projects of not less than eight family housing units. The guarantee extends over a period of thirty years. Then, under subsection 5 of the proposed section 8A, it is provided:

> The annual return of rentals guaranteed by the corporation under this section shall not exceed 85 per centum of the annual rental of the units of the project determined by the corporation under paragraph (b) of subsection 4 of this section.

The corporation is given power to determine the rents. I think the committee will wish either to have a stipulation of the amount of the return to be guaranteed under subsection 1 of the new section 8A or some clear statement as to the basis upon which the administration is to proceed under the power for which provision is here made.

Mr. HOWE: I shall be very glad to give an explanation. This section of the bill introduces the rental insurance principle which I explained at some length when we were dealing with the resolution. By this legislation, the corporation will be authorized to guarantee a minimum return of rentals from a rental housing project built in accordance with the terms of the section. The guarantee will be given in the first instance to the builder-owner, and may be assigned to subsequent purchasers of the rental housing project. The amount to be guaranteed will be a figure sufficient to pay taxes, debt service, operating expenses, repairs, renewals and replacements, and a two per cent return on the equity investment of the operator. By these provisions, it is hoped to encourage private enterprise to build some of our much needed rental housing, by providing an insurance against loss during the term of the insurance, and particularly against possible loss resulting from the competition of rental housing projects built in the future under more favourable cost conditions.

I should like to outline briefly the statutory limitations contained in the new section.

(a) The project must consist of eight or more units. The section is designed for project investment, and we feel that in order to have an economic operation, the minimum number of units cannot be less than eight. Hon. members will readily see the administrative difficulties that would result from dealing with a project consisting of a smaller number of units. We particularly fear the family investment of, say, four units in which in-laws are the occupants of a number of the units. We feel that in such an undertaking the owner might be inclined to rely upon the guarantee, rather than charge full economic rents. In the case of the larger operation, the owner in his own interests is concerned with full economic rents, rather than the guarantee. In other words, the section has application to persons engaged in the rental business.

(b) The period of the guarantee cannot exceed thirty years. It may be for a lesser period in the first instance, with provision for renewal. However, the full period of the guarantee cannot go beyond thirty years.

(c) The rents to be charged will be subject to a ceiling for the first three years. This ceiling shall be the economic rents as determined by the corporation, based on the cost of the project. We feel that the owner of a project, supported by a government guarantee, should not be allowed to charge more than the economic rentals, at least in the first instance.

(d) The rents that may be guaranteed cannot exceed 85 per cent of the economic rents set by the corporation.

Mr. HACKETT: How are economic rents determined?

Mr. HOWE: Economic rents are determined by examining the costs of the project and the costs of the services.

Mr. HACKETT: Are owners relieved from the determination of the rent by the boards which still have power in these matters, and which some people think are a source of impoverishment of the owners at the present time, because of the inadequacy of the rents?

Mr. HOWE: Those boards have no control over new construction.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Will it have any bearing upon its relations to rents of other houses in the district?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. HACKETT: Would the minister be good enough to say just a few words in explanation of the method of determining economic rents, as mentioned by him a minute ago. Would it be a public hearing?

Mr. HOWE: No. This is an insurance company. It can take a risk, or not take it. It sets its own idea of economic rents. The economic rent is the—

Mr. FLEMING: The corporation sets the rental, does it not?

Mr. HOWE: Sets the ceiling on the rent, which is a matter of agreement between the owner of the project and the insurance company. If the owner of the project says his economic rent is such and such, he must produce his costs and carrying charges, plus two per cent; and the corporation must agree as to what the economic rent is. After it has agreed with the owner—if it can agree—it can then insure up to 85 per cent of the economic rent. If it cannot agree with the owner, it does not take the business.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall section 2 carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HOWE: If I might proceed. I had reached paragraph (d).

(d) The rents that may be guaranteed cannot exceed 85 per cent of the economic rents set by the corporation. This is the ceiling figure of the guarantee. The actual amount will be a figure resulting from the various items which I have previously listed, but must not exceed this 85 per cent limitation.

(e) The corporation must approve the location of the project, the standards of construction, and the size and type of the unit. This places a control upon the type of construction that will qualify for the guarantee and will assure that the units will be family units in the moderate field.

We are not interested in the luxury class of housing. As I previously stated, the maximum rental that may be charged is $80 a month. This maximum is for a fully serviced unit with hot and cold water, heating, stove, refrigerator and janitor service. It is hoped that such fully serviced units will be produced to rent down to $55 a month. Unserviced units will have a lower rental range from approximately $57 a month to $40 a month.

The section reserves certain matters to be prescribed by the governor in council. The first is the fixing of the premium to be paid by the builder or subsequent owner. When this figure is determined, it will be specified in the contract with the builder. No regulation can, of course, be passed until the bill has been assented to. We have in mind, however, that the interest charges payable on the mortgage, plus the premium for the insurance, will not exceed the 4½ per cent interest rate at present charged on National Housing Act joint mortgages. I will refer to the mortgage financing when we come to the next section, and will deal with the matter further. The premium on the basis I have mentioned would be in the order of two per cent of the rentals to be guaranteed. This might be expressed in another way as one-quarter of one per cent of 85 per cent of the estimated cost of the project.

The governor in council is empowered to place a limitation on the maximum guarantee that may be given. This limitation may be expressed in terms of room cost or unit cost. On the basis of $80 a month for a fully serviced unit, the limitation will be approximately $7,000. The limitation per room would be $1,750.

The new section 8A provides that this insurance shall take the form of a contract between the corporation and the builder-owner, and that the guarantee may be given after completion of the project. In order to enable the builder to obtain financing during the course of construction, subsection 2 empowers the corporation to give to a builder an undertaking that the insurance will be provided if the project is built in accordance with the terms of the section. In practice, the builder will submit his plans and specifications and other relevant detail to the corporation before he commences construction, and at that stage will be given a commitment that if he goes through with his project as outlined he will be given an insurance contract.

Clause 2 of the bill also adds section 8B to the act, enabling approved lending institutions—

Mr. FLEMING: Could the minister deal with the next section 8B separately? I am sure that hon. members will have a number of questions to ask, and the two sections are not interdependent at all.

There are several questions I have to ask which arise out of the minister's explanation. It is quite clear that the corporation will have the real effective power in determining rentals and that two per cent is to be the extent of the guarantee. I gathered from the minister's statement that this is a fixed and determined rate and it is not the intention to vary it at any time. If that is the case, why should the percentage rate not be set out in the statute instead of being left to be determined by the corporation?

The next question I have to ask is perhaps broader in scope than the other questions which relate to the form of the section. I recall the amendments that the house dealt with a year ago. We then had some hopes that they would result in the building of houses. At that time the lending institutions were given certain guarantees of returns in connection with land assembly, in the hope that thereby they could encourage people to come into schemes of a substantial extent. The lending institutions would then have the benefit of lending on mortgages on the houses constructed on the property. But our hopes have been dashed because very little use has been made of the powers conferred by those amendments.

Mr. HOWE: I must challenge that statement. It has taken care of a good many hundreds of thousands of dollars worth.

Mr. NICHOLSON: How many units?

Mr. FLEMING: It certainly has fallen short of the expectations some of us had as a result of the discussions in the house and committee. The results obtained have not measured up nearly to the hopes we formed. This leads me to ask the minister what assurance there is that the proposal of guaranteed rentals will receive wide acceptance and will interest many builders. I take it that it will have to be builders of some substance who would be able to erect the necessary units. Have there been such conferences as would give the administration or the corporation substantial assurance that this section will interest a number of builders?

Mr. HOWE: There have been strong indications that this will encourage a good deal of building by the professional landlord investor. Should there be no building, it will cost this parliament nothing.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister said that the insurance would be limited to 85 per cent of the economic rental. It says here that the contract with the builder will guarantee an annual rental sufficient to meet the charges and provide a two per cent return on his equity. I cannot co-ordinate those two things in my mind.

Mr. HOWE: Of course the two per cent is a bare minimum. The economic rental provides for a larger return than two per cent, but the amount we will insure includes only two per cent.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The owner is guaranteed either two per cent of his equity or 85 per cent of the economic rental?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. It is the same thing, I think.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Will these have to be new projects? In Toronto there are a number of old houses which could be converted into apartment houses of eight or ten units. Could the conversion of such houses be carried on under this measure?

Mr. HOWE: No, they must be new projects.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That would be a splendid way of doing something in the centre of Toronto. As the minister knows, we have too many people living in the city and we need housing accommodation. Rather than allow many of these old mansions to be used only as boarding houses they should be included in this legislation. Many of them would provide a fine nucleus for a good apartment house. That has happened in many cases already. It seems to me that it would be an excellent thing to use houses in certain sections of the city when they are not being used at the present time in an economical way. Is there any reason for not doing so?

Mr. HOWE: It would be too uncertain. In the case of a new building we know what the cost will be and all about it; we know what its probable life will be. The government does not want any more experience in converting old houses.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I understand that this is now done to a certain extent through the lending institutions. On the upper part of Jarvis street in Toronto there are very large houses which I suppose could not be sold today for anything like 20 per cent of their original value, but they are centrally located and if they could be converted into apartment houses they would not add to the transportation problems of the city. There are similar houses on upper Sherbourne street. There is an old house there which has been converted into quite a large apartment house.

Mr. HOWE: The mortgage company does not want the business.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Why not provide that the mortgage company can do the business if it wants to. Is there anything in the bill to say they cannot do it?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It has to be a new house from the bottom up?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I think it is a short-sighted policy on the part of the government. We are talking of slum clearance—

Mr. HOWE: This has nothing to do with slum clearance. We are trying to encourage new construction, and we have no intention of going beyond that.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What you want is accommodation for people, and you want that accommodation at as low a cost as possible. I am certain that many of these old mansions could be converted for a good deal less money than if you start from scratch and build a new house. There are some large and very fine houses that could be converted to provide accommodation right in the centre of the city.

Mr. HOWE: We are not stopping it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There is no place to build an apartment house in the city of Toronto unless you tear down existing accommodation. What will happen under the minister's policy is that houses will be built on the outskirts of the city, thus adding to the transportation problem. With a little help, a good many of these old mansions could be converted.

Mr. HOWE: The government has had experience in converting old houses into modern apartments and our experience in that direction does not encourage us to go any further.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Have you had any losses in that connection?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, lots of them.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Under the home improvement plan?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Did we lose money on that?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): How much?

Mr. HOWE: We spent about $5,000,000 and we shall be fortunate if we recover about $3,000,000.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That is the home improvement plan, which is not in the same category as this.

Mr. HOWE: The home conversion plan.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister did not answer my question in regard to the provision in line 12 on page 2 of the bill, why the rate itself could not be stipulated in the section. If it is the intention of the government that the rate shall be two per cent, why should that not be stipulated right in the section itself instead of being left to be determined by the corporation?

Mr. HOWE: It seems to me a matter that properly comes under the regulations.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I said before the dinner recess that I wanted to say a few words in committee on this section. Section 8A has to do with contracts entered into with builders, and subsection 4 reads:

> The terms of a contract entered into under subsection one of this section shall provide:
> (a) that the builder or subsequent owner will provide efficient management of the rental housing project.

I point out that the contract entered into affects the builder or subsequent owner. Then paragraph (b) provides:

(b) that the rents to be charged in respect of the units of the project shall not exceed, during the first three years after the completion of the project, an amount to be determined by the corporation.

There again I point out that the section refers to a contract entered into between the corporation and the builder or subsequent owner. Then (d):

(d) that the contract, with the approval of the corporation, may be assigned to subsequent owners.

And (e):

(e) for such other matters as the corporation may deem necessary or desirable to give effect to the purposes or provisions of this section.

So that the contract is extended to the subsequent owners. The explanatory note on the opposite page states:

(e) this paragraph provides for the inclusion in the contract of such other matters as the corporation considers necessary.

It is one of such other matters which the corporation may consider necessary that I want to draw to the attention of the committee. Last year the act to amend the National Housing Act, 1944, was up for first reading on May 1, 1947, and I spoke on the question of contracts at that time, and again brought it to the attention of the house this year. I wish to elaborate a little on that point. After I had spoken on it last year, other parties in the country became interested. The government paid no particular attention at the time to the point I raised, but I want to read what the press had to say about it.

Mr. HOWE: Is my hon. friend familiar with the legislation of his own province which protects the owner of the property and the mortgage holder?

Mr. JOHNSTON: That may be so, and I shall deal with that in a moment.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is wasting an awful lot of time. I can give him the facts if he will permit me to do so. He has already spoken on this subject and I know what he is driving at. My hon. friend is not a lawyer, is he?

Mr. JOHNSTON: No, thank goodness.

Mr. HOWE: Let me give you a legal opinion.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Are you a lawyer?

Mr. HOWE: No, but I have a legal opinion here, which I will read:

The contract that is used by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in the sale of Wartime Housing units contains the usual or standard clauses of the agreement for sale that is in use in the province in which the project or house is situated. We consulted local solicitors when we first prepared the contract, and were so advised.

The hon. member for Bow River has objected to some of these clauses which, on their face, appear rather harsh. I am advised, however, that notwithstanding the wording of the agreement, home purchasers are protected from possible hardships by provincial laws concerning property and civil rights, which have been hedged about them. I understand that the clauses which have been used fit into the pattern of the protective legislation, and their effect is known in relation to the local laws. For this reason lawyers are reluctant to depart from these standard forms and the customary phraseology.

I am further advised that if an agreement for sale goes into default, the purchaser cannot be removed from his home without a court order, and that such court order is not granted until the facts have been examined into by a judge. In all cases, a purchaser is given a reasonable time in which to remedy or redeem the default. The hon. member for Bow River knows that in his province this reasonable time to redeem has in the past been stretched over many months.

It is not clear from Hansard whether the hon. member had reference to agreements for sale only, or to the mortgage deed used by lending institutions, as well. I may say, however, that the remarks I have made about the agreement for sale apply in principle to the mortgage deed.

So my hon. friend will see that the agreement contains the standard clauses in use in the province in which the house is situated, to protect the mortgagee or licensee.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am pleased that the minister has read the legal opinion which he has just given.

Mr. HOWE: Now we will get your opinion.

Mr. JOHNSTON: All right, I will give you mine as given to me by your legal department.

Mr. HOWE: Let us have it.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The Department of Justice gave me this opinion. Some of the outstanding lawyers of the country are in the Department of Justice.

Mr. HOWE: Have you it in writing?

Mr. JOHNSTON: I do not think I need to have it in writing. I can interpret—

Mr. HOWE: I gave you mine in writing.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I did not know that the minister would demand it in writing. I see that the minister came into the chamber prepared. I am glad he did, because I can see now that he has given a little consideration to the matter. Before I deal with that I shall mention again the legal opinion to which I just made reference. I was about to say, when the minister made his statement, that at least some of the press of this country have taken notice of this subject. I want to read to the committee what they have said, because it bears out the very thing which I have been arguing here. I would take it that before the press made a statement such as this they would probably get some legal opinion on the matter.

Mr. HOWE: What press is my hon. friend quoting?

Mr. JOHNSTON: It is not the Social Credit press; it is the Edmonton Journal. I am sure the minister would not contradict the Edmonton Journal. In the Edmonton Journal of March 14, 1947, the following article appears, entitled:

One-Sided Agreement of Sale

Tenants of wartime houses would be well advised to have a lawyer approve the agreement of sale before they decide to purchase. After reading one of these documents, which set forth the terms under which the Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation will transfer one of the wartime housing dwellings to tenants, the impression is left that the crown company is taking no chances.

One clause, for instance, stipulates that, if any of the terms of the agreement are not carried out, the purchaser will give up possession "without any notice to quit and without the vendor bringing any action for ejectment", and that the purchaser is to be "without any recourse whatsoever . . . either at law or in equity" against the vendor, for the recovery of any moneys paid. Further, it says that in the event of any breach of the agreement all payments already made "shall be retained by the vendor as and for liquidated damages and not as a penalty."

Another clause announces that in the event of any breach, "the purchaser shall forthwith become a mere trespasser upon every part of the said lands, and may be forcibly ejected therefrom by the vendor or his agents without any of them being in any way responsible for damages."

These clauses appear to the layman to be harsh and arbitrary. In excluding any appeal to the courts of the land, they violate one of the fundamental rights of a Canadian citizen. Although the vendor is a crown company, it cannot be allowed to set itself above the law.

To represent such a document as "Between His Majesty the King, in right of Canada", is to libel the crown itself. It has been charged that the bureaucratic mind is prone to arrogate to itself supreme power and authority. This agreement of sale certainly appears to be a manifestation of such a tendency.

I have just read that, Mr. Chairman, to show that some others are not quite in agreement with what the minister said. The minister went on to point out that the contract which he had referred to was different in each province. Last year I took particular pains to get one of these contracts. I wrote to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for it, and this is their letter dated March 24, 1947:

Toronto, Ontario
159 Bay street

C. E. Johnston, M.P.,
Room 645,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario

Dear Mr. Johnston:

Following your request, we take pleasure in attaching hereto copy of the sales agreement as used for the sale of one of the houses built by Wartime Housing Limited.

It is not just in one province.

Mr. HOWE: This is only one unit; it must be in one province.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I continue with the letter:

This is a standard agreement and is used whether the purchaser is a veteran or a civilian.

Yours truly,
James A. Hall
Supervisor of Sales and Negotiations

I think I would be right in interpreting that to mean that this is a standard contract used all over.

Mr. HOWE: I assure my hon. friend that in the province of Quebec quite a different agreement is used from that of any other province. I believe it is called a hypothec.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I can only take the word of the Central Mortgage—

Mr. HOWE: You are adding a lot of words to the thing that are not in the letter of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. JOHNSTON: It says this is a standard agreement and is used whether the purchaser—

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is not asking questions; he is telling the world. Go ahead and tell the world, and I will not interrupt you

Mr. JOHNSTON: That is what I am doing, because I think the world should know it.

Mr. HOWE: I know it.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Even if the minister may be a little perturbed at the moment, he will probably see the logic of rectifying the mistake. I am not arguing here to be contrary to the minister's view. I am trying to put up an argument—

Mr. HOWE: You are trying to represent to the world that you know something about this situation, and I can assure you that you do not.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I beg your pardon?

Mr. HOWE: You are trying to represent that you are an authority on this situation, and I am sure that you are not, because you are quite mistaken.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am not trying to represent that at all. I leave it to the opinion of the committee. I can understand English, at least. Let me read to the minister what this contract says. He may be quite disgusted and walk out of the committee, but that will not deter me from making this presentation to the committee. It seems to me that this matter is so important that even the minister, although he may be tired and busy, might retain his seat and listen to the argument. We do not all profess to have the same status as he has. I do not say that in a disparaging manner at all, but we are endeavouring to do the best we can for those who are concerned.

I turn to page 5 of this agreement and read this section. Perhaps I had better read the whole section because I may be accused of taking a part out of its contents. The paragraph starts in this way:

> And the purchaser covenants that he shall not permit or commit any waste upon the said land and shall not assign these presents without the consent in writing of the vendor.

Mr. McILRAITH: That is the usual clause in all these transactions.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Yes. I am exceptionally grateful to the parliamentary assistant for telling me that what I am reading is customary in all contracts. That is what I was trying to tell the minister until he got huffy and walked out. He said it did not apply to other provinces.

Mr. SINCLAIR: On a point of order, the minister did not walk out; he is here.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I was saying this is the contract that is used, and the parliamentary assistant agrees with me.

Mr. McILRAITH: I did not say that the contracts were the same in all provinces. I said the clause the hon. member just read is a standard clause in that type of contract.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That is exactly what the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation said in the letter which I read.

Mr. McILRAITH: You will find it in every sales agreement prepared by every selling authority.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Let me go on and read the remainder of this section. This is the written contract entered into between the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the purchasers of these houses, and neither the minister nor the parliamentary assistant can tell me that this contract is not valid once it is entered into; otherwise, what would be the purpose of entering into a contract of this type? It goes on to say:

> And also that he will give up possession of the said lands on breach made in all or any of the covenants herein set forth without any notice to quit and without the vendor bringing any action for ejectment. And that, on such breach, these presents (at the option of the said vendor) shall be void without any recourse whatsoever by the purchaser either at law or in equity against the said party of the first part for or in respect of any matter or thing in those presents contained for the recovery of any moneys paid by the purchaser under or in pursuance of this agreement which payments, in the event of any breach by the purchaser of any of the covenants aforesaid hereby declared, shall be retained by the vendor as and for liquidated damages and not as a penalty.

This is a legal document entered into by the two parties. Certain stipulations are made in the agreement which the man is forced to sign before they will enter into the agreement with him, before they will make any loans for the construction of houses. Before they will make a loan for the construction of a home, he has signed a document which waives his rights to go to the court to secure retention of any equity of moneys which he has paid into this concern. He may have the right in law to go to the court to ascertain whether or not he has broken any of the covenants, and in my judgment that is what the court would decide, whether or not he had broken any of the covenants of the agreement. Once that is decided, then the court will of necessity take into consideration the agreement into which he has entered and which declares definitely that he gives up the right to go to law in order to retain his equity.

I discussed this matter with some of the legal minds in the Department of Justice. The opinion I have just given is the opinion they themselves gave me, and I am sure that any fair-minded lawyer in the house would agree with me in this regard. The other day the minister himself made a statement which I will quote from Hansard. I am afraid he is himself a little bit foggy on the question. At page 3773 of Hansard of May 10, 1948, he said:

> So far as equity insurance is concerned, I do not know any way in which a man can preserve his equity other than by keeping up his payments.

I agree with him there, but I am not so much concerned about that statement, because, so long as he keeps up his payments, he has not broken any of the covenants of the agreement. Then the minister goes on:

> No one can take away a man's equity in his home except the courts, and in a case of hardship the court will appreciate the representations made.

Mr. Johnston: Would not the court have to be governed in its decision partly by the contract the man signs?

Mr. Howe: Perhaps, but courts have been known to be lenient in hard cases.

May I interject that they have also been known not to be.

Mr. Johnston: In the contract if the man fails to make one payment he waives all his rights, even to go to court.

Mr. Howe: Oh, no. Nothing can take away a man's right to go to court.

But I contend that, by the agreement he has signed, he has waived his right to go to court in order to retain any equity he has in the house which he purchased.

I call attention to the next section:

And upon any such breach the purchaser shall forthwith become a mere trespasser upon every part of said lands and may be forcibly ejected therefrom by the vendor or by his employees or agents without any of them being in any way responsible for damages or otherwise therefor. And the vendor shall be at liberty to retain possession of said lands and at his pleasure to resell same without notice upon such terms as he may deem proper and in any event absolutely freed and discharged from all and every claim whatsoever thereto on the part of the purchaser. Time being declared to be the very essence of these presents.

Let us analyse that paragraph in the agreement which the purchaser was forced to enter into. If a man makes every solitary payment and fails to make the last one of $37.50, he has waived his right to any claim whatever to the moneys he has paid in. The mortgage company can take possession of that house for the last payment of $37.50. They can turn round and sell the house for $37.50 to anyone they like. They can sell it for one dollar if they choose. There is no public auction and they can sell it the next day after they have taken it from him. "Time is the very essence of these presents," and once that property is disposed of by the mortgage company, where will the man, who could not even afford to build a house without a loan, obtain the money to go to court to fight these fellows? Yet he is forced to sign away his very rights. I agree 100 per cent with the Edmonton Journal. If that is not dictatorship, I should like to know what it is. I propose to move an amendment, Mr. Chairman, seconded by Mr. Shaw:

That section 8A as proposed to be enacted by clause 2 be amended by inserting immediately after subsection 4 thereof the following as subsection 5:

"(5) The terms of a contract entered into between Wartime Housing Corporation or Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation, as the case may be, and a purchaser, whether a veteran or a civilian, shall not deprive the said purchaser of his right to appeal to any court of competent jurisdiction, in case he is charged with any breach of contract, and in any case where such court adjudges the purchaser to be guilty, he may take action to recover his equity in the property and that present subsections (5), (6) and (7) of the said section be renumbered as subsections (6), (7) and (8).

Surely there is no member of this house who would deprive a Canadian citizen of his right to go to court, and all that amendment does is to guarantee that the purchaser shall have the right to go to court to get possession of the equity which he has in the house. Surely, I say, no member of this house would say that a Canadian citizen has not that right. Surely there is no member of this house who would say that any company, any corporation, any lending institution should deprive a man of that right. There is no question about it that the contract I have read to the committee deprives the citizen of that right, and no corporation or lending institution which tries to take that citizenship right from a man should be permitted to do so.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, I submit that both the amendment and the remarks of the hon. member are out of order. We are discussing a bill to provide for the insurance of rentals. He is discussing the terms of sale or mortgage. It is entirely inappropriate even to discuss the subject on this section or to attempt to amend this section to cover the terms of a mortgage or an agreement for sale.

Mr. JOHNSTON: On page 2 of the bill you will notice in paragraph (e) the following:

(e) for such other matters as the corporation may deem necessary or desirable to give effect to the purposes or provisions of this section.

Mr. HOWE: The purpose of the section is to insure rentals of the building. It has nothing to do with sale.

Mr. JOHNSTON: In the explanatory notes on the opposite page this statement is made.

(e) this paragraph provides for the inclusion in the contract of such other matters as the corporation considers necessary.

And, mind you, the sections I quoted referred to the agreement of sale between the corporation and the purchaser, not necessarily the builder but the purchaser. The word "purchaser" is used and so is the word "owner". The word "owner" is here, so that it is not just a rental proposition. It is true that if you look at page 2, subsection 4, paragraph (b), you will notice that it does refer to rents, as the minister has indicated. But in paragraph (a) reference is made to the builder or subsequent owner; in (d) we see the words "may be assigned to subsequent owners," and in paragraph (c) there is reference to owners again. In the explanatory notes there is definite reference to owners.

Mr. HOWE: Surely this is not in order, Mr. Chairman. The government does not sell the property to an owner. It is sold by one owner to another owner. Under this section all the crown does is insure the rentals. I wish we could have a ruling on that.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We have an amendment moved by the hon. member for Bow River that section 8A as proposed to be enacted in clause 2 be amended by inserting immediately after subsection 4 thereof the following as subsection 5:

(5) The terms of a contract entered into between Wartime Housing Corporation or Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation, as the case may be, and a purchaser, whether a veteran or a civilian, shall not deprive the said purchaser of his right to appeal to any court of competent jurisdiction, in case he is charged with any breach of contract, and in any case where such court adjudges the purchaser to be guilty, he may take action to recover his equity in the property and that present subsections (5), (6) and (7) of the said section be renumbered as subsections (6), (7) and (8).

In regard to this amendment, I think the point raised by the minister is well taken. In section 2 of this bill, section 8A of the act, the hon. member will notice this provision:

Subject to this section, the corporation may enter into contracts with builders to guarantee, in consideration of such payments as the governor in council may prescribe, an annual return of rentals from rental housing projects after completion thereof of an amount to be determined by the corporation, for a total period not exceeding thirty years.

Then:

The corporation may give to a builder an undertaking that the corporation will enter into a contract with the builder under subsection one if the builder builds a rental housing project in accordance with this section.

The minister is quite correct, and I think this amendment is strictly out of order, so I must rule accordingly.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Now that the officials are before the minister, I wonder if he could give the committee some supplementary information. The hon. member for Eglinton asked about the amount of housing we might expect to be provided after this amendment is passed. A year ago we adopted amendments which provided guarantees for land assembly, and the minister said that quite a considerable amount was guaranteed. That is true; but according to the last annual report of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, only four projects have been approved, and we are committed to an expenditure of $5,414 per acre to provide 894 lots, or $1,271 per lot. That is not an impressive report. Four projects in the whole of Canada since the amendments were passed last year, making provision for 894 lots, does not help a great deal. The minister should give some indication of how many units might be expected to be built in 1948 and 1949 if this amendment is adopted.

Then I should like to support the argument of the hon. member for Eglinton that the act should be more specific. While I have great confidence in the minister and his staff, I do not like these blank cheques. When we are passing legislation I think we should state the limitations. We should know the extent to which the treasury of Canada is underwriting this type of rental insurance. If two per cent is all we are guaranteeing, let us say so. If the benefits are to be confined to units costing $7,000 or less, let us say so. The legislation should set out more definitely just what is in the mind of the minister and his administration.

The other evening I took some exception to this sort of guarantee. I was quoting the rents being paid in different parts of Canada by those living in Housing Enterprises units. The minister and I had some difference of opinion concerning the rentals being paid. I was quoting those rentals, and the minister interrupted to leave the impression that all those units are rented with heat, water and other services included. My information is that only 949 of these units, or 28·63 per cent, are rented on that basis. It is difficult for us to understand how you can build, as you did in London, for example, 186 units at an average cost of $8,467 per unit, some of them three-bedroom bungalows and some three-bedroom, story and a half houses, to rent at $48 and $50 a month. I do not know of many private builders who are building houses at that cost and making them available at those rents. If it is possible to build $8,400 houses and rent them for such amounts; if in Toronto it is possible to build houses costing $10,527 and rent them at $55, $65 and up to $77, then I think the minister might explain what type of houses are to be built that will rent at $80 a month furnished. We should know just what position the people will be in.

The other evening I tried to explain that we are guaranteeing that those who construct eight or more units will be able to take the next three years as a base, and they will be assured of eighty-five per cent of the rentals they can collect during those three years. Certainly, if the rents in Ottawa, Winnipeg and Toronto are any criterion it is not very difficult to get $80 a month for new houses. If the government can build houses for $8,700 and rent them unfurnished at $44 and $48 without services, a great deal of money must be made by those who are charging $80, $90, $100 and up. So if those who are to build these houses can rent them at $80, they are guaranteed eighty-five per cent of that amount, or $68 a month, for a period of thirty years.

It seems to me that somebody is going to make a lot of easy money, if some limitation is not placed upon the transactions in the legislation. So I would ask the minister to tell me, if he can, why we cannot have set forth in the legislation the maximum amount that will be paid; the maximum cost of any unit that will benefit; and also the maximum amount the government is prepared to propose to guarantee for this type of housing. I think we are entitled to that information before we give the minister a blank cheque.

Mr. HOWE: I have already given the information for which the hon. member has asked. If he had been listening he would have heard it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: No; the minister has not told us what the commitment is for the treasury of Canada, when this legislation is passed. I was listening carefully, and I have not heard that information.

Mr. HOWE: Yes; I am to tell you how many new houses we are going to insure, is that it?

Mr. NICHOLSON: No; I think the minister should have information as to how many units are to be built, and at what cost, and for how much the treasury is to be committed by reason of this legislation.

Mr. HOWE: I am not a seer or clairvoyant, and I have no crystal ball. I cannot tell how many people will build under this legislation. I have every reason to believe there will be some built under it. I have not consulted every landlord in Canada, so that I have no idea. But may I point out that if there is no building under it, then there is no expense involved to the crown, and no risk to the crown. If there is a fair amount of building and the corporation does a fair amount of business, and if it charges reasonable premiums, it may be prepared to meet any eventuality. The insurance may be easy money for the builder—and it was my hon. friend who mentioned easy money—or it may be easy money for the country. But I have no crystal ball. My hon. friend is asking me an impossible question.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to make some observations on the remarks made by the minister and by the hon. member for Mackenzie. I have not any fear that there will be any great splurge in building under this section, or any great number of people rushing in, as the hon. member for Mackenzie said, to make a killing. My fear is that the restrictions to be applied will be so severe that there will be very little inducement for people to come in under it. I expressed the same fear last year in connection with the amendment before the house at that time. I thought the two per cent return to be guaranteed to lending institutions, which were expected to assemble the land, would not be adequate to induce many of them to participate, and I think my fears were justified.

But, with all that, it still does not clear up satisfactorily the point about the stipulation of the amount. I think it must be clear from what the minister said that no limit is laid down by the act. He has indicated it is the intention to fix by regulation the amount of guarantee at two per cent per annum. That is the provision under section 8A (1).

Mr. HOWE: That is the minimum return.

Mr. FLEMING: But that is not what the minister said. He said that the intention was to fix a return at two per cent.

Mr. HOWE: To fix a minimum return.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister left me with the impression that that was to be fixed for all time.

Mr. HOWE: That is what we insure.

Mr. FLEMING: That is the extent of the insurance, yes. We are talking about the extent of the insurance.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: If that is to be the fixed rate of insurance, the fixed percentage to be assured in all cases, and there is no intention to change that at any time, I am wondering why it should be left to become a matter of regulation, and why it should not be set forth in the section. After all, that is a provision which will create commitments on the consolidated revenue fund. If so, then surely there ought to be some limit fixed by the act or, if the rate is to be fixed as a continuing rate, then the act ought to fix it. If the minister had said that we may have to vary this rate from time to time, as conditions change, I think he might have had a case for leaving it to be determined by regulation. But he has not said that, and he has not made out any such case. It seems to me that, as the matter stands, the rate should be stipulated in the section.

Mr. HOWE: Then I shall say it now. The present intention is that the minimum will be two per cent. If later it develops that it seems wise to change it, the board of directors of the corporation will so indicate.

Mr. FLEMING: Have we that clear, that the minister is proposing that the right be reserved to increase the rate of return?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: Or to decrease it.

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. FLEMING: Then, if the right is being reserved to increase this amount, there is no limit fixed under the bill.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: And, if so, this corporation, without the permission of parliament, could increase the rate on the strength of what the minister has just said to ten, fifteen or twenty per cent; it could be done.

Mr. HOWE: Certainly.

Mr. FLEMING: When we are sitting here to legislate, surely we are not only considering probabilities. We should consider possibilities connected with the legislation we are being asked to pass. If this is leaving wide open to the corporation—

Mr. HOWE: To the governor in council; the regulations are approved by the governor in council.

Mr. FLEMING: All right; we are giving them a free hand to increase the rate, to make commitments on the consolidated revenue fund, and there is no limit under the act. Has the minister not considered, as was done in connection with other provisions of the National Housing Act, the fixing of some limit as to the commitment? We have a number of sections in the act where the extent to which commitments may be made on the consolidated revenue fund is definitely fixed.

If the minister is going to reserve the right to determine the rate of return to be guaranteed to builders under these sections, then certainly this committee has no right to pass the legislation until it knows what the cost will be, has a clear appreciation of it, and knows that there is a limit to it.

Mr. HACKETT: I heard the interchange between the minister and the hon. member for St. Paul's. Is there anything in the act which precludes the application of section 8A to old buildings which would be converted? I know the answer the minister gave; but is there anything in the act which precludes it?

Mr. HOWE: I think the act is clear that it is new buildings.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HACKETT: I have read the act, but I could not put my finger on any such provision.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member will find that section 8A (1) refers to builders. And "builder" is defined in the act as a person who builds a house for sale or for rent on land which he owns.

Mr. HACKETT: But that does not necessarily mean that he must start by laying the foundation and erecting a completely new structure. I think he might take a building which was up, and work such changes in it as would convert it into a series of habitable apartments. I see nothing in the act which would preclude that.

Mr. HOWE: Regardless of that, I can assure the hon. member that the insurance will be confined to new construction.

Mr. HACKETT: Then that will be by regulation, or by order in council.

Mr. HOWE: Just a matter of policy.

Mr. HACKETT: I heard the minister say that money had been lost in some ventures in which buildings already up had been converted. Is this the only reason, or is there another reason, that of wishing to encourage the construction of new buildings?

Mr. HOWE: No, it is the practical difficulty of dealing with old buildings on a wholesale scale. The corporation deals in the creating of large numbers of units of rental space and each old house would be a special architectural problem requiring special treatment. It has been found by bitter experience that it is not a business with which the government should be concerned. I can assure my hon. friend of that because I have had many worrisome hours on that particular problem and I am not prepared to change my mind.

Mr. HACKETT: Would that not depend upon the insurance company? If the rate be not entirely fixed by statute, could not a higher rate of insurance be fixed? The minister knows that there is such a thing as insurance for people who are not in the best of health and that rates go up where a fire risk is greater. What is the reason for confining the benefits of the act to new construction, unless it be that it is government policy to encourage new construction and to have nothing to do with renovations?

Mr. HOWE: The difficulty is that there are so many unknowns about an old house. Who can tell whether a foundation is good? Who can tell what the remaining life is of the materials? It is the class of insurance that for certain reasons insurance companies do not care to take as a matter of business. That is the reason I would not wish the corporation to insure this type of property as long as I am the minister responsible.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did I understand the minister to say that $5,000,000 had been lost in that kind of building?

Mr. HOWE: Two million dollars.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister said they had spent $5,000,000 on conversion and would be lucky if they got back $3,000,000. Is it not a fact that those conversions were done by the government and not by private individuals? It was a government proposition. This is a different proposition. If a man has a well-built house, and there are plenty of them in the city, it might prove useful. It seems to me that it is pretty radical on the minister's part to say that they will not take in any of these houses when there is evidence that there are many such houses in Toronto. I imagine the same thing would apply to Montreal. These houses are too large for people. As I told the minister, I know of many cases where such houses have been converted with good success, and I know of many other houses which could be converted under this bill.

I do not think there would be any more risk than there would be in other building, especially when it is a rental proposition. There is a demand for these units in many areas. It is a pity simply to say no, as the minister is doing. He knows the government was doing this before and it was on a cost-plus basis. No doubt about it they got stung in many cases. Then again it may be too soon to know what the final result will be, because this has been in operation for only three or four years.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. member for Eglinton expressed the opinion that we need not worry too much about this section because it is not likely that many units will be built. I am inclined to agree with him.

Mr. FLEMING: At two per cent.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I do not think many units will be constructed because of the passage of this bill. I am sure the minister will be back next year wanting other changes made. I am not concerned about that, but I am arguing that this is bad legislation for the Canadian parliament to be passing. I suggest that at some time this party will be over on that side and I would prefer not to have a tradition of this sort established. The minister has indicated that the corporation might fix the return at two per cent or ten per cent or twenty per cent. I do not think members of this house should delegate such important responsibility to any cabinet or any crown corporation, giving them the power to make a decision of that kind.

If there had not been so many interruptions yesterday I had planned to go into details as to how much a proposal such as I had in mind would cost if we do not have subsidized rental housing. The minister has suggested a target of 80,000 housing units for 1947 which has almost been reached. Prior to the last election, we argued that there should be 100,000 units built every year for ten years.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. member will confine his remarks to the clause. It has nothing to do with subsidized housing.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If I could have your indulgence for a few minutes, Mr. Chairman, I was trying to compare the placing before parliament of a concrete proposal that would—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: There was a long discussion on the second reading which dealt with the principle of the bill and the hon. member will now deal with the clause, not subsidized housing.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I agree with the hon. member for Eglinton and submit that this clause should be more specific. The hon. member for Mackenzie has just said that at some time his party may be over there. This is an insurance bill. It might be a thousand to one shot, but I should like to see the insurance there. I submit that this bill should be more specific.

Mr. FLEMING: We have asked the minister the significance of the provision as to rate, and he has indicated there is no ceiling on the rate which the corporation, with the approval of the governor in council, may offer by way of guarantee to builders. If that stands, then I for one cannot possibly support this section. Surely to goodness, we are not going to grant the government carte blanche in the matter of these guarantees? We have had it from the minister that it would be perfectly lawful under this section and quite within the powers that the government are reserving to boost these thirty-year guarantees to five, ten, fifteen, twenty or twenty-five per cent. In view of what the minister has said, surely this committee will not pass the legislation in this form. There is no ceiling on it at all; there is no maximum fixed. I suggest to the minister that some limit should be stipulated right in the bill.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I hope we shall get some support from the other side of the house to protect the taxpayers of Canada. I do not care if the minister says that he needs $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 or $200,000,000, but the legislation should have some limit. The return should be fixed as well as the total amount for which the crown is responsible. There should be a ceiling. If the minister should indicate that he does not plan to have any houses built when this bill is passed, then there would not be any charge at all; but if he is going to guarantee a return of twenty per cent on the capital invested in this type of housing, with rents guaranteed for thirty years on the basis of the rentals for the first three years, with a guarantee of eighty-five per cent, then I submit we are passing most objectionable legislation.

Mr. HACKETT: Is this legislation being introduced under some form of emergency? If not, how can the corporation purport to fix rentals and determine what they shall be?

Mr. HOWE: It is by contract. The government is not obliged to insure anyone's project. If the rentals are such as to appeal to the corporation a contract will be entered into. There is no compulsion on either side requiring any emergency power. It is a voluntary transaction between the builder and the corporation.

Mr. NICHOLSON: When the National Housing Act was passed it set out specifically that a joint loan should be made only to a person who owns the land or the lessee and that the joint loan should not exceed 95 per cent of the first $2,000, 85 per cent of the amount by which it exceeds $2,000 and 70 per cent of the amount by which it exceeds $4,000. When the act was passed, no responsible minister of the crown came to parliament and suggested that parliament relinquish its right to determine the percentage and leave it to the governor in council to decide whether it should be 95 per cent, 110 per cent or 120 per cent of the lending value. I submit that this clause should contain a floor; and when we are asked to guarantee rentals on units costing $12,000, $20,000, or $50,000, there should be some ceiling on the type of housing construction that shall be put up and some limit on the guarantee.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 2 carry?

Section agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to make an observation on 8A (3) (a).

Mr. FLEMING: Mr. Chairman, we have not dealt with 8B yet.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I called clause 2 carried.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. ADAMSON: I thought you were dealing with 8A (2). I wanted to move an amendment to 8A (3) (a).

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Clause 2 was carried, but if the hon. member wishes to speak to any subsection of it, and the committee is willing—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. FLEMING: I take objection, Mr. Chairman. It was clearly understood that we would deal with 8A and 8B separately. The minister made an explanation of 8A, and I asked if he would deal with 8A and 8B separately because the subject matter of the two is quite distinct. We have been dealing with 8A hitherto, and I was waiting until it had been disposed of before asking a question on 8B.

Mr. HOWE: I do not wish to be unreasonable, but we must make some progress. It is true that the hon. member for Eglinton asked that we consider 8A and 8B separately. Clause 8A is carried; that must be understood, and if the hon. member for York West wishes to amend 8A he is too late; but I am willing, with the permission of the Chairman, to listen to argument on 8B.

Mr. HACKETT: I would suggest to the minister that he listen to the proposed amendment to 8A. It will take only two or three minutes, and we may be able to finish this bill tonight with a little good will.

Mr. ADAMSON: My amendment is very brief and I think it will be helpful to the committee. It is to add to 8A (3) (a) the words:

conforms with an approved plan submitted by the municipality, and

So that the clause would then read:

(a) the project is completed and is built in an area satisfactory to the corporation and in accordance with standards of construction approved by the corporation; and conforms with an approved plan submitted by the municipality, and . . .

I move it for this reason. The corporation is expending a great deal of money, I think wisely, and this is a very good bill. You are going to build houses in places that are satisfactory to the corporation now, but I feel that the corporation should have some guarantee from the municipality, so that in a few years or in a few months time there will not be an objectionable plant or glue factory or something of that kind built next to one of these rental housing projects. It is only a form of insurance for the whole scheme that some such arrangement should be made with the municipality.

Mr. HOWE: I do not suppose there are three municipalities in any province which have a town-planning commission, and if you made it mandatory that there must be a municipal plan you would restrict the project to a very few areas. The bill implies that if there is a town-planning commission the project must conform with its plans, but to stipulate that would be exceedingly restrictive. I imagine that even in the city of Ottawa there is no town-planning commission.

Mr. ADAMSON: But there is bound to be a zoning bylaw or some form of municipal ordinance or regulation which zones some parts of the city.

Mr. HOWE: A builder would have to comply with such zoning regulations. He could not build otherwise. I accept my hon. friend's suggestion in good faith, but I assure him that his amendment is quite impracticable, and I hope he will accept my word.

Mr. ADAMSON: I will accept the minister's say-so that it is impracticable, but in the riding I represent there are three townships and each one of them has very definitely a town plan for the township, so that if a housing scheme is proceeded with it is safeguarded.

Mr. HOWE: The builder must conform with any town-planning bylaw. He could not possibly build otherwise.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The committee will understand that 8A is carried and now we come to 8B on which the hon. member for Eglinton wanted to speak.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister was going to read an explanatory note he had with regard to 8B. I would ask him in doing so to be good enough to note the rate of interest that 8B(2) provides:

(2) The mortgage or hypothec referred to in subsection one of this section shall be in such form as the corporation may approve and shall
(a) bear interest at a rate not in excess of a rate prescribed by the governor in council.

Mr. HOWE: Clause 2 of the bill also—it is section 8B of the act—enables approved lending institutions to make loans to assist financing of projects which qualify for rental insurance. It will be noted that the amount of such loan may be eighty-five per cent of the cost as determined by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. These costs will be determined by the corporation when fixing the amount of the guarantee referred to in section 8A. The rate of interest is to be determined by the governor in council. As I previously stated, we have in mind a rate that will, when combined with the premium, not exceed 4½ per cent per annum calculated semi-annually. This will be in line with the other provisions of the National Housing Act. The resulting interest rate expressed in the mortgage will be approximately 4½ per cent per annum calculated semi-annually.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Will the minister indicate how much will have to be included in the estimates next year to cover this item? When and how will this amount be voted?

Mr. HOWE: Nothing at all, Mr. Chairman; it is a statutory appropriation.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Transfer of property of Wartime Housing Limited to corporation.

Mr. FLEMING: There is an important provision in subsection 6 which says that "the corporation may pay to a municipality or other taxing authority an amount equivalent to the taxes". May we be sure that the payment in lieu of taxes will be equal to what would be paid on the property if the crown or the corporation had no interest in it?

Mr. HOWE: That clause is in the Farm Loan Board Act. It is simply a provision which allows the corporation to protect its interest in the property as far as taxes are concerned.

obtain the participation of municipalities in housing projects.

Has the minister any statement to make regarding the number of municipalities that may be interested in receiving the benefits of this paragraph?

Mr. HOWE: Generally those that have taken part in Wartime Housing agreements.

Mr. FLEMING: I have a question on subsection 3. What kind of lands are those that it is proposed the governor in council may transfer to the corporation? It is a very general provision. To what kind of land is it intended to apply?

Mr. HOWE: Wartime Housing land.

Mr. FLEMING: Entirely?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Next sitting of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Now.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): There is no amendment.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I understand that the question was, "When shall the bill be read a third time?" Next sitting.

Mr. HOWE: There is no amendment.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I understand that it requires unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I remind the hon. gentleman that there is no amendment.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I understand that, unless there is unanimous consent, a bill cannot be read a third time at the same sitting. The senate is not in session, and the bill would have to go before the senate anyway.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Next sitting.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

AMENDMENTS TO ACT OF 1934

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 18, consideration in committee of Bill No. 300, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, 1934—Mr. Chevrier—Mr. Golding in the chair.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose the last time we were dealing with section 40.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): That is right.

Sections 40 to 43 inclusive agreed to.

On section 44—Appointment of harbour masters at harbours designated by governor in council.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Just one moment; slow down.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Section 44 has to do with the appointment of harbour masters by the civil service commission. It is a new departure, and I think an acceptable one.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I should like to ask one question on this. Does that mean that every harbour master of every designated public harbour is to be appointed by the civil service commission?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. SINCLAIR: And on salary?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. SINCLAIR: If a harbour master is appointed at Horseshoe Bay he will be appointed by the civil service commission on salary?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not know about that particular instance, and therefore I should not like to answer in connection with it. It is certainly the intention of the section as it is.

Mr. WINTERS: Does that apply to a harbour master at a port where there is no revenue coming into the port? There are some harbour masters in ports where there is no revenue. Nevertheless they do a considerable amount of work gratis.

Mr. CHEVRIER: This has to do with public harbours. If there is a public harbour a harbour master may be appointed. He may not necessarily be appointed.

Mr. SINCLAIR: At a public harbour where a harbour master is appointed he will henceforth be on salary and under the civil service commission.

Mr. GILLIS: Would the minister mind defining what constitutes a public harbour?

Mr. CHEVRIER: A public harbour is a harbour which has been defined by limitation; in other words, one whose description has been covered by a separate document under the Canada Shipping Act.

Mr. GILLIS: That is vague and indefinite. I have a specific case in mind. I read it into the record around 1942. A harbour master had been dignified with that title for a period of about twenty years. He is held responsible for the regulation of traffic in and out of the harbour, must report to the customs officials and be responsible for clearing and entering vessels, and so forth, but he receives no salary.

Mr. CHEVRIER: He will receive a salary from now on.

Mr. GILLIS: Will that be retroactive? The officer I have in mind has been there for twenty years. Surely, if he is entitled to a salary now he should have been entitled to it all along. You apply now to the civil service commission, and I suppose the man who has held the job for twenty years, performed that service, will not be eligible for the position because of certain educational qualifications.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. GILLIS: Is that the idea?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do any ships use the harbour?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, a couple of hundred ships in and out of that harbour a month.

Mr. WINTERS: What is the name of the harbour?

Mr. GILLIS: I am not sure whether there is too much revenue.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There should be revenue with 200 ships a month.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If there is no revenue it might be decided that a harbour master is not necessary, and one would not be appointed.

Mr. GILLIS: It is a responsibility of the department again. I took that matter up also. A large number of ships from Newfoundland come into that harbour during the fishing season. There is wharfage there, the facilities of the department.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: It is eleven o'clock. Shall I report progress?

Section stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Tomorrow we appointed at Horseshoe Bay will he be appointed by the civil service commission on salary?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Speaker, if I am the only one objecting, and hon. members wish to have third reading tonight I will withdraw the objection I raised earlier.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Thank you, very much.

Mr. HOWE: I move third reading of Bill No. 280.

Mr. FLEMING: I would ask that it be allowed to stand until tomorrow.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Then, Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall take up third reading of Bill No. 280, to amend the National Housing Act. Then we shall resume the budget debate, and in the evening, if it is convenient, we may take up the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 21, 1948

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ADAMSON—VOTE IN COMMITTEE ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

Mr. RODNEY ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. In the Globe and Mail of May 19 the following words appear, referring to the meeting of the industrial relations committee on May 18:

Mr. Croll gained Progressive Conservative support by reason of that party's recent adoption of union security as a plank in its labour platform.

As a member of that committee I say this report is not in accordance with the facts. The vote on the amendment was one Progressive Conservative for the motion and five Progressive Conservatives against the motion.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

COMPENSATION OF STAFF—REFERENCE TO JOINT COMMITTEE OF REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State) moved:

That the report of the civil service commission recommending changes in the compensation of the staff of the library of parliament, laid on the table of this house on the 5th of May instant, be referred to the joint committee on the library of parliament.

Motion agreed to.

FLAX

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT OF BONUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LEWIS MENARY (Wellington North): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, of which I have sent him notice. Last spring the Hesky Flax company, in Ontario, distributed flaxseed among the farmers of our district. They gave the flax to the farmers for seed and were glad to get this seed back plus a bonus for the use of the seed. In addition they were to have the privilege of buying the flax. A farmer came in to see me on Saturday—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member knows that in putting a question he should be brief and to the point. If the question is lengthy I suggest that he put it on the order paper.

Mr. MENARY: This farmer was in to see me on Saturday. He delivered about sixteen tons of flax to this company and he has not been paid the bonus.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I suggest that the hon. member put his question on the order paper.

Mr. MENARY: My question is, when will he be paid the bonus on this flax?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this hon. member does not take up a great deal of the time of this house—

An hon. MEMBER: You do.

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, I shall deal with you myself at the proper time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like the hon. member to be permitted to put his question, because whether or not these people over here want to treat seriously the problems of the farmers, I believe at least this question should be answered.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member knows perfectly well that it is against the rules to make a statement when asking a question. The question should be brief and to the point. Two or three times I asked the hon. gentleman to put his question and to be brief. He did not do so. I suggested then, and I still suggest, that he put his question on the order paper.

Mr. GRAYDON: He did ask the question. I do not think Your Honour heard it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Orders of the day.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, surely the hon. member should have a chance to ask his question. He has already asked it, but I do not think Your Honour heard it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Hon. members will realize that there is only one Speaker in the house, who is responsible for order.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Why has not the bonus to which the hon. member refers been paid?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said he had given me notice. I have not received that notice, nor have I the faintest idea of what the hon. member is talking about —and I think the hon. member for Peel is in the same position.

Mr. MENARY: I sent the notice this morning.

POSTAL SERVICE

CARRYING OF MAIL BY AIR—IMPROVEMENT AND EXTENSION OF RURAL SERVICES—SERVICE TO P.E.I.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Postmaster General, in view of the statement he made yesterday. Will all first-class letter mail originating in Prince Edward Island and carried by Maritime Central Airways have the same advantages of airmail transportation as if Trans-Canada Air Lines operated to Prince Edward Island?

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): In my statement of yesterday I said that in the near future feeder lines would have the same privilege. We are organizing that. It may not be ready for July 1, but we want to extend the same scheme to them.

ONTARIO ELECTION

ATTENDANCE AT MEETING ADDRESSED BY MR. FARQUHAR OLIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the hon. member's interest in the matter, would he explain to the house why last night, by actual count, there were only 197 persons present at a Liberal rally addressed by Mr. Farquhar Oliver?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

VICTORIA DAY

QUESTION AS TO SITTING OF HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. GLADYS STRUM (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the house will be sitting on Monday.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Yes. We have frequently sat on May 24; this year, as hon. members are anxious to get through before the end of June, or by the end of that month, I think the general desire would be to sit on Monday.

NATIONAL HOUSING

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved the third reading of Bill No. 280, to amend the National Housing Act, 1944.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): With the co-operation of the house I shall detain hon. members for only a few moments.

Statistics in connection with New Zealand prompt me to bring the figures up to date. Both the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) and the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. McIlraith) referred to housing in New Zealand as compared with Canada. I have checked our statistics and with New Zealand officials here, and I find that in the figures for last year there is a slight discrepancy. The figures given yesterday by the parliamentary assistant indicated that 11,000 units were built in New Zealand last year. I am told the final figure is 12,734, a ratio of seven per thousand, which is slightly higher than the figure for Canada.

I wish however to draw the attention of hon. members to a comparison between the two countries in the field of government assistance in connection with housing over a period of years. In Canada we embarked upon assistance to housing in 1935, in the same year New Zealand elected a Labour government. In Canada since 1935 we have given assistance under the National Housing Act to 54,459 units; under Wartime Housing to 31,192 units; and then, as to houses built under the Canadian Farm Loan Act, although only 167 have been officially reported, I am told that for some years records were not kept. Assuming however that there were 50 each year for eighteen years, this would give a total of 900; and under the Farm Improvement Loans Act there were 994. This makes a grand total of 87,545 houses in Canada built as a result of government assistance.

Mr. McILRAITH: Go ahead and tell about the other government plans.

Mr. NICHOLSON: This is compared with—

Mr. McILRAITH: Mention integrated housing—Housing Enterprises.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have given the figures.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The figures you wished to give.

Mr. COLDWELL: These are official figures.

Mr. NICHOLSON: In New Zealand—the hon. member may bring this up if he has additional information—there were 68,453 units, or 38 per thousand as compared with seven units per thousand in Canada.

Mr. McILRAITH: I think perhaps the hon. member did not grasp the purport of my inquiry of a moment ago. What I was seeking to ask him was about the other government plans to which he omitted to make reference. I have in mind such things as integrated housing—Housing Enterprises—emergency shelter, Veterans' Land Act, and so on.

Mr. NICHOLSON: These are in the tables I got this morning from government departments. They coincide with the figures the minister gave the other day. The comparison shows 38 units per thousand of population in New Zealand as compared with seven units per thousand in Canada.

I might mention that state houses in New Zealand have a kitchen, living room, two bedrooms, usually a sun porch or verandah. The house is placed on from one-eighth to one-quarter of an acre. It rents for 25 shillings a week, which at the the present rate of exchange is about $15 a month. In view of the large number of units which have been built in New Zealand I suggest this comparison is most interesting.

The minister checked me up on statistics I gave in connection with incomes in Canada. I said before that I was using the latest information from the bureau of statistics, that of 1942, and I was correct in that statement; apparently that is their latest information. According to those statistics, seventy per cent of Canadian families were getting less than $2,000 a year. I find however that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) has compiled information as to incomes up to date and I am therefore pleased to make the necessary corrections. According to the very latest information from the Minister of National Revenue, which relates to the 1946 taxation year, about 68 per cent of Canadian taxpayers are getting less than $2,000 a year. There is this slight correction, therefore—from 70 per cent to 68 per cent.

I wish to conclude by emphasizing again the fact that I am not running Canada down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am merely comparing what Canada did during the war years and what Canada could do if we were getting the leadership from the minister's department that he gave in the field of construction during the war. Canada has set records in the last two or three years in the building of theatres, cocktail bars, bowling alleys, luxury hotels—

Mr. SINCLAIR: And factories.

Mr. NICHOLSON: But we certainly are not setting any worthwhile record in the building of houses for our people. We have plenty of luxury hotels, but we have not been able to break any new records in providing houses for the 68 per cent of the people who, according to government statistics, are receiving less than $2,000 a year.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 18, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, since we adjourned the debate on Tuesday night there has been time for us to learn something of the public reaction to this measure. So far as we have gone I should not think the Minister of Finance has taken much comfort from it. The mildest word I have heard used is "disappointing", and the word "black" has been used almost somewhat freely. The word "vinegar" has also been on people's lips. I shall have something to add to this torrent in my small way.

First of all, I wish to say something about taxation in a general way. It is hard to realize that less than ten years ago, in 1939, when we thought we were paying taxes, we were really paying nothing compared with our present taxes. At that time the per capita tax was $38.76, which for a family of five—let us call it a normal family—would be $194. Of course in those days most of the taxation was in the form of customs and excise which was largely concealed from the ordinary taxpayer so that he was almost unconscious of the fact that it was taxation at all.

In the intervening years the government has invaded our lives deeply. We have to make large payments for interest, and the Minister of Finance takes a large slice of our income for the social services which we have approved. We have made huge additions to our debt because of war, and we have to make large expenditures—perhaps not as large as we may have to make—for defence. A large dollop of our income goes for government-owned enterprises. We are in the railway business, the film business and various other businesses and they nearly all cost money.

I think it is very desirable that the taxpayer should have present in his mind exactly what is happening to him and what it costs to support all these outlets. As I said a moment ago, the federal tax in 1939 was $38.76, but the federal tax is now $198. The total tax from the three taxing jurisdictions is $259 per capita, or roughly $1,300 per family of five. I imagine that there is a feeling in some quarters that that is an average figure which does not mean very much to the average man. It is felt that it is paid by the well-to-do, but there never was a greater mistake than that. It is quite true that people with large incomes are being heavily taxed—and that is having an effect, and the effect is bad, on investment capital—but after all they have paid has been collected it represents only a small fraction of the total. To all intents and purposes the average is spread over the rest of the community. The average family may as well face the fact that that is what it is contributing to the national revenue, that that is what it pays.

I suggest that it is worth looking for a moment to see what it gets. First the average family knows what it gets for its municipal tax. It gets street lighting, education, water and all that kind of thing. It is interesting to note that municipal taxes during that period have not gone up; they have remained almost identically where they were, being roughly still $125 for the family of five. There has been an addition of $875 in that period, almost wholly in the form of dominion taxes. I think it is desirable that the people who carry this burden, the people who are trying to look after themselves, should realize just how much they are paying. After all, $1,300 is not chicken feed. I suggest that if every family knew just what was happening they might take a greater interest in what is going on.

This naturally raises the question of economy. I am not going to say a lot of old things about economy. Not long ago the Minister of Finance said in this house—I sympathize with him—that keeping down expenses was quite a job. He also said that he felt he did more for it—this is a free interpretation of his words—than anyone else in this house. That may be so, but after all he is the only one who really has a chance.

It is hard to abandon wartime spending. Spending is a pleasant thing and, as I say, it is difficult to get away from it. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply will be glad to have me recall to him what he said in this house in the autumn of 1945 in answer to a question of mine. He said:

> I dare say my hon. friend could cut a million dollars from this amount, but a million dollars from the war appropriation bill would not be a very important matter.

It was not a very important matter to him, but in Muskoka-Ontario we think that a million dollars is quite a lot of money. After we have been spending at that rate it is very hard to cut down. I should like to say a word about how the total number in the civil service has grown. I recognize that there are reasons for great growth, but the figures are interesting. In 1939 there were 46,000 civil servants; in 1944 the number had grown to 113,000, and in 1946 to 137,000. The full figure, including those in government corporations, at the peak was 173,000, from which there has been a substantial recession.

It is hard to know whether the post-war economy effort has slackened at all when there are still over 150,000 people in government employ. I suggest that there is always a great deal that could be done if only the Minister of Finance could harden his heart enough. I suggest to him, with every desire to be helpful, and I am sure he knows that that is always my wish, that there is only one way to economize, and that is to give people less money to spend.

It seems to me that if the minister gets involved in arguments with departmental heads about the reasonableness of what they would like to have, he is lost before he begins. If the minister could somehow or other put himself in a frame of mind when he is going over these items of having a deficit, of actually believing that the money is not there; if he could only say to department A or department B, "That is all you can get," I think he would be amazed to see how somehow or other they would get along with the money he would give them.

I heard of a manufacturer who had a pleasant and simple theory that there were two kinds of employees in a business, those who produced and those who did not produce. Among those who did not produce he included the clerical staff. He came into the managership of a new company where he found a clerical staff of about forty. He fired the lot of them. After that he began to take them back gradually one by one, but he took them back only as it was established to his satisfaction that they were really needed. I am not suggesting any such heroic measure to the Minister of Finance, but I am suggesting that there is only one way of getting economy; that is, he should not argue with people over what they would like to spend; he should tell the departments what he is going to allow them. After all, the trouble about the minister is that he can come along and put his hands in our pockets. If he were not able to do that I think he would find that people would manage to get along with less.

There is another kind of expenditure that is made, which while not very large in itself, is bad because it creates a most unfortunate impression on the public mind. I refer to the expenditures made for various kinds of commissions. Take for example, the price spreads committee. It is going to cost the country a lot of money. The Minister of Trade and Commerce will say that it is just chicken feed because he does not think a million dollars is any money at all, but when the ordinary taxpayer finds out how much it is costing for lawyers, for accountants, for stenographers and all the various incidentals, he will think it is quite a lot of money.

When we set up bodies of this kind I think it is proper to ask just what they are going to do. It is not fair to take this price spreads committee because it has been such a fiasco. It was beaten before it started. I feel sorry for my friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), who has had to preside over it, because, as I say, from the start he was beaten. If he did not find that prices were extravagantly swollen, he was going to fail; on the other hand, if he found that they were swollen, he would be criticizing government departments, the department of investigation and the department of control, for not keeping them down.

As I say, that kind of commission is undesirable. Compared to other large expenditures it will not be much, but I think it creates an impression in the public mind that we are careless with their money. I do not think parliament should be asked to lend itself to that kind of thing.

I come now to the minister's surplus. The other night he said it was of a nature to gladden the heart of a finance minister. But I do not think it should have gladdened his heart, and I am not sure it did, because in the latter part of his speech he spoke more realistically about it. It rather should have saddened his heart, for this reason: the surplus was due, first, to the unfortunate rise in prices, which jumped the taxes; second, to the tremendous spate of buying from the United States, which also greatly increased taxes, and third, to bad estimating.

I come now to the minister's taxation proposals. I have referred already to the widespread disappointment. Of course the trouble is that people want to spend their own money. They think they know how to do that better than governments, and they would like to have as much of their own money to spend as possible.

I said that I approved of budgeting for a surplus, and so I do; but the question is how much of a surplus? On that I would like to say a word further.

The reason I believe in budgeting for a surplus is this. From time to time there are bound to be periods of lesser activity during which, when you consider the obligations which the state has now assumed, we shall have to budget for deficits. Therefore if in a time of large income we do nothing to pay off debt, then the debt is going to go up and up and up, and in the end confidence will be destroyed. Nevertheless it is pertinent and proper to discuss how much the surplus should be. The minister was cagey in discussing this; he played with his cards very close to his chest. The one universal comment made when the minister was through was: Well, no election this year. The reason is obvious. The reason was that the minister did not, like little Jack Horner, put in his thumb and pull out a plum. He was very chary about distributing anything that even looked like a plum, and that gave rise to the thought that the plums were being kept until later. That might be a suspicion of unworthy minds; nevertheless it was widely entertained, and it was what everybody had in mind when they said: No election this year. This may be said: if the hard-pressed taxpayer is being denied relief this year in order that at some later time, with an election pending, little Jack Horner may put in his thumb and pull out a plum, that is wrong, and the taxpayer should resent it, and it should be changed before this budget passes the house.

Let me look for a moment at the figures. The minister is budgeting in the coming year for a surplus of $489 million. Last year he budgeted for $190 million, and he explained that that would be reduced by $110 million if the three provinces, that had not come to agreement with the federal government, came in. Let me repeat those figures. Last year he budgeted for $190 million, and tax relief of $160 million. This year he is budgeting for a surplus of $489 million; and he is giving tax relief nominally of $60,000,000, but really it is only $40,000,000 because $20,000,000 of that is in the amusement tax, and that involves merely a change in the burden, so it is really only $40,000,000.

Let us take this $489 million. Last year the minister's actual surplus was $460 million more than the estimate. He budgeted for $190 million and his actual surplus was $650 million. I am not suggesting that there is going to be any such excess this year. I do not think there will be. Nevertheless I feel confident that the budgeting is done very cautiously. Nobody wants to be caught out in overestimating. I think it is resonable to assume that $489 million might become $500 million or $600 million or more, but I am not going to press the argument. I am going to assume that it is practically, say, $500 million. If the debt reduction were the only thing we had to think about, no one would be more pleased than I to see $500 million used in paying off debt. But that is not the only thing we have to think about. There is the fact in the first place, that living costs have gone up considerably, and it is important to relieve the hard-pressed low-income taxpayers. Secondly, we still need to provide incentive, because we still have a situation in which the government in one way or another has been providing a terrific incentive to industry, and one day that will have to be done by ourselves. Therefore I say it is important to have the incentive. There is a third reason which it is proper to take into consideration, and it is this. We are in danger of being faced with a new tide of wage demands, and if anything can be done to relieve the cost of living in the lower income brackets I think it should be done, and done without delay.

I would like to read a word or two from a broadcast in England the other day by the Right Hon. Oliver Stanley, because it is relevant to the problem we are discussing now. Speaking of the British budget on April 7 last he said:

> We don't quarrel with the need for a substantial surplus, but we do differ from the chancellor as to the way he has got to get it
> He had a choice: he could get it by imposing heavy expenditure and still heavier taxation, or he could get it by a substantial reduction in expenditure, with a lower rate of taxes.
> Unfortunately he chose the first, and by doing so he stopped himself offering any large tax reductions to encourage incentive and increase production—the other and the better way of fighting inflation.

One further quotation from Mr. Stanley—and this has particular relevance to this budget:

> Make no mistake: however necessary such a budget may be in these dangerous times, it does not by itself get us anywhere. The real relief will only come with greater production, and that will only come with greater freedom and greater incentive. Fewer controls and lower taxes: that is what we want to see.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario).]

In the light of that I venture to suggest to the Minister of Finance that there are certain things he could do and do now. I suggest that there should be a contribution to the cost of living by an increase in the exemptions for people in the low income brackets. Just in case anyone wishes to know if I have a figure in mind, I say no; but I have had an inquiry made and I think I am in a position to reach the conclusion that a substantial measure of relief could be given to those in the low income brackets at a cost to the treasury of not more than 25 per cent of this figure of $500 million, which I have taken as the likely surplus.

There is one other thing I want to suggest, and I think it is of very great importance. I am sure everyone will agree, even those who do not share the view that private enterprise is the solution to our economic problems, that the lifeblood of private enterprise is that new and small businesses should constantly be coming into the picture and be encouraged to become bigger. Those of us who believe in freedom, and are just as strong as anyone else in disliking monopoly, believe that that is the way to do it. Therefore I suggest that the minister might take into consideration the giving of some relief to small enterprises—and I mean small enterprises of any kind. Someone asked me if that would include a farmer, and I said yes—anyone who incorporates his business and therefore comes within the four corners of the corporation tax act. I suggest to the minister, and again I am not going to give a figure, that it might be desirable, in cases where income is reinvested in the business, where there is no question of anyone taking it out, but where income is really invested and becomes the means of further employment and further production, there should be an amount at the bottom which is free of tax, and an amount above that where the tax might be five per cent, another amount where it might be ten per cent, and another where it might be fifteen per cent, the full tax to become payable at a comparatively modest amount. I repeat that I think such a measure would be of great benefit; and while I am not attempting to estimate its cost, I would think its cost at the present time would be very little indeed.

So far we have been considering what you might call the dividing up of the cake that we have. We have a certain amount. How are we to divide it up? I want to turn to a larger area—far more important in one way, because our whole welfare is bound up in government policy here. After all, whether we like it or not, government is in our affairs, government is influencing us at every turn, and it becomes of tremendous importance whether they make right decisions or wrong ones—because they are making decisions, and big decisions, all the time.

Having said this, I turn to the question of trade. There is no need to waste the time of the house one second to say how vital trade is to all of us. On December 9 the Prime Minitser began a debate on the Geneva trade agreements. By an unhappy chance, Mr. Speaker, these agreements were announced almost on the day, perhaps on the very day, that we also had announced the spate of embargoes, permits, quotas and all these other things which the Minister of Finance denounced the other day, quite sincerely I am sure, but which unfortunately have been forced upon us. In other words, the government found itself in the position of opening the door to trade with one hand and banging it shut with the other.

It would appear as if in this case the Prime Minister's instinct for timing had failed. The other day the Prime Minister was kind enough to give some advice—he gave it in a kindly way, as the Minister of Labour would say—to my leader. I am now going to read what the Prime Minister was kind enough to say the other day. He said, as reported at page 3939 of Hansard:

> I give my hon. friend a word of counsel. It is always wise to try to anticipate all possibilities before they arise. In so doing you do not find yourself unnecessarily embarrassed when the important moment comes.

I am inclined to think that the Prime Minister would regard what happened last autumn as an exception, perhaps one of the very few exceptions, to his successful following of his own advice. I will say to the Prime Minister that if he was embarrassed when he made that speech on the Geneva agreements, I did not see any sign of it. I regret that he made a first-class political speech, not the kind of speech I hoped he would make. I hoped he might have taken the trade agreements out of politics, but he did not; he put them right in.

In opening the debate the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 100 of Hansard:

> I should like to say that it is a source of particular satisfaction to me that the present agreement should be so completely in line with what has been the policy of the Liberal party in Canada from the days of Sir Wilfrid Laurier down to the present time,—

I was sorry to note that apparently Alexander Mackenzie and Edward Blake no longer enter into the picture. I hope that does not mean that Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself will ever be forgotten. At any rate that is what the Prime Minister said. He went on to add:

> —and that it should be my privilege to present it to our parliament. The Liberal party has always been in the van in the struggle for greater freedom of trade.

Further on he said:

> The party has always acted on the belief that prosperity is inevitably associated with extensive and general international commerce.

It is interesting, in the light of that, to look at the Liberal budget of 1930, which, I think I am correct in saying, gave the tariff its biggest single hoist since 1878; and of course we all remember the steel pipe duties in the autumn of 1945, when unfortunately the Prime Minister himself was away. So far as we can judge there was a bit of mutiny across the gangway at that time. At any rate we know this, that the increases in the duties were abandoned. Whether it was by reason of the master's voice from Winnipeg is really not a question we need pursue further.

These jarring notes of 1930 and 1945 are mild compared with what has been done since. We all remember the exchange conservation bill. A moment ago I referred to the spate of exclusions, quotas, permits and all these special powers given to the minister, to whom I must not refer in any way that he will not like.

The Prime Minister did not take part in the debate on the exclusion and conservation bill. I imagine the Prime Minister was embarrassed—at any rate too much embarrassed to take part in that debate. I imagine he realized the truth of the words of the negro gentleman who said: "Massa, dem two things don't paralyse."

I now want to come to the remedial measures, which were quite highly advertised last autumn. They do not seem to be working very well. The imports in January and February of this year stood at $287 million, which I understand is a record. There is an interesting circumstance there. Capital goods are coming in freely. Apparently the only people who have actually suffered are housewives, and people who, like the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman), like lettuce and other innocent things of that kind. They have suffered, but capital goods are coming in. No doubt the minister, as I shall point out later, committed himself to an extravagant and unwise policy of special depreciation.

According to the minister, last autumn we were going to correct our difficulties largely by increasing our export of manufactured goods to the United States. I should like to read the minister what he said at that time. They were glowing words. He said:

> My experience tells me that if we will make the building up of United States dollar exports a national objective, we should be able to balance our trade in a matter of months, and on a high level, rather than on a restricted level.

I am not going to haggle again about months, because we had that out last December. I am not quite sure what the minister explained, but at any rate it was limited by the minister to the matter of months. These practical men become very visionary at times. At any rate it looks as if up to the present moment what the minister did tell us then has proved to be a bit of a mirage, because so far as I can learn from competent authorities the amount of additional manufactured goods exported to the United States up to the present time has been trifling.

The well-informed Ottawa correspondent of Maclean's said in the last issue of that magazine that our present position in United States dollars shows no improvement, or very little improvement, over the low point of last December. In other words I think we may say that up to the present the program has been a flop. In addition, of course, we must not forget that we have had to borrow $80,000,000 from the Export-Import bank. This is the first time we have ever had to borrow, I believe, from a government authority in the United States.

I turn for moment to the excise bill. It is a kind of Siamese twin to the conservation bill. This was the bill that was made law by radio last November. We always found it difficult here to understand what that bill was for. It imposed a tax on Canadian goods with United States content, and it also penalized Canadian manufacturers of goods which were excluded from the United States. As a matter of fact that bill always seemed to me to be like a chameleon. It never seemed to keep the same colour. First of all, we thought it was a bill to conserve United States exchange. Then the minister candidly explained that they would never know whether it would save any United States exchange at all, because they would have to look at the over-all picture. Then there was this penalty clause against Canadian manufacturers. That seemed to be the point. When we pressed the minister on both these points and did not seem to be getting anywhere, it turned out that taxation was a feature, although at one time they were very unwilling to admit it. As a matter of fact I think the bill was very well described by my colleague the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), who is at the present time out winning by-elections in British Columbia. I shall read what he said:

> We are being asked to vote for something born in a fog, something which lived in a test tube . . . but the doctors, chemists and others now do not even know what they put into the test tube in the beginning. Yet we are asked to vote for legislation under those circumstances.

I do not think the government members liked the bill better than we did, but they held their noses and voted for it.

The reason for all this shemozzle is, of course, something with which we are all familiar. I will not take more than a minute or two to point it out, but it all goes back to July 1946. In July 1946 business had been allowed its head a bit; we were getting along quite well, and there is every reason to believe that we would have got along better, but the people in charge of controls felt that they could not leave the ordinary person to carry on his own business, and therefore they decided, as we all remember, to appreciate the dollar.

I wish to be fair. I believe they had the idea, that United States prices would go up and would then come down, and we would take the low road instead of the high road and meet United States prices coming down. The only trouble was that, as the governor of the bank of Canada pointed out, the predictions were all wrong. United States prices did not come down and things did not work according to plan. Apart from that, they were right, as the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) says.

Now, as I say, in 1946 we were getting along all right, though we did not know it, and the results of the appreciation are in the minds of all of us. There were two results. First, there was a run on American exchange, and in fifteen months we lost $1,100 million. Nothing was done until November of last year, and that is so recent in our minds that I need hardly take the time to refer to it. I will, however, mention the second result; for every day it is getting worse. The second result was the measure taken then to cut off American investment, practically like turning a tap. It has been a natural and, I submit, inevitable and useful part of the economic structure of the country from the outset that we should have American investment, and free American investment.

We are somewhat in the position that the United States were in in the last half of the nineteenth century, when they received constant and large investments from the United Kingdom. That was cut off, and one leading Canadian financial expert said the other day:

> There is no purpose in American capital coming into Canada at the official rate when Canadian free dollars or securities can be purchased at a substantial discount in New York.

The discount is now something like 7½ per cent. He says further, and this is important; for people in various walks found it out last summer: "The same applies to our tourist traffic." In other words, tourists, too, buy dollars at a discount.

It does seem an irony. In the first six months of 1946 nature was beginning to take its course. We were receiving American investments at the rate of $25,000,000 a month, which was very useful, and then we cut them off. Then, having cut off the money, we had to cut off goods by restrictions which not only were bad from our point of view but were doubly and trebly unfortunate, at the very time when we were hoping that the United States was becoming multilateral-trade minded. At that very moment, while trying to open the door to trade with the one hand, we had to bang it shut with the other.

It is common gossip, and I have no doubt true, that representatives—for all I know, the very people who had been at Geneva—had to go to the United States and interview the same people with whom they had been negotiating at Geneva for months for the purpose of releasing the barriers to trade, and tell those people that the very first contribution we could make was to bang the door and bar it—though I hope not bolt it—in their faces.

What does this add up to? I think it adds up to a situation full of difficulties, and, if I say danger, I do not use too strong a word. Just at the very moment when a child can see where our traditional markets are jeopardized, particularly in Europe; just at the moment when a child can see that we need to be trying, at all costs, to expand our markets in the United States, we take this step. This position has been well described in the Winnipeg Free Press, and I should like to read a brief quotation:

> Though Mr. Howe stated when it was inaugurated that the crisis which necessitated it would end in a matter of months, neither the crisis itself nor the restriction of imports and exports has diminished. Our reserves of United States dollars have risen only a little over the dangerously low level of last autumn. More serious, we are drawing on our United States loan, living in part on borrowings which must be repaid in five years and thus hypothecating many of the new dollars that we may be accumulating.

With regard to the other side of the shield, the Winnipeg Free Press says:

> In the meantime, something else is happening. In their shortage of dollars the European countries, and most notably Britain, are seeking to divert their imports as much as possible from dollar countries like Canada into the sterling area.

Page the Minister of Agriculture and ask what he found out about that when he had to force some of our products down their throats earlier in the year. To continue—this is the Free Press again:

> This diversion, in the not distant future, must operate to restrain Canada's exports to the sterling countries, especially when the grants of money to Europe lapse.

We cannot laugh that off. To continue:

> It would be the worst kind of folly, therefore, to assume that, after the completion of the Marshall plan, we can count on a continuation of the flow of dollars from Europe which we shall receive while the plan is in full operation —and even that temporary flow, as the foreign exchange control board says, will not end our dollar shortage.

These quotations from the Winnipeg Free Press make this perfectly clear. There is no reasonable expectation in the foreseeable future that we shall be able to build up large amounts of convertible credits in the United Kingdom, and that is something of profound significance to our whole future. We have to shift the direction as much as we can, while of course keeping our markets there also as much as we can; and that brings me back to the question of American investment.

American investments in this country are out of balance, as I said a moment ago. They are natural to us, and we cannot go on importing as we are now unless the Americans will again invest. The government continue to be adamant on the matter, or they say they are adamant; and yet in the budget they suspend duties on certain British goods because prices are too high for the Britishers to sell here.

I am not overlooking the point that if we do anything to depreciate our exchange it increases for the moment the difficulty of the Britisher in selling to us. What I am saying, however, and many other people are saying it, is that there is much reason to believe that the pound sterling is out of line. In that connection I wish to read a quotation from the Globe and Mail of May 20. It is important because of the attitude taken by Hoffman, the head of ERP:

> British prices are still too high for Canadian importers and it would appear that that situation will not change until Britain values her pound in line with the trading realities. Britain still says it will not do that, but Paul

Hoffman, European administrator, signed with other members of the national advisory council, a report sent to congress that the United States will require countries getting ERP aid to work out devaluation with the 46-nation world monetary fund.

I was interested to find in the most recent Economist that even the International Monetary Fund apparently is seriously considering the situation, that it has its eyes and its mind by no means closed.

I have been talking about what I regard as a distortion of our economy in our external economic relations. I now wish to talk briefly about what I regard as a distortion at home. Before the end of the war, in the spring of 1945, the government issued a white paper designed to deal with conditions after the war, when it was expected there would be some unemployment; and at the time I think the precaution was reasonable. If the unemployment had in fact come I should think the measures proposed would have had much to commend them. But what I complain about, and what I think has been little short of a tragedy, is that we continued to use those measures long after it was perfectly clear that we should have done exactly the opposite. Signs of the boom really appeared in 1946, and the methods outlined in 1945 should have been altered then, and altered quickly. Instead, the government continued to use them and even accelerated them. What we needed was a sedative; what we got was a strong tonic. What do I mean by that? I mean that the government did two things. It powerfully stimulated plant expansion by what I think were extravagant inducements in the way of depreciation, and it also continued to pursue an easy money policy, which was the other method of encouragement.

Now I want to say a word about this double depreciation. Let us understand exactly what it means. It means that companies are offered special inducements to go ahead and expand their plants as rapidly as possible. In this case they were allowed to deduct especially large amounts of money when that money was reinvested in the business, and so escape taxation on it. The plant expansion under way through the use of this double depreciation is estimated in a government report to cost $1,400 million. That is a terrific amount to impose on the economy of our country. According to this report, a survey of some four thousand companies, 2,241 of them in operation in 1939 and 1,971 coming into operation since, shows that these companies, when alterations are completed, will have a manufacturing capacity of $8·5 billion, as against $1·8 billion in 1939. In other words the excess over 1939 is 377 per cent. The comparable figure in the United States is 50 per cent. That is, proportionately we have gone seven and a half times as fast as the United States.

I mentioned the other evening that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply said: "Well, what's the matter with that?"—or words to that effect. The answer is this. If we can find markets for all these things; if we can sell all these goods and our producers of natural products can also sell all their goods, so that we will have the home market and the foreign market, that will be fine. But whether or not that is likely to happen remains to be seen. The other evening I used a simple illustration. I hope I am wrong—this is one time I would like to be wrong and see the minister right; but I used the example of a farmer straining himself and using all his resources to build a huge barn, which incidentally may turn out to be more than he needs, and at the same time neglecting to provide his family with the necessities of life.

The immediate result of this development is that an inordinate amount of our resources is turned toward this plant expansion, which means far less for the production of consumer goods, which in turn means this has been a most potent influence in the rising prices of consumer goods. We have been providing the money but we have not been providing the goods; and even those of us who do not profess to be economists know that this is a simple reason for high prices.

I sometimes fear that Canadian businessmen are taking this matter much too lightly. I think they are being led astray by what has been going on abroad. I have heard Canadian businessmen say, "Markets are illimitable; we we can sell anything we make". But this buying spree abroad is not going on for ever. As European nations become able to look after themselves there will be less need to buy from us. In the meantime I say again that at the very time our relations with the United States are so difficult, and when we really have not improved our position at all in spite of our restrictions, we are denying our manufacturers the advantage they had before July 1946 in selling in the United States. We have taken away a ten per cent advantage they formerly enjoyed.

When I refer to exchange, however, to me a convincing argument and one that outweighs all others is the appeal to realism. When you find things happening between people who are trading with each other freely, that comes as close to realism as you can get. To me it is not real for us here in Canada to sit in an ivory tower saying our dollar is worth one hundred American cents when actually it is being traded in the United States at between 92 and 93 cents. We too much resemble King Canute.

In passing, and coming back to this question of the export of manufactured goods, I want to say that if we can build these hundreds and in fact thousands of factories, and if they can all export their goods, it will be splendid; but we must remember that if we try to export to the point where we are not able to buy enough to provide our producers with their natural markets, the first people to feel the effects will be the manufacturers, because the home market after all is their best market.

I want to say a word about the investment aspect. How did we provide all this money in 1947? It was not by savings. Personal savings amounted to only $768 million in 1947 as against $1,676 million in 1944. The gap was filled largely by the realization of $750 million of our American exchange; in other words we were living off our fat. The amount was realized and paid to the banks, and became available; indirectly it appeared in effect in the large increase in bank loans. The second thing was the government surplus of last year.

I am going to say a word about savings, though one is almost self-conscious in talking about savings these days. Many people think that is a silly old-fashioned thing only talked about by people who are still living in the nineteenth century. My own belief is that there is great danger in the view which is so widely held that wealth consists in pieces of paper. If only we could think of it in terms of goods I believe we would be much more sensible. If we would also remember that at the present time we are living largely on savings, as I say both government realizations and the savings of private individuals who are spending more than they are saving, as a whole, we would appreciate how important it is. I wish I could make people believe that I think common sense in government one day will prove to be the same common sense that has to apply to individuals; that governments cannot by any legerdemain produce money over the long period, any more than individuals can. If we believe the government can do that, and if we go on believing that there is some secret way by which money can be created, then I say we are just piling up difficulties which one day will recoil upon our own heads. In the long run we have to provide personal savings for investment, just as we have done in the past.

I have dealt with foreign trade, Mr. Speaker, and with what I regard as the distortion of our economy at home. I have said something about the post-war inflation and the post-war boom. I have spoken about the artificial stimulus to our economy, and I want to say one thing more. I want to say a word about the manipulation of the bond market. Prices in the bond market are no longer made, as they always have been made in the past, by hundreds or thousands of individuals buying and selling. They are made by a few men sitting in a room here in Ottawa. How is that done? It is done by the support given the bond market through the Bank of Canada. The evils of this sort of thing have become apparent within the last few months. In January last, on account of an altered attitude on the part of the bank, the price of bonds fell from 104¾ to 101⅞. Later, I think about the beginning of February, the price fell again from 101⅞ to 100¼. This, of course, was without warning to the business community; it had to be. One can well imagine the embarrassment of executors, trustees and others who had been holding these bonds and since have had to sell them. Incidentally, if the government itself has suffered any loss in its transactions through its various boards, I would be interested to know where it gets the authority for the appropriation to pay such losses. That is another matter, however, which we can take up later.

The technique of course is the use of government funds through certain bodies which have been created. There is the unemployment insurance fund, and there is a fund called the security investment fund, in which the financial community has been much interested for a long time. It was a rather mysterious fund until very recently, but I noticed the other night, if I remember correctly, that the Minister of Finance spoke about it frankly. I may be partly responsible for that, because recently I asked a question about it. I asked what the authority for this fund was, and I was referred to two statutes. Well, when you are referred to two statutes, even a man who knows as little law as I do, knows that the authority is pretty hard to find. You have to spell it out. It is not clear and distinct and inescapable. When I got those two statutes I took counsel from someone who is a real lawyer—not just a reformed lawyer like myself—and asked him what he thought about those two statutes. He told me you could not spell any authority out of them at all. So I am leaving that question. We can find out all about it later. Meantime in six months that fund has spent $300 million of your money and mine in buying bonds in the market, and the fund has in fact now about $600 million.

I say, in that connection as in others, that we shall one day return to reality. We shall one day decide to question the judgment of two or three people sitting in an office; for however able they may be, however conscientious or however high-minded, they have not omniscience or supreme wisdom. Against them is the judgment of hundreds of thousands of quiet people who just buy and sell from day to day, matching their judgment against each other. They are going to find that that is the way prices are made, not by this superhuman wisdom.

It is interesting to note what has been going on in England, where there is a socialist government. Of course they have there this new revelation. At any rate Doctor Dalton believed it, and I should like to bring to the attention of the house briefly what happened in England, what the London Economist has described as an unwholesome and unpleasant precedent.

Doctor Dalton was a former chancellor of the exchequer. He undertook to support a certain security there, with disastrous results. The London Economist says this:

> A corner has been lifted this week (May 8) of the thick curtain which has shrouded last year's official activities in the gilt-edge market. In the past, the technique of governmental accounting has generally sufficed . . . to hide most departmental activities from the public gaze, but operations so large as Doctor Dalton's were bound to peep out through the screen sooner or later.

I commend that to the Minister of Finance. I think some of his operations are beginning to peep out, too. The London Economist continues:

> In the pre-budget phase last autumn "Daltons"—

The securities, not as a compliment, were called by Dalton's name.

> —rose by some ten points, only to collapse after their sponsor disappeared from the scene.

It will be noted that these securities were called "Daltons." I hope the Minister of Finance will never be memorialized in the same way. However, their sponsor disappeared from the scene. I hope this will be taken as a warning by those who may have any disposition to imitate the good Doctor Dalton. He undertook to impose his will on the bond market, just as our financial authorities are doing today. In the end what he succeeded in doing was to destroy confidence in the particular security he was supporting, so that the security fell disastrously in value.

In a world, Mr. Speaker, which is racked with conflict between those who believe in freedom and those who, whether they realize it or not, believe in control, I think even at the risk of iteration it is necessary to express what we at least feel in the matter. I do this especially as I shall be followed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and I shall be surprised if he does not use words which we have heard before—the words "exploiting" and "law of the jungle." I am not suggesting that what I am going to say now is ill directed against the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, because I sometimes have hopes for the hon. member —just as hon. members opposite have had hopes of him in the past. But I do think these things should be said.

First of all, those of us who have the belief that it is not through an extension of public ownership that social security and prosperity will come should not flatter ourselves that it is by any means a belief which is held universally. There are many people who think they have it but who by their actions occasionally show that they have not got it. For instance I cannot quite believe that the thirty-eight per cent of the people who, according to a Gallup poll in February, said they wished to work for the government, would regard themselves as socialists. Nevertheless to me it is disturbing to find that this poll, taken in February, showed that thirty-eight per cent of those who were questioned said they would rather work for the government than for private business.

What does that mean? Obviously it does not mean that I am criticizing any civil servants. We have some of the finest people in the civil service. But I believe an intelligent civil servant would be the first to say that this is a terribly dangerous situation to have abroad. So far as I have been able to discover, in all governments, municipal, provincial and federal, we have about six per cent of the people gainfully employed—that is not six per cent of the whole population, but of people in employment. Here we have about thirty-eight per cent of the people saying they would rather work for the government. What does that mean? I suggest it indicates a deep and disturbing psychological condition. It means that people have taken up the instinct for security, that they want freedom from responsibility, that they want work—yes, work, honest work, decent work, but a limited amount of it, so that they may have plenty of leisure. It is an abandonment of the spirit of adventure, of the driving energy and initiative which, as most of us think, have brought us where we are. I say that unless we stem the tide we have no hope of going steadily forward to improve our present economic position.

What do I mean by that? Well, I can illustrate it best by telling of a little conversation I had the other day with a man in my riding—or what I hope is going to be my riding, because it was in Parry Sound. This man is a general merchant, a man of great energy, one of the people who make democracy tick in that area. He said to me, "I work fifteen hours a day. But if the government took over my business and made me the manager of it, I would not work fifteen hours a day. I would work eight hours a day five days a week, and I would ask for two or three assistants". What am I saying? Well, I am not saying, of course, that people should be asked to work fifteen hours a day; of course not. But I am saying that the reason why free enterprise is able to achieve what it does is that a considerable number of people are putting into their work every last ounce of energy they have. If it takes fifteen hours, they will put it in.

I suggest there is all the difference in the world between honest and conscientious performance on the one hand, and on the other the performance of a man with drive and energy who is not content unless he does his absolute best. I do not think there would be any doubt in this matter if people would only think clearly. I suggest that is part of our trouble, part of the difference between us and the people to our left—although I must say sometimes I think there is not very much difference. In fact I would quote something said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and I am pleased to quote it. I think I like quotting it better than he likes hearing it. He said one day—and I like to remind him of it —"I am not opposed to private enterprise, but if they take the profits, they must take the risks". I said to him, and I say again: I do not change a word of that. But there is all the difference in the world between that and some of the other things the hon. member says.

To come back to clear thinking—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The digression that I made from clear thinking was a small one; I was just quoting the hon. member.

When reading the life of Mr. Justice Brandeis of the United States Supreme Court I ran across a quotation I should like to give to the house. Mr. Justice Brandeis was a lawyer; he was a queer lawyer because he actually made money. He was a great public servant. No one ever doubted that. He was a liberal—a human liberal, not a political liberal. Mr. Justice Brandeis served the state and the man on the street as very few people have. He said something which I think we might all remember. He said:

> Justice is truth in action, and if we want justice we must first find out what is the truth.

I think in plain words that means that unless we have intellectual honesty the thing will not work.

I want now to refer to what I think are some of the misconceptions which are plaguing us at the present time and which again I feel would disappear if we had clear thinking.

First of all there is the misconception of what I call the split personality, that we can be economically bound and politically free. I do feel that should be abandoned once and for all. What does the phrase "democratic socialism" mean? If it is not the equivalent to "free controls", then I do not know what it is. When we look at Italy, Germany and Russia, we realize that we should not be deceived by words. We should note what has happened there. Let us not be deceived by the words "nazism", "fascism", "communism"; it is all state socialism. That is in fact what they are.

Mr. COLDWELL: What about the Scandinavian countries?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): You can bring them up if you like. As I understand it, they are not socialist in the sense that the countries to which these other names are given are. I am sure that there cannot be any over-all economic control without political control. They are finding that out even in England. As far as labour is concerned, in view of the blight of the three despotisms in Europe I never can understand why labour has any doubt. A United States professor puts it in these words when he says:

> There is no place for collective bargaining or the right to strike, or for effective occupational organization in the socialist state, and every intelligent socialist, whatever his public utterances, knows as much.

There is the second misconception that those who believe in freedom, that those who do not want the state to be Father Christmas are lacking in social conscience. It even seems sometimes that to be socially-minded you must refuse to think clearly; you must use catch phrases, and most of all you must try to create the impression that what one man has is taken from another. If a man happens to have more than another man, it is assumed that he has taken it from him.

Mr. MacINNIS: It usually is so.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to refer to what I regard as the classic example, the case of Edison. Edison became rich, but I suggest that Edison created hundreds or thousands of times as much wealth for others as he did for himself. Furthermore, in a greater or lesser degree that is true of every successful enterprise. Churchill put it very well when he said that the people we ought to complain about are not the people who succeed but the people who fail.

The third misconception that is sedulously put forth—I wish every sensible and intelligent man could reach an agreement on this—is that somehow or other profit is wrong and ignoble. I should like to read a quotation from a man who at the present time is a labour peer. He is a well-known leftist in England; in fact some people would call him a socialist. A. D. Lindsay is a well-known writer on politics and economics. I have forgotten his title; it is hard to trace them when they become lords. He said:

> If we consider profit in itself it does not seem clear why a man working for an assured salary is doing right, while a man working for an uncertain profit is doing wrong. As long as there is an element of uncertainty in the supplying of demand, there must be a profit.

As I have said, in some of his moods the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar appears to agree with that.

Another thing I should like to say is that profit comes away down on the list. First of all there are wages, then there are taxes, then there is upkeep of your plant, then there is depreciation. If there is anything else, then there is profit. Profit can be obtained only when everyone else is paid. Even at that stage the tax collector, the genial Minister of Finance, comes along and has his crack at it. If there are profits they are well taxed.

I think we should remember that the financial statement of a business is a profit and loss account. There is nobody to hold your hand; nobody to weep a tear for you, if there are losses. You just go broke; that is all there is to it.

I should like to remind hon. gentlemen that even the socialist government in England, which has done so much to try to alter all this, has had to go back to providing an incentive. Let me read from a white paper which says:

> We must remove the idea of spinning out production in order to avoid unemployment, or of restricting output in order to safeguard earnings.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario).]

It may be that in the back of their minds was the thought that it was capitalist America which had come to the rescue of good old England and all the other countries concerned.

There is one last thing on this point that I want to say, and you will be glad, sir, it is the last. An attempt is made in this country from time to time to stir up class feelings, the sort of thing which has bedevilled some of the European countries. Even England, which we all admire and love so much, has suffered from social disabilities. Was it not Disraeli who said that there were two races in England? It was a fact not so long ago that the slum boy of thirteen years was five inches shorter than the boy who attended public school. That is on the way to being wiped out, and it should be. In England an end is coming to these social disabilities and inhibitions. But here we have not had that. How could it be so in a country where 99·9 per cent of us go to school together? We all speak the same way. There is no barrier to ability.

Mr. MacINNIS: How many go to univeristy together?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Every man who has ability.

Mr. MacINNIS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I know something about that. I will tell the world that any able man who wants to do it can get to university.

This brings me to opportunity. We in this party nail opportunity to the mast. We seek to help people to help themselves and among other things to provide their own security on a contributory basis.

Mr. Speaker, nature and our forebears provided us with a goodly heritage. By our own efforts and sacrifices we have added to it. Our progress to this present has depended on the free play of the human spirit in all departments of life including the economic. Some point to the war as a time when we made progress through control. It is true that during the war we needed controls in order to concentrate our efforts, but to the discerning eye it was clear that the achievements during the war depended on the same qualities of energy and initiative which capitalism had displayed in peace time.

The great bulk of the people in this country believe that these same qualities are needed to carry us on from here.

People are sensible. They know we cannot get rid of all controls tomorrow, perhaps ever, but they want to have them reduced as much as possible. However, governments will have to play a part beyond what they used to do, and electors should bear this in mind when they are considering the worth of governments which they elect, and in considering the present budget they will have to ask whether it is what it is because the government wishes to keep the plums for some future time.

This budget I think may fairly be described as a doctrinaire budget, a budget that has taken very little consideration of the man on the street. Take, for instance, the small relief in the sales tax. It is ironical to think of the sales tax being taken off when many people have still to pay an extra twenty-five per cent excise tax on their goods. In considering this budget the ordinary citizen may very well consider what happens—and it is bound to happen, human nature being what it is—when governments stay in power year after year after year. Even the best of them develop a kind of bland arrogance. They come to think, not necessarily that they are perfect, but at least that they are indispensable. They come to have what a famous statesman called in other circumstances a tranquil consciousness of effortless superiority, and this gives them the feeling that they can manage other people's affairs much better than the people can manage them themselves. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is very unlikely that the government in that frame of mind will be able to divest themselves of these powers as fast as they should. They will try to do so but they will find it difficult. It is in any event for the electors to judge whether the government have that openness of mind and that sensitiveness to public opinion which the solution of these problems demands. The widespread criticism of the budget makes me feel that the public at the present time may be exercising their judgment and that no matter how many election plums may be saved up by the government to offer them at election time, they may weigh this government in the balance and find them wanting.

I move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross):

> That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be struck out and that the following be substituted therefor:
> "this house is of the opinion that the government does not possess the confidence of the country."

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I think we have had a delightful dissertation from the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) which we have all enjoyed. I do not propose to follow his example and to take up the time which I wish to devote to the budget by replying to some of his remarks or to returning in kind some of the criticisms that one could make of the party to which he belongs. But I am going to say this to him with regard to the hope that he expressed regarding myself, that there is an old proverb which says that "hope deferred maketh the heart sick." I would remind him also that the definition of "fascism" and "nazism" is this: It is capitalism in an advanced state of decay. My hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party should take that very much to heart, because I have noticed that there is considerable decay in the party to my left—to my right, I mean.

Mr. MacNICOL: You were right the first time.

Mr. COLDWELL: We sometimes think of the party to the left as somewhat of a conservative party too.

May I also say this to my hon. friend, that the objection is not to profit in the sense that he defined it this afternoon but rather to profit when it becomes the motive of production and replaces human need as the motive for producing the goods that humanity requires.

I think we can all agree that the budget is a disappointing document, though the minister delivered his speech well. It gives little or no relief to the people who need it most. That, I think, is the main criticism which can be made of the budget which was brought down on Tuesday evening.

It is sound policy to budget for a surplus in time of prosperity, but that does not excuse the government from its obligation to assist those whom its policies of removing beneficial controls and subsidies have seriously affected. The gap between prices and income has become wider as the months have passed, and it is obvious that the fifty per cent or so of our population who do not earn enough money to pay income tax have had to reduce their already meagre expenditures on food and clothing and, where possible, on housing also. The reductions in food expenditure which are taking place will in time seriously affect both the health and the morale of those who are compelled to economize in that manner.

I wish to draw the attention of the house to the report of the Family Service Bureau at Hamilton, Ontario, which points out that most families had to spend from 24 to 39 per cent of their income, or amounts ranging from $24 to $45 a month, for food in 1939, and they must now spend from 40 to 80 per cent of their income, or from $50 to more than $100 a month, for the same standard of food in quality and quantity.

If we turn to the Toronto Welfare Council, in its survey of a group of representative families, we find that it reports that many families are now reducing their purchases of essential food products. Fifty per cent of those surveyed reported lower milk consumption, in most cases by from one to two quarts a day; bread purchases were reduced from one to seven loaves a week in twenty-one per cent of the families, and fifty-five per cent bought from one-quarter to three pounds less butter a week, while thirty-four per cent reported that they were using fewer eggs. This, I submit to the government and to the house, is a serious matter not only for the groups concerned but for the nation as a whole. High taxation, which falls particularly heavily on the low-income groups, has been in no small measure responsible for the huge surplus which the minister reported the other evening.

In 1943-44 the government collected in direct taxes—income, corporation, excess profits, $1,635,000,000. In the present budget it is estimated that in the year 1948-49 direct taxes will account for $1,315,000,000, or a decrease of $320,000,000 or twenty per cent from 1943-44. On the other hand, let us look at indirect taxation, the taxes that the people do not know they are paying: sales tax, excise tax, hidden from view. In 1943-44 these yielded the government $956,000,000; but in 1948-49 the minister budgets for $1,056,000,000 from this source. That is an increase of $100,000,000, or approximately ten per cent. In other words we decrease the direct taxes, which are largely collected on the basis of ability of pay, and shift the burden to indirect taxes, which are paid largely by those who are forced to buy clothing and furniture and provide themselves with homes and food.

But when we examine the surplus which was reported by the minister, and which gave him so much satisfaction the other evening, we find that a large percentage of it comes from sources which involve lowered standards of living for a large portion of the Canadian people. I do not know what the result of the present budget will be financially. The minister budgets again for a very large surplus, but I hope that his estimate of size will not be subjected to the colossal error to which it was subjected last year. On April 29, 1947, the minister told the house that he anticipated, for the year ending March 31, 1948, a surplus of about $190 million. On Tuesday of this week he reported a preliminary estimate of actual surplus of $670 million. It is, of course, understandable that estimates cannot be correct down to the last cent; but here is an error of very nearly half a billion dollars. He either had some exceedingly poor advice last year, or the surplus was deliberately underestimated for other considerations. This house, however, is the final authority in the levying of taxes, and in order that we may know what burdens we must inflict upon the Canadian people we should have before us estimates which are at least approximately correct.

While we can accept the principle of budgeting for surpluses in times of prosperity and inflation, there are certain qualifications that I think we should make. In the first place, as I have already indicated, budgeting for surpluses should be deliberate, open, aboveboard and not camouflaged in any way by under-estimating. In the second place, again as I have already intimated, the surplus should not be produced at the expense of those in the lower income brackets least able to bear the burden.

May I remind the house that very large reductions were made last year, and some additional ones are being made this year, which give substantial relief to wealthy individuals and wealthy corporations. If we are budgeting for prosperity surpluses, these taxes, that is the taxes on the corporations and on the well-to-do, should have been retained at their former levels, and the excess profits tax also should have been retained to permit a raising of the exemption levels to at least $1,000 or $1,250 for single persons and $2,000 or $2,500 for married couples.

I say those exemptions should be raised because the government has allowed the cost of living to rise so drastically that incomes at that level today are comparable with the incomes which existed when the lower exemptions were first accepted in this house.

In addition, the continued higher taxation on wealthy individuals and corporations, together with the excess profits tax, could have permitted, I believe, the elimination, or at least the drastic reduction, of the sales tax without very substantially reducing what would be a reasonable surplus for which the government might budget deliberately.

I want to remind the house again that sales and certain excise taxes bear most heavily on the less fortunate portion of our Canadian people. The C.C.F. program has always called for a progressive removal of sales and excise taxes, except those on luxury goods.

It is interesting to read, as I have done during the past few days, the debates which accompanied the imposition or increase of the sales tax some years ago. It was first imposed by the Conservative government in 1920 and criticized by the Liberals then. But when the Liberals came into power they retained and gradually increased the tax until 1924 when it reached the maximum of six per cent. Later it was gradually reduced, until in 1930 it was down to one per cent. Then came the Bennett administration, which increased it from one per cent to four per cent in 1931, and in 1932 to six per cent, where it remained until my hon. friends of the Liberal party took office in 1935. They immediately increased it to eight per cent, where it has remained substantially ever since.

The other evening I read the debate on the budget when the Bennett administration increased the sales tax from one per cent to four per cent in 1931. The financial critic of the Liberal party at that time was the Hon. J. L. Ralston, who afterwards became the finance minister of the government. He severely criticized the Bennett government because, as he said, it was the ordinary, everyday consumers, the men and women who are hard put to make ends meet who were called upon to pay the extra amount in connection with the sales tax. He added, and I quote his words:

> One gets a real idea what the sales tax means when one looks at my hon. friend's list of additional taxes. Out of $78,000,000 in additional taxes the sum of $52,000,000 will be raised by the sales tax alone.

Yet this year the government proposes to raise by sales tax alone the sum of $325 million net, or four and a half times the amount about which the Liberal party complained so bitterly in 1931.

The manner of the imposition of the tax is, of course, one which involves a much greater levy finally than the original eight per cent. It is imposed at the manufacturing level, so that the wholesaler bases his percentage mark-up on a price which includes the sales tax. Then the retailer bases his mark-up on the price which he has paid, including the sales tax. It is pyramided, so that the actual amount paid by the consumer is much greater than the original eight per cent.

True, the minister has removed the tax from certain food items, and this may or may not be reflected in the family budget because we have no controls, but he should be severely criticized for not removing it from other commodities, particularly from clothing and construction materials needed in the building of houses. Here is one place where effective measures could be taken immediately to remove the high cost of construction. In New Zealand the sales tax was removed on building materials in September, 1946, and it was estimated that this action would result in the saving of £150 on the average size house costing £1,500, or a saving of ten per cent.

May I remind the government that action in this respect, that is, in the removal of the sales tax, was recommended by their own Curtis commission on housing. On page 22 of their report the commission said:

> The earliest opportunity should be taken to remove sales taxes on building materials and equipment.

Action in removing the sales tax, however, might not, as I have already indicated, make much difference in the cost of living because of the government's failure to continue beneficial price controls on basic commodities. The minister himself has said:

> The present circumstances are not appropriate for far-reaching reductions in these indirect taxes. Producers and distributors are in a favourable position to gain whatever the treasury gives up and they could probably find plausible reasons for doing so, notwithstanding the high levels of profits at present.

The reason they are in this favourable position to charge all that the traffic will bear is that the government removed beneficial price ceilings. Since the minister expressed this opinion last year, retail prices have gone up 13·9 per cent between May 1, 1947, and April 1, 1948.

Mr. ABBOTT: I expressed that opinion this year. That is a quotation from this year's budget speech.

Mr. COLDWELL: I read both speeches; I thought I got it from last year's budget speech.

Mr. ABBOTT: That was from this year's.

Mr. COLDWELL: In his budget speech last year, at page 2558 of Hansard, the present minister justified his retention of the excess profits tax to the end of 1947, and he justified it by stating that profits had not yet returned to normal levels, and that if they had we should repeal the tax forthwith. He then said:

> Profits before tax still are running at abnormally high levels.

But they were running at more abnormally high levels than the minister was estimating at that time. His estimate last year of corporate profits and other investment income was $42,000,000 less than the more accurate estimate he gave in the appendix to the budget speech this year. Even so, the preliminary 1947 figures show that corporate profits before taxes for 1947 were some $400 million, or 28·1 per cent higher than in 1946, and that net profits after taxes were 35·4 per cent higher.

Lest these figures should be disputed, I wish to put on the record again table 7, in the appendix to the 1948 budget, page 4112 of Hansard, which gives us the corporation profits from 1939 to 1947. It is a very short table and I should like to have the permission of the house to put it on Hansard.

Mr. ABBOTT: Is that a repetition from the white paper?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, taken out of the appendix.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Put the wage figures in too.

Mr. COLDWELL: Somebody else will do that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the consent of the house to put the table on Hansard?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: I will hand the table to Hansard:

Table 7

Corporation Profits

	1939	1944	1946	Prelim. 1947
	(Millions of dollars)
Corporate profits before taxes.....	598	1,221	1,421	1,821
Deduct corporate taxes....	−112	−603	−670	−804
Corporate profits after taxes.....	486	618	751	1,017
Deduct dividends paid out	−287	−284	−340	−408
Undistributed corporate profits....	199	334	411	609

A further analysis of the table indicates the percentage increase of profits for 1947 over 1939, working it out in percentages, as follows: corporate profits before taxes, 204·5 per cent; corporate profits after taxes, 109·2 per cent; dividends, 42·2 per cent; and undistributed profits, 206 per cent.

May I say to my hon. friend who interjected a remark with regard to wages, that one of my colleagues will put them on the record. I may tell him, however, that real wages in the past year, in consequence of the increase in the cost of living, have dropped in terms of purchasing power, while corporation profits have increased in the same period.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): It is the same dollar.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: But they do not use it to buy bread.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. COLDWELL: This criticism I have made justifies the criticisms we made last year of the removal of the excess profits tax which, had it been retained, would have had an effect on the ability of the government either to decrease taxation on those least able to bear it, or, on the other hand, to have embarked upon a more substantial health and social security program for the Canadian people, while at the same time securing quite a substantial budgetary surplus, though perhaps not as high as the estimate at the moment.

The minister recognizes the dangers inherent in the high level of capital expenditure on new construction. He blames it, together with the high level of domestic consumption and exports, for the undue strain on our economy, and I wish to say something about this matter particularly.

Many years ago, the Liberal party, like the C.C.F., proposed the control of investments, and the minister's speech indicated that capital construction, that is, investment in plant, equipment, inventories and such housing as was undertaken, absorbed twenty-one per cent of the gross national product during 1947 as against fifteen per cent in 1946, six per cent in 1944 and, going back a few years, sixteen per cent in 1939. It may be remarked, I think that fluctuations in capital construction are mainly responsible for the ups and downs of the business cycle and for the consequent booms and depressions.

I recognize that many expenditures for new plant, equipment, machinery and so on had been deferred during ten long years of depression and six years of war. Consequently there is now a rush by everyone to replace worn-out machines, to buy equipment, and so on, all at once. What is happening is that construction, which should ordinarily spread over a period of sixteen years, is being squeezed into a very few short years. Everyone is building factories, new theatres, new bowling alleys, new breweries and replacing worn-out machines all at once. The danger is, as the minister saw himself, and indicated in his budget speech, that by and by we shall reach the saturation point, and when we do so, then activity will drop sharply and the effects of such a drop will be extremely widespread throughout the whole of the Canadian economy.

The minister recognizes this danger, and that is evident in his statement that this government has, of course, been deliberately restricting its own expenditures on construction and equipment during the last few years because of its desire to keep excessive national expenditure within bounds, and to divert wherever possible the construction of useful projects until the time when private expenditures will be lower and additional government work will help to maintain employment and income.

The theory is that the government should allow private construction to take its own course, the government being ready to fill the gap left by private enterprise when that gap occurs. I will say this to the minister. In my opinion, this is a decided improvement over the old laissez-faire attitude, but it is still a questionable procedure in terms of actual effectiveness.

The C.C.F. believes that the government should exercise some control not only over government investment but over private investment as well. May I remind the minister that a few years ago that was also the policy advocated by the Liberal party. The effect which government construction spending can have is, I believe, too small in the ordinary course of events to save the country from a major unemployment crisis which will follow unusually high capital construction in this period in which we are living. In our opinion, and we would urge it upon the government, the government should take positive steps, so that private investment spending in some respects should be deferred to later periods and priority given to such desirable and necessary projects as low-rental housing which the house has been discussing for several days this week, during which I hope the government felt rather uncomfortable about the results achieved so far. Such a policy would not only relieve the desperate housing shortage but have long-range effects in relieving the inflationary pressures which are responsible for steadily climbing prices.

What I mean is this. The public control of investment should not only be quantitative, which is to a minor extent what is happening now, but be qualitative as well. Construction contracts for hotels and clubs in Canada last year totalled $14,750,000, but for apartments in which people were going to live they amounted to only $12,070,000.

This, of course, is only one of a number of examples that could be cited. Then, too, we believe the government should exercise some influence on the location of desirable industries. The distressed areas of England and Wales and Scotland, for example, are becoming the sites of great, new and important industries. In the same way some construction expenditure could be diverted to the distressed areas of Canada; and we have those distressed areas. As the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) so frequently reminds the house, we have them in the maritime provinces; and to my mind this is what might be called a socially desirable project of the very first order.

In the same circumstances what would a C.C.F. government do? It would establish a national investment board which would exercise control over investments, so that they could be spread over a number of years and diverted into channels where they would be most effective, and establish priority for the most important types of construction, as, for example, housing. Because we believe this, I want to move an amendment to the amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), in these words:

> That the said amendment be amended by inserting after the word "government" and before the word "does" in the second line of the amendment, the following words:
> ". . . has failed to relieve the excessive burden of taxation on the low-income groups of the Canadian people:
> (a) By failing to increase the amounts of exemption from income tax from the present levels to $1,250 for single and $2,500 for married persons, and
> (b) By failing to remove or substantially reduce the burden of sales and excise taxes which bear most heavily on those suffering from low income and the present high cost of living.
> And further, the government has failed to establish a public investment board to assure the channelling of capital investment into socially desirable projects as a means of maintaining full employment, increasing production and raising the standard of living of the Canadian people.

Having moved that amendment, I think it is interesting to note that the government accepts the inevitably of depression and deliberately budgets for it. The C.C.F. believes our budget should be designed to prevent depression and to maintain the highest possible level of employment and income. Of course we shall be reminded that one attempt has been made by the government to slow down construction expenditure. How? By raising interest rates, through the withdrawal by the Bank of Canada of market support for our national bonds. But in his speech the minister said, as reported at page 4058 of Hansard:

> This increase in interest rates at this time is not expected to have any great effect in restraining the high level of capital expenditure . . .

Then he went on to say:

> . . . I do not believe that any reasonable increase in interest rates would act as a serious brake upon business expenditures under the circumstances of today, nor would it serve effectively to persuade consumers to spend less and save more of their income.

If that is the opinion of the minister I would ask why the government took action to raise interest rates.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario discussed double depreciation. I was interested to hear him criticize double depreciation because, as far as I can recollect, these large amounts of depreciation of all kinds that have been permitted to corporations and companies, including powerful oil and mining companies, have been supported wholeheartedly by members of the party for which the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario speaks. If I may give an example of the misdirection of investment I would refer the minister and the house to table 8, at page 8 of the appendix to the budget. There it is shown that, while new residential construction in 1947 increased by 37·9 per cent over 1946, other new construction increased by 59·3 per cent; new machinery and equipment, by 60·9 per cent, and investment in inventories, that is goods held for future sale, by 101·6 per cent. Housing, which I repeat should have first priority, is last in that table submitted by the minister.

My time is running out. Unlike that of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, it is not unlimited, and I do not propose to impose upon the house. Other features of the budget, however, deserve some comment. It is proposed to give further exemption of $500 to persons over sixty-five years of age. It is difficult to understand the logic of that exemption, though we welcome it because it will benefit a few people who need more income in their declining years. But we must not forget that most of the people of Canada over the age of sixty-five will receive no benefit whatever. Indeed, forty per cent of those seventy years of age and over are today in receipt of old age pensions, indicating that their incomes are not even $750, let alone $1,500. Their incomes are less than $600 a year. To my mind a better plan to help people of sixty-five or seventy would have been to abolish the means test, increase old age pensions to $50 a month, and at least to begin to lower the age to sixty-five, on the plan suggested in the dominion proposals to the provinces. We should not forget that the increase of $500 in the exemption will be reflected most in the highest brackets, because it will raise it at the bottom and relieve these people to that extent. So that not the needy but the more comfortably situated will reap the greatest benefit.

It is questionable whether people over sixty-five years of age need a further exemption of $500 as much as younger people, when they are building homes, establishing businesses and raising families. Indeed, the action of the government merely strengthens our demand for an increase in the income tax exemptions by at least $500 for single persons and $1,000 for married couples, as I have indicated. If we wish to introduce new and worthwhile features into our income tax allowances we might well consider a variation of the plan adopted, I think in 1945, in the United Kingdom, under which a man working on the land may receive a further exemption of $1,000 a year if he invests that amount in improvement to his farm. The thought behind that is not unlike the thought the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario had this afternoon, except that he used it in a rather different manner than I am going to use it at the moment.

We might, for example, give an exemption to a farmer, a home-owner or a builder, that is, one who is going to inhabit the home when it is built, to the extent of an exemption of $1,000 a year, or less, up to a maximum of, we will say $10,000, spread over a period of ten or fifteen years. What we are failing to do, under present circumstances, is to encourage our people to become the owners of personal property upon which they and their families should depend for their sustenance or for the making of a good and proper home.

No party in this country, no party in the House of Commons believes more thoroughly in the right to own and enjoy personal property than the party with which I am associated. As a matter of fact, our main criticism of the present economic system is that it denies to a majority of our people the right to own homes, personal property which they and their families can enjoy. That is the main principle; that is the reason this great capitalist system under which we live has created what is sometimes called a proletariat. It is the reason for what the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario condemned and which I condemn equally; it is the reason in many parts of the world for class warfare and class struggle, namely, the economic system which has denied to the individual the right to own the land or property upon which the happiness and sustenance of himself and his family depend.

Those of us who know the history of the rise of the industrial system, the history of the rise of capitalism from 1750, on, in Great Britain, know it was the story of the constant expropriation of the workers of Great Britain from the right to the common land and other facilities which had been theirs for centuries after they had delivered themselves from the feudal system in vogue previously.

So we believe that the attempt should be made to distribute such property more widely; and that is one of the aims of the movement we represent in the house.

Mr. KUHL: What about private business?

Mr. COLDWELL: Private business? Where it does not exploit the people, where it treats labour properly, and endeavours to serve the community as a whole, it requires no intervention. But when it reaches the stage of exploitation and monopoly, which private business has reached to a very large degree in our country, then it is time for the representatives of the people to take a hand.

I was going to say that even the increased penalty for failure to file income tax returns in time, suggested by the minister in his budget speech, will fall more heavily upon the farming community than upon any other group. Farmers, as we know, have great difficulty in filling out their income tax returns in time, especially as in our case those returns have to be filed in April; and the filing of income tax returns coincides with the busy seeding season of the farmers.

I believe I have exhausted the time at my disposal. May I conclude by saying this, that it was, I think, appropriate that the government should remove the tax of sixty cents a gallon on vinegar. It will at least remind the Canadian people of a budget that is thoroughly sour.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it has been indeed a delightful experience to listen to the two splendid speeches we have heard this afternoon, particularly in relation to a budget which has been variously described as an umbrella budget, a vinegar budget, an alarm clock budget. I am sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) did not have to provide the people of Canada with alarm clocks to waken them to the fact that his budget is a dreary document, without a ray of sunshine, and entirely lacking in faith and optimism.

Upon his very good presentation of what I thought was a very bad case, I offer to the minister my congratulations. I think a good deal of my hon. friend. I have been very fond of him ever since I came to the house and learned to know him. I am sorry, therefore, that I cannot go any further in my congratulations today.

As I listened the other night to the presentation of the government's financial program for the ensuing year, it became perfectly clear that the minister was unfolding before us what one might expect from mentalities geared to traditions of scarcity.

The successive budgets presented to parliament since confederation, and more particularly those of the past twenty-five years, have all conformed to a single general pattern. Each has been simply another link added to the ball and chain which the years of financial misrule have forged about the feet of the Canadian people. This budget could not have been better calculated to hold the citizens of this country fettered in their struggle for happiness, limited in their exercise of normal freedom, and frustrated in their just claim to reasonable material security.

The budget now before us is no exception to that general rule. It is another ball-and-chain budget. Over the years the weight of the ball has become heavier, the links of the chain bigger and tougher. And the minister had better begin to notice that the protests and groans of the Canadian people are becoming louder and much more insistent.

The minister at this time could have brought financial proposals before parliament that would have cut the chains loose, once and for all, so that neither ball nor chain could ever again shackle the Canadian economy. But in his fear of full production he missed the chance and muffed the ball.

I suppose it is a foregone conclusion that a majority of the members of this parliament, each elected by the voters of his constituency and responsible to them, will accept the minister's budget; will commit this parliament to its adoption. No budget presented by any government has ever been materially altered, much less defeated, in the history of our parliament. That very tradition serves to bind the ball and chain more firmly on to our people and their economy.

I have just wondered if, in this fourth session of Canada's twentieth parliament, faced with some realization of the extent to which the monstrous ball and chain bind us down, a majority of the members of this house would show courage to ignore that tradition; and with a consciousness of their responsibilities to their electors transcending all party considerations, accept proposals counter to some of those in the budget, but designed to help the Canadian people to realize that happy condition wherein they might be unfettered in their pursuit of happiness and not frustrated in their struggle for reasonable material security. With the minister's budget before them, how else could the average run of Canadian feel than frustrated and the average Canadian businessman than discouraged? The general attitude is, I think, admirably summed up by Walter D. Jones, president of the Canadian chamber of commerce, in these words:

> The government's financial policy seems to be based on the questionable assumption that money in its own hands will be spent wisely and well, but money, in the hands of a citizen or a businessman must be heavily taxed for fear of its becoming a danger to the national economy. Experience shows no justification for such an assumption.
> Indeed, when the finance minister states in the face of the largest surplus in the country's history that he must put still more money away for a rainy day, he must surely know that it is equally important that tax rates, even in good times, should not be confiscatory to the point of preventing the thrifty taxpayer himself from saving money for a rainy day.

I close the quotation at that point. I say that is my sentiment exactly. Most Canadians are becoming wiser with regard to finance and taxes than the minister appears to give them credit for. For instance, they know it is sheer nonsense for the federal government to pretend that it is putting away money for a rainy day. If the minister had declared that he was putting into storage material things like not easily perishable foodstuffs, defence materials and such like out of present production against the day when these things might be short, then it would have made sense, but if the government puts away a whole shipload of money, when the rainy day comes the real comfort to both government and people would be the production of labour and machines, and not the money.

The Minister of Finance at any time can get all the money this country needs to distribute both current and accumulated production without having to save that money from one year to the next. But not so with the individual, not so with the businessman. Moreover, if the government is in real earnest about debt reduction I suggest that there is a far more effective way of considering it than by practising highway robbery on the producers of wealth in this country. This I shall refer to very soon.

Right now I think is the time to revive the hope of our people and the faith that their productive efforts and thrift will be rewarded by a government that is determined to provide them with ample opportunity for the abundant life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. To achieve these ends, I submit counter-proposals to some of those that have been submitted to this house by the minister. I propose that a national monetary authority be set up at once, responsible to parliament and vested with powers in the name of the people of Canada to enable the following physically possible results to become financially possible.

First, I propose, as an initial step in a comprehensive debt-retirement program, that Canada's national debt be forthwith reduced by $3,500 million to $4,000 million. This to be done under a procedure wherein the monetary authority shall call upon the chartered banks to deliver to the Bank of Canada the Dominion of Canada securities which they hold up to that value, each bank to be credited on the books of the Bank of Canada with an amount equal to the face value of the securities delivered by it as an asset to balance the liabilities of the said bank to its depositors. The national monetary authority will then so regulate the use of this credit as to enable the chartered banks to meet their liabilities to their depositors in an orderly fashion and in a manner to maintain the stability of the national economy. This initial move will save to the people of Canada not less than $100 million annually in interest.

Second, I accept the provisions for expenditure as submitted by the minister in his estimates. These may be revised as discussion in the committee of supply may indicate as desirable. But in addition, I propose provision for expenditures as follows:

(A) Cancellation of the existing reduction in family allowances for each child after the fourth. This to be the first step toward an ultimate increase of fifty per cent in all family allowances as soon as Canada's production has reached an optimum level and conditions of foreign aid and world trade make it possible. I estimate that this provision will require an additional $15,000,000.

(B) Immediate provision for old age pensions of $50 a month at seventy years without a means test, this to be the first in a series of steps to be taken toward the objective of a $50 pension at age sixty. Succeeding steps to be taken also as Canadian production expands toward its optimum level and when international trade and foreign recovery assistance problems yield to successful solution. I estimate that this provision will require an additional $169,000,000 from the federal government.

(C) Pensions, for needy widows of sixty years and over, and payments to all disabled adults not otherwise provided for by government allowances, no matter what the cause of disability, if any, at age eighteen years. I think this will require approximately $20,000,000.

(D) Provision for a sum for the bringing up of war veterans allowances from $30 to $50 a month for single persons and from $60 to $85 a month for married persons and to increase 100 per cent disability pensions to $100 a month. This will require an additional $10,000,000.

(E) Provision for the encouragement, by subsidy or otherwise, of the increased production of primary products whose importation into this country from the United States has caused such a shortage of United States dollars. The objective must be to make Canada in the shortest possible time as self-sufficient as is possible in such things as sugar, coal and steel. For this purpose I would set aside $75,000,000.

These five proposals for additional expenditures total $289,000,000. They could be provided for entirely out of the surplus which the minister has estimated. The extent to which that surplus was intended for debt reduction becomes of very little consequence since I have already provided for the reduction of debt to the extent of $3,500 million to $4,000 million, with a consequent saving in interest of $100,000,000 to $120,000,000 a year.

On the revenue side I propose that the sales tax be abolished. The minister estimates an income of $395 million, in round figures, from this source; hence reduction in revenue if this proposal were adopted would be $395 million. Abolition of the sales tax must be accompanied by measures to ensure that the benefits are passed on to consumers in lower prices. One such measure is suggested later when I deal with corporation income tax. Since this tax, like all hidden or indirect taxes, has the effect of pyramiding costs, it can be reasonably expected that the cost of living would soon show a much greater reduction than eight per cent as a result of its abolition.

I propose the cancellation of the recently imposed excise tax of twenty-five per cent, and that it be replaced by import restrictions as long as it is necessary to take unusual measures to safeguard our dollar reserves.

In the income tax field, Social Crediters have consistently pressed for raising of exemptions to $3,000 and $2,000. As the first move in this direction, I propose that exemptions be raised this year to $1,500 for single persons and to $2,400 for married persons, and that that portion of incomes in excess of $3,000 be taxed for the coming year on a basis beginning at forty per cent, with a rising scale, so that the loss of revenue from this source should not exceed $300 million.

Corporate income tax requires considerable adjustment if proper incentives to all-out production are to be provided, and if we are to ensure the passing on to consumers of benefits resulting from sales tax abolition. Therefore I propose exemption from corporate income tax on a basis that would represent ten per cent return on capital, this figure to be arrived at by a procedure similar to that used by the board of referees, formerly set up and used by the Minister of Finance; this exemption to be conditional upon the corporation furnishing satisfactory evidence that savings in cost resulting from sales tax abolition have been passed on to consumers. Moreover, I propose that corporate incomes in excess of the ten per cent just outlined, but not exceeding twenty per cent, be taxed sixty per cent; and all corporate profits over twenty per cent on capital invested be taxed at the rate of eighty per cent. I estimate that on this basis the yield in taxes would be about the same as that estimated by the minister on the basis of forty per cent of all corporate income, as provided in the budget before the house. I might say, in passing, that it would reveal a more healthy state of affairs if there were hardly any revenue on this basis. It would mean that corporations would have succeeded in so organizing their affairs that, after dealing fairly and equitably with their employees and customers, they had managed to arrived at a just and satisfactory profit, and no more. In such an event, what I set out hereafter will take care of the eventuality of loss of revenue on this count, should we experience that happy outcome. I should just say here, that ten per cent profit is not excessive. A ten per cent book profit generally permits but a five per cent distribution, the balance usually being plowed back for capital purposes.

All these proposals represent a decrease in revenue amounting to $695 million, without allowance for possible reduction in income as a result of the corporate income tax changes suggested. Then, when we add the proposed additional expenditures of $289 million, we find in my proposals a total upset in the minister's budget calculations of some $984 million.

I recommend that this amount of $984 million be provided for as follows:

(a) by using from the estimated surplus—$484 million.

(b) by saving in interest charges through the debt reduction which I outlined at the beginning—$100 million.

(c) by estimated increases in revenue from remaining sources of taxation, over and above calculations by the minister, which are bound to result from increased buoyancy in the national economy—$100 million.

(d) by use of national credit through the Bank of Canada—$300 million.

Hon. members are at once in a position, it seems to me, to appraise the extent to which my proposals will bring about a large measure of those results which the people desire, and which the manpower and resources of this great nation can unquestionably achieve. They implement some of the possibilities of the true economic situation, and start us on the road to peaceful prosperity for every Canadian. Because they are based on true economic principles, they can bring to Canadians a great degree of security and an ever-increasing measure of freedom. So long as they can be implemented, there can be no argument against them, except perhaps that they do not go far enough in the constructive and progressive set-up of which they form but the first steps.

In giving them consideration, hon. members will naturally require an answer to the question: Will their adoption mean aggravated inflation? The limited time at my disposal prevents me from developing the answer to that question at this time. One of my colleagues who will follow in this debate will deal with this question fully. Just let me say in passing that the adoption of my budget proposals need not, and very likely will not, aggravate inflationary tendencies already present. I propose that any threat of aggravated inflation be effectively dealt with, whether under my proposals or under the budget the minister has brought before us. I do not like inflation any more than anyone else. It can be controlled, and I say that inherent in the proposals I have made are the controlling factors against inflation.

Surely hon. members can visualize, in the exercise of a single thought, the transformation which the adoption of these proposals will bring to our problems of production. Consider the incentive which industrial management will find in a realization that profits to the extent of ten per cent will not be subject to confiscation in any degree. To this extent, at least, the industrial producer becomes a free agent, unmolested by all the annoyances and costs of bureaucratic interference.

Consider for a moment the new incentive to the married workman who earns $2,400 or less, and who knows his pay envelope will come to him intact and unmolested by the high-handed exactions of a toll of "deducts". He will be conscious that his weekly pay envelope will secure for him and his family something more on a par with his productive effort, because of the removal of those ugly hidden taxes that breed high prices and constitute a burden on those in the lower income brackets out of all proportion to any added service the government may render as a result of the proceeds of their collection.

[Mr. Low.]

I am convinced that the removal of the sales tax and special excise tax, aided by the increased production that is bound to result from the improved incentive, can in a short time lower the cost of living index from its all-time high of 152 to less than 130, and in longer time to normal.

Consider the new spirit and the will-to-do that would come from a sure knowledge that, as effective productive effort increases the volume of goods and services available, children will be provided for through increased family allowances, on a basis that means a substantial contribution to what it takes these days to meet the essential material needs of a child; the aged, disabled and widowed will be cared for in comfort and in some degree of decent living. It does not require prophetic vision to see ahead, my proposals drying up the cesspools of hardship and discontent in which communism thrives. It needs no exaggerated imagination to see ahead a new atmosphere for constructive, friendly relations between labour and management, such as to ensure the production of wanted goods and services at an ever-increasing pace.

Inflation will not follow the adoption of our proposals. They have in them what can be used to curb the excessive forces that bring on inflation. Above all, they have in them the spur necessary to induce greater and greater production of wanted goods and services. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, that item of $75,000,000 to encourage increased production of such items as sugar beets, coal and steel represents the most effective possible attack on the threat to the Canadian economy from an unwarranted dependence on products from the United States and other dollar countries which has resulted in the austerity program now in effect in Canada.

You have before you my proposals for a bountiful budget as opposed to the baleful ball-and-chain effort of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. In my proposals, adjustments may be needed in matters of detail and in connection with accidental circumstances which I have not considered. I have not at my disposal for research and preparation the minister's bevy of personnel. I often feel that he would be a whole lot better off without his, or most of them. Too many of them are steeped in the mentality of scarcity of the London School of Economics, where for now almost a century journeymen economists have learned to forge the ball and chain. But the framework is there. I have not been able and shall not be in the time at my disposal to present full arguments and supporting statements, but others will follow from this corner of the house who will present those supporting statements. I submit that, contrasted with the succession of ball-and-chain budgets placed before this parliament in the past, our proposals represent the transition from a long, dark night to the dawn of a new day whose span, by the way, can be just what we make it. Our proposals at least begin to place the proper value on our human resources, the greatest resource that we have in Canada, and a resource which we very often overlook and fail to develop.

I think most hon. members will recognize that the proposals I have made are designed to implement what was contained in the amendment which my colleague, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), twice submitted in the throne speech debate. These amendments called for the application of Social Credit principles which our group have been expounding in this parliament over the past thirteen years. The things I have suggested were also involved in the amendment which I submitted to the throne address last year, which amendment included these words:

> The use of the national credit to meet at least some of the financial requirements for essential services, and as a guarantee that this country would not again be subjected to financial depression, to make available to each and all Canadian citizens a proper portion of purchasing power which shall not first pass through the usual channels of industry.

When I moved that amendment in 1947, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) gave support to that portion of my amendment just quoted, with certain limitations. But the limitations did not exclude anything that was involved in my amendment of a year ago, or indeed anything in my present proposals. I quote the opposition leader's exact words on that occasion as taken from Hansard:

> To the extent that such a fiscal policy has been or may be used for the support of definite public services such as old age pensions, family allowances, floor prices and so on, services that are regarded as being essential to the public good, to that degree I support it.

Mr. Speaker, those words of the hon. leader of the opposition exactly fit the proposals I have made today, because I have called for the use of the national credit for family allowances, old age pensions, floor prices, and so on. Such use of the national credit to the amount of $300 million means that purchasing power to that extent would circulate amongst the people without creating a debt at its source and without accumulating an interest burden throughout its whole life. It need never be cancelled out of existence until that day when production falls short of the purchasing power available in this country.

I visualize for the national monetary authority, which it is proposed to set up, a role ever-increasing in importance. Its main function would be to implement the financial policy laid down for it by this parliament, a policy designed to keep always in the hands of all the people sufficient effective purchasing power to balance the total prices of the goods and services available for sale—no more and no less. Let me emphasize here that in it would be no element of that bureaucratic control which, till now, has been increasing its grip on this nation. Moreover, I have no idea for the present or the future that the chartered banks shall in any way be interfered with in the excellent accounting job they are doing and the skilled judgment they are exercising in the financing of production. I simply advocate that the sovereign title to the creation of money be vested in the people whose inalienable possession it must be, and must remain. There is very little wrong with the present method of financing production, but there is everything wrong with the financing of consumption, which seems to be nobody's job these days.

At the same time, I should like to assure hon. members that in the proposals I have made this afternoon the depositors in chartered banks of this country will not be interfered with in any way in the control of their own deposits. They shall continue to control them and to use them as they so desire.

With reference to this inalienable right of the people to exercise effective control of currency and credit, I find myself in complete agreement with the cogent pronouncement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) which he made in a radio address just before he came into power in 1935, repeated and printed in a pamphlet calculated to help bring him to power, but on which he has been strangely silent ever since. I quote:

> Let me repeat what I said in parliament: once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit, it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to government and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament, and democracy, is idle and futile.

I am sure the Prime Minister agrees with that statement even today. I am glad that he is in his seat, and I am glad to see him nodding his head in assent to what I have said. In the light of that and of what I have said this afternoon, knowing the hearts of a good many of the Liberal members, I think I should expect substantial support for my proposals from the Liberal side of the house, including the Prime Minister. I realize, sir, that the rules of this house prevent me from formally submitting my proposals for a vote in this debate. Not more than two amendments can be submitted on the budget, but it does seem to me that the people of this nation are entitled to know the extent to which their representatives are prepared to support or to reject the proposals I have made. It should not be by the application of house rules that this nation is governed, although I recognize that rules are necessary in carrying on the nation's business in this parliament. I suggest that if the majority of the members of this parliament desire during this session to give effect to our proposed financial changes, it is entirely within their power to do so. If the majority of the members want to do these things, I feel sure that the minister who has submitted this budget, and of whom I am very fond, as I have already said, could be prevailed upon to insert the necessary changes which would give effect to the things I have proposed.

Let me say this. I am convinced that if the minister will do just that, if he will revise his budget along these lines, I am satisfied that it will receive support in the house unparalleled in the history of this parliament. I cannot resist the temptation to say that his political fortunes, and the fortunes of those associated with him, would be enhanced to a degree that will never be achieved at any national convention such as is proposed for next August.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I say that in the name of my constituents, yes, in the name of every citizen of this country, I call upon this parliament to rise up now and cast off the ball and chain and consign them forever to oblivion.

On motion of Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni) the debate was adjourned.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose last we were dealing with departmental administration.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Low.]

Science service—

5. Science service administration, $168,374.

Mr. NICHOLSON: On quite a number of occasions I have urged more adequate compensation for the science personnel of the Department of Agriculture. It is unfortunate that Canadian scales of salaries have not been brought to higher levels. Unfortunately a great many who are employed by the Minister of Agriculture remain in Canada at considerable sacrifice. One of my college classmates had a Ph.D. He spent fifteen years in Canada in the government service and reached a maximum of $3,200, and finally he left, after taking on family responsibilities, and got a job with a commercial concern starting at $6,000, and soon had an increase to $7,200. Can the minister make a statement to indicate what progress is being made in getting increases for the members of the science services of his department?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): At page 87 of the main estimates, giving the details, it is pretty well indicated what has been happening in the service. The salary of the director of agricultural science service has been increased from $7,200 to $8,000; the salary of the assistant director, from $3,960 to $4,140; agricultural scientist, grade 8, a new one, at $4,860. The principal clerk's salary is up by $90 and clerk grade 4 and the other clerks have also been given increases.

I presume what the hon. member had in mind is the scientists working in the different branches of the department whose salaries have been under review for some time. I can only repeat what I said last year, that we were in advance of any of the other departments in having a review made of salaries and having increases provided for under the general survey that was being made of salaries throughout the service. It is still correct to say that we are far in advance of any other department of government in the matter of salaries.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The common complaint has been that adjustments always start at the top with substantial increases and there are increases for people at the very bottom, but there is a large group in between who so far have not had adequate relief from the cost of living. Can the minister indicate what the prospects are in the immediate future for the large bulk in the middle-income groups who so far have not had increases? How soon can they expect satisfactory adjustments?

Mr. GARDINER: I think, Mr. Chairman, you had better call it six o'clock, and at nine o'clock I shall have all the details.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Shall we go on with these estimates this evening?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, when consideration of private bills comes to an end.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY OF CANADA

The house in committee on Bill No. 8, respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada—Mr. Rinfret—Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Power to increase capital.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, I shall be brief. When the hon. member sponsoring this bill introduced it on February 27, if I had been in possession of the information I now have, which was given when the bill was being considered in committee, perhaps I would have changed my mind in some respects. When I rose to speak at that time, what I had in mind was to obtain for Ontario, if possible, the assurance that was given to British Columbia on May 2, 1947, in connection with a similar bill, by the hon. member for New Westminster in reply to a question asked by my deskmate, the hon. member for Vancouver South. Let me read what was said. The hon. member for Vancouver South said:

> I think it is essential that some protection should be given to telephone users of British Columbia. I understand that the hon. member has been authorized to give assurance to the effect that the company has no present intention of applying for an increase of rates and will not make any such application unless compelled to do so by extensive changes in conditions.

The hon. member for New Westminster replied:

> That is my definite understanding.

That is what I had in mind when I spoke on February 27 last; I wanted some assurance in connection with the present bill. This matter was considered by the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines on May 11. One of the witnesses was Mr. N. A. Munnoch, K.C., vice-president and general counsel for the company. Referring to the amount of money which was to be spent, the hon. member for The Battlefords asked:

> Can you make that expenditure and hold your present toll rate at the present figure?

That was a very pertinent question, and in reply Mr. Munnoch said:

> It is impossible to say what will happen to telephone rates, but I can say that at the present time the company has filed no application with the railway board for an increase in rates—

Then he added:

> —and has made no preparation for filing such an application.

If that assurance had been given by the sponsor of the bill I for one, at any rate, might have taken a different position, though I am glad I took the position I did at that time. Then Mr. Munnoch went further and said:

> We have carried on through the war period and by reason of economies and technological improvements in telephony we have been able to maintain our present rate structure since it was established in 1926.

They did that all through the depression and all through the war, and I was convinced that they must have exercised very good management, particularly, in order to have $13,000,000 left from the $75,000,000 by which they were authorized to increase their capital on the last occasion. So I must confess I am convinced that the Bell Telephone Company when it issues this stock will spend the money judiciously. I also have in mind the reply by the vice-president and general counsel, which to me is a little stronger than if the statement had been made by the hon. member for Outremont, and which is equal to the statement made by the hon. member for New Westminster when the British Columbia telephone bill was under consideration. All these factors induce me to refrain from further opposition to the bill, and I propose to vote for it.

Just before resuming my seat, I wish to compliment my hon. friends to the left on the stand they took. Along with others and myself in this party, including the hon. member for Broadview, the hon. member for High Park and the hon. member for Vancouver South, they did what they thought was their duty. I am never afraid to do what I think is my duty. I am under obligation to no living man, as far as I know. I have no stock in the Bell Telephone Company, and further I can say this, which I have not said before. When I came to this house I divested myself of any stock I had in any concern or company with which I had anything to do that I thought might ever come to this house for a favour or for support. I wanted to be in the position that I was under no obligation to anyone who might come here. What I have said or done has been from my heart. It may have been wrong as far as my head is concerned, but it has come from my heart and I believe it has been right. So I compliment my hon. friends to the left, because in my opinion they were rather meanly treated by reason of the epithets and phrases which were hurled at them and which they did not deserve. They did what they thought was their duty, and I share with them the assurance I quoted given by the general counsel and vice-president of the Bell Telephone Company. That is what I was after. As you well know, Mr. Chairman, in my riding are perhaps twenty thousand, more or less, Bell Telephone users. In the main they are humble people, and I was anxious that they should not be asked to pay more than the $3.45 a month they are now paying. I accept the assurance of the vice-president of the company in that regard.

In conclusion, may I ask the hon. member for Outremont to communicate to the company that I for one would strongly recommend that they do what they did on the last occasion, at the instance of the hon. member for Broadview. No man I know in public life has done more for his constituents than that hon. gentleman. On the last occasion he fought a hard battle against all sorts of cruel opposition, for which he received no thanks whatever, to obtain a flat rate not only for Toronto but for the people living all around and about it. I would suggest to the hon. member for Outremont that an effort be made to get that flat rate for an area within five miles of the hon. member's own city, the city of Toronto and other large cities. It seems to me that it is not fair to ask suburban residents just outside cities to pay rates that are higher than those which we pay in the cities.

Further, I wish to express my appreciation of what has been done by the hon. member for High Park. I have always found him a fearless fighter. I would say the same for the hon. member for Vancouver South, and I pay my tribute to them for the part they have played in bringing about the assurance given re rates.

I fully realize that if, in time, for one cause or another the company has to have a higher rate, it will make its application to the railway board. I am satisfied with the assurance that was given to the hon. member for Vancouver South on May 2, 1947, and as above referred to re this bill.

Mr. KNIGHT: Mr. Chairman, this group is opposed to this section of the bill, and to the bill of which this is a section. We base our opposition chiefly upon the opinion held generally by ourselves and at least by some members in all parts of the house, that the increase in capitalization asked for by the company is too high.

The company is asking that its capitalization be increased from the present amount of $150,000,000 to $500,000,000. We believe that is too large an amount of capitalization for the company to ask at any one time. We believe, too, that a company with a capitalization of that sort, and particularly a transportation company—because, in a way, it is a transportation company—by its very nature would become a virtual monopoly. We believe that if it is to become a monopoly it should be a monopoly owned by the people of this country.

We could have a telephone company operated on a co-operative basis, in which event the profit would go back to the users of the telephone, or we could have a publicly owned company, in which case those dividends would go to all the people of the provinces in which the company performs its operations.

In this instance the profits of the company do not go to the users of the telephone as such. They go to those fortunate people who in early days invested their money in this venture. We have no great fault to find with that, under present circumstances. But we do recognize that the assets of this great company have been built up by the users of those public facilities. They have created those assets, but they are in the position of not owning any of them.

Dealing again with our view that the increase in capitalization is too great, let me say that this, like other companies, is one which has to come to parliament from time to time to obtain increases in its capitalization. I shall have a word or two to say about that later.

This group delayed the bill in its early stages, but only until two conditions were fulfilled. We held it up, first, until it had been established that there had been good and sufficient time for hon. members to say practically everything which could be said in respect of the bill, and time in which all information available could be obtained. In the second place, we held up the bill until we discovered that in the house a majority of members—and I believe this to be true—were in favour of an increased capitalization for this company.

When those two conditions had been fulfilled we withdrew our opposition and allowed the bill to go to the appropriate committee. I was a member of that committee and, if I had the time and were in the mood, I might be somewhat critical of committees of that sort. We had a genial and good-natured chairman—perhaps that was part of the difficulty. I would say in passing that it is unfortunate for a small minority on a committee when the greater number on the committee are in favour of rushing legislation through. On at least two occasions I was on my feet in an effort to move an amendment to the section we are now discussing, but I was informed that it had been carried long ago. My voice was not heard among the vociferous chorus of "carried, carried, carried", from all sides, which reminded me collectively of the individual voice of the former minister of veterans affairs.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In his more robust days.

Mr. KNIGHT: In the committee we met the officers of the company. May I pay tribute to them by saying that they were fair. I found some fault with them in that they would not make certain prophecies which I tried to persuade them to make. However, I believe they did produce the facts, to our satisfaction. We would like to persuade those officers to be content with a little less capitalization than is called for in this section.

After having examined the witnesses as best we could, we did not alter our conviction that the capitalization asked for is still too high. And we are also alarmed by the other point brought out by the hon. member for Davenport, namely, that we are likely to be faced with a rise in telephone rates charged by the company.

In its final analysis the money asked for in this section is needed for a tremendous expansion of the company in the matter of giving new service. That means practically the installation of new telephones and the setting up of machinery to service those telephones. This great amount of money could be defined, roughly, as the number of new units necessary multiplied by the cost of the telephone unit.

Before taking my seat, I shall have further comment to make on that aspect of the matter—the same comment I made in committee. I learned from questioning the officials that the company estimates that at the present time the cost of installing a telephone unit at present prices is $550. One member of the committee seemed confused on this; he appeared to think the cost of the mouthpiece was the main factor. I believe my information goes farther than that.

Might I point out that that figure of $550 is an all-time high. I asked the officials for corresponding prices of installations and the cost of a telephone unit in times when prices were not so high. I believe the official mentioned the period between 1932 and 1937 and gave the figure of $230, which may or may not have been the lowest figure in that period. The officials did not know. I want to make the point that the amount asked for is predicated upon the price per unit remaining as it is now or going higher. I do not think the company is justified in the assumption that the price will stay as it is or go up during the next five or six years.

I would remind hon. gentlemen that prices have been known to go down before, and drastically. If prices were to go back to the $230 figure the company would then have a much higher capitalization than it needed and would find itself in possession of vast sums of money which for the moment were not needed for the expansion of the company.

I shall here refer to the minutes of proceedings of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, where I am reported on page 44 as follows:

> Mr. Knight: The position is this: if your cost goes down to $230 within the next year or so, you will find yourselves, in terms of what you are asking for, in the position of having twice the amount you need, predicated on present costs?
> Mr. Johnston: I think we can agree with that.

This company must come to parliament once in a while, and I think that is a healthy condition. I believe I used the expression that they must come for an occasional medical check-up. If my argument is sound and prices go down it will mean that this company will not have to come to parliament for an increase in its capitalization for perhaps twice as long a period. That is one reason why we think the amount asked for is too great, and we hope that the company and this committee will be satisfied with a lesser amount. I think that to decrease the amount asked for would be to the advantage of all the people of Canada, and so I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke):

> That subsection 1 of section 1 of an act respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada be amended by striking out the word "five" as it appears in line 20 of the said section and substituting therefor the word "three."

Mr. JAENICKE: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in connection with the amendment which has been moved by my colleague. This company is seeking a substantial increase in its capitalization, and I submit that a company which is admittedly a monopoly should satisfy this committee that it needs that amount of capital. The onus of proof is on the company to show that it needs an expansion of $350,000,000 in its capital.

I contend that the amount for which the company asks is excessive, and I base my argument entirely upon the brief presented by the company and upon the evidence given before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

According to the brief and according to the evidence, the company expended $104,495,000 between August 1, 1945, and the end of March, 1948, in order to instal 329,000 additional telephones, an increase of 32 per cent. This means that in a little over two and half years the company expended in capital funds $317.60 for each telephone installed. This sum represents the cost of the following capital equipment: right of way, land and buildings, central office equipment, station equipment, exchange lines, toll lines and general equipment.

The company stated in its brief and its officers said in their evidence that it requires this capital expansion in order to instal during the next five years an additional 455,000 telephones. According to the experience of the company in the last two and a half years, which I submit is a recent period, the cost of each telephone to be installed is $317.60. On that experience the capital expenditure required in the next five years for 455,000 telephones would be $144,508,000. When the officer of the company who seemed to be giving evidence on technical matters was questioned on this he said that $317.60 was too low, that it would be around $500, and later on he increased the amount to $550. According to the answers he gave to me, I suggest that this was a pure estimate, which seems to me to be too high in the light of the company's recent experience which showed that a telephone cost $317.60.

Even assuming the cost to be $500, during the next five years the company would expend $227,500,000 in order to instal 455,000 telephones, not the $350,000,000 it is asking for. It was stated in the brief of the company that it still has $13,000,000 of treasury stock from the $150,000,000 which is authorized at the present time. Deducting that amount from the $227,500,000 shows that the company would need only $214,500,000 of capital during the next five years in order to make the proposed expansion.

According to the evidence and according to the brief, it is indicated that not all the money which the company will require will be raised through the issue of capital stock. The evidence and the brief show that a substantial portion of it, about one-half, is expected to be obtained, and I quote:

> . . . through borrowings and other available resources of the company such as depreciation credits which will be used and invested in the plant to be constructed.

Therefore, according to that plan, the company would need to raise by sale of shares only one-half of the $214,500,000, namely, $107,250,000.

It would seem to me that an increase in capital of $150 million would amply meet the needs of the company for the next five years. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the company has not discharged the burden of proof that it needs this $500 million; that is to say, an extra $350 million, and I think we would be remiss in our duty if we were to grant an increase of $350 million on such flimsy evidence as we had in the committee.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to speak for five or six minutes on this bill respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada. I wanted to speak before the amendment was moved. I wish to point out that I am not a socialist in the ordinary sense. Four or five years ago when the Postmaster General's estimates were up I urged that we should follow the practice in England where the telephone is a branch of the Post Office Department, because our rates were very high. In my opinion a residence telephone should not cost more than $15 or $20 and a business telephone in the neighbourhood of $45.

We had an investigation of railway, express, and telephone companies conducted by the Drayton-Acworth commission some years ago. Sir Henry Drayton was the chairman, Mr. Acworth was a British engineer, and the other member of the commission was Mr. A. H. Smith, president of the New York Central. What did they report? They reported that any application for an increase in capitalization should first be reported on by the board of railway commissioners, now the board of transport commissioners. I believe that such a report should have been obtained in this case, and that is my first objection to this bill.

The stock of this company is quoted today at 162¼. If the company gets the increase in capitalization I believe that the stock will immediately go to about 200. The company cannot pay dividends of eight per cent on that high capitalization, without an immediate rate increase. I am opposed to over-capitalization of these companies. We had the same arguments presented when the cheap light and power movement started in Ontario, and there were the same attacks on public men, but cheap light and power was a boon not only to the urban centres but also to the rural communities in this province.

Over-capitalization immediately means an increase in rates, and if this increase goes through, telephone service will cost three times as much as it should. The telephone is a public utility. I have no mandate from the people I represent to vote for this increase and create a monopoly. Monopolies are flourishing like a green bay tree in this country at the present time, and there is no one to stop them. Monopolies started about the time of Queen Elizabeth. She gave the sole right to trade in certain commodities to a few people, and that principle has been extended in modern times, so that many groups of persons and corporations enjoying a monopoly have the power to enhance prices in conformity with their own purposes.

It is for the railway commission to find out whether there is need for competition in the telephone field. I say yes, and competition should be welcomed by the people of our province. Are we getting telephone service at cost now? No. The people in Britain do, through the British post office department.

In Cochrane the cost of power went to $60 per horsepower.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to clause 1 and the amendment before the committee.

Mr. CHURCH: This bill is all about telephones, Mr. Chairman, and I want to show the cause and effect of no regulation of these companies.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: There is an amendment before the chair that subsection 1 of section 1 be amended by striking out the word "five" which appears in line 20 and substituting therefor the word "three."

Mr. CHURCH: I am going to support the amendment, Mr. Chairman. I have no mandate from the people of the province of Ontario or from my constituents to continue a monopoly of half a billion dollars. There is practically no regulation of this company. Why did it go to another place with this bill, where the fee is only $200 as compared with $500 in this chamber? I do not know whether the house understands that. The Bell Telephone company is a good company, well conducted, and I would like to see it get all the capital it needs to meet its capital requirements for the next ten or twenty years, but I think an increase in the capitalization of 100 per cent, bringing it to $300 million, would be ample for many years to come.

It took almost a motion in the house to try to get a stenographic report of the proceedings in the other place with respect to this bill. I am not blaming the company or the mover of the bill for that, because I think the mover of the bill wanted us to have the report Why should we not know all the ins and outs of this application? If we had had a stenographic report of the proceedings in the other place it would have saved five or six nights of discussion in this house.

I do not believe that we should support this bill and create a monopoly by raising the capitalization to half a billion dollars. One clause of the bill gives the board of transport commissioners jurisdiction to say what the amount shall be, but you have to be a shareholder before you can get the board to deal with that matter.

In the mother country they are having the very same discussions. The party which is called Conservative over there wanted to refer allegations about monopolies to an independent commission. We have a regulatory commission in this country, but they do not regulate. In Great Britain they rejected the United States idea of controlling monopolies by charging them with "restraint of trade" under the provisions of their anti-trust legislation, which can be enforced in the law courts. In the United States they have the interstate commerce commission over there and it is a very long and expensive proceeding. The result is these monopolies, cartels and things are international. They have entered this country, as hon. members know.

As I see it, it is the function and duty of the board of transport commissioners to find out the facts about this particular company. Do they need half a billion dollars, or will an increase of $300 million or $150 million tide them over for the next ten or fifteen years? I say yes, I believe it will. I suggest that the board of transport commissioners should find out the following facts about this particular company. If it is a monopoly, is it harmful, and why? If it is, what should be done about it? In dealing with this application I believe that the House of Commons would like the board of transport commissioners to consider that fact. Second, it is satisfactory up to half a billion dollars, or would $300 million do for ten or fifteen years? If not, what improvements or suggestions would the board of transport commissioners demand of this company? Is the telephone a monopoly? Will it have to pay dividends on half a billion dollars, or on $300 million? I believe they should find out these things in connection with this particular bill. If this bill is harmful, if it is harmful to give half a billion dollars to this company, what steps should the board of transport commissioners take to remedy the situation? They should find out whether a monopoly exists in the province. If it does, is it harmful to the public of our province and to the province of Quebec? These are a few things that I think the board of transport commissioners should examine and find out.

They talk about 100,000 customers wanting telephones. Who is to blame for it? If I did not have a telephone and could not get one I could apply to the board of transport commissioners, and they would immediately, of their own volition, send an inspector around and have a proper inspection made of the application. The public do not even know that, but it could be done. I wish to say this. I stand firm on the ground that the state exists for the individual, not the individual for the state; that state interference with the full liberty of the subject is an evil thing per se, the encroachments of which should be most searchingly scrutinized and resisted; that no government department, except where it enjoys a monopoly, can conduct a business at a profit; that the prosperity of the nation rests on the enterprise and ability of individuals in free association to conduct their affairs with a minimum of regulation and interference; that capital and labour are partners and not enemies, indispensable to one another; that bureaucracy is the enemy of them both and will ruin them morally and financially if they do not restrict its inordinate increase; and, finally, that what I seek is the welfare of the whole community, and no sectional or class advantage.

I believe that is the doctrine which would be acceptable to the people. I appreciate the fact that this company and its officers may have given good satisfaction. I believe they are asking over-capitalization in regard to a utility which belongs to our province.

I have always been in favour of the public ownership of the telephone. I proposed that many years ago in connection with post office. I called attention to what the post office in Britain was doing as compared with our post office, which has not made any improvements since confederation except in regard to the mail and all that kind of thing.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: I believe the time has come—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: This has nothing to do with the post office.

Mr. CHURCH: That is correct. I was just pointing out that I tried to get the post office to take this over years ago. I think that is about all I wish to say. I want to say one thing about television. The government has not laid down any policy—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. CHURCH: That is included in clause 5 of the bill.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. We are dealing with the amendment.

Mr. CHURCH: I am opposed to the policy of giving—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. We are dealing with clause 1 of the bill. What is before the committee is an amendment.

Mr. CHURCH: That is about all I have to say on this amendment. I am opposed to the giving of any monopoly for the reasons I have given. I believe a monopoly exists, and we have no mandate from the people to increase that monopoly. The people would have taken action in 1945 to prevent us going as far as the bill provides.

Amendment negatived; yeas, 24, nays, 47.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Par value of shares may be changed from $100 to $25.

Mr. IRVINE: I desire to move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current:

That section 3 be deleted and that section 4 become section 3.

I do not think it is necessary for me to spend any time saying what I am moving this amendment for. I have already objected to this bill, and in particular I have tried to explain to the committee the viciousness of this kind of legislation. All I want now is that the committee should be asked to vote on this amendment.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I want to point out to the hon. member that it is not necessary to move that a section be deleted. If the section does not carry it is out, anyway. No amendment is required to delete a section. You may vote against the section.

Mr. IRVINE: By moving the amendment, Mr. Chairman, I have given point to what I wanted to say. You are perfectly right, of course, in saying that all we have to do is to defeat the section. This gives me the opportunity of asking the committee to defeat this section.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall section 3 carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. IRVINE: Before you put the question—

Some hon. MEMBERS: It is put.

Section agreed to: yeas, 47; nays, 23.

On section 4—Transmission by will or intestacy.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 4 carry?

Mr. JAENICKE: I have no amendment to offer, but in such sections a provision is usually made that succession duties be paid before the shares are transferred.

Mr. HACKETT: That is the law.

Mr. JAENICKE: But we are passing a special act that they shall be transferred upon submission of letters of probate.

Mr. RINFRET: It does not override the general law.

NATIONAL INSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 151, to incorporate the National Insurance Company—Mr. Rinfret—Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BENTLEY: What about order No. 26 and order No. 27?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): As has been said, Mr. Chairman, this question of having a National Insurance Company incorporated by this bill is a matter to be carefully considered. I do not think it is right at all. There is one National Insurance Company in Canada now. It is all very well to say that there will be no confusion, but suppose something did happen to this new company which is being incorporated and it did not get on very well; that would reflect immediately upon the National Insurance Company we have now. It may be said that one is insurance and the other assurance. I suggest to the hon. member who is piloting the bill through that if there were included in the name the word "accident" or the word "general" it might be different. There is a General Insurance Company of England, for instance. I do not think it is right for a foreign company to come into Canada and take the name here proposed.

Mr. BENTLEY: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, why did you jump from No. 25 to No. 84 on the order paper, instead of dealing with No. 26 and No. 27?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Some of these bills are second readings and these are in committee. The hour for private bills having expired, I will now report to the Speaker.

An hon. MEMBER: It is not nine yet.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Progress reported.

The Deputy Chairman having reported to Mr. Speaker:

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Golding, from committee of the whole, reports that they have considered certain private bills and directed him to report the same and ask leave to sit again, and to report progress on Bill No. 151. When shall the report be received?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Now.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the said bills be read the third time?

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. COLDWELL: What bill is this?

Mr. SPEAKER: I will call one bill at a time.

Mr. COLDWELL: Name it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Rinfret moves, seconded by Mr. Brown, that Bill No. 8, intituled "An act respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada", be read the third time. When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Mr. COLDWELL: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no amendment. Adopted.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, next sitting.

Mr. RINFRET: Now.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call attention to the fact that the practice is that when there is not an amendment the bill is usually read the third time at the same sitting. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I submit—

Mr. SPEAKER: Bill No. 8 will be read the third time at the next sitting of the house. Bill No. 205. When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Mr. MacINNIS: I call attention to the fact that the hour for private bills has expired. It is after nine o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is the practice to ask the house to proceed with third reading even after nine o'clock. It is the privilege of the house to say "next sitting".

Mr. MacINNIS: The house has already said "next sitting".

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Mr. COLDWELL: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Bill No. 50, respecting the Ruthenian Catholic Mission of the Order of Saint Basil the Great in Canada. When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Next sitting.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Hlynka moves that the bill be read the third time. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Hlynka moves that the said bill be passed and that the title be as on the order paper. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: Adopté. Carried.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Bill No. 150, to incorporate the Canadian Veterinary Medical Association. When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Charlton moves that the said bill do now pass and that the title be as on the order paper.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, am I to understand that in connection with margarine, for example, you can take public bills after nine o'clock?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER: Bill No. 174, to incorporate the Canadian Association of Optometrists. When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for public and private bills having expired, the house will revert to the business under consideration prior to six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

5. Science service administration, $168,374.

Mr. GARDINER: Before the dinner recess the hon. member for Mackenzie was asking some questions with regard to the professional classes, particularly the scientists, in the Department of Agriculture. I presume the hon. member had in mind the science services all the way through the department rather than just those in the science branch itself. I should like to make a general statement as to the position, and then, if there are any questions to be asked with regard to the experimental farms or otherwise, they can be dealt with as we come to the particular items.

The general salary adjustments for the Department of Agriculture have been completed. Individual cases which could not be handled in the general revision, and some anomalies arising out of the revision, are now being adjusted as individual cases. In the professional classes the increases varied from $300 to $600 per annum, depending upon revisions which had been made during the previous two years. In other words, we started making these revisions in 1945. In some cases revisions had been made previously and in other cases they had not, so that there is a variation between $300 and $600, depending upon whether revisions had been made on a prior occasion.

During the time the general revision has been in progress the reclassification of individuals who have assumed increased responsibilities has continued, and consequently many employees have had their salaries increased by from $480 to $900 over the 1945 levels, by a combination of the general revision and a specific reclassification. Practically all the professional employees of the department have now benefited, and individual cases are being dealt with as I indicated a few moments ago.

Item agreed to.

Science service—

9. Agricultural chemistry, $312,525.

Mr. McCUAIG: Might I ask just what agricultural chemistry covers?

Mr. GARDINER: This particular item covers general service for all the divisions of the department, and specific cases having to do with soil surveys.

Item agreed to.

Science service—

11. Forest entomology, $887,693.

Mr. CHARLTON: I see the amount of this vote has been reduced by $81,000. I have looked over the estimates of the Department of Mines and Resources, however, and I should like to know if it would be correct to assume that some of the work which has been carried on by the forest entomology division has now been taken over by the mines and resources forestry branch?

Mr. GARDINER: The decrease results from the fact that further funds are not required for the construction of the plant at Sault Ste. Marie. The vote last year exceeded the amount required.

Mr. HAZEN: I wonder if under this item the minister is in a position to say what is happening to the pine trees of this country Many of them appear to be turning brown. Does his department have anything to do with that?

Mr. GARDINER: The main difficulty is a disease known as white pine blister rust, which has been affecting the trees. A study is being made in an attempt to combat it.

Mr. HAZEN: Will the trees die in time if the condition is not remedied?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, it will kill the trees eventually. I am not in a position to say just how long it will take, because the period varies in different places and under different conditions. If the ravages are not halted, it will kill the trees eventually.

Mr. HAZEN: Has it increased very much in the last year or two in this part of the dominion?

Mr. GARDINER: I am informed that there has been no marked increase, that it has been moving along at about the same rate for a considerable period of time.

Mr. HAZEN: Are any steps being taken to control it?

Mr. GARDINER: No specific way of controlling or stopping it has been developed, though continuous study and attempts to control it are being carried on.

Mr. MENARY: The spruce trees in my district are going in the same way. Would it be the same disease?

Mr. GARDINER: The difficulty there is the spruce budworm, and an attempt is being made to control that with parasites which destroy the insect.

Item agreed to.

Experimental farms service—

13. Experimental farms service administration, $100,475.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would the minister allow either item 13, 14 or 15 to stand. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle had some problems to bring up, and one of the items might be allowed to stand for half an hour or so.

Mr. GARDINER: I brought in the director of the division on purpose to take these items tonight, but if it is important I could let one item stand when we reach it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If the minister would agree to that I would appreciate it very much.

Mr. CHARLTON: I should like to ask what has been done to control the blue mould which is now affecting tobacco plants in southern and western Ontario.

Mr. GARDINER: We have already passed that item, under plant pathology.

[Mr. Hazen.]

Mr. CHARLTON: I thought it would come under the experimental farms.

Mr. GARDINER: Downy mildew or blue mould on tobacco was observed in southwestern Ontario in 1943. This was the first record for Canada. It was absent in 1944, but recurred in epidemic proportions in 1945. Thorough and quick action in getting the growers to treat their seed beds with P.D.B.—I shall not attempt to pronounce the name for which those initials stand—saved the crop. There is strong circumstantial evidence that the spores and fungus were wind-borne across lake Erie from tobacco beds or fields farther south. That is the information available.

Mr. CHARLTON: Is P.D.B. a cure for the disease if the soil is treated?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I understand it is.

Mr. CHARLTON: An absolute cure?

Mr. GARDINER: Provided that it is used at the proper time and efficiently applied, it is a complete cure.

Mr. CHARLTON: Has that information been conveyed to the tobacco growers? Apparently many of them are not using it.

Mr. GARDINER: The information has been conveyed to them, and it has been used widely. I do not know whether everyone is using it.

Mr. KNIGHT: What is the present function of the experimental farm at Saskatoon? What particular branch of experiments is it carrying out? I understand that in the past it has been used largely in the development of young trees to be sent out to farmers in the vicinity.

Mr. GARDINER: The chief activities in connection with experimental work at Saskatoon are carried on at the university. The farm there is a provincial farm. We have a forestry farm.

Mr. KNIGHT: I was referring to the forestry farm.

Mr. GARDINER: But there is some work being carried on at the agricultural college in connection with crops other than forestry crops. All the forage crop work is done at that plant, and the soils work.

Mr. KNIGHT: I was wondering to what extent the forestry farm was justifying its name. To what extent are young trees grown there? Are they sent out to different farms in the district? As a matter of fact I should like to say a word for that forestry farm, because I believe it is worth all that is being spent on it, simply through the amount of pleasure given to people who go out there to visit. On Sunday afternoons great numbers of people find it a place for pleasant recreation. I would pay tribute to the manner in which the flowerbeds and the like are kept. I was wondering, however, to what extent young trees are being developed and sent out into northern Saskatchewan.

Mr. GARDINER: They are going out from there at the rate of about a couple of million a year. Deciduous trees are produced at Saskatoon and coniferous trees, in so far as they are produced, are produced at Indian Head. The trees are distributed from both those farms throughout all western Canada, as a matter of fact, wherever they are required. They are going out in the numbers I indicated a moment ago.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: The minister will recall that sometime ago the board of trade of Dauphin made certain representations to his department in connection with an experimental farm which they thought would be most desirable in the Dauphin area. If I remember the correspondence correctly, the reply was that at this time it was not thought advisable to establish an experimental farm in that area.

Last year, I believe it was, when the estimates of the minister were up for consideration, the minister made a statement to the effect that in his opinion it would be a desirable project in that part of Manitoba. I would draw to his attention that we have no experimental farm in that large agricultural section of the province, and I would hope that the minister has not closed the door on the idea that perhaps in the future he would consider setting up an experimental farm at Dauphin or in that district.

Mr. GARDINER: There is no experimental farm there, and there is no provision in these estimates for putting one there. I am not in a position to say that we are likely to do so in the near future. However, some fine work is being done there by Mr. Parker. I was up there last summer and visited the experimental plots he is operating, and I believe it is among the best work being done in western Canada. I believe he is strongly of the opinion that good service could be rendered there by an experimental station somewhat larger than that which is there now. However, no provision is made for that in these estimates, to enlarge upon what is being done.

Item agreed to.

14. Central experimental farm, $1,354,441.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What is the reason for this increase? Would the minister tell the committee what has been done in the development of a rust-resistant barley?

Mr. GARDINER: The question which was asked just before the dinner recess, and which I answered just after the committee resumed this evening, gives the reason for a considerable portion of this increase. Many of the scientific and professional men spoken of are associated with the central experimental farm. A very considerable part of this increase is due to an increase in wages and salaries. Some of it, too, is due to studies being made, such as that just mentioned. Barley studies are being carried on here and also at Brandon and Winnipeg.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What are the types which are standing up best and which are recommended as rust-resistant? Are they malting types?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not in a position to give the names at the present time; but there is one malting variety and one good feed variety, both of which have been successfully developed. They are about ready for distribution.

Mr. CHARLTON: I understood the minister to say most of this increase was due to increased salaries. I find, however, that that accounts for only $57,000.

Mr. GARDINER: I said a very considerable part of it.

Mr. CHARLTON: That is only a small part of $177,000. I think the minister will find that the rest of it was taken up in the acquisition of buildings and structures. Where is that being done?

Mr. GARDINER: I find that $46,000 of it is on land; then there is the figure just given with regard to wages, and the remainder is for equipment.

Mr. CARDIFF: Has there been an increase in staff?

Mr. GARDINER: The information will be found at page 93 of the estimates. According to the details on page 93, the number at the central experimental farm was 118 last year, whereas next year it will be 113, being down five.

Mr. CHARLTON: Where was this land bought?

Mr. GARDINER: The land has not been bought; we have to get the money before we can buy it.

Mr. CHARLTON: Where is it intended to buy the land?

Mr. GARDINER: Right alongside the central farm.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am sure all hon. members are glad that this item is being increased. I feel that Canadians generally are proud of the work which has been done by the director of the experimental farms service and the personnel under his supervision. This applies to the work done both in Canada and in the international field. Could the minister make some statement with regard to the progress being made in connection with the artificial insemination of horses?

Mr. GARDINER: There has been very little success experienced in connection with that. Experiments have been carried on at Brandon and here but without any great success.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What progress has been made in connection with Garry oats?

Mr. GARDINER: It is being multiplied rapidly and there has been considerable distribution both east and west.

Mr. CHARLTON: Is that not one of the varieties susceptible to this supposedly new disease of root rot? What has been done at the experimental farms to develop an oat resistant to that disease?

Mr. GARDINER: It is resistant to both leaf rust and stem rust, but there is nothing to indicate that it is particularly susceptible to root rot or any disease of that kind.

Mr. CHARLTON: It has been stated all across Canada that Garry was one of the varieties susceptible to this disease, and there should be some information from the experimental farms about this.

Mr. GARDINER: The gentleman who is responsible for the experimental farms has the opposite opinion and that is the only opinion I can give.

Mr. QUELCH: What supplies of Saunders wheat will be available in the near future? I understand that red bobs wheat has been graded down to No. 3. As the minister knows, red bobs is grown largely in Alberta and it has been suggested that Saunders wheat will largely take its place.

Mr. GARDINER: It is being multiplied rapidly and distribution is being made in the northwestern section from Scott and Beaverlodge and Lacombe.

Mr. QUELCH: It stands up very well?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. FAIR: What is the reason for red bobs being dropped in grade from 1 to 3?

Mr. GARDINER: As hon. members know, wheats along with other cereals are sown on plots over a considerable part of western Canada and examined from year to year. This work is carried on under Doctor Newman. As a result of these experiments, it was found that red bobs wheat was not up to the general mark that has been made by Marquis wheat, and it has finally been displaced by Saunders, which is a good quality.

Mr. QUELCH: Would it be possible to delay the time when red bobs is to be declared No. 3 until ample supplies of Saunders are available? I understand that it is to be graded 3 next year. Would it be possible to put it off until 1950? There will not be sufficient supplies of Saunders wheat available until 1950.

Mr. GARDINER: That is not something that we can control. Grading is done under the board of grain commissioners which operates under the Department of Trade and Commerce. There is a special committee which meets every year and advises with regard to that matter. It would be better to bring the matter up on the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I understand that some experimental work has been done in connection with the use of hay balers. Can the minister indicate what success if any has been achieved in the use of hay balers during the ordinary haying season in different parts of Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: Hay balers have always been used generally right across Canada and I do not know that anything special has been discovered recently with regard to them. It is simply a matter of having the hay in proper condition when it is baled. If it is baled under proper conditions the bales will stand up quite well, but if there is any dampness in it they will not stand up. I do not know that there is anything new with regard to balers.

Mr. McCUAIG: What development has taken place in connection with winter wheat varieties, and I am referring to western Canada particularly?

Mr. GARDINER: There has been winter wheat grown in Alberta and some on the western side of Saskatchewan. From information we have here there are varieties which are not yet named but which give some promise. They are not ready for distribution and there is nothing more I can say about them at the moment. As is generally known, these are put through severe tests before any effort is made to multiply them and put them out, and those tests are still being made.

Mr. McCUAIG: I understand that yobo has been grown for the last two years and that there is quite an acreage up in the southwest corner. Will that be the name of the new variety?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know which variety they are using there, but I assume it is the variety that has been used generally through southern Alberta for some time.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Could the minister state what experimental work has been done in the production of vegetable oils? I see the hon. member for Fraser Valley is behind the curtains. I believe success has been experienced around Moose Jaw in growing rapeseed.

Mr. GARDINER: The seed most generally used for oil purposes in Saskatchewan and the west is rapeseed. Some work was done with sunflowers but sunflowers worked out more successfully in sections of Manitoba than in any other parts of the west. Then there are soya beans which do very well in the southwestern part of Ontario. We have not yet been able to develop a soya bean which will produce in the shorter seasons of the areas east and west of that. One great difficulty with the soya bean is frost, which in the spring affects the plant itself, and in the fall affects the oil-bearing qualities of the bean. So it is necessary to develop a different variety of soya bean from any we have yet, to make it possible to produce it successfully across Canada. There is one seed from which oil has been taken over a long period of time, and that is flaxseed, which is grown all over western Canada and in eastern Canada too.

Mr. CHARLTON: I am sorry if I am dwelling too long on root rot. The minister has just said that Garry oats was not susceptible to this rot. Vicland and Beacon were two varieties that were particularly subject to this disease last year. We have had reports from officials on the seriousness of this disease and on the steps taken to protect farmers across the country against it. Work is also being done on a new variety which it is hoped would be resistant to this disease. I should like to get some information on that.

Mr. GARDINER: There are three commonly recognized root rot diseases, the common root rot, browning root rot, and take-all. The common root rot pathogens may attack the plant at all stages of growth, causing seedling blight, leaf spotting, head blight and kernel smudge. The losses from these diseases are extensive during certain years in the prairie provinces, but their occurrence and the extent of their damage are so dependent on environmental conditions that it varies considerably.

To secure more accurate information on the effect of common root rot on the yield of wheat, samples were taken from selected fields in the different soil zones of Manitoba in 1939-41. The average loss was 7·5 per cent in 1939, 16·6 per cent in 1940 and 12·1 per cent in 1941; the greatest loss occurred in the southwestern part of the province.

In a similar study conducted in Saskatchewan in 1941-43, a disease rating was calculated for each field. The mean disease rating was 9·9 per cent in 1941, 6·0 per cent in 1942 and 9·4 per cent in 1943. Although the figures for Saskatchewan are not directly comparable with those for Manitoba, they indicate a seasonal fluctuation in the amount of disease, which is believed due to variations in soil, temperature and moisture.

Mr. CHARLTON: That deals mainly with wheat in the western provinces.

Mr. GARDINER: It was dealing with everything affected by root rot. If my hon. friend has some information I should like him to give it to the committee.

Mr. CHARLTON: I have heard a variety of reports and I do not know which is correct.

Mr. GARDINER: I have given all the information we have, but if my hon. friend has any other information we shall be glad to get it.

Mr. CHARLTON: Could the minister not get the information?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not sure that the information exists. If my hon. friend will put his information on the record I shall have it looked into and see whether it is correct.

Mr. CHARLTON: It is not my position to do that.

Mr. GARDINER: My position is not to give information which does not exist. The information which is in this book is all the information we have, and I cannot give any more.

Mr. CHARLTON: I am sorry to have to refute that statement. There is other information available and I have seen it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I direct a question to the minister following what the hon. member for Mackenzie has said? My understanding is that it has not yet been found profitable to grow soya beans and other oil-producing plants in the province of British Columbia due to our high cost of land and high taxes. Am I not correct in that? I do not think it has been found profitable to produce soya beans at any experimental farm in British Columbia. Is that not a fact? I think that is a fair question.

Mr. GARDINER: The answer I gave a few moments ago covered soils in other parts of the country. We have not yet been able to develop a soya bean which can be produced successfully in any part of Canada except the southwestern part of Ontario. I am not saying that we may not be able to develop a soya bean which can be produced profitably in other sections. In the early days we had some difficulties in connection with Red Fife wheat, which would freeze in the fall. We must find a variety of soya bean which will mature in a shorter season than any we have now. I do not know that would be true of British Columbia, but there are some conditions there which make it impossible to grow soya beans of a quality successful for oil production.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What little knowledge I have of farming is derived from the publications of the minister's department. Is it true that the growing of rapeseed and sunflower seed has been an exceedingly lucrative source of income to farmers on the prairies?

Mr. GARDINER: During some of the war years the growing of sunflowers, while I would not say it was very lucrative, paid its way very well, but most of those who went into the growing of sunflowers in Saskatchewan have gone out of it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I believe many people have left Saskatchewan.

Mr. GARDINER: They have two reasons for that. Rapeseed has done very well in Saskatchewan and is still doing very well, but of course the government has been and still is paying a guaranteed price on rapeseed. I am not sure we have established as a fact that rapeseed can be grown in Canada in competition with, say, the Argentine or some other country. But we are doing all right with it.

Mr. JUTRAS: Is the minister in a position to report on the progress that has been made in the last two years in establishing an illustration station in the immediate vicinity of the Red river valley south of Winnipeg? There is an experimental station not far off at Morden, but the soil in the immediate vicinity of the Red river is of quite a different type from that at Morden, and I think an illustration station on the eastern side would go a long way toward transplanting there the benefits that have been obtained at the Morden experimental station. Is the minister in a position to make a statement on that?

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, before leaving the little discussion which we had a few moments ago, and for the benefit of newspaper editors who are writing editorials across Canada rather regularly, I should just like to say that at no time have I ever said, and at no time have I ever been reported as having said, as far as I have seen the press, that oleomargarine is not a good food. As a matter of fact, so far as I know it is just as good a food, from the point of view of food value, as butter. I want to say that because I have read editorials almost daily in which I am quoted as having said something contrary to that. What I always have said is that we do not allow either oleomargarine or butter into this country. Butter comes into this country only under permit, and is presumed to be excluded from every other country, excepting Australia and New Zealand, under a tariff which makes it impossible for it to get in. It has been fourteen cents a pound up to the first of January, and it is twelve cents a pound now. We allow butter to come in under permit only from New Zealand and Australia. I may say that condition was established when my hon. friends on the other side were the government. Since 1931 we have let butter come into this country only under permit. Therefore both butter and oleomargarine are excluded from Canada excepting under very extreme conditions, when butter is allowed in from Australia and New Zealand.

Mr. CARDIFF: That must have been good legislation.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, it was good enough legislation to have been kept on by all governments for some considerable time.

Mr. CARDIFF: Congratulations.

Mr. GARDINER: But that does not say that New Zealand butter is not just as good as Canadian butter, or that Australian butter is not just as good as Canadian butter, and it does not say that oleomargarine is not just as good as any of them. What I am saying is that we do not allow either butter or oleomargarine into this country to compete with our butter. These are facts which one does not need to explain any further.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: On a point of order, because I am so often called to order myself, may I ask the minister what his remarks have to do with the item under discussion?

Mr. GARDINER: It has exactly just as much to do with it as my hon. friend's question of a few moments ago.

The answer to the question asked a few moments ago in regard to the experimental station in the vicinity of Morden is to this effect, that we have been making soil surveys in order to locate the type of soil which is thought to be necessary to carry out the experiments that we desire to make. It is thought that we have located a suitable place for an experimental station, and when it is established it will be for the purpose of experiments in connection with cereals and forage crops.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to ask a question in that connection. In the riding I happen to have the privilege of representing we produce 85 per cent of the small fruits produced in British Columbia, and British Columbia produces approximately 50 per cent of the small fruits produced in Canada. I refer to raspberries and strawberries. We have had an application in for some time for a small experimental station in the central part of the Fraser valley, which would concern itself particularly with diseases affecting raspberries and strawberries. What steps are contemplated or will be taken in that connection? We have an experimental farm in the riding, but it is primarily interested in dairying and stock production. It has very little connection with small fruits. The soil is not similar to that where most of the small fruits are produced. We have asked for an experimental or illustration station in the central part of the valley—we are not particular where—where 50 per cent of the small fruits of Canada are produced. What steps are being taken in that connection?

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that at Mission there is a station operating in connection with berries. Then, there is, of course, the Agassiz farm. The work at Mission is being carried on under the direction of the officials from the Agassiz farm; but if I interpret the hon. member's question correctly he has an idea that there should be another station established somewhere in the vicinity of the area where the airport is.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Somewhere near where the berries are produced.

Mr. GARDINER: Some consideration has been given to that. I am not in a position to make any definite statement as to what will be done there, but consideration is being given to the matter.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I want to make it clear that I am not in a critical mood on this matter, but the experimental station or the illustration station, I believe they call it, is at Hatzic. It is on a private individual's farm, where apparently, through the Department of Agriculture, we make certain arrangements for the production of small fruits. This is a very large industry. For instance, last year one co-operative alone shipped $1,500,000 worth of small fruits to Britain. It is no small industry which can ship $1,500,000 worth of raspberries and strawberries to Britain alone.

What we are asking for is an illustration station, or if you prefer to call it an experimental farm or station, somewhere in the central part of the valley. We particularly want it in the area where the berries are grown, because if you are to control the diseases, and find out the different varieties of berries that we can produce, the station should obviously be where the soil is capable of producing the maximum crops. We are not asking for a large experimental farm; we are asking for an experimental station. The potato growers of British Columbia asked for the same thing. We in the upper part of the valley are quite agreeable that that station should be placed in the riding of the hon. member for New Westminster, because that is where most of the potatoes of the province of British Columbia are grown. At least, they are grown in the lower part of the province.

We are having a great deal of difficulty with disease, particularly among our raspberries. We realize now that because the British markets are cut off we must either cut our cost of production or increase our production under nominal costs or find other markets for other varieties. One way that could be brought about is by establishing what we call an illustration station somewhere in the vicinity of where the maximum production takes place. I would strongly urge upon the minister that consideration be given to establishing one. It would entail very small cost because, as I said before, one co-operative alone shipped $1,500,000 worth of small fruits to Great Britain. That is no small amount, and it is only part of our production.

Mr. GARDINER: I might answer this question before we go on to something else. I was in Vancouver the day before yesterday, and the berry growers, to whom reference has been made, interviewed me there with regard to this matter and other matters having to do with the marketing of their berry crops. All I can say to the hon. member is that we realize that there is a necessity for carrying on experimental work there on a larger scale than we are now carrying it on. Consideration will be given to the representations which he has made.

Mr. SHAW: It is my understanding that two experimental stations were to be established in Alberta to operate in conjunction with the Lacombe experimental farm. I also understand that these stations were to give special consideration to the study of the wooded grey soils found in the foothill territories of Alberta. Have these two stations been established? If so, where?

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that there are stations established between Lacombe and the mountain area. I am not able to give the exact location of them. At these two stations they are proceeding to make a study of the soils.

Mr. McLURE: Under this item I should like to ask the minister whether the experimental fur farm at Summerside comes under this vote, or under some other? If it does, I should like to have some information with regard to the progress of that farm and the amount of stock there.

Mr. GARDINER: It does come under this vote, yes.

Mr. McLURE: May I have some information with regard to the cost of this farm? What is it doing? There is no report on it.

Mr. GARDINER: The work is educational, carried on in connection with nutrition and genetics in different types of foxes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: In view of the observations of the hon. member for Fraser Valley about being in order, I think I shall be in order in asking the minister whether any thought has been given to establishing an experimental farm or illustration station to study the development of oil crops in this country, having regard to the great public interest in certain phases of that matter. Having got into order, I wish to thank him for the clear statement he made on the butter and margarine situation, in which he said that margarine was by no means an inferior food, and he gave reasons why he was opposed to the introduction of foreign butter or margarine. I see he is much in favour of the manufacture of butter within the country, so that I am sure the committee would be interested to know what his attitude is to the manufacture of margarine in Canada.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think this is the item under which that should be considered. The desire is to have this item stand, and go on.

Mr. BARRETT: It has been suggested to me that it would be of benefit to some of the tobacco growers if a short course were given in the grading of tobacco. It is an intricate process. There are thirty odd grades and subgrades of tobacco, and, when buyers go into the field to buy, some of the farmers and growers are more or less at a disadvantage because they are not thoroughly familiar with the different grades. As I say, it has been suggested that a short course of a week or two would be beneficial. Has the department had any suggestions of that kind, or would it be possible for the substation at Delhi to carry out that work?

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that there is an arrangement between the companies concerned and the government whereby the department gives assistance to schools which are conducted by the companies, and assistance is also given by the companies. At any rate they have representation in similar schools in connection with production, these being conducted by governmental authorities. In other words, there is a co-operative arrangement to assist graders of tobacco, but I presume what the hon. member advocates is a government school apart from those.

Mr. BARRETT: I was not suggesting that instruction be given to the graders, but that the growers themselves should be instructed so that they may be familiar with their own grades of tobacco when the company graders come.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that the province puts on short courses which the producers attend, but we have no part in those. I suppose that would be extension work from Guelph college.

Mr. BARRETT: I did not know there was any.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Arising out of the answer given to the hon. member for Fraser Valley, I should like to know whether the illustration station spoken of as likely to be established in the Fraser valley will be expected to deal with the whole province of British Columbia. Will it take care of the needs of the Okanagan valley and the Creston valley area, for instance?

Mr. GARDINER: We have twenty illustration stations in British Columbia, and in the Okanagan we have the Summerland farm, which is perhaps the most advanced experimental farm we have in Canada dealing with fruits. The station I speak of would be only one out of twenty-one if it were established as another station. We have twenty others spread over the province.

Mr. HLYNKA: Does the department make grants to illustration stations owned by private farmers? There are several in my constituency and it has become difficult for these individual farmers to keep up these orchards or illustration stations. If they were given some assistance I think these stations would serve a useful and beneficial purpose in the communities concerned.

Mr. GARDINER: We have a great many stations of the type referred to where we go on to the farms of fairly successful farmers or men who do not raise objection to people going on their land, being themselves prepared to explain the experiments to those interested. We rent from fifteen acres of land up from these men, and for a small rental they agree to take instruction from our officials as to how to proceed with the plots and with the work done there. They also agree to allow the public to go on the land and see the experimental work which is being done, and in return for that they have the right to sell the crop when it matures and dispose of it for their own good. That is carried on across Canada and there are many of these farms in western Canada.

Mr. HLYNKA: No direct grants are given?

Mr. GARDINER: A rental is given; that is all.

Mr. McIVOR: I think I should say a word with reference to our experimental farm station about twelve miles southwest of Fort William. If all the work the government does, and the money it spends, bring as good results as those obtained on that station, there is no doubt about the future of the government's policy. The experiments in grains and grasses, fruits and vegetables of different types, fertilizer, and all the diseases that attack fruits and vegetables, are excellent. As the minister has said, people are allowed to go on the farm, and there is a big field day. The experiment superintendent is a man who knows his work, and with it he is most courteous and kind.

Item agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 15 stands.

Production service—

16. Production service administration, $46,089.

Mr. LENNARD: I wish to refer to a matter which perhaps does not come directly under this vote, though it might as well. I refer to the bulletins put out by the department. They are fine bulletins and I know they are in great demand, but in the past several months I have found that many of them are out of print, owing, I presume, to that demand. Is any provision made for augmenting the supply or increasing the production for the coming months? I feel that it is a service which should be extended.

Mr. GARDINER: They are being replenished just as quickly as that can be done. We agree there is some lack of them at the moment, but we are attempting to bring them up to date.

Item agreed to.

Production service—Health of animals—

17. Administration of Animal Contagious Diseases Act, and Meat and Canned Foods Act, $2,611,508.

Mr. CARDIFF: There is an increase of $238,909 in this item, and I see it is mainly accounted for by salaries. I think the county of Huron is fourth in line for a tested area. If this increase does not mean we are to get any more service than we have had in the past, our people will be disappointed. I do not object to these men getting better salaries, but certainly we need better service. Could the minister tell us whether this increase will mean better service, or if it is just an increase in salaries?

Mr. GARDINER: As has been indicated, this increase is largely accounted for by salaries, which will not mean additional staff; but a considerable portion will go to increased staff, and to the extent that this is so, the service will be increased. This year we are taking third year students at the veterinary college at Guelph and sending them out to do much of the work that has to be done under this item. Of course that will involve not only a good deal in the way of payments but also a good deal in the way of expenses.

Mr. CARDIFF: Will that by any chance speed up the service that we were to get in connection with tested areas?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, that is exactly why it is being done. The idea is to speed up the inspection work being done in connection with T.B. and other work of that kind.

Mr. CARDIFF: If that is the case could the minister give us any idea when our area will be tested? I think we are fourth in line.

Mr. GARDINER: We are hoping to get at it this year.

Mr. MENARY: A farmer in my district has a purebred Hereford herd, and he has lost three of his cattle. Sometimes they break out in a sweat; they gradually get thinner and thinner until they die. Would the minister have any idea what the disease might be?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think it would be possible even to make a guess. The proper thing, of course, would be to get the nearest veterinary, either one of our men or someone else, to examine these cattle. I should think it important that they are examined.

Mr. MENARY: Last fall they very kindly sent two men from Ottawa, but they could not tell what the disease was. More recently I have been after them to send another man, but they advised me to get in touch with the experimental farm at Guelph. We have had men from there, too.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Could the minister indicate whether any action is being taken with a view to training a larger number of veterinary surgeons? I understand that there is quite a shortage all across Canada, that not enough are graduating to fill the government service. I believe the governments of Nova Scotia and Saskatchewan—and Manitoba, too, I am informed—are making special grants to students, and I believe the federal government should participate in some such program to train veterinary surgeons, so that it may be possible to meet the problems which are being brought to the department.

Mr. GARDINER: Some 130 will graduate next year. I believe there were about thirty-eight last year; there will be about forty this year, and about 130 or 140 next year. That will give some idea of the increased numbers. Probably that is partly due to the fact that quite a number of men who came back from overseas went to the veterinary college at Guelph and are being trained for that work.

During an earlier stage of the discussion—I have forgotten what we were considering at the time—I made the statement that we were 120 short in our own staff, and I want to get that on Hansard correctly now. When I read my remarks on the previous occasion I found that the 120 had become one or two; probably that has something to do with shorthand, but the statement should have been that we were 120 short in our own staff. And of course there is a great shortage throughout the country, so that we are encouraging these men to go into that work. One way of giving encouragement is to employ them as third-year students to go out and do work. This year we are sending out 114 students from Guelph and another group of about fifteen from Quebec. That is being done to give these men assistance during the summer so that they may continue their college courses in the winter, and at the same time gain a great deal of experience in the work they will be required to do later on.

Mr. WINTERS: Last year when this item was before the committee I brought to the attention of the minister the difficulty under which farmers in my constituency are operating because of the lack of veterinarians and the T.B. testing. At that time the minister was good enough to tell me the situation and that he would take my representations into careful consideration. Is he now in a position to say what progress has been made and what we may look forward to in the matter of help in the constituency of Queens-Lunenburg?

Mr. GARDINER: It does not appear that we shall have enough men to get down to that area this year, certainly not in the early part of the season. The position which has developed since the matter was brought up last year is I think, pretty well illustrated by the figures I have given and by our undertaking to students to put them in the field in their third year. That is an encouragement, of course, to some who would find it difficult to get through without that work. It also increases the staffs we have available to carry on the work. The 130 or so who are going out this year will be of great help in strengthening the staffs we have out through the country and making it possible for us to get the work done much more quickly. I am sorry we shall not have sufficient to get down to the hon. member's constituency this year, but we shall be there just as soon as possible.

Mr. WINTERS: Could the minister indicate approximately when he might expect his men to reach that constituency?

Mr. GARDINER: Next year for sure, I am told.

Mr. BLAIR: I am interested in this item because we have had an outbreak of virulent T.B. in my constituency. On this item I have usually spoken of Bang's Disease, or contagious abortion, and that problem still exists. But in the district surrounding my home we have something really worse. One of the finest herds in the district has gone down completely on a T.B. test; and it was an accredited herd. Within the year that herd has been negative. It has always been negative; it has never had any trouble with T.B. This year on a test the whole herd went down, including even this year's calves. Several other herds in the neighbourhood have gone down in the same way. Apparently the infection, whatever it is or wherever it is coming from, is of a most virulent type. Although admittedly men have been up there and have furnished every assistance they could, apparently they are at a loss to find the cause of the infection.

So far as the manager of the herd is concerned, let me say that the man who owns the herd, and his son, are men who are well trained in the raising of purebred stock. As I said, this is one of the finest herds in the country, a herd which has been responsible for the producing of a Canadian champion.

I went out to see this herd, and what I saw was really pitiful. The owner led me around and said "There is the reserve champion of last year's winter fair." He showed me some heifers. They have not been able to find the cause of infection, and they are doing testing there now.

I was present the other morning when the report on another fine purebred herd was read, and ten purebred cows had gone down. I do not think any ruling has yet been made as to the cause of infection. Let us consider the condition of the first purebred herd. This man's young cattle were sent away to pasture last year on the day they were tested. They were negative at that time. They were brought in early in November, and every one of those had gone down in this year's test.

This would seem to me to be an unusual case, and there must be an unusual cause for the infection in that area. I have tried to find the cause of infection, and I am led to believe that it has occurred either through an interchange of feed bags—and that is a common procedure at the present time on these farms—or it has occurred by the feeding of bone meal. There does not seem to be any other reason for it.

This year's calves by this purebred herd went down. It might be that the cause of infection of the calves was due to feeding, but they have been fed pasteurized skim milk. This is a serious question, because not only am I interested in the matter since it affects these purebred herds in my district which are going down, but I am interested as a physician in the cause of a contagious disease. I say that because bovine tuberculosis is so readily transferable to human beings, particularly to children. In children it cripples, incapacitates and destroys. I would say that a fair percentage of tuberculosis in children is due to bovine tuberculosis.

The other day, Friday last, the Prime Minister brought in a resolution telling what the government intended to do by way of grants for the cure of tuberculosis. But if we are not going to start on this thing at the bottom, and if this is not going to be cleared up, there is no use in talking about the eradication of tuberculosis in human beings. We know the pitiful effects on children who catch the disease, and the crippled joints from which they suffer.

In that district we have a very fine agricultural representative. He has been giving every encouragement to young farmers there by way of calf clubs, and all that sort of thing. I have tried to take interest in these matters. But it is hard to tell those young fellows to raise good stock or to go into the raising of purebred stock when they know that they may be wiped out at any time on account of a disease like this.

I am appealing to the minister for additional help by way of men in that area, so that we may have more than the ordinary T.B. test. In the ordinary T.B. test a few animals in a herd may go down here and there, throughout the area. But this is wiping out herds. We are proud of some of our herds there. These men who have other good herds coming up for tests simply feel that they are sitting on a bomb, knowing that the work of a lifetime may be wiped out.

I am still of the opinion that this is no ordinary disease, because it possesses a virulence which has not been exhibited in any T.B. area before, and I say the department should do experimental work to find the cause of that trouble.

As I said earlier, I believe the matter of feeding bone meal to these animals has had a great deal to do with it, either that or the exchange of feed bags. Above all, I would say to the minister that the farmers should be given an educational program as to how the disease could be avoided. I met the veterinary for that area at one of these herds the other morning, and we were absolutely at a loss to know what the cause of the infection could be.

Mr. GARDINER: The case referred to is a special one. As the hon. member has said, our men have been checking up and doing the best they can to determine the cause. As a matter of fact, we have taken such particular care with it that the director, himself, has been out there and has gone over those herds. Not only that, but he has personally checked the work done by those who have been attempting to determine whether it is ordinary bovine tuberculosis. He is satisfied that it is. It may be a particularly virulent type, but they are satisfied that that is what it is.

Then, as for being able to establish definitely where it has originated, let me say they have not been successful in that up to the present time. However, it is being treated as a very special case, and the men are right on the work of trying to determine the cause and how to overcome similar happenings in that area or elsewhere. Beyond that, however, they have not been able to go, up to the present time.

Mr. BLAIR: The department has furnished every aid and facility, so far as that is concerned. But I should like to ask the minister if they have considered the possibility of its having originated in this interchange of feed bags, or if they have made investigation into the bone meal products these farmers are feeding?

Mr. GARDINER: They have fairly well satisfied themselves that the disease has not been brought in either through the bone meal or the sacks. As a matter of fact they are inclined to believe it has been brought in by animals which have been brought in from areas which are not inspected. Up to the present time they have not been able to prove that definitely, but that is their opinion.

Mr. BLAIR: In the first herd which went down, one of the finest in the country, there has been no interchange of cattle, so far as that is concerned. And even this year's calves have gone down. We investigated the other morning the possibility of the disease being conveyed to them by skim milk; but the farmers have been feeding pasteurized milk. They have had no new stock in there. This man breeds his own, and has not been buying any; unless the disease was taken in there by drovers; and it would hardly seem possible that a drover using a truck could bring in a disease of that virulence.

Mr. GARDINER: There is nothing more I can add to what I have said, other than this, that it would not be necessary for the animal to come into the herd that suffered most in the end. It may have come into the district by that method. Then again, these animals have been exhibited over a large area, and it is possible that some of them could have picked up the disease and passed it on to the others.

I may say I had some experience with a herd of cattle, myself, at the end of the first war. I had seventeen in that herd, and sixteen out of the seventeen went down. We just had to get rid of them; that is all. I started with the one that was left, and I have not had one go down since. The one left was a calf. One cannot explain how it happens sometimes. I am quite convinced, so far as my case was concerned, that it happened through a cow I had had on the farm for a long time. She began to get thin, but I did not have her checked immediately. I had no particular reason for doing it at that time. However, by the time I got around to checking them, every animal in the herd, with the exception of the one calf, went down. These things can happen anywhere if one is not careful, and I have no doubt that something like that happened to that herd.

Mr. BLAIR: The four other herds which went down had not been exhibited at the winter fair and there did not seem to be any contact between the herds. That is why I feel so disturbed that a disease of such virulence has come into the area.

Mr. GARDINER: We are doing everything we can about it.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is the T.B. test compulsory anywhere in Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: Areas take a vote by counties or municipalities and when there are two-thirds in favour of it, then it is compulsory. Everyone must have his animals checked. As a matter of fact we check and inspect the animals in the whole district. No one is allowed to bring animals into the district until they are inspected, and persons who have animals in the district are not allowed to have those animals come into contact with others if it can be avoided.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I do not think that is good enough. I have had some experience with bovine tuberculosis and, like the hon. member for Lanark, I think we have to go further and have the testing compulsory right across Canada. I think it is wrong to leave it to a vote whether there will be inspection and testing. We had a case in our district and the first we knew of it was when a little baby took sick. We had a hard job getting the baby to the hospital, but I am not going to tell that story.

The baby died and the medical man who had attended the baby diagnosed the case as bovine tuberculosis. He immediately had a veterinary sent out to the farm and the cow that was milking reacted. When we killed the cow she was absolutely rotten. I would have thought that after that had happened everyone in the district would have been conscious of the danger and been willing to have his herd tested, but even the man who had been supplying the milk to the village refused to have his herd tested.

This matter is so dangerous that we should have a law to compel every farmer to have every animal tested periodically. A man may have his herd tested and found to be free but, like the herd the hon. member for Lanark spoke of, there may be another herd on the adjoining farm or a little way off. The cattle happen to get in contact with each other or a truck comes in that has been hauling other cattle. There is always the danger of losing the whole herd. In addition, as the hon. member for Lanark said, there is a danger to human beings, especially to children who are so susceptible to this disease. The minister should consider bringing in a measure covering the whole of Canada and making testing compulsory.

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to put on the record what has been done. The following are the percentages of cattle that have been tested:

	Per cent
Prince Edward Island	100
Nova Scotia	92
New Brunswick	100
Quebec	80
Ontario	60
Manitoba	50
Saskatchewan	40
British Columbia	23

That does not say that any particular area has had everything done for it that it desires to have done. The testing of entire areas was taken on much more readily in the maritime provinces than anywhere else. It is only since I came into the department that Alberta has permitted us to go into the province and check the cattle. You will notice that only twelve per cent of the cattle in Alberta have been covered. That is due to the fact that we have not had sufficient men since that time to do this work. During the thirties, as everyone knows, veterinaries throughout the country were almost starved out of practice because animals were not worth enough to warrant calling a veterinary when they were sick. Many of these men went out of practice and there has been great difficulty of late in finding enough men to cover the areas.

There is no difficulty in getting the money. This is one item in my estimates in connection with which I can get all the money that can be spent each year, provided that I can get the men to spend it and do the work. We are trying to build up staffs by encouraging men to come in and qualify to do this work. Until a year ago we were probably a little overzealous in insisting that any man who did this work must be specially qualified. We were hesitant about putting anyone on the work who had not passed a special examination. It was not enough that he had been a veterinary thirty years or twenty-five years ago; he had to pass an examination now.

Since about two years ago we have been trying to utilize every available man and we have even had students out doing the work. I do not think we are in position where we could compel people to have their herds tested because we could not test them. There are not enough veterinaries in the country to test them. As is indicated here, there are some sections of the country that have been at this a long time and have had the work done. However, the fact that they have been tested once does not indicate that during all the years they have kept right up to date. The only reason they have not been kept up to date is that we have not enough men.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I am glad to hear the minister say that they are not being so fussy about veterinaries during the past year or two. Would it be possible to organize teams of men who were not veterinaries to work under a veterinary? I have seen cattle tested, and it does not seem to me that it is necessary to have a veterinary do the actual injecting of the virus and make the examination. If a group of men were trained to work with a veterinary I think they could cover the country a lot faster.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I just want to follow up what the hon. member for The Battlefords has said. In the particular district in which I live we have a T.B. free area. You must get a permit to bring in cattle; you must have them tested and all that. As nearly as I can remember, it is twelve years since those municipalities were brought into the T.B. free area and there has not been a re-check since that time. All young stock that have been born have not been checked and there has been no check on whether an animal with a contagious disease is among the herds.

I could cite many cases, such as the one cited by the hon. member for The Battlefords, that occurred when we had the first test. Many families with little children were very much alarmed and in some cases entire herds went down. It seems to me that something must be done. Twelve years is too long a period to let pass without a check. I realize all the difficulties the minister has pointed out. I remember advocating that he organize students in teams under qualified veterinaries. If that will not accomplish the work, then you might have to go further and follow the suggestion of the hon. member for The Battlefords.

This is a serious business because it affects human life. I hope the department will give serious consideration to the development of teams to work under properly qualified veterinaries, not only to take care of new areas but to check the old areas. I know of areas that have applied to become free areas, but they have not been able to be declared free areas because of a shortage of help. Certainly these areas which have not been inspected for ten or twelve years should be re-checked, because you cannot tell what may have developed in that time. I want to impress the importance of this on the minister.

Mr. BRYCE: I was delighted to hear the minister say that they are going to employ extra veterinary surgeons for this work. I was also pleased to hear him say that he has no trouble in getting the money to do the job. I am very much interested in the question of re-testing raised by the hon. member for Souris. I happen to live in a T.B. free area. It is not so long ago as twelve years that we had our re-test, because they are always picking out the odd animal that will go down. I have been very much interested in this matter for a number of years, and I quite appreciate the alarm felt by the hon. member for Lanark and the hon. member for The Battlefords, because since I came to this House of Commons I have seen T.B. tested cows go into an area where there were people suffering from T.B. and six months later when the cattle were tested they also were found to have T.B. That is a serious matter. I am delighted that the department is carrying on this work.

There is another point I would bring to the minister's attention. When he became Minister of Agriculture more areas were coming in than are coming in now. The movement started in the eastern provinces and everybody was more agreeable then to coming in because cattle then were worth $40 to $45 apiece. The same grade of cow brings $200 today. When you go into a municipality and want to sign up the farmers to have this testing done, naturally they say: Well, cattle are a good price today. If the man has a family of small children he may look at the matter differently, but if he looks at it only from the point of view of dollars and cents he says: Thirty-eight dollars does not look very much to me for a cow that will go into the tank; I will leave it until later on. Naturally, under those circumstances, you do not get two-thirds of your people to agree to have the test. I spoke about this matter in the house once before and one hon. member pointed out that you got $96. It is true that you got $96 if your animal was registered and you had papers and all that sort of thing, but I have always been in the class, when milking cows for the city of Winnipeg, of being glad to get a good grade cow.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): A registered cow is worth several hundred dollars now.

Mr. BRYCE: I never had money enough to buy anything like that. I want to appeal to the minister to check up with his officials, because I think $38 compensation is far too little to pay, with the price of cattle what it is today. I assure the minister that I am hopeful that, as long as he is Minister of Agriculture, he will never let prices go back to $40 and $50 for a cow as long as we have the United States market willing to pay a good price for our cows. I think $38 is ridiculous. If you doubled that figure and then went out and asked farmers to sign up I am sure they would agree to have the test made in much greater numbers than they are doing now. In the interests of health alone it should be made compulsory. I am naturally afraid, in this house, of talking about compulsion, because I know what would be said of me if I did. Nevertheless, in the interests of the health of this nation, I do say that this testing should be made compulsory.

Mr. GARDINER: I just want to say in reply that our experience is in the opposite direction. We have seventy districts in Saskatchewan which have already applied and to which we have not been able to send anybody, and we also have a considerable number waiting in Ontario. If we were anywhere near up to date we would probably have double the present number applying right away.

Mr. BRYCE: I am delighted to hear that.

Mr. GARDINER: There is no difficulty in getting applications. They are coming in so fast that we are not able to handle them.

The other question is one which has been discussed in the house several times; that is, about compensation going up and down with the price of cattle. There are arguments in favour of that and against it. When cattle were down, for example, to $50 apiece, and sometimes as low as $20 apiece, the argument then was that we should pay more because of the low price of cattle. I think the argument for that was just as strong as the argument that we should pay more when the animal is worth more. There is an argument both ways, but we found it was wise up to the present to maintain the same level whether prices are high or low.

Mr. BRYCE: You do not get anything if your animal goes into the tank. If your animal is only partly diseased, around the neck, say, or the liver, you get what value is in the meat, but you do not get anything if it goes into the tank.

Mr. GARDINER: You get whatever value there is in the hide and grease. It may not be much, but you get it.

Mr. BRYCE: That is nothing.

Mr. GARDINER: At present it may amount to quite a bit.

Mr. CHARLTON: On previous occasions I have warned the minister and the department of the seriousness of T.B. and also Bang's disease in cattle, and I want to take this opportunity to reiterate in part what I have said before. I think it all hinges around one thing. I was glad to hear the minister say that he has never been refused any money by the government for this purpose. I think that is all the more reason for stating that the root of the trouble is the low salaries paid to the veterinary surgeons doing this work. I have said that before, and I shall continue to say it until their salaries are in line with those paid to other professions in the department and in the government service. Their salaries are nowhere near in line at present.

I have here a resolution passed at the annual meeting of the Ontario veterinary association, held at Niagara Falls, Ontario, on January 22-23, 1948. It reads:

> Copy of resolution unanimously passed at the annual meeting of the Ontario veterinary association held at Niagara Falls, Ontario, on January 22, and 23, 1948.
> The Ontario veterinary association now in annual conference at the hotel General Brock, Niagara Falls, Ontario, unanimously endorse the following resolution and respectfully request your sympathetic consideration and action.
> Resolved that the salary schedule of veterinarians employed in the federal Department of Agriculture is inadequate for the responsibilities involved and the qualifications required,
> The depleted federal service can be restored only by the institution of appropriate and fair salary schedules and will have its reflection on the health status of the Canadian livestock industry as it relates not only to our domestic but export trade.
> May we ask your favourable consideration to an upward revision of salaries comparable to that offered members of other professions.
> Ontario Veterinary Association,
> E. F. Johnston,
> President.

Mr. GARDINER: What was the date of that?

Mr. CHARLTON: It was a resolution passed at their convention on January 22 and 23 of this year. I want to be quite fair with the department. Some considerable changes have been made and I congratulate the minister upon them. Apparently these changes have not been sufficient to bring recent graduates, or graduates of previous years, into the service of the department. I want to say a few things to prove that statement. As the minister said earlier this evening, the usual personnel of the health of animals branch is 410. The present staff numbers approximately 290. I may be out one or two; but, as the minister said previously, they are 120 short of the required number to bring it up to the average. In addition to that, sixty members of the present staff are over sixty years of age.

It has already been said that a large number of areas have asked for this test to be taken. I have some figures here which are probably about a month and a half old. They may not be quite accurate, but they are approximately correct. I should like to put them on the record. Areas which have been accredited but are now past due on their tests total ninety-six. Areas that are in the process of being tested across Canada—that is, about a month ago—number twenty-seven. Areas accepted for this test but not tested at all number fourteen. Areas due for a test during 1948 number thirty. That makes a total of 126 areas across Canada waiting for the T.B. test. Unless something is done to encourage graduate veterinarians, or graduates of previous years, to come into the service, we shall never get very far ahead with this testing work.

I want to take exception to a statement made by the minister on April 17. I do not know whether it was a mistake of the press or not; I should not like to say, but the minister can correct me if I am wrong. In a statement made by the minister to the Kiwanis club in Ottawa on April 17 of this year, the following appears. I shall quote just part of it:

> Mr. Gardiner stressed the need for more "properly qualified veterinarians" in Canada. In Canada there were 904 properly qualified vets and 294 of them worked for the government. Fifty-five of the government employees were more than sixty years of age. At the present time there were 120 vacancies in the Department of Agriculture for vets.

That does not agree with the figures I have of the number of registered veterinarians across Canada. I have the figures for the various provinces, but it is not necessary to give them. The total across Canada as I have them—I may be out a few—is 1,053. I think there are somewhere between that number and 1,100 in Canada.

I want to congratulate the department and the veterinary college of Guelph for getting together and co-operating on taking the third-year students. Part of the third-year course at the veterinary college is to take on this work for two months in the summer. Therefore the third year will be the fourth year now, since the veterinary course will be a five-year course from now on. I may say that the number graduating this year from the veterinary college at Guelph is forty-three. The 1949 class, that is, the boys who will be taken on by the department this year for the two-month period, one month in field work on the disease of plants and plant inspection, is 118. The number in the class which will graduate in 1950 is 140, and the number in the class of 1951 is 153. It will be seen by these figures that there will be an increasing number in those years. I should like the minister to answer at a later time, if he can, just how many of this year's students, the forty-three graduating this year, he expects to take on the department this year. I doubt whether there will be very many.

Several orders in council have been passed respecting the salaries of veterinary surgeons. As I said before, some increases have been given. Some of these orders in council have been tabled in the last few days, but until that time they had not been tabled. I wonder why this government passes orders in council and makes them available to everybody but members of parliament. I make that statement and it is true, because I had a difficult time to get the three last orders in council. I knew they had been passed. I had a terrific time in getting hold of them. They had never been tabled, but everybody but members of parliament seemed to be able to get hold of them. I ask the minister why that is, because surely we have the same privileges as an individual in having access to orders in council passed by the government.

An order in council was passed on March 24, P.C. 1/1222, which increased the starting salary of veterinarians from $2,100 to $2,400; but the $2,100 starting salary is still retained in the order in council. If in future years they wish to drop back to $2,100, because there are probably a few more vets in the country, they can drop back to that amount. As I said, the starting salary was raised on March 24 to $2,400, and on a later date it was raised to $2,700. So far as I know, that is the starting salary for veterinarians coming into the service under the grade one classification.

Other orders in council have been passed to increase and reclassify veterinarians, now in the service, for which I wish to congratulate the minister, or whoever was responsible for it. That was done more or less to hold the men who are in the service at the present time. It was very necessary to hold these men, because in the past few years we have had 120 resignations, and if something were not done, there probably would have been more resignations from the branch. But, as I said before, nothing very satisfactory has yet been done. I understand that something is now being considered. Since I have heard nothing definite, I shall be glad if the minister can make it definite tonight that the starting salary has been increased and that the reclassifications can be made to a greater maximum without examination, just simply a year by year reclassification up to a maximum for the grade four veterinarians, or senior veterinarians.

As was so well said by the hon. member for Lanark, this is not a problem of the health of livestock only; it is a national health problem, and should be treated as such. If what we have to do is to pay more to veterinarians to join the service, then it should be done, because we have been going along for three or four years with a reduced staff. It is of sufficient importance not to be so miserly in the future. It is essential that we do something to rid this country of T.B. I repeat that this is not simply a livestock health problem; it is a national health problem. When you find young children coming down with T.B., and the incidence so great as was stated by the hon. member for Lanark, it should make people jealous of the fact that they want to have their herds tested even from that point of view alone.

I would suggest strongly that the department be given sufficient money to carry on a vigorous advertising campaign to warn farmers of the many dangers confronting them in this fight against T.B. It might be logical for a person, after having an accredited herd for sixteen or eighteen years, possibly to become a little careless. That is understandable. He thinks, having been free so long, that condition will continue without as much care on his part as he has taken in the past. These veterinary surgeons should warn these men of the various dangers, and the department should carry on an instructional campaign, telling the farmers of the various things they must guard against.

As the minister has said, the department does not feel that the exchange of feed bags was so very important a factor in the recent outbreak in Lanark county, nor was the bone meal. They think it was introduced by animals from non-tested areas. That is another point that suggests the importance of getting over all areas in the country and not simply choosing isolated counties here and there. A test is of questionable value, when there is a county that is tested regularly while the county next to it is not. A man across the fence might have cattle on his farm; there might be a stream running from his field into the adjoining pasture, and if his cattle were polluted with tuberculosis, his herd not having been tested, his neighbour's cattle would become infected.

It is important to have the larger areas covered, and more consideration should be given to areas adjoining tuberculosis-tested areas. Consideration should be given them above isolated areas, no matter when the application came in, because it is of much greater importance to have adjoining areas tested than it is to have an isolated area tested.

As the hon. member for Lanark pointed out, the savings of a lifetime might be wiped out overnight by this dread scourge of tuberculosis. The two diseases that call most urgently for attention are tuberculosis and Bang's disease. On various occasions I have mentioned Bang's and it is equally important with tuberculosis. The area-testing for tuberculosis is, however, of great importance, and Bang's will go along with that.

I wish to congratulate those who have taken part in creating the greater co-operation between the veterinary surgeons and the medical profession, because neither the medical men nor the veterinarians independently could possibly handle the situation. There must be complete co-operation. They must travel hand in hand across the country in the fight to get rid of tuberculosis and Bang's disease. I have made various statements before on this question, and I should like to have the minister inform the committee of the number of veterinarians graduating this year. How many is it expected to obtain from the college?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not in a position to say how many we shall get from the college, probably not more than four or five as far as we know at the moment.

I think I should say something with regard to the salary levels. I would agree with the hon. member for Brant that until recently the salaries have been much too low. The ranges ran from $1,640. As a matter of fact, veterinarians came on at $1,640 and worked up to the level of $1,800-$2,160, and there was some difficulty in getting beyond that level. The situation is changed today, so that the veterinarian, if he is right out of college, comes on at $2,700. He does not come on at the bottom of that grade, which is $2,400 to $2,700, but at the top of the classification, which is $2,700, and he has to put in only one year to get into the $3,000 class. If he has had one year's experience as a veterinarian outside the department he goes into the $3,000 class, and he gets a yearly advancement until he reaches $3,300, without further examination. From $3,300, however, the increases are promotional and he can go up to $4,800. So that there has been a considerable increase in the payments now made to veterinarians.

Mr. HACKETT: Can he go to $4,800 without examination?

Mr. GARDINER: He has to have the usual promotional examination from one classification to another after he gets up to $3,300. It is neither an oral nor a written examination but a rating.

Mr. HACKETT: That is departmental?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. It is based on the work he has done. It is a departmental rating confirmed by the commission. That is the position in the matter of salaries. I might say, in answer to the question my hon. friend has asked, that the 904 is the figure given at the Chateau Laurier. That is the official figure of registered veterinarians. In addition to that, there are veterinarians who are qualified, working for the department, and that would bring the figure to between 1,100 and 1,200.

Mr. CHARLTON: I understood the minister to say the figure he gave included 294 working for the department.

Mr. GARDINER: The 904 is exclusive rather than inclusive.

Mr. CHARLTON: The minister said that the veterinarians could go to $4,800 without examination. That is perfectly true. They can probably do so if they get a reclassification in their grades and are good enough to be chief veterinary inspector, meat inspection, or chief veterinary inspector, animal contagious diseases. There are only two jobs and only two men on those jobs with $4,800. How many men have a chance to get those jobs?

Mr. GARDINER: The district inspector, grade 2, can go on to $4,800 as well. There are five of these.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the business on Monday?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): On Monday we should like to complete consideration of Bill 300 to amend the Canada Shipping Act. There are only a few sections left and it will not take long, and then we shall continue with the budget debate.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $234,297.
2. Publicity and extension division, $195,013.
3. Advisory committee on agricultural services, $3,000.
4. Contributions to empire bureaux, $86,139.
5. Science service administration, $168,374.
6. Animal and poultry pathology, $261,264.
7 Bacteriology and dairy research, $87,662.
8. Botany and plant pathology, $845,983.
9. Agricultural chemistry, $312,525.
10. Agricultural entomology, including a payment of $3,500 to the commonwealth biological control laboratory, Belleville, Ontario, for special services, $1,031,667.
11. Forest entomology, $887,693.
12. Plant protection, $556,674.
13. Experimental farms service administration, $100,475.
14. Central experimental farm, $1,354,441.
16. Production service administration, $46,089.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 24, 1948

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

MONEY AND CREDIT IN CIRCULATION

Mr. CAOUETTE:

1. Why are Bank of Canada notes, old or new, all dated January 2, 1937?
2. What is the amount of money and credit in circulation in Canada at present? What is the proportion of currency to bank credit?
3. On what gold value is the Canadian monetary unit secured at present (a) in Canada; (b) outside of Canada?

Mr. BELZILE:

1. The date of January 2, 1937, on the current issue of Bank of Canada notes is the date on which these notes, the form and material of which was approved by the minister in accordance with the provisions of section 24(4) of the Bank of Canada Act, were first put into circulation. This issue succeeded notes of another design issued and dated in 1935, and which were withdrawn from circulation.

2. (a) As at March 31, 1948, Canadian currency in circulation (excluding currency held as till money by the banks) amounted to $1,098 million and active money supply, including currency, to $3,933 million.

"Active money supply" is the aggregate of the following, excluding deposits of the Canadian government, inactive notice deposits, deposits of chartered banks with Bank of Canada and cheques deposited by payees not yet cleared against the accounts of the drawers:

(1) Canadian deposits of the chartered banks plus

(2) Canadian deposits with Bank of Canada plus

(3) Canadian currency in circulation apart from that held by the banks as till money.

(b) The ratio of currency in circulation to the total of (1) and (2) above was 38·7 per cent.

3. (a) and (b) It is not clear what is meant by these questions. However, pursuant to an order in council passed under the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, 1945, the governor in council fixed the par value of the Canadian dollar for the purposes of the agreements at one United States dollar of the weight and fineness in effect on July 1, 1944. As of that date, the United States dollar had a par value of 15 5/21 grains of gold, 9/10 fine.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—EMPLOYEES

Mr. ASHBY:

How many individuals were employed in the federal Department of Agriculture (all branches), on January 1, 1910, 1920, 1930, 1940, 1948?

Mr. GARDINER:

	Employees
	Classified	Prevailing rates
Jan. 1, 1912....	718	No record available
Jan. 1, 1920....	1,125	No record available
Jan. 1, 1930....	2,079	No record available
Jan. 1, 1940....	3,458	582
Jan. 1, 1948....	3,984	1,337

Note: Figures for 1910 are not available; first record available is for the year 1912.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

EXIT PERMITS—BABIES

Mr. CAMPBELL:

1. Have any babies been exported from Canada during the past five years to foreign countries for adoption there?
2. If so, how many (by provinces), (a) male; (b) female, and on whose recommendations and to what countries?
3. Were exit permits issued and by what department?
4. What supervision is there over babies that have been exported?

DANGEROUS DISEASES

Mr. McKAY:

1. What were the number of deaths in Canada during 1947 from (a) diseases of the heart; (b) cancer and malignant tumours; (c) nephritis; (d) diseases peculiar to the first year of life; (e) pneumonia; (f) tuberculosis?
2. Has the government taken any steps to reduce the number of deaths from heart disease?

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—KINGSTON OFFICES

Mr. KIDD:

1. Has the wartime prices and trade board offices in Kingston?
2. If so, how many persons are now employed there?
3. Where are these offices located?

4. Has the lease expired or when does it expire?
5. What rent do they pay?
6. How long have they occupied these premises?
7. Are any arrangements being made for them to occupy new premises? If so, where and what rent do they intend to pay?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

EXIT PERMITS—BABIES

Mr. CAMPBELL:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between any individual or group or provincial government and any minister, department or official of the federal government, during the past two years, having to do with the export of babies to foreign countries.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this motion should be passed subject to the usual reservation, that the consent of provinces must be received before filing correspondence.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried, subject to the reservation made by the minister.

FARM PRICES

POWERS OF AGRICULTURAL PRICES SUPPORT BOARD EXTENDED BEYOND MARCH 31, 1948

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide that section nine of the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, dealing with the powers of the agricultural prices support board, shall be deemed to have continued in force after March 31, 1948, and that it may be continued in force for such further period as the governor in council may fix by proclamation.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEDNESDAY EVENING SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Wednesday, the 26th of May, 1948, and all subsequent Wednesdays to the end of the present session, the sittings shall in every respect be under the same rules as provided for other days.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should think that at this stage the house would be ready to accept the Prime Minister's motion to increase the time at our disposal for the discussion of the business of the house. Can he indicate to the house what legislation the government intends to bring before the house between now and the end of the session? This information would I am sure be helpful to hon. members in that it would enable them to arrange their plans to meet the government's program.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be glad to bring before the house a statement of legislation which is outstanding. I shall not be here tomorrow, but I should hope that on Wednesday I might be able to give the house a full statement of what remains to be brought forward. There is not a great deal.

Motion agreed to.

VICTORIA DAY

ANNIVERSARY OF BIRTHDAY OF QUEEN VICTORIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, as this is an important day in the annals of the British empire, the anniversary of the birthday of a great and beloved sovereign of yesterday, I believe that as a House of Commons we would do well to follow the precedent suggested by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in former years. I suggest that we pay our tribute and homage to her memory, and our tribute and homage to her great grandson, the reigning monarch of today, by standing and singing God Save the King.

The members rose and sang

God Save the King

THE LATE HON. J. L. RALSTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to say a few words as president of the Canadian Bar Association about a man who was not only a pillar of the Bar Association, but one of its rarest ornaments.

Canadian lawyers are proud to claim the late Colonel Ralston as one of their very own. They mourn his death and will long cherish the example he has set to his profession in the various avenues of their high calling.

Perhaps I may be permitted to say here in part what I have said elsewhere about Colonel Ralston and his sudden and much lamented death.

Colonel James Layton Ralston died at the end of the day,—a day like all his days, filled with labour. He led a life of labour.

Well equipped physically and mentally, he turned to account every ounce of energy that his stout frame and powerful intellect were capable of generating. Few men in our time have successfully engaged in broader fields of endeavour; none has been more unsparing of self.

Ralston was in turn lawyer, soldier and politician. In each of these callings he excelled; in each he left enduring marks and abiding friendships; in all, his way was lit by the lamps of a purpose that never wavered, of a courage that never weakened, and of ideals that never dimmed. Ralston was primarily and always a lawyer. In early manhood as his first choice he went to the law; to the law he returned from both soldiering and politics. He was admitted to the Nova Scotia bar at the early age of twenty-one, and to the Quebec bar half-way through his career.

His capacious mind and its easy intake, his faithful and well-stored memory, his intellectual curiosity, his gift of orderly and lucid exposition, his endless industry, made of him one of the great Canadian advocates of his generation. He understood the meaning of professional duty in its public no less than in its private aspects. He was alive to the traditions of the Bar. He knew that it has functions of supreme importance to the life of a free country, that its members are called upon to develop and exercise qualities of leadership and guidance which are not exacted from the members of any other profession. He knew that in a democracy where all are subject to the law, and where so much depends upon the interplay of political parties for the enactment of good laws and their fair administration, the lawyer is better qualified than many to make a contribution to public life, and his he made generous, wholesome and vigorous.

He suffered the fortune and the fate of those engaged in the endless adventure of governing men—no more, no less. Ralston understood. He did not complain. He considered it a privilege to have given of his best in field and forum to the public service of his country. When this came to an end he returned to his briefs, not sad and dejected, but lighthearted and joyous. He had done his duty; he had retained his ideals; he had kept his friends.

To live in hearts we leave behind
Is not to die.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have naturally, knowing there would be those who, like myself, would wish to make reference to the late Colonel Ralston, given careful thought to what should be said or done in the house this afternoon regarding the passing of one of the greatest public servants Canada has had.

Part of my duty as leader of the house and Prime Minister is to preserve traditional practice and to be careful in the matter of establishing precedent. I therefore had a careful search made as to what had taken place in parliament in the past, and have been unable to find that at any time, with one exception only, has reference been made by the leaders of the parties to the passing of former members of governments who were not members of the parliament then in session. The only exception, so far as I have been able to ascertain, has been with former prime ministers or leaders of political parties. I considered whether it would be proper for me to depart from the traditional practice today, or rather to set a precedent which it might become embarrassing to follow in some future cases. Before taking my seat this afternoon I had a word with the acting leader of the opposition and mentioned to him that I did not think, for the reasons I have mentioned, that I should depart from what has been the customary practice and thereby establish a new precedent.

However, I am happy indeed that the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) as president of the Canadian Bar Association, has found the best of reasons for drawing the attention of the house to the loss which the legal profession of this country has suffered in the passing of the late Colonel Ralston. May I say that I echo sincerely and deeply all the sentiments that he has expressed. I would say on behalf of the public of Canada that I think Canada has lost one of the finest men of our country in the passing of the late Colonel Ralston.

I knew Colonel Ralston intimately, and a more unselfish and self-sacrificing public servant I have never known. I cannot recall anyone of my acquaintance who seemed to be more industrious, more conscientious or more ready to sacrifice everything for duty, as he saw it, than Colonel Ralston. We had our difference as to what was the most advisable course to be adopted at a particular time, but such differences arise in government and are sometimes inevitable. As far as I am aware, that difference, which was a political difference, did not make a difference in our personal friendship. I continued to retain to the end of his life the strongest affection for Colonel Ralston and the greatest possible admiration for his high character and exceptional abilities. I believe that the great service which he rendered our country in the period of the war years as Minister of National Defence brought a reaction which was inevitable. I would think that it helped to account for the shortening of his life. But those who knew Colonel Ralston will realize with me that he was a man who could not spare himself no matter what particular task he might be engaged in. As has been reported in the press, he was apparently following his customary habit of working until half past six or seven o'clock at night before returning from his duties to his evening meal. I would not have been surprised if the evening had found him engaged again on the task he had in hand. Certainly it was so through the years that he was here as Minister of National Defence. The continual taxing of his energies, and what must frequently have been the overtaxing of his strength undoubtedly contributed to his sudden passing at the age of sixty-six. I feel that our own country is very greatly the loser in the death of one who held so high a place in his profession, who played so important a part in public life, and who took such a great part in the larger task of helping to save the world's freedom when freedom itself was at stake.

I do not think we should ever forget that Colonel Ralston, when the first war came on, gave up his practice to join Canada's armed forces for service overseas, and that his was a heroic part. He served with great distinction through the whole of the first war. When a second war threatened, I remember talking with him very earnestly before war actually broke out. Fearing that something of the kind might happen, I begged of him to come into the ministry forthwith. He told me in his quiet, humble, modest way that he had felt the need of making provision for his family and himself and for that reason did not wish to come back into the government, but that if war came I could call on him in a moment. When war came, I asked him again to come into the government, and he responded instantly. No one could have rendered the country greater service in the time that he was minister of the department of defence than Colonel Ralston. His name will always be greatly honoured in this country, and nowhere more than in this parliament, and by none more than by those who knew him best.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as an old personal friend of Colonel Ralston, a fellow Nova Scotian, and also as the honorary head of the Canadian Bar Association, I should like to add a brief and simple tribute to the great man whose death has just occurred.

Colonel Ralston never did a selfish thing in his whole life, and I cannot think of anyone whose death would cause more widespread sorrow than his. A truly great Canadian has passed away, and his countless friends are shocked and grieving. His whole life was devoid of selfishness and filled with distinction. A brave soldier, a fine lawyer, a wise statesman, he brought honour and glory to Canada throughout his whole illustrious career. His devotion to duty, his intellectual honesty, his frankness and courage, his capacity for self sacrifice, his unfailing manliness in all the activities and relationships of life, were altogether exceptional. His heart was full of human sympathy, his friendships were innumerable, his loyalty to old comrades and friends unshakeable.

To his devoted wife and son I extend my deepest sympathy.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, as one who had the privilege of sitting in this house with Colonel Ralston when he sat on this side, and also when he was a member of the government, I wish to associate myself and the C.C.F. group with the tributes paid to his memory by the member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley).

I shall remember Colonel Ralston best because of the meticulous care with which he answered, or at least attempted to answer, every letter I wrote him during the time he occupied the position of minister of defence. I knew how busy he was, and how many important questions he had to deal with, and I refrained whenever possible from writing him in regard to anything. But as happens with all private members, I had occasion, at times, to put questions to him, and no matter how much trouble the answer involved I always got an answer which was full and complete in every detail. I am sure that that is the way in which he will be remembered by most of the members, at least on this side of the house.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the member for Peace River (Mr. Low) was not a member of parliament while Colonel Ralston was winning the admiration of the whole house by his estimable behaviour in the cabinet during wartime, he has asked me to say a word on behalf of the Social Credit group.

After all the beautiful and noble things that have been said, it seems utterly impossible for me to say anything more, or to say it any better. But an inspiring passage referring to the war comes to my mind at this moment, as put into the mouth of a soldier boy who was called upon to make the supreme sacrifice. The words are, "Now, God be thanked, Who has matched us with His hour." I believe those words are exceedingly appropriate as applied to Colonel Ralston. In his spiritual life, having left this life of storm and stress, he must now be able to say with great satisfaction, "Now, God be thanked, Who has matched us with His hour."

The members of my group join with all other members of the house in deep appreciation of Colonel Ralston's fine life, and in tenderest sympathy and good will toward his bereaved ones.

Mr. J. W. MacNAUGHT (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I feel that as the member for Prince, the constituency represented in this house from 1939 to 1945 by the late Colonel Ralston, I should add a few words to what has been already said by the other speakers.

I believe that I am voicing the feelings of every one of my constituents and the people of the maritimes in general, regardless of politics, race or creed, when I say that in the passing of the late Colonel Ralston the maritimes have lost one of their most distinguished sons. Colonel Ralston had a tremendous capacity for forming deep and abiding friendships. During the six years he represented Prince he made many such friendships. I well recall that on a return from a trip to the battlefronts in Italy, Colonel Ralston spent literally hours telephoning the friends and relatives of boys he had met and talked to while overseas. Such genuine acts of courtesy and thoughtfulness on the part of a busy man are not soon forgotten.

On behalf of my constituents and myself, I wish to express deepest sympathy to the family of the late Colonel Ralston.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I rise to associate the Progressive Conservative party, of which I have the honour at the moment to be the acting leader, with the sentiments which have been so eloquently expressed by those who have preceded me.

I felt when I heard the news of Colonel Ralston's death that it was almost like losing a member of one's own family; for through the war years he had endeared himself to all of us who sat with him in parliament and had anything to do with his department. His courtesy, his friendliness, and, as one hon. member has said, his capacity to hold his friends, singled him out and made him one of the very great men with whom we have had the honour to associate. His courage, his brilliance, his almost indefatigable attention to every detail of the duties at hand, and his devotion to that duty, marked him in the hearts, minds and memories of all of us as one of nature's gentlemen. No greater tribute than that can one man pay to another.

On behalf of the party with which I am associated, Mr. Speaker, I join with other hon. members who have spoken, in conveying to the late Colonel Ralston's widow, and to his son, deep and genuine sympathy in this their hour of sorrow and of loss.

PALESTINE

UNITED STATES PLEA TO SECURITY COUNCIL—QUESTION AS TO CANADA'S SUPPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): I should like to ask a question of the government. Will Canada support the United States in its plea to the security council for a declaration that the present situation in Palestine is a threat to the peace, and, in fact, a breach of the peace?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared at this moment to make a categorical answer to the hon. member's question, because my information is that late Saturday afternoon the security council disposed of both a proposal submitted by the delegate of the United States and one submitted by the delegate of the United Kingdom. Though I have no information as to just what the precedure was, we received an official notification from the secretary general, Mr. Trygve Lie, in a telegram which I think I should read to the house, because, though I have scanned the newspapers carefully, I have not seen its text published. This is the dispatch:

Have honour to communicate to your government following resolution adopted by security council at its 302nd meeting held 22nd May, 1948.

"The security council, taking into consideration that previous resolutions of the security council in respect to Palestine have not been complied with and that military operations are taking place in Palestine;

"Calls upon all governments and authorities, without prejudice to the rights, claims or position of the parties concerned, to abstain from any hostile military action in Palestine and to that end to issue a cease-fire order to their military and para-military forces to become effective within thirty-six hours after midnight, New York standard time, 22nd May, 1948;

"Calls upon the truce commission and upon all parties concerned to give the highest priority to the negotiation and maintenance of a truce in the city of Jerusalem;

"Directs the trade commission established by the security council by its resolution of 23rd April, 1948, to report to the security council on the compliance with the two preceding paragraphs of this resolution;

"Calls upon all parties concerned to facilitate by all means in their power the task of the united nations mediator appointed in execution of the resolution of the general assembly of 14th May, 1948."

Draw attention in particular to paragraph two of this resolution.

Trygve Lie

It is true that there is a report in the newspapers of this morning under the dateline, "Lake Success, N.Y., May 23," which reads as follows:

The United States appeared ready tonight to renew its fight for a Palestine cease fire order, voted down late Saturday by the united nations security council which instead appealed to Jews and Arabs to stop fighting.

However, there has been no subsequent proposal, of which my department has any knowledge, of further action since this resolution was adopted.

Hon. members realize that the difference between the resolution adopted and the one submitted is that the one submitted called for a declaration under chapter 7 of the united nations charter, which provides for methods of coercion. Canada is a member of the security council. As such our delegation on the security council is responsible not only to the Canadian people but to all members of the United Nations. All I can say is that the whole matter is being, and will continue to be, considered in the most objective light possible, with a keen and earnest desire to make such moves, and take such measures, as will seem to be both practicable and best fitted to bring about a cessation of the terrible situation which, I will not say, exists, because I do not know at this moment whether this resolution has been complied with, but which has been in existence until very recently in the Holy Land.

REPORT AS TO SHOOTING OF BRITISH CITIZENS TAKEN PRISONER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. According to the C.B.C. news at one o'clock, the Jews have declared that they will shoot all British citizens taken prisoner. The question I should like to ask is this: Has the government any information as to whether that would apply to Canadian citizens, or only to those of Great Britain?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Canadian government has received no information whatsoever of there being any threat by the Jews, as referred to by the hon. member, to shoot British subjects.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REPORTED PURCHASE BY C.B.C. OF BUILDING IN MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of National Revenue whether the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has purchased a building in Montreal for its offices and other purposes at a price reported to be $750,000?

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the report, but the statement as given by the hon. member for Eglinton is not according to the facts.

Mr. FLEMING: Press reports indicate that the Ford hotel building in Montreal has been purchased by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

P.E.I. CAR FERRY

INQUIRY AS TO CHANGES IN SCHEDULED CROSSINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. MacNAUGHT (Prince): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Are any changes to be made in the scheduled crossings of the car ferry at Borden and Tormentine?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Yes; decision has been reached to institute a late sailing of the Prince Edward Island car ferry from Cape Tormentine at 10.30 p.m., daily except Sunday, from June 27 to September 7, inclusive; also an earlier sailing on Sunday has been decided upon which will leave Borden at 9.10 a.m. and Cape Tormentine at 10.30 a.m., from June 4 to September 5, inclusive.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

NORTH STAR AIRCRAFT

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce may I call the attention of the Secretary of State to a question of mine passed as an order for return on Wednesday, April 28, 1948, with regard to North Star aircraft? I do this because I see on the order paper a question by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) which is similar to mine. Now that a month has elapsed since the question was passed as an order for return, may I ask the Secretary of State if I may have an answer to my question at an early day?

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): I shall be glad to make inquiries and try to expedite the return.

INCOME TAX

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF NEW ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Will the Minister of National Revenue say if it is his intention to bring in the new income tax legislation at this session?

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): It is the intention of the government that the new income tax act shall be introduced after the budget debate has been finished.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is it the intention of the government to submit the income tax bill to a special or standing committee of the house for consideration?

Mr. McCANN: The hon. member's question might more properly be answered by the Minister of Finance, since the new income tax legislation comes under his direction. But I do not think I am betraying any confidence in saying to the hon. gentleman that it is my understanding that the bill will be referred to the committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am glad to hear that, because there are many bona fide farmers who would like to come and give evidence.

Mr. McCANN: You can arrange for that.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VICTORIA DAY—REQUEST FOR HALF HOLIDAY FOR PART OF PAGE STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. CARDIFF (Huron North): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the house would consider a very urgent request. In view of the fact that there is such a scanty attendance in the chamber, and that the boys who are employed as pages feel that the 24th of May is a day they should have off, would it be possible to grant at least a part of the page staff a half holiday?

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

AMENDMENTS TO ACT OF 1934

The house resumed from Thursday, May 20, consideration in committee of Bill No. 300, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, 1934—Mr. Chevrier—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the bill was last under consideration the committee was dealing with clause 44. Shall the clause carry?

Section agreed to.

Sections 45 to 54 inclusive agreed to.

On section 55—Coming into force. Sec. 17.

Mr. SINCLAIR: This is the place to introduce a new clause, according to Beauchesne, 670 and 671. I need not speak at great length on the amendment I shall now propose to section 406, because I covered that when I spoke on the second reading of the bill. The minister has informed me that there will be a number of special amendments next year to those parts of the Canada Shipping Act relating to the technical end of radiotelegraphy. My amendment is not a technical one, being intended rather to ensure safety, and there is no need for any technical knowledge to understand the meaning of it.

Section 406 of the Canada Shipping Act is the section that stipulates what type of ship shall carry radiotelegraph operators as a safety measure. Subsection 1 satisfactorily covers deep-sea ships and cargo ships. Section 406 (2) is the section referring to coastal steamers plying on the east and west coasts. The intent of the act is a good one. The section states that a ship certified to carry 50 or more persons shall have a radio operator if it makes a voyage of more than 200 nautical miles from place to place. The second subsection states that the bigger ships carrying 250 persons must have an operator if they make voyages of more than 90 miles from place to place, and the third subsection provides that if they carry 500 passengers or more they may go only twenty miles from place to place without such an operator.

When this act was drawn up I am quite sure it was intended to cover the situation I shall describe. Another section of the act to which I call attention shows the great importance which is attached to proper radiotelegraph service at sea. Section 40 gives the minister amazing powers. The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) commented on the wide powers given the minister in case of emergency. He can allow ships to go to sea without a certified captain or deck officers or engineer officers, without steamship inspectors or proper loading; but there is one significant subsection of this clause which provides that while he can do all these things, he cannot allow any leeway in relation to those aspects that concern radiotelegraph installations on ships.

This is not only important as far as the people who drew the act are concerned; it is extremely important to the people of British Columbia. As I pointed out in my earlier remarks, our province has a very heavy coastal steamer traffic north and south. Our coast, while picturesque, is a dangerous and treacherous one to navigate, especially in the winter, when unfortunately we have not only heavy rains but dense fog. Moreover, our coast is a very badly lighted one. We have not one quarter of the aids to navigation on the British Columbia coast, in the way of lights, buoys, foghorns and so on, that the Americans have, either on the coast of the United States itself or on the coast of Alaska.

It has been mentioned also by the British Columbia members that we have not a coast-guard to help in rescue work on the British Columbia coast as have the Americans. For these reasons the people of British Columbia are anxious that the coastal steamer traffic shall be properly protected by adequate radio-telegraph service.

Unfortunately, while the intent of the act is good, there have been infringements and evasions—not, I am glad to say, by the two major steamship lines, Canadian Pacific Steamships and Canadian National Steamships, but by some of the smaller lines which ply the coast. They have taken advantage of the fact that in the act the length of journey is defined as "from place to place," and therefore the coastal steamers can make the voyage of 500 miles to Prince Rupert, along all that hazardous coast carrying 400 passengers, and evade the stipulations of the act by merely calling every 90 miles at some small fishing cannery, logging camp or paper town. Such places could not give to a ship in distress the service which is expected. The reason for limiting the voyages of ships of this type is that if the ship is in distress, aid in the way of salvage tugs, high speed tugs and medical help can be sent to points which the ship had left or towards which it was headed; and above all, that these points should have wireless listening posts at which someone will be listening for distress calls, and to which the coastal steamer could send a call if it is in distress. Such posts are not found in these little logging towns, which are used as "places" under the act. They have none of these facilities. They have no tugs or lifeboats which could go out to give aid. They have no medical aid at hand. Seldom have they a doctor. As they have no listening posts, a ship could be in distress five miles away and nobody in these little towns would be any the wiser.

The people of British Columbia, therefore, have indicated strongly that they think this act should be strengthened. The weakness arises from the words "place to place". It has been suggested that we use the terminology which is used in the United Kingdom with regard to coastal traffic, namely, "terminus to terminus". This, however, might apply to a ship, for example, going from Vancouver to Alaska, passing two or three points en route which are places from which aid could go out.

Public opinion at home has pretty well decided that "public harbour to public harbour" is a much better definition than "place to place", a public harbour being a place designated under this act, the Canada Shipping Act. Every public harbour has a harbour master, and from these harbours you could expect aid in the way of tugs or lifeboats, and medical aid; and there would be maintained at each of them a listening post.

I should like to refer the minister, if he is at all in doubt as to the opinion in our province, to the feeling expressed last winter in editorials in all the papers after we had a fatal wreck on one of our small coastal steamers. Only last week two papers in British Columbia which consistently support this government, the Vancouver Sun and the Victoria Daily Times, both carried long editorials on the subject, one entitled "Safety on the coast", and the other "Safety at sea".

If the minister wants other proof, I am sure the hon. member for Yukon, who during the fifty years he has been active in the west has probably travelled our British Columbia coast more than any other member in this house, or the hon. member for Vancouver East, or the hon. member for Kootenay East, can support me in this contention.

I do not think that I can say anything further, so I will now move my amendment, which is as follows:

That section 406 2(a) of the Canada Shipping Act be amended by substituting in subparagraphs (i), (ii) and (iii) the phrase from "public harbour to public harbour" wherever the phrase "place to place" now occurs.

Mr. MacINNIS: I rise only to support this amendment. I know that greater safety is required than is at present provided by the regulations affecting ships plying on the Pacific coast. I understand that some of the opposition to providing radiotelegraph on the ships, an operator for that purpose, arises out of the small amount of work the person in charge would have to do. I submit that is not a good argument. If it were a good argument, instead of having full-time firemen in our cities, who may be on duty for weeks without being called to a fire, we would have part-time firemen. The need for a radio operator on a ship is when an accident occurs, either to the ship which is so equipped, or to some other ship. It is a question of radiotelegraphy not only from ship to shore but also from ship to ship. The importance that is attributed to radiotelegraphy in the schedule to the safety at sea convention is a good indication of the value attached to it. There are over six pages of regulations. I suggest that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver North is necessary at this time, and is especially necessary on the rugged coast of British Columbia where we have no coastguard service.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The hon. member for Vancouver North has clearly and completely stated the case for his proposed amendment. The act as it stands now, with the use of the word "place" in the various paragraphs, enables the steamship companies whose ships are not equipped with radiotelegraph to evade the act. They can have a short voyage from place to place, including a number of "places", on a whole long voyage; whereas if the words "public harbour" are substituted for the word "place" they cannot do that. As the hon. member for Vancouver North has said, the largest shipping companies on the west coast are properly equipped. I have been on these ships when they had to call for help. I have been on ships when other ships called them for help. If it had not been for the radiotelegraph, they would not have known that a ship was in trouble, nor could they have made their own needs known to the people on shore or to other ships. I submit to the minister that, in the interests of public safety, the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Under the present provisions of the act, a C.P.R. steamer operating on the west of Vancouver island could get by the present provisions without providing a radio operator. If the minister has ever been out to this wild and rugged country, he will realize the urgent necessity of providing for the safety of passengers on runs of that kind. I appreciate the fact that in the near future there will be extensive advances in the field of communication from ship to shore and from ship to ship. But if within the next few years a tragic accident should occur, even although radiotelegraph facilities might not have averted it, I suggest to the minister that he and his department would be in a much happier position, having regard to public opinion, if this amendment were allowed to pass.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Chairman, I have looked carefully at the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver North. While there is some merit in the proposal, I must oppose it, for the following reasons.

It has already been stated by myself during the course of this discussion that the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act were given careful consideration by a special committee set up in the Department of Transport. It was a committee of experts and heads of various branches having jurisdiction over certain parts of the act. The committee heard representations from various associations, unions and groups across Canada. One of these associations was the commercial telegraphers union, Marconi section. They presented a brief having to do with amendments to the act in connection with radio, radiotelegraphy and the like, and there was no such representation as that which has been brought forward at this time.

There is sitting at the present time in London an international convention known as the convention for the safety of life at sea. That convention is considering amendments to the radio sections of the Canada Shipping Act, as well as to the safety sections of the act. Canada is one of the representative nations at the convention, and in all probability will be a signatory to it. I would hesitate to recommend amendments to the act when I do not know the recommendations to which in all probability Canada will be committed. I believe it is more in accordance with practice, and certainly with custom, to wait until those recommendations have been agreed upon. It may be that they will contain an amendment such as the one now suggested. It may be that there will be a complete revamping of the section. Until I am in possession of those recommendations I would hesitate to accept this amendment.

There is another reason which should be given consideration, and that is that the amendment has the tendency of materially strengthening the act. I presume there could be no complaint about that, other than the fact that there is a group of owners of certain vessels which are not equipped with radio apparatus and equipment; and it might very well be that this would work a hardship upon those people. I believe they have the right to expect that until the recommendations of the convention for the safety of life at sea have been brought in, no changes which would materially affect them, such as the amendment now offered, should be made. For those reasons I feel I should oppose the amendment.

Mr. SINCLAIR: With all due deference to the minister, I suggest the answer he has given does not answer the point at all. I do not know why we should wait for the recommendations of an international convention before strengthening our own act so far as the coast of British Columbia is concerned. I have mentioned that the present word "place" would apply to little fishing towns such as Lund, Egmont and Alert bay, and this should be sufficient to end the controversy.

To say that some international convention may bring in other regulations is not enough. I admit that some companies might be forced to install radio apparatus; but I should think we ought to consider the hardship which might befall two or three hundred passengers on a ship who may be facing a watery grave, and not the hardship to shipowners. The small cost of installing radiotelegraphy sets on these ships, as is done on Canadian National and Canadian Pacific ships, should not be considered as an obstacle.

For these reasons I suggest we should have a division on this matter.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I say another word before the amendment is voted on. My opinion is that the minister's argument as to why he cannot accept the amendment is so weak that it would have been better left unsaid.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Somewhat like the hon. member's speech of a moment ago.

Mr. MacINNIS: No, not at all. In my case, what was required to be said had already been said. But, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver North, I can see no reason why we should wait upon a convention or a conference in London. The minister has said that he does not wish to do anything until that conference makes a decision. But, suppose the conference does not deal with this matter at all so as to safeguard lives on ships plying on the Pacific coast, are we to leave it at that? Are we not going to safeguard life unless a convention somewhere makes a decision?

The minister said that it might put some companies, now operating ships, to some expense.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I did not use the word "expense".

Mr. MacINNIS: I cannot understand anything else that would come up but the matter of expense. But has anyone ever heard of a proposal involving expense which employers have not opposed? It was only when laws were made and it became more expensive to disobey the law than to comply with it that we had safety in industry. The same will apply in this situation.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): With all respect to the minister, it does not seem to me that the deliberations of any international convention considering the Canada Shipping Act in any way lessens the necessity for the amendment offered by the hon. member for Vancouver North. There is a crying need for this change. To allow ships without radiotelegraph to carry passengers is to court disaster and to endanger the lives of thousands of passengers. This is going on every day and every night along the coast of British Columbia. The danger might be largely done away with if the minister would consent to the amendment and if the committee were to adopt it.

Why should the ships of some companies see fit to carry radiotelepgraph, if it is not necessary? They know it is necessary; I have been on those ships when it has been called into play. They have had to use it, both for their own safety and for the safety of other ships. Why toy with the question because someone in London is going to think it over? Let us now, in committee of the House of Commons, deal with it and thereby lessen the danger to the lives of thousands of people.

Mr. HAZEN: I am not prepared to support the amendment without knowing more about it. It may be that on the Pacific coast some such provision is necessary. Although my knowledge in the matter is not complete, I doubt whether an amendment of this kind is required along the coast of the bay of Fundy, or perhaps in some other parts of the maritime provinces. Until I have more light on that point I am not prepared to support the amendment. I know British Columbia has a long coastline; along the bay of Fundy our coastline is comparatively short. Unless there is some clear definition of the expressions "place to place" and "public harbour" I would not be prepared to support the amendment.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Perhaps I can answer that objection. It would not apply to the bay of Fundy at all, because there are certain specific limitations. This section does not refer to every passenger steamer. It refers to a passenger steamer with 50 or more passengers which goes more than 200 miles—and certainly I do not think you can take a journey like that on the bay of Fundy—or a passenger steamer carrying more than 250 passengers and going more than 90 miles, or finally the large one carrying more than 500 passengers and going more than 20 miles. I think that would be just as desirable in the bay of Fundy and around Nova Scotia as on the British Columbia coast.

Mr. LANGLOIS: I am not very well versed in the coastal trade on the Pacific ocean, and therefore I cannot understand the full meaning of the amendment before the committee. Will the minister or the hon. member for Vancouver North tell the committee what class of ships will be affected by this amendment?

Mr. CHEVRIER: All those mentioned in section 406, subsection 2.

Mr. LANGLOIS: As I understand the amendment, it substitutes for the word "place" the words "public harbour". I think section 539 of the Canada Shipping Act defeats the purpose of the amendment. Under that section the governor in council may declare to be a public harbour any area covered with water. Section 593 reads:

(1) The governor in council may, by proclamation,

(a) declare to be a public harbour any area covered with water within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, and such proclamation shall define the limits of the harbour so proclaimed; and

(b) extend or restrict the area of any existing public harbour in Canada.

(2) Upon such proclamation being issued, all statutes, rules and regulations affecting such public harbours shall apply thereto as so extended or restricted.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Among the public harbours on the coast are Vancouver, New Westminster, Victoria, Nanaimo, Port Alberni and Prince Rupert. That control is very much in the hands of the crown under this act. Certainly I do not think the minister would declare that little fishing camps and logging camps should be officially designated as public harbours. The coastal traffic in British Columbia is much heavier than anywhere else, because there are no roads along the coast, and this creates a great volume of coastal passenger traffic. The amendment refers only to coastal passenger steamships; it does not refer to deep-sea steamers or deep-sea cargo ships.

Mr. CHEVRIER: In case there might be a misapprehension as to the number of public harbours on the west coast I should like to have this matter clear on the record. There are some 600 proclaimed public harbours in Canada, the following being on the west coast:

Bamfield Creek	Nanoose
Bull Harbour	Ocean Falls
Chemainus	Pender
Comox	Powell River
Crofton	Prince Rupert
Gibsons Landing	Quadra
Horseshoe Bay	Snug Cove
Ladysmith	Squamish
Nanaimo and Departure Bay	Ucluelet Arm
	Victoria

I do not want to repeat the reasons I gave a moment ago in objecting to the amendment. I think I should say that the hon. member for Vancouver North was kind enough to discuss his amendment with me before he brought it down. I in turn discussed it with my officers and they repeated to me what I have already put on the record, namely, that they had given consideration to the brief of the telegraphers' association from the west coast and had reviewed the amendment in the light of what has been said, but their advice to me is that it should not be accepted. I have to give the committee the benefit of that advice.

Mr. STUART (Charlotte): As this amendment affects boats in the bay of Fundy—although I am not sure at the moment how many will be affected—and the amendment would impose added expense on boatmen in the bay of Fundy, as well as making necessary added inspection by officials of the department, I wonder if it could not stand until tomorrow so that hon. members who are interested could look into it and decide whether they wanted to support it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am in the hands of the committee, but this bill has been up at least four times, and I would like to get it through today if I can. However, if it is the wish of the committee to go on discussing it, I am in the hands of the committee.

Mr. HACKETT: Let us vote on it.

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 24; nays, 35.

On the title.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There are one or two amendments I should like to make, and I think this is the stage at which to make them. I understand that I must have the consent of the committee to make them at this stage, but I think they are amendments which will commend themselves to hon. members. This one arises out of the discussion which took place the other evening with regard to sailing ships. The amendment is:

Amend clause 1 of Bill 300 by deleting subclause (9) and substituting therefor the following:

(9) Paragraph eighty-nine of the said section is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(89) 'Sailing ship', except for the purposes of the load lines rules, means a ship propelled wholly by sails, and a ship solely employed in fishing not exceeding one hundred and fifty tons gross tonnage, provided with masts, sails and rigging sufficient to allow her to make voyages under sail alone, and that, in addition, is fitted with mechanical means of propulsion other than a steam engine."

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I move accordingly.

Mr. SINCLAIR: This does not cover British Columbia fishing vessels because they are not equipped with masts and rigging and they do not use sails. When the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg raised the question a week ago with regard to his fishing schooners, I gave him my sympathy, never assuming that this would be so inclusive as to bring in even the fishing boats used on the British Columbia coast. A ship under 150 tons would cover most of our coastal fishing fleet, but to specify that they must have masts and sails would not describe anything but the odd Indian's fishing vessel.

Mr. CHEVRIER: My information is that the definition includes fishing vessels not only on the east coast but on the west coast, provided that they have sails. That has always been the practice.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): If I may come to the assistance of the hon. member for Vancouver North, practically all our vessels on the Pacific coast have to have a mast for the purposes of loading cargo, and it would only be the part of wisdom for a boat to have a piece of canvas around the place if they happened to drop a propeller or something of that kind. My opinion is that the amendment will meet the case on the Pacific coast as well as in the east.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The last phrase of the amendment says that the vessel must be capable of moving under sail. It is all very well to have a small piece of canvas around, but that would not, on the mast of a big seiner, sail it very far.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That part of the definition is not changed from the one they are now operating under. I will read the original definition of sailing vessels:

> "Sailing ship" (except as may be provided under the load lines rules) means a ship propelled wholly by sails, and includes a ship not in excess of one hundred and fifty tons, gross tonnage, provided with masts, sails and rigging sufficient to allow her to make voyages under sail alone, and which, in addition, is provided with mechanical means of propulsion other than a steam engine.

They are operating under that definition now. This change is being made to come to the assistance of people on the east and west coasts, so that they will be exempt from steamship inspection.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am glad to have the assurance that our big boats need only put a piece of canvas on their main cargo boom to qualify as a sailing vessel.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. LANGLOIS: Under the new definition of sailing ship we are creating a new class of ship, as the minister assured us the other day, following the report of Mr. Justice Cannon. I take it that fishing vessels under 150 tons which are not equipped with sail will also benefit from being in this new class.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No; we are not creating a new class, but we are exempting fishing vessels from steamship inspection, for the reasons I gave a moment ago. Amending the definition is an entirely different thing from creating a new class.

Mr. LANGLOIS: I am afraid the minister misunderstood me. Is it not correct that, following Mr. Justice Cannon's report recommending a new class in the future for ships under 150 tons gross tonnage, irrespective of the trade in which they are engaged, fishing boats will be able to benefit from being in this new class created for ships under 150 tons?

Mr. RICHARD (Gloucester): In what class does a ship come that is smaller than 150 tons and is not equipped with sails but is propelled by mechanical means other than steam?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It comes in the class provided for ships of less than 150 tons.

Mr. LANGLOIS: This is the class I had in mind.

Mr. RICHARD (Gloucester): Does it require inspection?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Not as strict.

Mr. MacINNIS: Does the amendment just moved by the minister restore the old section as it was?

Mr. CHEVRIER: For fishing vessels.

Mr. MacINNIS: For fishing vessels only?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: In reply to the hon. member for Vancouver North I would say that the amendment is in the present act with regard to sailing vessels.

Mr. CHEVRIER: What I said or intended to say was that the greater part of the definition contained in the amendment was contained in the old one. I was saying that in answer to my hon. friend's contention that there would be a great change so far as masts and sails are concerned.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni said that all that would be required for a ship to qualify would be to have a mast and a piece of canvas. But I would point out that the amendment moved by the minister calls for masts and sails, not a mast and a sail. Consequently the easy optimism of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is not justified.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I appreciate at times my hon. friend's analytical mind, but I had not noticed that masts and sails were in the plural. The average ship on the Pacific coast has one mast, and the average seine boat there would not start out to sea just with sails; in that case it would never get there. The idea of a sail is to bring it back home in case of trouble.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is nothing to the point that masts and sails are in the plural, because this refers to a ship employed in fishing.

Mr. STUART (Charlotte): Even the seiners fishing offshore, nine out of ten of them, would have what is called a riding sail, for protection. I have seen many boats come in using only a quilt for a sail. If you have plenty of wind it does not take much to bring you home.

Mr. SINCLAIR: This is perpetuating an old description perhaps suitable to the east coast fleet. I do not see why in 1948 the big modern fishing vessels of the British Columbia fleet, powered by diesel engines, should be described as sailing vessels. Why not get a better description of the west coast fishing boats?

Mr. MacINNIS: What were the arguments for making this change?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The recommendations of the Cannon commission, which reported on small boats.

Mr. WINTERS: I wish to thank the minister for reconsidering this matter and bringing in this amendment, which will better serve the fishing fleet in my constituency. My only comment is that the 150 tons gross tonnage might not be large enough at the time to cover larger schooners. If it had been 150 tons registered tonnage, I think it would have served them better. At any rate I think the minister will keep an open mind on this, and if we need the increased tonnage we will seek it at an early day.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have another amendment to propose. Perhaps it will be of assistance to the hon. member for Vancouver North.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall we carry the amendment which is now before the Chair?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I should like to add another section to the bill which would read as follows:

Subsection 9 of section 1 of this act shall come into force on a date to be fixed by proclamation.

Mr. HACKETT: So sailing ships may never sail.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Will my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, be good enough to move the amendment?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I so move.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The object of the amendment is to give those who will be affected by the new definition some time to get ready. After the matter has been under consideration for some time the effective date of the section would be proclaimed.

Mr. SINCLAIR: This I suppose is to give the big fishing boats time to buy the small piece of canvas referred to by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. HACKETT: As I understand it, the effect of the amendment is that subsection 9 of section 1 shall not come into effect when the bill itself does.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. LANGLOIS: Mr. Chairman, I am not worrying so much about the time which will be given to these ship owners to get their ships in shape according to the new regulations, but I hope the department will not decide to put them into force in the middle of the navigation season. I trust they will wait until the beginning of the season to do that.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is the intention.

Amendment agreeed to.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I still have a further amendment, and this is the last one. It refers to sections 118 and 118A of the act. If the committee will look at page 4, clause 6, they will see that clause 6 of the bill repeals sections 118 and 118A. It is still the intention to repeal sections 118 and 118A and to substitute therefor the following:

118. Every British subject who—

(a) served as as master of a home-trade, inland waters or minor waters sailing ship of over ten tons, gross tonnage, fitted with mechanical means of propulsion other than steam engines, before the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and forty-eight, for a full period of twelve months within the ten years immediately preceding the date of his application for a certificate of service;

(b) produces satisfactory evidence of his sobriety, experience, ability and general good conduct on board ship; and

(c) passes the prescribed examination;

shall be entitled, on payment of the prescribed fee, and according to the waters served in, to either a home-trade, inland waters or minor waters certificate of service as master of a steamship of over ten tons, gross tonnage, and not exceeding one hundred and fifty tons, gross tonnage, and not carrying passsengers. Such certificate shall not be valid on tugs.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I so move.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister explain the difference between his amendment and section 6 of the bill?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The object of this amendment is to provide for those operators of small vessels such as the goelette which my hon. friend had in mind the other day. If the present bill is allowed to go into force, then the operator of a small vessel will have to undergo a severe test, a severe examination to get a certificate, which in all probability he will not be able to do because he has not the facilities. Therefore the proposal, by the amendment, is to give to masters now operating these small boats a certificate, so that they will not be put out of business thereby.

Amendment agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister say whether any decision has been reached about the line which defines inland waters, and whether or not Ellis Bay, and the other port, the name of which escapes me, were included within the description?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The matter was discussed the other evening, and the decision arrived at was to leave the definition as it was, namely, that it would be from a point extending from Cap des Rosiers to the west tip of Anticosti island, and then to a point on the north shore, the name of which I have forgotten at the moment. It was thought that if it were extended easterly that would be including too much territory. The extension is already some 100 or 120 miles more than the original definition called for.

Bill reported.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I wish to discuss sections 11 and 40 of the bill. Incidentally may I say I am grateful to the house for giving me this opportunity. I intend to move an amendment which, if carried, would delete these two sections.

I am going to ask the house to direct its attention for a few moments to the exact purport of these two extraordinary sections. Section 11 is in these terms:

The minister may, if he thinks fit, and upon such conditions, if any, as he thinks proper to impose, exempt any ship from any requirement contained in sections one hundred and thirteen, one hundred and fourteen, one hundred and thirty-two and one hundred and thirty-three, or dispense with the observance of any such requirements in the case of any ship, if he is satisfied that that requirement has been substantially complied with in the case of that ship, or that compliance with the requirement is unnecessary in the circumstances of the case, and that the action taken or provision made as respects the subject matter of the requirement in the case of the ship is as effective as actual compliance with the requirement.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member; but on the third reading, as on the second reading, hon. members are not allowed to discuss the clauses of the bill. That should be done in the committee stage.

Mr. HACKETT: But I am offering an amendment to delete those two clauses from the act, and I submit with great deference that that is a competent procedure on the third reading of the bill. I would point out to the house that those two sections are a challenge not only to law and order but to the basic traditions of our political system and to the supremacy of the law and of parliamentary government. In effect, they state that what is now the law ceases to be the law if some individual decrees that it shall not be the law. It is an attack upon the rule of law and it is a perversion of parliamentary government. It as an echo of the bill that was passed earlier this session, the act respecting the conservation of foreign exchange, when the minister in charge of that bill was given powers that enabled him to legislate for the country at large and to determine that laws in force had ceased to be effective.

In this case there is not even the alleged reason of urgency. We have listened to arguments advanced in support of legislation which has been brought forward in the house resting upon a doctrine of urgency or emergency. That doctrine, for the time being, was seriously challenged the other day by a judgment of a court which held, that, no emergency having been established, the legislation was entirely beyond the competence of parliament to enact.

Mr. CHEVRIER: But there is urgency here.

Mr. HACKETT: I challenge that statement. There has been no evidence of urgency and much less of emergency. It has been stated that it would be more convenient if the officers of the department over which the minister presides were permitted to deal rather summarily with situations which heretofore came under the law. I refer now to section 40.

Section 40 says in substance that the seventh part of the Merchant Shipping Act shall not apply whenever the minister, on the recommendation of the chairman of the board of steamship inspection, so decrees.

The board of steamship inspection is a creature of the minister and is in all probability comprised of gentlemen who are in the service of his department. I shall be glad to be corrected on this point if I am in error, because I have not yet been able to ascertain exactly who constitutes this board of steamship inspection, but I have noticed that its members are appointed by order in council, and it is fair to assume that they would in most cases be in complete harmony with the government and in all likelihood under the dominion and instructions of the minister.

Let us look for a moment at the seventh part of the shipping act. It deals with many aspects of shipping, and it deals with those questions which affect humanity most, that is the safety of those who go down to the sea in ships. In fact, the whole seventh part comes under the general heading of "safety". It includes in the act fifty odd pages of the statute and it consists of something like 125 sections—116 sections to be exact.

If this bill becomes law it will mean that that entire seventh part of the Canada Shipping Act will cease to have the effect of law and may be suspended, deleted, changed or otherwise dealt with as the minister sees fit, without notice and without reason.

Among the items which may be dealt with in this summary way are the following: steamship inspection service; safety and inspection certificates; provisions as to safety convention ships not registered in Canada; limited and other voyages; overloading passenger ships; safety precautions; radio equipment; inspection of radiotelegraph apparatus; radio certificates; load lines and loading; special provisions to load line convention ships not registered in Canada; general provisions to loadline convention ships not registered in Canada; loading of timber; changes affecting certificate; safety of ships, passengers and crew; dangerous goods; ships alleged to be unseaworthy; inspection of ships' tackle; gangways and dock lines; exceptional vessels and exemptions from inspection; fees for inspection; detaining for non-compliance or other causes; discretionary application of safety of load line conventions, sale of ship to realize fines imposed; disposal of penalties and limitations of proceedings; general penalty; special application of this part.

This broad realm of shipping legislation in which, as the result of centuries of experience, these provisions have been embodied, first, in the British act and, subsequently, in our own act, shall cease to have the effect of law and be binding upon the people at large only so long as it meets with the approval of the minister. The minister, in making his statement to the house with regard to section 11, said that a similar provision is found in the British act and he suggested that was the reason to introduce such a measure into the Canada Shipping Act. I draw to his attention that, while the language of the British act does not differ materially from that of the Canadian act, there is this great difference: Whereas in the Canadian act discretion is left with the minister, under the Merchant Shipping Act of the United Kingdom the discretion rests with the board of trade.

I do not think it is necessary at the present time to enter into a lengthy discussion of the origin and function of the board of trade or the part which it plays in England. It is one of those hoary institutions that go back almost to the time King Canute. It is one of those institutions that has grown up in that seafaring country. It is associated in the minds of many with Trinity House, Deptford shipbuilding yards and other like agencies which were the product of initiative, enterprise and experience that sent Englishmen to the seven seas. They were not administered by civil servants or by persons who found themselves in relation to authority in the position that our departmental officials find themselves here. They lived on the banks of the Thames, in that harbour of ten thousand masts, and saw its commerce and trade pulsating day by day. They were of the life, of the essence of that great humanizing and colonizing agency that, through the centuries, made of Britain what she has been and is. To liken the minister—who, with all his grace and charm is but a passing phase on the political scene—to an institution that has been in existence for five, six, or seven hundred years is, I think, to show a lack of sense of proportion.

We pride ourselves on living in a country which acknowledges the rule of law, a country in which everyone is subject to the law, and is supposed to know the law and is dealt with as if he knew the law. Yet under these amendments, under sections 11 and 40 of the bill, the law may be changed without notice and without reason at any time.

My hon. and genial friend, the minister of the department, said there is urgency. What urgency is there? This law has been the law since 1934 and it embodies enactments which were the law in Canada for a great many years before that. The laws which are affected by section 11 have to do with the certification of masters, mates and engineers, and the qualifications of men who are operating ships; it is important to the people who ply the trade of sailors and seamen and to the people who journey by sea, that there should be the utmost confidence and reliability at all times in those to whom they confide their lives every time they put out to sea. Yet the minister makes this suggestion. Because, during the war when there was a shortage of men and when there was surge of cargoes which had to be taken across the deep that our fighting forces might be kept effective, hazards had to be taken and life and liberty were in the balance—because these things were done then, the minister suggests that today we should depart from that age-old rule of stability of the law.

We come to section 40, concerning which there is no reason other than the convenience and the desire of a small departmental group to be absolute in their mastery of situations. What right has any man in any department to determine, without notice, how a ship shall be loaded or unloaded? What right has he to say how a passenger ship shall be equipped with lifesaving devices and others?

We talk here about our origin and about the majesty of the law. Not infrequently speakers are inclined to recall how a British sovereign summoned his judges together. If my memory serves me well, it was James I, in 1608—the very year in which Champlain came to the rock of Quebec—who did that. The judges of the court of king's bench of England were summoned one Sunday morning to ascertain if they would do the bidding of the king. They all, with the exception of one rather short, thick-necked, florid individual, bowed their heads and said they would. But one, Coke, who has achieved immortality, said it was not competent for anyone, even the king, to interfere with the courts. He stated a principle which has been accepted wherever institutions such as ours prevail, that is that all men are subject to the law at all times, namely, that it is not competent to anyone at any time to change or to interfere with the law.

Yet by this bill the house is saying that fifty pages of a statute, upon which thousands of people depend for their safety may be stripped from the statutes; and the penalties which have heretofore attached to those who disregard these humanitarian provisions will cease to be effective.

We talk here frequently about communism and about the encroachments of communism upon our institutions. I suggest that we would do well to turn our eyes inward and look at the depredations going on in this very House of Commons where greater encroachments are being made upon the liberty of the subject and upon the stability of institutions built up through years of civilization than could ever be readily achieved by the activities of any foe from outside. We appear to have forgotten entirely what it cost to make of the law something durable, to make of the law something that applies to all men, something that could not be set aside, something that everybody was bound to respect, the integrity of which, both in its application and in its making, were beyond challenge.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Hazen):

That sections 11 and 40 of this bill be deleted.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the object of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) would be to disapprove that which the house has already approved when it passed the two sections to which the hon. member refers, namely sections 133A and 488A. In other words, it would be a backdoor method of striking out sections already approved by the house.

I fail to see why the hon. member should be exercised at this stage about these particular sections. I fail to understand why he has selected these two rather than many others—several others, at least—of a similar nature which were brought in last session. I can think of an amendment to the Railway Act which I brought before the house, which had to do with an order in council arising out of the war emergency and which the house saw fit to approve. I can think of one or two like amendments brought in by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), which used practically the same wording as the orders in council passed during the war years.

Why my hon. friend should, because of a high legal principle, select these two sections in the act, is beyond me; because if the principle he advocates is a good one, then it was a good one in the other instances to which I have referred.

My hon. friend made light, as he had a perfect right to do, of my explanation of the fact that this section 133A can be found in the Merchant Shipping Act of the United Kingdom. Not only can the section be found in that act, but the exact wording is used, with the exception of the substitution of the expression "board of trade" for the word "minister". I do not know whether my hon. friend is aware of the fact that the board of trade has now become the ministry of transport in the United Kingdom. So that over there the ministry of transport has the same rights and the same privileges as the Minister of Transport in this instance, on the advice of the steamship inspection board, seeks from the house.

Then it is set out that anything done by the minister under this section will be laid on the table of the house. I do not wish to go over the arguments I have already given, but I would say to the hon. member that this matter is urgent. Not only is it urgent in all parts of Canada where the shipping act applies, but particularly in his own province. If his amendments were to carry, there are various groups in the province of Quebec that would be seriously affected.

It has been found that shipowners have experienced extreme difficulty in securing drydock facilities for annual steamship inspection, because of the greater number of ships we now have. If these two sections are not allowed to remain in the act, ships would have to be tied up, not for weeks but for months. There could not be annual inspections of hulls, machinery and equipment as required under the Canada Shipping Act. The steamship inspection board can extend that inspection from one year to two years, if it is of the opinion that hulls, machinery and equipment are in seaworthy condition and safe to sail.

There are all sorts of difficulties arising in the manning of ships in connection with certificated officers and engineers. In order to keep ships moving, it is essential that these two sections be allowed to stand as they are. I would refer to some examples which would affect the position in my hon. friend's province.

There have been repeated occasions during the winter months when the Lapointe and the McLean had to go to the assistance of people who were in difficult straits on the north shore. Had it not been for these two sections, the ships could not have gone and could not have taken the fuel, provisions and mail that these people on the north shore of the province of Quebec were awaiting.

The Magdalen islands have found themselves in similar difficult conditions; but because of these two sections it has been possible to send assistance and relief to the people of those islands, by exempting from part VII of the act certain of the necessary requirements.

I turn now to the province of Ontario where, because of this particular section, especially 488A, the extension of the summer and intermediate seasons to October 31 and December 1 for tankers between Toledo and certain other ports provided for hundreds of thousands of gallons of fuel oil. We know what the position with reference to fuel oil was last winter and what it will probably be again in the coming season. Had it not been for the relaxation of these requirements, fuel oil would have had to come by other than water transportation.

I could point to a number of occasions when paper products were sent to Corner Brook. Had the requirements been put into effect, ships would not have been able to take paper products to that part of Newfoundland. Operations under this amendment would be principally as follows:

1. Extension of certificates where lack of drydock accommodation prevents inspections being completed.

2. Acceptance of equipment considered sufficient pending delivery of required equipment on order.

3. Acceptance of surveys by competent persons considered equivalent to steamship inspections.

4. Permits for ships for occasional voyages beyond the limits of the inspection certificates.

5. Permits for ships, recently operating under certificates other than Canadian, to allow continuous service until validity of existing certificates ceases.

6. Increases in loading capacity of certain ships to carry bulk cargoes, ore, grain, coal and oil, during summer season.

7. Permits for uncertificated engineers, pending examination for certificates.

I suggest that there is every reason why these two sections should be allowed. I would point to the experience in the United Kingdom where similar sections exist and where, by virtue of the commonwealth agreements, they are bound to respect our regulations as we are bound to respect theirs.

I say, finally, that if this amendment were allowed it would create great hardship to those operating under the act, and particularly ships of this country would be tied up and would not be able to move with the dispatch that they should.

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I speak or is the debate closed? The minister has listed the circumstances under which he has the power to evade or change the law.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I just make this interruption? The minister has the power, on the recommendation of the board of steamship inspection.

Mr. HAZEN: He has the power, on recommendation of the board of steamship inspection, to make changes that are not provided for in the act. Everyone in this chamber is sent here by his constituents to make the laws of this land. Surely we are astute and capable enough to draft a bill that would cover all the circumstances the minister has just mentioned. By permitting the minister to change the law under certain circumstances, we are not living up to our constitution or parliamentary practices.

I admit that we have adopted this procedure on many occasions, but I do not think it can be justified on the grounds of convenience. When we come to draft a bill, every effort should be made to put in it the provisions we want and not put in legislative permission to the minister to change the act under certain circumstances.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is done in that way in the United Kingdom.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think that justifies it.

Mr. FLEMING: They have a socialist government over there.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That was 1906.

Mr. SPEAKER: The amendment moved by Mr. Hackett, seconded by Mr. Hazen, seeks to amend the bill as reported from the committee of the whole. Such an amendment cannot be made on the motion for third reading of a bill. The proper course would be to move that the order for third reading be discharged and the bill referred back to the committee of the whole for reconsideration. I refer the house to Beauchesne, third edition, citations 710 and 711, and May, thirteenth edition, at page 422.

I therefore rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, I realized that the amendment was out of order and I was wondering how the debate was being carried on. As the motion for third reading has been reopened by unanimous consent, I think Your Honour should consider not having third reading now and leave it so that the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) could put his amendment in proper order.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I shall have to object. I do not think the hon. member for Stanstead can say that he has been treated badly. Third reading was passed and I think it was at my own suggestion that he was given the opportunity to revert back to the order of the day. The hon. gentleman is one of the outstanding lawyers in this country; he is president of the Canadian bar association and I am sure that, after the time he has spent on the amendment, it could not be improved a great deal. I submit with deference that we should proceed.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not know just what the hon. member for Stanstead wishes to do about the matter. I understand that a bill cannot have third reading at the same sitting so he can still stop it.

Motion (Mr. Chevrier) agreed to on division, bill read the third time and passed.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Friday, May 21, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. J. L. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am rising at the earliest possible time in the budget debate in order to call the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and his colleagues in the cabinet to matters which are of great concern to the people of British Columbia in the hope that, before the budget is finally passed, it may be found possible by the federal government to take steps to alleviate the financial problems which confront my province; also, may I say, to dispel the rankling sense of injustice which is felt by my people of British Columbia as the result of being the highest taxed province in the Dominion of Canada.

Of course the house is familiar with the many natural and climatic advantages of British Columbia which are of themselves of tremendous value to our economy. There are many wonderful features which result in our having the highest per capita income in the dominion, but those same features are not wholly economic assets. Equable climate and high wages have been a lure that has drawn tens of thousands of people from the other provinces to our Pacific slopes. Younger people have gone there in a search for high wages and steady employment, while older people go there to bask in the sun in their declining years.

This rapid increase in our number can, in the long-term view, be considered an economic asset to our province, bringing as it does an increase in capital values of real estate and business concerns; but it will be realized by hon. members that sudden strain has been thrown on our provincial and municipal governments in having to provide schools, hospitals, social and domestic services to this large number of people.

From 1945 until the present these costs have been met from the provincial surplus account which was built up during the war years, when public expenditures were deferred in the interests of Canada's war effort; and I might tell the house that this surplus account of approximately $42,000,000 has now been entirely invested, either in deferred maintenance of our public works or in capital construction costs, which have built additional schools, hospitals, roads and university accommodation. In passing, may I say to hon. members that the University of British Columbia has increased its enrolment from 3,500 before the war to approximately 9,000 at the present time. These figures in themselves will give some idea of the sudden increase in the magnitude of the problems which this transition period has brought to my province.

I know the Minister of Finance may harbour the thought that the provincial authorities might have been wiser to retain part of this surplus as an emergency fund to bolster the revenue account in the event of an emergency, which now in fact has arisen; but may I point out to him that British Columbia is still a great frontier, has always been a country where the terrain enforces large highway and railroad expenditures in order that services may be provided to our scattered pockets of population. Consequently, our bonded indebtedness is now as high as prudence would indicate was desirable; and I am sure, too, that, in view of his own policy of reducing indebtedness out of surplus, the Minister of Finance cannot quarrel with provincial authorities if they are guided by his own example and follow the same course.

I would like, sir, with your permission, to read an editorial from the Vancouver Sun, not that I myself fully endorse the conclusions which are drawn, but because I believe it is in the best interests of Canadian unity that the members of this house should know how Canadians in each section of Canada feel, to be aware of our prejudices and apprehensions, as well as our great loyalties and strengths. The editorial is headed "Hello Sucker!" and reads:

Texas Guinan had a word for British Columbia. Patrons of her night club used to be smilingly greeted with, "Hello, sucker!" British Columbia qualifies for that salutation from the dominion government on the basis of the price it pays for fiscal co-operation with Ottawa.

The Vancouver Sun has obtained the figures for the seven provinces which rent taxation rights to the dominion. Here they are for the year ending last month:

	Contributes to Federal Treasury	Receives in Return
British Columbia ...	$144,386,517	$20,289,281
Alberta	47,674,232	13,205,173
Saskatchewan	33,196,561	13,681,361
Manitoba	64,778,961	12,661,301
New Brunswick	23,987,722	7,821,817
Nova Scotia	29,087,722	10,033,372
Prince Edward Island	2,306,818	1,635,189

Mr. JOHNSTON: Has the hon. member the percentages?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): It is nice to live in Prince Edward Island. The editorial continues:

A little arithmetic shows what's happening. British Columbia is discovered to be paying 42 per cent of the federal receipts in exchange for 16 per cent of the federal rents. The three prairie provinces contribute $145 million and get back $39 million—while British Columbia contributes as much as all three of them combined and gets a little over half as much.

In fact, Ottawa's collection in British Columbia alone is enough to pay off all the seven provinces and still leave Ottawa a meaty profit of $65 million.

The figures explain why British Columbia is levying a sales tax while Ottawa luxuriates in surpluses. They also explain why British Columbia is demanding that Ottawa fulfil some of the vague social welfare promises made in the Green Book.

The agreement under which this province is being mulcted runs until 1952. British Columbia signed under strong pleas from the dominion government that uniform taxation policies were essential for postwar stability.

That will give the house some idea of what the average man on the street feels in regard to the dominion-provincial taxation agreement that our province entered into. Of course I would not be prepared to endorse fully a statement of that kind, because I quite appreciate there are two sides to every story and I imagine that the Minister of Finance or his parliamentary assistant will be speaking in the debate at a later stage. I would point out to my hon. friends that that editorial was not written by the Globe and Mail but came from the Vancouver Sun, which is very fair and has consistently supported this administration.

I know, sir, that the Minister of Finance can say with truth that these provincial receipts from the federal government are only part of the complete story. He will point to family allowance payments, freight subsidies, public works expenditures, defence expenditures and a host of other federal spending within the provinces; but the fact remains that many of the residents of the one rich province which entered into the dominion-provincial agreement now feel that it was a sorry day for British Columbia when it agreed to bind itself with the other less wealthy provinces in an agreement with the federal government.

I may be asked, why did British Columbia enter into this arrangement? It must be admitted that there was no coercion used; but there was some very attractive bait held out and it was hoped that such a gesture from one of the so-called three wealthy provinces would set an example of co-operation and good will to Quebec and Ontario that might persuade them to make their contribution to Canadian unity and a more abundant life for all Canadian citizens, regardless of the province in which they happened to reside. I am sure that it was this feeling of good will and desire for higher standards of social services which prompted British Columbia's acceptance of the terms mutually agreed upon, plus the guarantee of minimum annual payments which would act as a floor to our provincial revenues in the event of an economic recession. Economic security seems to be the great goal in Canadian life today; but perhaps there is a valuable lesson to be learned there, by provincial governments as well as by individuals, that static security can be something for which we have to pay too high a price.

From the figures of provincial tax collections and receipts from the federal government, it can readily be seen that my province is making the highest per capita contribution to the federal treasury and receiving the least percentage of return. We receive approximately fifteen per cent back, compared with the next greatest contributor, Manitoba, which receives a return of approximately 20 per cent, down to the lowest—I exclude Prince Edward Island because I realize that there are special considerations affecting it—which is Saskatchewan, which receives a return from the federal treasury of approximately forty-one per cent of what it pays in, plus equal emoluments from other fields of federal expenditures. The situation can be stated perhaps more graphically on the basis of population. British Columbia, with approximately the same population as Saskatchewan, and most certainly with fewer members of parliament than Saskatchewan, contributes $124 million net to the federal treasury, while Saskatchewan contributes $19,500,000. I cannot refrain from admonishing my C.C.F. friends from Saskatchewan who sit opposite—sometimes I think they are in a happy economic fog—that they should be very careful before they make any attempts to try to eradicate private enterprise from British Columbia.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Where did the fog come from?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Not from here. The hon. members are trying to eradicate it all the time. If you do you will only be biting the hand that is assisting you, and you will also be attempting to kill the goose that lays the golden egg.

Mr. McKAY: I never saw one of these geese. What do they look like?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Come to British Columbia and you will see.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is the goose the water runs off.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I know the Minister of Finance will be quick to point out that certain actions by the federal government have caused to a degree British Columbia's high income; that our foreign loans have made possible the high levels of profit and employment in our basic industries, and, to a degree, I believe this point to be well taken. He will admit, I know, that exports from every other province have been benefited to a lesser or greater degree, as has British Columbia, by the same methods; but I would ask him carefully to study this vital point: most of our wealth in British Columbia is coming from our extractive industries; in other words, we are using up our capital assets at a time of high federal taxation, and we cannot retain enough of this wealth under our present deal to pay the cost of opening up our remaining frontiers to development, the building of vital roads and railway lines and other public works which will make our reserves of timber, coal, minerals and agricultural land accessible at an economic level of cost to enable us to compete on world markets, which we inevitably must do.

The majority of the members of this house come from the two great central provinces, and they would be less than human if they did not at times become impatient with us members from the maritimes, and the western provinces who come here to this national forum at Ottawa and speak of the handicaps under which we labour. We speak of freight rate inequalities and discriminations; we ask for lower tariffs on manufactured goods; we ask for co-operation from these two provincial governments that have chosen to remain outside the co-operative brotherhood of the dominion-provincial agreements, and they are perhaps tempted to think we are never satisfied.

To you from the two great manufacturing provinces, I would say: We do not begrudge you the necessary tariffs to enable your people to keep busy supplying us primary producers with the manufactured goods we require; only this, do not forget that our products must be sold in the competitive markets of the world; our pulp and paper, our lumber, our wheat, fish and apples, these you do not consume in adequate quantities to keep our economies solvent; you must co-operate with us economically if we are to continue to protect you behind tariff walls. There is no need for me to point out to you that in British Columbia, as in the maritimes and indeed in all the provinces which are at present co-operating with the dominion government, our natural and cheapest sources of supply for all manufactured goods is in the United States, and indeed that, too, is the natural market for most of the products which we produce.

Under the present financial arrangements with the federal government, all would be well, Mr. Speaker, if the people of British Columbia were paying the same rates of tax as the less wealthy provinces; but in order to care for our increase in expenditures, due, as I pointed out earlier, to the great increase in population, it has been necessary to place an additional tax burden on the British Columbia residents, namely a three per cent retail sales tax. As hon. members will realize, such a tax is extremely repugnant to any taxpayer anywhere; but especially is it so in British Columbia where, as I have pointed out, our per capita tax is the highest in the dominion. Another unfortunate feature of such a sales tax is that it inevitably increases our cost of production and, to that extent, impairs our competitive position in the export markets of the world upon which we must, in a large measure, depend for our livelihood.

I know the Minister of Finance will reply that perhaps the British Columbia government has gone ahead too rapidly in the field of social security measures. In reply to this, and by way of explanation, I will quote from the speech of Premier Byron Johnson, given in the British Columbia legislature on March 5 of this year. Mr. Johnson said:

> At the time the Green Book proposals were presented to us, it was estimated by the dominion government that we would have a total of 16,670 old age pensioners on our lists by 1948. I find, however, that in October of last year there were 17,768 persons in receipt of old age pensions and that now, the beginning of 1948, there are on our rolls 21,305 recipients. This figure is expected to rise to nearly 25,000 before the end of the year.

Or, as you will note, Mr. Speaker, fifty per cent over the estimate presented to them at the time the Green Book was brought out by the federal authorities. I continue with Mr. Johnson's remarks:

> Since, due to climatic conditions, the bulk of internal emigration is toward the Pacific coast, British Columbia is placed in the position of making financial concessions through a tax agreement to what has been termed "less fortunate provinces," while at the same time being compelled to assume a very great share of the social service load of other provinces because of the emigration of their people to the coast... In short, 20 per cent of the new old age pension cases assumed during the last five months of 1947 were not really British Columbia cases in the true sense.
> There has been a similar rapid rise in the number of persons receiving social allowances; that is, persons who are classified as unemployables. During the years from 1943 to 1945, inclusive, the increase was approximately 1,000 cases a year; but in 1946-47 the case-load rose by 2,000, and during the present fiscal year it is expected to rise by nearly 2,000 more . . .
> In short, the cost of these three pensions alone has risen from $4,100,000 in 1945-46 to an estimated $8,900,000 in 1948-49, or by more than 100 per cent.
> The inequality that exists between provinces with respect to social services can best be illustrated when it is pointed out that, despite British Columbia's rise in population, the per capita cost of these services has risen from $1.60 in 1944-45 to $2.07 in 1946-47. This is in contrast to Saskatchewan, where the per capita cost has risen merely from 56 cents to 76 cents.

I think they must all drift out to British Columbia when they reach the age where they qualify for social allowances. I continue:

> Finally, in reviewing all social services, including both health and welfare, it was found that costs had risen from $9,300,000 in 1945-46 to an estimated $19,346,000 for 1948-49, or an increase of approximately $10,000,000 or more than 100 per cent.
> I do not think that anyone would suggest that curtailment of expenditures should take place in our social services. It seemed to me, therefore, that if the dominion government, by virtue of our withdrawal from the income, corporation, and succession duty tax fields could collect $139,958,000 from this province during the fiscal year ended March 31st, 1947, and pay back to the province approximately $23,000,000, or only 16 per cent of what they collected, it was reasonable to expect that the social security proposals of the Green Book should be implemented, if only partially.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the views of the Liberal Premier of British Columbia. I am sure that the Minister of Finance, if he were in his seat at the moment, and the parliamentary assistant to the minister who comes from British Columbia, would both say that our premier is a man of unimpeachable integrity and sound business judgment.

Mr. JOHNSTON: They will be the last to do anything.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I think the hon. member is getting a bit worked up. There is no point in merely urging complaints without offering some solution; and I shall try to keep my suggestions for budget revisions to orthodox practices, which I am sure are the only kind that our present Minister of Finance will accept, in any event. Let us first examine the 1947-48 surplus as reported by the Minister of Finance last Tuesday. He said it amounted to $650 million which, as he said, was a figure to gladden the heart of any minister of finance. In my view that was a very modest statement.

I am sure that Canadians generally will take encouragement from the fact that our heavy tax payments were not entirely dissipated by federal expenditure, but let me express my own personal views in regard to this surplus.

First of all, it was approximately $500 million more than was estimated by himself in conjunction with his financial advisers and experts, and this huge surplus does not, in my opinion, prove that they were bad guessers. It resulted almost entirely from the processes of inflation and merely reflects the fallacious over-confidence of the government that they would be able to control inflation in Canada.

Their inability to control inflation in Canada to the degree which they expected resulted in high costs, higher wages, higher provincial expenditures and provincial deficits, but in the case of the federal government the net result was a $500 million increase in the expected surplus.

This surplus, by no stretch of anyone's imagination or conscience, can be assumed to be solely the property of the dominion government; surely the provincial governments should have a little consideration shown them. I admit that when we retire federal debt we are repaying debts which every citizen in Canada owes; but surely when the senior government has a surplus and there is personal and municipal and provincial hardship because of conditions which created that surplus, then I submit that the guilty conscience of the finance minister should have spurred him to display "a humble and contrite heart" in consulting the provinces as to how a part of this huge and unexpected surplus could be used to mitigate the burden of more junior taxing authorities.

Despite what I have said regarding the apparent inequalities of British Columbia's tax payments, I appreciate the fact that the minister must treat all provinces, rich and poor, on the same basis, and I would not ask him to do otherwise.

This is what I suggest that he do immediately:

1. Set up a federal highway commission which would designate the highways to be considered as links in the trans-Canada highway system.

2. Pay in cash to the provinces twenty-five per cent of the capital and maintenance cost which they have spent on these highways during the past ten years.

3. Offer to contribute twenty-five per cent to the capital and maintenance costs of any such designated new highways if undertaken at any time, with the further proviso that such commission have authority to contribute up to 50 per cent of the capital costs of such federal highway construction, if undertaken at the instance of the federal government when surplus labour and material are available.

4. Make money available to provincial governments at cost of 2¾ per cent for construction costs of schools and hospitals, interest only to be deducted from the provincial grants for a transitional period of ten years, after that time amortization to start over a period of the next forty years.

5. An agreement with the provinces to be entered into which will guarantee a minimum return of twenty per cent of corporate and personal income tax collections in that province.

Mr. Speaker, the creation of such a federal or trans-Canada highway board is a step which I am sure would meet with the approval of every member of this house, as may be confirmed by reference to speeches made by members on all sides during the past years. The arguments are too numerous and too well known for me to repeat them at this time, but I know that every Canadian looks forward to the day when there will be a highway across Canada, from sea to sea, from Yarmouth in Nova Scotia to Tofino on the west coast of Vancouver island.

I advance these proposals to the federal government in the hope that they will give them serious study and consideration. Some means must be found to assist and guide our junior governments. It is idle to talk of 1941 provincial tax collections as a valid basis for discussion; since that date, great changes have taken place in productivity, population, and capital investment as between the various provinces and, moreover, we no longer are speaking of the same dollar. It used to mean 100 cents; its purchasing power in labour and materials is now only sixty cents.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I express the hope that this government will immediately re-examine the position of the provinces; and I am confident that, with tolerance, sympathy and understanding on both sides, a fair and reasonable compromise can be arrived at.

Mr. W. ROSS THATCHER (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to compliment the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) on the speech he has just delivered. It was one of the best I have heard him give. I hope, of course, he will vote in the manner he spoke. If he does, I am sure he will vote against the budget which is before us today.

Despite what most members of the house probably think about the budget before us today, I am sure all will agree that last Tuesday evening, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) delivered a comprehensive and lucid statement. It is almost certain, I think, that this budget will reach a new high as an unpopular measure, and in view of that fact the minister is to be complimented on having had the personal courage to proceed with it as he did.

Having prefaced my remarks with that comment, I must say that in my opinion this budget is unnecessarily harsh. Seldom in recent years have the Canadian people waited for a budget with such eagerness, but I am sure that never in recent years have they been disappointed so thoroughly and completely.

In a nutshell, what does this budget report and what does it propose? It reports, in the first place, a surplus which is larger than all the surpluses which we have had, put together, since confederation. It reports, in the second place, that the recent year was as prosperous economically as we have ever had. Yet, despite these facts, the minister has the audacity to come to parliament, and suggest that next year Canadian taxpayers shall be given no relief of any consequence.

This group cannot concur with that recommendation. We believe that the rising cost of living has made it imperative that taxpayers, particularly those in the lower categories, shall be given tax relief at this time. If parliament refuses to grant this concession within the next few days, I think unnecessary hardships are bound to result.

I find the figures on the revenue side of the budget most revealing. Hon. members who heard the budget speech last year will remember that the minister said, as reported at page 2610 of Hansard:

> Behind us are the huge and difficult budgets of the war years.

"Behind us"; and yet during the recent fiscal year the minister collected in taxes from the Canadian people $2,630 million. During the last year of the war the government's tax revenues were only $2,374 million. In other words, in the past year Canadians were taxed more heavily by $256 million than in the last year of the war. I find it hard it reconcile that fact with the promise the minister gave last year that the huge budgets of the war years were behind us. The burden of taxation can be realized when we compare it with our taxes in 1938, the last year of peace. In that year our taxes were $516 million, or only one-fifth of their present level.

An hon. MEMBER: What about income?

Mr. THATCHER: I am talking about taxes. During the war years Canadians willingly paid high taxes and made many sacrifices. But the war has been over three years. I do not think it was ever contemplated that huge governmental taxes should roll forward indefinitely into the years of peace. Every member of parliament should realize that the people of Canada are aroused over the fact that parliament has not seen fit to give them some decrease in taxation at this time.

The expenditure side of the ledger is also disconcerting when you look at the budget. The minister reports little progress in reducing the cost of government. Last year the total expenditure amounted to $2,124 million, and in his budget speech the minister said, as reported at page 4057 of Hansard:

> We have striven to bring expenditures down and to keep them down.

Yet in the next breath he forecast, for the coming year, general expenditures amounting to $51,000,000 more than last year. Furthermore, he forecast that there would be additional expenditures to be announced later in the year. At a time when approximately twenty per cent of the national income is going into federal taxation, many Canadians are wondering whether the government is doing all that is possible to curtail its ordinary expenditures.

The minister informed the house that this year we shall have a surplus of $727 million. While we are on these surpluses, it is interesting to remember that last session the minister forecast a surplus of only $190 million. In other words, in his calculations he apparently made an error of $537 million. If he has made the same error this year, we shall have a surplus of over one billion dollars in the coming fiscal period.

Mr. MAYHEW: He listened to your gloomy forecasts of last year.

Mr. THATCHER: I must say that I agree with the principle of budgeting for a surplus in times of prosperity, with certain qualifications. On the other hand I want to say that this surplus has not been achieved by economies; rather it has been achieved, in large part, by imposing vicious indirect sales and excise taxes; by refusing the taxpayer any relief from excessive personal income tax; by failing to carry out an adequate system of social services; and by refusing to go ahead with such projects as were mentioned by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, namely a trans-Canada highway, irrigation works in the west and things like that. I am sure this budget will go down in history as a monument to government neglect. I think the minister should not be too proud of the surplus he is showing us today.

However, after he achieved the surplus, most Canadians thought they would be given some tax relief, and I think justifiably so. Yet the tax relief which the minister is proposing for 1948-49 is almost negligible. Suppose we look at the tax relief for a moment. First of all, the minister announced he is going to remove the sales tax on certain foodstuffs. That is a trifling concession, although it is welcome.

Mr. MAYHEW: On all foodstuffs.

Mr. THATCHER: No.

Mr. MAYHEW: On what has it not been taken off?

Mr. THATCHER: It has not been taken off pickles and certain other things. It has not been completely removed. However, whatever those concessions were, we welcome them although, as I say, they are trifling.

Mr. MAYHEW: Yes, I believe the tax still remains on pickles.

Mr. THATCHER: The great tragedy of the matter is that without ceilings, it is doubtful whether these savings will be passed on to the consumer. It seems quite probable that the food dealers will absorb a good part of them. I do not think this sales tax cut on food will mean a great deal to the ordinary taxpayer.

Then let us look at the amusement tax, the next tax which the minister is taking off. Surely it is a strange policy which would deny tax relief to the wage earner in the low brackets and at the same time would remove the tax on gambling, night clubs and parimutuels.

Mr. SINCLAIR: He was asked for that.

Mr. THATCHER: It could be, but I doubt it. Even if this policy was a wise one, in almost every case the provincial government has moved into that field. Premier Drew announced next day that he was moving in.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What about Premier Douglas?

Mr. THATCHER: He has not moved in.

Mr. SINCLAIR: He is slow.

Mr. THATCHER: Not at all, but probably British Columbia has imposed the tax. I suggest that this tax on amusements will not be passed on to the consumer in most cases, so that it means very little to him.

The minister announced cuts in the British tariff on rayons and and cotton piece goods. Let me say that this concession is most welcome. But once again, without price ceilings, I do not think these concessions will reach the consumer. I am much afraid they will be absorbed by the dealers in those commodities, whether they be wholesalers, retailers or agents.

The minister announced that he was going to reduce the succession duty tax. Henceforth, when anyone dies, his estate will not be taxed if it is not one of $50,000 or over. Formerly it was taxed if it was $5,000 or over. It seems strange to me that a man must die in order to get tax relief from the Liberal government, but apparently that is the case.

The minister announced a few other trifling concessions. He said he was taking the tax off vinegar, silver ware and alarm clocks. The hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Knight) received a letter about this alarm clock concession, and I should like to read a quotation from it, which is as follows:

> Someone should send Mr. Abbott an alarm clock at the reduced rate in order to wake him up to the needs of the people.

That sums up the matter quite well. In other words, I suggest that the tax concessions the minister has made in this budget are trifling. They do not mean much to the average taxpayer. With regard to personal income tax, the only concession the minister made was to people sixty-five years of age and over; he gave them an increased exemption of $500. But the great majority of taxpayers were given absolutely no relief whatever. Indeed, instead of relief, today they are forced to pay stiffer penalties if they should happen to be late in filing their income tax forms. With the ever increasing cost of living, the income tax has almost reached the point of confiscation. The real income of many citizens has been cut so much by inflation that some families cannot afford to buy milk, cannot afford to buy—

Mr. SINCLAIR: Butter.

Mr. THATCHER: Yes, that is a good illustration; or oleomargarine or other essential foodstuffs. Refusal on the part of the government to give to people in this category tax relief at this time can only be characterized as heartless. The government's treatment of the small wage earner is to be deplored all the more when we remember that, at the first of the year, they took off the excess profits tax, and they took it off at a time when corporation profits were higher, probably, than they have ever been in our history.

Mr. SINCLAIR: They are paying taxes.

Mr. THATCHER: They are not paying excess profits taxes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What about Moose Jaw Hardware?

An hon. MEMBER: They are not making profits.

Mr. THATCHER: By refusing relief at this time, the government is riding roughshod over the wishes of ninety-nine per cent of the adult population of this country.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. THATCHER: Mr. Speaker, in view of the scarcity of their numbers in the chamber, I am afraid I am going to have a little trouble in convincing many Liberals tonight. However, when the house rose at six o'clock I was discussing the failure of the government to give tax relief in this budget to the people of Canada, at a time when the government has shown an overwhelming surplus of $727 million.

I had stated that in my opinion this budget is unnecessarily harsh. It has given little or no tax relief to Canadians at a time when the cost of living has rendered such relief imperative. I suggested, moreover, that in refusing this relief the government is riding roughshod over the wishes of about ninety-nine per cent of the adult population.

I suggest now that for a few moments we should look at the reasons the minister gave in his budget speech for refusing tax relief.

His first reason was the need to pay off some of the national debt. To a degree I can go along with that policy. In times of prosperity it is only sensible that some of the debt we accumulated during war years should be paid off. But I believe there is a point of balance between desirable debt reduction and the public's ability to pay it. The minister does not seem to have found that balance. It is one thing to skim off surplus excess earnings and quite another thing to impoverish large parts of the population in the process of skimming. I suggest that the minister could have given reasonable tax relief, at least in the lower brackets, without seriously impairing his debt reduction program.

The second reason the minister gave for refusing tax relief had to do with defence. I quote from page 4063 of Hansard where he says:

> We face today very great uncertainties in international affairs . . . A substantial surplus will help to keep our powder dry.

The minister implied that Canada has certain military responsibilities which she must look after, in a democratic world. On the surface that reason looks fairly plausible. But I find, as I read the page a little farther down, that the minister this year is budgeting $20,000,000 less for defence expenditures than he did last year. I find it hard to understand this fact, if the peril to Canada is as alarming as he says it is. It strikes me that he is not suiting his actions to his words.

The minister stated, in the third place, that high taxes were necessary to combat inflation. Once again I quote from his speech, as it appears in Hansard:

> We should deliberately budget, as a matter of policy, for substantial surpluses in times like these. Only that way can we hold inflationary forces in check.

I ask the house to note that. I think the minister knows that statement is not correct. The suggestion that high taxation is the most effective way of controlling inflation is worn out. High taxation in the past few years has not prevented prices from going up; nor will high taxes in the future prevent inflation from continuing. It contributes to the inflationary spiral, instead of taking away from it and stopping it.

Surely the minister would not suggest to the house that a policy of giving a little tax relief to small wage earners might start an orgy of buying. The government's taxation policy, instead of stopping inflation, is adding to it. Such taxes as the sales tax and the excise tax contribute directly to the high cost of living. If the government is really sincere in its desire to fight inflation at this time I suggest that it set an example by removing some of these indirect taxes.

Then it seems to me that the minister is being inconsistent when, on the one hand, he makes the claim that taxes cannot be reduced because it would place extra purchasing power in the hands of the taxpayers, thereby raising the cost of living, but on the other hand—just a little later in his budget—tells us he is going to give an extra year's compulsory savings back to Canadians who paid them originally. That will release about $80,000,000 extra purchasing power the minister did not have to release.

The minister cannot have it both ways. If it is possible to risk redistributing $80,000,000 in that manner, then surely there could have been a reduction in taxes.

I suggest to the house, that inflation could have been controlled much more effectively and much more equitably by price control, than it has been by high taxation. At page 4057 of Hansard, the minister made this statement:

> It would have been more comfortable had we been able to return to a free price system under general conditions of stability, balanced production and abundant imports.

Of course it would. That is precisely what this party has been trying to point out for two years, both in parliament and out of parliament. Then the minister went on to say that he could not keep controls because, "fate did not afford us that opportunity."

Well, that statement is hardly correct. It was not fate which took off controls prematurely; it was the Liberal party. Today we are seeing the folly of that action. Canadian citizens are paying heavily for the error in judgment which the Liberal party made.

The other day the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) described the prices committee as a fiasco. From the view point of the Progressive Conservative party, perhaps it is a fiasco. Certainly I do not think their members have been anxious to make it a success. Certainly the findings of the prices committee—

Mr. FLEMING: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has cast a reflection upon the Progressive Conservative members of the prices committee, saying that he did not believe they wanted to make a success of the committee. That is a reflection, and I ask the hon. member to withdraw it.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is a fair statement.

Mr. THATCHER: I said it did not seem to me they were trying to make it a success.

Mr. FLEMING: I still object.

Mr. THATCHER: I shall withdraw it; I meant to say it did not seem that way to me. Certainly the findings of the committee have been harmful to the political philosophy in which the Progressive Conservative party believes. Perhaps in that regard it has been a fiasco.

[Mr. Thatcher.]

When the prices committee was originally set up, the C.C.F. group argued that this was not the way to solve Canada's inflation problem. We are still of the same opinion. We believe that only the reimposition of price controls can cope with the inflation problem; and I think that contention has been borne out by the facts.

Last year the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) told us in debate that prices would stabilize around an index of 146. The index has climbed steadily, until today it is 151, and it is still going up.

However, once the prices committee was set up, members of this group have tried to make it useful. Our members attended regularly. Personally I believe the committee has done some valuable work. I believe by this time it has discovered, beyond any reasonable doubt, the main reason for the ever-rising cost of living. Because of the devastation of the war, and because of the abnormal conditions arising from the war, the demand for most goods has been far in excess of the supply. Under these circumstances regular competition is not functioning to keep prices down.

In the committee, one witness after another has freely admitted taking advantage of shortages to make the largest possible profits. That is natural under the present economic set-up. In the committee I asked one witness after another to suggest some voluntary way in which we could bring prices down. Not one witness has, to my knowledge, given us any idea of how this could be done voluntarily.

Mr. BOUCHER: On a point of order, I do not think the hon. member is allowed to discuss the evidence given before a committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: I was going to call that to the hon. member's attention. I do not believe that he is permitted to discuss the evidence before a committee. It has been agreed that hon. members may discuss the general situation with respect to prices, but they should not discuss what is going on in the committee.

Mr. THATCHER: Before you insist upon that ruling, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might make several comments?

Mr. BOUCHER: Just stick to the rules of the house.

Mr. THATCHER: In the first place, I would state that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario mentioned prices the other day. In the second place, the Minister of Finance has stated that high taxation is the way to control inflation. My argument is that price controls would be a more effective way. In the third place, when the prices committee was set up, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said, if I understood him correctly, that debate in the house on the subject would not be precluded.

I have not very much more to say about the matter, but I should like to put my opinion on record. I believe it is a better way of controlling inflation than the budget of the Minister of Finance. If that is satisfactory, I shall proceed; if I am out of order, I shall stop.

When the committee was set up, the Prime Minister suggested that the glare of unfavourable publicity would probably bring down prices. I think the proceedings have shown that that hope is futile. The committee has found why prices are up and, if the government will give the committee teeth, I think we can get prices down.

Mr. BOUCHER: Is all this in order?

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask the hon. gentleman again not to discuss what has gone on in the prices committee.

Mr. THATCHER: Thank you. I will not mention the discussions again. The Minister of Finance has told us repeatedly that our economy is tied up with the economy of the United States. During the last month costs and prices in that country have gone up to a higher level than ever before. The federal reserve board is predicting that inflationary pressure in the United States will be greater in the last six months of this year than it was in the first six months. That is caused by the huge European recovery program together with a tremendous $14,000 million expenditure for military affairs which the United States are making.

So serious has the situation become in the United States, that the President's economic advisory committee recently recommended price controls, as the only effective way to stop run-away inflation in that country. Here in Canada the situation is similar, and it seems to me the government is being very stubborn when it refuses to recognize that fact. No one likes controls. When the supply of merchandise and produce can catch up with the demand, by all means get rid of controls; but until that time let us be sensible. Let the government admit they erred; let them, even at this late moment, have the courage to correct their error. Let us stop this steady rise in the cost of living.

The fourth reason the minister gave for keeping taxation high was to conserve United States dollars, and that suggestion struck me as the weakest argument of all. Surely the export-import controls which parliament set up a few months ago should be able to do this effectively. On page 4063 of Hansard the minister states:

> We must build up an export surplus—we must try to export more or import less, or both.

Despite that statement, despite the fact that the minister says he needs United States dollars very badly, in his budget he overlooks the huge amount of United States dollars which are available, if the embargo on Canadian cattle and other agricultural products entering the United States is lifted. This would be a lucrative source of United States exchange, some people estimating it at $100,000,000. If we need United States dollars so badly, why is the minister neglecting that source? The minister is always talking about a free economy. It seems strange to me that all controls have been taken off except those which affect the farmer.

For these reasons this group cannot agree with the minister in his contention that the taxpayer should not be given any relief at this time. Along with the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, I must say I am wondering whether tax relief is being held over until next year for partly political reasons. Certainly, if substantial tax reductions were given a year from now they could be translated more effectively into political advantage. I suggest that this budget is not a human budget; I think it could be better described as a Tory budget.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Next year's budget.

Mr. THATCHER: There is only one other matter I should like to deal with. I am sorry the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario is not in his seat at the moment. On page 4249 of Hansard the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario implied that democratic socialism—in Canada the C.C.F. party—is similar to nazism, fascism and communism. The hon. member is a man whom I personally admire very much, and I regret that he should have made a suggestion of that kind, because I realize he knows it is not correct. As every hon. member in this house knows, the C.C.F. party has refused time and again to co-operate in any way with communism or with any other ism.

Mr. BOUCHER: Or with anybody else.

Mr. THATCHER: I wish to say to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario that I consider our party as being more democratic than his. I think it was beneath the dignity of the hon. member to try intentionally to smear the C.C.F. party.

I should like to close with a few words in French which possibly my hon. friends to the right will not be able to understand.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I would like to end my speech tonight with a few words on a very important matter and, as my remarks are meant particularly for the Canadians of French extraction, I shall speak in French.

There are some people in Canada—there are even some in this House of Commons, such as the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell)—who still confuse the C.C.F. party with the communists.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Hear, hear!

Mr. THATCHER: In view of the international situation, I would like to state as clearly as possible the position of our party as far as communism is concerned.

Mr. GRAYDON: The communists are with you.

Mr. THATCHER: The hon. member is wrong there. I wish to stress the fact that there are fundamental differences between democratic socialism and communism, in so far as their respective ideologies, objects and methods are concerned.

To begin with, we of the C.C.F. party believe first and foremost in democracy and individual freedom. If we cannot attain our ends through the polls we shall not gain them at all.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Hear, hear!

Mr. THATCHER: The communists believe that the end justifies the means. They adopted totalitarianism; regimented the individual and destroyed personal freedom. We unreservedly denounce any party which advocates the use of force. Such methods are abhorred by the C.C.F.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. THATCHER: The second difference, and that, I believe, applies to many of us, is that we, democratic socialists, fundamentally believe in the laws and teachings of the Christian church while on the other hand, communists have placed materialism above religion.

In the third place, communists in Canada are teaching a philosophy which advocates loyalty to a foreign state first of all, and loyalty to Canada afterwards. The members of the C.C.F. party can no more endorse such a principle than can the members of other political parties in this house.

In the fourth place, the communist party advocates complete state ownership. The C.C.F., on the contrary, believes that only some parts of our economy should be socialized, such as natural resources, industrial and other monopolies.

[Mr. Thatcher.]

Discussing the budget last year in the legislature of my province, Premier T. C. Douglas spoke as follows:

> I have inquired into the communist party and studied Karl Marx. Knowing their philosophy, I feel it is false and I believe it is wrong from the economic, moral and sociological standpoints.

Last January 22, Mr. M. J. Coldwell, the leader of our group, speaking over the C.B.C. network, said:

> There is a fundamental difference between the methods and philosophy of the C.C.F. and those advocated by communists; we have always opposed every form of dictatorship; we loathe communist methods.

I believe, firmly indeed, that in this country, the C.C.F. will be in the vanguard of any struggle against totalitarian communism.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Hear, hear!

Mr. THATCHER: At the same time, it is not enough to behave as Premier Duplessis, Premier Drew and others have done in various parts of Canada, that is, to label everything progressive as communist. Such a policy, more surely than anything else, will beget communism.

(Text):

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the house is engaged in the discussion of a travesty of a budget. The esteemed leader of the Progressive Conservative party has properly described it as the worst budget since confederation, and we of the Progressive Conservative party are one in denouncing this budget as a shockingly harsh imposition on the Canadian people.

A year ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) boasted of his budget surplus, but the budget surplus he reported to the house last Tuesday evening is apparently proving something of an embarrassment to him. Whence did this surplus come? In the first place, it is the product of very bad budgeting. It represents an all-time high in inaccurate budgeting. What was forecast a year ago as a budget surplus of $190 million, now appears as a surplus of $670 million, or a cash surplus of $1,181 million. Yes, one way it is three and a half times what was forecast, and the other way it is six times as much as was forecast. It is impossible, therefore, for any member of this house to approach the present budget and its forecasts with any measure of confidence in the size of budget surplus that has been forecast by the Minister of Finance.

Where did this budget surplus come from? What is the source of it? The source is the very same source from which the government always obtains its money. It has no magic source of money. The source from which the government gets its money is the pockets of the people, and in this case, what we find is that a surplus has been created because the government dipped far more deeply into the pockets of the people than there was any need for their doing. And now the Minister of Finance says: I am going to budget for a further surplus, a surplus of $489 million. If his forecast is no more accurate than that of a year ago we may expect a year hence that he will be announcing a budget surplus anywhere from one and a half to two billion dollars, if the same ratio of inaccuracy is maintained.

The taxpayer deserves a break, not the beating that this government is giving to him. The reductions are so trifling as to be insignificant in relation to the size of the tax load that is being maintained on the back of the taxpayer, and they are trifling in relation to the needs of the taxpayer. Never has there been a stronger case than today for tax reductions; but the Minister of Finance, apart from insignificant little reductions, has slammed shut the door in the face of the taxpayer who has asked and rightly expected some substantial reduction in the load of taxation.

The authors of this budget have shown they do not know anything about the problems of those who are called upon to pay these shockingly heavy imposts. They just do not know, for they could not possibly justify these tax proposals if they did. It will, I am sure, shock every member of this house to find the Minister of Finance saying, as he did on May 18, at page 4057 of Hansard:

> There will never be a better time to reduce the burden of our national debt. We can do it now without hardship.

I say, Mr. Speaker, he cannot do it on this scale without hardship. He has been pursuing this policy in recent years, not without hardship, but at the expense of hardship on the Canadian people. There is hardship now on the part of hundreds of thousands of Canadians in trying to make both ends meet; but apparently the Minister of Finance and the members of the government are so far removed from the experience of the rank and file of the Canadian peple in meeting their family budgetary problems, that they just do not know anything about the problems these families are experiencing in trying to make both ends meet.

This weight of taxation, not suddenly imposed, but continued year after year after year, from war into peace, and now after three years of peace carried into the fourth year of peace, represents confiscation. It can no longer be called taxation; it is now confiscation. In the case of a great many Canadians it represents today a capital levy, because there are many families in Canada living on a small income who simply cannot meet the high cost of living and the burden of taxation without having to borrow on their insurance policies and try to get by in that way. These continued imposts represent a capital levy in the case of these people. But the government apparently does not know anything about the plight of the people who are living today on a small income. It does not seem to realize what the vaulting cost of living means to these people, the wage earners and those who are living on a low, fixed salary.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, this budget is likely to defeat one of the purposes which the minister professed in introducing it. It is likely to lead to more labour unrest. It cannot fail to evoke, on the part of many sections of labour, demands for increased wages in order that they may meet this double load of the high cost of living and high taxation, and to the extent that it may give rise to labour unrest it will set back production and give a further fillip to inflation.

There is the further factor to which this government is both deaf and blind. It is the fact that the people want tax reductions. Who is supreme in this country, Mr. Speaker? Is it the government, this group of nineteen men, or is it the people of Canada, the people who are paying the shot? Those of us who are perhaps a little old-fashioned in our views thought the people were supposed to be supreme; and one might have hoped, if that were true, that the views of the people in demanding relief from this load of taxation might have been heard and that the government might have given some heed to this clamour for relief from the load of taxation. But apparently it is not to be so with this government. This is a different kind of government. With this government in office, it seems that the people are not supreme. The government fancies itself supreme and, no matter what the people may think, no matter what they may rightly and justly expect and demand, this government is nevertheless saying to them: No, you shall have no reductions.

I happened to be in Washington during the Easter recess, on the day on which congress overrode the President's veto of its tax reduction bill. That was a victory of the people. That was a victory of public opinion over the executive branch of government, and I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is high time we in this country had a victory of public opinion over the dictates of the executive branch of government here. Our system of government is not like that which obtains in the United States. Apparently the only way that the people of Canada can have an opportunity of asserting public opinion, when this government is too deaf to hear or too blind to read the signs of the times, is by recourse to the ballot; therefore this party has in its amendment challenged this government to carry this issue to the people in a general election. This is a government that has been far too long in office now for the good of Canada.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): What have you to offer in its place?

Mr. FLEMING: A government that will be just 100 per cent improvement over the ramshackle, dying government at present on the treasury benches will take its place.

This budget also raises searching questions as to the fundamental and underlying purpose of taxes. The theory, recognized from the beginning of responsible government until the present time, until the era of this government, has been that taxes were an impost upon the people to meet the legitimate expenses of government. But, apparently we have to recast our thinking entirely in the light of this budget, because it bears no relationship whatsoever to the needs of meeting legitimate expenses of government. This house will not cavil about meeting those expenses, but it will cavil about being asked to levy upon the Canadian people such an additional amount as bears no relationship whatever to the legitimate expenses of government or to the needs of retirement of the national debt in due time.

Yes, back of this budget is a fetish, which apparently has seized hold of this government, that somehow it is its duty to prevent the people of Canada from using their own money. Whose money is it, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Canada are toiling to earn? The government thinks this money is its own and it has first call on it, and the poor wage earners may take what is left. The people of Canada, I affirm, do not need the paternalistic intrusion of this government into their affairs to help them manage their own finances in their own family budgets. They do not need this government to step in to try to prevent them from using their own money, whether by way of satisfying their own obligations or saving or spending their money.

The Minister of Finance has assumed, all the way through his budget speech, that the money would be used entirely by the people of Canada, whatever would be saved to them in reduction of taxes, by running out and spending it at once. He does not know the Canadian people, and neither does any member of the government who supports this budget on that basis. The Canadian people know best what to do with their own affairs and what to do with their own earnings, and if there is any undue disposition on the part of any to spend today it is probably due in no small measure to the way this government has discouraged their saving money and being thrifty.

Yes, this budget has all the earmarks of paternalism; it has all the earmarks of robbery when one considers the proper sphere of taxation in meeting the legitimate expenditures of government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would suggest to the hon. member that he modify his language.

Mr. FLEMING: Mr. Speaker, the government says in effect to the taxpayers: It is a good thing for you that we are taking your money from you—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I cannot permit any hon. member to use the word "robbery", and to suggest that the government robs the people. I would ask the hon. member to withdraw that.

Mr. FLEMING: Certainly I will withdraw the word, Mr. Speaker, if you say so. I have heard it used in the house before, but I will certainly withdraw it if you say so and I will substitute for it, "the absolutely unjustified and unconstitutional imposition".

Indeed, it is the kind of budget that is the product of the brain trust. It is not taxation; it is not a budget to be measured in terms of taxation. It has no relationship to taxation needs. You can think of this, Mr. Speaker, only in terms of confiscation; and it springs out of a desire to foist upon Canada a scheme of managed economy. This budget is intended to be a weapon in foisting a managed economy upon Canada.

It is not new to find the government pursuing the path of managed economy. Here is a member of the government on the C.B.C. network last August 6 speaking on behalf of the Liberal party:

> My guess is that any future government in Canada, whatever its political complexion, will resort to some type of economic planning.

These are the words of Senator Robertson, the government leader in the senate. In this budget, Mr. Speaker, you see some of the fruits of that mentality on the part of the government, a mentality that believes in the managed economy. Here is an expression that the Minister of Finance has used, which I suggest has some significance. At page 4063 of Hansard, he is reported as saying:

> This government and this parliament must accept a considerable measure of responsibility for influencing and, indeed, directing economic trends in so far as that can be done within the framework of our political and economic principles.

Further on, he refers to the government as:

> Those charged with responsibility of directing the affairs of the nation as a whole.

No one will have any objection to the efficient management of the affairs of the Dominion of Canada within the proper sphere of government; but where we take issue, and complete issue, with this budget is that it intrudes into the affairs of the people; it intrudes into their private affairs, and seeks to set the government up in the management of these private affairs. I ask the minister to listen to his own words as recorded at page 4056 of Hansard:

> Neither this government nor this parliament has either the political mandate or the constitutional power to maintain indefinitely in peacetime a strait-jacket of controls over prices, production and distribution. Our whole economy has been organized to operate on a price basis by private incentives and private initiatives, not by centralized direction. I believe that the great majority of Canadians want it to work that way, want it to work by free and open competition and not by government direction on the one hand nor on the other hand by direction of the irresponsible power of monopolies, cartels and other organized groups.

These are good words, Mr. Speaker. I just wish that the minister would apply them to this bare-faced attempt to further the schemes of those who believe in the managed economy. This government has no mandate from the people of Canada to impose a system of managed economy upon this country.

It is just impossible to conceive that any government would bring in so bad and so harsh a budget unless it had some card up its sleeve; and therefore we are left to think that the card is to be played in 1949 with some reductions then, on which the government will seek to make a grandstand show on the eve of a general election. Well, they insult the intelligence and the memory of the people of Canada if they think they are going to live down the recollection of this woeful budget so soon. Yes, retribution will await this government whenever it dares to submit itself to the Canadian people.

This budget is an irresponsible budget. It has been born in the same kind of mind as conceived, first, those dictatorial import restrictions last fall, and, second, taxation by radio, that gross invasion of the constitutional privileges of Canadians. It is the same mentality at work. There has been no reform since November 17, 1947. This country and this government are in the grip of those who believe in the managed economy. I for one do not believe in the managed economy. One reason I do not believe in it is that there is not enough intelligence in any man's mind, or in the mind of any small group of men to manage the whole of the Canadian economy. In the second place, Mr. Speaker, it is far too dangerous to be risked, because any mistake made, where you have a system of managed economy, is on so vast a scale that the results are bound to be catastrophic. We are not without experience in Canada of the colossal scale on which the effects of the blunders of the managed economy theorists are likely to make themselves felt. We have had a sample of it in this country since the great blunder in the middle of 1946 and the constant flight of United States dollars from Canada ever since, a flight and a policy which almost brought this country to economic ruin in 1947.

Let me examine ever so briefly some of the reasons put forward by the Minister of Finance. He has trotted out the bogey of inflation and has suggested that this budget is likely in some way to assist in deterring the inflationary processes now at work. We have inflation now. This kind of taxation has not restrained the processes of inflation. The minister has the idea, and I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, it is a fundamental fallacy in his whole approach to the problem, that if he helps to boost prices higher by adding more taxes he will help to restrain the inflationary process.

The suggestion is so utterly foolish on the face of it that it amazes one that it should be put forward by a minister in this house. The minister had a great opportunity, the opportunity of a lifetime, to reduce taxation and make a substantial contribution to the reduction in the cost of living. Yes, he could have done much to mitigate the present rigours of inflation which are bearing so heavily upon persons of small means and small fixed incomes in Canada. If the removal of the sales tax on prepared foods was sound, then, Mr. Speaker, why would it not be sound to extend that removal to a great many other commodities which enter into the cost of living of the Canadian family?

The minister has sought to continue, yes, and has justified the continued imposition of these hidden consumer taxes which bear relatively so much more heavily on the man of small means, because they are consumer taxes. These taxes levied at the source, on the manufacturer, go on pyramiding as they pass from one hand to another, until the sales tax, starting at eight per cent in the hands of the manufacturer, is invariably about fifteen per cent when the consumer pays the price of the goods over the counter. In addition to that, you have all the excise taxes that go on heaping burden upon burden on the ultimate consumer with every hand through which they travel.

What about economy? If only we could have some evidence on the part of the government that it believes in economy and is making an honest, frank effort to approach the problem with a view to effecting reasonable economies in the operation of government; not to do away with essential services, but to grapple with the problem of eliminating unnecessary expenditures of government! A government which has the belief that it is contributing to the restraint of the processes of inflation by boosting prices through the inclusion of high taxes in them, is certainly not the kind of government that has the ghost of a chance of doing anything to effect necessary economies in the cost of government.

By entertaining such a belief, the government has disabled itself before it even starts. There is no use in expecting economy from this government when it has started already with the idea that it is restraining inflation by heaping taxation on top of the high prices of commodities today.

We believe that within reasonable limits the idea of putting aside a surplus when times are good, and reducing the debt when times are good, is sound, but not when you find it on the scale practised here. What would the individual do? An individual who has some idea of his responsibility puts aside some money for the rainy day. But have we any assurance that this government, simply because it is soaking the taxpayer today far beyond its own needs, will give any benefit to the taxpayer when times are not so good? Should a recession come, is there any assurance that there will be a reduction in taxation?

There is no such assurance. As a matter of fact, when that time comes we may find pressures at work in the other direction. If it is the kind of government that we have today—which heaven forbid!—the government would say: Well, we have increased expenditures now to meet additional costs; therefore we must keep up the taxes to meet the cost. And the government will just go on, in those days as it is doing now, by its taxation policies, penalizing thrift and hard work.

There is no guarantee here that the sacrifices made today will be passed on should a recession in business conditions come. And it is not as though this burden of taxation were newly laid upon us. The Canadian people have been carrying it for years, and carrying it in the hope that sometime this burden would be lifted and they would see the daylight. Last year the government paid off five per cent of the net national debt, and it is budgeting now to pay an additional four per cent of that debt. It is going much too fast in that direction.

This managed economy idea is of the essence of socialism. The socialists believe in the managed economy. They believe that government, simply because it is government, can manage the affairs of the people, can manage the economy of the country, including the affairs of families throughout Canada, the budgets of Canadian homes, better than the Canadian people can manage these things themselves.

You find that same thought inherent in the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), because, after dealing with the question of increasing exemptions in income tax and reducing the burden of the sales tax, he adds this in his amendment:

> And further, the government has failed to establish a public investment board to assure the channelling of capital investment into socially desirable projects as a means of maintaining full employment, increasing production and raising the standard of living of the Canadian people.

Everyone in this house, I think, believes in full employment, increasing production and raising the standard of living, but I hope we do not believe in the method that is proposed here by usurping in favour of the government the right to say how money shall be invested in Canada. What is the capacity of government for directing investment of money?

This is a further example of the centralization of power that is inherent in the socialist creed in this country; and it is for reasons of that kind that, no matter how members of the C.C.F. may dislike communist support, the communists can see themselves so closely identified with the C.C.F. I have not said that the C.C.F. see themselves identified with the communists. Many members of the C.C.F. in this house have disavowed communist support; but the fact is that communist support is still forthcoming, and in the present election in Ontario we have Tim Buck, No. 1 communist in Canada, calling upon communists throughout Ontario to back the C.C.F. candidates in every riding where there is no communist candidate.

Mr. KNIGHT: May I ask the hon. member a question? Has he any assurance that the communists will vote C.C.F.?

Mr. FLEMING: I do know that the sense of discipline in the communist party is strong, and Tim Buck has told communists throughout Ontario—he said so publicly; there is no secret about it—to vote for the C.C.F. candidates in every riding where there is no communist candidate, and there are only two ridings in the province where there are communist candidates. The matter does not stop there. You will remember the blatant offer that Tim Buck made of support to the C.C.F. throughout Canada when he advocated the election of a C.C.F. government. He calls for a C.C.F. victory:

> If we elect a C.C.F. government in Ottawa, it is quite obvious that the whole perspective for Canada will be changed. Certainly then our road ahead will be through the social democratic regime. . . After we have elected a C.C.F. government and we are faced with the question of how to work further to develop socialist consciousness in the majority of the working class, we can truly say that the party that did this is a Marxist party, the part of socialist Canada.

I was interested to hear the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) in his speech tonight deal with the subject. It is not long ago that Mr. Laski, who was chairman of the executive of the labour party in Great Britain at the time of the last election, and who is regarded as one of the leading mouthpieces of that party there, had some things to say on the subject of the position of the socialist party in Great Britain. If the C.C.F. is such a democratic party, how do they account for the fact that Mr. Laski—and I am using his words—expressed doubt "whether in a period of transition the Labour government"—by that he meant, of course, the socialist government—"could risk overthrow of its measures as the result of a general election"? Does that sound like democracy, saying they are not going to risk a general election if it means that their socialist measures would be put in jeopardy? This same Mr. Laski is the author of a book entitled "Faith, Reason and Civilization". It is a neat little book. I wish to quote from pages 57 and 58 of it, in which Mr. Laski expresses his great admiration for the Russian system. These are his words:

> The solemn truth remains that in the Soviet Union more men and women have had more opportunity of self-fulfilment than anywhere else in the world . . . it is the only nation which . . . knows without doubt that its people move to the control of their own destiny . . . If therefore it be accepted that our own time bears a profound resemblance to the era in which Christianity was born, it seems to me that we are entitled to conclude that the regeneration of values which the new faith effected, after no doubt a long and bitter struggle, is more likely to be secured in our own age by the central idea of the Russian revolution than by any alternative principle we are in a position to choose.

That is Mr. Laski in a book published in 1944, just the year before the last general election in Great Britain. The C.C.F. say that socialism is necessarily democratic. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the communists are clear-headed enough to appreciate that if you carry socialism to its logical conclusion, you arrive at communism sooner or later.

My time is passing quickly, but I cannot forbear from reading the observations of Aubrey Jones, who wrote in the National Review in February last what I think was a penetrating analysis of socialism. He says this:

> It is true that democratic socialism is not communism; in many respects, however, it is a pale reflection of it and in these non-Christian respects it also contributes to an undermining of spiritual wholesomeness and integrity. Socialism, like communism, holds out a certain extravagance of expectation; things, it is said, will be so much better when once the system is changed. That is a non-Christian trait. For the essence of Christianity is to teach, as far as this mortal sinful world is concerned, a sobriety of expectation and to affirm that great changes are brought about, not by new systems, which in fact always take on the character of old systems, but by a new spirit. That this extravagance of expectation has over a period of years been induced in England is fairly evident; it has become one of the greatest obstacles to national rehabilitation, it prevents the needed psychological adjustment to the changed national status, and through the impatience and irresponsibility to which it gives rise it bodes ill for freedom.
> Again, democratic socialism, like communism, indicts a class; evil is not something common to all men, it is the badge of the capitalist; the workers, by contrast, are of superior virtue, but are held down despite themselves. This equally is not a trait of Christian belief. Nor is there anything more calculated to make class divisions permanent than this portrayal of one class as inherently better than another. It is an attitude which the wiser and soberer members among the workers themselves will wish to repudiate. Yet again, democratic socialism, like communism, sees a man's views as determined, not by a sincere quest for truth, but by his economic status. This, too, is no part of Christian belief and is conspiring to make men deaf to all honest preaching. Finally, democratic socialism, like communism, is not inspired by unselfishness; animated in very large part by rancour against the capitalist, against the man who wishes to better himself and his immediate kin, it threatens to push the state far into individual and family privacy.

I just wish to comment briefly in passing on one or two items in this budget. In the first place, this budget does not bring relief to the gold industry. At the present time that industry is dying. The subsidy which was provided for in this house a few weeks ago is helping only a few mines. In a large section of the gold mining areas, such as Kirkland Lake and others, there is unemployment on a large scale. This situation is attributable directly to the determination of this government to hold the Canadian dollar at an artificial level and to peg gold at an artificially low price, while the cost of the production of gold increases.

As to the increase in the interest rate on arrears of taxes, I have this to say. It is nothing short of brutally unfair on the part of the government to raise the interest rate on arrears when very often these impositions of interest are attributable directly to delay on the part of the Department of National Revenue in making the assessment. I have here a return brought down in the house recently by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) in reply to certain questions I asked. I asked the number of income tax returns not assessed as at December 31, 1947, throughout Canada. The number given in this return is 2,336,879 as of December 31 last. I would ask hon. members to note these figures. For 1943 and prior years there were 44,000—I am just giving the round figures now—in 1944, 110,000; in 1945, 265,000; and in 1946, 1,905,000. Since that time another two million returns for the year 1947 have been filed. In the majority of cases these people do not know that they are in arrears until the assessment is made, and it is grossly unfair to heap upon them the burden of increased interest charges.

I wish to say quite definitely and, I hope, constructively, in my concluding remarks that the proposals of the Progressive Conservative party as to what this budget ought to have contained—and still ought to contain, if this government is not too stubborn—are the following. We say, first, that the budget ought to bring about a substantial reduction in indirect taxes in order to effect a decrease in the cost of living. Second, the budget should effect at once increases in the exemptions on account of income tax. Third, the whole problem of making budgets in this country should be approached from what we say is the proper point of view, namely, let the people enjoy the fruits of their labour; let them enjoy the incentive that comes from the retention of that which they have earned. That will make for increased production. That alone will defeat inflation. Fourth, we say the time has come when this government should—yes, must—reconvene the dominion-provincial conference. The need of that is apparent on every hand.

[Mr. Fleming.]

On May 14 we heard in the house the announcement of some limited assistance for the provinces, in respect of public health, but there is still no comprehensive system of social security. Nothing of that kind was attempted in those proposals, and we shall not have that until the dominion takes the responsibility for reconvening the dominion-provincial conference. In the second place, there has been no attempt to co-ordinate the public investment plans of the dominion and the provinces. In the third place, the time is ripe for reconvening the dominion-provincial conference because some of the difficulties have been removed in the form of indirect taxes.

Hon. members will recall what an important part was played in 1946 by the objections of the provinces to the continuation of the dominion in the field of indirect taxation and the difficulty that presented to the conference. They will remember the position taken by the Premier of Nova Scotia with respect to those indirect taxes. There were six of them, namely, the gasoline tax, the amusement tax, the pari-mutuel tax, the electricity tax, the security transfer tax and succession duties. The dominion has now withdrawn from four of those fields and has reduced one other of the six.

I say the time has now come when the dominion government must reconvene that conference. Canada requires it. This government need not any longer think it can bring Ontario and Quebec to their knees in a contest of attrition and nerves. I call upon this government to abandon the cold war it has declared against the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Let this government and the governments in all the provinces meet together like Canadians. Let this government measure up to its responsibilities and reconvene that conference. The responsibility rests upon this government.

It is a sample of the high-handed attitude of the government that when the Minister of Finance announced withdrawal from these two fields of indirect taxation, namely the amusement tax and pari-mutuel betting tax—fields which from time immemorial have been possessed by the provinces—he had this to say to the provinces, as reported at page 4068 of Hansard:

May I be permitted here to express the hope that in these cases where the dominion government removes taxes of this kind and withdraws from the field, the taxpayers of Canada will receive the benefit of such action and that, so far as possible, provincial taxing authorities will refrain from stepping in.

I suggest to the Minister of Finance that he mind his own affairs in this federal field, and leave the provincial governments to manage theirs.

This is my final word. The policy of the Progressive Conservative party is to work unceasingly for a reduction in the load of taxation, not just a token reduction, but a substantial reduction of taxation. The policy of this government on the other hand is to continue to soak the people. The policy of the C.C.F. is to fasten upon the people of Canada the manacles of a regimented economy. The policy of the Liberal party, as declared through this government, is to surrender to those who espouse the cause of the managed economy. The Progressive Conservative party, Mr. Speaker, believes that the people are entitled and are able to manage their own affairs without paternalistic and officious intrusion into those affairs by an all-powerful Ottawa bureaucracy.

We say to this government: Get your hands out of the pockets of the people! Stop this plundering of the taxpayers under the guise of taxation!

Mr. J. E. MATTHEWS (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I do not imagine I shall be expected to agree with all the remarks so forcefully made by the hon. member (Mr. Fleming) who has just taken his seat. I must admit I agree with some of what he has said. And I trust, when I have concluded what I have to say, he may also agree with some of the statements I make. I hope that to be so, even though it does not develop into a complete love feast between us.

Contrary to the hon. member's remarks, I have been impressed this year, as indeed I was a year ago, with the able budget speech delivered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), and I wish to add my hearty congratulations to the many he has already received. I look back to the night a year ago when the present minister announced a surplus for 1946 of $374,000,000, and a reduction in our national debt for that year of $352,000,000.

I well recall the criticism directed against him at that time—first, because there was a surplus at all, and, second, because he had reduced our debt. My own opinion was that when the Minister of Finance at that time estimated a surplus of $190,000,000 on this year's transactions he would not be far out. I had a lot of confidence in his cool, careful calculations. But had he a year ago estimated a surplus of, not $190,000,000 but $670,000,000, my faith in his judgment would have received a severe shock.

I do not propose to follow this debate through all the devious channels it may pursue. To me, one acid test of the year's transactions is that the business of Canada has been kept going under a full head of steam. In some instances taxes have been reduced—not very much; and $670,000,000 has been paid on our national debt.

Critics may talk for months on the smaller questions involved; but again I say that the huge reduction in our debt is the acid test and cannot be controverted. There was the $352,000,000 reduction in 1946 and $647,000,000 in 1947, making about a billion dollars of our national debt paid in two years.

How will that affect our interest payments for the coming year? Well, the interest on a billion dollars at three per cent would be $30,000,000 a year. That $30,000,000 saving each year may appear just chicken feed to some; but it is not so to me. It may be well to keep in mind that for eighty-one years, since confederation, the federal government has had only seventeen surpluses. They were in 1871, 1872, 1900, 1903, 1904, 1907, 1912, 1913, 1924 to 1930, 1947 and 1948.

It is safe to assume that the two last-mentioned outdistance all former surpluses combined. We should also not forget that our Minister of Finance has an unbroken record of surpluses, one for every year he has occupied the driver's seat. Not only that, but he estimates another half billion surplus for 1948; and I say, "More power to him."

To me a nation's business, so far as the finances are concerned, is the business of the individuals who comprise that nation. The taxpayers of Canada are the shareholders of this huge government business. We have a general manager, and he has presented his annual report called the budget speech. The question which interests me most, and which should interest every shareholder—otherwise called taxpayer—is whether or not our general manager, known as the Minister of Finance, and those associated with him, are making a success of their work.

I suggest that a general manager of any business in the world who could show results to his shareholders comparable with those reported by the Minister of Finance in his annual report would be wined and dined as the hero of the company. The shareholders without exception would be proud of him, and their applause would not take the form of a want of confidence motion.

Such a motion means only this, that he should be replaced by some new, untried and possibly inexperienced amateur. I can assure my good friends that the people of Canada, the shareholders of our nation's business, are not so gullible as to take on any such risk as that. The shareholders will be inclined to ask definitely, who is in mind, anyway, to succeed the Minister of Finance. I wonder how many people in Canada realize that if you take all the railways of Canada and all the chartered banks of Canada and tie them all up together, their combined business as indicated by gross revenue is only one-third of the volume of business transacted by the dominion government. That is to say, the gross revenue of all the railways of Canada is $758 million, and of all the banks of Canada, $229 million, and of the dominion government $2,869 million, or three times greater.

The cost of running this huge business last year, for instance, was $1,985 million; and at that it was $131 million less than the previous year. May I emphasize here a statement made by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, that a total of $1,214,288,000 of Canada's expenditures is uncontrollable—such items as family allowances, pensions, interest on the public debt, subsidies for provinces, contributions to various government agencies. My criticism is—and I shall be frank about it—that what are called "uncontrollable expenditures" have been permitted to reach proportions far beyond what is reasonable or necessary in this country. These uncontrollable expenditures had better be kept under control. It is the taxpayer's money. He proposes to have a voice as to how that money will be spent. I think in that regard a word to the wise might be sufficient.

I have not much respect for an individual who does not pay his bills, or at least make an effort to do so. I have the deepest sympathy for the man who, because of ill-health or unavoidable losses, cannot discharge his indebtedness. My feelings toward a nation are exactly the same as toward an individual.

I have no hesitation in saying that the minister has a sound idea in reducing our indebtedness each year to the largest possible degree now, when times are good. You may call it cyclical budgeting, if you wish, but I call it plain common sense. Taxes are never popular, but the real test is not how much taxes you have paid, but how much you have remaining after they are paid.

I shall not take the time to speak of fishing, mining, pulpwood production and many other sources of revenue, but at this time I want to make special reference to agriculture. So far as I am aware, Canada has never had a Minister of Agriculture who has worked so zealously and so persistently in the interests of the farmer as has the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I say that quite frankly and I do not think anyone will attempt to contradict me. He had the vision to see, and the government had the vision to support him, that a prosperous farm population would contribute immeasurably to the prosperity of Canada as a whole and therefore make this country better able to bear the tremendous financial demands resulting from the war.

To that end he set his course, with the result that, during the years 1939 to 1947 inclusive, there was paid to farmers in Canada in subsidies, bonuses, freight assistance and other similar forms, no less than $528,979,000. That is a lot of money over and above the regular farm income. That amount includes bonus cheques which farmers received on quality cheese amounting to approximately $12,000,000; on fluid and concentrated milk, butterfats, et cetera, $156,000,000. The premium on hogs amounted to $35,000,000. Then there were other channels, including $87,000,000 which was applied to prairie farm assistance in the form of acreage bonuses resulting from poor crops; there was $25.000,000 for prairie farm rehabilitation to build dams, dug-outs and other conservation works; there was $19,000,000 prairie farm income, including such items as compensation for storing grain on the farm; there was $88,000,000 for wheat acreage reduction, which means just what it says. Then $100,000,000 was applied to feed freight assistance, feed wheat drawbacks, plus over $2,000,000 subsidy to increase Canada's bacon export trade, along with another $1,000,000 as an egg export subsidy.

I suggest that there had to be a lot of cheques issued in Ottawa and cashed by the farmers of Canada to absorb the tremendous amounts I have quoted. Someone will ask whether these huge payments have been justified, but my answer will be that they have been amply justified, away beyond the slightest contradiction. Farmers and non-farmers felt that the cash farm return in 1946 of $1,752,000,000 might not be equalled for many years, it being twice as high as it was in 1939.

But what happened? The returns for 1947 showed an increase of $237,900,000 over 1946, or a total of $1,990,600,000, or close to the two billion mark. In other words, there was an increase of $161,000,000 over Canada's previous peak year of 1944. The 1947 farm income that I have quoted includes an increase over 1946 of $128,000,000 from the sale of grain, seed and hay; and an increase from the sale of livestock from $574,600,000 in 1946 to $590,000,000 in 1947. But it does not include payments made to farmers under the Prairie Farm

Assistance Act, another $11,577,000, this bringing the total farm income last year to the astounding figure of $2,002,000,000. Two billion dollars—we may well wonder, along with the Minister of Agriculture, when and to what extent that record will ever be broken.

It was illuminating, to say the least, to read in a western paper not long ago a letter signed C. Bolton, Knighton, Radnorshipe, England, paying wonderful tribute to Canada's Minister of Agriculture, as "a man of vision", something, he said, which was very much lacking in the world today. "He wisely agreed," said Mr. Bolton, "to a wheat price which he knew we could pay, and which over a series of years would undoubtedly pay the farmers, for whom he works so hard, much better than an inflated price and a defaulting creditor." Mr. Bolton goes on to express some comparisons so striking that it would be scarcely ethical to quote them here.

So far as 1948 is concerned, the twenty cents a bushel increase in the initial wheat payment, retroactive for three crops, will put many a farmer away to another good start, meaning, as it does, the distribution of an extra $150,000,000 now being made among western farmers. The return this year also of the refundable portions, the compulsory saving feature, of the 1943 and 1944 income taxes, amounting to $230,000,000, will bring revenue into many homes, besides reducing future interest payments by the government.

As against this, however, there are extra expenditures to be provided for. The new health program is placed at an initial annual expenditure of $30,000,000 a year. The increase in Canada's war pensions will boost that expenditure from $73,000,000 to $91,000,000 per year. This commendable increase will benefit 400,000 Canadian men, women and children, including 153,000 disabled veterans and 17,000 widows.

The increase in old age pensions, pensions for the blind, health and hospitalization allowances and more persons drawing family allowances, will mean another $27,000,000 expenditure for 1948. These expenditures, along with unemployment insurance, war service gratuities, and similar grants, have increased tremendously during the past ten years. For instance, the amount paid in family allowances since its inception is around $700,000,000.

I have quoted sufficient to indicate that the farmers as a whole all across Canada have made a wonderful response in the matter of production. There have been references of late to the butter supply. Some claimed that the farmers, particularly the younger farmers, were letting the country down in dairy production. I did not believe it, at all events so far as Manitoba is concerned. In order to settle the point, I have before me the official report issued by the department of agriculture of Manitoba. From that report I learn that creamery butter manufactured in Manitoba in 1947 amounted to 26,265,141 pounds or an increase of 198,513 pounds over 1946; and dairy butter, 5,963,000 pounds.

The total milk production in Manitoba in 1947 was 1,230,740,429 pounds, or an increase of 11,666,792 pounds over 1946. There were seventy creameries manufacturing butter in Manitoba in 1947, and twenty-three manufacturing cheese. The estimated farm value of butter, creamery and dairy, made in Manitoba last year was $14,534,000, and of cheese, $890,000.

The total farm value of the milk produced in that province was $25,932,000. I mention these figures to show that if there is any slowing down of milk production in Canada, the fault cannot be laid at the door of Manitoba farmers.

In hog production the number of carcasses shipped in 1947 was less than in 1946; the number of live hogs remaining on the farm at the end of 1947 was more.

May I add right here, as a matter of information, that the official report from which I have quoted gives the following estimated average income per farm as follows:

Year	Average per farm
1942	2,639
1943	3,040
1944	3,444
1945	2,770

When speaking on the budget a year ago, I referred, perhaps boastfully, to the success of Manitoba farmers at the Toronto Royal all down the years, and particularly in 1946. Last November, or was it December, they even eclipsed all former records. They exhibited 128 animals and won 135 prizes, including twenty-two firsts, twenty-five seconds, nineteen thirds, sixteen fourths, thirteen fifths, eleven sixths, and the remainder in close proximity. In addition to prizes, they won outstanding awards, namely two grand championships, two reserve grand, one senior, one reserve senior, one junior, five reserve juniors. In 1946, they won eleven awards and ninety-eight prizes; in 1947, twelve awards and 135 prizes. No further comment is necessary regarding the excellence of Manitoba livestock.

This good farming and attention to business has brought commendable results. For instance, last year the Manitoba farm loans association had only 310 outstanding mortgages, 303 agreements for sale, and 193 farms remaining for settlement, as against 1,162 mortgages, 657 agreements for sale, and 641 farms in 1941. The association's collections last year alone approached the million dollar mark.

The record of the Canadian farm loan board is equally good. Of 1,678 first mortgages and 222 second mortgages, the amount of principal overdue more than six months at the end of 1947 was $65.71, and the amount of interest overdue, not one dollar.

A writer in an American magazine not long ago deplored the unscientific methods of Canadian agriculture. I read the article to the end, expecting to find some explanation as to why Canadian farmers took the first ten places in the world wheat competition at Chicago in 1947. I expected to find some explanation as to why Canadian farmers almost invariably win the grand championships in wheat, barley and oats in American competitions, and as to why the most advanced American farmers grow, though not so successfully, the finer sturdier varieties of wheat, developed by Canadian scientists. I did not find the explanation.

Speaking of progress made by many western farmers, I want to draw attention to an organization that quietly and without ostentation has been doing very effective work in this country. I refer to the Farm Improvement Loans Act passed in 1944 during the financial administration of the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley). The act was designed as a short cut to the more speedy financing of improvements on the farm. The loans were actually made through the chartered banks, but with a substantial degree of government endorsation. They were put through at five per cent interest, and during the three years 1945-46-47 approximately forty thousand farmers obtained loans, amounting to thirty-one and a half million dollars, for the purpose of farm and home improvements.

It is interesting to note to what wise and helpful uses these loans were approximately applied.

Thirty thousand loans ($25,000,000) were applied to the purchase of farm implements, notably trucks and tractors.

Four thousand loans (over $4,000,000) were for the construction or repair of farm dwellings, barns and outbuildings.

Twenty-five hundred loans (almost $1,000,000) were for the clearing and breaking of new land, resulting in 123,680 acres heretofore uncultivated having been brought into production. Seventeen hundred and twenty-five loans (over $1,000,000) were applied to the purchase of livestock.

One hundred and forty-nine loans ($86,000) were devoted to fencing and farm drainage.

Better still, although operations were begun only in 1945, nearly half the loans made up to the end of 1947 have already been repaid in full, notwithstanding the fact that loans may be effected for a period up to ten years.

Thus far, not one dollar loss has been experienced, a record which speaks volumes for the wise and efficient administration of the act. The fact also that approximately 40,000 Canadian farm homes have already been made more comfortable, or the farm rendered more productive, as a result of those loans, is ample justification of the recent extension of the act for another three years. I submit that this type of legislation is desirable and constructive and has the added virtue of being in no sense paternalistic.

We may well wonder if, and when, the pendulum may begin to swing the other way; for it would seem improbable that our present successes will continue indefinitely without reverses of some kind. It is assuring, however, to note the efforts toward stabilizing conditions that are being made. For instance, what a hopeful statement was that made by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) recently when he announced that 4,000 Canadian companies will invest a billion and a half dollars before March 31, 1949, in a reconversion program producing new commodities in Canada. Hon. members will admit that this is facing the situation in the minister's characteristic big way.

Then again, the recent international wheat agreement endorsed by thirty-six importing and exporting nations, after several years' efforts, is an achievement which Canada has long sought.

Many former markets are now non-existent, and have to be replaced. To this end, in formulating international trade agreements—thus expanding in ever-widening circles our business relations with other countries—Canada owes a big debt to the recent Minister of Trade and Commerce, the present Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacKinnon). I am confident that few people realize how great is the contribution he has made to expanding the trade of this country. For instance, last year's substantial increase in trade was augmented by an increase in our exports to Latin American countries of over 50 per cent, those to Argentina showing an increase of almost 200 per cent; in fact, almost every republic in South and Central America has increased its Canadian buying. Canadian exports also to Australia and New Zealand are reported to have increased about 80 per cent over 1946. Our exports to Brazil, which used to amount to about five million dollars, grew in 1946 to $24,600,000.

Canada was the second largest source of supply for Britain last year, with an increase of 17 per cent over 1946.

As hon. members are aware, the former Minister of Trade and Commerce made an extensive trip last year and, I think, proved himself a splendid combination of salesman and statesman. No one can estimate what that one trip will mean to the future trade of this country. I desire to quote briefly from an article in the Monetary Times in which the former Minister of Trade and Commerce gives his own impressions.

As head of the Canadian trade mission to South Africa and the Mediterranean area, it was my privilege to share personally in yet another constructive step towards the promotion of Canadian trade. Travelling some 25,000 miles, the mission, made up of prominent Canadian industrialists and government officials, visited eleven different countries for trade discussions, and touched briefly at seven others. Our primary object was a good will visit to Canada's third best customer, the Union of South Africa, which is more fortunate than other sterling countries in that she is able to pay for dollar imports out of her vast gold resources. Everywhere the mission travelled it met with a reception which could leave no doubt with respect to the warm regard in which Canada is held abroad. Officials and businessmen alike were impressed by the fact that we had a genuine interest in trying to assist them in developing a market in Canada for their products, as well as in promoting our own export trade. The good will resulting from the visits made by the mission will be remembered for many years, and I am sure will have a most beneficial effect on Canada's trading relations in the future.

We hear a great deal today about the cost of living. I was interested in an article published on May 3, 1947, by the London Recorder, giving a breakdown of how the average man and woman in England spent each pound of personal expenditure in 1946. I have the list before me, and I have translated the amounts into terms of dollar spending, to make it more readily understandable here. These are the figures for England, out of each dollar of personal expenditure, as I have stated:

Food	26
Alcoholic beverages and tobacco	20
Rent, water	8
Fuel, light	4
Durable house furnishing	4½
Other household goods	1
Clothing	9
Books, newspapers	1½
Private motoring	2
Travel	4
Entertainment	2½
Other goods and services	17½
Total	$1.00

In Canada, the following table from the bureau of statistics will show, in a manner as nearly as possible comparable with the table in the London Recorder, a breakdown of the average personal expenditure on the different items which go into the consumer's budget in Canada. Both tables are for expenditures in 1946. Out of every dollar of personal expenditure the average person in Canada spent in 1946:

	cents
Food	27·2
Alcoholic beverages and tobacco	11·2
Fuel	3·6
Rent utilities and household operation	12·6
Durable house furnishing	3·3
Other household goods	1·0
Clothing	14·4
Books, magazines and newspapers	1·2
Transportation, including street-car, bus, train and aeroplane fares, private motoring and purchases of gasoline	6·9
Automobiles and accessories	2·4
Recreation, amusements generally, holiday and resort expenses	2·1
Other goods and services	14·1
Total	$1.00

It will surprise many Canadians to learn from a statement made by the minister that in the United States a single taxpayer with no dependents has exemption up to only $600; and that, while in Canada $800 means an income tax of $5, in the United States it means a tax of $20; also that a married taxpayer with no children has exemption in the United States up to only $1,200. In Canada a $1,600 income means to such a person a tax of $10, but in the United States a tax of $40.

I stand four square in support of the government in having had the will and the courage to impose taxes commensurate with the imperative demands of war. This is no time for our Canadian people to forget the astounding contribution made by this country toward prosecution of the war. And why not? It was our war, and upon the result of that war depended our freedom, with all that word involves. Yes, our war effort was stupendous, and the taxes we are paying today, as a result of that war effort, are, and will continue to be, a definite burden. Yet, in terms of what we have remaining, our contribution is a mere bagatelle when compared with the devastated homes and absolute ruin visited upon our allied nations in Europe.

Furthermore, I am confident it can never be said that Canada scuttled the allied ship with the cessation of hostilities. Our nearest ally should be better versed on that score than any other nation, and it is encouraging, yes, inspiring, to read in some United States papers acknowledgment of Canada's contribution to post-war efforts. At Washington recently the Tabloid News paid tribute to what our country has done in the way of aid to Europe, stating that Canada's aid in terms of relative population or national income is greater than that of the United States. These are its concluding words:

To the world's need in peace or war, Canada makes a bold and sacrificial contribution, but quietly and without fanfare.

The Portland, Oregon, Journal, in a fairly recent article pointed out that Canada's population is only one-eleventh of the United States, and her national income about one-fifteenth, so that the loans and outright gifts of $1,850 million made by Canada to Europe are the equivalent of a United States loan of $20,350 million in terms of population, or $27,750 million in terms of national income. Surely this is a striking comparison and a friendly tribute from our southern neighbour.

These facts have been widely commented upon by other leading papers in the United States. I could quote from many others did time permit. For instance, the New York World-Telegram, with a daily circulation of almost 400,000, has this to say concerning the facts I have cited:

It is a sturdy and noble people that we have to the north of us. Canadians are a bulwark of democracy and decency. We are indeed fortunate in our neighbours.

Mr. Speaker, I would commend those words from United States papers to some hon. members in this chamber who never lose an opportunity of endeavouring to belittle Canada whether in war or peace.

We sometimes hear it said that all that portion of a taxpayer's income exceeding $25,000 should be confiscated. Well, that would not help very much. A concise analysis appeared in an Ottawa paper not long ago, bearing upon 1946 returns:

The figures showed that the combined incomes of all Canadians getting $25,000 a year or more totalled $113 million. If, therefore, the government were to take away from this group every cent they made, it would still be short about $1,600 million of what it needs in the way of cash in order to administer the country. If put in another way, all the incomes of all our so-called rich, grabbed by Mr. Abbott, wouldn't be enough to pay half of the baby bonus for one year.

The people of Canada may expect to pay taxes, heavy taxes, for many years as a result of the war. So long as those taxes are applied in substantial measure to reduce our national debt, Canadians will take a reasonable view of the situation. But they are going to insist, yes, they are going to demand, and I hope they will, that the taxes which they pay and for which they have worked so hard are not frittered away in fantastic government expenditures.

Even with the astounding reductions in our national debt made during the past two years by the Minister of Finance, we are still burdened with a debt of enormous proportions. It seems to me that in order to retire that debt we must have millions more people in Canada. We must open our doors more widely than ever before to desirable immigrants from other countries. We have a tremendous extent of country populated by only twelve million people. Europe, including Britain, with an area half the size of Canada, has a population of four hundred million. In other words, were we as densely peopled as Europe, our population would be eight hundred million instead of only twelve million. We have a task before us. We cannot expect to hold indefinitely great stretches of unoccupied lands when there are many million human beings huddled together in other countries, yearning to assist in the development of Canada's rich and, to a large extent, untouched resources. Yes, a largely increased population will be a potent factor in the reduction of our national debt.

As regards taxation, some resentment was engendered among farmers with respect to the new income tax forms prepared for 1947 returns. I believe that to quite an extent, particularly in western Canada, the object, or what I hope was the object, of that new form was misunderstood.

I am glad to endorse the new efforts made by the department to run down tax evaders. Honest taxpayers all across Canada will heartily endorse that action.

I cannot recall having heard at any session so many members lauding their constituencies, and at considerable length, as during the present session. It was all very commendable, all very interesting, and I think we should have more of it.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I say all honour to those who have not hesitated to place on the record of this parliament a tribute to the constituencies they represent, and to the efforts of the people.

However, I am in a position to pay a tribute greater still to the people of my constituency, and one not touched upon by other members. We have it on the highest authority that life does not consist of bread alone, and that a good name is to be chosen rather than great riches. Let me say here that I have the honor and the satisfaction of representing the constituency of Brandon in the House of Commons longer, with one exception, than any member since confederation. And in all those years, it has never been suggested to me directly or indirectly that I should stoop to any political act of a doubtful nature. That is my tribute to my constituents, and it is one of which I am justly proud.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I again congratulate the minister and his department on a big task having been carried to a successful conclusion by a big man.

Mr. H. O. WHITE (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, in rising tonight to discuss the budget I must say that, after hearing the Minister of Finance present it the other night, I more or less came to the conclusion that I would not take part in the debate because there was not much in the budget to inspire an address of any kind. It did not present any incentives to those in labour, industry or farming to increase production, and we as a free-enterprise country must offer something besides the whip if we are to increase production.

I would point out to my socialist friends to the left that there are no other twelve million people in the world who have produced as much food and sent abroad munitions of war to the same extent as the twelve million Canadians have done.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): That is right, and under free enterprise too.

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East): I wish to say a word or two about the way in which the budget affects my own constituency, and as it affects my constituency so also will it affect the Canadian people. Taxation is discouraging production. I only need to refer to a couple of items to bring that home to the house. One is reduction in the production of cheese and the other is hogs.

I have in my hand two editorials, one from the Ottawa Journal and the other from the London Free Press, both dealing with food problems. One deals with the statement of Sir John Boyd Orr a few days ago, and the editorial comment of the Ottawa Journal on his statements. The other is a report in the London Free Press on the agricultural institute of Canada meeting in Guelph on June 23 next.

Sir John Boyd Orr points out the vast increase in the population of the world. It is 40,000,000 since V-E day. James Turner, of the world federation of farmers, has pointed out that in 1951 production of food will be only the same as in 1939; yet by that time there will be more of an increase than the 40,000,000 in the population of the world. And these 40,000,000 did not bring one acre of ground with them on which to produce more food.

I think we as Canadians can produce a good deal more food than we have; but you cannot get the Canadian farmer, or labour or industry to produce at a loss for long, and therefore I want to point out to the government just how this is affecting a good many people.

Of all the things that are bothering the farmers, labour and small business, income tax is, in my opinion, the worst. I have talked to a good many farmers and they are quite prepared to pay their share of income tax if they owe it. Labour and the salaried worker never get a chance to handle their share because it is taken away from them before they get it, and so they see to it that they only work so long and do not get into the higher income brackets. The result is that they will lay off for a day or two, so that there is a decrease in production all across the board. If some means could be found of reducing the burden of income tax, or if those exemptions in the lower income brackets could be raised, so that people generally could have some relief, they would be able to buy food, and it would be a relief to those producing food. They would have an incentive to produce more, so that the consumer could get it at more reasonable cost.

I was quite interested in this article with reference to Sir John Boyd Orr, because in all the plans that are being made there has been no mention of rewarding the man who produces food. I can say to that organization and to the agricultural institute that until they take into consideration the man who is going to produce the food, and the necessity of rewarding him, they will not get the food and they might as well cease their deliberations. If they think the farmer will work for nothing and board himself they will be disillusioned people.

We did not ask labour during the war to give its services for practically nothing, nor did we ask industry to do so. We rewarded industry and labour and they produced the sinews of war and were enabled to produce them in abundance. We can do the same again as far as food is concerned, but the farmer will not do it for nothing.

The other evening one of our socialist members, the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson), I believe, was mentioning the need for subsidized housing, and he went so far as to say that we should have subsidized farm housing. I submit that if any group of people are adequately rewarded or paid they can provide their own housing, whether in the city or in the country. But what has happened? Under subsidized housing, the farmer, and every citizen in the land who has paid for his own home, or is paying for it, will be asked to provide a home for some improvident person, without thrift or regard for the future, who wants someone to pay for a home for him. That is what subsidized housing means. You and I will pay for someone else's home.

Mr. MARTIN: That is what the hon. member for Eglinton recommends.

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East): We certainly do not want to do it the C.C.F. way, anyway.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What about the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard?

Mr. HAZEN: Every member has a right to express his own opinion.

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East): I will say to the hon. member for Mackenzie that history has shown that any government that paid people for doing nothing has ended in the ash can, bankrupt.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): That is right. Think of the Romans.

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East): Let me say that there are many vacant houses in the country, but people do not want to work at jobs that are necessary where these houses are. These houses are on the farms, and that is a good indication that the man who tills the soil is not being rewarded, in relation to the hours of work he puts in, and the knowledge and ability he must put into that work. Those people who think food is too dear will find many farms in Middlesex county that can be bought for the price of a house and lot in the city, and they will not be out of a job if they go there. They will have food at cost, but I will not tell them what that cost is. They know it just as well as I do, and they do not want to go there.

We hear quite a bit about stabilization of farm prices, the price of farm products, and that sounds good to a lot of people. But it does not take a great deal of ability to stabilize the prices of farm products below the world price or below parity price, and the recent moves on the part of consumers demanding the admission of oleomargarine into the country are a fair indication that the consumers will not stand for higher prices if the world price should drop below levels which the consuming public can afford to pay. They will not stand for it now and they certainly will not stand for it in the future. I think we are just holding out a hope to the farmers that when things are not so good, the prices of their products will be higher. That is certainly just a dream and nothing else.

[Mr. White (Middlesex East.]

The other evening the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Archibald) speaking on the plight of the farmer, was bemoaning the fact that the average income of the farmer was less than that of any of the other groups in Canada. But I notice that the hon. member for Skeena and all the other members of his group voted for the wheat bill which gave the farmer less than the world price. I also notice that they voted for the agricultural bill to put coarse grains under the wheat act. So it seems to me that they are inconsistent. They talk on the one hand about the fact that the farmer is not getting enough for his produce, and yet they vote the other way when the opportunity arises.

Recently the dominion bureau of statistics provided these figures. The labour income index in Canada in the last twelve months has risen forty-four points, while the farm income index has receded fourteen points. How do we arrive at that? It is because most of the things the farmer has to buy have increased in price to a greater extent than the things the farmer has to sell. So we find ourselves in that particular plight at the moment.

What else has the budget done or not done that my constituents do not like? One of them is this. The tax on soft drinks and candies is not removed. Workers and children are usually the buyers of those products. On the other hand, the tax on pari-mutuel betting, which aids a group of people that are not greatly in need of aid, was removed. So I say that the government was unwise in that particular move.

Actually the budget was not brought down last week; it was brought down on November 17 last when a twenty-five per cent increase in excise taxes were placed on many articles that the low income groups have to buy. When that tax was put on, it gave the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) the opportunity to say at this time that he had built up a huge surplus and that he was not increasing taxation in any lines, but was able to reduce taxation in a few. If you can put on a heavy tax five or six months before the budget comes down, and then say you have taken off some here and some there, it may sound good at the moment; but as far as the people back home are concerned, they are still digging down in their pockets and paying to this government in taxes thirty-three cents out of every dollar they receive. So I would say that, as far as my people are concerned they are disappointed.

The only bright part of the budget is the fact that the minister was able to reduce the national debt. I want to point out again—I have said it before in this house, and I am going to say it again—that we, our children and our children's children will be paying for subsidized food that was supplied to people who were more able to buy it during the war years than they will ever be in the years to come. So when you hear people asking for subsidies, you know they are wanting somebody else to pay for something they want, and that somebody else is you.

I repeat again, Mr. Speaker, that the budget was a dismal disappointment. It was a budget of sixty-five or die. I think the amendment of the Progressive Conservative party was absolutely in order.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): The minister's budget speech, Mr. Speaker, is one more budget speech of despair. It contains no hint of any new order of abundance and freedom such as our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) promised us all during the war. We find in it no sign of any brave new world worth fighting for. It is a budget of privation, scarcity and frustration. Why was the budget such a chilling disappointment? It seems to me that the people of Canada ought to know. They realize that in Canada we have a magnificent heritage, with an abundance of resources of almost every kind; a wonderful people, skillful, aggressive, buoyant, able and ready to work. Yet we have to have conditions such as this budget imposes on us. Why is this?

The answer is that this budget is based on an oxcart financial system trying to function in an age of internal combustion engines; in fact in an age of jet propulsion. Small wonder it fails to do the job!

There is but little comfort to be found in the speech of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) who, I presume, would be preparing the budget speech if the Conservatives were in power.

Mr. KNOWLES: The same speech.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The speech of the frigid, reactionary Conservatives, misnamed progressive, delivered by the hon. member, was even more bleak than that of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). In the Conservative, the scarcity mentality has run riot. You never find coming from any Conservative since I have been in the house—except one in the years long ago—even the slightest glimmer of a comprehension of what it is all about or how we can get ourselves out of the difficulties in which we have found ourselves. Why they do not employ some real financial and economic experts and learn from them, I cannot understand.

Mr. KNOWLES: No expert will work for them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They everlastingly talk about getting to the stars, but they have not the slightest idea of how to get their feet out of the mud on the earth.

The present orthodox financial system simply must be changed. Let that be borne in upon every member of the house and upon every person in the country. Just as long as we persist in keeping the present orthodox financial system, we shall have budget after budget of the type of that which we have just had presented to us.

There will be those who will wonder if there is any evidence to support the statement that I make. I do not wish to bring myself into the limelight particularly, Mr. Speaker, but I hereby issue a challenge to the Minister of Finance and the members of the Liberal and Conservative parties to debate the fundamental principles of finance. I defy any one of them to prove that the Canadian nation has to finance entirely with debt money. I will give them all the time they need to prepare themselves, and when they are ready to come, I will be ready. We are financing this nation, and have been ever since some time in the middle of the first world war, with debt money. The debt money idea is part of the general mentality of scarcity which apparently prevails universally among Liberals and Conservatives throughout the country. The budget at the present time proposes to finance all Canadian activities with debt.

The one bright spot thus far in the budget debate is the Social Credit speech of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). I do not wish to slight the speech of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). He merely told what was wrong in some respects with the budget; he did not tell us how the wrong could be made right.

The Social Credit proposals, in brief, were as follows—and I shall make a summary of them so that we shall have them before us. It was proposed that we have a national monetary authority responsible to parliament and vested with power in the name of the people of Canada to enable those things which are physically possible and desirable to be made financially possible. As an initial step in a comprehensive debt retirement program the monetary authority to call upon the chartered banks to surrender to the Bank of Canada three and a half to four billion dollars of dominion securities. Each bank to be credited on the books of the Bank of Canada with the face value of the securities delivered, this credit to be an asset to balance the liabilities of the bank to its depositors.

The national monetary authority so to regulate the use of this credit as to enable the chartered banks to meet the liabilities to their depositors in an orderly fashion, and in a manner to maintain the stability of the national economy.

Third, cancellation of existing reduction in family allowances for each child after the fourth as the first step toward an ultimate increase of fifty per cent in all family allowance, costing $15,000,000.

Immediate old age pensions of $50 at seventy years of age without a means test; the first step toward an objective of $50 at sixty—an additional $169,000,000.

Pensions for needy widows at sixty years of age and over and payments to all disabled adults not otherwise provided for by government allowances, eighteen years of age and over $20,000,000 additional.

Provision for increasing war veterans allowances to $50 and $85 a month for single and married persons respectively, and to increase 100 per cent disability to $100 a month, an additional $10,000,000.

Provision for encouragement by subsidy or otherwise increased production of such things as sugar, coal and steel to make Canada self-sufficient and to save American dollars—$75,000,000.

Abolition of the sales tax, $395,000,000; accompanied by measures to ensure benefits to consumers.

Cancellation of the recently imposed excise tax of 25 per cent.

Income tax exemptions to be raised to $1,500 and $2,400 as an initial step in ultimate exemptions of $2,000 and $3,000 respectively—$300,000,000.

Ten per cent exemption of corporate profits for income tax purposes conditional upon companies handing over the sales tax abolition benefits to consumers; the rate of tax on profits between ten and twenty per cent on capital to be at 60 per cent; tax on profits over 20 per cent to be at 80 per cent.

The total upset in the present budget would be $984,000,000, to be provided for as follows:

(a) by using from the estimated surplus $484,000,000.

(b) by saving in interest charges through the debt reduction, $100,000,000.

(c) estimated increases in revenue from increased buoyancy, $100,000,000.

(d) by national credit, $300,000,000.

One item there that might not be easy for the orthodox financial mind to understand is the last one, the national credit of $300 million. I maintain there is some hope in that budget. The question that will from time to time be raised will be whether or not that budget is sound, whether it will actually work in the Dominion of Canada in the year 1948-49.

It will be argued that Social Credit proposals are unrealistic, unscientific and unsound. It will be contended that Social Credit proposals will cause inflation. I will argue that Social Credit proposals are realistic, scientific and sound; and I contend that Social Credit proposals will not cause inflation in a wisely managed Canada.

Social Credit proposals will not cause inflation in a wisely managed Canada, because Canada has such a tremendous amount of resources of such a wide variety and she has her industry developed to such a high degree that she is completely capable or can be made completely capable of supplying the needs of her people, or goods which she can trade for needs which we cannot supply.

The first question I ask is: What is inflation? Inflation is a rise in prices which results from a scarcity of goods. When I first came to parliament it was impossible to get any Liberal to consent to the truthfulness of that definition. But today the war has forced them all to agree that that is the definition of inflation. It is a rise in prices fundamentally brought about by a shortage of goods.

What are the causes of inflation? The first cause is a shortage of goods in relation to money in circulation. The second is taxation. It is not a real cause of inflation, but it is a cause of a rise in prices which is called inflation in the country today. The third is the increased cost of production, such as the increase in freight rates, the increase in the cost of gasoline and the like. This also is not a real cause of inflation, but it again is the cause of a rise in prices and must be counted in when determining the causes of rise in prices called inflation. The fourth cause is over-capitalization, and the fifth cause is over-exportation.

I do not propose to deal in detail with all of these. I mention them as being the main factors which are contributing to the high cost of goods prevailing in Canada today; such high costs being commonly called inflation and being blamed generally upon the fact that there is too much money in circulation for the goods in the country.

What are the safeguards against inflation—the safeguards which would be used in this Social Credit budget which the hon. member for Peace River proposes? Here are some of them. In the first place, we should stimulate our production. This has been spoken of by scores of members in the house. I think the country is pretty well agreed as to how we could stimulate our production. Here are some of the proposals which all hon. members speak about rather freely.

First, remove or at least alleviate all incentive destroying factors such as, for example, discouraging taxation, which the hon. member who just took his seat was discussing;

Second, remove uncertainty of markets;

Third, remove undependability of prices.

These factors are within the control of our generation, if we use the facilities which are at our disposal. And we need not become a socialized state in order to use those powers.

Next, we should carefully plan, in conjunction with the provinces, definitely to make Canada self-sufficient so far as possible. We should make definitely a balanced economy, as is eloquently advocated by Mr. W. H. Moore, who was an honoured member of the house, representing the constituency of Ontario, in his fine book called "Grey Days", published in 1946, a book which I would encourage all hon. members to read.

Again, we should adopt proper protective measures to give confidence to Canadian producers. These measures which are at our disposal, and may be undoubtedly used, and which we see in operation today, are quantitative restrictions; that is, keeping out those goods which we do not want to come in to destroy the market for our own goods. For example, when we are producing tomatoes we do not want outside tomatoes supplying the market.

We can keep them out by quantitative restrictions, so far as we require to do. In addition to quantitative restrictions, we can use subsidies and we can use exchange control. These three measures could exclude outside goods entirely. If the government and the various provincial governments of the country had the courage to say, "We are going to produce in Canada, for example, our own tomatoes; we are announcing to the world we are going to and we are announcing to Canada we are going to; we invite an all-over effort to produce tomatoes; produce them and we will guarantee the Canadian market"—if something similar is done with the various commodities that Canada can produce so well, then the producers will rise in great numbers if they are guaranteed interesting prices and an assured market.

There is nothing unreasonable about that proposal. We should impose rationing on goods in short supply and we should grant compensated discounts on goods in plentiful supply. There is nothing new or revolutionary in either one of those proposals; they were used freely and broadly during the war with great success and could have been used during the peace with equally great success. This last proposal, that of granting compensated discounts on goods in plentiful supply, is a means of price control. It is the price control which the Social Credit organization advocates, being price control by inducement and not by compulsion.

Then we should adopt generally effective and aggressive measures to increase the production of goods essential to Canada's freedom and prosperity, such as the production of our own coal, our own steel, our own oil for fuel, our own gas, our own electricity and the other things which we can produce, including our own sugar.

Any ordinary individual looking at the way in which Canada has managed her household during the last forty-five or fifty years would be struck with absolute astonishment that a group of intelligent people should so mismanage the magnificent asset which is Canada, allowing themselves to go billions and billions of dollars into debt to outside countries for commodities which could be produced in Canada with great success if the people just set about doing it.

I should like to give an example of the injurious effects which taxation has upon production and prices. If production is impaired, if prices are allowed to rise, both bring on inflation. Consequently this example of the injurious effects of taxation will indicate how that sort of thing can work toward inflation. May I read an excerpt from a rather interesting book which has come into my hands entitled, "Lincoln's incentive system," by James F. Lincoln. This man Lincoln is head of one of the greatest companies in the world making the product he makes. His book was published only recently in 1946. What he puts into his book is the results of his own practical experience in his own magnificent company in the United States. This is what he says on page 72:

> Only the consumer pays taxes in the final analysis. This statement may need clarification.
> Let us take a case in point. We go to a gas station to buy a gallon of gas, for which we pay 20 cents. Of that, six cents is advertised as sales tax. That leaves 14 cents. The company providing the gas pays taxes of over 100 million dollars. Each gallon produced must pay its share of this tax which is about two cents. The railroad transported the gas. It pays another 100 million of taxes. That adds another cent in freight charge. The station that sells it has a tax which adds another cent. All the people who furnish the oil company any and all supplies, labour, or material must add their taxes in their charges, since they can get their money to pay taxes only from their customers. After all the taxes have been taken out, the gas cost is less than four cents, the taxes nearly 16 cents. If the 16 cents had been listed as sales tax we should scream our heads off. Or should we?

And then at page 138 he says:

The present graduated income tax, which excludes the possibility of the able to profit from their ability, will in the same way that serfdom did eliminate the best efforts of the able in our economy. What is more serious, it will stop the further development of the latent abilities of those on whom we depend for leadership in our economy. Not only that, it will kill the desire of the rising generation to develop. This, if continued, will wreck our economy if we are to meet the competition of other nations who give freedom of opportunity to their industries and their citizens.

And further on:

I wonder what our reaction to the governmental taxation would have been if, at the time of the passing of the income tax law, we had been told that this law, with its double taxation of profits and renegotiation, would take from the stockholders in many cases over 99 per cent of every dollar of profit made by the industry.

Perhaps that would be excused by the statement "that can happen only to the rich stockholder who gets too much anyway." How should we have reacted if we had known that a widow, whose sole income was from 100 shares of stock of the Lincoln Electric Company, was to be taxed 95 per cent on her part of the profit of the company? Out of $12,000 of company profit, the government took $11,400 and left her $600. Still more important, a large part of the $11,400 taken from her by the government would have gone to the consumer in lower prices, had not government grabbed it out of her hand.

That is a rather striking account of the effect of income tax on production and prices in the United States. I would imagine that if a carefully prepared statement were made in Canada it would be just as revealing as that one.

May I give now an example of the relatively simple means which we could adopt to bring about an improvement in the Canadian production of coal. May I quote from an address by Mervyn Brown on a national coal policy at a parliamentary dinner on April 28, 1948. Many hon. members will remember that. He said:

The extensive report made by the Milnes Coal Company of Toronto (one of the largest wholesale and retail coal distributing companies in Canada) should satisfy you as to the quality of this hard coal. This report was endorsed by many other Ontario coal dealers.

I shall read a few lines from this impressive Milnes' report, which has been widely published. I quote:

"The results of these tests carried out in our own yards and the reports from our customers were remarkable. These reports convince us that this Alberta hard coal is practically smokeless and clean to handle and that it possesses all the burning qualities of high grade American anthracite . . . It is obviously of the greatest importance that large tonnages of this hard coal should be mined and delivered to the coal dealers of Ontario at the earliest possible moment. . . . If a well designed plan for distribution is laid down to market a Canadian fuel of this quality at a reasonable price, we are confident that the product will soon command an extensive market throughout Ontario."

Ladies and gentlemen—this property has continued to lie dormant in face of the fact that during the last 25 years we have sent out of Canada approximately $887,000,000 to purchase foreign anthracite.

And this is only part of the story.

According to consulting coal engineers of high repute—this hard coal can be mined and delivered to Ontario homes at from $12.50 to $13.25 per ton—after yielding a substantial profit. Yet the Ontario householder pays an average of $20 per ton for foreign hard coal of inferior quality. The Alberta hard coal would thus save him over $5 per ton—or $35 each year on seven tons—an amount equal to another week's wages for the man in a low income bracket.

If 5,000,000 tons of this hard coal were shipped over our own railways—to the coal-less provinces of Ontario and Quebec—the saving would amount to $25,000,000 annually—an amount equal to four per cent interest on the whole funded debt of Ontario.

Ladies and gentlemen—a deposit of hundreds of millions of tons of this high-grade hard coal lies dormant in Canada—while we depend upon foreign countries to supply us with this basic necessity of life.

Listen to the concluding paragraphs of a recent report on this Highwood coal property by one of the foremost consulting engineers of the United States:

"I am familiar with all the coal fields of western North America. I know of very large tonnages of low grade coal. But I know of no high grade coal deposit that has the physical characteristics of the Burns deposit.

In conclusion, I wish to emphasize several specific statements about the Burns coal. The quality of this high-grade coal has been amply demonstrated. It stands up well to sizing, handling, transportation and weather. It abounds in such thick beds under such apparently shallow cover that it can be strip-mined at low cost. It is the greatest known body of hard coal in western North America and should command extensive and profitable markets."

That indicates to what extent we could have developed Canada's natural resources to the end that we would have been supplying our own needs in superabundance. It can be shown conclusively that we are neglecting resources of equally remarkable richness and extent in respect of several other important needs of this nation. Any genuinely intelligent administration that set out with the deliberate objective of making the Canadian people free and happy and prosperous would use these resources and would adopt the means that would use them. That is just plain common sense. You do not have to have any Social Credit theories to see that that can be done. Social Credit would realize that these resources ought to be developed and would take the measures that would develop them.

May I quote another statement on this matter of coal. I feel rather strongly about this question; the fact that Canada submits to huge yearly imports of coal is one of the main causes of the dollar shortage about which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is so much worried. What I cannot see is why the minister and his predecessors have not gone about some sort of solution of the problem, instead of simply getting up here and telling us about the trouble, while we go into debt and suffer. I quote from a submission to the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, of March 19, 1948, at page 4:

> The Highwood hard coal contains an average of about 1,000 more B.T.U.'s or heat units per pound than the average pre-war American anthracite.
> Inasmuch as probably 50 per cent of the coal in this extensive coal bearing area lies above valley or water level, competent consulting coal engineers have stated that this hard coal can be strip-mined and tunnel-mined at a very low cost per ton.
> This hard coal can be mined—transported—and distributed in Ontario under existing mining costs and net freight rates at a price which will drastically lower home heating bills.
> The annual solid fuel requirements of Ontario and Quebec for domestic heating approximate:
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Ontario ..... | 6,250,000 tons |
> | Quebec ..... | 2,250,000 tons |
> | Total ..... | 8,500,000 tons |
> These total requirements are mainly met by United States coals and imported coke.
> Limited tonnages of domestic coke are produced in Canada from American and Nova Scotia coal. A very limited tonnage of solid fuels is imported from overseas.
> Between 1928 and 1940 Alberta shipped to Ontario an average of about 41,000 tons of coal annually, mainly to points in northern and western Ontario.
> We submit that this large central Canada solid fuel requirement can be ultimately mainly supplied by the development of the Highwood hard coals in Alberta.
> Attached to this general brief is a separate brief referring more specifically to the quantity and quality of coal in the Rio Alto (Burns) properties.
> It is undoubtedly your desire that Canadian coal production be vastly increased in the shortest possible time—to conserve and obtain much needed American dollars.
> It is undoubtedly your desire that if practicable, the standard of living be raised by drastically lowering home-heating costs.
> Again and again, you have warned the people of the grave dangers that lie ahead in continuing to depend upon imports of foreign coal.
> It is, we believe, your desire that the development of this Highwood area be carried out by individual initiative and private capital.
> Given certain conditions, individual initiative and private capital wait the opportunity to develop the Highwood coal area with vigour and speed.
> The essential condition is a firm understanding by one or both of the Canadian railway companies to construct a short spur line to serve the Highwood area.
> This spur will be about 50 miles in length.
> It should join the Canadian Pacific Calgary-McLeod branch line at Okotoks, Alberta.
> This line from Okotoks to Calgary can easily carry another 5,000,000 tons or more of freight annually to the main line of the C.P.R. at Calgary and to the C.N.R. at the same point.
> The total cost of this short rail spur line from Okotoks to the Highwood Coal areas should not exceed $1,500,000 inclusive of steel rails.
> The grade should be about half of one per cent in favour of the load.
> Construction will involve very little rock cutting and no large bridges have to be built.
> The spur can be constructed in about four months. If done as a war measure or a greatly needed post-war project, it might be built even more quickly.
> Whereas in pre-war periods a large amount of manual labour was required in rail construction, the job can now be accomplished largely by mechanical means, using bull-dozers, et cetera, with a great saving of manpower and capital.
> It is strange to hear comment from time to time about the "immense task and cost" of building a fifty-mile rail spur to make the product of this vast coal area available to the people of Canada.

After that information has gone on record, Mr. Speaker, if the people of Ontario and Quebec do not rise in a united demand that their fuel interests shall be looked after by the government in power here, then I must say I stand absolutely amazed at the people of Ontario and Quebec.

I turn now from production, which is the first fundamental essential if we are to avoid inflation. What are the main monetary principles involved in Social Credit proposals? They are, first, a monetary authority which would have charge of all monetary affairs within the dominion. Second, the creation of debt-free money to be spent—not lent—into circulation. This debt-free money to be backed by the goods and services, producing and consuming, of the country. This principle is the centre and core of the whole series of Social Credit proposals. Third, the use of such money to stabilize the price structure. Fourth, the progressive elimination of the debt system of finance.

I said I would undertake to show that these principles are realistic, scientific and sound. As a beginning to keep my promise, may I refer to some men whose authority as financial students it will be hard to question. First I refer to Vincent C. Vickers, who was connected with the Vickers Company in Britain.

These are the things which help to establish the authority of Mr. Vickers. He was an Oxford graduate. Consequently, as an Oxford graduate he got a whole lot of unrealistic ideas into his head which, when he finally got them out, proved beyond any shadow of doubt that he had discovered the weakness of the orthodox and the virtues of the new. He was deputy lieutenant of the city of London; a director of Vickers Limited for twenty-two years; a director of the Bank of England from 1910 to 1919; president of the Economic Reform Club and Institute, London.

He died in November, 1939. He wrote a book named "Economic Tribulation", and finished it almost on his dying bed. It was first published in 1941 and printed in Great Britain by Stephen Austin and Sons of Hertford. These facts concerning this man indicate that if he, in the circumstances under which he was raised and lived, and considering the society among which he moved, could change his opinion from the orthodox notions of finance to opinions similar to those of Social Credit, there is something or other in the Social Credit proposals that appeal to the mind of a thinker. Vincent C. Vickers advocated at the close of his book (1) a national monetary agency; (2) stabilization of price levels through the use of that agency; (3) debt-free money spent—not lent—into circulation; (4) the abolition of the debt system of finance. See how closely his recommendations follow the Social Credit idea. Here are some quotations from his book, from which hon. members can draw their own conclusions as to whether what I have said is true. At page 74 of "Economic Tribulation" we find:

> 1. State control and state issue of currency and credit through a central organization managed and controlled by the state.
> 2. Stabilization of the wholesale price level of commodities; that is to say, a fixed and constant internal purchasing power of money; so that a pound will buy tomorrow what it bought yesterday; an honest pound, not a fluctuating pound. And this can be done by so issuing and regulating the volume of available credit and currency that it shall at all times be adequate to permit of the purchasing power of the consumer being equated with the volume of production; not by limiting the purchasing power, but by firstly increasing purchasing power more in proportion to the productive capacity of industry.
> 4. Any additional supply of money should be issued as a clear asset to the state; so that money will be spent into existence, and not lent into existence.
> 7. The abolition of the debt system where all credit is created by the banks and hired out at interest to the country.

Mr. Speaker, as regards that stand of Mr. Vincent Vickers, taken after a lifetime of careful study of the economic tribulation in which he found the world, which resulted shortly after his death in the greatest war of all time, the conclusions of such a man are surely such that they ought to be treated with respect.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

May I turn to another eminent authority, whom I think hon. members will find equal difficulty in disregarding. I refer to Professor Paul H. Douglas of the University of Chicago's economics department. This man has written a book called "Controlling Depressions", published in 1935. Any hon. member who has not read that book with great care I would urge to read it with great care because it is of great value. If he reads it he will come away from it a much wiser man than when he approached it. I found it one of the most compelling books I ever read, most instructive and enlightening on every aspect of economics. This is what Professor Paul H. Douglas says, after a well-documented study of the whole field of economics in so far as he could compress it in a book of about 280 pages. This is taken from his conclusion on page 278:

> A nationally managed system of currency and credit until such time as an international system may be perfected.
> The removal from private banking of the power of creating commercial credit and the lodging of this function in a socialized agency which will serve as the manufacturer and wholesaler of credit, and with private institutions serving merely as the retailers.
> The creation of credit by this socialized agency should follow two main principles: (a) to provide, so far as possible, employment or useful work for those thrown out of their jobs by business depressions, and (b) to stabilize in a rough manner the general price level.

Hon. members will notice that his proposals generally do not conform so completely with the Social Credit concept as the proposals of Vincent Vickers; nevertheless there is a striking resemblance even there. Hon. members will be interested to find that Professor Douglas advocates dividends in certain circumstances.

I refer now to certain examples of debt-free money in history, cases in which debt-free money has been used with unquestionable success. I shall name a few: the Guernsey island experiment which commenced in 1815 and went to 1829, in which great quantities of money, considering the size of the island, were issued, apparently backed by the going-concern activities of the island, and were used in building a market house, paying for debts, building dikes, building schools and so on. No ill results were noticed. This experiment is thoroughly described in a book which hon. members will find in the library, called "An Example of Communal Currency", by J. Theodore Harris, published in 1911.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Was the money finally redeemed?

Mr. BLACKMORE: A good deal of it was redeemed through collecting a fee on the market house after it was built, but a great deal of it remained in circulation.

Second, the greenback experiment through which Abraham Lincoln issued over $400 million of greenbacks, backed by goods and services, produced and consumed by the United States in his time, and won the civil war.

Third, Britain's Bradbury experiment, discussed fully in two books which are found in the library by Doctor William A. Shaw: the first, "Currency, Credit and the Exchanges", published in 1926, and the second, "The Theory and Principles of Central Banking", published in 1930. They are very revealing in their instructive consideration of this subject. With these books in the library, I stand amazed that so many hon. members in the house have never given any attention to the important matter of money and what can be done with money in the way of creating a new order, not money that is collected from the people but money that can be created by the state, backed by the goods produced by the state and used by the state by being spent into circulation to improve the general economic well-being of the nation.

Fourth, the $26,000,000 which Canada created during world war I, which was spent into circulation during that war, and which saved the interest that would have been charged on $26,000,000 of debt.

The thing which I have been utterly amazed at is that there was no money created during the recent war by the government, but every single cent of the cost of that war was saddled on the Canadian people as a debt to bear interest for an indefinite period of time. This constitutes one of the public crimes of the administration occupying the seats of government today.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order. I must remind the hon. member that his time is exhausted.

Some hon. MEMBERS: He has about three minutes to go.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to burden the house, but may I discuss briefly one or two aspects of the Guernsey island experiment which everybody finds interesting. There is a great writer on economics with whom everybody is more or less familiar. I refer to Sir Norman Angell. He published a little booklet, called "Your Money," around 1936. It is an interesting little booklet. There are two statements made in the little volume to which I would direct the attention of hon. members, because they have a bearing on what we have just been discussing, the matter of the Guernsey island experiment. They help to show how it was that Guernsey island was able to issue the money without causing inflation, and the extent to which she could have issued it without causing inflation. Sir Norman Angell says that the amount of money which a nation needs in circulation depends upon the number of exchanges of goods for goods, goods for services, services for goods which need to be effected in the nation; that every one of these exchanges requires money because money is the medium of exchange. Wherever an exchange is required there has to be the medium; therefore there has to be money. That gives us a valuable key to the amount of money which can safely be created in a state. I quote from the little booklet to which I referred. On page 31 the following appears:

> Guernsey's method had obvious advantages, and speaking broadly, achieved its objects and was successful.

Again this statement:

> It is not "backing" which of itself is the determining factor, but quantity in relation to exchanges needing to be operated.

I quote that because it gives such a useful hint as to the amount of money which can be created safely in a state and used without causing inflation.

I had other things which I thought I would say, Mr. Speaker, but I do not feel it is becoming that I should use the time of the house any further. Therefore I will leave other things to which I wished to refer, particularly quotations from Doctor William A. Shaw in those great books of his, and quotations from other eminent authorities, which I shall probably bring to the attention of the house at some future time.

May I now just lay down a conclusion which I challenge anyone in this house to question and prove to be untrue. Social Credit proposals are realistic, scientific, and sound, and can be so established from the finest authorities to be found in the world today, as well as from experience; Social Credit proposals will not cause inflation.

I would urge upon hon. members once again, and upon the dominion government as a whole, that there lies hope for security in Canada and an abundance with freedom, only through Social Credit, only through the use of the power which was given to Canada by the British North America Act to create currency and credit in accordance with public need. I commend Social Credit proposals as an alternative to this bleak and forbidding budget which we are now considering throughout Canada, and from which we shall at once commence to suffer.

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the budget announced on the 18th of this month was indeed a sad disappointment to all Canadian citizens. During the past year we have experienced a period of steeply rising prices which have made it all the more difficult for those earning small incomes to maintain a livelihood. Early last fall the austerity program was introduced, and it announced to the nation at large the necessity for economy, the prohibition of the purchase of goods from our neighbours to the south, and also heavy taxation of many Canadian-made goods which are essential to the maintenance of the household.

Early in this session, through the fear of the government that prices were rising unduly, the prices committee was set up to bring in findings to deal with the situation which was then alarming the government. Since the setting up of that committee, the Canadian people have waited anxiously and earnestly to see what would be done to relieve them of the burden of high taxation and high living expenses. I am sure many of us felt that there was a lag in production and a lack of initiative because of the difficulty which the smaller businessman and the smaller wage earner have been experiencing in maintaining a livelihood under present conditions in Canada.

The result, I am thoroughly convinced, was that Canadians far and wide expected in the coming budget a more conscientious grappling with the situation that confronted them. They certainly had reason to hope for something from the prices committee that would tend to solve their problem, but no findings have yet been brought in. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) mentioned this evening that the findings of the prices committee had established certain things. I fail to see where any findings have been made so far, and I do not think Canadians generally who have followed the deliberations of the committee entertain any great hope of its reaching a solution of the problems facing the country.

Everywhere throughout Canada there was a feeling that relief from taxation must come in the budget announcements. Many people urged that it be given by way of the abolition of hidden taxes, reduction in the sales tax, reduction in the income tax, an increase in the exemptions, and in many other ways which would give a further inducement to the Canadian people to work, to produce, to save and to increase their business and their production in a time of scarcity.

There is no doubt there is scarcity. There is no doubt we have markets for our goods. There is no doubt our big problem is to find ways of selling our goods to purchasers from whom we can get United States dollars for them. We can sell any goods that we can produce if we give time or credit. Consequently, the big problem facing the Minister of Finance was the problem of increasing production, increasing exports rather than decreasing imports, and, so far as we possibly could effect it, the obtaining of United States dollars, so that we could live our lives in our own country on an income which is warranted in view of the resources we have. We should have an income in excess of that of any other nation, because we have the resources and all the materials needed, and there is demand for our goods. All we have to do is to produce the goods and obtain compensation for them.

When, however, the minister announced his budget, the whole house was shocked to realize that there was practically no attempt to grapple with the situation that we find ourselves in today. I believe everyone of us felt that the government had finally made up their mind that they did not want to satisfy the wishes of the Canadian people, that they did not want to meet the demands of the Canadian people, and that they could postpone the election date a little longer.

I believe the Canadian people are suspicious of the government withholding relief from taxation, withholding their program of legislation until such time as they can hold it out as an inducement to the people to return them to power. The result is that if you walk along the street you will find that the average citizen is thoroughly convinced that no government would produce a budget so unpopular if they thought of appealing to the electorate a short time thereafter.

When we look at the concessions granted by the budget, I think it is significant of the psychology of the cabinet. They have decided to give some relief to the man over sixty-five years of age. They give him an extra $500 deduction from income tax, and I do not think there is anything wrong with that principle. There are many people in advanced years, over sixty-five, who have retired on superannuation benefits of one kind or another, or who are retiring on their life's earnings, with small incomes, who have been in straits to maintain a decent living under the heavy taxation which Canadians have had to bear. To these men the government have opened their hearts to the extent of an increase of $500 in exemption.

In my opinion, however, there is a class of people who warrant the consideration of this cabinet to an even greater extent than our citizens who are over sixty-five years of age. I speak of the young people, the men and women who have returned from the war, or people who, by virtue of the war, have not been able to establish themselves in their own private businesses, industries or occupations, or even in their own homes. These people are beginning their life's work and are subject to heavy taxation, and I believe that relief should have been given to the young people as well as to the old.

One realizes that today, with the cost of living as it is in Canada, the householder cannot maintain himself at the standard to which Canadians are entitled, because they are penalized to the extent of twenty-five per cent on electric stoves, electrical appliances and refrigerators, so that they cannot set up housekeeping, even though those articles are made in Canada by Canadians, not requiring any major portion of United States dollars. People must still pay a tax which, according to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), was such as to prohibit our young people from enjoying the use of these articles.

We find that you can benefit, provided that you die and are not worth more than $50,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Who wants to die?

Mr. BOUCHER: Who wants to die in Canada, as my hon. friend says?

Mr. WEIR: Not under a good government.

Mr. BOUCHER: The Minister of Finance has been, in his own words, quite generous. In respect of those foodstuffs that were previously subject to the sales tax, he has given relief, and he says he will lose revenue that should go to the treasury to the extent of something like $20,000,000 in the year. There are about 12,000,000 Canadians, and the cancellation of this tax will mean on the average a saving of about $1.60 per person per annum. That is not a very generous gesture in the attempt to bring relief from the high cost of living and the heavy taxation which the people have to bear. It indicates to me that the government has had inculcated in its mind, as a result of wartime psychology, the idea that it must tax the Canadian people in order to keep them thrifty. It must save money for Canadians because Canadians cannot be allowed to save for themselves. I believe the government has reflected its firm conviction that the Canadian people cannot be thrifty, cannot save for themselves without the assistance of the paternalistic front row in the House of Commons to do their saving for them—a paternalistic government represented in the person of the Minister of Finance.

To me that is an entirely false conception of the very spirit of Canadianism. We in this country are an aggressive people, willing to work, anxious to work, a thrifty people who are eager to put aside something for a rainy day without the government helping us to do so.

I believe that we have experienced in Canada much greater thrift on the part of the average citizen than we have on the part of the government in the matter of expenditures. I believe that if the government, in their budget, had announced where they were going to economize a little more on the reckless expenditures we have had, instead of saying they were going to make it so that people could not spend and could not buy scarce materials, the Canadian people would give a much better reception to the budget that is brought before us.

I think of the people with whom I come in contact daily; that is, the farming people in my community who are producing the goods for export and working eight, ten, twelve and eighteen hours a day to do so; these farmers are assisted by their wives and members of their families, all working on a joint venture for the production of much-needed goods to help out a hungry world. I am amazed when I find the government sending out to them an income tax statement and asking them to fill out that income tax form if they want to take advantage of the three-year average in taxation, asking them to fill out a long, white sheet, telling everything they are worth, their total assets; saying in this House of Commons: "You must have it understood that you do not have to do it until we demand you to do it", but continuing to send it out and asking them to do it, and having them believe they must do it; going to them through their representatives and saying: "You have not done so now, so we must do it. Show me your bank account for the last ten years; tell me what you have purchased for the last ten years, what you have given away for the last ten years, what you have built in the last ten years, by what amount you have increased your assets in the last ten years." By such procedure you will undoubtedly arouse the resentment of anybody placed in that position.

It is not fair to agriculture, because agriculture will see what the government is doing for other classes of people. Immediately the farmer realizes that double depreciation has been given to industry to increase their plants, their machinery, to enlarge their capacity for production, to increase their manufacturing facilities by their capital investment at a rate, as the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) pointed out, seven times as great as that of the United States, there is every reason for him to feel dissatisfied with the requirements made upon him with regard to taxation.

Sometimes when I am out in my country and meet my farm constituents, they ask me if any of those in the front row have ever been on a farm; if they would like to come out and help make up their financial statement, their income statement for the last ten years; if they would like to help them calculate their increase in capital investment, their depreciation, their basic earnings, their three-year earnings; how they could decide that, where the daughter has lived for twenty-seven, twenty-eight or thirty years at home on the farm, helped the housewife in the house, driven the horse on the hayfork, driven the hayrake out in the field, raised the poultry to pay for the groceries of the house, raised pigs to pay for the taxes for the year, yet the farmer would not be allowed, as an exemption, her wages because the main work was within the house. Then there is the young fellow under twenty-one years of age, learning his trade of farming, perhaps attending school, going home from school and doing as many of us who have been brought up on the farm have done, taking off his school clothes and getting into his overalls, doing chores until eight or nine o'clock at night, and then going in to do his homework. Those in that position cannot help reflecting on the difference between such and those who are not in pursuit of agriculture.

I think a great picture can be painted that would impel this government in reason to allow consideration not only to the farmer who works many more hours than seven or eight a day, five or six or seven days a week, and to give more just compensation to individual initiative in the production of much needed goods commensurate with the work done, and the application given in that regard.

The same thing could be said about the smaller business people. When the small businessman or the young man setting up in a small business—be it a garage, a store, a workshop or any artisan trade—can see a big manufacturing company, as has been the case, allowed to increase its capital investment with double depreciation, while he is not allowed to do so, you again force that man to believe that this House of Commons is catering to big interests and, irrespective of what are the demands of the present day, is not considering the needs of the smaller man.

Then, when you see within our cities the civil servant, the man who is employed by the government, getting the great promises he did a year or so ago, of a re-examination of civil service salaries, wages, living conditions and classifications; when you see the Gordon report recommend that certain department offices be taken from the operation of the Civil Service Act and the appointments left to the treasury board or to a committee of the cabinet; then, when you find out that, after all that is done, the charwoman in the House of Commons can come to work about 4.30 or 5 o'clock in the morning, trudging here from her home which may be at some distance, work until about 9.30 in the morning and get a mere $3 or $4 a day, while you find the private secretary to the Prime Minister of Canada receiving a raise in pay per year of $5,000, you will find that there is plenty of reason for discontentment and dissatisfaction, and a demand for a better deal.

It is now eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and I do not intend to proceed with my discussion of this matter tonight. I feel that it is but my duty, however, to point out, as critically as I can, the total lack of a realistic approach to the problems of the day in the budget as announced. I believe that the Canadian people would produce more, would be happier and would in a much greater measure solve our problems of high prices, high taxation and United States dollars if the government showed more confidence in their ability to do so than the budget reflects.

In conclusion, may I say that I believe, if our Canadian farmer were allowed to export his meat products and his farm production to the United States and sell them at the price he could receive for them there, without export restrictions, it would give us more United States dollars than the Minister of Finance is able to tell us that his austerity program has brought in since its inception.

On motion of Mr. McKay, the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Tomorrow we shall continue the budget debate.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 25, 1948

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO REPORT IN "GLOBE AND MAIL"

Mr. J. L. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In the Globe and Mail of this morning it is stated that I attend Liberal party caucuses. This statement is incorrect, because I attend neither their caucuses nor those of any other party in the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is a pardonable error.

DEBATES COMMITTEE

LEAVE TO SIT WHILE HOUSE IN SESSION

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor):

That the standing committee on debates be empowered to sit while the house is sitting.

Motion agreed to.

THE KING'S PLATE

WON BY "LAST MARK", OWNED AND BRED IN BRANT COUNTY, ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. CHARLTON (Brant): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner): Is the minister aware of the fact that "Last Mark", owned and bred by James Fair of Cainsville, in Brant county, won the King's Plate yesterday, at Toronto Woodbine Park, bettering the previous record by one and three-fifth seconds?

Mr. GRAYDON: We will have another winner on June 7.

An hon. MEMBER: Also ran.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday, May 24, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) this year was, to say the least, a disappointment to most Canadians. It is a typical big business budget, which makes little or no attempt to meet the great problem of the day, that of the high cost of living. Despite increased living costs the personal income tax exemptions remain unaltered except for a few people over sixty-five years of age who are fortunate enough to have an income.

There has been only the slightest gesture to remove hidden taxes which constitute one of the nation's heaviest burdens. The removal of the eight per cent sales tax on the essentials of life should have been part of the government's program this year to meet the high prices that the consumer is called upon to pay. This tax could have been very well removed from clothing, shoes, furniture, kitchen utensils and dishes without dissolving completely away the huge surplus of three-quarters of a billion dollars which has been declared this year by the minister. But the government has removed the sales tax on only thirty-eight food items—a weak gesture indeed toward meeting the high cost of living.

The acute housing shortage could have been relieved by removing the sales tax on construction materials, plumbing fixtures and electrical fittings. If that were done I am sure there would be more inducement for builders to get on with the much needed housing program. But the government continues to do nothing to reduce construction costs, with the result that our home building program lags dangerously.

Both the farmer and labour are disappointed with this year's budget.

Mr. A. R. Mosher, president of the Canadian Congress of Labour, has stated in a press release that income tax exemptions should have been raised to ease the drastic drop in "real income," and that the sales tax should have been abolished on clothing and construction materials. There are also protests, almost without number, from farmers and farm organizations regarding the failure of the government to realize the pressing need to meet the high cost of living by drastic cuts in hidden taxes and by an increase in the income tax exemptions. But the government does not appear to be unduly alarmed about these protests; otherwise something surely would be done about them. After its terrible blunder in removing price controls, the least the government could now do is to endeavour to redeem its position by removing taxes which bear most heavily on the consumers, particularly on those in the low income brackets. But the sales tax and the excise tax largely remain. Very little has been done to reduce living costs.

I believe that something may be said for maintaining taxes at a reasonable level in order to retire public debt. Those taxes should be collected from the people who are best able to pay them. Corporations and persons with high incomes are the ones best able to meet those obligations. Had the government retained the excess profits tax, which was removed last year, income tax exemptions could have been increased, all sales taxes abolished.

The burden which the great majority of Canadians bear in high living costs could have been materially lightened had the government brought down a "humanity first" budget, rather than one based on big business practice. It is indeed most difficult to reconcile the present attitude of the government to sales and hidden taxes, in the light of a statement made to this house in 1931, on June 4, by the late Colonel J. L. Ralston, who then protested against the higher sales tax being imposed upon the public by the Conservative government then in power. He stated on that occasion:

> Yet as I say the tax has been increased from one per cent to four cent and it is being passed on to and paid by the only people who do pay—the consumers. It is the ordinary, everyday consumers, the men and women who are hard put to make ends meet, men who are out of work, who are now called upon to pay the extra amount in connection with the sales tax.

But the attitude of the government seems to have changed. The excise profits tax has been taken off big corporations, but the sales tax on most consumer goods still remains.

I believe that one of the main evils of Canada's economy, as identified by the Rowell-Sirois report, is the heavy dependence of the government on taxes which take no account of the citizen's ability to pay. The sales and excise taxes are perfect examples of this evil. They bear equally on rich and poor alike, regardless of their income. Moreover, in hard times they discourage consumption, and hence production. In good times like the present they may not seriously retard the public demand for goods, but they definitely add to the cost of living and add to it inequitably. Sales and excise taxes simply add to the financial burden of every household in the country, and run counter to all the nation's efforts to put taxation on a sound basis.

Everyone hears and knows a lot about income tax but very few realize the import of Canada's hidden tax system. The income tax in 1947-48 placed $659 million in the federal treasury, but this represents only twenty-five per cent of the tax burden that Canadians pay to the federal treasury. The other taxes with the exception of the corporation and excess profits taxes, which realized $591 million during the last year, are much more onerous than the income tax, because they are largely hidden from view. The customs tax last year produced $293 million, excise taxes $464 million, sales taxes $372 million, and succession duties $30 million, and these together with several other taxes produced seventy-five per cent of all federal revenue from taxes, or three times as much as the personal income tax. The total tax bill for the past financial year was $2,452 million. Based on a Canadian population of some twelve million, this means that for each person in Canada there was a federal tax of $204.33, or on the basis of a family of five a tax of $1,021.65. Of this amount, sales and other regressive taxes account for seventy-five cents of every dollar paid in federal taxes.

Few people realize the variety of these taxes. The federal government taxes building materials, plumbing equipment and manufactured commodities with but few exceptions. Automobiles, pianos, rugs, kitchen utensils, and even children's toys and clothing all carry the eight per cent sales tax.

There is a federal tax on long distance telephone calls, telegrams, railway, bus, air and steamship travel. If a broken clock or watch has to be replaced, you must pay an extra 25 per cent excise tax. The government, however, has seen fit to remove the tax on the lowly alarm clock, for which all early risers are thankful. A smoker who buys a pipe or lighter pays an extra 35 per cent tax over and above the eight per cent sales tax. Fountain pens carry the same tax.

Canadian troops during the war paid $1 for 300 cigarettes because they were tax free. In most parts of Canada 300 cigarettes now cost $5.25 which means that $4.25, or 28 cents a package has gone largely into the federal treasury.

Children who buy chocolate bars are obliged to pay a 30 per cent tax, plus the eight per cent sales tax. The same applies to chewing gum. Soft drinks are subject to a 25 per cent tax, plus one cent per bottle, and there are huge federal taxes on tobacco and liquor which realize millions of dollars. With that I for one have no quarrel, because these are definitely classified as luxuries, and if the government requires taxes—and all governments do—these are commodities that could well stand the tax.

A cheque requires a minimum federal excise stamp of three cents, and one cent postage on a letter is a recently imposed federal tax. Coal, unless imported from Britain, carries 50 cents a ton excise tax, plus eight per cent sales tax, and when you pay your life insurance premium the federal government collects two per cent as tax.

If you furnish your house, the furniture and carpets include eight per cent sales tax; and electrical apparatus, including radios, electric stoves, refrigerators and toasters, are subject to an extra tax of 25 per cent. We must not forget the excise tax on matches, furs, toilet preparations, cameras and a host of other articles; and also the customs taxes which filched $24 per capita from our pockets last year, and have been reflected in the price of consumer goods.

Most Canadians will not quarrel with taxes on luxuries, but any tax on the essentials of life is unjust because it has no relation to ability to pay. Such taxes are the sales and excise taxes, largely hidden from view. These taxes bear most heavily on people with families, and substantially add to the high cost of living.

The manner in which the sales tax is collected gives rise to a further injustice. The eight per cent sales tax is placed on manufactured goods and is based on the manufacturers' selling price. When the wholesaler sells the commodity to the retailer, his markup is calculated on a price which includes the original tax. The same thing happens at the retail level, and therefore the tax actually paid by the consumer is much higher than eight per cent—probably nearer to twelve per cent. This tax should have been wholly removed from the necessities of life in order to ease the burden of the high cost of living on people with low incomes. In view of the great surplus of $700 million this year, the government should have taken steps to remove the sales tax on essentials of life and on construction materials as well. Such a measure would have been anti-inflationary and would have had a far-reaching effect on lowering price levels.

I also feel that the tax on chocolate bars, candy and soft drinks could have been removed. Children, who are the great consumers of these commodities, ought not to be penalized, especially when the government has found its way clear to remove the amusement tax on night clubs and pari-mutuels. Last year the government removed the excess profits tax. This meant a loss to the treasury of several hundred millions of dollars. This tax ought to be reimposed, and with this increased revenue the government would then be in a position to increase income tax exemptions to $1,250 for single persons and $2,500 for married persons, as is proposed in the C.C.F. amendment. Such exemptions are justified, if for no other reason than the increased cost of living in the past two years. The present exemptions are inadequate to meet the demands of the high price levels now prevailing.

I suggest further, in the interests of public welfare, that all hospital bills, doctor, dental and funeral expenses ought to be deductible from income tax. For the farmer who is finding it increasingly difficult to make ends meet, breeding herds ought to be recognized as capital assets, or at least a $500 tax exemption allowed on the yearly sale of livestock so that livestock production can be encouraged and maintained. I feel too, that in view of the biggest surplus on record the government could well afford to permit reasonable deductions from income tax for interest and mortgage payments on farms and homes if such mortgages were incurred prior to 1939.

Finally, in order to encourage farm and home ownership, I believe deductions of at least $250 a year should be allowed from income tax on the purchase of a farm or an urban home. I believe the adoption of the recommendations I have just made would do much to relieve the plight of the low income groups, and would improve the well-being of all Canadian citizens. The acceptance of such a program by this government would mark it as progressive, as a government more interested in human welfare than in currying the favour of the big interests.

Mr. JOHN R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just taken his seat began his remarks, as did others who preceded him, by saying the budget was so disappointing that the people with whom he has come in contact were greatly depressed. I am not going to take up any time talking about a matter that has caused so much depression among the people. I am going to try to do something that will lift the hearts of the people of Canada, particularly of those who live in the maritime provinces.

I have a resolution on the order paper, in the discussion of which I would have said much of what I intend to say now had I had the opportunity of speaking on it. Since I shall not have that opportunity I think it is only right that I should withdraw the resolution. Therefore, with your consent, sir, and with the consent of the house, I ask that the resolution standing in my name be removed from the order paper.

I am going to base my remarks on a Canadian Press dispatch dated April 19 appearing under the heading "Survey of maritimes shows prosperity low". In the course of this article the statement is made that the per capita income in the maritimes is only from 63 to 78 per cent of the average throughout Canada. This is indeed very low, and I will try to present a program to change that from low to high. The maritimes are the forgotten part of Canada. They have endured great depression, greater than should have been their lot.

Hon. members who were on the rehabilitation committee in 1943 and who listened to the debates, and hon. members who read the minutes of that committee, were impressed by the great opportunities there are throughout Canada if we Canadians would only review the resources of the country as we should and make some effort to develop them. The committee members themselves carefully surveyed the minutes and made a number of recommendations, perhaps a dozen. Those dozen recommendations I will reduce to five, but the five will contain the meat of the dozen.

The first recommendation was that maritime capacity to produce electric current should be greatly increased and at the same time rural electrification should be expanded. The second was that maritime primary and secondary industries should be greatly expanded. The third was that the maritime marshlands should be reclaimed. The fourth was that bottlenecks obstructing maritime trade, such as lack of a bridge across the strait of Canso and lack of a canal across Chignecto isthmus, should be overcome. Lastly, it was recommended that maritime agriculture should be given the benefits now extended to western farmers under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I am not going to discuss all these recommendations; I will take the first two.

I began to make inquiries in the maritime provinces which I visited three times for the purpose of ascertaining what holds back expansion of industry in that part of Canada, and the obstacles the committee thought should be removed in order to make for the expansion of maritime economy. The results of these inquiries I propose to give to the house.

At the outset I suggest that lack of expansion in the maritime provinces as compared with the rest of Canada is largely due to the lack of cheap electric power. That statement is supported by the Saint John reconstruction committee in their brief, which states clearly that in the first place expansion in the production of electricity is necessary to the expansion of industry, and secondly that a surplus of electricity is coincident with and precedent to industrial expansion.

After making an exhaustive survey I am convinced that if they had cheap electricity, with their splendid resources, they would expand much more rapidly than they have done.

One might ask how they compare with the central provinces in the production of electricity.

Electricity itself comes from several sources, or can be produced from several sources: first, water or hydro power; second, coal; third, oil; and fourth, gas. It is not my intention to deal with the last two, but only with the first and second, namely, hydro power, and power produced by coal.

It might be asked how the maritime provinces compare with the central provinces in capacity to produce power from water. Well, the two central provinces are happily situated. They have magnificent rivers, with a firm and substantial flow; when they make dams on the rivers they have a considerable height of water in the penstocks at the power houses from which they are able to develop a large quantity of cheap power, and their own advancement has been largely the result of cheap power.

I know from long experience in industry that the province of Ontario—and the same is true of the province of Quebec—owes its great industrial expansion to its capacity to produce cheap hydro power. In the maritimes they are not similarly situated. I do not know whether the time will ever come, but until someone proposes a method of developing power in the tidal estuaries, the maritimes have only one real hydro-electric power, namely that on the Saint John river at Grand Falls; and that is greatly handicapped by the lack of reservoir capacity. The reservoir capacity behind it is small, and the result is that while perhaps today, when the spring freshets are running down the river, they can produce 60,000 horsepower, in July or August it will be down to 30,000.

You cannot expand industry on such hydro development. But the maritimes have what Ontario and Quebec have not, namely, very large resources of coal, and today we can produce electric power just as cheaply from coal as from hydro power. There are those who will not believe that; nevertheless it is true. The Ontario hydro commission itself gives evidence of that, because at this moment it is building or planning to build a gigantic 150,000 horsepower plant in the vicinity of Windsor, Ontario. I have discussed the subject with their engineers, and they say that with proper coal and the latest modern high-pressure high-temperature boilers, using pulverized coal and turbo-generators, they can produce electricity as cheaply from coal as from water.

The maritime provinces have very large resources of coal, and I am sure that those resources can be their salvation in the production of power if the program I shall announce is carried into effect. And from that on, with cheap power and a surplus of power which they can easily have, they would invite industry in. I shall mention some examples of the industries I have in mind.

For quite a few years after my first travels in the maritime provinces I was convinced that unless they had cheap electric power there could not be much greater progress for them than that which they have so far attained. But being convinced that by means of their coal they can have cheap electric power, and a large surplus of it, I am equally convinced that the maritimes, if they receive the support they should receive, the support which I am going to suggest they should receive, will get on their way towards industrial expansion.

At least ten years ago, when this idea first presented itself to me, I began making surveys. At that time the whole of central and southern England was being revolutionized through the production of electricity. In England they had no hydro power of any consequence, and so they began to develop the power they require by production of electricity from coal. When I was in England making the first initial survey in relation to the production of electric power from coal, I found many new electric plants, with the most modern type of boilers. They were high-pressure high-temperature boilers, using pulverized coal which is blown in just like oil. I have seen a great many installations using pulverized coal, and you could not tell it from oil when you looked into the furnace. They had turbo-generators. With this equipment the whole industry of electric power production has been revolutionized, with the result that in every city in southern England—around London and for fifty miles out of London—you will find thousands of new industrial plants. The same thing applies to Manchester, Birmingham, Oldham, Leeds, and a score of other cities I visited to inquire into their production of cheap electricity.

All their power plants are connected together by what is called a grid system, and through their connections with the power plants of the country, they have 5,500 miles of main line grid. Today over in England their development staggers everyone who happens to have the privilege of seeing it. That power system does not cover the whole of England, and it is not the only one, but it is rapidly expanding. It is using 26,000,000 tons of British coal yearly. If we can expand maritime electricity production from maritime coal, it would at once provide a fairly good permanent home market for their coal and would take up a great deal of slack.

Following my return from England I pursued that study extensively and have been doing so for quite a number of years now. In the course of it I have visited a large number of electric power plants. Some of them were smart, modern power plants, of the new type which is called an outside-built plant. They were delivering electricity at a low price per kilowatt, as I will show later. I am satisfied that if we can assist—and that is what I intend to propose—the maritime provinces to equip themselves so that they can have an abundance of cheap electricity, they will be on their way much more rapidly than we dream of. There is no reason whatever why they should not expand like every other part of Canada, or of the United States, England or elsewhere, that has cheap power. There is no reason under the sun why they should not expand or why their industrial fabric should not expand. I am convinced that it will.

Returning from that survey in England, I travelled across the United States where there were these modern power plants using coal. I discussed the matter with the engineers to ascertain the cost of production of electricity in a coal-fired plant as compared with water, and I found it satisfactory. I am going to set out to show that in the modern coal-fired power plant, burning powdered coal—which, as hon. members know, is blown into the furnace—and with turbo-generators, electricity can be produced on the basis of one kilowatt hour per pound of coal used, 13,000 B.T.U.'s and up. The maritimes are well supplied with coal. In a few minutes I will produce evidence of that. But to continue with my reference to the survey which I made in connection with the cost of producing electric power from coal: everywhere I found that it ranged from possibly 0·9, perhaps 0·92, 1·1 or 1·12 pounds of coal per kilowatt hour to as low as 0·9 pounds of coal per kilowatt hour. That is cheap electricity. We cannot do any better anywhere.

With electricity that cheap, I am sure the maritimes would go ahead rapidly.

There is nothing that gives me so much heartache as to see what is happening in the maritimes. It is staggering to read daily in the press of the large numbers of fine young men and young women, the flower of the maritime provinces, moving away, many of them to the United States, many to the central part of Canada. Of course we are glad to have them here, but the majority of them should have the opportunity to earn a livelihood in their own provinces and to build up their own part of the country. If we cannot build up those provinces, it will be just too bad for the influence of the maritimes in the central part of Canada.

Continuing the investigation, I found that there was a great power plant—and it is only one of the many that I visited—at Michigan City, on the way to Chicago. If you go by the Toronto trains—I suppose by C.P.R.—you will pass that gigantic plant at Michigan City, with its many smokestacks. It has a capacity of 100,000 kilowatt hours of power. It powers the whole of southwestern Michigan and the whole of northwestern Indiana. The engineers will tell you that the power is produced there, on the average, on the basis of one kilowatt hour per pound of coal. That is mighty cheap power.

Some years ago those interested in the subject made a series of investigations which were referred to as the steam-station-power-costs investigation. Many were made. In the fourth investigation along that line, according to one of the editors of the Electrical World, a prominent electrical magazine, the average found was 0·92 pounds of coal per kilowatt hour. If therefore I base my argument for the maritime provinces on the basis of one kilowatt hour produced from one pound of coal, I am doing it on good authority.

As I said earlier, I am backed up by what the hydro are planning in their new plant at Windsor. They would not do it if they did not know they could do it on that basis. So I will say again, and I do not believe it can be repeated too often, that the salvation of industrial expansion in the maritimes—and it must be greatly expanded in order to keep its own folks at home and give them jobs—is the using of maritime coal to produce electricity. There is any amount of coal there, and the Lord has situated it conveniently. There are four main areas of coal. The largest and most important one of course is on Cape Breton island. According to our own bluebooks they have approximately two billion tons of No. 1 coal rated at 13,200 B.T.U.'s, which is a high B.T.U. capacity. Today they produce a little over four million tons of coal. They told me down there that if labour conditions were what they should be, or what they think they should be, or what the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) thinks they should be, and if they had better equipment in the mines, they could produce much more coal. I believe they can. If labour conditions were satisfactory and they had efficient machinery for taking the coal out of the mines there is no reason why they should not produce more coal. If they could produce six or seven million tons of coal, that would be a great advance in the maritime economy, because after all coal is their greatest source of revenue.

The next centre is the Westville, New Glasgow and Stellarton area, where I believe they produce about 500,000 tons a year. That coal is 12,500 B.T.U.'s, still a very high grade. The next area is in the riding of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black), at the Springhill mines, where they produce 600,000 tons a year. I have been there and looked over the plant carefully. That is a very high grade coal, up to 13,600 B.T.U.'s. Close at hand are the Joggins mines where they produce about 250,000 tons a year of 12,000 B.T.U. coal.

In the province of New Brunswick they have only one coal area, at Minto, where they have in reserve approximately 100 million tons of 12,000 B.T.U. coal. All maritime coal is conveniently situated on the mainland for transportation. In Prince Edward Island they have no coal, but they have one splendid harbour. They have more than one harbour, of course, but at Charlottetown, represented by the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure), they have an outstanding harbour. In that harbour they have a power plant; and perhaps I had better begin there and then go back around the rest of the maritimes. They have at Charlottetown a fairly modern power plant located on the harbour. Ships can come right up to the dock and unload, and with a simple method of taking the coal from the ships to the power plant they would have to all intents and purposes a dockside plant which would be as good as the best. Today that plant produces something around 8,000 to 10,000 kilowatt hours. They are modernizing that plant, and by next year or the year after I believe they will be producing 15,000 kilowatt hours. That is a reasonable capacity for the island, at present.

On the land side the largest power plant is at Minto, where they produce 23,460 kilowatt hours. That is large for the maritimes, but small in comparison with the hydro plants up this way, and also small in comparison with the big plant which is to be erected at Windsor, Ontario, to burn coal. Then at Maccan, Nova Scotia, they have a really smart little plant, which I went to see a couple of times. It is much like the electrical plants I went to see in the United States, and it is now producing about 17,500 kilowatt hours. I was glad to learn that they are increasing the size of the plant to double the production, and that within a short time they will be producing 35,000 kilowatt hours. I hope to live to see the day when that production will be doubled again, in view of what I may say later as to the possibilities of expansion. They also have a fine power plant at Halifax, and two splendid plants on Cape Breton island.

I am going to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the great lack in the maritimes has been a firm extra supply of cheap electric power. That is why they have not expanded. It is not the fault of the present power plants. I have nothing but the best to say about the maritime power plants I have mentioned, but I want to see their capacity doubled. I am convinced that another 25,000 kilowatt hour plant at Halifax would give that city the opportunity to expand to which it is rightly entitled. Another 25,000 kilowatt hour plant on Cape Breton island would permit that thrifty part of Nova Scotia to expand. Nothing will induce expansion of industry like extra power. As I said at the beginning, that is how Ontario has expanded; we have always had the power.

Mr. McCANN: We do not have it now.

Mr. MacNICOL: We will have it within another year, when the hydro-electric power commission will turn into the wires an additional million and a half horsepower from the gigantic dams being built up the Ottawa river. In addition, in two years time we will have available the big power plant to be constructed at Windsor. Therefore if we do not have the power now we soon will have it. The hydro-electric power commission is a concrete example of the result of the production of a vast number of kilowatt hours of cheap electricity distributed throughout the province of Ontario. No one knows better than the Ontario hydro-electric power commission that the expansion in this province has resulted from an abundance of cheap electricity; and this is also well understood in Quebec.

I believe I had come to the suggested new power plant for Cape Breton island. I should like to see another 25,000 horsepower plant in the New Glasgow-Westville-Stellarton area. They are almost up to capacity now, and one big new plant would meet their additional needs at the moment and leave a surplus for expansion. I also believe both the Minto area and the Saint John area in New Brunswick should have new power plants of not less than 25,000 horsepower capacity. There should be a new plant at Moncton, another at Bathurst, perhaps one at Campbellton in the north, and one down in the southwestern portion of New Brunswick. While I am at it, I believe I left out the southwestern portion of Nova Scotia, which generation after generation, has been more or less standing still, largely because of lack of power. A plant should be erected there. As Nova Scotia has the coal; why should it not have the power?

Now I come back to Prince Edward Island. I mentioned the power plant at Charlottetown. There is another small plant at Summerside with a capacity of about 1,500 kilowatt hours. A plant of 25,000 horsepower capacity at Charlottetown would permit the distribution of power throughout the island, and I am sure production would expand like nobody's business. I have been from one end of the island to the other. The power situation at Charlottetown is fairly good at the moment, but there is not much for the rest of the island. They must be given a chance to expand and develop their own resources, to produce in their home plants; and nothing will bring about that result better than an abundance of cheap electricity. I urge as strongly as possible, that these suggestions be adopted, because I am convinced that only by some such program can the maritime provinces expand. Their primary and secondary industries can be greatly enlarged, and that is essential if they are to expand economically so that their people may have something to do at home.

You may ask how all this has come about. Well, everywhere I went I asked engineers, "What would you recommend that the federal government do?" and I am going to tell you what these engineers suggested. Probably there will be other suggestions, some perhaps better than these; but the first one given me was that the federal government should advance one-third of the cost of that power program in the maritimes and one-third of the cost of rural electrification. That is what we did here in Ontario. We paid one-third of the cost for protection against floods on the Grand river, which amounted to a large sum of money. It is a suggestion which might be worth considering. In the case of the maritimes, the government could do what they are doing in the western provinces. I shall refer to that in another debate.

Next, they could make an outright capital grant as is done in western Canada in connection with conservation of water and reclamation programs. In western Canada outright capital grants are made under P.F.R.A. for the building of dams and dug-outs, and the same thing could be done in the maritimes.

Next, the federal government could lend money to build new power plants or to modernize or make additions to present large plants, including interlocking provincial grid transmission systems, at a rate of two per cent, repayable in forty years. Which one of these plans would be the most attractive to maritimers, I do not know.

Next, pay a subsidy of one mill per kilowatt hour for ten years for power produced and sold, or its equivalent, $1.25 a ton on maritime coal used in the production of electricity and its distribution throughout the maritime provinces.

There is a program that will bring results. I do not look upon it as being a mere matter of cost, because the federal government would reap a return in the form of sales and income taxes, and after a while in the form of succession duties, a hundred times more than what they would put into it. Aside from that, it is imperative that we do something to assist the maritime provinces. The Canadian Press dispatch which I quoted earlier refers to the average income in the maritimes as compared with elsewhere. Stop to think what it would mean if we could bring the average income in the maritimes up to the average income in Ontario.

I do not want anyone to think that in talking about the maritimes I am not talking for Davenport riding, Ontario. If such a program were carried out, Davenport riding, which I have the honour to represent, and Toronto and Ontario and Quebec would profit. As I said a few moments ago, one of the immediate results of the new power plant at Maccan was the building of a new salt plant at Amherst. This is a very fine plant employing 100 or perhaps more men and women. It is well worth going to see.

When I went through it I examined the machinery to see where it came from. I found that some of the machinery came from the fine city of Brantford. I found that the radiators were from the plant in Toronto in which I worked for many years. The evaporators had had been made in Owen Sound, in the riding of the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Case). Other machinery had been made in Hamilton, and much of the electrical equipment came from Sherbrooke, Quebec. This shows that that new salt plant brought business to Ontario and Quebec.

I do not know of any better way by which I can help my riding. I never talk about my riding, because I want to see the country opened up. I know that, as the country is opened up, the factories in my riding will get something to do. Just recently an announcement was made that another new plant is to be erected in Amherst by the Bendix Corporation at a cost of $9,000,000, to employ 750 people. I say without fear of successful contradiction that if cheap power is made available in the maritimes, along with proper means of transmission throughout the length and breadth of the provinces, those provinces will expand as they have not expanded since confederation.

If anyone else can tell me of any other plan that will put the maritime provinces on their feet I should like to hear it. I know that Ontario and Quebec have expanded greatly because of their cheap power. I spend my time in travelling and I try to do what I can to help Canada. I know that as the west expands, as the maritimes expand, they will order materials from Ontario and Quebec. We will get our part of it. We should all go along together. One part of the country cannot be prosperous with other parts not prosperous.

I have done my best on this occasion to present a program which, on the basis of many years of travel and survey in England, the United States and Canada I am convinced will bring about the economic rebuilding of the maritime provinces on a scale never dreamed possible.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to compliment the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) upon his excellent talk on the maritimes. Sometimes Toronto is accused of being selfish, but we can never accuse the hon. member for Davenport of that. He is always thinking of other parts of the country, for which attitude he is to be complimented.

Many hon. members who have spoken in this debate have prefaced their remarks by saying that the budget is a disappointment. I do not think it is a disappointment; I think it is exactly the type of budget we could expect to get from our present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I do not think the people of Canada expected to get water out of a stone, and they did not get it in this budget.

However, the Minister of Finance must be realistic. I think it is time that we had realistic people as ministers of finance in this country. The minister is reported on page 4063 of Hansard as saying:

I believe that all parties in this parliament and most Canadians share the view that the national budget is no longer merely a matter of the government accounts that should be balanced every twelve months on some financial rule of thumb. We view the national budget now as an integral part of the nation's business, influenced by and having an influence upon the state of employment, income and prices.

Again he states:

This government and this parliament must accept a considerable measure of responsibility for influencing and, indeed, directing economic trends in so far as that can be done within the framework of our political and economic principles. Were we only a small municipality, unable to influence the mighty economic forces determining the prosperity of our citizens, it would still be wise for us to look further ahead than this year and to put something by at present.

I think that is a realistic point of view to take. In the past we have been like the ostrich, burying our heads in the sand and trying to make out that budgets did not affect our everyday life. However, today we recognize the fact and face up to the responsibility that budgets have a real influence and that they can be used to balance our economy and maintain a proper relationship between consumption and production in our country. Our hon. friends to the right in the Conservative party say that this is too great a power to be given to the government. However I think it is only the people's representatives who should and must accept that responsibility.

In my opinion the minister was wise in budgeting for a surplus at this time, although I do not agree that that surplus should have been the amount that it was, some $670 million. I think this year and next year the minister would be justified in budgeting for a surplus of probably $500 million. The minister should be straightforward in the matter. He should have given to parliament last year a more correct estimate of what our surplus would be.

Mr. ABBOTT: He did the best he could.

Mr. WRIGHT: It seems to me that there was too great a difference between the estimate of $190 million and the $670 million which we attained. This year we budgeted for a surplus of some $489 million. We hope that is more nearly correct than last year's estimate, and it probably will be.

Surpluses are not something that we should be ashamed of. As businessmen or farmers we are rather proud if we get a surplus. That is what we are working for, and government surpluses should be viewed in somewhat the same light. But there is a difference between a government surplus and a surplus which the average individual or business attains through individual effort. The government gets it surplus through the efforts of the Canadian people as a whole, from their industry and from the taxes which the government collects from them as a result of that industry. It is not the surplus that matters so much as how you attain the surplus and from whom you get it, and I am afraid that is where the minister and I shall have to part company, because I cannot agree with him in some of the methods by which he has accumulated his present surplus.

I think we have come to agree in Canada that direct taxation is fairer than indirect taxation. People should know where the taxes are coming from. In 1946-47 the minister collected by direct taxation $1,412,156,000, and in 1947-48 the estimate was $1,286,878,000, or a decrease of some $125,278,000. On the other hand in indirect taxes, in 1946-47 the minister collected $1,022,129,000, and in 1947-48 $1,134,325,000, or an increase of $112,196,000.

The minister would have been better advised had he collected more in direct taxes and less in indirect taxes, because direct taxation is a fairer means of taxation. But the situation is even more disturbing when we analyse the figures to determine just which direct taxes are being increased and which are being decreased.

In the personal income tax field, for instance, the minister collected in 1946-47, $694,530,000 and in 1947-48, $659,828,000, or a decrease of roughly $40,000,000. On the other hand, in 1946-47 he collected, through the excess profits tax, $448,698,000, while in 1947-48 he collected only $227,000,000. The excess profits tax was discontinued as of the first of January of this year. The excess profits tax has yielded a lot of money to the tax funds of this government during past years; in round figures, it yielded in 1943-44, $468 million; 1944-45, $465 million; 1945-46, $494 million; 1946-47, $448 million.

The minister in his budget—and the other members of the government have so stated—said that it was necessary to remove this tax to encourage production in this country, that when we wanted to increase production we had to give some incentive to industry to expand in order to obtain that increased production. If it is necessary to give industry an added incentive to produce, I think it is also necessary to give the farmers of this country some added incentive for increased production, and to give the worker in the factory some added incentive to put in a little more overtime to increase production. But the minister has not given the same incentive to these primary producers as he has given to industry by the removal of the excess profits tax.

If he had raised the income tax exemptions for the lower income groups to $1,250 for a single person and $2,500 for a married person we would have got a great deal more production. I know there is no single factor in the agricultural areas of Canada that has held up production to a greater extent than the income tax. Whether we like it or not, the farmers, as hon. members who have contacts with our agricultural areas well know, are saying that they are not going to milk cows to pay income tax, and that they are not going to feed pigs to pay income tax. Unless some incentive is given to the primary producers in this country to increase production, we can expect a rising cost of living because of the scarcity of essential food products. The Minister of Finance might very well have considered giving some exemptions to the primary producers engaged in the production of foodstuffs and to the working men who are employed in the factories and producing all our goods and services.

In my opinion the government is itself to blame for inflation in this country: first, by removing controls; second, by removing the excess profits tax, and at the same time encouraging the reinvestment of millions of dollars which might have been paid in taxation, in expenditure on new plant and equipment by allowing double depreciation on new and reconverted plants and equipment. The minister admitted in his budget speech that it is this capital expansion which is taking place in Canada that worries him, and yet the government deliberately set out to encourage this capital expansion. I have in my hand a government pamphlet entitled "Encouragement to Industrial Expansion in Canada—Operation of Special Depreciation Provisions—November 10, 1944—March 31, 1949." It is published by the authority of the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. It is an enlightening pamphlet and gives the government's reasons for allowing special depreciation. It says at page 22:

> The significance of this income tax deduction, frequently called "double depreciation," was that it permitted companies, while profits and taxes were high, to postpone the taxation on a portion of their profits to a later period when it was understood that taxes would be lower. The purpose of this provision was amplified by the Minister of Finance on June 26, 1944, in his budget speech: "First, it will allow the taxpayer to recover a part of his capital whenever earnings are good but will still leave all the income or profit actually realized from the venture over its whole life subject to taxation; second, it will allow him, in respect of such new investment carried out at a time when the government has declared the conversion and expansion of industry to be desirable, to transfer some of his income from a period when wartime tax rates may still be in effect to a later period when he may expect normal taxation to be lower. To this extent, it will relieve such investment for postwar purposes from such wartime taxation of business profits as may still be in effect at the time the work of conversion or expansion is carried out.

The minister goes on to give certain examples of just what this will mean to the taxpayer who is expanding his plant and equipment. He said:

> To take three companies each having an income before depreciation of $100,000 in 1945 and each having established standard profits of $50,000: The first company having no investment in a new capital project would pay a gross tax (income and excess profits tax) of $65,000, including a refundable tax portion of $8,333, or a net tax of $56,667. The second company making an investment of $250,000, of which $100,000 was for a building and $150,000 for machinery and equipment, would pay, after allowance of normal depreciation rates on new investment, a gross tax of $45,000 or a net tax of $40,667, after deducting the refundable tax portion of $4,333. The third company making the same investment expenditures and being permitted to charge double depreciation would pay a gross tax of $25,000, including a refundable tax portion of $333 or a net tax of $24,667. The third company would thus be paying $16,000 less in taxes than the second company, and $32,000 less than the first. These amounts do not reflect the full savings by the investing companies using varying depreciation rates because some of the profits, the distribution of which may be postponed, will be subject to taxation at a later date.

This provision really meant something to these companies, and as a result of that we find that the companies themselves have taken advantage of the provision to the extent that in 1945 they made application for and were granted $232 million in depreciation for the period of operation, November 10, 1944, to March 31, 1949; in 1946, $377 million, and in 1947, $845 million, or a total of $1,392 million, after cancellations, reinstatements and adjustments had been made. The house will notice that there is a very large increase during 1947. Naturally those companies which had excess profits in 1947, and which in the normal course of events might have had to pay 85 per cent of these excess profits in taxes, were anxious to expand their plant and equipment, because they knew the government had already announced that the excess profits tax was coming off at the end of 1947, and if they could keep that money out of the hands of the government for one year they knew they would be safe. Therefore naturally there was a tremendous increase in applications for double depreciation on plant and equipment during 1947. I say to the minister that was one of the main reasons for the rise in the cost of living and the scarcity of materials that we had in Canada in 1947, and that we have in 1948.

The minister did not give the same concessions to the house builder; he did not give the same concessions to the farmer who wanted to buy land or to expand his plant as he gave to these companies in the class which I have just indicated. Let me give a little further analysis and show the size of the companies which received this special depreciation. On page 45 of this booklet the following appears:

> Smaller projects involving expenditures of less than $100,000 were most numerous. They made up 77 per cent of all applications received, but involved only $105 million or 8 per cent of total expenditures approved. On the other hand, 3 per cent of all applications were for projects of $1,000,000 and over, and comprised $815 million or 58 per cent of all investment expenditures contemplated. These figures indicate that the major part of the industrial investment program is due to the expansion of a small selected group of large industries.

It may be all right. I believe expansion is necessary in Canada, but I do not think the larger units, which quite possibly could have financed their own expansion, should have been given these special privileges with regard to depreciation. The same thing applies to the regions benefited. On page 9 of the booklet the following appears:

> Ontario anticipates the largest amount of investment projects with approved special depreciation, $605 million. Quebec is next in line with $509 million, followed by British Columbia with $165 million, the maritime region with $65 million, and the prairie region with $48 million.

Again the whole program has been one of centralization, centralization not only in regions but in the hands of small groups of tremendously large industries, which they have been able to build through special depreciation allowed by the government. That is where I disagree with the minister. I disagree with him in the method by which we attain these surpluses, and in the method of taxation that we are using in this country. It is time we recognized that small business has a place in Canada; that small business is the backbone, and must be the backbone, of our economy. Until we give it an equal opportunity with large industry, through the taxation policy that we follow in this country, then I am afraid that small industry cannot develop, nor can we spread our industries into the areas about which the hon. member for Davenport has just spoken. We should be able to distribute our industry more in Canada than is being done at the present time. It is my opinion that the government, through its fiscal policy, can have an influence in the distribution of industry.

The government needs to adopt some new method of giving encouragement to production and the ownership of houses. If the government wishes to do that it might very well give consideration to an exemption of up to $1,000 on capital invested in a house or in a farm in this country. Thousands of our young men have come back from overseas and have settled on farms, some through the Veterans' Land Act and some on their own. Because of our present system of taxation, it will be almost impossible for these young fellows to pay for their farms. It is almost impossible for the average workingman to pay for a house because of the high cost of construction today, and that high cost is the result of the government's policy. One of the reasons for it is the government's policy of special depreciation, whereby large industries are going out and bidding for every bit of the available material in this country to use in the expansion of their own industries in order to take advantage of this special depreciation.

Let us be fair; let us give to all groups in this country an equal chance. That is my main criticism of the budget. I think the budget should be used as an instrument of fiscal policy, an instrument to give to all the people of Canada an equal opportunity.

Mr. HARRY R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, in the two budgets which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has brought down he has been very fond of making records. In his first budget he brought down a surplus the like of which we had not seen in Canada. The budget which he brought down last Tuesday was the most disappointing budget in our history.

My colleague the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), when he was home over the week end, was hailed by one of his constituents who asked whether the hon. member might put questions on the floor of the house. When my hon. friend replied "Yes", his constituent said, "Will you ask the Minister of Finance when the budget will be brought down?" Another man, one of my own constituents, said that this budget which we saw last week reminded him very much of the paraphrased quotation, "Abandon hope all ye who live and labour here."

During the war years the Canadian people were willing to stand any financial strain that might be put upon them and accounted it but a small sacrifice. But I do not suppose that any people in any other country during the war years had suffered such a tremendously accelerated rate of taxation as did the Canadian people. From 1939 to 1944 our taxes rose from $500 million to over five times that amount; and now, with the federal government taking twenty-three cents out of every dollar of the people's earnings, the great question which this budget poses is this: Is Canada, by a silent revolution, rapidly becoming a bureaucrat-controlled state, or is individual freedom to survive? Revolutions can be silent as well as violent.

The second question is whether this is a production budget, or whether the high rate of taxation is destroying incentive, thus feeding the fires of inflation and taking bread out of the mouths of our people.

Contrary to the impression which the minister wished to give, taxation has decreased by an insignificant amount in total, and the rate of taxation is also very little reduced. The total amount to be taken in federal taxes, $2,384 million, is now almost as great as was the national income in 1933, when it amounted to $2,632 million. It is an amazing situation, to think the federal government is now taxing as much as the total national income was in 1933, and it is particularly amazing when we remember that the government creates nothing. The present budget offers no relief whatsoever in the personal income tax bracket, and it represents a reduction of only three per cent in total taxation from last year's extraordinary burden, when an unexpected surplus of $670 million was realized, or an amount equal to $55 per head for every man, woman and child.

Notwithstanding this unexpected windfall, the government refuses to reduce taxation. Surely the government is on the defensive, for there is not a taxpayer in the country who believes that its policy is either fair or sound.

Last year the Minister of Finance, with immodest pride, boasted that he had produced not only the largest surplus but a surplus which was equal to the aggregate of all the surpluses since confederation. This year he might equally have boasted that he had brought down a surplus which included not only last year's but all the surpluses of foregoing years since Canada was a nation. But he was singularly silent, because he knew that, while people were asking for bread, he was going to hand them a stone.

Everyone has been concerned with the rising cost of living. The government looked for a scapegoat and instituted the prices committee. As was suggested when the resolution was introduced, they have not called as a witness either the governor of the Bank of Canada or the deputy minister of finance, who could well explain the inflationary background of rising prices due to the government's war fiscal policy. Nor have they sought to discover the influence of taxation on the cost of living, which would be a proper assignment for that committee.

All taxes, including personal income taxes to some extent, tend to find their way into the cost of the things we buy. Imagine, then, the influence on present-day costs of a government which takes in taxation alone $2,384 million out of a total national income of $10,820 million, or, as I mentioned, twenty-three cents out of every dollar earned. Put in another way it means that Mister Average-Canadian is working ten hours for Ottawa out of every forty hours he is employed. Add to that provincial and municipal taxes, and Mister Average-Canadian probably finds himself working a total of one and a half days for the state, leaving only three and a half days to meet his direct family expenditures.

The surplus last year was equal to the total of personal income tax payments by all Canadians, and yet not even a gesture of thanks was made by this government. The rate of taxation is still extraordinarily high. In the personal income tax field, after the minimum and niggardly exemptions, the first $100 earned is taxed ten per cent; when $500 is earned the rate is twenty per cent; if $8,500 is earned the rate is thirty-five per cent; and when $17,000 is earned the rate is fifty per cent, from which point it rises to eighty per cent, and if there is investment income in excess of $1,800, there is an additional four per cent.

The smallness of the exemptions and the rates of taxation speak for themselves, and one need hardly refer to the fact that the rate at the peak of taxation a few years ago was but a few per cent higher than what we are faced with today. It suffices to say that in the peak year of 1944-45 income taxation produced $768 million, and in 1947-48, $660 million, or a reduction from the wartime peak of a mere fourteen per cent. Whatever the reductions may have been, they are a far cry from 1939, when the total personal income tax taken by the government was $61,000,000. We still have an increase of 1,100 per cent and are apparently not entitled to any reduction.

The minister mentioned that he was budgeting for production. The facts indicate that he is budgeting for a continuance of the high cost of living, which is not to be confused with inflation. How any government thinks it can extract twenty-three cents from every dollar of national income and not force prices up is beyond imagination. The fact that the government have just removed the eight per cent sales tax on certain processed foods is an indication that in their heart of hearts they know that taxation is directly contributory to the high cost of living.

In view of what I have said, what does the minister mean when he said there have already been three substantial reductions in the personal income tax, and it "offers no serious impediment to work or initiative—at least none that could be removed by any further reasonable reduction". His qualification would seem to admit that any taxation interferes with incentive and therefore with production.

I think he is right up to a point, but he has lost his sense of balance when it comes to calculating the effect of restoring even a moderate amount of incentive. Incentive-destroying taxes are the greatest sin against the financial integrity and the productive efforts of our country. If given reasonable incentive and rewards, Canadians will work like beavers preparing for a long winter.

One of the amusing and amazing things about the minister's budget is that the extraordinary amount of surplus last year, $670 million, was unexpected. But once having got it into his hands, he finds a thousand and one reasons why he should keep it there, and why this method of painful extraction should be continued indefinitely.

There is nothing new in the idea of a cyclical budget. It has been practised by people with common horse sense for at least five thousand years. Now, however, the individual is not to be allowed to keep what he earns, but the state will keep it for him. The state, not the individual, will provide for the proverbial rainy day. It never has in the past.

The unexpected size of the surplus is a reflection on the government's estimates and the whole theory of a managed economy. One would think dire calamity would happen if the government did not retain last year's surplus and budget for another one. Once having gotten a surplus, even by chance, and finding that the people have not been forceful enough in asking for some relief, the government have thought up ways and means of keeping from the people their own money. The government have therefore trotted out the idea of cyclical budgets on the basis of taxing for a surplus in good times so that they can spend more of your money than they take away from you in bad times. In the meantime the individual is lost sight of.

Are Canadians not to be trusted to look after their own earnings, or must the government do it for them? Who built Canada up? Was it a race of foolish, improvident people or a race of pioneering, hard-working, thrifty, God-fearing people? Money will burn a hole in the government's pocket just the same way as if you take a spare $100 out of your bank and carry it around loose in your pocket.

Are we to build up the state and forget the individual? Never can you have a prosperous state without a prosperous people. Do Canadians want the state to look after all their housekeeping? Do men and women want to rely solely on the state for their jobs and for their old age? No, they want an opportunity to provide for themselves. They do not want to be spoon-fed like a baby, but rather they want a chance to manage their own affairs like men. Anyone who has been familiar with government spending knows that the individual usually obtains much better value for every dollar spent than does some government agency with its tremendous overhead and its lack of regard for the sweat and toil which savings represent. It is high time that the reins of government were taken out of the hands of a bureaucracy and were returned to parliament and the people.

No consideration was given to allowing the wage earner or the farmer,—again with his own money—any relief to meet the rising cost of living. With an amazing and unexpected surplus, the least that might have been expected was some increase in the present tax exemption levels of $750 for a single person and $1,500 for a married couple. It has always beggared the imagination of the speaker that any government should place a direct tax which lowers the standard of living below the minimum level to which Canadians with their skill and resources are entitled. With the cost of living increased from 130 in April, 1947, to 153 in 1948, or eighteen per cent, one would have expected that a trustee of the people's money would afford them some small measure of relief, despite three trifling reductions since the peak of wartime taxation. Perhaps a change of trustees is long overdue.

The ability of the government to concede and the need of the people for some increase in tax exemptions are so clear that one can only surmise that any reasonable government would have been willing to grant some concession, had it not been for an administrative bureaucracy that just did not want to go to the trouble and bother of changing the income tax forms.

The only managed economies which we have known in recent times were the national socialist regime under Hitler, the fascist corporate state under Mussolini, and communism under Stalin. Once you put the money managers in the saddle, their every excuse for failure is "give me a little more power; let me tighten the reins a bit more and use a little more severe bit in the mouth of the once gallant horse." Finally, the animal is completely tamed because it has lost its spirit; but it does not win any more races and it does not perform in the way it used to. The spirit of enterprise is lost and a general lowering of the standard of living is the result.

Surely this continent has seen enough of managed economy when the Roosevelt pump-priming experiment was unsuccessfully tried in the United States, and billions of dollars were thrown away in an attempt to get the United States economy moving. Let me tell the minister that all the cyclical budgets in the world and all the pump-priming in the ocean are not worth a nickel as compared with the force of men's fears and hopes.

The minister talks about inflation and how his present action in denying the people what is rightfully theirs is best for them. The candy, which is not the minister's candy after all, is to be handed out one stick at a time and the child is not allowed to have the whole bag in his own possession. But the minister overlooks the fact that he himself may lose the bag. The house might have been more interested if the minister had explained that the government itself is responsible for inflation; that inflation is due to nothing more or less than the wartime fiscal and monetary policy of his government; and I am not criticizing him at the moment for that. He might also have pointed out that too much money is just as inflationary, whether spent by an individual for something useful and where value is received, or whether spent by the government for something likely a good deal less useful and likely where value will not be received. In an interesting speech by Courtland Elliott, C.B.E., who has the happy advantage of both a sound theoretical training and a practical background, he has this to say:

> The fact is that government expenditures and their financing are the most potent inflationary forces in the world today. Yet having absorbed the shock of present tax rates, we seem to be willing to accept the delusion that taxes cannot be reduced because of inflationary measures. I venture the prediction that when times change we shall accept the explanation that taxes cannot be reduced materially because we shall then be in a deflationary period and relief and public works expenditures will require high taxes.

It is incredible to anyone with a knowledge of government ways and particularly of political pressures that any government could be a saver of money over a long term. It might have been possible at some time in our history, but not since governments have allowed themselves to be held responsible for the prosperity of the people. Moreover, it is hard enough to save money when one has worked for it with the sweat of one's brow. But as far as the government goes, there is a saying, "Easy come, easy go."

It was also interesting to hear the minister say:

> In any case, once full employment is reached, as it was last year, any expansion in total output is bound to be limited and gradual.

This is a nice pretty statement which just does not mean a thing. I can think of no economic group in the country that would not produce more if they did not have the burden of an additional rate of taxation on additional production. What has happened to the minister's clear thinking when in his budget of 1947 he said:

> It is the high marginal rate of tax on additional earnings that discourages additional work, enterprise and initiative and consequently we must aim in our reductions at cutting down these marginal rates of tax.

There is not a farmer member of this house who does not know that more milk and butter could be produced but for the discouraging effect of higher taxes on additional production. The same applies to cattle and hog raisers; and indeed I am told that good hired men will not even work for bosses who make income tax deductions from their pay. The result is that the farmer pays the tax himself. The hired man is interested, as is everyone else, in take-home pay, and if it is not high enough he strikes for more. The same thing applies in our cities to household assistants. We would have more houses built if carpenters, plumbers and plasterers were not faced with incentive-destroying taxation. There is no need to stop at the artisan classification. Nurses often have carefully figured out just how much income takes them into the next higher bracket or causes their husbands to lose their marital exemption. The same goes for professional men, who now indulge in long, extended vacations because of the economic futility of working additional hours. What is the use of working an extra evening in the week if the bulk of the earnings is to be taken away in taxation? If we lived in a vacuum the minister's contention might be right; but we do not, and it might be a good thing if he had a little more time to go around and learn something about the problems of his constituents in St. Antoine-Westmount.

Mr. ABBOTT: He gets around quite a bit.

Mr. JACKMAN: Well, it is surprising that his majority the last time was only sixty. Continued high taxation has led and will lead to demands for higher wages, to strikes, and to a lessening of production. Only recently it was noted in the newspapers that the medical doctors had increased their fees. All taxation—and this goes for income tax, too—eventually enters into the cost of the things our people buy. It is hard enough to get people to work for themselves, much less for the government.

Another point on which there is some confusion, Mr. Speaker, is this. Full employment does not mean full production. Many times in Canada's history we have had full employment when production, both in agriculture and in industry, was but a bare fraction of what it is today. Doctor Mackintosh of Queen's university recently pointed out that the gross output in Canada in 1938 was $5·1 billion and that this year it will exceed $14 billion. Our population has not changed substantially in that period. After allowing for the rise in prices, the increase in real output per capita is about thirty-five per cent. The output of all workers has been increased by the use of more power, capital equipment and management. With some incentive to businessmen, particularly owners of small businesses, to acquire the machines, and with some incentive to the workers to operate the machines to the full, then we can expect a still further and immediate substantial increase in production. Full employment and full production are not necessarily the same thing. The brawn, muscle and skill of the farmer or workman when directing the power-driven machine has made possible the steadily rising standard of living on this continent. We need to encourage, by restoring incentive, owners to venture forth and workers to put forth their best efforts, so that the national pie will be greater and the slice of each will be larger.

The minister says that "to slash our taxes now would fasten controls more securely on our national life." The opinion of many is that if we do not restore incentive and production the government will always find reasons for retaining controls to regulate the distribution of scarcity. Again, it was interesting to hear the minister say:

> It has done what a government could do to meet inflationary pressure by the most fundamental method, that is, by stimulating increased production to satisfy excessive demands.

Later on he said:

> On our taxation side, our policy has been to reduce our taxes where they were impeding work and production.

What a change in his thinking from last year; or shall we say, what wonders were worked by a small dose of Abbott's relief remedy! The small cut in taxation which worked this miraculous cure was so powerful that it must have been encased in an atomic bomb!

The minister directed attention to our national expenditures, and mentioned particularly the large amount that went into new construction, industrial plants and equipment, public utility projects and housing. I shall not criticize the government unduly for its policy of double depreciation. At some time in the life of a plant the cost is allowed to be written off for replacement purposes, and the fact that the depreciation was accelerated does not necessarily mean that the total tax take is less. I would point out, however, that the policy of double depreciation was another example of faulty planning. Hindsight shows it to have been totally unnecessary and to have aggravated the inflationary tendencies aready existing in our economy. Had we needed to create employment, it would have been a fine thing, but once again our economic managers saw dimly through dark-coloured glasses. The effect of upping our dollar from 90 cents to 100 cents U.S. also had the effect of encouraging manufacturers to embark on extensive capital improvement programs requiring the importation of American machinery, and this at a time when we did not need to encourage expansion on the part of anyone. As a result of accepting the advice of those who hold themselves out as expert managers of our economy, the minister was able to say:

> Our forecast proved to be much too conservative; prices, wages, profits and expenditures all increased much more than we anticipated.

On all four counts the government was wrong. In his reference to the rapidly rising price level in Canada, the minister said the adjustment was inevitable but was made easier because of the government's action on July 5, 1946, in restoring the Canadian dollar to parity with the United States dollar. Of course he does not think a ten per cent increase in prices would have discouraged the buying of American products by Canadians. Many of us think otherwise. Now that he is in a distressing predicament in regard to United States exchange, having wilfully lost the country's reserves, he imposes embargoes and import restrictions. Just yesterday morning a fresh batch of import restrictions were announced by his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). This is just another example of how one control breeds another, until the camel is occupying the tent and the Arab is outside shivering in the cold of the desert night. Furthermore the Minister of Finance should write it down in his copy book that Canadians will not permanently accept a lower standard of living than Americans, and it would be interesting to know what his government has done to increase the purchase of Canadian products by the United States. Indeed I should have thought at least half the cabinet would have been in Washington in an endeavour to increase our trade with that country, particularly to have them buy more of our products.

As to the corporation tax, little need be said at this moment. Before the war it was eighteen per cent; and I hope my hon. friends of the C.C.F. will remember that. It is now thirty-five per cent or thirty-seven per cent, depending upon the province in which the corporation carries on its business. It is true that the excess profits tax has been done away with as of the end of last year, but its place has been taken in large part by the increased normal corporation tax rate. I do not know whether anyone thinks corporations are soulless treasure houses that have some endless means of paying taxes, but one might as well realize that corporation taxes, like all other taxes, rapidly become absorbed in the cost of the articles corporations make and sell.

If I may refer again to the theory of the cyclical budget, the minister has pointed out the advisability of saving in good times to tide over bad times. If it works that way, the principle is sound. But the political philosophy to which most of the members of this house subscribe is that the state is but the sum total of its people, and I for one would prefer to see our people with some reserve themselves, so that like sensible human beings they could have some fat on their bones to tide themselves over the more difficult times. Again I would reiterate that a pump-priming has never been successful in any country and that individuals are entitled to put something by for their own rainy day in the same way as a veteran is entitled to save some of his money, so that he may make a down payment on the small home he so badly needs; or a farmer or a businessman is entitled to retain some of his earnings to pay off his borrowings. Parents are likewise entitled to put something by for the education of their children, to say nothing of their own old age.

The minister also mentioned as a reason for a cyclical budget that we might be confronted with a large increase in expenses for national defence. To quote him, he said:

> Otherwise we would have to add to the other disturbing effects of an expanded defence program the complications of sudden inflationary expenditures or sudden increases in taxes. A substantial surplus will help to keep our powder dry.

To this I may only add that what is needed to deliver the goods is a new powder monkey.

In the last war we froze our civilian economy and the wages of our workers in civilian production. In order to expand our war production, wages of workers in war industry rose to new high levels, so that boys of sixteen and seventeen found themselves earning much more than their fathers whose wages were frozen. It was, of course, necessary to drain off some of this surplus purchasing power, because civilian production could not be expanded. I wonder what is to become of our economy and our freedom if, on top of the present high levels of taxation, we had to increase, because of armament expenditures, our general level of taxation. If we were fighting for our freedom against a foreign foe we should surely lose it to those who were regulating our internal economy. For this reason, if for no other, the minister should endeavour to cut down government expenses and reduce our level of taxation, so that it is not only bearable but able to stand the imposition of wartime taxation.

In his third reason for a cyclical budget or a managed economy, the minister stated:

> Tax reductions would add nothing to production.

In this, as I have already stated, I think he is immeasurably and entirely wrong. He made a reference to certain unknown strong or fortunate groups who could look after themselves if the inflation he feared took hold. May I say to him that, like war, inflation is a national calamity and I know of no one who does not fear it as one should fear the devil.

The one small bone that Mother Hubbard was able to find in the cupboard was the elimination of the sales tax on processed foods. Nothing contributed to the rising cost of living more than the pyramided sales tax, and I think it was a surprise to many that this tax was applied against a great list of food products that did not happen to be sold in their raw state, such as cereals, all packaged foods, all canned goods, preserves, jams and jellies, and all smoked meats such as sausages, bacon and ham. It had always been understood that the sales tax did not apply to two of the three great essentials of life—food and shelter—and now that understanding is virtually a reality. For this I congratulate the minister.

It is interesting to note, however, that he says that this relief from taxation will create little additional inflationary pressure. I agree with him, but not more so than I would agree with him if he were to reduce taxation generally.

Time will not permit me to go into the comparison which the minister made of United States taxes with our own, but I would point out that the tables which he placed on Hansard clearly show that our own system of taxation is anti-social. The single man is taxed more in the United States, whereas the married couple are taxed more in Canada. I congratulate the minister for granting an additional exemption to people over sixty-five years. It was long overdue.

As to succession duties, I should like to say just one word. While I have not had an opportunity to examine the effect of the changes, I am one of those who believe that succession duties are one of the fairest forms of taxation. Large inheritances make for inequality of opportunity among our citizens, and substantial succession duties provide a desirable source of revenue because they have not the objection of incentive-destroying taxes.

As a final justification for withholding from the Canadian people a substantial part of what they create and earn, the minister said:

> The activities and scope of government in Canada have been extended by popular consent and indeed by popular demand. Parliament and the government have a wider responsibility than before the war, particularly in the field of economic affairs.

This cannot be gainsaid, but any government which is worthy of the name should be at some pains to point out to the people that the money which goes to finance social services is not created out of thin air. Because of the extent of our social services, no longer is the money taken from one group and paid over to another group of our people. Every family in the land is subject to direct and indirect taxation for the express purpose of providing these social services, although many people have the feeling that someone else is paying the shot. True leadership would indicate to our people that the extension of many social services simply means that they will be taxed in order that the government may provide them rather than that they will be able to save in order to provide the services for themselves. The money will in either case come out of their own hard-earned savings.

Already taxation, federal, provincial and municipal, is taking close on to a third of what all our people are producing. This is a startling amount in comparison with pre-war figures. If it goes on far enough with a few per cent added each year it will soon bring us up to fifty per cent of our earnings being retained by the government. We shall have lost our freedom as individuals and be subject to some form of state socialism or of outright communism. Again, revolutions can be silent as well as violent.

Canada was built up on the principle of individual liberty, and if one is not permitted to have some financial reserves he loses his economic freedom. The liberties which we hold most sacred are lost to us because we are subject to political domination at every turn. It is my belief that we shall do better, that we shall be more creative, that there will be more to divide and distribute among all if free enterprise is allowed to function and the individual is permitted to retain his economic freedom with which goes his political liberty.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I have much pleasure in congratulating the minister upon his budget. My first reason for offering congratulations is that, notwithstanding the headlines and prophecies of federal members and others, there was not one bit of leakage until the minister announced his budget. As one hon. member said, "Only God and Abbott knew what was in the budget." Considering the pressure, considering the telegrams and letters which he received, I think this is proof that he is a man of stability and one who can keep his own counsel.

This proves that those who prophesied a great reduction in income tax were false prophets, and I would give a warning now to those who are beginning to make prophecies about the next budget, that it will be an election budget. This means, I suppose, that there will be no tax reductions, that the budget will be just as tight as this one. If it is, it will certainly be a feather in the cap of the minister. It is easy to do the popular thing. I listened, for instance, to members of the opposition urging that old age pensions should be increased to $60 a month, and I think they should. If I were an old man and had nothing to live on but $60 a month I would not be able to go very often to the picture shows, and I certainly would be glad that I did not smoke a pipe.

The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) struck a very fine note when he said, in effect, that this was a good business budget. When I contract a debt and sign a note, Mr. Speaker, I am in duty bound to take up the note and pay the debt, and when we realize that, according to the hon. member for Brandon, one billion dollars has been paid off the national debt within two years, meaning a reduction of $30,000,000 in interest charges, that is something for which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is to be commended.

Another thing for which I commend the Minister of Finance is for not making promises. It is so easy to make promises. So many men in different walks of life have found themselves in difficulties because they could not fulfil their promises and somebody took legal action against them for breach of promise. You cannot do that against our Minister of Finance. The only man who has made a promise to this house is the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and he has made a good one. The hospitals are finding it very difficult to carry on and to find sufficient beds for their patients, and the Prime Minister has promised $30,000,000 to help them. That will be very helpful indeed to those who are ill.

Another thing upon which I congratulate the minister is this, and I was reminded of it by a letter that I received yesterday from somebody at Fort William who has found that this budget makes a difference in her grocery bills. She says that this is the first time she has experienced a little relief from high taxation, and she mentions a reduction of five cents a pound on ham and bacon and says that her grocery bill will be smaller So that is the best kind of tax reduction for her.

The minister may be up against it a little, because he has given some relief in his budget to the men and women who are over sixty-five years of age, for he may find that there are more people over sixty-five years of age in Canada than he thought there were before this budget came into existence.

I would have liked to see a reduction made in the sales tax for the relief of our retailers, and I would also have liked to see the excise tax reduced. But there is a long year ahead of us and many things can happen in that year. I notice that the tax on silver-plated articles has been reduced. I would like to see watches put on the free list. Watches are used universally and are a necessity. I would also tell the minister that he should give some relief in the matter of wedding rings. They, too, should be put on the free list. Imagine a young man getting married and not being able to buy a wedding ring, and then two or three weeks afterwards his wife goes to a social gathering and it is seen that she has not got a wedding ring on! The Minister of Justice might say that was the beginning of a divorce, but of course that is not always true.

Another thing I would like to see is some relief for the mining industry. I have received a number of committees from the mining industries at the head of the lakes, and I would like to see a little more help given to our mining industry. When we could not get jobs for our men during the depression I remember how we used to go to these mine operators and how they helped out our unemployed. I am sure the minister will take this into his sympathetic consideration.

I would also like to express the thanks of our community to the government for having increased by twenty-five per cent the pension that is paid to those who fought and risked their lives for us. That will come out of the surplus for next year perhaps. I think it is the absolute duty of the dominion government to look after these men, and the women too, who gave their best and came back less fit than they were before to do their life's work.

When the Prime Minister promised assistance amounting to $30,000,000 to the provinces, I was very well pleased because we in Fort William need hospital aid. If a certain government is elected in Ontario I expect we shall get about $300,000, but if another government is elected maybe we shall not get it. When I see beds in the halls of hospitals, outside the maternity ward, the children's ward and other wards, I say it is high time that our governments got together, and I thank the Prime Minister for this encouragement. When the provinces make their recommendations to the dominion government they will get their share, but it is necessary, of course, for the provinces and the dominion government to get together.

I should like to say in closing that in Canada we have more nearly realized than any other country, including Russia and even New Zealand, the four freedoms. Where is the man today who cannot get a job? I know some people may have difficulty in getting work because of poor health or accident or for some other reason; but there is no reason why, if a man is willing to take the first thing that comes, as you and I did, Mr. Speaker, and work at that until he gets something better, all our people can be employed, and that makes Canada the greatest country on earth.

Mr. W. A. McMASTER (High Park): Mr. Speaker, the few remarks which I shall make this afternoon will, I hope, be constructive and mean something in the future as to the manner in which the government brings down its budget and perhaps also as to the manner in which this budget will be dealt with at a later stage by the house this session.

I heartily agree with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that in good times we should budget for a surplus. As long ago as 1791, Alexander Hamilton, who was perhaps the first and leading economist of his time in any country, said this in his report to congress:

> As the vicissitudes of nations beget a perpetual tendency to the accumulation of debt, there ought to be in every government a perpetual, anxious and unceasing effort to reduce that which at any time exists as fast as shall be practicable consistently with integrity and good faith.

From that time until the present it has been the hope, the desire and the aim of every country in its budget to have a surplus in good times so as to be able to meet the deficits which are bound to come in the bad times which have always followed. In the United States in the time of Hamilton they had a debt of $77 million. This was progressively reduced until in 1812, when the war with Great Britain broke out, the debt was only $45 million. It was increased by that war to $133 million. This again was reduced until 1851 when it stood at $68 million.

The civil war, which was perhaps the greatest war of all time up to that date, increased the debt of the United States to $2,756 million, which for a people of thirty million, was not anything like the debt which we are now bearing in Canada, but which at the time was thought to be almost unbearable. However, the United States faced the problem, and in the year 1893 this had been reduced from $2,756 million to $838 million. Because of the depression which then arose, it stood still until the beginning of the great war.

The first great war raised the debt of the United States to about $25 billion, which, at the time, was thought to be almost an astronomical figure. They again attempted to reduce it and in fifteen years had reduced it by $9 billion to about $16 billion. Then came the depression of the thirties and the debt kept going up until in 1936 it amounted to $34 billion. In fact it doubled in those depression years.

We all know that the last war increased the debt of the United States to such an extent that it is now about $269 billion. At the present time they are doing what they can to reduce this debt.

I must say that in the last year the United States had an income of about $40 billion. While they had expenditures of $42 billion, in that $42 billion they include all loans which they made to other countries. As I recall it, about $7 billion of the $42 billion is made up of loans made to European countries. That is why I am going to say that in Canada actually we have no surplus. It is true that, because of the bookkeeping methods we have adopted, the minister shows a surplus of some $450 million or $500 million, but certain things do not appear in the expenditures. For instance, they show only $75 million toward a sinking fund. We must remember that during the last year we advanced to other countries the sum of about $646 million. This advance of $646 million was one of the main factors which produced large incomes in the country. It is fair to say that of this $646 million, which was spent in loans to other countries, and out of which goods were provided, perhaps as much as half, or over $300 million, would be taken back by the government in the form of taxes. This is more likely to be the case, because that extra amount of money which was obtained by the people would be added on to the ordinary income of the people and would place them in higher income brackets. Therefore I think the Minister of Finance in his budgeting should have allowed about $300 million—which is about one-half of what the United States allowed—as an expenditure during the last year. If that were done the surplus would, of course, practically disappear.

It is unfortunate that the minister, in some of his talks to the newspaper men last year, referred to a surplus. As a result of that, a great deal of adverse criticism was voiced. Actually, if the figures had been put on the same basis as they are placed in the United States there would not be a surplus at all, but a deficit.

I have looked into the figures of this year, and I have been unable to find about $50,000,000 which was voted to the provinces of Saskatchewan, British Columbia, Alberta and Manitoba last year. To my way of thinking, that is as much an expense as if it were paid out of your pocket, because actually before that time it had been carried as an asset of government. The writing off of it amounted to an expenditure. I spent some time looking, but I have not been able to find where the payment appears in the accounts as presented by the government. I very much doubt whether it appears anywhere. That would reduce the surplus also.

It is of great importance that we have a surplus in good times, because of the method of showing the receipts from income tax, corporation taxes and other taxes. I wrote a letter to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), and he quite frankly replied that so far as the receipts for any fiscal year are concerned it means all the money that is paid in for that year. He refers to an example I cited and says:

> In the example which you have cited, if a taxpayer paid his 1946 tax on the first of March, 1947, it would be considered as 1946-47 revenue. If a similar payment, even although it were on account of 1946 tax, were made on the 15th day of April, 1947, then that payment would be considered as 1947-48 revenue. The taxation year for which a tax may be paid has no bearing whatever on the fiscal year to which the revenue is credited.

It may be said that for statistical purposes separate records are maintained with respect to the amount of tax collected for any particular calendar year. This is entirely separate from the amounts which are considered as revenue for the fiscal year.

Therefore one might expect that if a depression came along the moneys which may be received for any year may be very much less than the money actually paid for that year; because of that, I say the listed receipts for any year do not actually give the amount of money that was paid for that year; and for that reason also the surplus shown is uncertain. It should be scrutinized closely and should not be accepted as the definite amount of any surplus.

The question arises, how do you produce a real surplus? Of course there are only two ways by which a government can produce a surplus. They are similar ways to that by which any person in private life could produce one. You must either increase your revenue or reduce your expenditure.

I should like to deal for a moment with the question of reduction of expenditures since I would be the last person to suggest to the Minister of Finance that he should increase his revenue in any way, because the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) has shown that we are now paying twenty-three per cent of our total income in taxes. When we take into consideration provincial and municipal taxes the amount is probably thirty-three per cent. We must remember that everybody is not paying thirty-three per cent. Some people pay no taxes; others are paying ten per cent; still others are paying fifteen per cent, and so on, but some are paying seventy-five per cent or eighty per cent. But if the total amount of taxes paid is thirty-three per cent of the total income, then I believe the future of our country looks very bleak indeed. I recall that we used to talk about England as the country of high taxes. As I recall it, the highest amount paid there was thirty-six per cent of the total national income. We all know what conditions were there at that time. If these conditions obtained in Canada in ordinary times it would impose a very great burden indeed upon the Canadian people.

The minister may ask me how I would reduce expenditures. I say to the minister that expenditures must be reduced. Actually a great deal of them cannot be reduced. I recognize as well as the minister does that the interest on the national debt must be paid. I can understand and appreciate the fact that we are paying a very low rate of interest on that indebtedness; that the amount might be increased; that, instead of being $450 million, it might easily be $550 million.

I recognize at once that, since we have started to pay family allowances, we shall continue to do so. It would be a tremendous undertaking on the part of any government to change that. I understand that our veterans must be looked after, and all these uncontrollable expenditures must be taken care of, but there are other things that the minister must face. I went to some pains today to look at the increase in expenditures from 1938 to last year, and in some cases the present year, and I find that those expenditures which are purely ordinary administration and departmental expenditures, could be kept down more than they are.

We are going ahead, putting more people on the payroll, paying them more money, and while it may be good for these people, I can only say to the minister that if he keeps on in that way he is doing what the C.C.F. wants to do. He is putting everyone on the payroll. You cannot spend yourself into prosperity by having a lot of people on the payroll, any more than you can drink yourself into prosperity. The minister must face these things.

I would point out some of the departments in which there has been a tremendous and unjustified increase. Let me take first agriculture, and I am speaking now of the administration end of it. I begin with 1938-39, which was perhaps a normal year. We shall be lucky if we ever have an average year as good as that in the rest of our lives. I do not know whether we shall have any better times than in the past, but I do not think the millennium is coming soon. It is rather the other way around; it is farther away. In 1938-39—I will say 1938 for the sake of brevity—we spent in agriculture for administration $9,527,000. In the year 1948-49, as set out in the estimates, that is now $18,000,000.

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member for Souris wanted us to double it again. He suggested the other night that we double it.

Mr. McMASTER: The hon. member for Souris is an enthusiastic agriculturist, but I am not speaking about the things to which he was referring. I am speaking about administration, whereas he was speaking about that which has to do with the production of better grains, cereals and so on. Go ahead with that as much as you like, but keep down administration expenses.

Mr. ABBOTT: It requires administration if you extend those services.

Mr. McMASTER: In external affairs in 1939, when we were an ordinary country minding our own business, we spent $1,057,000, and for the next year we shall spend, as provided by the estimates, $9,777,000. It has gone up 900 per cent. It seems to me that Canada is going beyond the point it should go in these expenditures. I realize that a great deal of this is caused by present conditions. Maybe a million of it has to do with the united nations and perhaps half a million with other organizations which are more or less international in character; but I still say that we are spending altogether too much on external affairs, and I suggest that we can reduce the taxes on our people if we do something in this connection.

I come now to something I do not understand, and that is the annual amortization of bonds and commissions. In 1938 we spent practically $5,000,000, and that has gone up to $8,000,000.

In the finance department, which is a large department, I know, administration cost about $3,500,000 in 1938, and that has gone up to over $20,000,000.

In the fisheries department there has been an increase from $2,036,000 to $5,996,000. After all, while we can do something for the fishermen, we may have to do something more than that for them in bad times, because they have had bad times in the past and may have bad times in the future. Perhaps an expenditure of about $3,000,000 might be helpful to them in bad times, more helpful than such an expenditure now on something that is not directly beneficial to them at the present moment.

The justice department has gone up from $2,748,000 to $3,601,000, which is not much.

The labour department has risen from $788,000 to $2,295,000. In that connection I would refer not only to the administration of the labour department but to unemployment insurance. The rather considerable sum of $18,000,000 is paid out in salaries. It may be a large department; and that sum has nothing to do with the contribution of $17,000,000 which the government is making to the unemployment fund. It strikes me that $18,000,000 is a very considerable sum to pay for carrying on the administration work of that department; that is, the unemployment insurance department.

The House of Commons has gone up from $1,800,000 to $3,878,000. Immigration has gone up from $1,335,000 to $3,788,000. Indian affairs has gone up from $5,305,000 to over $7,000,000. Lands, parks and forests, special projects, has gone up from $2,249,000 to $5,738,000. The post office has gone from $35,000,000 to over $67,000,000. Public printing and stationery has gone up slightly.

I now come to public works. We have been talking about budgeting for bad times, and many people in the past have said quite truly that all public works should be left if possible until bad times come. In that connection I should like to read something that might be helpful to the government. It appears in a book by Erik Lindtahl, written some time ago. It is in regard to budgeting for a surplus in good times. He says: "The benefits of so doing are: (1) Financial gains would accrue to the state and to the local authorities through a reduction in the average level of costs for construction work, etc. (2) There would be less unemployment and better utilization of production capacity during depression years. (3) There would be more stable prices and less violent economic fluctuations owing to the monetary effect of the recurrent under-and-over balancing of the budget through adjustment of public expenditures between boom and depression years."

We have heard about cycle years and their effect on budgeting, and this writer points out that the trade cycle should not be allowed to affect normal public activities. That is why I say that it would be no kindness to the people employed by the government in these administrative jobs if we were to dispense with their services during bad times, and yet we cannot keep them there in ordinary times. I suggest in fairness to them, that their services should be dispensed with as far as possible in good times and, if possible, they should be taken on in bad times when they need the jobs. Public works should be undertaken in depression years.

Too much has been done in these late years. The tax burden should be lighter during depression and heavier during boom. I agree with the minister in that regard, and I was moved to read that statement of Mr. Lindtahl because public works have risen from $20 million in 1938-39 to a total of $59 million in the present estimates. I would suggest to the minister that a great deal of this work should be left until such time as it can be done to greater advantage and with less expense to the country, and so that the money would be distributed among a larger number of people.

I have made some suggestions in a business way, and I hope that even politically they will bear results, even from the standpoint of those who might put them into force.

I would suggest something about revenues. As I have said, perhaps the revenues are high, but new revenues can be obtained from those who now ecsape taxation and who are able to pay. In the last analysis, the money should be obtained from those who are most able to pay, and I suggest that there is a large field of unearned increment that has not been taxed.

When I say this I do not want anyone to say that if you allow for unearned increment you have to allow for losses, because I will not admit that for a moment. The United States lost revenue because they allowed the losses of stocks to be set off against gains in stock. That is not right; it is not fair; it is not necessary, and I am not suggesting that that should be done.

But there is a great deal of unearned income. One reason for that is this high income tax. Of course I am not a prophet. I am not a great businessman either or I would not make this statement, because it might have some adverse effect. But I am sure that prices of many stocks are kept up today in the hope that somebody will make some money out of those stocks, which money will be untaxed. What these people want is to get some money that is not taxed, because they do not want to pay taxes any more than anyone else does; and in the case of rich people, the taxes are fairly high. I would suggest, for instance, that that would be one of the most effective ways of stopping inflation.

If there is anything in the world that I want, it is to stop inflation. I hitched my political life to the promise that I would do my best to stop inflation. During the war the government did a good job in keeping down inflation, but I am not so proud of what they have done since. In some cases I believe that where they should have been firm, they yielded; it looks as though inflation may get the better of things. I know there are a great many people who are gambling everything on inflation. They are buying everything of a tangible nature. They actually think the same thing will happen here as happened in Germany; therefore they will buy something tangible, and the other people who have investments in government bonds or mortgages will be paid off with worthless pieces of paper. One of the ways to stop that is to tax unearned increment. I suggest that the sooner the government get their experts to work at that, the better it will be, so that something may be evolved. It cannot be all-inclusive. There would be many who would escape it, but it would, I believe, have a most salutary effect on stopping the rise in prices.

A few days ago I spoke about accelerated depreciation in speaking about housing. I do not intend to go over that again, but I shall simply say that what I placed on Hansard at pages 3689 to 3691 inclusive, I stand by. I did not intend to say anything about this accelerated depreciation, but I believe that it was allowed at a bad time. I believe it had an inflationary tendency. I think the government themselves are to blame in that they set a date at which this allowance for depreciation must be spent. If they had put the date further ahead, I would not have felt so badly about it, although for the life of me I cannot see why these people perhaps should not pay their taxes the same as everybody else. I realize, as one of the other speakers has said, that this depreciation is only accelerated, but I think it should have been decelerated. It should have been put off until some later time. It was given, of course, for the reason mentioned by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright). As mentioned in the book put out by the government, it was done so that the people could get the benefit during a period of high taxes and not have to pay high taxes; for in bad times, of course, when there were no excess profits or no profits, there is little or nothing to charge depreciation against.

I have said something about increasing the revenue. I think it can be increased in the manner I have mentioned by taxing unearned income and otherwise. Then we could decrease some of the revenue, because I believe the people in the lower income brackets are paying too much. I think everybody should bear a fair share of the burden, but the people in the lower income brackets are bearing their burden in paying the sales tax. I hope the government will go through that sales tax list and leave out many other articles. They can add something else on luxuries for those who can pay, but I would suggest that if possible they should remove from that list some other articles used by the people in the lower income brackets. After all, on the list are one or two things that go into the building of houses, which is important. The poor man must have a house. I do not, of course, deal with the whole list, but I should like the minister to do something for those people who are in the lower income tax brackets by removing that tax which is bad, which cannot be seen, and therefore probably arouses much less vocal opposition than does the income tax.

I think there should be a larger amount of exemption for each child. Inflationary prices affect the married man more than they do anybody else, because for every child he must buy clothes, shoes and other necessaries. The amount of inflation affects him in proportion to the number of children he has. If they have two children, they are affected to double the extent the married couple with no children, so that something should be allowed more than the $100 now allowed. I should think this amount could quite easily be increased and should be increased perhaps in such a way that the people with greater wealth should not be able to take advantage of it. They can get along all right, and most of them have not many children anyway, so that it will not affect them so much.

Again I think the rates of income taxes that were manipulated a little, and helpfully, downward by the minister at the last session, could be still further decreased. I am willing to agree that everybody should have a sense of responsibility for the way in which the country's business is carried on, and nothing brings that to his mind more quickly than the fact that he has to pay something toward it, no matter how small may be the amount. I would suggest to the minister—and I shall be somewhat definite in my suggestion in this case—that where previously the tax was started at ten per cent—that is, on the first $100—it seems kind of hard that a man after he gets over a very limited income, should have to pay $10 on an additional $100 of income. That could be put down to, say $4 and then jumped up by $4 a hundred until it gets to twenty per cent. Maybe it could be jumped by $2 a hundred and go to a higher base. This tax is a great burden on the people who are in this low-income tax group. They could be given a sense of responsibility at not so great a price as they are paying at the present time. I would be quite willing and would suggest that this concession, causing as it does a loss of revenue, which goes all the way up the line, should not be available for those who have incomes of $5,000 or more. I realize as much as does the minister—and he has said so publicly—that every increase in exemption that we give to people in the lower income tax groups goes all the way up the line; and that for the rich people it means an exemption at the rate of perhaps fifty per cent or sixty per cent.

I now come to another point, and I have spoken about it quite often. I feel just as strongly as ever on the subject; and if I need any reason for bringing it up now, it is in the fourth clause of the resolution relating to income tax, where it is suggested that expenses be allowed to people in the transportation business and to others who are in the business of, I think the wording is, the sale of real estate or on commission. It struck me, when I read it, that it is a much restricted clause.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not only real estate.

Mr. McMASTER: It may not be intended to be only real estate.

Mr. ABBOTT: On commission; people who operate a business and who are receiving remuneration by commission.

Mr. McMASTER: I think that was what was intended; it applies not only to those who are selling real estate, but to all commissions and otherwise. I would urge that whatever regulations are made, and whatever concessions are to be given, they should be put in a definite form. Definite regulations should be made, saying these people shall get exemption for stated reasons. These should be publicized, and the rulings made should be available to the people. They should know what exemptions everybody else is getting. When they make up their income tax, it is a worry to them when they do not know exactly what is intended to be allowed. I would suggest in this case, and in fact in all other cases where there is a discretion as to allowance, that it be made definite.

I want to read to the minister something which is applicable not only to his discretion in this case but to all other discretions under the income tax laws. These words were written longer ago than I had thought; they appear in chapter 45 of that famous book, "The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire", by Gibbon:

> The discretion of the judge . . .

In this case it is the minister.

> . . . is the first engine of tyranny. The laws of a free people should foresee and determine every question that may probably arise in the exercise of power and the transactions of industry.

I suggest to the minister that he go to some pains in making regulations covering every point in his discretion; that these should be publicized, and that the results of any act or decision on his part should be made public.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

ORGANIZATIONS ADVOCATING OVERTHROW OF CONSTITUTED AUTHORITY

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. LaCroix for the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the criminal code.

Mr. DAVID CROLL (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I suppose that all hon. members have one thing in common; without exception we are anti-communist. So we must persist in our constant opposition to the spread of communism, for no one in this country but communists wants communism to prosper. Personally I dislike and distrust communism because it is dictatorial, because it is tyrannical and because it is totalitarian. Others hate it for these as well as additional reasons. I think they are all good. In dealing with this subject, without reference to party I think this house can be divided into two groups. In my view one is effective and the other is less effective.

One of these groups comprises those whose anti-communism is emotional and whose tendency is to fight heresy with the weapons of repression. Their hatred of communism is not confined to religious grounds. There are those whose hatred of communism is based on economic beliefs; based, as a matter of fact, so little on religion that any deviation from what they call free enterprise is to them treason. There is room also for those who cherish a love of country above all that our divers religious and economic heritages may offer. So far as these people are concerned, the heresies are against the church, capitalism and patriotism, and they say the solution is repression.

There is another group whose hatreds are shared by all others but who prefer to fight on grounds of reason rather than emotion. They are prepared to strike at the root of the evil. This group sees communism as a revolutionary movement headed down a blind alley, but definitely the result of social causes which it feels it can remedy. Its weapons are the traditional freedoms and the progressive removal of social injustices, with which Canadian people thoroughly agree. These are not martial weapons, but these people feel that they will strip the enemy of their weapons at least. I believe that the strategy of this latter group will be more effective in defeating the common enemy of both groups.

When repression is proposed, when the outlawing of the communist party reaches the point of vote in this House of Commons, I ask myself, and every member of the house must ask himself, whether the persecution of a revolutionary minority is the answer. I have searched history, and I find that all that such persecution achieves is the gratification of some less attractive impulses of the persecutors; and, what is far more important, the ultimate triumph of the persecuted.

Let us examine the history of our own country. In 1917 communist groups were banned in this country. In 1918, after the close of the war, the order banning them was repealed. In 1921 the communist party was formed; and in 1932 the party was made illegal under the infamous section 98 of the criminal code, which by the way was rarely used. In 1936 that section was repealed. In 1940 the party was again made illegal in this country, and in 1945 the ban was removed from the communist party.

In the interval, in 1942, the party changed its name to Labour Progressive. Under the auspices of that name and in the midst of the kindliest feeling toward them when this country was concerned with our heroic ally—tanks for Russia, aid to Russia, Stalingrad, Uncle Joe and all that sort of thing—the party was able to elect some members to the city councils of Winnipeg and Toronto; they were able to elect a member of the board of control of Toronto. Later the people of Toronto woke up and did away with him nicely, democratically by the way. Members were elected to the Ontario legislature and, I believe to the Manitoba provincial legislature, and one member was elected to this House of Commons.

It seems obvious that the passing of a law does not do away with them. They now claim a membership of more than 23,000 in Canada. They may be just puffing in the usual manner, but on the other hand it cannot be denied that they have shown considerable strength in some of the industrial areas in Canada. It is also to be noted that Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, Poland and Hungary all passed laws to do away with communism. Look at them now. That is a fate which I should like to avoid.

Let us take a look at Italy. Twenty-seven years ago Mussolini outlawed the communist party and declared to the world that he had done away with it. Then came the war; he died and his regime fell. We found Italy swarming with communists; there were millions of them. Italy had to make a choice; she had either to outlaw the communist party or to defeat it by democratic processes. Italy decided to do it the hard way. She fought and she won. Although it was not a decisive victory, it was undoubtedly a decisive battle which now gives her the opportunity to strengthen her social defences.

Last week presidential primaries were held in the state of Oregon, Stassen and Dewey being the candidates. Stassen had preached the outlawing of the communist party, and Governor Dewey took him up on it, accepted his challenge, debated it nationally and locally. The people of Oregon spoke and Dewey was elected.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that no matter what action we take against the communist party today, we shall find that there will be a revolutionary left wing popping up the minute that conditions get difficult again and men begin to lose their jobs, and somebody behind a wicket says: All those who want relief will line up on the right.

I started out at the beginning by defining the emotional approach to anti-communism and I advocated the rational approach because, amongst those with the emotional approach, there are people with dangerous illusions. They tend to pin the red label on all those whose political positions veer a little left of centre or who do not agree with their own political views. This not only overrates the enemy, but alienates political allies. Let me give the house an example.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) spoke in this house a few days ago and outlined Canada's foreign policy. It was a magnificent report of the greatest significance to the nation. It was moderate, and it met with the approval not only of members of the house but of the general Canadian public. This is what he said:

> Canada would play her full part in every movement to give substance to the conception of an effective system of collective security by the development of regional pacts.

Yet in some sections of the country we hear comments being made upon it such as this:

> Brutally warlike and imperialistic.

Again:

> The most dangerous proposals.

Again:

> The most incendiary ideas.

That is the way in which the communists talk about our foreign policy. Yet is it fair to say that all people who use similar terms are also communists? If that is so, then I need only tell you, Mr. Speaker, that exactly these words were used by the Duplessis press in Quebec to describe the minister's speech. They are not communists; no one can suggest that. They may not be very bright, and they may be opposed to this government, but they are not communists. I merely point out the danger of condemning by association. Regrettably it springs from a tendency to hang the red label on people who are not guilty of it and from an eagerness to use the red label to discredit sometimes a trade union, sometimes a social movement or anything else of a progressive nature that appears within a greedy man's grasp.

I do not think we shall get anywhere in that way. Our attack on communism must be as realistic as the communist attacks which took Rumania, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia; it must be tailored to the thinking of our own people, and it must be directed against the reds who are really communists. It must not rest simply on the assertion: "No matter what it is doing to you, our way of life is best." That is not good enough.

If I may be personal, to me communists are not necessarily those from across the seas; they are not those who simply demand socialized medicine, or higher old age pensions, or the restoration of price controls. I do not think anyone could hold any such views after having been progressively the mayor of an industrial city, the minister of labour of our largest province, and the member representing a large working-class constituency.

No; communists, to me, are people. To me, a communist is a man who holds a certain card; just as a fellow-traveller is a man whom I suspect of holding a party card but of being too discreet to admit it. As human beings go, many of them are as you and I. They give to the poor; they love their children; they are well informed, and their personal lives are not unlike ours. The trouble is that they are fanatics, blind, unreasoning fanatics; and no one can convince me that fanatics are not potentially dangerous. They are prepared to use boldness and force, or stealth and cunning, whichever the situation calls for. It is a cold-blooded brand of power politics, utterly ruthless and utterly merciless in its belief that the end justifies the means. Its end is world domination. Their loyalties lie outside the borders of this land, despite their parrot-like reiteration to the contrary. The single-track mind, whatever its terminus, is a menace to all of us whose preference is for individual freedom, for tolerance and a willingness to see two sides to most questions. It is a menace to the vast majority of Canadians.

We have a criminal code for those who break the law. Let us apply the law for crimes they commit, not for ideas they have. I heartily approve strengthening the code to deal with these people and with subversive activities, but I am opposed to outlawing people for religious, political, social or economic views.

If, as has been suggested, we outlaw the communist party, or the Labour Progressive party, or whatever title it may appear under next, then I assure the house that our emotional impulse will bring forth hearty approval. This approval will come from, among others, the Labour Progressive party. We will drive them underground, which means that they will be given a stimulant toward organization, a badly needed provocation to party activity. They are born conspirators; they thrive on the cloak-and-dagger life; we will confer on them, by outlawing their party, a sense of romance that will attract converts, particularly immature converts, and what is more, we will toss into their lap the partisan halo. Out-in-the-open events often make them a little silly. But they are skilled tunnelers and sub-surface operators.

No, Mr. Speaker, let us be guided by reason rather than emotion. Communism is on the wane in this country mainly because people have jobs; they have enough to eat, and some of them are able to lay something aside for a rainy day. Some day I hope that the government gets around to finding a scientist who has a political turn of mind. I have a particular job for him. I hope that that political scientist will undertake the work and find out the relationship between calorie intake and communist enrolment in a given country. It seems to me that that is a study we have neglected.

I have said that the communists are on the way down. If anyone doubts that they are slipping, is there any other explanation of their somewhat embarrassing support or attempted support of the C.C.F.? On every platform in this province, from every housetop the C.C.F. are saying: We do not want their money; we do not want their support; we do not want their votes; we want no part of them. If they were an asset, that, to me, would not appear to be the normal reaction.

Where is their influence in this country? They have no representatives in the House of Commons. I am even surer that they have no representatives in the Senate. In so far as the legislatures are concerned, the communists have a few members in the province of Ontario, and I think one in the province of Manitoba; but their members are known, tagged and minimized. In the municipal councils they may have one here or there, but they are overwhelmed by numbers. And mind you, Mr. Speaker, the only way that they are able to elect members to these various legislative bodies is that there is a great deal of inertia amongst our own people. Where we find seventy-five per cent of the people voting, they have not a chance.

Someone may say that they have influence in the administrative offices of this country. I doubt that. We have had reason to believe that if they were there, they were cleaned out. They certainly are not in our police departments; they certainly are not in our armed services. I do not believe that they have any great influence in this country.

Communism can become important, but only when the masses of the people have been driven into despair by hunger—that is what happened in eastern Europe—or into a mistrust of democracy itself—that is what happened in Czechoslovakia. We in Canada can certainly produce a revival of communism only if unemployment is permitted to rise again, or if we drive the communist party underground, which has always favoured their growth; for, like a weed, they flower in adversity.

My advice is to keep them out in the open. Let everyone see their leaders and their party members. By all means tell the people, retell the people, and tell the people again what the communists stand for, and make them campaign as you and I campaign, in the open market places of political ideas. The Canadian loves freedom for himself; but he detests and fears insecurity for his family; and if we deprive him of his present modest measure of security he will again, as he did in 1930 and in 1934, listen to those who propose that he trade in his freedom.

Poverty is the great catalyst that drives an exhausted society to communism. In Europe not only have they had poverty, but on top of that they have exploitation, corruption, race hatred, discrimination, inequality of opportunity and injustice. In this country, if we keep things healthy economically for the masses of the people, there is nothing at all that we need worry about. But if we permit collapse again we shall once more have some form of red peril, no matter under what name it travels.

The challenge is to make democracy work, for when democracy becomes positive communism becomes negative. As for myself, I have sufficient confidence in our institutions to believe that they will survive the onslaught of political controversy. They will grow and improve and benefit our people. Reason, history and experience tell me that this bill, if passed, will play into the hands of the communists, and that is the last thing I want to do.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have a word of disagreement with the last speaker. If I have I shall have to read his speech carefully to find out what it is; because his sentiments were expressed as I should like to be able to express mine. However I am going to deal with the matter from a slightly different point of view, from the point of view of an ordinary everyday Canadian citizen who has a tremendous belief in the past of our country, a tremendous faith in the future of it, and an infinitely greater faith in the intelligence of the Canadian people to listen to, screen and accept or reject ideas that are submitted to them. If our eighty years of responsible government have not taught all of us that we as a people are capable of doing that, then we have not been able to learn the lessons of history.

Furthermore, we have in the mother country some valuable lessons. They have never attempted a thing of this kind. I have been in London myself—and a great many other hon. members who have been overseas have been there—and listened to the variety of speeches one will hear in Hyde Park, in Albert Hall and in other places. Only the other day a man told me that he was over there during the war and attended an open air meeting being held around the smoking ruins where one of the big rocket bombs of the Germans had fallen. Right there a man was standing up making a speech, condemning the British government for its treatment of German prisoners of war, and nobody tried to take him down off his box; nobody interfered with him. They let him talk, I do not suppose he had the slightest effect on the government's treatment of prisoners of war. But when the people can believe in the right of free speech to the extent that they will allow a speech of that kind around the smoking ruins of one of their buildings where probably lives were lost, it indicates that they have learned the value of democracy, or, as the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) says, the open-market discussion of political ideas and other kinds.

I hold in my hand a little clipping from The Economist of London, and it is headed, "No United Kingdom 'Witch-Hunt'." It reads as follows:

> Action against professing communists in the United Kingdom government service has long seemed desirable, but it must not be allowed to develop into the kind of excesses which have lately been witnessed in Washington. There may be something laughable in the spectacle of Hollywood reduced to a jelly of fear of "radicalism"; but there is something tragic in it, too. In the last resort, democracies must work out their own means of self-protection by their own democratic method. That is the only final assurance that it cannot happen here.

That is something that everybody can learn. We come back closer to home, and while I am not a supporter of my hon. friends opposite—there was a time when I was, many years ago in my juvenile life when I had not seen the light—I retain the democratic right, Mr. Speaker, to go back there if I want to.

Mr. JOHNSTON: You would hate to do so.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am not going to do so, but I have the democratic right to do so, or to support my hon. friends here, or my hon. friends there, and I want nobody to take that right away from me. I will oppose any attempt to do that, and I equally oppose the attempt to prevent anybody else from expressing his ideas. I do that on idealistic democratic grounds. But I also want to say, as the hon. member for Spadina has said, that there is a very good practical reason why I do not want to see a bill of this kind passed in this house.

It so happened that I attended the first meeting called to organize the communist party in that part of the country in which I lived shortly after world war I. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that things were more or less upset politically. Ideas were undergoing certain changes. There was questioning going on, and obviously everybody was imbued with what he thought was a new idea and was endeavouring to express it.

I went to that meeting and listened carefully to the man who came to tell us the story of what we could do for this country if we formed a communist party. When the time came to sign up members I had to make up my mind, and I did. I did not find in that meeting, or in the program suggested, the place where my political faith could find a home, and so I left the meeting and have never attended one of that kind since. But I have watched them closely, and I believe that the decision to which I came at that time was the right one. They still have no place for me in their particular organization, nor have I any desire to be there.

On the other hand, in our political life in this country I must, on behalf of those who wish to support me, go out into the open market of political ideas and take on all comers who do not believe as I do, and I am perfectly willing to do so. If any member on the other side wishes to come to my constituency and promote his ideas I am prepared to stand on the same platform with him and oppose his ideas and advocate my own. The same goes for my hon. friends over there or in any other part of the house and the same goes for those who believe in the communist idea.

At no time, however, have I ever suggested, and I hope I shall never so far lose my faith in democratic methods as to suggest, that because someone over there or over here, or anywhere else, does not agree with me I must prevent that person from having the right to say what he wishes to say. Certainly I will never suggest that such a person be put in jail or be outlawed or shot or treated in any other way that some others might treat us.

I am not alone in that belief. Responsible members on the Liberal side apparently feel the same way, for I have a report that appeared in the newspapers, from the Canadian Press, wherein the Secretary of State

(Mr. Gibson), who is not in his seat at the moment, is reported to have said at a meeting held at Kitchener—and these words are in quotation marks:

"Some people suggest that the communist party should be outlawed and its papers banned. I do not believe this is the answer . . . if we have nothing better to offer than the communists, then we have no excuse for opposing them; but if, as we generally believe, our system is superior, then our people of all groups and classes have a right to know in what ways they benefit by supporting our democratic system."

There is a place where the Secretary of State and I can meet on common ground, and that is, I expect, rather rare for him and me.

I wish to point out also that a bill of this kind exhibits two characteristics, to neither of which I should like to see Canadians subject. It indicates either a lack of faith in the Canadian voter or else a childish fear of something because we have not the courage to get out and face it and take the necessary steps to make it impossible for the thing we fear to grow.

In another debate in this house the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) put some figures on the record. His speech will be found at page 3555 of Hansard of May 3 of this year. He took his figures from the World Report of April, 1947. The figures were released in London, according to his statement, and he gave the size in numbers and percentage of population in various countries of the communist party. In Canada, his figures indicate, there are 23,000, or one-fifth of one per cent—·2 per cent.

I remember the early days of Hitler's regime when he was turning his hatred upon the people of the Jewish race and when he tried to make and finally succeeded in making the German people believe that the whole future of Germany was endangered by allowing this small section of the population to live. He made it stick so well that these people were almost eliminated.

At that time the Jewish population of greater Germany was, I believe, something less than one per cent of the total population. Do we want something like that to happen here? Do we want to debase ourselves so far as to try to bring about the conditions recommended by this bill, because we are afraid of one-fifth of one per cent of the population of Canada who have been active in this country for something like twenty-eight years?

I cannot conceive of an idea of that kind emanating from a Canadian citizen whose forebears pioneered this country and took an active part in the development of our democratic institutions, a Canadian who, like myself, knows only this as his native land, who believes in our institutions, in the land where his particular racial group and mine have learned to get along together in amity without threats, except on the part of a few fools, to go and shoot each other. I cannot understand such a man bringing in a bill of this kind. It seems to me inconceivable.

If this bill had come from a newcomer to Canada who had emigrated from a country where they had never had the advantages of our historical background, I could understand it. But from a fellow Canadian like myself, I am frankly unable to understand how it could be proposed.

Let us see whether there is truth in the dangers that these people represent. We are told that one of their first points of attack is among the working-class organizations. Mr. Speaker, for a great number of years I have been very active in the farm organizations of Saskatchewan, big ones and little ones, from small institutions comprising a few people who handle in a co-operative way coal, wood, gasoline, and things of that kind, to the larger ones that handle the great grain marketing and the great distribution of all commodities.

We have communists in Saskatchewan. There may be some in the co-operative movement; in fact, I would be amazed if there were not. I expect that some have probably tried to gain official positions in the elective fields of these organizations, but of all the organizations I know, I am aware of only one co-operative farmers organization in Saskatchewan that has one communist on the board of directors, and he is there, not by any claim to political superiority by reason of his beliefs but because the people who elected him believe he is a competent director of the organization. If he attempted to introduce any of his ideas into the operation of that organization he would suffer defeat at the next election.

Of all those organizations, I know of not a single one that is to the slightest extent dominated, among its elected officers, by communists. I hold in my hand their News Letter, volume 3, No. 4, of April, put out by the Co-operative Union of Saskatchewan, and I wish to show how co-operatives believe in democratic performance, in democratic practices and in democratic activities in all their fields. I will say this, and it cannot be disputed, that no co-operative organization in this country that I have ever heard of has ever endeavoured to prevent, by law or repression, even the kind of private enterprise they are opposing, from continuing, although we have frequently had some types of private enterprise that have tried with some success to persuade the present government to make it more difficult for co-operatives to grow than they have for some of the great semi-monopolies in this country. However, they stand absolutely for religious freedom, racial tolerance, freedom of assembly and freedom of speech. That is at the masthead of every co-operative organization I know of in the west. They say further that the denial of any of these rights to any one group endangers the whole edifice. I think that is a potent statement. If we establish in this country things of the kind suggested, we shall weaken our faith in the system we have been building, I think successfully, over our nearly eighty-one years of nationhood since we got responsible government.

I know that on many occasions in the past I have criticized, as I shall in the future as long as I am here, those in authority when I think they have done wrong. I believe it is through that kind of criticism, when it is sound and when it is submitted to the public, that we make improvements. That is how it has gone along. We did not always have the state that we have at the present time. It was much worse at one time. We had, shall we say, most unmoral political activities in the past; even in my lifetime I can remember them. I do not believe that we have nearly so much of it now. In the main I believe that the great majority of the people who are elected to this House of Commons, and to our legislatures, are men and women of integrity, who did not buy their way via the rum jar and other methods of that kind. I believe that we are improving our political life. We shall not improve but shall rather weaken our position the minute we undertake to say that, because of somebody we do not like or somebody we think we have cause to fear, we shall do as is suggested. The minute we say we must prevent these people from talking, we are doing as the hon. member who spoke just ahead of me said; we are making it possible for them to build up something that we might have great cause to be afraid of in the future. I am never afraid of anything I can see, but I can get desperately afraid of shadows when I do not know what is contained therein. I think that goes for our whole political life.

Another thing the co-operatives say is this, and I am quoting now from the April letter of the co-operative union:

> Remember—the technique of the anti-democratic is always the same. First, a small minority group is singled out for persecution and denial of the right to meet, to speak, to worship.

When that is done, Mr. Speaker, then we start from there on the downward path reversing the history of our country. I should like to tell some of the things that have happened that I know of. I should like to tell my hon. friend one little story. A man came to our western country not so many years ago, and because he knew a great number of us in that country were Protestants, he brought out what was supposed to be the obligation taken by the Knights of Columbus. He sought out everyone he could think of who was a member of the Masonic order, and saw that he got a copy of it. It was the most damnable document I ever read in my life until I came to Ottawa to this session of parliament when I received another one which I will describe in a moment if I have time.

That document set out all the things that the Catholics would do to the Protestants, the most vicious kind of things they were going to practise on them in order to make this a Catholic country completely under the control of the Knights of Columbus. They held meetings in our community and they asked us to go there. I went to listen, and I was extremely angry. When the meeting was over, when this man had finished speaking, I got up. I said, "Here you are; you call yourself a decent individual. Yet you come here and try to destroy my faith in my neighbour and create in me an emotional hatred for him, because you say he claims he is going to do something to me." I took that document, tore it and threw it in his face. He became very angry and came to my office the next day. He started again, and I had the great and glorious pleasure of taking him by the windpipe and tossing him out through the office door. He never came back again. I do not want those things to happen in this country.

Mr. LaCROIX: Even to your neighbour communists?

Mr. BENTLEY: As long as my neighbour the communist is subject to the same laws as I am in this country, and as long as he does not break those laws. If he does break those laws, he must be dealt with by the police force, the same as I or anybody else who breaks the laws. There is plenty of law to take care of all the misdemeanours or major crimes that can happen in this country. We have a good police force. We have good city by-laws in our urban places. We have plenty of protection to see that nobody is permitted to do things to us that our law says must not be done; and I believe implicitly in law and order.

The other document I mentioned that I received was just as bad, and I received it from an anonymous person out in Vancouver, British Columbia. This was anti-Jewish, and was trying to persuade the reader that the Jews must be dealt with both harshly and severely in this country. It did not say to kill them, but if I had been subject to emotionalism, as it was hoped the receiver would be, I would have easily read into it my right to go out and kill them. I was told the question was, Who is a Jew? This paper said not to have the slightest doubt about who is a Jew when you meet him. If he looks like a Jew, he is a Jew. So with regard to anybody I do not like, all I have to do is to describe him as a Jew and go out and do something harsh to him; because if he looks like one to me, he is one.

The same thing would eventually apply to these people. When you start to pick on some kind of people, some day you will say, "Not only do I suspect you of holding a card, but I am going to strip you and look for a card." And if I do not find a card on you, I am going to say, "You are a communist, anyway, and something is going to happen to you." From there we go on from one to the other, to the Japs and to the Jehovah's witnesses who tried to propagate a certain kind of religion and who should be allowed to do so. We shall go from them to somebody else, and pretty soon we would have ourselves in a political turmoil instead of having the democratic rights we are supposed to have.

I should like to go on at some length to give more quotations from this paper, but I know there are others who wish to speak on this matter and I do not want to take more than my share of the available time. It seems a pity that we have only an hour for these particular things, because if anyone takes his full time—

Mr. LaCROIX: You are doing your best to talk it out.

Mr. BENTLEY: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said I was doing my best to talk it cut. That statement is completely and utterly untrue. I did not make the rules of this house. Those are made by the government. I have only this occasion to speak on this matter, and others will want to do so also. I am perfectly willing, when the matter comes to a vote, to stand and be counted on the basis of what I have said here tonight. Anybody who says I am deliberately talking this bill out is telling a deliberate untruth; and I should like to use a stronger word.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take all the time available tonight. I have probably already taken more than my share. There is plenty more that I should like to have said, both from my heart and from my mind, as well as from this document from which I was quoting the co-operative unions' Monthly Letter, which is put out by the kind of people I believe in and trust. But I hope I have at least said enough to convince some members of this house that the Canadian people are intelligent enough to be able to get out and listen to all the political ideas that may be expressed by anybody in this country and to choose what to them is the best. I will abide by their decision, because I believe it will be a good decision when made by them.

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my remarks this evening will be very brief. I expect to conclude within three minutes, so that hon. members will have an opportunity to vote on this bill if they wish to do so.

My choice is very simple. I must support the bill because I have in my constituency the leader of the Canadian communist party, Mr. Tim Buck, who has been opposed to me in elections and whose influence and methods I know very well. At the same time I must deplore the fact that this bill has had to be introduced in this house by a private member, and that a better bill designed to accomplish the thing we all want, that is the security of our Canadian way of life, has not been sponsored by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) or the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King).

In the short period of the last ten years we have seen free countries fall under the spell of the police state. We have seen the Baltic states, Yugoslavia, Roumania, Bulgaria and Hungary come under the spell of communism. Today we see Greece menaced by this same absolute form of government. Only a few weeks ago we saw Italy win a notable victory over the communist ideology in its last general election. Czechoslovakia has gone under, and Finland has been forced to sign a most unfortunate agreement. The Baltic states of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania are politically dead; and the march of the iron curtain is ever westward.

The people who support these absolute doctrines do not understand our political philosophy, the fair play in which we believe and the tolerance which we have always maintained under our British institutions. Therefore they cannot be met by ordinary means; they must be met by strong measures. Though in this bill there is much that democratically minded people must deplore, I have no choice but to support it, because I believe that communism is the number one menace to the world today and that, unless we take positive action against it, in the end we must be weakened and possibly succumb.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt whatever—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. MAYBANK: Hon. members are calling "Question", but this bill will not be voted upon tonight. I did not want to speak at this time; I wanted to give the measure more consideration and to speak at greater length. Obviously, of course, I cannot say what I should like to have said in the time at my disposal this evening, but whatever ideas had occurred to me I am going to set aside for just a moment in order to comment upon the speech to which we have just listened. I believe the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Skey) gave us an excellent example of where this sort of legislating will lead us. In effect he said, "I have Tim Buck for an opponent in my riding, and I am in favour of this bill".

Mr. SKEY: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MAYBANK: There is no point of order. I am interpreting my hon. friend's remarks.

Mr. SKEY: Only because I know the methods they employ to delude the Canadian people.

Mr. MAYBANK: That is all right. The hon. member was on his feet for some time—

Mr. SKEY: Three minutes.

Mr. MAYBANK: He had a good opportunity to explain all the explanations he endeavoured to make. My construction of what he said is just as I put it to you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SKEY: It is quite wrong.

Mr. MAYBANK: Well, perhaps on some other occasion the hon. member will explain the last explanation. That is exactly the way in which people will approach this sort of problem; not being able to meet with arguments opponents of the sort dealt with in this bill, they will have the law on them. If necessary, they will make a law they can have on them and do something to them, fine them or put them in jail or something like that.

Mr. SKEY: Why does the government not sponsor a proper bill?

Mr. MAYBANK: The hon. member for Trinity and other hon. members might just as well understand now that they cannot win elections in that way.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nine o'clock.

Mr. MAYBANK: I hear it said that it is nine o'clock. I desire to speak further upon this bill and analyse it, as well as some of the philosophy underlying it. That cannot be done this evening, so I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: The time reserved for public bills having expired, the house will now revert to the business under consideration at six o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means; and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. REAL CAOUETTE (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, when the people of Canada learned about the budget they were very much disappointed, for many good reasons. I do not intend to speak very long in English; a little later I shall continue in French. I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that if social credit policies had been applied in this country we would not have had to face the things we are facing today. During the war, social credit policies were partly applied; for instance, the subsidies given to producers, which constituted a step toward the social credit policy of just prices. If this policy were still followed in this country we would not face shortages of merchandise and complaints from the consumers.

During the war we made gifts to other countries. In peacetime it would be no harder to make those gifts to our own people, and they would be completely satisfied. All during the war we never heard anything about a shortage of money in this country, though they say that in order to carry on the war we were obliged to tax the people heavily, that the people were paying all these expenses, and so on. When war was declared in 1939 the people of Canada were not able to finance it because we were just like a lot of broken nails. We had been starved for the ten previous years. However, just overnight in 1939 we were able to find the money with which to build up the strongest war machine we had ever had in this country. It should be just as easy to build up in peacetime a machine to assist our people.

Another thing which looks like social credit policy is the provision for family allowances which has been in effect since July, 1945. If Social Crediters had not been talking about a national dividend from 1930, 1931 and 1932 we would not have family allowances in this country. I agree that a Liberal government passed the law, but it was the Social Crediters who formed public opinion in regard to that matter.

Mr. MICHAUD: Why did you not put it in, in Alberta?

Mr. CAOUETTE: I will answer the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska. During the dinner recess I heard it said that Aberhart had promised a national dividend but had never given it, that he preached social credit for eight, nine or even ten years but that we do not have it yet. It is said that Mr. Manning, the present Premier of Alberta, is still talking about a national dividend, but it has not been granted. This is not the fault of Social Crediters. They endeavoured to obtain a charter for a provincial bank of Alberta, but it was refused and they were unable to go ahead with their policies. The blame rests on the government which stopped them from going ahead to apply social credit.

Mr. LOW: A dog-in-the-manger attitude.

Mr. CAOUETTE: It may be said that a national dividend has not been declared under the Manning administration, but one thing must be said about that administration in Alberta; it is the most honest government in Canada today. You will hear that, Mr. Speaker, not only from me, but even from some of our Liberal friends who know something about it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Have you ever been in Alberta?

Mr. CAOUETTE: Yes. For your information I was there last year.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You just passed through.

Mr. CAOUETTE: They would not allow the hon. member in Alberta. The adoption of the social credit philosophy is a duty in this country. It is not only a duty; it is an obligation that it be established. For an hour this evening we have been hearing about communism. Communism is an idea and you cannot put an idea in jail.

Mr. GRANT: What about Fred Rose?

Mr. CAOUETTE: You put him in jail, but you have not put communism in jail. You will have communism in this country until you can offer a better idea. We stand for free enterprise; we stand for security with freedom, which is just the opposite of communism. Let us go ahead with the social credit philosophy; let us explain it to the people and put it into practice. We should be doing more about it than presenting a budget such as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) presented the other night. The government is just following the same line as it followed before. The same abuses remain and nothing is corrected.

An hon. MEMBER: Toryism.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Toryism and Liberalism. Something must be done and it cannot be done just by making speeches. We can continue to talk in this house, but if we do not do anything to stop communism by proper action, by establishing a system which will permit our people to have a good standard of living, we shall be wasting our time completely.

The trouble today is finance, and the Minister of Finance knows it. There is a shortage of money this year in this budget. The Minister of Finance would like to pay all the debt of this country, but he is not able to do that. He may pay the interest and a little off the capital debt, but he cannot go very far with it. He is not so sure about next year. This year we have prosperity, but it is a strange and funny prosperity, because there are people unemployed and there are people who are starving today.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Come with me and I will show you. You may not find any in this House of Commons but you will find some in our Canadian families. Finance is the trouble and we have to correct the trouble at its source. The Minister of Finance is not creating money. I remember reading where an hon. member had asked the Minister of Finance why he did not have the Bank of Canada create $2,000 million of credit. The minister replied that if the Bank of Canada created $2,000 million of credit, then the chartered banks would have the right to multiply that by ten or even fifteen, which would cause inflation in this country.

If the chartered banks of this country have the right to multiply by ten or fifteen or twenty the amount of money or credit created by the Bank of Canada we should use the Bank of Canada not only as a branch of the chartered banks but as a means of providing service for the people of this country. I will continue my remarks in French.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, after listening to the budget speech it is evident that we shall not have a general election this year. Some of my Liberal colleagues do not even mind saying that it is not a pre-election budget. To me the budget is simply the admission that the government are not responsible to the people, that the government kowtow to financial interests and do not take into consideration the needs of the people. I would not say that the government would not like to take a greater and more specific interest in the people's welfare, but they cannot do it because such monetary control prevents them from doing what they would like to do. It is all very well to say that money is not everything, that the Social Credit members are always talking about money, but one sure thing is that you cannot go very far without money but you can go anywhere with it. Here is an example. During the war there was plenty of money to make war machines; there was no lack of funds for guns and rifles, there was no lack of it for the army and for munitions. Moreover, all that war material was flown over Europe and all that ammunition was dropped there without our ever getting one cent for it. They got it all for nothing. Now, in peacetime, we have an austerity program and no money. There is no means of setting up peacetime machinery, of developing the natural resources of this country. What we lack is money, and nothing else. We have the manpower, the know-how. People are ready, backed by scientific knowledge and equipment. All we have to do now is to put them to practical use. But the token that gives a right to the use of all those things, that allows everything, is lacking.

The government, through its Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), holds no prospect whatever, in its budget, of something better, or something more sensible in the future. The future holds nothing in store for us, Mr. Speaker. Shall we suffer the whole nation to be strangled much longer by financial interests? We must act now. There is no sense in just talking and speech-making. We must take definite action to prevent Canada from falling into the same chaos, the same difficulties that now beset every country in Europe. This budget offers nothing concrete. It brings no income tax exemption. While the Minister of Finance was reading his budget speech, I was looking around me and observing on the other side of this house many of my good friends, Liberal members, getting a little pale. The budget speech surprised them because many of my good friends had promised or suggested to their constituents that they would get tax exemptions this year, and that did not materialize.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): You do not lack imagination.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Having asked $2,000 for married people, they should force the government to grant that exemption. But when they vote on the budget, the hon. members will vote for the meagre $1,500. They will tell their constituents that it will come next year. We fear communism but we do nothing to prevent it and put an end to its causes. We do not mind fostering its growth by budgets such as the one we are now discussing. This budget, Mr. Speaker, is, I believe, anti-social, it is directed against the family and I would even say that it is anti-Christian. It is a national disgrace.

In Le Droit of May 20, 1948, one could read an editorial by Camille L'Heureux bearing the title: "Money before human values." I quote:

> The budget brought down by the Minister of Finance in the House of Commons has proved a bitter disappointment and a source of profound discontent to the Canadian people.

Further, Mr. L'Heureux adds:

> In truth, Mr. Abbott's budget is antisocial. It seeks to protect the privileged classes to the prejudice of the less privileged. Moreover, it is directed against the family, for it does not take into consideration the increased obligations of family men who earn less than $4,000. It weighs down upon them, crushes them under a heavy load of taxation. Its surplus of $670 million for the last fiscal year is largely made up of moneys which could have been more properly used to provide a reasonable degree of welfare to the Canadian family. It will be the same with the next one, estimated for 1948-1949 at $489 million. In short, the Canadian government sacrifices the reasonable welfare of Canadian families most deprived of material goods to that of the privileged classes of this country and to the continuance of a financial policy which provides exaggerated help to Great Britain. This budget consecrates the principle of the precedence of money over human values.

It is time to recognize that human beings are not mere pack animals, but that they are worthy of consideration and respect. The dignity of human beings today is trampled underfoot. Man is used very much like a pick, or a shovel. He is no better than a machine, and little or no attention is afforded him.

Mr. Speaker, private enterprise is discouraged, which promotes the further rise of communism in this country. Those of our people who could start or establish new industries or businesses or develop new inventions have not the courage to go ahead with their plans because our financial and taxation systems do not permit them to do so. We have to hire accountants to do our bookkeeping in an effort to hang on to our earnings. Otherwise, the returns go entirely to the government. Private enterprise must be respected. May I quote the following excerpt from an article by Mr. Leopold Richer which I have read in the newspaper Notre Temps:

> There remains as a bulwark against the rise of communism and socialism, the impressive fortress of American capitalism. However, in the neighbouring country as everywhere else, private enterprise is attacked from without and from within. From outside, by all those forces which lead, particularly in Europe, toward the state control of production and wealth sources. From within, by its own abuses, its static condition, its blindness, and, its slowness in adapting itself to new conditions.
> Western Europe is being helped in her fight against communism; but is it known that victory is thus being ensured to socialism in Europe? Now after all what is socialism if not a bridge thrown across the abyss of bloody revolutions to enable people to cross over peaceably from capitalism to communism? Does one realize finally what a ridiculous situation the capitalist countries find themselves in? They are providing the enemy with arms.

Mr. Richer adds:

> Even if it is understood that North America should go to the aid of starving and impoverished Europe, one can rest assured that this will not ensure the survival of private enterprise. Is the latter looking for an ideology? This ideology already exists. It is there, within the said enterprise and its social realm.
> As Mr. Esdras Minville recently reminded the members of the Montreal Chamber of Commerce: "The world of tomorrow will either be Christian or communist. Business men cling to freedom of endeavour and to private enterprise. And rightly so, because these are important fundamentals of a social order based upon the respect of human dignity. But if business has rights, it also has duties to perform, the first of which is to serve society."
> If capitalism is to survive, it can pursue but one objective. It must aim at making private enterprise serve the community. But once this objective has been set, we get a new outlook on the future and private enterprise can save the community many tragic upheavals.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that no intelligent citizen, having read that article, should be satisfied with saying: "How beautiful and logical". On the contrary, everyone should make up his mind to follow that lead in order that we may achieve the results which we are seeking.

The problem today lies more in the distribution of goods than in their production. Our industries, both primary and secondary, could produce even more goods if they were only given an incentive to do so. What we are lacking is buying power in the hands of the consumers. The replacement of man-power by machine creates a problem to which there must be a better solution than ever-increasing unemployment.

Today, production depends more and more on mechanization. The worker, who has been replaced by the machine, is no longer remunerated. He loses his wages and everything. If we come to the point where machine replaces the worker, instead of serving him, man will be enslaved.

The purpose of economy is not to provide employment, but to satisfy the needs of man. Such is the purpose of economy. Those who do not think that it should serve the people are simply off the track.

Full employment is not an impossibility. For instance, instead of using fifty men or a steam shovel that takes the place of some two or three hundred men, we could bury the steam shovel and put some five or six hundred men to work with teaspoons. That would give work to everyone. It would be a way of achieving full employment as it is advocated by members of the C.C.F. and by our Liberal friends opposite.

By applying every social credit principle, the policy advocated by the Electors' Union would solve and cure the economic ills that are rife in Canada.

The Social Credit party suggests a cure that would save the people as well as free and private enterprise. Other groups, as I have just pointed out, offer full employment or similar plans that, in short, are just as effective as a poultice applied to a wooden leg.

In the budget speech, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) told us that he could not reduce the personal income tax; the people must understand, he said, that even with more money, they could not buy more than they do at present. There is at least one course they could take, but that is quite out of the question today. Indeed, 68 per cent of our workers earn less than $2,000 a year and they are burdened with debt practically the whole year round. If they had less taxes to pay they could afford to pay their bills. Many such people, hundreds of them, are in urgent need of money.

They have barely enough to live on, $2,000 to $2,500 a year and they would rather spend that money for their family, but they are prevented from doing so. It is alleged that they could not purchase more commodities with this money, but they could at least pay for what they are buying now.

The program of the Union of Electors is more than ever a practical one, and those who do not now recognize it as such will have to admit it before long. If we must wait till we are shaken out of our complacency, it will not take long. It is no secret that the communists are gaining throughout the world. Once again, I say that we must do something at home.

When we ask that all revenues of less than $3,000 a year be tax-free, such a provision is possible and logical. No valid reasons can be given in this house for the maintenance of a tax on all incomes over and above $750 for single persons and $1,500 for married people, when we, as members of parliament, enjoy exemptions of $2,750 for single persons and $3,500 in the case of married people. We find it to be a good thing for ourselves; it is logical and none of us voices any criticism; we are glad to have that exemption but let us not forget that all constituents in our respective counties and every Canadian would also be delighted and pleased to be relieved in some measure from the burden of income tax.

And now, a word concerning the old age pensions of $60 per month at age 60. Some may ask, where will the money come from? Where did it come from during the war? Let us get it from the same source.

Tonight I shall discuss not the methods but the results that are desired. Let us ask ourselves whether Canada can produce enough to pay a $60 monthly pension without the means test, to people in the sixties.

Then we should grant monthly pensions of $60 to our incapacitated or disabled people after they reach the age of 21. No one could assert that Canada is unable to produce sufficient to ensure our incapacitated or disabled people a monthly pension of $60 at the age of 21, when we are in a position to grant pensions to our office workers after the age of 60. If we can give huge sums outside Canada we should certainly be able to give some assistance to those who need it in this country.

The fourth point is the monthly $20 national dividend which we demand. That dividend is still possible. As I said at the outset, family allowances are based on the same principle as that dividend. Moreover, the latter would not be based on laziness as some claim; on the contrary it would be based on and linked with production, and production itself cannot materialize if it is not linked with work.

Dividends would be handed out for labour. The higher the level of production, the fatter these dividends would be. There is absolutely nothing illogical or unfeasible about it today in our country. In the present state of industries, equipment and mechanical devices, we must find a remedy to the social unrest that prevails among our people. In a letter to the King of Sardinia, the Monsignor Rendu, Bishop of Annecy, wrote as follows:

> The progress of industry has given rise to such odious abuses that one has to go back to the times of paganism to find the same degree of callousness and contempt of humanity as exists today. What astonishes me most is that public opinion or what is generally called by that word does not rise against this ever-increasing disorder which engulfs the community like a wave blown by a storm from the middle of the ocean. The abolition of slavery was the source of a noble enthusiasm . . . ; however there is no one to suggest a remedy to this most painful and loathsome disease of humanity. The wailings of its victims are plainly heard, but no one dares raise his voice from fear of those who press them in an effort to extract gold from them.

The same conditions prevail today. Everyone is afraid to raise his voice against finance, against those who control money and credit or against those who are treating man as a piece of machinery. Under social credit from the social standpoint, we are not afraid of attacking evil where it exists and of applying the remedy where it is needed instead of resorting to futile remedies.

If we do not want communism in Canada, let us at least provide honest means of livelihood to each and everyone of our citizens. Let there be among us the rich, the not-so-rich, millionaires and the poor, but we should see that in Canada nobody lacks the necessaries of life. Let us at least guarantee basic necessities.

In his encyclical Quadragesimo Anno, Pope Pius XI expresses himself as follows:

> For then only will the economic and social organism be soundly established and attain its end when it secures for all and each those goods which the wealth and resources of nature, technical achievement, and the social organization of economic affairs can give. These goods should be sufficient to supply all needs and an honest livelihood, and to uplift men to that higher level of prosperity and culture which, provided it be used with prudence, is not only no hindrance but is of singular help to virtue.

Mr. Speaker, I will tell my hon. friends from the other side of the house that if social credit is no good, if it is a dangerous thing, a thing to be feared, what is there to stop the government from applying in Canada the social doctrine of the church? Who prevents them from doing that? It is the financiers, the people who control money and credit, who are only too glad to lean on us to make war, to make the gun-makers wealthy, but when it comes to making the Canadian population wealthy there is no more money. The money-makers are for war; they like war. Then they come and take away from us the money we have been able to make during or after the war, and that for many years to come.

As far as communism is concerned, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the house to one fact. For the last month there has been vile propaganda against that northern section of the province of Quebec which I have the honour to represent in this house. The papers reported that there were 3,000 communists at Val d'Or, 4,000 at Rouyn and 2,000 at Malartic. It was even said that machine-guns had been found at Val d'Or, in the cellar of the member for Pontiac. However, when they came to my house they found that it had no cellar, so how could it hide machine-guns?

This whole story is a malicious fabrication, reflecting on the population of the northern part of the province. At Val d'Or as elsewhere, the people are peaceful, peace-loving, mindful of their own business. They are not communists. There are no more communists in Val d'Or or in Rouyn than here in the house at Ottawa, or in Montreal. We have no such people. Those living in the north are for the most part Catholics. In my constituency they are Social Crediters, which means that they are anti-communists.

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of the Minister of Public Works—he is not in his seat at present, but he will read this—the fact that we in Val d'Or are in great need of a post office and that the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) should see his way clear to satisfy the numerous demands that come from the city of Val d'Or, and provide it with a post office. We also ask for the establishment of a rural mail delivery service in all the parishes of the county of Pontiac, which are all agricultural or colonization parishes. Some people there have to walk as much as five or six miles to fetch their mail. We ask for a rural mail delivery service. We are entitled to it, but here again I suppose money will be lacking.

For two years now we have been demanding a home delivery mail service for the twin cities of Rouyn and Noranda. The Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand) says that a post office should be constructed at Noranda or at Rouyn, and that he does not know what to do. Those people in the north want to be told, not where the post office is to be built, but whether they can have their mail delivered at the door. As far as the means employed are concerned, that is the government's business, the Post Office Department's business. The population wants results. If we get none there, because the member is not a Liberal, it means that it is just the same as in Russia where communist methods are employed. The representatives of the people must be respected, whether they be Liberals, Conservatives, C.C.F. or Social Crediters. When their constituency needs something, let them have it, instead of waiting till the next election to give them empty promises. Those are the things which my constituency most urgently needs. I hope that the responsible ministers will see to it that those requests are satisfied as soon as possible. The whole population suffers from injustice at present. We are entitled to these services and have a right to expect results.

In conclusion may I state that, from the economic point of view, social credit provides a solution. If it is not good, let another one be brought forward. Its philosophy is not a materialistic one. On the contrary it is a good spiritual philosophy and we will fight for its application throughout Canada.

(Text):

Mr. T. B. BARRETT (Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my contribution to the debate will be brief, for I do not intend to indulge in any detailed criticism of the budget but merely to endorse what already has been very well said by other members of this party.

I find that the manner of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is so engaging that, as far as I am concerned, in his administering of a very bitter pill I am somewhat disarmed.

However, in spite of his assurance that the medicine will be good for us, I think the harshness and bad taste of the dose will not only nullify any good effects which theoretically it should have, but tend to destroy that confidence which is so necessary between patient and physician if a cure is to be effected.

The disease, the minister tells us, is inflation; the cure, high taxation. But this heavy burden of taxation, especially as it bears upon the lower income group, is having a definite effect in slowing up production; and increased production, it seems to me, which would help to satisfy the pent-up demand, would be a much better way of beating inflation than taking the people's money away from them so that they will be too hard up to buy what they want.

My conception of the function of government is probably an old-fashioned one, but I believe that government should interfere as little as possible with the ordinary affairs and the lives of the people. If injustices are being perpetrated by any one group, it is the duty of the government to correct and curb those abuses. But otherwise I think they should, as much as possible, leave the people alone to run their own affairs and they should make conditions such that the people will be encouraged to make a reasonable profit rather than discourage and discredit them for so doing.

I deplore this ever-growing tendency toward government interference in private business which is so greatly advocated by my hon. friends to the left and which is practised by my hon. friends opposite. I shall probably be dubbed as a Tory reactionary for taking this stand. Since that term is bandied about so often, I think it worthwhile to inquire into just who are the reactionaries in this house. According to my understanding, a reactionary is one who persists in advocating outworn and discredited policies. Socialism is nothing more than state management, state control and state paternalism. It is the oldest form of government known to society.

In the olden days of the tribal system it probably worked fairly well, in that stage of social development. The chief had full control over the lives of the people of his clan, and looked after them in a paternal way. As civilization advanced, this system developed into the old feudal system, and for a great many years that worked well, at that time. But society has outgrown that. It is now outworn and discredited. On the other hand, the system which this party stands for and supports, that of the greatest freedom of the individual—out of which have grown all the freedoms which we enjoy, such as the freedom of association, universal suffrage, freedom of elections and all the other benefits of democracy—is the most modern, the most advanced system, and has been more conducive to human happiness than any other system recorded by history. I therefore leave it to the judgment of the house as to who are the reactionaries.

Moreover, while our hon. friends of the C.C.F. are extremely voluble in repudiating these embarrassing advances which are being made to them by communism—and I quite acknowledge their sincerity in this repudiation —I must point out to them that, while their methods of approach and their methods of administration differ vastly from those of communism, in the long run the ultimate aim is the same, namely state control of the people. In fact, as Lord Lothian said a few years ago at an Empire club banquet, communism is the only form of socialism that will work. In this connection, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read into the record a resolution which I have received from a group of Ukrainian citizens in my own constituency. It is as follows:

We, Canadians of Ukrainian origin, numbering 80 gathered at a public meeting in Waterford, Ontario, May 16, 1948, unanimously resolved to bring to your attention the following:

1. In 1918, by the will of forty million Ukrainian people on their ethnographic lands of Europe, a democratic Ukrainian national republic was formed, which was recognized by the western powers.

2. The Ukrainian national republic was annihilated by the armed aggression of the Muscovite Bolsheviks between the years 1918 and 1920, and a fictitious totalitarian state the so-called Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic was formed, which, even today exists due to the dictatorship of the ruling communist party and to the terrorism of the secret political police.

3. Since that time the Ukrainian people have struggled unceasingly against the Soviet occupants, viz.: millions of lives lost in that struggle, the present uprising of the Ukrainian partisan army, and the new 300,000 Ukrainian political refugees in the allied occupation zones of Germany.

4. Only after occupying the Ukraine, and annihilating the more intelligent and more active elements of the Ukrainian people by mass executions, by banishments, and by artificial famine, were the Muscovite communists able to commence the realization of their imperialistic plans for undermining the whole world.

5. The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, with its anti-national, totalitarian, terrorist regime, appears as the greatest threat to world peace, world freedom, culture and the Christian religion.

6. By means of revolutions, civil wars, economic crises and subversive acts of its fifth column communist parties in every country, the U.S.S.R. aims to overthrow the existing democratic regimes and to form vassal states, based on the dictatorship of communist minority.

7. The communist parties of the world, under various aliases, are in reality branches of Moscow's communist party of Russia and a fifth column of the U.S.S.R., whose orders guide their activities. Their activity is aimed at the destruction and overthrow of countries wherein they function.

Therefore, we appeal to the Canadian government and especially to its united nations representatives:

1. To investigate, to introduce and to support at the united nations forum, the just requests of the forty million Ukrainians in regard to the renewal of the Ukrainian democratic national republic on their ethnographic territories.

2. To question the right of Mr. D. Manuilski, who has been appointed by and represents the occupational Russian regime, the right to speak in the name of the Ukrainian people.

3. To point out to the members of the united nations the threat to world peace of the present totalitarian U.S.S.R. government with its anti-national regime and its imperialistic foreign policy.

4. To outlaw the so-called Labour Progressive party, which is a branch of the Russian communist party and a fifth column of U.S.S.R. The L.P.P. is not a Canadian party because its headquarters are outside Canada and this party's activity is aimed at exterminating the democratic regime in Canada.

5. To extend a sanctuary on Canadian soil to the Ukrainian political refugees, who at present are found in western Germany and Austria. These peoples are anti-communists, and are representatives of every walk of life. During the last three years under the protection of the western allies they have displayed their skill in organizational and constructive work.

These displaced persons if assisted to settle in Canada would spearhead the movement and combat communism since they are victims of its menace. We feel that the settling of these people in Canada will raise the standard of Canada culturally and economically. In the present grave international crisis these people look with foreboding at the future and have no opportunity for a total expression of their constructive abilities.

We trust that you, being acquainted with the foregoing, will draw the necessary and fair conclusions and meet our request with approval. We remain,

Faithfully yours,

Mike Podolak,
Chairman of meeting.

John Danyeevich,
Secretary.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in his budget speech the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said we should view the national budget in relation to the whole economy of the country. He went further and said we should think of it in terms not only of the present but also of the future.

With that sentiment I thoroughly agree, but I fail to find in the budget speech or in the policies of the government any implementation of that high principle. As far as the budget itself is concerned, it seemed to me that the Minister of Finance applied that principle of planning our national affairs in relation to our whole economy only with respect to the national debt. To him it seemed a matter of supreme concern that we plan everything to make as large a reduction as possible in our national debt. All of us feel a measure of sympathy with that idea, for it is in keeping with something most of us go through personally. We find that debt is a millstone around one's neck, and that it is highly desirable to get rid of it if at all possible. But it is also true in the experience of ordinary human beings that most people like to live for something else than just paying off debt. Most people like to enjoy life in the process, and to feel that they have something to look forward to. I suggest that there is a parallel between that ordinary human experience and the problem which faces us in planning our national economy. I believe it is our job as a parliament, and the job of the government, to find a balance between reducing the debt as far as that can be done, and at the same time making provision for improving the standard of living and providing our Canadian people with an opportunity to enjoy life here and now.

Just in passing, I should like to remind the minister and the house that if his position were completely logical it would mean that we should do our best to get the national debt down to some small figure, such as it was a number of years ago. When we look at some of the statistics with which we have been furnished we find that in 1933 our national debt was only about $2,500 million. In 1947, on the other hand, our national debt was over $13,000 million. Most of us have memories of 1933 which are much more bitter than those of 1947. The fact is that in the year of the infinitely smaller national debt we had the worst depression this country has ever known, but in the year of the huge national debt to which I have referred we had what the government, at least, calls a time of high prosperity. I do not say one is the cause of the other, but certainly these figures disprove the suggestion that by simply reducing our national debt to some smaller figure we would bring back prosperity. What counts is not the size of the national debt but the level of our economic activity, and the production of the goods and services that go to make up the standard of living of our people.

As a matter of fact, this point was driven home to the house a good many times during the course of the war by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) when he was Minister of Finance. Time and again he was chided by Mr. Hanson, then leader of the official opposition, over the huge debt which was being piled up. The minister found this chiding somewhat to his liking, for it enabled him to reply that this huge national debt was but an index of the increased productivity of the country. Many times he told us he had no fear of our ability to carry a much larger national debt as long as we had a high level of economic activity and high productivity. So I suggest that the aim of the government's budgetary proposals and the aim of parliament should be not simply the reduction of the national debt to some hypothetically low figure, but rather the raising of the level of production and the standard of living of the Canadian people.

I felt that the best part of the budget speech was the part the minister did not read. As a matter of fact, I want to compliment the minister and his officials on the way in which the white paper was put together this year. In his speech the minister indicated that there were certain new departures; and I have found it extremely interesting and valuable to look through the statistics contained in the budget white paper. I am sure these figures will be very useful to us in time to come. I was particularly pleased with the way in which the minister had prepared for us not only figures relating to government accounts but figures relating to our national economy in the broader sense. I am interested also in the figures he gave relating to the amount of money spent by governments at all three levels in relation to the total national income of the country as a whole.

Some hon. members may fear that having said this, I shall be launching into a reading of a lot of these figures. That is not my intention tonight. I do wish to call attention, however, to the figures in the appendix to the budget, on page 4111 of Hansard, where a table appears headed, "Personal disposable income per capita". This table, like many others in this appendix, gives comparisons for the years 1939, 1944, 1946 and 1947. The particular table to which I refer indicates quite clearly that there has been a considerable increase in the amount of personal disposable income per capita in this country since 1939, and I happen to know that the figure in 1939 was considerably higher than it was in 1933. Even with the increases that have taken place, however, we find that the average personal income per capita in Canada for 1947, before the deduction of taxes, was $804. The direct personal tax amounted on an average to $63, which left a net personal disposable income of $741 for every man, woman and child in this country.

It all depends on one's approach to this subject whether that is a good figure or not. When one thinks of it in terms of average individual income it does not sound very much, but when someone points out that it is the average income that people can spend for all the goods and services they need to keep alive, the average income of every man, woman and child, then it might be said that it is pretty fair. For example, if the average for every man, woman and child is close to $750, to use round figures, it would mean that a family of four—a man, his wife and two children—would have an average annual spendable income of $3,000. Again I say that sounds very good when one speaks in terms of averages.

But nothing is more deceptive in statistics than averages and that rule certainly holds good in this case. It so happened that about a day or two after we got the budget and this interesting appendix which the minister gave us with it, his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), presented us with a green book entitled, "Taxation Statistics." This book bears the publication date of September, 1947. Again I am grateful to a department of government for what it has done in compiling useful statistics. I wish to refer to some figures found on pages 116 and 117 of this new and interesting book. The figures on these pages are headed as follows:

> Estimated distribution of taxpayers, income, and revenue by income class and by marital status and dependents.

These figures are for the taxation year 1946, which is the last year for which these statistics are available, and one can understand that they could not be any later than that just yet. I wish to make a comparison between the average personal disposable income which the Minister of Finance gave in the appendix to the budget with the figures furnished by the Minister of National Revenue. I do not want anyone to say I am dealing with figures that are not comparable, so in the table given by the Minister of Finance on page 7 of the appendix I shall take the figure for 1946 and compare it with those given by the Minister of National Revenue for the same year. In that year the average personal income in Canada was $769 before taxes were deducted. With the deduction of taxes, it is brought down to $704. It is a question which of those figures one should take for the purpose I have in mind, but I suggest that the round figure of $750 is fair enough, and for my purposes it is on the conservative side.

What I am anxious to do is to show hon. members how deceptive that average is. It is very nice to say that every man, woman and child has $750 a year to spend on the things he needs. Thus it might be said that $3,000 a year for a family of four is not too bad. But what is the picture as given to us by the Minister of National Revenue in his book, "Taxation Statistics"? To begin with, I may say there are several columns in these pages headed "single no dependents", "single one dependent", "single two or more dependents", "married no dependent", "married one dependent", "married two dependents", "married three dependents", and so on. I intend to take the figures from only three columns. The three I have chosen are "married one dependent", "married two dependents" and "married three dependents". In other words, these are families of three, four and five persons. I have taken them as being a sort of average Canadian family.

If it were true that the Canadian people have this glorious average of $750 a year per person it would mean that families of three should have an income of $2,250 a year. But what is the story for a family of three persons, namely, a married couple with one dependent? There were in the year I am considering, 1946, 423,520 taxpayers in that class. Of those 423,520 taxpayers in the class of families of three, only 161,020 had $2,250 or more. On the other hand, 262,500 of them had incomes of less than $2,250, or, in other words, less than this glorious Canadian average.

Let me put it in percentages. Only 38 per cent of families of three persons who pay taxes had the average income or better; 62 per cent of them had less than the average. Bear in mind this further fact that I am taking only the figures for those in the taxation bracket. If you add to the 62 per cent to which I have just referred the families of three that do not pay income tax that are below the exemption levels, the number of which is not given, you raise to a much higher figure those families of three Canadians who are below the average to which I have referred.

Let me go into the next column which deals with married persons with two dependents, or, in other words, a family of four. If the glorious Canadian average meant anything it would mean that a family of four should have an income of four times $750, or $3,000 of disposable personal income. But what is the story of families of four? According to the figures furnished by the Minister of National Revenue, there were 294,616 taxpayers in the class of families of four, or married with two dependents. Of those 294,616, only 48,166, or 17 per cent, had the average or better. On the other hand, 246,450, or 83 per cent, had incomes in 1946 below the glorious average.

Again I point out that that figure of 246,450 families of four persons having less than the average income takes into account only those who paid taxes. If you add to that figure the families of four that had incomes so small that they did not pay taxes at all and therefore are not included in the taxation statistics, the percentage of Canadian families of four having less than the average would be even higher than 83 per cent.

I move over into the next column which is headed "married three dependents", or in other words, families of five. What is the story there? Again, if the average of $750 meant anything it should mean that families of five have an income of $3,750 a year. I find in the case of these families of five, in 1946 there were 142,524 who paid taxes, and of that number only 14,224—

Mr. McCANN: Where did you get that figure of 14,224?

Mr. KNOWLES: I am taking those who were receiving $3,750 or more. The minister will find that dividing line about half way down the column. I have taken this average of $3,750 and added the figures from there down—the minister can check them and draw my attention to it if I have made a mistake—and it comes to 14,224, which is ten per cent of the total number of taxpayers in that group, whereas there are 128,300 who are below $3,750 in the families of five. This means that, of the families of five who pay taxes, 90 per cent have incomes of less than the average figure of $750 per person.

Mr. McCANN: There may be two in the family who are not dependents at all.

Mr. KNOWLES: The heading on the column is, "married three dependents". If they have other members of the family who are not dependents they are not claimed as dependents by the taxpayers.

Mr. McCANN: You ought to put on the record, with respect to the family of five who, according to your figures, are earning $3,750, or five times $750, that all of them put together had to pay a tax of only $190 on the average.

Mr. KNOWLES: The Minister of National Revenue is missing my point altogether. I am not now complaining about the amount of tax the people had to pay. I am complaining with respect to the thousands of people who are in such low income brackets that they do not pay income tax at all.

Mr. McCANN: If that is your only complaint we can attend to that.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is the best promise we ever got from the ministerial benches. I want to make one further comment about this class, namely, families of five. I have taken as the average $3,750, namely, five times the average individual income of $750, and I have shown that 90 per cent of the families of five have less than that average. Actually in the group "married three dependents", namely, families of five, there are 56,800 who have less than half the average, and that figure of 56,800 represents 40 per cent of the married taxpayers in this country who have three dependents.

I point out again that my figures are on the conservative side, because they do not include the thousands of persons that there are in each of these categories whose incomes are below the exemption levels altogether. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this turns that glorious Canadian average of $750 per person into a pretty sorry picture when one has to face the fact that there are that many Canadian families trying to get along on incomes so far below the average. This average income is very nice if you have it or if you are in the brackets above it, but it is poor solace and poor comfort to those who are away down below to be told that, on the whole, things are so glorious in this country.

There are two comments I want to make on the statistics to which I have just referred. The first is, if I may go along with the line of thought that was in the mind of the Minister of National Revenue, that these figures support the criticism that has been made from many quarters of this house against the Minister of Finance for his failure to increase the tax exemption levels. Others have pointed out, and I will not take time to repeat it, what has happened to the cost of living. The Minister of Finance himself pointed that out very effectively in his speech when he told us that it was the thing that had chiefly concerned all of us during the past year or so. What I am pointing out now is that it is no theoretical or hypothetical consideration but a real problem for thousands of Canadians whose total personal disposable income is so far below the Canadian average.

The other comment I make on the basis of these figures is that they reveal pretty poor planning on the part of the government of the day as far as the standard of living of our Canadian people is concerned, and it points up the need for tremendous improvements in our economic conditions both in terms of economic productivity and in terms of social security. I do not wish to go into these matters at any great length tonight, but I want to say a word or two in particular with regard to the second of the things I have just mentioned, namely social security.

If any government accepts it as its duty to make its budget have some beneficial effect upon the life of the country; if, as the Minister of Finance said in his budget speech at page 4072 of Hansard—

> In the world of today we must be prepared to undertake much that is new, much that is daring, much that is big.

—one of the places to start is in the field of social security, a need that is high-lighted by the kind of figures that I have given the house tonight taken from the government's own statistics. With so many of our people down in those income brackets where living is so tough, it is not good enough to plan for better programs of social security years or decades in the future—

Mr. MARTIN: What other country spends as much of its national income on social security and welfare services as Canada?

Mr. KNOWLES: That question is repeated so often, every time we talk about conditions in Canada, that it is losing any point it ever had. What we are concerned about is Canada. Even if the conditions to which I have referred are the best in the world, still we are not satisfied with them and no parliament or government has any right to be satisfied with them.

Mr. McCANN: All things are relative.

Mr. KNOWLES: Things are relative, but it is relatively hard to live at the standards of living and on the incomes which these people receive.

Mr. McCANN: They are living better than any other people in the world.

Mr. KNOWLES: There we are, right back to the same old argument. I say to the government that their job is not to be satisfied by comparisons with other countries—and I am not sure that there are not some other countries where in some respects they have things a little better than we have.

Mr. McCANN: Where are they?

Mr. KNOWLES: But in other respects we are better off here. However I am not going to enter into that argument.

Mr. McCANN: No, that is the argument that kills yours.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is the argument that will kill your government, and you know it.

Mr. McCANN: It is the argument that kills your argument.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister has been in this official atmosphere for so long that he has forgotten what these things mean to the people back home. I sat here a week ago tonight when the budget was brought down and sensed the general feeling in the house that it was a tough sort of budget but perhaps a necessary one, and I knew the Minister of Finance felt that, after people had thought it over, they would thank him for it. But I happened to be home in Winnipeg over the weekend and I was amazed at the things people said to me whom I met even casually during the two or three days while I was home.

Mr. McCANN: Tell us what they said.

Mr. MacNICOL: It would be unparliamentary language.

Mr. KNOWLES: I found far more disappointment with this budget, even amongst people who are Liberals, if you please, than even I expected.

Mr. McCANN: They will tell you the truth.

Mr. KNOWLES: They did, that is it. They told me the truth. They told me they could not understand—

Mr. McCANN: What is it? We are prepared to hear it.

Mr. KNOWLES: They could not understand the Minister of Finance bringing down a budget with the huge surplus that was announced and doing nothing to improve the position of those in the lower income brackets. If the Minister of Finance wants to know it, I had not planned to speak in this budget debate, believe it or not, until I went home and found so much opposition to it that I felt—

Mr. ABBOTT: You had better capitalize on it.

Mr. McCANN: Tell us what the opposition is other than that it did not meet your demand for a cut in personal income tax.

Mr. KNOWLES: I just told the minister, and he has repeated it. That is the chief opposition of the people of this country to this budget. They say that, with a surplus of over $600 million, the Minister of Finance surely should have found it possible to raise the exemption levels and give some taxation relief to those in the lower income brackets.

Mr. McCANN: Everyone of those people realizes—

Mr. KNOWLES: How about standing up?

Mr. McCANN: I will rise. I am sorry; I did not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCANN: There is not a person in this country who does not realize the obligations that we have because of the war, and frugal, sensible people who understand the economic conditions of this country, are prepared now to pay our share of our vast debts.

Mr. MICHAUD: Hear, hear.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is absolutely right; people are prepared to pay their share, but people to whom I talked, some of whom are in the upper income brackets, did not feel that it is fair to keep on taking so much from the people in the lower income tax brackets.

Mr. McCANN: The only people who are talking that way are the hon. member and other politicians who are doing it for political reasons. On economic grounds it is not sensible.

Mr. KNOWLES: The more the Minister of National Revenue interrupts, the sillier his remarks get, and also the more untrue—particularly that last remark. It is a little too much even for the Minister of National Revenue to make.

I was getting around to the point, before these interruptions became so numerous, to say that in my view it is the responsibility of government to try to do something to improve the lot of the people who need it. I have shown tonight from the government's own figures that there are thousands of our own people whose incomes are away below the average and who need some real help from the economy of this country.

The government can do things in the way of improving our general level of productivity and economic activity. I am leaving that phase of the matter to other of my colleagues who are taking part in the debate, because I want to say a few words about the other responsibility the government can discharge, namely, the improving of plans for social security. I should say it is not just that plans need to be improved; it is the implementation of those plans that is so long overdue.

The other evening the minister announced a surplus of $670 million; but for the old people of this country the only concession that was made was about $5,000,000, to use the minister's own figures, that he proposed to give to people sixty-five years of age and over by means of increasing the exemption level for people of that age. Everyone in this house knows my concern for improving the lot of old people in this country; but I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the place to start, if you are going to give $5,000,000 to Canadians sixty-five years and over, is with those who have the least and hence need help the most. The minister's way of doing it gives the greater part of that to those in those income brackets who have the most. A colleague of mine interrupts to correct me, and rightly so, and says that all of it goes not to those who need it most, but to those who need it least.

Take, for example, persons sixty-five years of age and over who have an income of $6,000 a year. There are a number of them, as hon. members know, in another place in this building. Most of them are over that age, but they have at least that income. Raising the exemptions for people on that level will give them a tax reduction—or an increase in take-home pay—of at least $110 a year. That $500 a year exemption level increase means that the top $500 on which they are paying tax is no longer taxable, and they are up in the bracket where they pay at least 22 per cent. Twenty-two per cent of $500 is $110.

If any of the hon. gentlemen to whom I have referred have other income, and they are in higher brackets still, they get that much more. For example, a member of the other place who had other income that put him up to $20,000 a year, or some business executive, and there are quite a number of them getting $20,000, he is in a bracket where this tax relief will afford him $250. Why give $110 to people who have incomes of $6,000 a year, or $250 to people who have incomes of $20,000 a year, because they are over sixty-five years of age, and give nothing to the old age pensioner who gets only $360 a year, or $420, or $480, depending upon which province he lives in? If you took $5,000,000 and divided it up amongst the old people a fair way to do it would be to divide it amongst Canada's old age pensioners. It would not mean much, but if you divided it amongst all it would come to pretty close to $2 a month. I suggest that this would have been a much better gesture on the part of the government than doing it this way.

Mr. BEAUDOIN: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes.

Mr. BEAUDOIN: Is it true that the Saskatchewan government has cut down the old age pension recently?

Mr. McKAY: No; raised it.

Mr. KNOWLES: The Saskatchewan old age pension is the basic $30 a month that is provided for by federal statute, plus a $5 supplement added by the Saskatchewan provincial government.

Mr. BENTLEY: And they all get it.

Mr. KNOWLES: Alberta pays a supplement; British Columbia pays a supplement, and there is a certain kind of supplement in Ontario.

Mr. SKEY: A $10 supplement.

Mr. KNOWLES: With an additional means test. I am just stating these figures to give the total picture. Do not get me off into that, because it would be quite a long story. I frankly do not like the way in which we have been led into making old age pensions a political football and tossing it back and forth from the federal government to the provinces, or from one province to another. In my view what should have been done is something along the line which was proposed in the government's proposals to the provinces back in 1945.

Mr. BEAUDOIN: As a matter of fact, your government did cut it.

Mrs. STRUM: They never did any such thing.

Mr. KNOWLES: I happen to come from Manitoba; therefore it is not my government. But Saskatchewan at no time reduced the pensions payable to the old age pensioners in the province.

Mr. MARTIN: They withdrew the $5 supplement last fall.

Mr. KNOWLES: The story of the Saskatchewan old age pensions was this: first $20 years ago, then raised to $25 in 1943 when this government did it here, raised to $28 a few years later by the Saskatchewan government itself, then raised to $30 a month about two years ago, and raised to $35 a month a few months ago. At no time has it been reduced.

Mr. MARTIN: Is it not a fact that last fall when the Old Age Pensions Act amendment became effective the $5 supplement payment that Saskatchewan normally paid was withdrawn by the provincial government and restored at the beginning of the present year?

Mr. KNOWLES: The $5 provincial grant that the province gave for about a year before this government came through with it was paid in lieu of the $5 which it was expected this government would provide. When they came through—

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Pretty weak!

Mr. KNOWLES: When it came through they did exactly what Premier Garson did in Manitoba, and nobody in this house had a word to say about that.

Mr. TIMMINS: What was the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) complaining about out in Saskatchewan last October?

Mr. MARTIN: Saskatchewan was the only province to withdraw payment.

Mr. KNOWLES: The Minister of National Health and Welfare knows he is just indulging in the kind of practice that a certain magazine did. He is just carrying on this attempt to set the dominion against the provinces, and one province against another, and the old age pensioners suffer as a result of it.

I want to point out that the government of Saskatchewan has recently added another $5 and made it clear that it is paying what it regards as 25 per cent of a $50 a month pension, and it calls upon this government to give their share of the $50 a month pension.

Back in 1945, and I presume they meant it, the federal government made offers to the provinces, which included the expectation that this government would pay out $217 million for old age pensions in 1948. I know all the arguments about these two provinces down here who will not sit down and talk things over and agree upon something for the good of Canada as a whole, but this government apparently expected to spend $217 million on old age pensions in 1948. In this year's estimates the amount allotted is $65,000,000. I do not call that a good budget. With a surplus of $670 million, the government allow only $65,000,000 for old age pensions in the year 1948, when in 1945 they talked of putting aside $217 million for old age pensions.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just two minutes more, Mr. Speaker.

I was one of those who applauded most enthusiastically—I meant it and still do—when the Prime Minister made the announcement a few days ago in regard to health measures. We welcome a beginning in that field with all the enthusiasm we possess. But I cannot help noticing on the other hand that, whereas in 1945 there were proposals that involved the federal government spending $150 million per annum on health measures, we now have proposals laid before us for only $30,000,000. That kind of budgeting is not good enough for a government whose job it is to exercise some responsibility in respect of the well-being of the Canadian people as a whole. Our people have a right to expect something a great deal better.

There was more that I should like to have said, Mr. Speaker, but I will not trespass upon the time of the house. I thank you for the two minutes extra you have given me.

[Mr. Martin.]

(Translation):

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, my first words will be to congratulate the treasurer, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on the angelic patience he has shown all through this debate.

Mr. MICHAUD: Hear, hear!

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): The treasurer has to listen—

Mr. MICHAUD: To dissatisfied people.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): —over and over again to the same criticisms and requests. After having heard members criticize his failure to reduce the income tax, he will listen in a few days to a possibly greater number of members who, after all their criticisms, will ask him for increases, pensions of all kinds. They will tell him—like I am going to do tonight—that he should provide for public works, the construction of post offices, repairs to piers, et cetera. That is why I think he deserves to be congratulated, although those are the only congratulations I shall address to him tonight, for I believe, like Samuel Johnson, that praise like gold and diamonds owes its value to its scarcity. I ask him to continue, not always to pay attention to minor details but, as he has done, to face the future squarely without any fear of criticism, shaping his course with the knowledge that each of his actions and motions, as well as each of the words he has uttered are in the best interests of the people.

I heard last night the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) tell us in perfect French, for which I congratulate him, that there are fundamental differences between his group and the communist party in so far as their respective ideologies, objects and methods are concerned. As regards the objects and methods, I might admit that often enough the hon. member is right. But in connection with any fundamental difference in ideology, I cannot see how the advocates of socialism, under whatever form, can know so little about it as to believe that they diverge from a theory which they have upheld from the very beginning, that is the Marxist theory. They are opposed to dictatorial methods used by communism, but let us remember that socialism and any form of government control of industries is a totalitarian method and if they do not propose to overthrow governments by force, if they plan to achieve that end through the popular vote, it is certainly not by advocating what can be called real democracy, because after all we must remember that in England, after two or three years in office, the government proposed to nationalize that most noble of all arts, medicine. Fortunately, the United Kingdom medical association stood firmly and the government had to fall back and let the people obtain medical care as it should be given, that is on the basis of devotion and self-sacrifice.

Mr. MICHAUD: Hear, hear!

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I read in the Ottawa Journal today an article which is exactly along my line of thinking. In a certain debate, I referred to the position of Spain with respect to the united nations and especially the United States and the British commonwealth. As we are trading with Spain, I think I will be allowed to say a word about this article and even add to it. The Ottawa Journal said—and I am giving a hasty translation—that during the civil war in Spain, men who hold eminent positions in the communist party today were then acquiring their basic experience trying out, as de La Fontaine puts it in one of his fables, their first set of teeth. There we find Georgi Dimitrov who drew up plans for the international brigades in Spain and is now the Red dictator of Bulgaria. Tito was then known under the name of Joseph Brozovitch. He was in the forefront with Dimitrov and he is today the dictator of Yugoslavia. Klement Gottwald was a political commissar in Spain and today he is the strong man in Czechoslovakia. André Marty who was in active charge of the Dimitrov plan, is today a communist leader in France. I would say that he is the chief communist agent in France because he held a key position in the leadership of the communist party in that country. I am adding this to the article because the latter does not state that André Marty, his ancestor, was the communist leader in 1871, when Napoleon III fell. Luigi Longo, notwithstanding some newspaper items, holds in Italy a position exactly similar to that of André Marty in France. Longo presides over the military and political organization of the communist party in Italy. Mention is mostly made of Togliatti, but the real leader is Luigi Longo. These two men were making a first test of strength with Doctor Negrin the then president of the so-called democratic government of Spain. Therefore, those were the men who ran everything their own way in Spain and who were defeated by Franco.

Spain is accused today of being ruled by a fascist government and of still putting up with such a regime. At the same time, I am sorry to say, the united nations do not hold it against Russia to be party to two treaties, the first with the united nations, the second in relation to the three powers agreement of Japan, Germany and Italy. It is this secret document which was made public by the state department of the United States and which truly existed though its existence was denied, as it was bound to be, by Soviet Russia. In the case of Spain, with which we have commercial dealings, it is a crime, but no such crime attaches to Russia for having had double dealings with the countries of the world.

As I cannot speak indefinitely on Spain without being called to order—I thank Your Honour for your indulgence—I shall only put on record this question asked by the honourable member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion): What are the figures relative to our trade with Spain from 1936 to 1947?

We find that in 1936, our imports from Spain totalled $1,129,315 while our exports amounted only to $469,160, more briefly, in 1947, we bought $3,003,000 worth of goods from Spain but sent her commodities valued only at $940,594. To borrow a well-known saying from one of the high officials of the Department of External Affairs, this means that if the word "consul" is as old as trade, we should appoint a consul to Spain since we have been trading with that country for quite some time.

I understand that Mr. Glass who is in Lisbon with Mr. Morin is doing very creditable work, but, even if Franco is still leader of the Spanish government, we ought to appoint a consul who would supervise Canadian business in that part of the Iberian peninsula.

I said that my words of praise for the treasurer would be brief but I added that, like other honourable members, I would make various requests. I take the liberty of putting two on record. Since 1939 I have been pleading for the building of a post office at Donnacona, one of the most prosperous new towns of the whole province of Quebec.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Under direction from the late and regretted Mr. Cardin, Minister of Public Works at the time, I had succeeded in having the Department of Public Works purchase a piece of land in Donnacona and prepare plans, and in having a credit approved in the 1939 estimates. Unfortunately, the war came and it shattered all hopes of these people to whom I owe much and who have a right to expect a great deal from the federal government as well as from the provincial government.

I renew this request because, since 1939, the population has increased by 1,200 which is sufficient indication that the building used for this service is entirely inadequate. The people are justifiably complaining. Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to quote the following resolution passed by the municipal council of Donnacona, which was communicated to me and of which I sent a copy to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) some time ago:

January 5, 1948.

Whereas the town of Donnacona is the seat of the county of Portneuf, province of Quebec, and is at the same time a very important industrial centre;

Whereas all the citizens of Donnacona recognize the untiring work done by Mr. Arthur Delisle, postmaster;

Whereas the premises now occupied by the post office are too small and no longer suited to the needs of an important town like Donnacona;

Whereas the whole population of Donnacona earnestly demands the building of a post office by the dominion government;

Whereas the dominion government has already purchased in Donnacona a site for the building of a post office;

Whereas the dominion government has already recognized the necessity of a post office at Donnacona;

Whereas Donnacona requested the building of a post office six years ago;

Whereas the said post office is now urgently needed;

It is moved by Alderman Isidore Doré, seconded by Alderman Elisée Veillette and unanimously carried that the dominion government, through the Post Office Department, be entreated to accede to the request submitted by the citizens of Donnacona regarding the erection of a post office to meet the needs of the people.

I have been urged by the citizens of Donnacona to renew the request I made some time ago to the Minister of Finance. I hope that his supplementary estimates will include an appropriation of at least $35,000, because the plans drafted in 1939 are now inadequate and will have to be revised to cope with the mail traffic at Donnacona. I said, a while ago, that the people of Donnacona deserve it. They give the finest example in the whole country of the co-operation that should exist between labour and industry. In that district, where strikes are unknown, grievances are settled through discussion, thanks to the perfect agreement that exists between industrialists as well as civil and religious authorities. If this example were followed all over the country in every district and community, there would be no cause to grieve over long work stoppages that entail heavy financial losses to industry and labour, but more especially to the workers' families.

[Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf).]

I now come to my second request. I shall state it more briefly because the plans are not yet complete. I have in mind the building of a wharf on the St. Lawrence just opposite the picturesque parish of Cap Santé, perhaps one of the most attractive tourist haunts in the constituency of Portneuf, along with Deschambault and Neuville.

I wrote to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) stating my reasons for requesting the building of a wharf. I do not need to restate them in the house. I trust however the Minister of Finance will as usual have the patience of an angel and kindly listen to the claims of the member for Portneuf. They are few but he has them at heart. They are submitted with the best intentions. A friend of mine, the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret) has reminded me of a request I had forgotten. I thank him for it. On behalf of all the farmers in my constituency and throughout the province, I ask the Minister of Finance to consider the case of those farmers compelled, as you know, to pay income tax.

I would ask the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) if they could not find one way of reducing the income tax in the case of farmers. Let me explain why I make that request. The farmer employs on his land one, two or even three of his sons to whom, quite often, he pays no salary. I would ask the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue if it would not be possible to deduct from the farmer's taxable income a certain amount in lieu of such salaries in order to allow him, and especially his sons, to work with greater heart, to make the land more fruitful, and so to enable them to develop and enrich the heritage which was entrusted to them. They will be able in this way to keep more money at home, if possible, which will benefit the family and the young people.

I know that it is often stated that the federal government pays for family allowances. Had I only had the time I would have put on record the moneys which it provides in grants and subsidies of all sorts to the farmers of Quebec alone. Unfortunately, eleven o'clock is coming on and I see that my time is almost up. I have no intention of uselessly lengthening this debate.

I would therefore ask that special consideration be given to those farmers who employ their sons on their land, from, shall we say, sixteen to eighteen or nineteen, in order to help develop the national family heritage, and in order also to encourage those farmers' sons to stay on the land, to help, for several years, their parents, their younger brothers and sisters, so that greater sunshine may yet flood this good Canadian earth to which the farmer is so attached and for which he has given so freely of his sweat and oftentimes, of his blood.

Mr. Speaker, I often regret that our hon. friends opposite do not read the history of this country more often when I hear them comparing our standard of living and that of other countries.

If they understood the wholeheartedness, courage, physical energy and strength with which our fathers devoted themselves to moulding Canada into the land we know, they would realize that this is a land of sacrifice if ever there was one. Even if they have slight grievances and feel that the people are not entirely satisfied, they should not dare to draw comparisons that always sound feeble, especially when the Canadian standard of living is set beside that of other countries.

It is good to be living in Canada, as those who have been elsewhere very well know. One need only look around to ascertain that I speak the truth when I say that Canada can be favourably compared with any other country in the world.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that I am short of time; however, I wish to congratulate again the hon. the treasurer on his patience. I beseech him to disregard all critics; let him think and act as a true Canadian, always bent on making Canada the happiest country in the world.

Mr. MICHAUD: Hear, hear!

(Text):

On motion of Mr. Ilsley the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the acting leader of the government what the business will be tomorrow?

Mr. ABBOTT: We shall continue with the budget debate.

Mr. GRAYDON: If the budget debate should be concluded tomorrow what will be taken up?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think we shall go into supply. I believe that is the understanding.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, May 26, 1948

The house met at three o'clock.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

DEBATES—FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata) presented the first report of the standing committee on debates, as follows:

Your committee has given careful consideration to its order of reference under date of May 10, 1948, which reads as follows:

"That the advisability of continuing the publication of the revised edition of debates and the distribution of the unrevised edition of same, be referred to the said committee."

Your committee has heard Mr. Edmond Cloutier, King's Printer and Controller of Stationery, and Mr. Earl C. Young, Editor of Debates and Chief of Reporting Branch, House of Commons, and Mr. Yves Fortin, Production Supervisor of the Printing Bureau.

Your committee recommends:

1. That the designations "unrevised" and "revised" editions be discontinued, and the day to day edition be known as the daily edition and the bound volume as the bound edition.

2. That members be allowed eight calendar days, from the date on which the speech is made, to submit to the debates office necessary and permissible corrections in their speeches as reported in the daily edition, and that no corrections submitted after this period be accepted.

3. That the pages of each daily edition be submitted to the printing bureau not later than nine days after the daily edition is published, and that once proofs of the corrected pages have been approved by the debates office they be assembled by the printing bureau for the bound edition.

4. That the pages of the daily edition be kept intact so that, after permissible corrections are made, the pages of the daily edition can be used for the bound edition as originally printed, and that changes suggested by members be confined strictly to correction of errors and essential minor alterations.

5. That effect be given forthwith to the recommendation contained in paragraph 4 above, for the present session and succeeding sessions.

6. That no order for reprints of a member's speech be received by the debates office after the expiration of seven days from the date of the daily edition in which it appeared.

7. That the distribution list of complimentary copies of debates allotted to members be hereinafter forwarded by the joint parliamentary distribution branch to the printing bureau for distribution.

Your committee further recommends that the government consider the advisability of increasing the number of complimentary copies of the daily edition of debates to members from 10 to 16.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Jean François Pouliot,
Chairman

[Later:]

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house I move, seconded by Mr. McIvor, that the first report of the standing committee on debates, presented this day, be now concurred in.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to ask the hon. member who has moved concurrence in this report how long it will be, under this new arrangement, before the bound Hansard will be available to members and the public.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to reply, the first bound volume will appear approximately one month after the time expires which is allowed for any necessary corrections—that is, something over a month after the opening of the session. Each month thereafter we shall have one bound volume of Hansard, representing about one month's sittings.

Mr. FLEMING: Mr. Speaker, many of us in this part of the house could not hear the report which the hon. member for Temiscouata has just read. I would ask that opportunity be given to members to scrutinize the report, and that to that end the motion for concurrence be deferred. If we are called upon to vote now, we shall be voting upon something we really know nothing about.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. FLEMING: Mr. Speaker, it is only proper that the motion should stand over until the members know what they are voting on.

Mr. POULIOT: I will leave it as a notice of motion for Friday.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Pouliot the debate was adjourned.

PRICES—CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved:

That the name of Mr. Zaplitny be substituted for that of Mr. Irvine on the special committee on prices.

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS—SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Second report of standing committee on industrial relations.—Mr. Cote (Verdun).

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to table the annual report of the federal district commission for the calendar year 1947.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table the annual report of the national harbours board for the calendar year 1947. The French edition has been delayed in the printing, but will be available shortly.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

BANK OF CANADA—NEW CAPITAL INVESTMENT

Mr. MENARY:

Have steps been taken by the Bank of Canada to curtail the volume of new capital investment in Canada, and if so, what were they?

Mr. BELZILE: Under existing conditions the volume of new capital investment in Canada is limited primarily by the available physical supply of labour, building materials and equipment rather than by monetary or financial policies. It is understood however that the Bank of Canada has expressed the view to the chartered banks that under today's conditions, when the rate of capital development is straining Canada's manpower and material resources, it is undesirable that funds required for the financing of capital expenditures should be obtained through an expansion of bank credit. The budget speech dealt in a general way with the economic and financial aspects of this question.

NAILS

Mr. COYLE:

1. How many pounds of nails were imported from the United States during each month in 1947-1948?
2. What is the approximate selling price per pound in Canada?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Imports of nails from the United States:

Month	1947 Lbs.	1948 Lbs.
January	920,800	424,500
February	215,500	510,700
March	496,100	400,500
April	680,800
May	805,200
June	648,400
July	848,000
August	1,286,200
September	768,400
October	989,900
November	569,800
December	670,200

2. Not known. Price would vary according to dealer or locality. There is no ceiling on nail prices.

EXPRESS RATES

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH:

1. Has the board of transport commissioners control over express rates as well as freight rates?
2. Have express rates recently been raised?
3. If so (a) how much; (b) upon what authority?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. Yes.
2. Yes (competitive tariffs only).
3. (a) 21 per cent; (b) section 332, Railway Act.

FARMBOROUGH, QUE., POST OFFICE

Mr. CAOUETTE:

1. Is there a post office at Farmborough, Quebec?
2. If so, what is the name of the postmaster?
3. If not, for what reason was this post office closed?
4. Will the said office be reopened in the near future?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

1. Not at present; temporarily closed 3rd October, 1947.
2. See answer to No. 1.
3. The postmaster, Louis St. Germain, resigned on 26th September, asking that his resignation be effective immediately, and no one could be found to take over the office.
4. Yes, provided a suitable person can be found to take over the post office.

POSTAL SERVICE—CARRYING OF MAILS BY AIR

Mr. GAGNON:

1. Has the Postmaster General or any officer of the Post Office Department entered into negotiations with the Canadian Pacific Air Lines for the carrying by that company, on the same terms as Trans-Canada Air Lines, of letter mail, whether prepaid at air mail rates or not, as specified in the statement made by the Postmaster General on May 20?

2. If so, what was the result of such negotiations?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

1. Yes.

2. Negotiations continuing.

NEWSPRINT

Mr. DORION:

1. What was the newsprint production during 1947, in each province?

2. What was the newsprint consumption in Canada during the same year?

3. To what countries has newsprint been exported, and what quantity to each country?

4. What conditions are imposed for a permit to export newsprint?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Estimated total Canadian production 4,446,789 tons. Provincial figures not yet available.

2. Estimated Canadian consumption 273,485 tons.

3. Exports from Canada, by countries:

WIARTON, ONT., EMERGENCY AIRPORT

Mr. CASE:

1. What is the total amount of expenditures to date on the emergency airport near Wiarton, Keppel township, Grey county?

2. Is the work on this airport now complete? If not, what are the anticipated expenditures to complete same?

3. Was the work on the Wiarton airport let by contract, and if so, what was the amount?

4. If not by contract, on what basis was the work undertaken?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. $676,658.83.

2. (a) No; (b) $45,000.

3. Total amount of contracts, $534,369.50.

4. Not applicable.

HOSPITALS—TUBERCULOSIS

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. How many hospital beds were there per thousand persons in Canada, by provinces, in (a) 1931; (b) 1941; (c) 1947?

2. What was the death rate per 100,000 population from tuberculosis in each province in the last year for which statistics are available?

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE—CROP INSPECTORS

Mr. ARGUE:

1. (a) How many crop inspectors were employed under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in each crop year since 1939; (b) what was the total amount of salaries, wages and expenses paid to these inspectors in each of the above years?

2. In how many townships were payments made in each of these years?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

MOTION FOR PAPERS

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION—SASKATCHEWAN—DAMS AND IRRIGATION WORKS

Mr. ARGUE:

For a copy of all plans and blueprints prepared by officials of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, from January 1, 1947, to date, pertaining to location, costs, size and type of structure of dams and irrigation works on the South Saskatchewan river.

Mr. GARDINER: I think that all of the blueprints and reports of the engineers have already been tabled in the engineer's report. If there are any others, they will be tabled.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried, subject to the reservation made by the minister.

URANIUM

DISCOVERY IN HALIBURTON COUNTY, ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. HODGSON (Victoria, Ont.): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources, or to the government generally. Is the government aware that the largest body of uranium ore on the North American continent has been found, and proven by diamond drilling, in Haliburton county within about seventy miles of the Chalk river plant?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STATEMENT AS TO LEGISLATION TO BE INTRODUCED DURING THE PRESENT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On Monday my hon. friend the acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) asked if I would give the house a statement of the legislation that is still to be brought down before the conclusion of the session. I need not make mention of measures that already appear on the order paper. They should however be kept in mind in reviewing the legislation that remains to be dealt with.

In the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday hon. members will see a notice of a resolution for the approval of the international wheat agreement. That resolution will appear on tomorrow's order paper. The following measures, as hon. members are aware, are being considered by committees of the house: an act to provide for the investigation, conciliation and settlement of industrial disputes; an act to amend the Loan Companies Act; an act to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1938; an act to amend the War Veterans' Allowance Act, 1946; an act to amend the Veterans' Insurance Act; an act to amend the Veterans' Rehabilitation Act. An act to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act, and an act to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act are before a committee of the Senate. There will of course be the bills which arise out of the budget resolutions, and which include the following: a bill to amend the Income War Tax Act; a bill to amend the Dominion Succession Duty Act; a bill to amend the Excise Tax Act; a bill to amend the Excise Act; a bill to amend the customs tariff.

Other measures to be introduced will include: a bill respecting Canadian National Railways financing and guarantee; re-introduction of the Income Tax Act; a bill to amend the Criminal Code; a bill to amend the Judges Act; a bill to amend the Lord's Day Act; a bill to amend the Government Annuities Act; a resolution and bill to amend the Yukon Act; a resolution and bill respecting the Northwest Territories commission; a bill to amend the Land Titles Act; a bill to amend the Manitoba Natural Resources Act; a bill to amend the Saskatchewan Natural Resources Act; a resolution and bill to amend the Diplomatic Service (Special) Superannuation Act; a bill to amend the Board of Transport Commissioners Act; bills respecting a tax convention between Canada and France and Canada and New Zealand; a bill to amend the National Battlefield Commission Act.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): All by June 30.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think hon. members will find that most of these last-mentioned measures are relatively simple and non-controversial and may not occasion much in the way of discussion. I am not saying that the resolutions on the budget may not occasion debate. There are still a few more I should mention. These are possible measures. I do not say that they will be proceeded with, but perhaps it is just as well to take notice of them at once. Measures which may be introduced in the senate are: a bill to amend the Insurance Companies Act; a bill respecting the Quebec Savings Bank Act; a bill to amend the Bankruptcy Act.

Additional measures which may be introduced in this house are: a bill to amend the Exchequer Court Act; a bill to amend the Petition of Right Act; a bill to amend the Supreme Court Act; a bill to amend the Tariff Board Act; a bill to amend the Criminal Code (race meetings). I hope to introduce, and trust the house will receive its provisions favourably, a bill respecting the development of the national capital.

In addition to these measures there will be such legislation as may arise from reports of standing and select committees, in addition to specific bills which have already been referred to them and further supplementary estimates. As always it is necessary to see things from as many sides as possible in advance. I should add that from time to time, measures may come forward, or may have to be brought forward, which are not thought of at the moment. I have not in mind any other measures being introduced. I do not wish to say that something may not arise between now and June 30 which may necessitate some further measure or measures being introduced.

As hon. members have just remarked, there are still but five weeks in which to complete this program, if that is to be done by the end of June. I hope that we may be able, among the parties themselves, so to organize business as to ensure the attainment of that end.

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Arising out of the Prime Minister's statement, may I ask the Minister of National Defence whether the legislation which is forecast in the speech from the throne for the amalgamation of the army, navy and air force acts of Canada has been drafted?

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): Yes, the legislation is ready, but, as the hon. member knows, it would amount to the amalgamation of some sixteen acts, which would run to over 300 sections, and it is felt that it would not be possible to dispose of it at this stage of the session without unduly prolonging the session. We can, we believe, get along under the existing legislation until next session.

WHEAT BOARD

QUESTION AS TO REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT TO AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce or, in his absence, to his parliamentary assistant. When may we expect the annual report of the wheat board to be placed before the agriculture committee?

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of the question and bring forward an answer.

WARTIME HOUSING

REPORT AS TO REMOVAL OF TRELLISES FROM HOUSES IN WRIGHTVILLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, arising out of a report appearing in last night's Ottawa Journal. Perhaps the parliamentary assistant will answer or take note of it. Will the government take steps to stop the removal of trellises, which is taking place at the present time, from houses built by Wartime Housing Limited in Wrightville?

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I saw the story in the paper, but I do not know whether the trellises of wartime houses are being removed. I shall look into the matter and see what can be done.

SIR STAFFORD CRIPPS

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE VISIT TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. TIMMINS (Parkdale): According to a report in the press last night, Sir Stafford Cripps is coming to Canada to confer with us respecting economic matters affecting Canada and the United Kingdom. I wonder whether the minister can tell us anything about it.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): So far as I am aware, Sir Stafford Cripps is not coming to Canada in the immediate future. He may be doing so later on.

ISRAEL

QUESTION AS TO RECOGNITION BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. ARGUE (Wood Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the widespread sympathy in Canada for the new state of Israel, is the minister in a position to tell the house whether or not the government will grant it recognition?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The matter is still under consideration, and as soon as a decision is arrived at I will, as promised some days ago, communicate it to the house.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

FREIGHT RATES

APPLICATION OF INCREASES TO HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): May I ask the Minister of Transport whether the freight increases granted by the board of transport commissioners, in respect of all commodities to which it applies, will apply on the Hudson Bay railway?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): I went into that question fully when my estimates were being discussed, in answer to a question raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon City, and if the hon. gentleman will look at Hansard he will find a complete statement there.

Mr. BENTLEY: I did, but it was not as complete as it should be.

S.S. "ABEGWEIT"

INQUIRY AS TO STRUCTURAL CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): Mr. Speaker, on May 12 I asked the Minister of Transport, as will be seen at page 3860 of Hansard, about structural changes in S.S. Abegweit. May I ask when I can have a reply.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): The structural changes to which my hon. friend refers have to do, I presume, with the planking of the space between the two rails on the Abegweit. That is a matter which is still under consideration, and I am not able to give my hon. friend a reply at this time.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 25, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, during the last few months there have been a number of attacks in the house on action taken by the government in July 1946 in revaluing the Canadian dollar; and indeed certain policies proposed by members of the opposition would reverse the step taken at that time, the main policy being a devaluation of the Canadian dollar to ninety cents. I feel I should make some reply to these attacks, and that is the main purpose of my intervention in this debate. However, I should like at the outset, before I come to that subject, to express a few views on the budget itself and to make some reference to certain statements that have been made by members of the various opposition parties about the budget, notably the statements made by the financial critic of the official opposition (Mr. Macdonnell) who spoke on Friday last.

The budget is in my judgment a sound and good budget. It is the kind of budget that does not provoke an immediately favourable reaction, but the kind of budget to which the reaction becomes progressively more favourable as the weeks and months go by and people realize the soundness of the principles upon which it is based.

Naturally the tax reductions have been welcomed, as tax reductions always are. They were wisely selected and will be beneficial. I have made a list of the ones I consider most important. Perhaps the most important was the removal of the tax on certain foods. The leader of the C.C.F. opposition (Mr. Coldwell), in commenting on that tax change, made this statement:

> True the minister has removed the tax from certain food items, and this may or may not be reflected in the family budget because we have no controls, but he should be severely criticized for not removing it from other commodities, particularly from clothing and construction materials needed in the building of houses. Here is one place where effective measures could be taken immediately to remove the high cost of construction. In New Zealand the sales tax was removed on building materials in September, 1946, and it was estimated that this action would result in the saving of £150 on the average size house costing £1,500, or a saving of ten per cent.

As I listened to the hon. gentleman, I was very much surprised, so much so that I wondered whether I was losing, not my judgment but my memory—because I thought I remembered; and I have since confirmed my recollection, that immediately after V-E day, which was on May 8, 1945, this government removed the sales tax on building materials. The order in council was passed on May 10, 1945, effective on May 14, 1945, removing the sales tax on all building materials. It crossed my mind that if hon. members in the C.C.F. opposition would familiarize themselves with events in Canada to the extent that they familiarize themselves with what takes place in New Zealand, they would not have forgotten an event which took place in this country nearly a year and a half before similar action was taken in New Zealand.

Another important change in the taxes was the removal of the duties on cotton and rayon piece goods coming from Great Britain, up to June 30, 1949. It is an important and dramatic change in policy on the part of the government, but one which, so far as I know, has not been adversely criticized, and will be extremely beneficial from several points of view—first, it is expected, in providing price relief, and particularly in increasing our imports from the United Kingdom and redressing the unsatisfactory trade balance situation which exists as between Great Britain and Canada.

The third tax change to which I should like to refer is the removal of the excise tax from certain articles not properly classed with jewelry items, which is an important reduction.

The fourth is the additional income tax exemption to those over sixty-five, which has I think met with general approbation.

The fifth is the change in the succession duty exemptions, by which estates of under $50,000 in value are to be exempt from dominion succession duties. I must say it was a great surprise to me that that removal would affect nine out of ten of the estates and would entail a loss to the treasury of only $5,000,000. If these are the facts, and we are assured by the Minister of Finance that they are the facts, that was a wise and proper move to make.

After these tax concessions to which I have referred, the Minister of Finance is budgeting for a surplus of just under $500 million, and there are many who worry about the size of our surpluses. I must say that in this debate no clear-cut position has been taken by the opposition with regard to surplus budgeting. The financial critic of the official opposition merely said he believed that in times like these we should have a surplus, but this was too big a one. Other members on the opposition benches have taken that position. A severe position to take would be that which the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) almost took the other night, namely, that we should calculate exactly each year what the expenditures will be, and not take, as he says, any more money out of the pockets of the people than enough to make those expenditures—on the ground that anything else is plunder or robbery, to use those remarkable phrases which he is so fond of using in this house. He went on to say in another part of his speech—which could be made useful, I suppose, in a different environment—that it was all right to have a surplus, but that the surpluses we are budgeting for are too large.

Mr. FLEMING: Hear, hear.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes—"hear, hear." I think that the mentality of the members of the opposition generally is all wrong in this matter of surpluses. In the United States of America there is a tradition with regard to surpluses which is different from ours. The belief there is that it is the duty of the government, not only in especially good times but in normal times, to effect a reduction of the national debt as rapidly as possible. From what I read in the weekly and monthly publications of the United States, I understand that pressure is put on the leaders by the membership of the house of representatives to make sure that all outgoings—not only current outgoings but loans and so on—are met out of operating revenues, and also that provision is made for progressive and rapid reduction in the national debt. That is done on a sound instinct; it is done on the instinct that guides prudent and successful people in their ordinary business enterprises.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. ILSLEY: I would ask my hon. friend just to wait; I shall have a hard enough time, probably, before I get through.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): We are with you on that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not want to have too many interruptions. But that is the tradition in the United States of America. I think we should attach more importance to that here. If we could have substantial surpluses over the next few years and reduce the national debt, it would make a great difference. Suppose we were able to reduce the debt by two and a half billion dollars. That would result in an interest saving of just under $70,000,000 a year, which would make it far easier for governments to meet the legitimate needs of the people. It is a crippling thing, and a defeatist attitude, to think that you must go on piling debts higher and higher on the ground that taxation of the people is plunder. The money, it must be understood, is not taken and divided among the cabinet ministers. The money is taken and applied to the reduction of the debt owed by the people of the country. From the standpoint of the man in the street, the ordinary people of the country, I think the policy of debt reduction, certainly in times like these, is a right policy.

The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews), who is a shrewd and experienced member of this house, the other night said this, as reported at page 4324 of Hansard:

> I have no hesitation in saying that the minister has a sound idea in reducing our indebtedness each year to the largest possible degree now, when times are good. You may call it cyclical budgeting, if you wish, but I call it plain common sense.

[Mr. Fleming.]

And plain common sense it is. Of course there is another important reason why extensive reductions in taxation should not take place at the present time.

Mr. JACKMAN: What about the individual? Surely the same reasoning applies.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: Why do you not do something?

Mr. ILSLEY: Let me quote from the budget speech as reported at page 4063 of Hansard:

> What we do will affect the fortunes of our citizens and their cost of living. If we diverted our prospective surplus into a reduction of taxes now, it would add hundreds of millions of dollars a year to the already intense demands of Canadians for goods and services—but it would add nothing to the volume of Canadian goods and services available for sale. People would try to buy more, but there would not be more to buy, unless the effort to get it resulted in more imports that we cannot afford and which we would have to shut out somehow or other. Prices would be sure to rise. Some people would profit, but others would lose out to the higher cost of living. The apparent benefits of tax reduction would prove to be a mirage except to those strong or fortunate groups which can profit more than they suffer by higher prices.

And later on:

> Now is the time to lay the foundation for employment budgets in future, while fighting inflation at present.

I would commend that sentence to the judgment and consideration of the members of this house.

There is another consideration that I think ought to be placed before the house. Our income tax level now, on the average, is lower than that of the United States of America. The United States of America is taking dramatic steps for assistance in European recovery. If we in this country had a stock of United States exchange, I presume that we would be doing what we have done consistently in the past—that is, we would doubtless be assisting by the extension of credits for European recovery, because we have such a heavy stake in European recovery. But we cannot do that, or we cannot do it to any appreciable extent, because of our exchange position. On the other hand, we shall be supplying goods. Undoubtedly there will be large offshore purchases, as they are called, from Canada under the European recovery plan being administered by the United States of America. But it would be undesirable, I feel sure, having in mind public opinion in the United States, to have a situation arise such as this: that the people of the United States should be keeping their taxes up to the high levels they have now attained, and that Canada, not contributing toward European recovery by way of credits, should seize the opportunity to push her taxes down and cash in on the situation in such a way that we would inevitably be severely criticized and penalized by others.

I come now to the main part of the speech that I rose to make. I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) on Friday evening. He said two or three things in his speech that I want to use more or less as a text. They are good principles. He said that what we needed—I am not quoting him verbatim, but just giving the effect of his words—in considering these matters is realism, clear thinking, and intellectual honesty. I want to apply those tests to some of the criticisms that have been made of the government's financial policy, and to some of the positions that have been taken by the opposition.

To begin with, I submit that if the hon. gentleman had applied those tests to one instance he gave, he would not have given it. On Friday afternoon he told the house that the taxation on the average Canadian family of five was something over $1,300, and he arrived at that figure by taking the per capita taxation in Canada and multiplying it by five. That is one place where the multiplication table just does not apply. A family of five usually includes two or three young children; and to take the average per capita taxation, all the money raised from the rich and the poor, from corporations and from individuals, and get a per capita amount and then say the average family of five is paying five times as much as the average individual in Canada, is a gross fallacy and should not have been used by an hon. member ordinarily as careful as the financial critic of the opposition.

The budget speech strikes me as having those qualities outlined by the hon. gentleman—of realism, clearness of thought, intellectual honesty and recognition of the facts; and I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) not only on recognizing those facts but on his devotion to duty in acting accordingly. He knew he would run into a barrage of unreasonable, demagogic opposition criticism, but he did what he knew he ought to do. He defended his decision in a budget speech of unanswerable logic. His course of action will be approved by large numbers of Canadians today, but, more important still, it will be approved by all Canadians in the years to come.

As I said at the outset, the statement has been made that our action in restoring the Canadian dollar to par in terms of United States dollars on July 5, 1946, was the sole cause, or at least the chief cause, of our loss of United States dollars in 1947, and was thus indirectly the reason for the restrictions introduced last fall. Some of those who take that position work themselves up to a high pitch of assurance indeed. For instance, the other evening the hon. member for Eglinton said:

> We have had a sample of it in this country since the great blunder—
> Everything is either "plunder" or "blunder".
> —the great blunder in the middle of 1946 and the constant flight of United States dollars from Canada ever since, a flight and a policy which almost brought this country to economic ruin in 1947.

Well, the responsible critics do not go that far, but some of them do say this was one of the greatest mistakes in our financial history. I should like to reply to this charge, because I regard it as entirely unfounded.

Let us recall the situation. The revaluation of our dollar was part of our policy of price control. On July 5, 1946, I recommended that four steps be taken: first, that the price ceiling be changed from a general to a specific basis; second, that subsidies be continued where needed to continue price control; third, that price ceilings on imports be set not on a fixed price but on an imported cost plus a limited mark-up basis; and fourth, that the Canadian dollar be raised to par with the United States dollar.

Four days earlier, on July 1, 1946, price control in the United States had lapsed or collapsed; it had ended, and the step here in Canada was taken having in mind that fact among others. We took the step we did for several reasons. First, we knew that sooner or later there would be an inevitable adjustment of our prices to United States prices. We could not see any reason why, by keeping our dollar ten per cent below the United States dollar, we should inflict upon our people permanently a cost level and price level ten per cent higher than that of the United States. In the second place, we were making heavy loans to Great Britain, and the revaluation of our dollar would encourage imports from Great Britain and reduce the necessity of credits. Third, our whole policy of price control was gradual decontrol, not sudden decontrol as in the United States; and if price control was to be retained and eased off by stages, as was done subsequently and I am sure wisely done, a step of this kind would be of great assistance.

Few policies of a Canadian government ever received such general acceptance. The opposition took no exception to that policy. There was some suggestion that we should have done it in two stages instead of one; that is, five per cent then and later another five per cent, but we replied to those criticisms at the time. The opposition took no exception to bringing our dollar back to par. To listen to them here one would think they had opposed the step. They did nothing of the kind, nor did the public at large. One has only to look at the newspaper headlines of the day to see the widespread approval that was given. It was not until much later that any volume of criticism developed. This was based on hindsight, not on foresight; but as I shall now show, it is not valid criticism even now. The hindsight on which it is based makes a false appraisal of causes and effects.

The first statement made is that the step we took unduly encouraged imports from the United States and discouraged exports to that country. First I shall deal with the imports. There is no doubt that there has been a large increase in the volume of imports from the United States, though apparently the peak has been passed. The financial critic of the opposition stopped at February; he did not go on to March, and of course he had not the figures for April. When we recall that this increase in the volume of imports from the United States has taken place in the face of a forty per cent increase in United States prices, surely it is unreasonable to think another ten per cent would have made any difference, or certainly much of a difference. One of the main reasons why Canadian importers were bringing in so much from the United States was that prices were going up in the United States, and they thought the time to buy was before prices went up further. But there were other reasons. Half our two billion dollars' worth of imports from the United States are essentials we have to import, regardless of the exchange rate. Imports of such commodities as coal, steel, cotton and manufacturing components come in anyway—when production is at a high level in Canada. The volume of these imports rises when our production rises and falls when our production falls, regardless of the exchange rate. The cost of such imports is only a part, and often a small part, of the cost of production or the cost of capital expansion; and a mere ten per cent on the price of such imports would have no effect whatever on their volume.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

It has been estimated that not more than twenty-five per cent of Canada's imports from the United States are consumer goods. Here the volume of imports would be more sensitive to price; but even in this field the purchasing power of the Canadian consumer has been so great during this period that in all probability the revaluation of the dollar has had no appreciable effect on volume. But while the volume of imports from the United States was affected, if at all, only to a negligible extent by the revaluation, the importation from overseas was much more sensitive. Prices of European goods were very high by Canadian standards, and many of them were consumer goods that could hardly be classed as essentials. The demand for these goods is very responsive to price changes. Whatever was the proper policy with reference to imports from the United States, there can be no doubt about one thing: we want to encourage importations from overseas countries, and the revaluation of the dollar worked in that direction.

Some irresponsible statements have been made about the extent to which the imports were increased by the revaluation. I am glad however to note that the financial critic of the opposition has ceased emphasizing this feature of the revaluation—he did in his speech last Friday at any rate—and seems to be concentrating entirely upon its effect on the import of capital, about which I shall speak in a few moments.

I come now to our exports. So far as I can ascertain, the revaluation has had no effect in diminishing our exports. One can imagine conditions when depreciation of our dollar would encourage exports by giving us a better competitive position in foreign markets. But in conditions of today, with our costs of production such as they are and our exchange rate at its present level, our exporters are able to sell on a competitive basis in any of the markets of the world. So here the argument against revaluation falls down completely.

Even in the tourist industry, which is economically a species of export, there is no evidence at all that the revaluation has diminished the flow of tourists to this country or that a devaluation would increase it. The cost of vacations in Canada is, in all probability, lower than the cost of vacations in the United States; tourists from the United States obtain many of their dollars from the unofficial market anyway; they are quite free to obtain Canadian funds from the unofficial market, and there is nothing in the figures to indicate that the revaluation effected any slowing down of tourist movements into this country.

The only export industry upon which the revaluation admittedly had some effect was the gold mining industry. It was recognized from the start that this industry, by its very nature an anticyclical industry, would be adversely affected to some extent, and compensatory measures have accordingly been adopted. A careful, well-reasoned estimate made by a writer in Toronto Saturday Night placed the probable increase in exports of gold to the United States under a ninety-cent Canadian dollar over the exports of gold under a hundred-cent Canadian dollar at not more than $15,000,000 a year. But there were other export industries which used the revaluation as the occasion for increasing their prices. This is the reason I said there was no ascertainable net effect in diminishing or discouraging exports from Canada to the United States or to other hard currency countries.

I understand that Premier Drew placed the figure I have just given as $15,000,000 at $100 million a year, but without any facts whatever to support his figure, which, in my judgment, is a completely wild one. Taking the imports and exports together, therefore, everything indicates that the revaluation had nothing but a negligible effect on our balance of payments with the United States on current operations—that is, when we consider exports and imports together, the whole situation.

Now, let us look at the effect it had on capital movements. It is on this point that the financial critic of the opposition speaks with immense assurance. This is what he said in his speech last Friday at pages 4244 and 4245:

> The second result was the measure taken then to cut off American investment, practically like turning a tap. It has been a natural and, I submit, inevitable and useful part of the economic structure of the country from the outset that we should have American investment, and free American investment . . . That was cut off . . . It does seem an irony. In the first six months of 1946 nature was beginning to take its course. We were receiving American investments at the rate of $25,000,000 a month, which was very useful, and then we cut them off . . . American investments in this country are out of balance, as I said a moment ago. They are natural to us, and we cannot go on importing as we are now unless the Americans will again invest.

Let us look at the kind of investment that was being made by Americans in Canada prior to revaluation. Most of it was the speculative purchase of Canadian securities—many of them government securities. Americans were buying these securities believing that our dollar was valued too low and that it would inevitably have to be revalued. The investment was the purchase of existing securities—securities either of governments or of existing enterprises; and most of it was a purchase for speculative reasons. This is not the kind of investment that we really welcome. Indeed, for years I used to worry when I learned of increasing speculative American purchases of our securities. I realized that we were simply running into debt to a foreign country, placing a mortgage, as it were, upon our own resources to residents of the United States—a mortgage that was sure to be called at some uncertain and unfavourable time when the holders of the securities decided to sell them.

To hear the financial critic of the opposition one would think that the kind of investment that the revaluation discouraged was the investment of risk capital, the kind of capital that develops new enterprises, the kind of investment which we welcome. But this was not for the most part the kind of investment that was being made, nor was there anything in the revaluation to discourage that beneficial type of investment. Investors of risk capital have been able throughout to obtain Canadian dollars in the unofficial market, indeed for most of the period at around 90, the very price to which we are told we should reduce our dollar.

If anyone were to ask my personal opinion as to why risk capital did not come in last year, I would say it was because of the repeated rumours that have been circulated that the Canadian dollar was to be devalued to 90 cents, or lower if necessary, a course which has been advocated in the house by members of the official opposition. It is not that kind of prospect, but exchange stability, that investors of risk capital have been seeking; and I am glad to say that we have begun in recent months to see confidence returning in our exchange and an increasing volume of risk capital being invested in this country.

When the financial critic says that we could go on importing if we could go on borrowing American money, this is true. But to go on basing our imports on great and ever greater borrowing from abroad would not be a desirable development.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What about investments?

Mr. ILSLEY: To employ a term used by the financial critic, it would be living off our fat and doing so with a vengeance—

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Not if it were investments.

Mr. ILSLEY: —and paving the way for serious trouble in the future. Even if it were desirable, devaluation now would not cause the 1945-46 type of investment to be resumed, because the expectation of another appreciation of our dollar would be absent.

Then it is said there should be some devaluation. The opposition has been confused in its advocacy of devaluation. There has been a tendency on the part of some members, notably the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman), to talk as if the Canadian dollar should be free, should be allowed to find its own level; but this view is not general, and for very good reasons. The financial critic has never been bold enough to go this far. He has been selecting 90 cents as the proper level. Why 90 cents rather than 95, or 85 or 80, nobody knows; but 90 cents it is, so far as he is concerned. I am glad to note, however, that in his speech on the budget he has not resumed his advocacy of a depreciation to 90 cents. I do not know whether there is some opposition policy other than the one he has just stated. Indeed he did not in his speech advocate any depreciation. However, the last opposition policy to be stated in the house is devaluation to 90 cents.

Now, everything I have said indicates that a devaluation to 90 cents would have no significant effect so far as curtailment of the volume of American imports is concerned, no significant effect on increase in the volume of Canadian exports, and no effect whatever on increase in the volume of desirable American investments in Canada. Its only certain effect would be an unfortunate increase in the Canadian price level, and an almost certain reduction in imports from the United Kingdom and other overseas countries. Surely such a policy has nothing to commend it.

It is also said that the true value of our dollar is indicated by the value of Canadian dollars in the unofficial markets in the United States. Nothing could be more fallacious than this allegation. The unofficial market in the United States is in no real sense a market in Canadian dollars.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): How can the minister say that? He has just referred to investments through the unofficial market.

Mr. ILSLEY: But it is not an indication of the true value of the Canadian dollar.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ILSLEY: If hon. gentlemen will please hold their peace I will tell them in a moment. It is merely a market in limited-use Canadian dollars. The Canadian dollars that are sold in the unofficial market in the United States can be used only for a severely limited number of purposes. They can be used by tourists in Canada; they can be used for capital investment in Canada, but they cannot be used for the great bulk of ordinary commercial transactions, such as payment for goods and services, freight charges, interest on dividends, or to settle any other current payments owing to Canadians. The official rate is rising at the present time. The resoluteness with which we are setting our exchange position in order is creating a growing demand in the unofficial market in the United States for these limited-use Canadian dollars, but that market is no indication of the true value of the Canadian dollar and no guide whatever to what the natural or proper rate ought to be.

The financial critic of the opposition said last Friday, as reported at page 4246 of Hansard:

> To me a convincing argument and one that outweighs all others is the appeal to realism. When you find things happening between people who are trading with each other freely, that comes as close to realism as you can get. To me it is not real for us here in Canada to sit in an ivory tower saying our dollar is worth one hundred American cents when actually it is being traded in the United States at between 92 and 93 cents. We too much resemble King Canute.

When the hon. gentleman says this he is violating the principles which he laid down in his own speech—those of clear thinking and realism. He is using an argument which is specious; he is spreading a fallacy; he is misleading the public.

It is said that had we not taken this step there would have been no need for the November restrictions.

If what I have said is correct, it will be seen that the restrictions would have been necessary whether or not we had taken the step of July 5, 1946. The perpetuation of a cheap Canadian dollar would not have stopped our loss of exchange to the United States, probably not to any extent at all, and certainly not more than to a very minor extent. The proper policy to restore our exchange position was a policy which, while not discriminatory, was discriminating—that is, inviting and encouraging the imports we wanted, and excluding the imports we did not want; a policy which accomplishes the ends really desired, not many other ends which are thoroughly undesirable, such as raising the Canadian price level, discouraging imports from the United Kingdom, and the others I have mentioned.

It was said by the member for Muskoka-Ontario, quite inexcusably, that since the adoption of the present restrictions our present position in United States dollars shows little or no improvement over the low point of last December. His authority for this statement is, he says, the Ottawa correspondent of Maclean's magazine, whose bald statement he takes in preference to the figures given by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech. When Canadians realize that our holdings of hard currency exchange sank rapidly and steadily all through 1947 to a low of $461 million on December 16 last, and that by the end of April, 1948, they have climbed again to $588 million, apart altogether from what we have borrowed from the Export-Import bank, they will see not only that the downward trend has been arrested, but that an upward trend has been substituted for it and that our position is righting itself. How, then, can he say that the policy of November 1947 has failed? We have every reason to be gratified by the results of that policy.

I believe, for the reasons I have given, that our revaluation policy was sound at the time we adopted it, and that it continues to be sound today.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister will allow me to ask one question. I do not like to be accused of inaccuracy. I try not to be inaccurate. It is quite true that I did give as an authority Maclean's magazine; nevertheless I thought I had independent evidence also. I believe it is a fact that no less a person than the governor of the Bank of Canada pointed out that while for the moment there is apparently a rise—

An hon. MEMBER: What is the question?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would suggest that the hon. member ask his question.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am asking whether the minister is aware that the governor of the Bank of Canada, in giving evidence before the senate committee, pointed out that while for the moment there is a rise, there are heavy payments that will come, and that the rise pointed out for the moment is to a considerable extent misleading.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend should have waited until he had the facts before he made the kind of speech he made last Friday.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have always had a great respect for the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott); I have admired his urbanity and the way in which he has treated members who are not on his side of the house. I wish to point out one or two things concerning the policy of the government and the brain trust back of the government, although I wish it to be understood that I am not criticizing officials, because, after all is said and done, matters of policy in the end are decided by the government itself.

Hon. gentlemen opposite were very largely to blame for the scuttling of the British empire by the policy they adopted at Bretton Woods, followed by the United States loan agreement, which have proved most disastrous to the cause of the empire and of Great Britain.

We also know what happened at the Geneva trade conference in February last year. For eight months we could get no information about what was going on at Geneva in the making of trade pacts over the head of the House of Commons while parliament was in session. Then in October or November our delegates came back and the government inaugurated their austerity program, which pretty nearly wrecked this country and the empire. Parliament was called for December 5.

I wish to refer to some government policies which are most unfair to Ontario and Quebec, which are paying over seventy per cent of the cash taxes of this country. The government took away their sources of revenue, and that, as well as the heavy burden of taxation from which we are suffering, has caused a great deal of unrest.

I wish we had the municipal system in vogue in this parliament. Our system of responsible government, which in my opinion, is not responsible government at all, is one hundred and fifty years old. If we had the more modern municipal system the estimates could be considered by the minister, the chief officials and certain members from all parties in the house, who could strike off certain expenditures. There is no reason why this country, years after the close of the war, should be spending money like water over the head of parliament. We have been too extravagant. Economy is not wanted. Parliament never hears of the expenditures until it conducts a post mortem on the estimates and after interim supply has been granted for nearly nine months. This parliament knows practically nothing of the action taken.

The budget address is probably the last time that a private member has a chance to say anything about world conditions and what is going on in this country. I contend that if we had the municipal system it would give the committee the right to revise proposed expenditures, because the present policies of the government are very largely wrong. We need some system of checks and balances in relation to expenditures. If the municipalities used the system we use in this house they would all go bankrupt, but they are bound by the Municipal Act. The Municipal Act does not give them power to spend money like water as the government of the day is doing. Sections of the Municipal Act provide that none of these charges can be made except on a year-to-year basis, and in certain cases money bylaws for capital expenditure have to be voted on by the people.

If the government are sincere about the present budget they should hold an election. I believe that the election has been delayed for some time to come. I say that this budget was very largely made at Washington. We have those periodical excursions all over the seven seas. Our ambassadors and financiers are making these excursions. Donald Gordon has recently been issuing statements across the border. Then we have those conferences all over the world. For a month now we have had green grass and flowers, and the birds have been congregating and chattering. So do we in conferences; the same applies to our delegates and financiers and all the rest of them. They are on the seven seas. We are now having conferences. We are a nation of conferences. One mistake we made was in surrendering to Washington too much political, military, economic, financial and social initiative. This is nothing but a Washington-made budget over the head of parliament, following out what was done at Geneva away back in February 1947.

If we look closely at the budget we shall see that it is nothing but window-dressing, preparing for an election. What has become of the old Liberal doctrine of the people ruling in the country? The people do not rule. Now we have a family compact. Who controls the family compact? The brain trusts and the officials who give this advice. As I said the other day, there is an old Scotch proverb which says, when you go away up in the clouds be sure you keep one foot on the ground. We have no such thing as that here. It was referred to by me the other day on the amendment of the minister to abolish the penny bank.

There is no such thing as thrift in this country today. The government do not appreciate thrift because they bring in these astronomical figures running into billions and billions of dollars. In the civil estimates they are spending nearly $2 billion; whereas in 1896 the Tupper government spent $36,000,000, and the population has gone up only one-fourth since. Before the war the government spent $400 million on civil estimates; today it is up to $2 billion, without any control over the expenditures; so much so that interim supply is passed for about nine months of the year, and over the head of parliament, and we cannot strike off one dollar. I am opposed to this principle. What has become of the principle of government by the people, of the people and for the people? It does not exist in Canada today. The executive rule the land from coast to coast. They bring in a budget and the whole House of Commons has to swallow it. You cannot strike off a dollar. If you do, the government is defeated and must resign.

If we had the municipal system here we would be able to strike off from one-third to one-half the present cost of civil government in Canada, and give the people back home in the constituencies a chance. Mr. Fielding and Sir Wilfrid Laurier said that the sales tax should never go above a maximum of four per cent. It went to six, then to eight. They did cut it to four on food; it should come down to two. The reduction should apply not only to food, but to clothing and all the necessities of life.

If the budget is what the minister, the financiers and the government say it is, then the government should hold an election on it. If it is a popular budget, the government should go to the country on it. It should be decided by the electors. Why is the government afraid to hold an election in Canada and get the verdict of the people on it? I tell the house that it is a blessing that Ontario and Quebec did not adopt the Sirois report. It is the most mischievous report I have ever read. It is taxation without representation. We pass interim supply without any information. This system of taking such huge sums of money, nearly a billion dollars above what we need in 1948, is wrong. We are taking too much money out of the pockets of the taxpayers.

The minister says that such a policy will save us from inflation. Have hon. members ever heard of such a ridiculous doctrine? I do not know where it was invented. I can tell you that this system of taking all that money out of the workingman's pocket and using it for the purposes indicated, more than the minister needs, is against the principle of the Municipal Act, which requires expenditures to run only from year to year. By this system we are creating inflation. This system of budgeting amounts to putting your hands in the workingman's pockets until there is nothing left, particularly when we remember that taxation is very high, and the high cost of living is added on to it. Not enough has been charged to capital. Too much has been charged to pay-as-you-go.

This generation is suffering in flesh and blood. Why should the sins of the whole human race be carried by this generation of people in Canada? A large part of the present budget should be charged to capital and not to income, because there is no income to justify it. There is no retrenchment, and no attempt at reduction of taxation. It makes the poor people back in the constituencies wonder what the House of Commons is for. The executive over our heads can pass a budget like this, and nine months of supply, without any real discussion at all of any of the individual items of the estimates. We find no retrenchment at all, but sky-high extravagance in every department of the public service.

No attempt is made to reduce taxation. The reduction of taxation is held in contempt by the various departments. You have only to look at the estimates to find that out. The poor working classes had hoped that at this session they would receive a reduction in the high income tax. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) the other day referred to the working classes and the small income tax payer. A reduction in these high taxes is badly needed by this class of people. In Britain they have reduced the income tax. In that country two million people do not now pay income taxes at all. The minister in his budget made a comparison with taxes in the United States and Britain, and published two tables. His comparison was most unfair, because there are many differences. As a result of the policies which hon. gentlemen opposite have put into effect, a person today, if he wishes to exist at all, has to utilize what little saving he has put by or any little money investment he may have.

Last year the house had not much opportunity to discuss the main or supplementary estimates. As I pointed out when we voted interim supply last month, while it is true that the minister must have money to run the services of the country, businessmen, retail merchants and others have been looking for retrenchment in government expenditures. Practically all we are doing now in committee of supply is holding a post mortem after the money is spent. That is no way to conduct the business of the country.

The government are spending money like water. I can see no sign of retrenchment in the main estimates or in the supplementaries. We are being asked to vote large sums of money for bonuses, subventions and subsidies for the prairie provinces, and the other provinces do not get anything. There are many items here for interim supply, one for $80 million, another for $17 million, and so on. These expenditures, under this method of conducting the business of the country, really mean expenditures and taxation without representation. The house is abdicating its functions to the executive. It is a dangerous principle. Expenditures for civil government in the days of Sir Wilfrid Laurier amounted in 1897 to $36 million, and the population of the country has increased by only one-third or one-quarter since; but the civil estimates are now nearly two billions.

There should be some better way of conducting public business. The municipalities would be bankrupt if they did business in this way. The auditor general should have wider powers to deal with some of these expenditures. The Minister of Finance may take this humorously, but it is no laughing matter for the working classes I represent. Government extravagance and lack of retrenchment, added to the high cost of living, are becoming scandalous, and the public will not stand for it. We should have some redress of grievances before the executive spend money in this way by interim supply.

I have referred to the sales tax. Who pays the income tax? Taxation, so far as the industrial workers are concerned, is levied at the source? But what about the rest of the community? I am not here to criticize any particular class, and I do not mind saying that I have a great admiration for the farmers; but according to the figures supplied by the dominion bureau of statistics, for the last year of record, there were 705,973 farms in the country and only a small percentage of the farmers filed any income tax returns. The total cash income of farmers, reported by the bureau of statistics, in 1946 was $1,769,632,000, and it went over the two billion dollar mark last year. The bureau explains that farm cash income does not include income accruing to farmers from outside sources, nor does it include the value of products consumed in the farm home.

Who are the people who are prosecuted in our courts for offences in connection with income tax? I can find no farmers being prosecuted for violations of the act. And so far as the other offences are concerned, in connection with controls, for example, the people who are prosecuted are those who live in the cities. One druggist in the city of Montreal was fined only five dollars for giving out as an aid to his business pounds of butter. There should be some uniform, reciprocal system about prosecutions for all, not for some. I have always maintained that the principle of confederation for us to observe should be "each for all and all for each", because I do not believe in having legislation that does not apply to all classes of citizens. Prosecution should be impartial, and not just for industrial workers; but this is not so.

The official opposition in this house have been urging economy in government, but without any success. Take the main estimates for this year and you will find they are sky-high in every department of the public service. People have no idea where the money will come from. The opposition have done their duty by trying to point out where economies could be effected, but the government goes on spending freely.

One matter to which I would call the attention of the house is the practice of non-residents of coming into Ontario and taking part in provincial elections. Outsiders from other provinces are coming in, visiting provincial constituencies and making speeches. I have never taken part in any election held in any other province, either in the maritimes, on the prairies or in British Columbia, but I find, in almost every newspaper I pick up, reports indicating that some of my hon. friends to the left have been going around Ontario addressing meetings. I am not questioning their right to do so, but I have always taken the view that it is not the right thing for anyone to go into another province and take part in provincial or municipal elections, unless he is a ratepayer there also.

I listened the other day to my hon. friend the member of Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), for whom I have a great deal of respect, discussing conditions in the maritime provinces, especially in connection with hydro-electric power. May I point out to hon. members that in the operation of our hydro-electric development in Ontario for cheap light and power we never receive one dollar by way of grant from the federal treasury. I object, therefore, to paying a third of the cost of steam plants or anything of that kind in other provinces.

What we need in Canada is a sound protectionist policy of bonuses, subventions and subsidies to solve the economic problems of each province. How has development been brought about in Ontario? The industrial development by the use of electrical equipment in Toronto, Brantford and other cities in the province has been the result of a policy of protection, and we have done a great deal under the British preferential agreements and the Ottawa agreements, requiring United States industrial institutions to have plants in Canada. But hon. gentlemen opposite, with one wave of the hand, by means of Bretton Woods, the American loan, and the notorious Geneva undertaking, have destroyed all the great preferential trade of empire.

Why can we not have preferential trade within the empire? This government, through its free trade policies, has made it difficult for Canadian industry to carry on. Take the agricultural implement industry. Through the protectionist policy, that industry was built up in Canada, giving work to thousands of our people. The Massey-Harris Company, for instance, provided employment for a great many of our fellow Canadians, but the policy of this government has endangered that industry. There would not be an industry left in Canada if the government had its way, and the industrial provinces will pay for it in the years to come. I do not believe in the free trade doctrine, with all this wave of internationalism.

In my opinion the maritime provinces are largely to blame for the condition in which they find themselves at the present time, under their free trade theories. They moved certain head offices to Montreal. With their rich resources and their supply of coal they could have developed industries, and they cannot now expect to rap at the door of the dominion and claim bonuses, subventions and subsidies toward their power development. I introduced a bill in 1923 for the establishment of a national fuel policy, and I received little support from the maritimes except from the late Senator Logan and the present Hon. Mr. Justice Carroll.

As regards immigration, I agree with the views put forward by the Canadian Legion in their meeting at Saskatoon yesterday when they called for more British immigration. We have now taken our fair share of the displaced persons, and something should be done immediately. Otherwise the cream of immigration will go from the British isles to Australia and New Zealand where they are welcomed. The governments there are welcoming large bodies of British people, our own kith and kin, who saved our shores in the last war, with only the aid of the dominions, and, two years later, with the help of our devoted allies to the south. Immigration from the British isles should receive more attention, and there should be mass immigration from there now as there is to Australia.

As I said recently, what are we going to do about Newfoundland when the election takes place on June 3? I dealt with this matter away back last year in connection with the Labrador bill. I believe that the doctrine should be taken up actively by Britain and by Canada, namely, that of lease-lend by which all the bases were given up from Newfoundland right down to British Guiana. That lease should be cancelled now once and forever. It is a 99-year lease, practically a freehold. It was done to aid America in the battle of the Atlantic against invasion. That lease should be cancelled and should be charged up to lease-lend. Newfoundland will not be talked out of the empire any more than Canada will be. Newfoundland will have to be fought out of the empire.

I have never known a time equal to the last four years when, as Mr. Churchill says, more effort has been made to scuttle the empire and liquidate it. That effort has been made not only in India, but in the Suez, Egypt, Palestine, with the loss of the Mediterranean lifeline, and in many other parts of the world where that policy has been carried on. Britain will not sit down and be content to be a second-class power and allow dollar statesmanship to cripple her forever. She still rules the waves and "Britons never shall be slaves" as James Thomson, the great Scotch poet said, when he wrote "Rule Britannia" at the time of the Spanish Armada.

A retired United States admiral said recently that the United States has now taken Britain's place and rules the waves. That was not so at Pearl Harbor. I am against Britain being a second-class power, notwithstanding all that is said and done. I am opposed to any more scuttling of our empire. Many things looked impossible. The mother country kept world peace and security for centuries against dictators—against Philip of Spain, Louis XIV, Napoleon and twice in our own generation against the Kaiser and Hitler of Germany. Next to the Christian church no other agency has done as much for the freedom of the world and for liberty and civilization as the mother country has done on the seven seas. Did not the battle of Britain in the last war look impossible? Everything looked impossible including the battle of the Atlantic, as did the exploits of Drake, Raleigh, Nelson, Blake and others. The mother country, notwithstanding the terms of the Bretton Woods agreement and the hard terms of the United States loan, can live a few more months the hard way. We see the utter collapse of statesmanship in America and also in this Geneva dollar pact proposition.

As I said the other day regarding Canada, it has never had a foreign policy. The foreign policy of Canada is "We have no commitments; parliament will decide." Our foreign policy is to be linked up with the United States. I am a great admirer of the people of the United States, and of what they did. It was of the utmost importance. We should have the most friendly relations with them because, with Britain and the dominions, they are the hope of the world. There should be the most friendly relations between Britain, the dominions and the United States.

We are now making the same mistake again. We are trying by the UNO to appease Russia and are adopting an appeasement policy. She does not want it and she refuses it. The United States did not have a foreign policy until recently when they adopted the ERP, Mr. Marshall's program, which has not yet been put into effect to any great extent, although it is now getting beyond the blueprint stage. However I will say this. The policy which they are now pursuing is on again, off again and on again, and all that kind of thing. That country decides one thing about Palestine and marches up the hill today politically, then tomorrow marches down the hill for the sake of safety as a nation as it sees the partition difficulty. That is meant for local consumption in the coming election as well.

The committee on foreign affairs, which has been meeting recently, and whose appointment I opposed, is one of the most mischievous committees we ever had. One has just to read the papers of the last few days to find out what they are saying down there. They have government officials before them. What are the government officials doing? They are deciding the foreign policy of the government themselves in these matters, over the heads of the House of Commons, while we are in session. Did you ever hear of such functions in a committee on foreign affairs? They want more embassies on the seven seas. As I said the other night, if UNO at Lake Success were only to close down for a year, we might have some hope for peace. Our parliamentary association turned itself into a pan-American association. It forgets all about the empire and goes on thinking, as Time magazine said recently, that we are becoming, in an economic way, the 49th state in the union. As I said, the officials should not be laying down these foreign policies of their own volition over the head of parliament now in session.

Then there is the matter of extravagance of the various departments. For instance, let us take the Department of External Affairs. They have ambassadors and embassies on the seven seas, consuls and consuls-general. There are trade commissioners, but these are useful in obtaining trade. A big trade conference is opening next Saturday in Toronto. I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and many members of the house will go there to see what can be done. Having all these officials overseas is useless duplication. The trade commissioners do fine work; but why should we have carloads of these other ambassadors on the seven seas? Most of them are not ambassadors; they know nothing at all about diplomacy, except what they learn by experience. We have various ones going around the seven seas making speeches along these lines as well, and the empire is being scuttled accordingly.

I can say this about economy. It is talked of by all the ministers when they speak. The Minister of Finance has been comparing his budget with that of Britain and the United States. Economy is talked of by all the ministers, but that is only for us. Economy is the last thing the minister thinks of, because he has his experts, secretaries, first secretary, second secretary—they are copying the external affairs department—third secretary, fourth secretary, fifth secretary; and where do the public come in while all this is going on? This matter of economy is the last thing the ministers think of. It is not for them to practise. The public must save, or where would the money come from for ministers to spend? We have been told that over and over again. Where would the money come from for the ministers to spend if the people did not save?

The greatest wheeze, as a writer says, is the newly invented economic doctrine and theory, solemnly supported by a lot of honest deputies, no doubt, but who misjudged the situation. What they say is their policy is made by the brain-trusters and others. They are all good men, and some of them should know better than to swallow all this and make it a political budget instead of a financial and economic one, and make the public pay this vast taxation as a remedy against inflation. They say that for the Minister of Finance to collect several hundred million dollars more than he requires will, in some mysterious way, make for a sounder economy. But I cannot find that in any of the modern textbooks. The only way to get back to a sound economy would be for the minister to cut the coat according to the cloth and to stop the huge waste now going on on the seven seas. We can only do that if the minister takes a strong stand, and if we stop borrowing from foreign countries. My principle has always been to tell the people the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, but that is not what is done in this budget. The government should not be afraid to tell the people they have made a mistake, and should never have a budget that legislates against human nature as this one does.

On April 6 the budget was brought down in the old country. The National Review says it was a political budget of Sir Stafford Cripps, containing little to hearten the people of the mother country in the face of the austerity now prevailing there. The keynotes are dependence upon America; that they must continue to lavish public money on socialist projects, and that this money must be obtained from the enterprising and thrifty. It is the old story of taking money in excessive amounts from those who have to pay the taxes. That budget contained some remissions, trifling in themselves but large in the aggregate to the less well to do, while the taxes on alcohol and tobacco were further increased. But in that budget there is a capital levy on incomes from investment. This is a political purchase tax, and it has established a precedent. The higher income groups will pay very heavily when this is added to the already heavy burdens they carry.

The socialists are blind to the damage being done their country. They think only of keeping power for their party and of putting good socialists into comfortable jobs. If these aspects were uppermost in the minds of the socialist government, however, it was otherwise with the general public. The orgy of extravagance, the lavish scale on which ministry officials live, says the National Review, the absence of thrift displayed by the government of Britain, all have appalled the electorate. They are asked to save. Why should they? What can be the use of saving when money is squandered in this way? Money and more money is to run out of the leaking government pool. It has to come out of the pockets of the people. That is what will be done here in Canada also, I am afraid. The government have taken the sales tax off some articles of food, which was a fine gesture, but they should have extended it to include clothing.

It is against this background that certain tax changes in the budget must be considered. We see these taxes in Britain, and over here we try to copy and imitate Britain in many ways. We see what happened at Geneva and all the rest of it. The present tax rate not only discourages saving; it incites people to spend whatever they have. With reference again to the special levy in Britain, this falls most heavily on the enterprising and the thrifty and at the same time spares others, while the tax relief granted does the same thing.

I say here, Mr. Speaker, that I am for an empire policy. I agree with Mr. Casey, the outstanding Australian statesman. I am in favour of an empire conference on trade, defence and migration. As Mr. Casey said on April 18, we need a great empire leader who will go through the empire with a flaming sword. The United Kingdom is blind to the bright pictures and happy prospects lying latent in the dominions, particularly in South Africa and Australia. It is vital that she should decentralize her population throughout the British commonwealth. Until she ceases regarding herself as an isolated community and plans her economy accordingly the people of the United Kingdom have little hope of rising above their present drab austerity. Mr. Casey went on to say:

> There are in England men of character, experience and vigour who are virtually unemployed. The empire's talent is at present wrapped in a napkin. British citizens could have the sun, moon and stars if they stirred out of their lethargy.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must inform the hon. gentleman that his time has expired.

Mr. CHURCH: I can conclude in just a moment. Mr. Casey went on to say that they could again take their place in the country of nations as a great power by the policy he names, and I believe that is so. I suggest that Britain should help the dominions before giving help to any of these mandated countries, where her efforts have not been appreciated. As Lieutenant-General Sir Alan Cunningham said, but for outside interference Britain would have brought the Palestine problem to a happy ending, and so she would if she had been left alone to do so and not have been interfered with by the UNO, and the way Washington and the UNO changed so often about it.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, we have had quite an interesting debate on the budget. A week ago last evening the government rolled out their big gun and gave us quite a barrage. Then last Thursday the heavy artillery of the official opposition was brought up in the person of their financial critic. Since then we have had a series of smaller guns; then today the Liberals rolled out another big one and turned him loose on us.

I am not going to deal with many of the questions raised by those who have spoken previously, though after a while I am going to offer one particular criticism of the budget. Before doing so, I want to draw to the attention of the financial critic of the Progressive Conservative party some things he said to which I would not care to have to subscribe. Early in his remarks he dealt with the minister's predilection for the easy spending of the money under his control, and endeavoured to persuade the minister that he should reduce expenditures. He suggested that this could be done in several ways. I want to refer to two statements, the first appearing on page 4240 of Hansard, where the hon. gentleman said in part:

> I suggest to him, with every desire to be helpful, and I am sure he knows that that is always my wish, that there is only one way to economize, and that is to give people less money to spend.

I want to make it clear that at that time the hon. member was speaking of the money the minister made available to heads of departments. In justice to the hon. gentleman, I do not want it thought I am trying to show he was referring to the people of the country. Then, on the next page he went on to say:

> . . . that is, he should not argue with people over what they would like to spend; he should tell the departments what he is going to allow them.

That may sound like a quite unimportant statement, but if that is the position the hon. gentleman would assume if he were Minister of Finance I should say that is as close to a financial dictatorship of this country and of a duly elected parliament as anything could be. The suggestion is that the Minister of Finance should tell the head of another department, for instance the Minister of National Health and Welfare: "Here is the money you can have. To the extent that you can replace with better clothes the rags of some unfortunate Canadian citizens with this money, you may do so; but beyond that you may not go." That is the implication of a statement of that kind.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? I am sure he does not want to be unfair.

Mr. BENTLEY: I do not.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Does he not realize that I was suggesting purely a method? Of course I was not suggesting that the Minister of Finance would do it in any arbitrary or unthinking way, but that he would have his own means of arriving at what he thought was the proper amount. It was purely a matter of technique.

Mr. BENTLEY: That was not a question. However, the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has had an opportunity to clarify a statement that disturbed me a good deal. As I say, I should not like to see the Minister of Finance of this country have such powers.

Another thing the financial critic of the official opposition said was that the desire for security on the part of the Canadian people was stifling the spirit of adventure. He mentioned the fact that a poll taken among the people had indicated that about thirty-eight per cent of those questioned would like to work for the government. It is assumed that the reason is that they want some security, and apparently this desire for security is deplored by the hon. member. I want to point out to him that it is all right to keep on telling us fairy tales about venture capital in this country. There was some venture capital. People who put their household goods and the other limited supplies they may have had upon their backs, in carts, or even in boxcars later on, and went out to invest all they had in a piece of land or in some type of small business in the far reaches of a new country, were investing venture capital, an investment of the human and financial resources they had.

But the financial interests of this country have not displayed any tendency in the last twenty-five or thirty years to risk their capital, and, may I say, even before that. In the early days of the manufacturing industry, when that industry was young in the country, and the country itself was young, those who invested capital in manufacturing in this dominion demanded and received protection. I am not arguing either for or against protection at the present time. It may have been necessary for the building of those industries. That is a debatable point. The fact remains, however, that they did not venture capital and take on all comers. They asked for and received protection for the capital they invested, and they have done very well by that protection.

I have been dealing with times of peace; but in a time of war it is people's lives that are ventured, not capital. The capitalist class we criticize here; those who have formed their combinations, their monopolies, are the ones we criticize. They demanded and received protection all the way through, during the war. It was the men and women who went out to the various front-line services in the air, on the sea or on the land, who ventured something; they ventured their lives. They ventured their lives in both wars, because propaganda agencies of the government, and their own consciences, prompted them to believe that if they did not venture their lives those lives might not be worth saving. If our military operations both of world war I and world war II had not been successful, and had we been defeated, our lives would not have been worth saving. We would have had no security of any kind from the type of government which would have run this country, had either of those wars ended with success for the enemy; and particularly is that true in respect of Hitler Germany.

[Mr. Bentley.]

So the people who went out and risked their lives did so with the hope that, if it were necessary for them to lose their lives, at least they would have provided some security for democracy and the type of living which we have built up in this country to some extent, to date, and which we hope to improve upon in the years to come. Certainly it is security that people want.

Capital has not been venturesome. In the war they demanded, and received, a considerable amount of assurance that they would not have their monetary position badly impaired because of their entry into the manufacturing of war materials. May I point out one further thing to the hon. member; and with the assurance that I am not saying these things in any bitterness of spirit. I am trying to convince as many people as I can who are listening to me, or who may read what I say, or give some thought to what I am saying, that the statements I make have behind them a sound basis. My experience in life, from observing what has gone on around me in the circle of people with whom I live, has convinced me of the soundness of what I am saying, and of the unsoundness of statements made by the hon. member in his speech.

Reading from page 4250 of Hansard, I find that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario made some statements with respect to how many can go to universities. He said:

> Every man who has ability.

Then the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) said, "No", and some other hon. members said "Yes". Then the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario continued:

> This brings me to opportunity. We in this party nail opportunity to the mast. We seek to help people to help themselves and among other things to provide their own security on a contributory basis.

With the last statement there can be no great complaint, provided that the person who is to be asked to take care of his own security on a contributory basis has some means whereby he can do that. But again, let me remind the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario and the house that the minister in his budget speech last year told us that half the population of Canada were below the income brackets for which income tax payments are required. Anyone living a single life in Canada and earning less than $750 a year is certainly not in a position to make much of a contribution toward his own future welfare. The same is true of a married person who earns only $1,500 a year.

In connection with educational opportunities, I heartily disagree with the statement of the hon. member, because I know many people who are able and would have been willing to help themselves through universities, had they not had other obligations. I would remind the house that there are many citizens in Canada, growing young men and women, who have the ability, the courage and the energy, and who would like very much to put themselves through universities, if they could. Upon them, however, may be resting the necessity to provide for elderly parents, or for families, or for brothers and sisters, either partly or completely. We look around at many of the civil servants in Ottawa; we do not need to go outside this city for examples, although they may be found spread from Halifax to Vancouver. We shall find many men and women in the civil service in Ottawa who have had to spend long periods of time in caring for unfortunate parents. Had there been a provision for the parents, those young people might have been able to work their way through universities.

Had that been so, let me draw to the hon. member's attention the fact that there are not enough universities in the country to take care of all those people—if those who were willing to go had an opportunity to do so. Again I would point out that a great deal of public money goes into the building of universities. To that extent there is public support for those who graduate from the universities to take their places as citizens. I am not complaining about that.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): You do not object to that, do you?

Mr. BENTLEY: No. I am very glad that they have been helped to that extent; but I do say we should have that opportunity available to the fullest extent; so that all children who in primary and secondary schools have shown themselves capable and who wish to go ahead, should be able to do so, and should not be prevented because of failure of family finances to supply them with those things they require in order to continue their education.

The hon. member mentioned the matter of attempting to stir up class distinctions in this country, and thereby to bedevil the country. I can assure him that I agree in his dislike of those things. But again I wish to point out that we cannot expect Canadians, any more than other people, to be content forever with luxury on the hill, and mud shacks or slums, or whatever it may be, surrounding it. Wendell Willkie pointed that out in his book, and we can see it every day. My goodness, anyone who has worked among the people of this country must have seen the time when, through pure unfortunate circumstances, people have had to reduce themselves and their families to a meagre existence, not because of any fault they have committed in their work, or the industry in which they were engaged, but simply because of some circumstances over which they had absolutely no control. And when we pick intelligent and able people, and know they are willing to work, and when we suddenly find them reduced to a class of work which will not compensate them the way in which they should be compensated if they are to keep their families, we cannot blame them if at times they form themselves into class-conscious groups and become extremely angry about conditions in the country which has reduced them to that position. As I say, I am not trying to be discourteous to the hon. member. I simply want to draw these things to his attention, because I know from the very decency there is in him he will see the justice of what I am saying.

I should like to make one reference to what was said by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman), at page 4355 of Hansard. From his speech it was evident that the hon. member for Rosedale had only one criticism to direct against the government. His speech conveyed to me the idea that the government was not doing too badly in its general policies, but that if the hon. gentleman's party were in power they would do the same things but would do them much better. That was the impression I got from his speech. I will quote what he said on just one point, because I have not time to go through all his speech. He said:

> I would point out, however, that the policy of double depreciation was another example of faulty planning.

This from a member who has never shown much inclination to favour planning of any kind! He goes on:

> Hindsight shows it to have been totally unnecessary and to have aggravated the inflationary tendencies already existing in our economy. Had we needed to create employment, it would have been a fine thing, but once again our economic managers—

Meaning the government, I suppose.

> —saw dimly through dark-coloured glasses.

I would point out to the hon. member for Rosedale that the government on the opposite side of the house has constantly taken from the big business interests of this country any guidance it has ever accepted from anybody. The chambers of commerce and boards of trade have more influence on the government of this country at the present time than have any other bodies.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is rubbish, the same old story.

Mr. BENTLEY: Results are what count. The proof of the pudding is in the eating. Every time this government passes legislation you can find commendation for that legislation in the pronouncements of chambers of commerce, or if you go back you can find recommendations from chambers of commerce and boards of trade for such legislation; but every time you find recommendations coming from agricultural groups or from labour unions you find the government fighting those recommendations to the last ditch.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is rubbish too, and nobody knows it better than my hon. friend.

Mr. BENTLEY: I shall deal with that a little later when I speak of farm organizations. At the moment I wanted to point out to the hon. member for Rosedale that the people in whom he places his economic faith, the leaders of big business in this country, were pleased with the double depreciation feature and many other government policies when they came in; and if, as he says, hindsight is better than foresight, he and his friends in big business must be indulging in that hindsight, because now they are weeping at the results of some of the policies which they believed were good a few years ago.

I now come to the main part of my criticism of the minister's budget. I shall not bother referring to Hansard, because if you pick it up and read it through you will not find the matter to which I am about to refer mentioned in it in any way whatsoever. But before coming to the main part of my remarks, let me say that this budget gives no taxation relief to the lower income groups in Canada, and there is no assistance of any assured kind for the consumers of this country. True, the minister took off the sales tax, but without any assurance that the saving will be passed on to the consumer. The minister made that quite definite. There is no relief, not even a little bit of relief, for the kids of the country who, for their parties and so on, have to extract another two cents from the old man to buy a soft drink. In fact there is no relief in this budget whatsoever for the vast majority of the Canadian people.

Mr. ABBOTT: That tax brought in $23,000,000 last year.

Mr. BENTLEY: Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is a matter of pride to take $23,000,000 from the kids of this country.

Mr. ABBOTT: We take it from people who drink Scotch and soda too.

[Mr. Bentley.]

Mr. BENTLEY: Any time I buy Scotch I will willingly pay the tax if only the kids can have their soft drinks free of tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: Drink milk.

Mr. BENTLEY: We can moralize all we like, on what adults and kids should drink, but at their little social affairs the children like to imitate their elders by having something to drink. Their elders, of course, forbid them alcoholic drinks; so the children have the habit of using soft drinks, and the government comes along and takes $23,000,000, because people are trying to teach their children to be temperate. There are spiritual values in democracy, but every piece of legislation passed by this house is based on purely materialistic thinking, and it is time we put a little bit of spirituality into some of our legislation.

In the budget there is no suggestion whatsoever of any taxation relief for our co-operative organizations. There is no suggestion that the three per cent tax imposed on co-operatives two years ago is to be removed. Again I point out that that is one of the most unjust taxes that has ever been imposed on any body of people in this country. It is a tax which is entirely unjustified. I will grant that it does not put a heavy financial load on most of the co-operatives, although a few of them find it difficult to carry this tax load.

But it is not because of the financial load it imposes that I complain. The co-operative movement was absolutely built up as a free enterprise, non-profit business, and when that three per cent tax was imposed it put upon the statute book of this country a law which declares that co-operatives which claim to be non-profit, free enterprise organizations are profit-making institutions. I wish that this house and the government could see that point of view. Nobody invests in a co-operative organization for the sake of getting interest on the money invested. It is purely a case of a small or large group of people getting together and saying, we will build something of our own to serve us in some particular way, in order to save the money that we have in our pockets. But when they have saved their money this government comes along and says: Before you can get that money back into your pockets, a certain portion of it we are going to call profits, on which you must pay income tax. There is no justification for an income tax of that kind.

I have before me a number of resolutions, but I shall quote only one of them today, since the minister has given an undertaking that Bill No. 454 will come up shortly after the budget resolutions are disposed of. Here is a resolution that was passed unanimously by the congress of the Co-operative Union of Canada, held in Saskatoon on March 9, 10 and 11, 1948. The congress of the Co-operative Union of Canada is a combination of the various co-operatives in this country and also includes the active and able council of co-operatives in the province of Quebec. In this resolution they ask that the recommendations the congress made on March 22, 1946, should be given effect to by legislation. They do not want the tax applied by the means I indicated a few moments ago. They do not want this applied to any co-operative which comes in this particular group which I am going to quote for the benefit of the house:

(1) It is controlled exclusively on the basis that no member shall have more than one vote.

Mr. Speaker, there can be no more democratic organization in the world than a business organization in which every shareholder, regardless of the amount of his investment, has only one vote. No small group of individuals can control the policy of that institution. To that extent, that makes it a pure co-operative. I continue with the resolution:

(2) The net surplus arising from member business after payment of expenses and setting aside of depreciation and necessary reserves is allocated among its members in proportion to the business by each with the association or organization, pursuant to a prospect held out in its act of incorporation, bylaws, or contract with its members. If an association or organization desires to place in reserve a sum in excess of that which the minister deems necessary the setting aside of such additional reserve shall not disqualify such association or organization from exemption from tax, but such reserves shall be subject to tax in its hands.

That is fair enough. They ask only for the necessary reserves; then, if they desire to get more, the minister shall decide in his discretion whether they need these extras, and even if he decides that they do, they are prepared to have these reserves taxed according to other corporation taxes. I continue:

(3) The surplus so allocated is paid to the members in cash, or in such other form as the association or organization may by bylaw determine, provided that the amount so allocated be reported when required by the minister, and, if income of the member, shall be taxable in his hands in the year in which it is allocated.

age dividends of any one year any of those dividends become income in the hands of the member, the final receiver, then that is part of his income and is taxable in his hands.

(4) It pays not more than a moderate rate of interest on share capital of the association.

A moderate rate of interest I believe, generally speaking, among co-operatives is 3 to 3½ per cent.

In other words, if in the allocation of patron-

(5) Not more than one-third of its business in any year is done with non-members.

A co-operative cannot very well refuse to deal with those who come into its place of business who may not be members; but if not more than one-third of its total patronage is from non-members, they believe they should qualify as co-operatives, as I have explained. If more than one-third is, it would be obvious that they could get to such a size in doing non-member business that they would be more in the nature of a profit-making concern than a co-operative.

(6) Notwithstanding the foregoing, any association or organization shall pay income tax on that portion of its net surplus arising from non-member business which it does not distribute to non-members.

That means that they are fair. They say that, even though we are a co-operative, and do not do business with over 33⅓ per cent non-members; even if we do business with only one non-member we recognize that that business is profit business unless we return his dividends to him. If we do not return his dividends to him we recognize that the profit there is taxable in our hands, and therefore it is quite proper that it should be taxed. I continue:

The surplus of any association or organization directly or indirectly owned or controlled by one or more of the said associations or organizations shall not be liable to taxation under the said acts, provided it conducts its business or enterprise in the manner above set forth. Nor shall any patronage dividend distributed by it to its member associations or organizations be liable to be taxed in their hands if the member associations or organizations in turn allocate the dividend so received to the members on a patronage basis.

That means, Mr. Speaker, if a number of co-operative associations federate themselves for the purpose, we will say, of manufacturing some of the goods they propose to distribute through their local co-operative associations, then the earnings of the federated organization, if they are allocated back to the individual co-operative associations, and from there to the individual members, should not be taxable as income in the hands of either the federated co-operative or the individual co-operative which is affiliated with each, and shall become income only when it is private income in the hands of the individual who finally receives it.

That is my main criticism of the budget today, not because there is no other criticism, but because other hon. members have dealt or will deal with the other features. I did not want this opportunity to pass without drawing to the minister's attention the need for abolishing the three per cent tax on co-operatives, which was imposed by his government in 1946.

Mr. W. D. WYLIE (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, while I do not pretend to be a financial wizard; yet, after listening to the interesting and sometimes convincing speech of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) this afternoon, I am still convinced that the budget was what so many hon. members have said it was, a big disappointment, not only to the majority of hon. members, or perhaps I should say, to hon. members of the opposition, but to many of the Liberal members who, when the vote comes, will of course vote with the government.

It was a big disappointment to Canadians generally, the working classes and the farmers. We all realize how the cost of living has increased, and with no tax relief conditions will be much harder. While I must say that the farmers are perhaps better off at the present time than they have been for years, yet they have been more or less forced out of many lines of production because of the income tax. I refer particularly to hogs. The raising of hogs in the southern part of my province is almost out of the question. That has happened as a result of the income tax. That is one reason; another reason is the shortage of feed. In the raising of hogs on a farm, the feeding is done in the early hours of the morning and in the evening. Therefore it is really overtime work. The farmers complain that they are not going to raise hogs for Mr. Abbott. That is the general contention in my area.

The leader of this party, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), in his speech offered some good suggestions. I feel sure that if they were adopted they would ease conditions in this country not only for the working classes and the farmers but for everyone in general.

Here and there there was some trimming of indirect taxes, just enough to mollify the public and kid them into thinking they were getting something back from a generous government. This policy is always defended on the ground that it is anti-inflationary. It seems to me that the government does not want the people to keep the money they earn. The government says that the people will only spend it and send up the cost of everything, and thereby help to increase the market for scarce commodities.

[Mr. Bentley.]

The public could understand that reasoning in 1945, in 1946 and even in 1947. But this is 1948, three years after the war. Many goods are in fair supply now, but clerks are looking at each other and watching business walk by the window because the tax siphon is too efficient.

Goods are high priced, because wages and costs of materials are high and the sales and excise taxes are so heavy. The chances are it would take a fair-sized recession or depression to force them down to pre-war levels, and I am sure the government does not want either of those eventualities. The public possibly could take some more of this anti-inflation treatment if it were convinced that the government, while preaching, was doing a bit of practising, but the signs do not point that way.

Ottawa still keeps an army of temporary civil servants with no great display of economy. They are paid by taxes. Ottawa keeps expanding offices all over the country, competing for office space with business, and thus driving up rents. These inflated rents cannot help having some effect on increased prices. That is not the way to buck inflation, but it is the government way. The government does these things while it milks the average taxpayer. It says in effect, "You give your money to us. We do not want any inflation, no, sir, not in Canada, but it is O.K. if we do a little inflating of our own".

That is just about the way the public see it. The poor taxpayer would dearly love to have a little surplus of his own after listening to the surplus mentioned in this budget—$670 million. The taxpayer would even like to put a little bit away for old age. The conditions today for the average middle man are entirely different from what they were in the time of our fathers and our grandfathers.

I wonder if it occurs to the government that the average taxpayer today would like just that chance. It does not follow that if he got a cut in income tax and in other taxes he would buy all the scarce goods in sight. He might put away enough money so that he could retire and not be dependent on a $30 a month dole from the government, and I think that would be a good idea. The $30 might be eaten up as it is today when we are fighting inflation with the cost of living beyond the 150 index mark.

If the government must save us from ourselves, just as a means of siphoning money to prevent inflation, it should take the money not to spend it all itself but rather to give some of it back to the taxpayer. Compulsory savings were used in wartime for that purpose, and it could work today instead of having us robbed blind.

We have had comparisons of income tax with the United States, and according to the table that appears on page 4066 of Hansard there is little difference until you get over the $2,500 mark. That is as far as income tax is concerned. But it is the other taxes that we are concerned with.

We have the taxes on cars. We pay from $500 to $600 more for a Ford or a Chevrolet or a Plymouth and up to $800 or $900 on a Chrysler, above the price in the United States. That applies not only to cars but to many pieces of electrical equipment; one might say all of it. The same is true of farm machinery and many other items. When, therefore, we discuss taxation as between the two countries, I think the conditions are entirely different.

We must go farther than the actual income tax. Income tax today is, of course, doing nothing but taking the money out of our pockets so that we shall not have it to spend. That was done with the 25 per cent that was put on last fall on many goods; in fact, on almost anything you wanted to buy. That was done for exactly the same purpose. It is true that the government has taken the admission tax of 20 per cent off theatres and the tax off some of these other things such as pari-mutuels, but most of the provinces have put it right back on. Alberta is the only province I know of that has not. Ontario is doing it; Saskatchewan has done it, and most of the other provinces are doing it. Alberta is not putting that tax on. I think that is to their credit. The minister expressed the hope that the provinces would not, but I believe legislation was passed by most of the provincial legislatures some time ago to get the tax when it was released by the dominion government.

The eight per cent sales tax could very well have been taken off completely. That should have been done two years ago. At the present time it is taken off certain items. I am sorry the minister did not see fit to take it off soft drinks, chocolate bars and candies, as the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley) suggested. I think it is time the kiddies got back to their nickel drink. I have received many letters from manufacturers of soft drinks this year wanting this tax removed. I think the sooner that is done, the better.

There has been an announcement by the minister that interest will be paid on overpaid income tax. While the interest is very small, it may be some incentive, but I think the greatest incentive to make people pay the tax is the increase in the penalty. It is now up to seven and eight per cent.

The minister said, as reported at page 4067 of Hansard:

> It is also proposed to increase the penalty rates applying to unpaid taxes from the present 4 per cent and 7 per cent to 6 per cent and 8 per cent respectively. These higher penalties will provide an additional spur to the payment of the proper amount of tax on the due date and contribute to greater equity as between individual taxpayers.

It may and it may not. I often wonder why the government does not pay something on the money it has deducted through the payroll system. It used that money in some cases for fifteen months with no interest paid on it, and that amounts to a substantial sum quite often. It also treats the wage earner or the man on salary in a way different from that in which almost any other taxpaying citizen is treated.

I think that when anyone hires out for $150 a month, he is entitled to that. That is an agreement reached between him and the employer. But along comes the government and says that so much income tax must be deducted at the source. It is about time that was discontinued, unless the government sees fit to pay about the amount of the penalties it imposes, either six or eight per cent. If that were done, it would certainly help. I hope the government will soon see its way clear to stop that tax deduction at source.

Getting back to the 25 per cent that was put on last November, I would point out that there is one thing that is doing; it is discouraging buying. It has stopped people from buying what they wanted and what they have done without during the war years. I refer particularly to frigidaires, gas refrigerators, cars, and many other things. A few minutes ago I mentioned the tax that has been put on cars. I have here the opinion of an authority, the president of the Ford Motor Company of Canada, Mr. Greig. This is what he has to say in connection with the 25 per cent tax:

> The effect of "excessive" excise taxes on passenger automobiles eventually will be reflected in a dwindling market and must inevitably result in reduced employment in the Canadian motor car industry . . .

That is a statement by the president of the Ford Motor Company. Farther on he says:

> This onerous excise tax was piled on top of the eight per cent sales tax, which remained unchanged . . . The government made it clear that the purpose of this heavy tax was to hold down—discourage, if you will—the buying of passenger cars in Canada and thus to conserve a proportion of the United States dollars expended for imported parts and materials used in their manufacture.
> We strongly feel that effective import controls have removed the last vestige of need for an excessive excise tax as a means of conserving United States dollars. The fact that our national surplus is in the neighbourhood of $800,000,000 is a clear indication the excise tax on automobiles is not needed for purposes of revenue.

That is from a man who, I think, really knows what he is talking about.

While I am on that subject of the shortage of United States dollars, there is one other thing I should like to mention. It is reported in the press, of course, by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that the ban on the export of cattle to the United States may be removed in the near future. That is one way of easing the dollar situation. The large ranchers in southern Alberta—with ranches that run up to 5,000 and 6,000 head of cattle—all agree that that should be done. They are quite willing to accept the Canadian price, but there is one thing they want and that is to be able to hold that market. That is our natural market. It is a market we have always depended on, especially in southern Alberta, because we are far removed from the heavily populated centres. By removing that ban, I am sure the government would receive much assistance. I think I would be quite safe in saying that $100 million or perhaps $150 million would be received, depending on the number of cattle allowed to go into the United States. That is our natural market in that area. Those ranchers are certainly hoping to see that release.

Coming back to the eight per cent sales tax, I am reminded of a statement that was made in this house back in 1931 when the Conservatives sat to the right of the Speaker and the Liberals to the left. This is what the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had to say in 1931 in connection with the sales tax which was put on at that time:

> Where does my right hon. friend expect to get most of his taxation? He expects to get it out of the sales tax (4 per cent) and from the excise tax of one per cent on everything that comes into the country.
> What does that mean? The sales tax, as we all know, bears most heavily on the great mass of the people, yet the wealthiest people are receiving a partial exemption on their income tax, and that additional burden is placed on the great body of the people through the sales tax . . . This is the deathknell of everything in the way of freedom of trade!

Mr. JOHNSTON: And of the Liberal party.

Mr. WYLIE: I wonder if the Prime Minister spoke to the Minister of Finance before this budget was presented. I wonder what he thinks of the eight per cent sales tax now in the light of the statement he made when he was in the opposition in this house back in 1931? Times have a way of changing. I am quite sure that he feels that, now it is on, it might just as well stay there.

During this debate various subjects have been covered, and there is one that I want to mention in passing. It is our housing situation in this country. I want to make some criticism of the wartime houses that have been built in my city of Medicine Hat. We have seventy-five houses that are now just about completed and, Mr. Speaker, I would really call them shacks—but shacks that are costing, I imagine, between $5,000 and $6,000 each. There is no basement in them, as all hon. members know. Those houses are all rented to returned boys who went overseas and fought for us for five years. When they come back we offer them a house like that at a rental of $22.50 to $27.50 a month. I contend that those boys should have had something just a little bit better than that; and when they are paying their rental, I think it should be considered as another payment on a house they would eventually own. Some of those boys have come back without arms and without legs, moved into those houses and will be there for the rest of their lives paying rent.

I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) mention the trans-Canada highway. That is one way I can think of in which a part of that huge surplus could be used. It could be used in building a trans-Canada highway from one end of Canada to the other, that Canadians can use. On my trip home last year I covered part of it. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that between North Bay and Sault Ste. Marie it is a disgrace, and certainly is not doing our tourist trade any good. I have spoken to many Americans who have driven fifty or sixty miles on that highway, then turned around and gone back through the United States. That is poor advertising, and something it will take years to overcome.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni mentioned some very good points, and I hope the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), or whatever minister is responsible, will see fit to adopt some of those suggestions. On Monday morning of this week a motor cavalcade left Brandon on its way through to the coast. Those people stayed in Medicine Hat last evening and were to leave this morning. There were about seventy-five in the party when it reached Medicine Hat, where two more cars and ten other people were to join them. The party will continue on to Lethbridge, Nelson and right through to Vancouver, advocating the southern route for the trans-Canada highway. Those people realize that something must be done, and I think it is up to the dominion government, which has ways of collecting money that the provinces do not have. I believe this should be made a national policy, as it is in the United States. If we leave it to the individual provinces one may build a hard-surfaced highway from end to end of the province, while another will not; that is the situation at the present time. So it is to be hoped that something will be done in that respect.

Before I conclude, I want to touch upon a matter I have discussed in this house every year since I have been here. That is the question of irrigation in western Canada. Irrigation is very important to the people of the drought area, and when we see nothing being done year after year we wonder just what the intention of the government is in that regard. We realize that a start has been made on the St. Mary-Milk river dam, and we appreciate what has been done. That dam will cost a million dollars or more, but many other things have to be done in connection with distributing the water to be held in that dam, and the sooner a start is made, the better it will be.

The local branch of the Canadian Legion took up this matter at the convention in Saskatoon this week. They think the attitude of the government with respect to irrigation in entirely wrong; that is, dealing with it more or less as a relief measure. Irrigation is much more important than that, and should not have to wait until we have unemployment in this country.

The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) has told us about the sugar beets we could raise in that part of the country. If we had irrigation we could grow more sugar beets. Any vegetables that can be grown could be raised in southern Alberta, where we have ample sunshine. In addition, small fruits, all kinds of grains and grasses, hay and anything else you care to mention could be raised there, and I believe a greater effort should be made in this respect.

At the present time, of course, we have more or less to rely on the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. That has been of great assistance and is certainly appreciated by many farmers in that area. But for what they receive through P.F.A.A. bonuses many of those farmers would be on relief. I was just looking at the report of the Department of Agriculture for the year ended March 31, 1947, and I noticed that, since 1939, under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act the farmers have been paid almost $73,000,000. Of course Saskatchewan received most of that money; but when we consider what is being expended under that legislation, and when we consider what can be done by spending a few million dollars on irrigation, I believe the right policy would be to push ahead with irrigation just as quickly as possible.

Perhaps the government may want to use another method to make rain. Years ago we had a man named Hatfield in that area, and what he shot into the clouds to make it rain no one will ever know. A new method is being tested now, not only in this country but extensively in the United States; that is, the possibility of making it rain through the use of dry ice. I understand that the national research council is carrying on investigations along this line. Only the other day I had a resolution from the Medicine Hat chamber of commerce in connection with the use of dry ice for this purpose. This resolution was also sent to the government, and I hope they will study it very carefully. It is quite short, and I should like to read it:

> Whereas it is now publicly known that the dominion government of Canada is favourably disposed towards carrying out investigatory experiments in Canada of dry ice bombardment of clouds to create artificial precipitation of rain;
> And whereas the Medicine Hat chamber of commerce is firmly convinced that all that area adjacent to the Cypress hills in Alberta, which includes that of the city of Medicine Hat and district, is a district of heavy cloud formations during the greater part of the growing season;
> And whereas we feel that this is the logical point to carry out investigatory experiments;
> And whereas there appears to be the existing facilities for the said experiments, located in this area at the Department of National Defence experimental station, Suffield, Alberta.
> Be it therefore resolved that we urge that these experiments be carried on within this area as early as possible.

We have all the facilities at Suffield, which is a national defence experimental station. We also have plenty of clouds in that area. Of course I realize that, to make these experiments a success, the clouds must be of a certain formation and at a certain height; but I hope those experiments will be carried on in this district this summer. I assure the house we would all be glad to see it rain in the first two weeks of July. That is the time we always need it, so I would suggest that the government carry out their experiments toward the end of June or early in July. If they can make it rain I am sure the people of that area will be thankful indeed.

In conclusion, let me say it is up to the government to improve conditions, and this can be done through our democratic system of government. I believe that is the only way to do it. We must make conditions in this country such that we do not have to worry about communism or any other ism that might endanger us.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, the annual budget presented on May 18 by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is most disappointing to the average Canadian citizen. While the figures he set forth show a surplus of about $670 million for the past year, other adjustments bring that up to $727 million; and cash received from other sources added to the cash surplus brings the total up to $1,181 million, as mentioned by the minister.

With the high cost of living in Canada today, with the heavy taxation and with our dollar value at approximately sixty-five cents, these citizens of Canada are entitled to greater income tax exemptions than are now allowed in Canada. The federal tax in 1939 was $38.76 per capita, whereas today the federal per capita tax is $198. Last year the minister budgeted for a surplus of about $190 million, and the result at the end of the year was several times that figure. For the coming year the minister is budgeting for a surplus of approximately $489 million; I hope he is somewhat closer to the figure than he was a year ago.

In 1939, in round figures, there were approximately 46,000 civil servants with the government. Today there are over 150,000 persons in government employment in this country; and in that I include the civil service. We find a great deal of extravagance and wasteful expenditure of public money by the present federal government. The minister may say, "Where would anyone reduce those expenditures?" My colleague the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) spent a full forty minutes in discussing the national film board. I am not saying they do not render useful service, but I do say there is an extravagant waste of money in that set-up. The estimates this year show in this regard an expenditure of $3,537,000, or an increase of $776,518 over last year. I am sure that great savings could be made in this respect, and a useful service extended to the people throughout the country.

There has been sitting a special committee on prices, which committee many people across this nation believe is now a complete farce. Heavy expenditures are being made there to retain legal counsel, secretarial staff and help of other kinds. The committee has been sitting since February 10, and in those three and a half months has held about sixty sittings. The last statistical summary from the Bank of Canada sets forth the cost of living index, and it shows a steady increase from month to month up to the present time. That increase is still climbing, just as if the committee had never sat.

On May 24, as reported at page 4324 of Hansard the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) placed a set of figures on record, and his speech was referred to this afternoon by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley). I shall have something to say about the minister's speech somewhat later in my remarks. The figures placed on record by the hon. member for Brandon show that, during the years 1939 to 1947 inclusive, sums paid to farmers of Canada in subsidies, bonuses, freight payments and other payments amounted to no less than $528,979. The hon. member gave the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) great credit for having brought about all this legislation.

I am not arguing about the point the hon. member was attempting to make; but I take issue with the fact that he did not go farther and tell the plight of the farmers in his riding and throughout the Dominion of Canada because of the great loss they have suffered at the expense of legislation brought down by this government.

If we take all this into account, the difference during those years between what the farmer actually received for cereals, meats, dairy products and other products, and the average prevailing world market prices or United States prices is considerably over a billion dollars. In other words, the Canadian farmers have subsidized the consumers of Canada and of Great Britain with foodstuffs during those years to a value of over a billion dollars. That is a great contribution to be made by the agricultural producers of this country when one realizes that they were the only people so controlled during those years and the only producers in Canada today still kept in a strait-jacket by the government and forced to market under controls to certain designated countries, and that they are prohibited from shipping their produce to other countries because of embargoes imposed by this very government.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was discussing the amount which the agricultural producers of Canada had contributed since 1939 in subsidizing the consumers of this country and Great Britain. I want now to refer to the average losses suffered by the prairie farmers because of the United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement from August 31, 1947, to April 31, 1948, which is in the present crop marketing year.

A comparison between the revenue received by the Canadian farmers, including producer certificate payments of twenty cents a bushel which are now being distributed, and the price of class 2 wheat averaged by months, shows a loss per bushel for the 1947 crop to date of $1.50 a bushel. There were 127,305,668 bushels delivered in those nine months under the agreement, showing a loss of $191,891,763 for the first nine months of this marketing year. On the same basis, wheat destined for domestic consumption within Canada averaged a loss of $1.50 a bushel. There were 54,755,418 bushels delivered, showing a loss to the producers of $82,401,104. Thus the prairie farmers in wheat alone, in the first nine months of the 1947-48 crop marketing year, subsidized the consumers of Canada and Great Britain to the amount of $274,292,867. That is quite a figure. Remember, this is the second year of the United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement. The loss per bushel to the producers this year is almost double what it was in the first year of the wheat agreement. Those figures are on the record by the ministers of this government.

If the proposed international wheat agreement is carried into effect, it will be absolute proof that Canadian wheat producers will have no opportunity of regaining the hundreds of millions of dollars which they have already lost under present governmental marketing operations.

Producers within other exporting countries such as the United States, which will be a signatory to the international wheat agreement, received the benefit of prevailing world prices while they were at a reasonably high figure through these past years, and they took advantage of their situation. But the government of this country saw to it that our producers should not secure those prices. I have seen a copy of the agreement from Washington, and unless there are considerable changes made our producers will never regain any of this great loss which they have suffered. It is far too great a contribution to ask any one class of this nation to bear, much as we are agreed as to the necessity of keeping down the cost of living. Other methods could have been taken which would have assured that our agricultural producers would receive their fair share of the national income along with manufacturers and producers of other necessities of life in this country.

This afternoon the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), who was minister of finance during the war years when much of this legislation controlling the farmers was brought into effect, spoke in favour of the present budget. He said that he thought this government should follow the example of the United States government and budget to pay off the national debt. If that be true, why not budget consistently for this purpose? Why was this suggestion not made a year ago when the minister brought down the budget? But there was no indication of any such thing at that time. Last year's proposed surplus would not indicate that the thought had occurred to any member or official of the government. When the present Minister of Justice was minister of finance no member of the government was more responsible than he for certain regulations which put the producers of this nation in a strait-jacket which prevented them from receiving world prices for their products. I admit that he received a lot of advice from his colleagues, but he was responsible for the legislation which came under his department. And now he suggests that we should copy the United States. I think he might well be a party to seeing that our farmers shall receive assistance on the same basis as United States producers are receiving assistance today and have received it through past years.

The Canadian government have refused and are refusing to allow the export of agricultural products from Canada to the United States, despite the fact that this trade would correct a great deal of our United States dollar exchange difficulties which the Minister of Justice mentioned this afternoon. He and his colleagues are more responsible for our exchange situation today than anyone else I know.

I shall certainly support the amendment moved by my colleague the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) that "this house is of the opinion that the government does not possess the confidence of the country." So much for the budget, because I do not want to repeat arguments that have been made by other members.

During the past week-end and early this week it was my privilege, along with other members of the parliamentary committee on veterans affairs, to visit the city of Saskatoon and attend the dominion convention of the Canadian Legion which is now in progress. Upon our arrival there last Saturday, we were informed of the passing of a great Canadian. May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to speak of him as one of ourselves, Comrade Colonel J. L. Ralston. He was a man of great courage, high principles and sterling character. To those who were not privileged to sit in this house with him, if they want real proof of his courage and self-sacrifice I suggest that they read the speech delivered by this great Canadian in the House of Commons on the evening of November 29, 1944, which will be found recorded in Hansard of that year at page 6657. He certainly proved what a great Canadian he was at that time by his self-sacrifice.

Following the drumhead service on Sunday afternoon, and at the ceremonial opening of the convention on Sunday evening, the legion hymn was sung, "Old Soldiers Never Die, They Simply Fade Away," and there seemed to be more significance than ever in that hymn on that rather sad occasion. I was happy to think that the first business transacted at the business session on Monday morning was the passing of a resolution of condolence to the widow and son in the sad loss of a great husband and father.

As I sat on Monday and listened to the legionnaires in that great convention of over one thousand delegates deliberating on their problems, problems created as a result of two great world wars, and thought of the present worldwide international unrest that was referred to by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) when he pointed out that we might, on short notice, have to expend a great deal of money for national defence in this country, although it was not evident, this was brought home to me, Mr. Speaker, and I decided that it was my duty to avail myself of the first opportunity in this chamber to speak of the international peace garden. I want to compliment the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews), because on July 11, 1947, he cited the history of this undertaking. He made his remarks during the course of the discussion of the estimates on parks and historical sites under the Department of Mines and Resources, and I wish to compliment him on his fine presentation at that time. I thought he did a much finer job at that time than he did last Tuesday afternoon in his budget address. Certainly he did much more for the interests of his constituents as a whole whom he has the honour to represent, and the citizens throughout this country.

I have never before spoken on this particular matter, but I wish to say that the area of the garden consists of some 2,340 acres, 1,452 acres in Canada donated by the Manitoba government and 888 acres on the United States side, donated partly by Washington and partly by the state of North Dakota. This garden is situated in the Turtle mountains, a range of hills rising to some 2,500 feet above sea level. They extend forty-five miles east and west and twenty miles north and south, and are located midway along that great undefended 3,987 miles of boundary line between Canada and the United States, and midway along the southern boundary of the Souris constituency which I have the honour to represent at present in this house.

The international peace garden is incorporated under the laws of Manitoba and North Dakota, and has been recognized by both Canadian and United States governments. Further work on this project should be the responsibility of the federal government; first, because the whole proposal is international. The dominion government has already expended, through the province of Manitoba, approximately $52,000 on this area. It is interesting to recall a paragraph of the speech from the throne at the opening of the Manitoba legislature on February 29, 1932, under the leadership of Mr. John Bracken who has always been an ardent supporter of this garden, and is now the leader of the official opposition of the House of Commons. He said:

> A memorable event of the past year is the provision made for the peace garden in the Turtle mountain region of Manitoba and North Dakota. This international project ought to have a prominent place in the peace chronicles of the present era when every thinking person in the world is compelled to realize that one of the most important questions facing our civilization is that of world peace, friendship, and co-operation.

An editorial in the Winnipeg Tribune of that date said:

> It is a worthy, a splendid project, and one that has the enthusiastic approval not only of the people of Manitoba and western Canada, but of other millions in both countries . . . Some of the most magnificent monuments in the world have been erected to commemorate lost causes, vanished glories and ruined hopes. A peace garden, let us hope, will symbolize in its own living beauty, ever more cordial relations between the two countries.

On July 24, 1932 the official opening of the garden took place and people were assembled from great distances in the central west, both Americans and Canadians.

I should like to give a few facts concerning the present status of this international peace garden. First of all, as to the board of directors for this year, 1948, I will just give the principal officers. They are as follows: Honorary president: W. V. Udall, Boissevain, Manitoba; president: D. G. McKenzie, Winnipeg, Manitoba; chairman: John A. Stormon, Rolla, North Dakota; first vice-president: M. S. Colquhoun, Deloraine, Manitoba; second vice-president: Russell Reid, Bismarck, North Dakota; treasurer: Lieutenant-Colonel A. J. Robbins, 496 Ash street, Winnipeg, Manitoba; assistant treasurer: John A. Stormon, Rolla, North Dakota; secretary: Myrtle Baldwin, Rolla, North Dakota; assistant secretary: E. T. Johnson, Boissevain, Manitoba; assistant secretary: Henry Sunderland, Dunseith, North Dakota. There are some seventeen directors from all parts of the United States and Canada scattered throughout these two great areas, which speaks well for the people in that area. The booklet goes on to point out that for 133 years this great stretch of boundary line between Canada and the United States has been a boundary of peace without warship, fort, soldier or gun. It states that:

> Two great world wars, and the economic and financial problems arising therefrom, and possible military requirements in the future, are drawing these nations into continuous and closer collaboration and co-operation. This practical demonstration is proof positive that peace between nations is more than an idle dream; it is an accomplished fact.

Then it cites the various reasons why these sites were selected. One of the reasons was that of the natural scenic beauty of the area; second, the wide variety of trees, shrubs and wildflowers found growing there; third, the abundance of wild life, including birds, native to the district; fourth, the large number of small lakes located in the Turtle mountains; fifth, the location being almost the geographical centre of the North American continent; sixth, it being located on the only hard-surface highway running north and south across the continent, extending from northern Manitoba through the United States, down into Mexico, and extending into the countries of South America; seventh, no physical barrier, such as rivers, lakes, mountains or gorges, standing in the way of the free movement of people across the boundary in the area designated. Then it gives the pledge which appears on the plaque as follows:

> To God in His Glory
> We two nations dedicate this Garden and pledge ourselves that as long as men shall live, we will not take up arms against one another.

Then it says:

> In addition to a beautiful garden, our plans contemplate the erection of an international peace tower as a symbol of peace between our two great nations, and a suitable war memorial to the thousands of young men and women who gave their lives in the last two world wars in the defence of everything we hold to be dear in life. Associated with this memorial is to be a little chapel where friends of loved ones may seek comfort and consolation.
> Plans are being made for tourist accommodation, picnic grounds, public assemblies and recreational facilities.
> Customs and immigration offices will be erected on the site to facilitate the movement of people across the boundary.
> A great deal of public support is already manifest. Women's organizations, churches, service clubs, boards of trade, returned soldiers' organizations and many similar bodies, as well as a large section of the public, are evidencing a desire to help in the promotion of this worthy project.
> Large sums of money will be necessary. We are budgeting for $100,000 for 1948. Financial support must be forthcoming from governments, public bodies, business institutions and we hope from tens of thousands of peace-loving citizens.

There is much more in the booklet, but I do not want to take up the time of the house to read it.

More and more, may I say, will United States tourists be drawn northward by the magnetic attraction of our national parks. I noticed in the Christian Science Monitor of yesterday many pages devoted to the tourist trade, and the same newspaper on May 21 stated that in 1948 United States tourists are due to spend $15 billion. It sets out in a number of paragraphs the way in which this money will be spent, indicating that a good deal will be spent by tourists coming to Canada. The Canadian people are looking for a great part of that money which will be spent by tourists, and I do not know what could be finer than to have the bulk of these tourists come through that peace garden, with all that it signifies of sacrifice on the part of our peoples in the two world wars.

I wish to compliment the people who met from different parts of Canada and the United States and originated the idea, bringing about the organization and having it incorporated as they have done. May I emphasize the intriguing fact that, instead of being situated in the far east or in the distant west, this garden is located actually within thirty miles of the exact centre of the North American continent. Surely that is a fitting place for it, for this tall and commanding peace tower, proclaiming to the world the friendship between our two great nations.

Again I compliment the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) upon having dealt with the question so efficiently on the estimates last year. I could have waited and done so this year in connection with the estimates; but I thought it would be more effective, and I hope it will be, coming from him. I appeal to the minister to have this $100,000 set aside annually for a period of years to create what the board has in mind, in the Department of Mines and Resources, under parks and historical sites. If that is done, I trust that the minister will give this matter the just consideration which it so well deserves. Surely it befits these two great nations and the peoples of these great lands; and therefore I make an earnest appeal, on behalf of the people of Canada, that we play our part, together with the people of the United States, in furthering this fine project.

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, while the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) and I no doubt can readily agree that the farmers of the country throughout the years have not received a fair share of the national income, yet I believe I would be correct in saying that the two of us have arrived at that conclusion by a different process of reasoning. And while I have no desire to delay the continuation of the budget debate by going into details with regard to what my colleagues and I in this group, on different occasions, have presented to the house as to the reasons why the farmers have not been receiving their fair share of the national income, and our opinion as to what should be done to rectify that situation, yet when the hon. member for Souris was speaking I could not help thinking of the time when the party to which he belongs was in office, and when I sold wheat at the lowest figure at which I have ever sold it in my life.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): So they did all over the world.

Mr. BURTON: I will deal with that. I must say also that at that time I sold beef cattle, which were fit for the show ring, at such a ridiculously low price that it was a shame even to bother taking them to market. My hon. friend says that was the condition throughout the world. Yes, but we must remember that at that time there was a man high in the ranks of the hon. gentleman's party who promised the people of the country that he would blast his way into the markets of the world.

I cannot take time to discuss the many excellent speeches that have been made in this debate, but there is one to which I wish to refer, and that is the speech made by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) this afternoon. He seemed to be somewhat concerned about something going on in this province and I wish to put him and his friends at ease. If I could follow the hon. member for Broadview he said this: "One matter to which I would call the attention of the house is the practice of non-residents coming into the province of Ontario and taking part in provincial elections". Later on he said: "In almost every newspaper I pick up there are reports indicating that some of my hon. friends to the left have been going around Ontario addressing meetings". While quite fairly enough the hon. member expressed the opinion that we had that right, yet he questioned the propriety of our doing so.

I wish to put the hon. member at his ease and say that, so far as my colleagues and I are concerned, we do not go to any meeting in Ontario or in any other province of which we are not residents to address meetings unless we are specially invited by the people in those vicinities to go and speak to them. I also wish to assure him that on the odd occasion when I have accepted an invitation to address an Ontario audience I have made it quite plain that I had no intention of trying to tell them how to vote.

The hon. member should also remember that when people invite us to go and speak to them they have a right to know and to hear the story of Saskatchewan told by people who know the score; and if the hon. member for Broadview could assure us that certain people and certain interests in the province of Ontario would not go out of their way to distort the efforts our present government puts into solving our problems in the province of Saskatchewan, in all probability he would not be worried about so many of us taking part in speaking to the people.

Furthermore, may I say that if he could assure us that money from Ontario will not be used to try to influence the election in Saskatchewan during this coming month, then we could all feel a little more happy, especially if he could assure us that Trestrail and people of that ilk would not be using money that very often has been made off the industry of the people of Saskatchewan and of western Canada to tell us later on what is good for us, and in such a way that it is frequently obnoxious.

When the Minister of Finance, on the evening of May 18, delivered his budget address, I could not help feeling sorry that so promising a young Liberal minister should be placed in a position of such difficulty by having to present such a typical Tory budget. I must compliment the minister on having done a very good job on a very poor subject. I am quite satisfied that it was as distasteful to him as his budget is to the majority of the people of the country.

But my pity turned to amazement when a man who apparently adheres to the traditional Tory attitude, like the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), endeavoured to criticize the budget brought down by the present Minister of Finance. I could not help thinking that if the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario and his colleagues were on the other side of the house, in all probability, with the possible exception of a few minor details, they would have brought down a similar budget. We can be quite certain of the fact that it would not have been any better; in all probability it would have been a still more bitter pill for the common people of this country.

As time goes on, a person cannot help noticing that those people who prefix "progressive" to their party label are coming closer and closer to the Tories that are only Liberal in name; in fact, in some provinces of this country they are already in the same camp.

An hon. MEMBER: What do you mean?

Mr. BURTON: In my own province of Saskatchewan these people are in some places arranging saw-offs among themselves in an attempt to delay the march of progress.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Do they call themselves "Independents"?

Mr. BURTON: No.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is what they do in Alberta.

Mr. KNOWLES: They call themselves fusion candidates.

An hon. MEMBER: Confusion candidates.

Mr. BURTON: In some places they do not even go to that extent. One might say they are running on the same ticket. In dual member constituencies they have arrangements whereby one candidate will be a Liberal and the other one a Conservative.

Mr. KNOWLES: And you cannot tell them apart.

Mr. BURTON: That is just what I was trying to tell the hon. members; more and more is it becoming evident that one has greater difficulty in telling them apart.

When my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) moved the subamendment for our group and later on was followed by other colleagues from this group, not only did he and they place on the record our want of confidence in the government; the amendment also stated the reasons why and wherefor we considered that the government was doing a poor job. I will not endeavour to retrace all the arguments that have been brought out. I will not endeavour to search out any other defects in the budget. But as all hon. members will know, our case has been made clear and plain, and we have no hesitation in submitting the stand that we have taken to the people of this country.

May I refresh the memory of hon. members. When my leader moved his amendment, it was as follows:

> That the said amendment be amended by inserting after the word "government" and before the word "does" in the second line of the amendment, the following words:
> ". . . has failed to relieve the excessive burden of taxation on the low-income groups of the Canadian people:
> (a) By failing to increase the amounts of exemption from income tax from the present levels to $1,250 for single and $2,500 for married persons, and
> (b) By failing to remove or substantially reduce the burden of sales and excise taxes which bear most heavily on those suffering from low income and the present high cost of living.
> And further, the government has failed to establish a public investment board to assure the channelling of capital investment into socially desirable projects as a means of maintaining full employment, increasing production and raising the standard of living of the Canadian people, and . . ."

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that any progressive-minded member who is desirous of voicing the opinion of the people he has the honour to represent will certainly be obliged in his own mind to support that amendment.

An hon. MEMBER: That is what you think.

Mr. BURTON: While I could go on and aggravate the Minister of Finance by picking here and picking there at this umbrella budget, as some call it, and point out many other parts that are obnoxious to the people of Canada—in fact, I would say a great many features of the budget were not necessary—yet, what is the use? If by this time we have not convinced enough members on the other side of the house that the people of this country do not approve this budget, then, so far as I am concerned, I am prepared to take the vote and abide by what the majority decides. But let me say this much to hon. members through you, Mr. Speaker: the people of Canada are not satisfied and they will make good use of the opportunities that are presented to them to register their protests.

Before I resume my seat, there are one or two matters that I should like to deal with which are only indirectly connected with the budget. The first, I may say, was referred to by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) the other day when he was taking part in this debate; and today I believe it was again referred by some other hon. members, including the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Wylie). The hon. member for Comox-Alberni, as reported at page 4310 of Hansard of May 24, suggested this:

> 1. Set up a federal highway commission which would designate the highways to be considered as links in the trans-Canada highway system.

Later on he said this:

> Mr. Speaker, the creation of such a federal or trans-Canada highway board is a step which I am sure would meet with the approval of every member of this house, as may be confirmed by reference to speeches made by members on all sides during the past years. The arguments are too numerous and too well known for me to repeat them at this time, but I know that every Canadian looks forward to the day when there will be a highway across Canada, from sea to sea, from Yarmouth in Nova Scotia to Tofino on the west coast of Vancouver island.

I fully concur in that. I would go even further and say this. Our dominion government has let Canada lag at least fifteen to twenty years behind the times in not having provided for such a federal board of highway commissioners. That board, as the hon. member suggests, would endeavour to settle little, petty, local arguments as to whether this highway should run here or there. I would go even further and say that the federal government, even in this budget, should have made provision so that that board could have had the wherewithal to operate and be of assistance to the provinces in having a trans-Canada highway system constructed.

It is all very well for the minister to say, as he did in his budget speech, that this is not a time to branch out into some of these activities. I agree with him in part in that respect. But let me draw to his attention the fact that we have found it to be the case, not only in our farming activities but in our other business activities, that if you do not make use of good times in order to make your plans to revamp and repair your machinery, then, when the rainy day hits you, you will find yourself in a difficult position. That is why during the period often referred to as the hungry thirties, when we had men practically wasting away in relief camps, no such works were undertaken; nothing was ready so that they could start doing useful work. The excuse was that there was no money, whereas we should have had the machinery ready and should have had arrangements made for the materials and the necessary finances. If that had been done we would not be lagging behind our friends across the border by at least fifteen or twenty years.

As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni says, every Canadian is looking forward to the day when we shall have a trans-Canada highway from sea to sea. In my opinion a board of federal highway commissioners would, in the first place, work with the provincial governments to co-ordinate their activities in that respect, and could arrange material and financial assistance for them as well. They could also decide, for example, whether from Winnipeg on east, through that long stretch of unproductive country, it would be desirable to have a four-lane highway connecting with the central and eastern parts of our country, or whether it would be more desirable to have the highway branch out to cover different parts of that territory. If you look at a map you see that in all probability such a highway system would have to go through Winnipeg, which for more reasons than one is referred to as the gateway to the west. Practically, speaking, there is no other way to get to the west except through Winnipeg or by coming close to it. A little further west, however, you can branch out, and as you go further west you can go more to the north and still be in settled, productive territory. Here again I contend that we should not be satisfied with just a little ribbon of highway across the plains, which we may call a trans-Canada highway. We should have a system of highways adequate to take care of that great western plains country; and since highway construction in that area would be easy and comparatively cheap, there is no reason why we should not have both a southern route and a northern route.

However, Mr. Speaker, you cannot expect the provinces to do this. It is really a federal job. My own province of Saskatchewan has about thirty-eight per cent of the total surveyed roads of Canada, but at the same time we have only about seven per cent of the total population. How can we be expected to give proper road facilities and services to our own people and, in addition, do the job the federal government should do in providing a trans-Canada highway? So I repeat that even in this budget provision should have been made for such assistance to the provinces. We are endeavouring to do what is possible, but there is a limit to what the provincial governments can do. During the past four years new work undertaken and reconstruction work on highways in our province amounted to 1,680 miles, and this year a tremendous building program is contemplated. During the past four years we have regravelled approximately 4,000 miles of highways, and during the past three years we have tripled the total mileage of hard-surfaced roads in the province. Quite frankly, the total mileage of hard-surfaced roads was very much limited until a few years ago, but at least we have made a start in that connection.

The other question with which I should like to deal is also of vital interest to the people not only of my constituency but of practically all of western Canada; that is, the Hudson bay route. In the first week of August of last year the Hudson bay route association, in co-operation with the government of Saskatchewan and with the magnificent assistance of the Canadian National Railways, put on an excursion to Churchill. I had been wanting to go to Churchill ever since the road was opened, but something always interfered with my plans. I am happy to say, however, that last August I had an opportunity of making that trip; and I was so delighted with what I saw that if another excursion is held this year I want to make the trip again. At this time I should like to extend a hearty invitation to hon. members from Ontario and Quebec and the maritimes, who may have time to spare, to join us on that trip. If they do they will see for themselves that there we have not the white elephant a great many people would like to make it out to be. I can show them that, with the possibilities which now exist, if only we get a fair deal, the road, the port and the route will be an asset not only to the western provinces but to all Canada.

When the excursion train left Regina last August three ministers of the provincial government were on board, and I am happy to say there was also a member of the Alberta government, who, I believe, since has been called to his reward. In that connection I should like to make a suggestion to my hon. friends from Alberta. I noticed that Hon. Mr. Fallow had with him a very nice little movie camera, and I am sure he obtained many fine pictures. Possibly my hon. friends could intercede with the members of his family and make arrangements so that the Hudson bay route association might be able to use the films he took at that time.

Proceeding in a northerly direction the Hudson bay special stopped at Saskatoon, where many others joined the party. From there we went on to Prince Albert, where the citizens and the board of trade gave us a hearty welcome. They realize that even at Prince Albert we are not yet half way up the province. They know the tremendous possibilities for the development of that northern country.

From Prince Albert we went to The Pas, Manitoba, and again we were well received. From The Pas we had a side trip arranged for us which took us to the mining town of Flin Flon, on the border between Manitoba and Saskatchewan. I might add that we were keenly interested in this, and spent several hours in this mining and smelting town. I can assure hon. members that many of our prairie dwellers had a little better idea of the tremendous wealth in that northern section of western Canada.

May I add that in the sight-seeing trip I had the good fortune to be in a motorcar driven by one of the officials of the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company. Answering our questions he told us that, in so far as their experts and surveyors were able to ascertain, not only his children but his grandchildren would have no need to worry about the mineral ore being played out or depleted in their lifetime.

From 1940 to 1945, the war years, when we needed so much the production from our mines, this area milled 12,262,838 tons of ore. That produced 475,125,604 pounds of copper and 605,116,521 pounds of zinc, as well as some other valuable metals.

We had to return to The Pas to take the Hudson bay route which starts at The Pas and runs in a northeasterly direction. For the information of hon. members, let me say once we were on what is properly known as the Hudson Bay railway, in spite of our having only a freight locomotive of ordinary size drawing our large excursion train, the ride was most comfortable and agreeable. In fact neither the Canadian National nor the Canadian Pacific through northern Ontario is anywhere nearly as comfortable from a riding standpoint as is that stretch of road from The Pas to Churchill.

Between The Pas and Wabowden, the first divisional point outside The Pas, is an area in the neighbourhood of 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 acres of arable land awaiting settlement. In addition to that, there is a tremendous amount of forest products and products from lakes and streams, besides undiscovered and, in some places discovered but undeveloped, mineral resources.

Mr. MacNICOL: And a fine stand of timber.

Mr. BURTON: Yes, the hon. member is quite correct; there is a fine stand of timber. I contend that the Hudson Bay railway has the potentialities of making that port a paying proposition, just because of the natural assets in that part of the country.

Furthermore, when we got to Gillam, the next divisional point—and remember, this was in the first week of August—only 150 miles from Churchill, our train stopped for a short time for servicing, during which time the passengers on the excursion train got out to walk along the right of way, and they were picking ripe strawberries. That, in the first week of August!

Mr. BENTLEY: No cream?

Mr. BURTON: They were so delicious we could do very nicely without cream or sugar.

We proceeded north from Gillam. In that area are millions of horsepower going to waste because of a lack of development of the waterfalls and rapids which could easily be developed. When we arrived at Churchill almost all of us began to see the sights, which we covered as much as we could from that time until the following evening. Included in our sightseeing was the elevator. Incidentally, let me add that I was informed by some of the superintendents that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was responsible for some of the up-to-date equipment installed in that elevator. I was told that at one time, and in the space of four minutes, they can unload four carloads of grain.

Mr. CASE: The minister was active in private enterprise when he put that in.

Mr. BURTON: I would say that whatever the minister did because of his inventive genius and engineering ability is now given a chance to work for the people as a whole. He does not, like some other hon. members, always follow the line of private enterprise.

We have there an institution which is not a private enterprise, but it is a credit to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and to anyone else who had anything to do with the erecting of the elevator and the building of the railway.

We were invited to visit the airport and army base being operated at that place. Let me say to hon. members who are sometimes worried about our Yankee friends having a few people up at that base that in my view they are unduly alarmed. From what we had an opportunity to see, the men stationed there were being well cared for and were doing a job which must be done if we are to develop that northern country as it should be developed. While it is true that friendly relations might at times become too friendly, at the same time I would repeat that I do not think in this instance we have anything to worry about.

I took a number of snapshots along the line and at Churchill. We have not time to go into all these details, but I might add that, while there, we saw many of the so-called white whales. I mention this now because some time ago a good many people were excited about whale oil. Right there at our back door we have whale oil available, if we only make arrangements to secure it.

The trip back was arranged so that the train covered in daytime almost the same mileage we had covered at night when going up. The result was that we saw about all the territory and the surrounding country so far as it was humanly possible to do on such an excursion.

There was one thing that struck me forcibly on that trip. In the first place, there were very few young people on board. Most of us were either middle-aged or going on to advanced years. But everyone seemed to be determined to see as much as possible in the short time available. With very few exceptions, they were pioneers of the west, and the impression they gave me was that they had at last the opportunity to fulfil the dream of a lifetime by making a trip to their own port of Churchill on Hudson bay. For some of us it was the first opportunity we had of having our feet on the deck of a boat travelling in deep water, and it reminded me that those of us who travelled in prairie schooners in days gone by never got seasick.

The possibilities of trade between the prairie provinces and the maritimes are immense, and I hope, Mr. Speaker, that we shall continue to develop this route. I am satisfied that if it is given an opportunity to show what it can do, it will be an asset not only to the people of western Canada but to the country as a whole.

Mr. W. GARFIELD CASE (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, one of the interesting things about the budget debate is the notable travelogues to which we are treated, which give us a better appreciation of the great possibilities of Canada. But I could not understand just why the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton) referred to this budget as being an umbrella budget. I did hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), in presenting the budget, speak of laying something away for a rainy day. But my conception of an umbrella is something that gives you protection from what otherwise might be described as a thorough soaking, and I certainly do not feel that this budget measured up in any respect to that description. It might just as well be a totem pole as an umbrella for any protection it affords to the taxpayers of Canada generally.

I wish to comment briefly on the reference of the hon. member for Humboldt to a national highway. With all due deference to the present plans for beautifying Canada's capital, which, after all, is entitled to consideration because we are a proud people and want to make our capital as attractive as possible within due bounds, I can think of no more fitting memorial to the gallant sons and daughters of Canada than the building of a national highway across this country. As we are becoming more conscious of ourselves as a nation, surely we owe it to ourselves to guarantee that we can travel in our own country from coast to coast, without detours into another country and being compelled to declare what we are taking in and bringing out. At the present time many such detours are necessary.

The hon. member also referred to the vast areas beckoning the settler. As I listened to him I could not help wondering how the C.C.F. party would attempt to justify their bitter opposition to immigration, until we had housing and other comforts of life available for our new settlers. If we had attempted to build our future on that theory, Canada would never have been. Our forefathers came to this country with no homes to go to or anything else, but they were prepared to address themselves to the task of hewing homes for themselves out of the forest and suffering hardships and privation in laying the foundations upon which future generations have continued to build up this country. Theirs was not an easy task in any sense of the word.

I often think of that when I hear my C.C.F. friends criticizing the Premier of Ontario for his plan to bring into this province 7,000 immigrants a year, but apparently Ontario must now take a back seat to Alberta which has indicated a desire to secure 400,000 immigrants from the British isles in the next ten years. I agree with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that every effort must be made to bring these people to where the food is to be consumed rather than to assume that we can constantly be shipping the food to them in other countries.

I think I should say, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Finance has proved himself to be at least courageous, because a few nights ago he presented to the house and the people of Canada a budget which certainly is not popular in any part of Canada that I have had the opportunity to visit. Nor can I think it is very acceptable to the Liberal party, regardless of the fine effort made this afternoon by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), a former minister of finance, in seeking to defend the position taken by the present Minister of Finance.

But to prove, Mr. Speaker, that this government have no sound formula of budgeting for expenditures and receipts, in the three years I have been here they have always been hundreds of millions of dollars out in their anticipated receipts. The last budget brought down by the Minister of Finance was only about $700 million out. Two years ago, when the present Minister of Justice was minister of finance he was prepared to budget for a deficit. How times have changed! Now the Minister of Justice, when we are seeking to bail ourselves out of a difficult situation, recommends and endorses the present proposals of the Minister of Finance to budget for a substantial surplus. Just how much they know about what they are doing is hard to understand. For instance, I was amazed to hear the Minister of Justice say this afternoon that, by raising the succession duties exemption from $5,000 to $50,000, he had been astounded to discover that it would mean a loss of only $5,000,000 in revenue. After years and years in the portfolio of minister of finance, he was amazed to make that discovery! But a mere $5,000,000 meant something to people some time ago.

I can think back to 1932 in the province of Saskatchewan when the then provincial treasurer, Mr. Murdock MacPherson, carried on the affairs of that province with $12,000,000; and while Saskatchewan has many advantages today by way of social services, and such things as they are now seeking to tell the electors about, nevertheless last year it raised and spent more than $57,000,000. That is quite a far cry from $12,000,000. I suppose, so long as the people are getting some benefit from it, we must accept it.

However I am one of those who is not in any sense disappointed with the budget. I heard the stories on the street that there was likely to be a surplus of $750 million, and so on. I knew then that we were standing on rather thin ice. I knew that if the Minister of Finance was consistent, he could not lower taxation. I doubted whether he would be consistent, because there has been a lot of turning about on rather short notice in this House of Commons, but when he indicated to the House of Commons that his purpose in putting on the 25 per cent excise tax was to drain off purchasing power I knew that he could not be consistent and return anything to the people of Canada in the way of lessening taxation; otherwise he would be defeating the tax he had imposed by radio on November 17 last. Therefore I think we have just about what we might have expected.

I want to make this observation. I think it is a sad commentary, and it must mean a great deal to the Canadian people to know that we now have arrived at the place where, by interference and regulation, the government imply that they are no longer prepared to trust the Canadian people; that they must regulate their very lives; that they must draw off their purchasing power; in other words, that they must stem the trend toward inflation in this country. It seems to me so foolish to take the stand that we can regulate or beat inflation by draining off purchasing power. If the government had been anxious to serve a useful purpose, to play fair with the Canadian people, they would have reinstated, or so far as I am concerned they should never have abolished it, compulsory savings, if that was necessary, because then there would have been something laid by for a rainy day.

I am one of those who have come through the ranks of municipal government. We discovered long ago that if a municipality were allowed to budget for substantial surpluses the natural tendency would be to find some place to spend that money. That is the general trend when you allow governments to build up huge surpluses; and with an election in the offing next year, or possibly before that—although I doubt whether they would dare face the Canadian people on a budget such as that brought down in this house recently—it could be possible that a great many favours might be provided by the huge surplus indicated.

Of course, if the Minister of Justice was correct in suggesting that this surplus might be continued for a number of years, I suppose from a purely economic point of view, there might be some justification for the attitude he was taking. I have at least been consistent in this regard. Even last year I urged the government to give evidence of faith in our country by budgeting for a deficit, because I felt that it would indicate to all and sundry that we had faith in our people and in our productive capacity. The productive capacity of Canada is positively immense; but as long as we hamstring the people with intolerable taxation we shall have this degree of labour unrest, we shall have this sense of confusion and lack of direction which is evident at the present time on all sides by our businessmen, and we are more apt to have a higher degree of inflation than we would have if we were to build up our productive capacity. In other words, up to the present time the people have been living in expectation of something they have not received.

One can understand that with the cost of living increasing, with taxation at an all-time high, with a huge surplus, which the government boast is the greatest on record, and yet no evidence of tax relief, it has a deadening and sickening effect on the whole Canadian economy; because, after all is said and done, it is all right to boast of surpluses; it is all right for the Minister of Justice to be critical, but by the very motion that has been made by the financial critic of this party we say that we have no confidence in this administration, and therefore we certainly have no confidence and trust that the surplus the government are seeking to take from the Canadian people without any sense of direction will be spent wisely. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, nothing would have done more to stimulate production at the present time than to have cut straight across our taxation barriers and to have taken this country out of its present dilemma.

All through the budget address, and again this afternoon in the speech of the Minister of Justice, I heard many references to the United States of America. I have nothing but the greatest admiration for our great neighbour to the south, but I do not think our Canadian people should be poured into a mould and held in a strait-jacket just to satisfy some foolish whim we might have with respect to the United States economy.

[Mr. Case.]

For instance, this afternoon the Minister of Justice said, in effect—and I am not going to quote him exactly—if we had kept our dollar at par that we would be going into debt to a foreign country. Let us see how well the present administration have succeeded in that regard. I want to remind you, Mr. Speaker, and this House of Commons, it was not very long ago that, for the first time in history, Canada borrowed $300 million from a foreign power. This is the first time we have ever been in debt to a foreign government. If the government feel that their present policy is succeeding, I for one fail to recognize it.

The minister spoke of United States citizens who bought our bonds as a good investment. Certainly they bought those bonds with a $1.10 dollar. They bought those bonds on speculation that the Canadian dollar would return to par, and they sold those bonds back on the Canadian market in such numbers when the dollar was at par that the Bank of Canada was forced to lower the bids on Canadian bonds. That was what the Canadian investor had to pay for our regard for the United States economy.

What we want, Mr. Speaker, is an honest dollar. That is my plea tonight. The moment you build an artificial structure under your money you are affecting the whole basis of your economy. I think I have had sufficient experience to be able to labour that point if I cared to do so, because it is not a question of where you are going to nail this dollar. We had a tremendous trading advantage, a trading advantage in the markets of the world. So long as the United States dollar was accepted as the standard of value, all the markets of the world lay open to us. It is all right to say that we would have bought less from Great Britain or that the British exporter would not have had the same access to our markets. I fail to see that, if the United States dollar remained at the standard value of $1.10.

In other words, the greatest advantage any nation possesses is the right to regulate its currency in relation to its trading advantages in the world's markets. I suppose that is one reason why the top-heavy influence at Bretton Woods and the international bank determined that no country could depreciate its currency by more than ten per cent without the consent of the bank; but Canada was in a very strategic position. We had a ninety cent dollar to go into the bank with, which by the same token would provide us with the right of devaluing that dollar still further. In other words, we could not have an eighty-one cent dollar.

It does not have the same effect on the home market. Just imagine what the Minister of Justice said this afternoon—that they levelled the Canadian dollar because of the tendency toward inflation in the United States. He said that our Canadian importers were buying larger quantities in that market because they feared inflation, and right on the very eve of the time they feared inflation most he said to Canadian importers, "Here is another ten cents on your dollar; go and buy more and more." So why would they not drain off more United States dollars? The government bonused the purchase of goods in the United States by adding that ten cents on. The proof of the pudding is in the eating, and we have discovered that by our interference with the true level of our dollar, by our interference with the desire to have an honest dollar, we have interfered with our whole internal economy. There was no cry from the gold mines or the basic producers before we levelled the dollar. Now that we have levelled the dollar, we have to have a group of bureaucrats going up and down the country checking the books of the gold producers to find out how much gold they have produced in a certain basic period in order that they may be entitled to the bonus which the government says is in store for them.

Last but by no means least—I tried to copy this as carefully as I can, and I believe I have it verbatim—the Minister of Justice said: "But it would be undesirable, I feel sure, having in mind public opinion in the United States, to have a situation arise such as this: that the people in the United States should be keeping their taxes up to the high levels they have now attained, and that Canada, not contributing toward European recovery by way of credits, should seize the opportunity to push her taxes down and cash in on the situation in such a way that we would inevitably be severely criticized and penalized by others."

I do not think there ever was a time in history when the United States had to lean upon the philanthropic attitude of the Dominion of Canada. Generally speaking, they have been able to forge ahead for themselves—as a matter of fact, a little too much so—and it is a sad commentary that our government was so much concerned about the economy of the United States, who today are looking for markets for their goods and trying to have someone drain off their dollars in order that they might return as purchasing power. It is, I say, a sad commentary that we should be so much concerned that we would feel that we were taking advantage of them by pushing our taxes down. It is a most unfortunate fact, but all Canada is to be penalized because the United States dollar or the United States tax rate is not lower.

The minister forgets, although he made some comparisons, that income taxes are much lower federally in the United States than in Canada. He was inclined to confuse the issue by introducing a note with respect to state taxes. There are other things he overlooks: for instance, the fact that a motor-car of the same manufacture costs from $600 to $900 less in the United States than it does in Canada. We are paying a very fine price for our tie-in with the United States economy.

I certainly wish to do everything in a co-operative sense so that we may carry on together; nevertheless this country offers a great challenge to everyone, and when the minister seeks to fix our Canadian dollar at par with the United States, I resent very much his interference with the natural flow of trade and the placing of a 25 per cent embargo or restriction or excise tax on the Canadian dollar in the home market because, he says in effect, our dollar is worth 100 cents in the United States market. After all, this is a mere joke because our Canadian dollar is discounted at as high as fifteen per cent in a neighbouring city like Buffalo. He says that our Canadian dollar will be held at par in the United States markets, but by the same token he says it is worth only seventy-five cents in the home market in Canada.

I say to the government: If that is your idea of providing an incentive for Canadian producers; if that is your idea of providing more take-home pay for the worker in industry; if that is your idea of giving our farmers a break, then it will be written in history that it is the best formula you had to offer. But I think our people are entitled to a better break than that, particularly our farmers; and I plead on their behalf, because I like to feel that I am their spokesman in this House of Commons in so far as I represent them in my riding. I plead that they be given a larger exemption in respect of income tax than is generally provided for other citizens.

You may say that this is difficult to work out, but the Minister of Justice put ideas into my head. He said that huge surpluses did not go to cabinet ministers. I never thought they did, but he suggested it. Well, they have provided $500 more in the way of exemption for those of sixty-five years of age and over, and it does seem to me that a larger exemption for farmers can be justified, because the farmer and his family all contribute to the welfare of their enterprise, no matter how small the individual share may be. I can remember as a boy seven years of age working on the farm, when I first learned to milk and to help to look after dairy cows. No matter how small the individual's share may be, they all play their part; and I think the government would be making a fine contribution, something that would be greatly appreciated by our farmers, if they fixed the exemption for farmers at a higher level than that accorded other classes, having regard to this one example I have given, where all the members of the family contribute to the family income.

Another thing I should like to see dealt with is this. I would make sure that this disability with respect to married women was removed. Only this government could think of a scheme like that, whereby they treat married women in a different class from other citizens. They say in effect, "You as a married man will have an exemption of $1,500, but if your wife has an income of over $250 you will deduct from your normal exemption the excess she has over $250."

That, too, has a restraining effect on the contribution married women could make, particularly in hospitals and in other fields of endeavour, and it is unfair. I do not think any married man would object to paying his tax on the basis of a single man if his wife had a taxable income, and no one other than this government could think of a deal of that kind whereby they charge a man a luxury tax for having a wife who has an income.

Another thing I am greatly concerned about is this. There is in effect, on the statutes of the country, a law which provides that every person must accept the family allowance. In making that statement some time ago, the Minister of Justice, then minister of finance, said it was not compulsory. It is not compulsory, but if you do not take it they will say you have taken it anyway. How will you get out from under? I do not think it is fair, and I suggest that there should be a certain level, say $3,000 or something like that, beyond which one would not be required to accept the family allowance unless he cared to do so.

The family allowance is something I have been inclined to criticize, not so much the benefits provided as the administration of it. I still feel that it was wrong in the first instance. I feel that the dominion government should have passed enabling legislation, so that any provinces which wanted to take advantage of the family allowances could have passed the necessary legislation to bring themselves within its influence. The administration then would have been provided through the present social service set-ups within the provincial governments, through that of the old age pension and the mothers allowance. But no. We have now a unitary system and it is bad for this country. Dual administration would have been much better; because I am not too sure but that the time may come when those who are probably a little more radical than even the Liberals may bid for votes on an increase in family allowances, and hon. members can see just how dangerous it may be. So I feel that there is room for adjustment there. I would certainly plead with the government to give consideration to that particular phase of our economy.

In closing, may I say I feel that the government should give immediate consideration to the references made by the hon. member for Humboldt to our vast resources. Certainly we have there an opportunity to provide something by way of leadership for our people, to encourage them to roll back our great frontiers and to benefit by the rich resources of the nation. Those resources can be turned to good account by providing our people with the services and other securities they are looking for.

Recently some of us, while guests of the board of trade of the city of Toronto, were privileged to visit Sunnybrook military hospital. That is a remarkable institution. There are miles of corridors. It covers acres of ground, and I understand that it will cost, when completed, between $7,500,000 and $9,000,000.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): How much?

Mr. CASE: Between $7,500,000 and $9,000,000, I understand. But it will provide a haven for over 900 veterans. It is a marvellous institution and certainly is a tribute to those who conceived the idea of it and those who brought it into being. It was one of the highlights of our trip. When I think of what can be done for the benefit of mankind just with money, I certainly would urge this government to do everything in their power to encourage the development of our vast resources, in order that they may be processed and exploited for the benefit of mankind. I am one of those who believe that we have a perfect right to exploit our natural resources for this day and generation, provided that we replace the replaceable resources so that those who are yet to come may enjoy some of the same advantages that we enjoy. But I believe that this government could give greater leadership and could inspire our people to greater heights.

When I think of the reference made by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech to building up a surplus because of the unfortunate international situation which might lead to greater requirements for armed services, I think that is just about the poorest excuse for a surplus I ever heard of in my life; because we could not budget for enough, in anticipation of what might be before us, to maintain an army in the field for thirty days, if war ever breaks again; and God help us if it does. It will certainly be a war of survival, and it will take more than the present finance minister's budgets and surpluses and everything else to save mankind. The thing is to bring to our people some degree of relief at the present moment, and to budget so that they will throw off the shackles of burdensome taxation, exercise their God-given freedom, enjoy some degree of enthusiasm and develop their ambitions to provide this country with the productive capacity of which I know it is fully capable.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): With very much of what the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Case) has just said, Mr. Speaker, I find myself in agreement. It is unfortunate that we do not hear more speeches of that character from my hon. friends to the right, and I shall have something to say about that a little later on.

One thing apparently that the public as a whole is agreed upon is this. There is general disappointment with the budget of 1948. Some of the newspapers have called it the "vinegar" budget, perhaps owing to the removal of the tax on spirits which go into vinegar. Others have called it the "black" budget. But it has been generally agreed that this budget has not been a satisfactory one so far as the people of Canada are concerned. What the reasons are for that I will not at this time enumerate, because they have been mentioned by others. We might perhaps look behind the scenes a bit and find out from where the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has been receiving advice in connection with fiscal policy. I have in my hand an excerpt from a newsletter which is called the Letter Review, published by the Review Company of Fort Erie North, Ontario. It is dated February 9, 1948. This is a leaflet which comes through the mail to all members of the house and which, to my mind, is one of the most reactionary pieces of literature I ever saw. This is the advice which was handed out, and I quote it because it happens to coincide closely with the attitude of the finance minister:

> Inflationary pressure, as it affects the price of the necessities of life, does not arise from excessive purchasing power on the part of the few, but from excessive purchasing power in the hands of the masses.

So says this Letter Review. Then it goes on:

> A government which proposes to use fiscal machinery for the relief of inflationary pressures has to start out by imposing unpopular taxation where it will hurt most, not by silly attempts to tax where it will hurt least.

The import of that, of course, is that the finance minister is being advised to tax the masses of the people, as they describe them, who have, in the opinion of the Letter Review, too much money to spend. Of course the figures given in this house yesterday evening by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) completely disprove that premise, because he proved in figures that the large majority of the people of this country do not have too much money to spend. It appears to me that the Minister of Finance has accepted that advice and has been using the fiscal policy of this country to extract still more money from the people in the lower income brackets rather than going for it where the money actually is. I should like to quote, too, an opinion as to the condition of affairs in this country by a person who, I think, will be accepted by the members of the Liberal party as somewhat of an authority on Liberal policy. I refer to Hon. Stuart Garson, Premier of Manitoba. This appears in a publication entitled The Canadian Liberal, and published under date of "Spring, 1948." I suppose it is a quarterly publication, and this is the most recent issue. In that journal Premier Garson has this to say about Canada:

> . . . Canada today
> (1) has no national social security program;
> (2) has no national public investment program . . .
> (4) still has overlapping old age pensions administration;
> (5) still has overlapping three-way responsibility for relief, which in the depression of the 1930's was disastrous to the municipalities and the provinces;
> (6) still faces a complete lack of co-ordination in the efforts of ten different governments to combat any future depression communicated from the outside world.

Then this significant paragraph appears further on:

> The enemies of our democracy could not devise an argument against it more persuasive than the conditions of governmental confusion and frustration in this country in the 1930's. Today free society is under savage attack. Why should we, by our inertia, reduce its defences?

Those words by the Premier of Manitoba are as strong as need be used to point out that again the government is following a policy of drift and laissez faire, and is making no plans whatever for the future. For this reason the members of the party with which

I am associated decided to move an amendment. We now have before the house the amendment moved by the official opposition, which says in short that the government no longer has the confidence of the country. We felt that was inadequate, because it is quite obvious that sitting in the opposition we would not have much confidence in the government ourselves, but we wanted to set out why we feel the government has not the confidence of the people as a whole.

So our amendment sets out what I think are constructive proposals, which may be summarized in these words. We suggest: first, that the government take action to raise the exemption levels for taxation purposes to $1,250 for single persons and $2,500 for married persons; second, that they remove or substantially reduce indirect or hidden taxes such as the sales tax and the excise tax, about which I shall have more to say later; third, that they launch a program of public investment designed to expand industry, particularly in western Canada, and channel investment into socially desirable fields such as the building of homes; fourth, that they balance and stabilize the Canadian economy by controlling prices of consumer goods and reducing the cost of production for Canadian agriculture. I believe those four proposals summarize what the people of Canada are today asking the government to do.

I need not take up more time in discussing the budget itself, because what I have already said and what has been said by the members of this group constitute our criticism of and also our alternatives to the budget proposals. The remainder of the time at my disposal I should like to devote to a reply to some of the statements which have been made by some members of the Progressive Conservative party, particularly the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), who spoke on May 24. I do this, not because I wish to approach this discussion in a spirit of political phlebotomy, but because the members of the Progressive Conservative party have gone out of their way within the last three or four days to criticize rather severely the C.C.F. and, I think more or less unfairly, to attack the C.C.F. party as being connected with some subversive forces in this country, or something of that sort. They have made statements which in my opinion must be answered; otherwise the country may get the impression that the statements are correct. What I have to say will be said in a kindly fashion, because I have many good friends to my right whom personally I like very much; but because I disagree with the opinions they have expressed and because I wish to correct their statements, it will be necessary for me to refer to what they have said; and I hope they will take it in the spirit in which it is given.

The hon. member for Eglinton began by saying that the government is falling into line with the socialist philosophy, as he called it, of the managed economy. I shall quote directly from his speech, to be sure I do not misrepresent what he said. At page 4320 of Hansard he used these words:

> This managed economy idea is of the essence of socialism. The socialists believe in the managed economy.

Let us have a word on this question of managed economy. You know the trouble with a great many slogans and catchwords is that when they go out, well trimmed up, they may sound quite evil and sinister, when actually they may be very innocent. In its essence, what is a managed economy? Surely even the hon. member for Eglinton would not get up in this house and argue for a mismanaged economy or one that is not managed at all. He would admit that management is necessary in the affairs of the country in much the same way that management is necessary in the affairs of our daily life. What he appears to object to, if I understand him correctly, is the government having any hand in managing the over-all affairs of the nation. Rather, it appears to me, he would favour allowing the so-called forces of free enterprise, supply and demand and so on, to act by themselves in a sort of vacuum, with checks and balances supplying the answer.

I suppose that is a perfectly sincere view, and he is entitled to it; but let me refer him to a statement I find in an interesting little book entitled "John Bracken Says", which was published in 1944, just before the election. The leader of the opposition, at that time not yet a member of this house, was discussing agriculture. It is quite true he did not use the words "managed economy", but this is what he did say; and before I read it I want to say that I agree with him. At page 132 he said:

> What do I mean when I speak of guaranteeing the farmer against income fluctuation? I mean simply this: that the farmers, as a producing section of our population, shall receive their proportionate share of the national income of the country—a small income should the nation's income be small, and a proportionate share if it be large—a proportionate share, based on the number of people working on farms. That includes farm operators and farm workers.

How would anyone go about giving the farmers a proportionate share of the national income in an unmanaged economy? Surely, if the hon. member were going to carry out this promise and make it good to the Canadian farmers he would need to have some control over the affairs of the country, not only over the agricultural economy but over all the other things that enter into production on the farms. Then he continues, using that awful word "plan", and says:

> The plan will, at the beginning, be applied to the more important farm products, and will be extended as rapidly as possible to cover the whole field of production in agriculture and other food products, including fish.

As I said before, I agree with the leader of the opposition that the agricultural population of the country is entitled to its fair proportion of the national income; but I do not see how anyone assuming power in this country could make good on that promise unless he were to assume a certain amount of control over the national economy. If the leader of the opposition ever did come to power I am sure one of the first things he would have to do in order to carry out this promise would be to repudiate the philosophy of the hon. member for Eglinton and those who agree with him.

I shall refer to that question again later on, but now I want to come to another matter. The hon. member for Eglinton and some other speakers to my right have been having a real field day talking about socialism, communism and matters of that kind, and have made quite an attempt to link up the communist party with the C.C.F., using, if you please, as an authority some statements by Tim Buck. It seems strange that they would use him as an authority when it suits their purpose, but will not believe him at any other time. I want to refer them to something, and I do so because it is so easy to make statements and attacks of this kind. Just because Tim Buck happened to say that in his opinion the communists should vote for a certain party, ipso facto the hon. member for Eglinton takes that to be the gospel. I would not be so sure. I have here a clipping which dates back to about 1942, and which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press. It reports a meeting at Massey Hall, at which the leader of the communist party, Tim Buck, was present—this was at the time the communist party was banned—and the then premier of Ontario, Mr. Hepburn. Then, if you please, the third member on the platform with Mr. Buck was—well, let me quote from the clipping:

> In addition to the premier and Mr. Buck, speakers included Leopold Macaulay, conservative member of the Ontario legislature for York South.

Incidentally the purpose of the meeting was to urge that the ban on the communist party be lifted. Does this mean that Mr. Hepburn and Mr. Macaulay are communists?

Mr. ADAMSON: What date was that?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: It was 1942. Nor does it mean that the communist party was going to vote for these gentlemen at the next election, or vote for them in any other election, just because they happened to be on the same platform that night. I would not say so. They were there because they all agreed on something. Incidentally the C.C.F. did not have a man on the platform, apparently, while the other two parties had. But to attack the C.C.F. for things which are much more innocent than that is, in my view, unfair, and taking advantage of catchwords and slogans which do not add to any party's reputation.

While I am on the subject, I should like to refer to the answer made in the Windsor Star by Mr. Cameron, who made an extensive study and wrote articles on this question of communism, and the cure for communism. He said this:

> There is no cure for communism because communism is not a disease; it is a symptom. It is an expression of the vast unrest that permeates all the people of the world not excepting our own, as the result of the moral, spiritual and economic breakdown of bourgeois capitalism.

That might give us something to think about. Instead of going around accusing each other of communism, I think we should go to work to erect a new structure to replace the breakdown of capitalism, go about it seriously, and be willing to co-operate with each other.

Hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party should realize that when they attack socialism and when they attack the system which now exists in Great Britain, New Zealand, Australia and some of the Scandinavian countries they are not doing any good to the world, that indeed they are doing it immeasurable harm. In all these areas the people have got together, and in a democratic way have elected governments which, in their opinion, are applying a correct policy. It is not adding to the good will of the world, or to the good will in any democratic country when people go out and attack a political system just because they happen to be in disagreement with it; and then link it up with communism or with any other old thing in order to smear it and blacken its name. I do not think it is good either for democracy, for progress or for any of the things which hon. members in this house profess to support.

I should like to quote briefly from some authorities who deal with this question of socialism and whom I would much rather accept than the spokesmen of the Progressive Conservative party, or anyone who believes the way they do.

For example, the late Archbishop of York, William Temple, said this:

> The vast system of beliefs, practices and policies which may roughly be called western civilization . . . was admirably adapted to the production of wealth and power. But its motives were non-Christian, self-interest, competition, the struggle of rival forces. If it is to be a blessing, not a blight, its motives must be transformed.

There was a man who was not afraid of progress, who was not afraid to call a spade a spade. He saw the structure of the capitalist society going in the wrong direction, and said that its motives should be transformed—which is exactly what the C.C.F. is advocating.

Then we have the Papal Encyclical of 1931, in which Pope Pius XI said this:

> You assuredly know and lament the ultimate consequences of this individualistic spirit in economic affairs. Free competition is dead; economic dictatorship has taken its place. Unbridled ambition for domination has taken its place. Unbridled ambition for domination has succeeded the desire for gain; the whole economic life has become hard, cruel and relentless in a ghastly measure.
> It is rightly contended that certain forms of property must be reserved to the state since they carry with them an opportunity for domination too great to be left to private individuals without injury to the community at large.

I say again that here we have an expression of opinion from a disinterested party, one who is not interested in politics as such but who advises perhaps the largest single unit of faith on earth, that the system which we term capitalism, because of the results it has produced must be changed in certain respects, and he goes so far even as to suggest certain fundamental changes. Surely we are not so small in this parliament as to oppose progress just because someone calls it socialism.

I wish it were possible for us to drop all the old slogans and all the old names, because I am sure we would be surprised at how much common ground we would find among ourselves. Hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party, such as the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) have risen in the house and advocated public ownership of public utilities such as telephone systems. Other members of the same party, perhaps in a disguised form, perhaps in a form which they themselves did not recognize, have advocated socialism in the house. In spite of the arguments they used against the Canadian wheat board, when the question was put to the house they voted for it. This is another method of doing something collectively which cannot be done individually. In other words, the whole membership of the House of Commons has been going toward what might be described as a socialistic system—and I hesitate to use the word because it antagonizes some hon. members. But actually what we are working toward is a system of co-operation. We are replacing the system of competition and rivalry and cutthroat business practice by a system of co-operation and doing collectively what cannot be done individually.

Call it what you like. We of the C.C.F. call it democratic socialism, and we are attacked for it. Other hon. members must realize they are advocating the same thing, only they have not attached the same name to it.

I come to a quotation from the Roman Catholic hierarchy of Saskatchewan in 1934 which states:

> It is abundantly clear why the church condemns and abhors the abuses of the materialistic capitalism of our industrial age with its consequent unemployment for the masses and huge fortunes for the few. These evils are so well known that we are saved the trouble of listing them here. Suffice it to say that materialistic capitalism is so un-Christian in its philosophy and evil consequence that it must give way to a reconstructed social order based on Christian principles.

What language could be stronger than that? Again it comes from a source which does not take sides politically, but it is sincerely advising its people to be bold enough and to have the spirit of the pioneer to go out into new systems to see if they cannot improve their conditions.

Finally, from the United Church report of 1939 we find this as part of the report of the social service committee of that church:

> We are driven to the conclusion that the only thing that will solve our present day social and economic problems will be the absolute Christian socialization of the means of production and distribution of all the necessities of life

There again we find the word "socialization" used. Immediately someone will say, "they mean that the government should take everything over and that everything should be state-owned". Of course it does not mean that. Socialization of the means of production and distribution does not necessarily involve state ownership, nor does it even necessarily involve public ownership in its various forms. But it means that the methods of production and distribution shall serve the ends of society as a whole. That is why the word "socialization" is used. It means the socialization of the motive for which things are done. Instead of things being done for profit, the future motive should be to serve the public, the community, society as a whole.

With these authorities before us, surely no one in the house or elsewhere would seriously attack socialism. Whether they agree or do not agree with the methods which the C.C.F. would use to bring about a spirit of co-operation and good will, surely they cannot disagree that these principles are supported by the greatest spiritual and moral authorities on earth.

I go on to another term which has been bandied around, and that is paternalism. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) and the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) said they were opposed to paternalism creeping into the affairs of this country. What is paternalism? The dictionary meaning of it is, anything done in a fatherly way. I do not know why anyone should object strenuously if the government wants to be a father, provided that it does not use the rod too often.

But for the Progressive Conservative party to object to paternalism would be funny if it were not so tragic. We know the history of the tariff structure in this country. We know it was a Conservative prime minister back in 1878 who started the first real tariff wall in this country which exists today, and which governments since then have continued in some modified form. In 1855 in this country we had reciprocity with the United States, which was ended in 1866 because of certain things done by Sir Alexander Galt in 1859. In 1878 Sir John A. Macdonald came out with what is called the national policy. In his opinion it was necessary to set up a tariff structure to prevent manufactured goods from coming into this country so that our own manufacturing industries could get a start.

That system has been extended in different forms. One government would bring the tariff down a little and another would raise it a little bit. Under the Bennett administration we had the highest tariff structure ever in this country. If that is not paternalism I should like to know what is.

How many members of the Progressive Conservative party would say they would favour the removal of all tariffs so far as Canada is concerned? The silence, Mr. Speaker, speaks for itself. There is not one. They are all in favour of paternalism when it comes to the protection of industry, and perhaps they have something there. But why should they attack the government or the C.C.F. because we wish to do something for the other people in this country? There again a term is used without much thought being given to its meaning.

I want to come a little closer and grapple with the question of the sales tax. The hon. member for Eglinton worked himself into quite a lather over the sales tax. He called it a plunder and other words which I do not wish to use because they were not well received by the Chair. What is the record? Why should the hon. member get so excited about it? The record is here. In 1930 the sales tax stood at one per cent. The Bennett administration came into power and in 1931 raised the sales tax to four per cent, and in 1932, to six per cent. In 1935 the Liberal administration came back and raised the sales tax to eight per cent in 1936. There is the history of the sales tax, pure and simple, for everyone to read.

Mr. GARDINER: It goes back farther than that.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Yes, I could start at zero instead of one per cent.

Mr. GARDINER: You could have started at six per cent earlier than the year you first mentioned.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: It was raised to six per cent by the Conservative administration, or by 600 per cent as compared with 1930. Hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party may say they were not responsible for that, and they would be correct. But the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman), speaking in this house on July 9, 1946, had this to say of the sales tax:

> Very few of our people today know there is already a sales tax imposed at the wholesale level. Such a tax does not discourage the worker from working, and there is fairness in a tax policy based on the principle that the more one spends, the more one pays.

I do not agree with him there. He went on:

> There is nothing obligatory about paying a tax if one does not purchase.

It appears that the Progressive Conservatives have found a new solution for dodging the sales tax—stop buying. If you do not buy you do not pay the sales tax. But most of us are accustomed to eating and doing things of that sort.

I come now to another statement which I think is quite illuminating. The hon. member for Eglinton talked about social security. I agree with him that we have need of a comprehensive program of social security in this country. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), speaking in this house in 1946, said at page 1751 of Hansard of that year:

> Leading economists tell us we shall have to increase our national income . . . by fifty per cent if we are to maintain these new types of fantastic Liberal policies.

Apparently he was not satisfied with what we were doing because these social services cost too much. I remember vividly the present leader of the opposition rising in his place not very long ago and saying that billion dollar spending must stop. If we were to stop billion dollar spending there would be precious little left for social security. But while attacking the C.C.F., the Progressive Conservatives have forgotten their own record.

I come to something else which will be really interesting to the Progressive Conservative party. I have already pointed out certain contradictions in what they have suggested, but perhaps the crowning one is in what they have done rather in what they have said. In 1942 that party chose a new leader, and only that party could have chosen for its leader a man whom they had described only a few years before as a complete failure.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I thought he was from Manitoba?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: That is right. That is why he left Manitoba, to take the leadership of the Progressive Conservative party. Here is a document which is probably the only one of its kind in captivity. It starts out with a bold headline, "The Bracken Government Has Failed The Farmer!" It goes on to say:

The Conservative party has always claimed that under Mr. Bracken the farmer was getting a raw deal, but never expected Mr. Bracken would admit it.

And further:

Fourteen years ago Mr. Bracken and his party were elected on the promise to aid agriculture and reduce the cost of government.

Fourteen years later Mr. Bracken, who has always claimed to be the friend of the farmer, admits that agriculture has not had a square deal; and admits he cannot reduce the cost of government.

It goes on:

What can you expect from Mr. Bracken who in fourteen years has failed—

Failed to do what? Failed:

To reduce the burden of your municipal taxes and municipal debt.

To reduce the interest burden on the provincial debt.

To reduce the cost of government.

That awful phrase again!

To provide hydro-electrical services to rural Manitoba at low cost.

To ensure a fixed price for your wheat.

This is the first time I have heard criticism of a provincial premier for having failed to ensure a fixed price—a fixed price, of all things—by a party which does not believe in a managed economy! It goes on:

The Bracken government has penalized the wage earner and all people with small incomes.

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

He was then described as "Two per cent Bracken". It goes on:

The two per cent wage tax must be abolished. Cost of government must be reduced.

By whom was this published? It was published by the Conservative Association of Manitoba. Here was a glaring case of a party, after having completely destroyed the reputation of a man whom it had described as a complete failure to agriculture and the wage earners, then, with that characteristic contradiction of terms which they always use, electing him as leader of their party.

Mr. MUTCH: Will the hon. gentleman tell us the date of that?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: My hon. friend reminds me that it was not the Progressive Conservatives at that time. They have become progressive since then.

Mr. MUTCH: What is the date of it?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: As a matter of fact, there is no date on the document. It might have been published yesterday, but I wish to be fair—

Mr. SINCLAIR: They are still saying the same thing.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I wish to be fair. There is no date on the document, but I know when it was published, because there happened to be a provincial election in Manitoba at that time. It was in 1936.

Mr. MUTCH: Is that from the manifesto of 1936?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It may still be the manifesto of 1948.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: On the back of this document is the Conservative platform; on the front is this attack on the premier of Manitoba of that day.

Mr. MUTCH: They still feel the same way in Manitoba.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The Manitoba Tories still feel the same way.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: The reason I am putting these things on the record is, as I said earlier, not that I wish to engage in any carping criticism, or any battle of words with the Conservatives—

Mr. SKEY: Never.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I wish to point out that they have been making certain statements about the C.C.F. in the last few days; as a matter of fact, in the last few years. They have made it their theme song in this debate, and it is necessary to examine the background of a party, so that one may assess whether he can attach any importance to what they say at any time, because if Mr. Bracken was a failure in Manitoba—

Mr. SINCLAIR: If!

Mr. ZAPLITNY: —in the opinion of the Conservative party, then they made the greatest mistake of their lives when they appointed him as their leader.

Mr. SINCLAIR: He was the best they could get.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: If he was not a failure in Manitoba, then the Conservative party at that time were not telling the truth. Therefore, from whichever way you take it, it becomes clear that no one can attach very much importance or credence to what the Progressive Conservative party say in that respect at least.

Mr. MUTCH: What makes you think they do?

Mr. SKEY: I do not think they attach any importance to the remarks of the hon. member.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Of course that is your own privilege, but I have given hon. members to my right every opportunity to deny it if they want to, and to repudiate it if it is not true, and not one of them has said it is not true. I give them the opportunity now, if they wish to rise and repudiate the statement that Mr. Bracken was a failure. They do not do so.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The whole party is silent.

Mr. SKEY: Mr. Bracken is not here at the moment.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I want to make it clear, Mr. Speaker, that I am not attacking the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). As a matter of fact, I have not said one word which could be construed as attacking him.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Quite right.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: This document put out by the Conservative Association of Manitoba attacked him. As I said, the reason I am putting this on the record is that the people who read the debates of the House of Commons and who read the press may be able properly to assess the amount of credence and weight that can be given to the statements of the Progressive Conservative party, which first abuses a man, destroys him, and then elects him as leader of their own party.

I now want to refer to another matter—

Mr. PROBE: Here they come in.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Repeat it; we have missed it.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: What I am going to say now will be a little more pleasant to the ears of my hon. friends to the right—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): We just consider where it comes from.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: —but it may not be quite so pleasant to my hon. friends across the way. We have been getting a lot of information recently. This is an article which appeared in a journal and was written by Mr. Tom Horabin, who was for eleven years the chief Liberal whip in the British House of Commons. I wish to quote from this to show what it will be necessary for the people of Canada to believe in, if they wish progress, regardless of whether they call themselves Liberals or Progressives or anything else, people who believe in taking the steps which will consolidate the gains we have made in our social services, extend them and also find some new social motive for production and distribution.

As most hon. members know, Mr. Horabin left the Liberal party and joined the Labour party, and he explains it in this way:

> My decision to leave the Liberal party, and subsequently join the Labour party was not easy; I was naturally reluctant to sever association with old political friends, but I was faced, as every Liberal is faced today, by a moral issue which cannot be evaded.

I wish to commend that to my Liberal friends across the way, particularly the private members. Then Mr. Horabin goes on to say:

> Throughout this parliament the Labour government and the Labour party have shown their determination to preserve the essential freedoms, of speech, press, and association. At the same time they have shown their determination to add to these another essential freedom, which the Tories don't like, economic freedom for every man, woman and child in the country—and in this the Labour government is succeeding.

It is heartening to hear words of that type coming from a Liberal member of the British House of Commons.

Mr. SINCLAIR: An apostate.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I would not want to quote from a statement of a Labour member, because naturally it would be said that he would not say anything about any government of which he was a supporter. Mr. Horabin was for eleven years the chief Liberal whip, and he now says these things about the Labour government. Then he goes on to say:

> By their policy of full employment, control of the cost of living through food subsidies, social services that ensure adequate allowances when people are too old, or sick or for some other reason cannot work, the Labour government are removing the fear of want for the first time from the lives of the British people.

Every Liberal who wants to carry out liberal principles in the context of the modern world must of necessity vote Labour and fight the Tories to the death.

I am not going to suggest that the Liberals of this country should fight the Tories to the death; we are not going to take our politics that seriously, but I want to impress the Liberals with this, that what is happening over in Great Britain is the exact reverse of what is happening in this country, because, instead of the true Liberals, those who are progressive in the best sense of the word, going in the direction that they have to go if they are to carry out Liberal principles, they are in the various provinces across this country joining with the Conservative party to form coalition governments. I want to say this in a friendly way, that that type of policy will prove in the long run disastrous to the Liberal party in this country, because they have come to the stage where they have either to continue along the road of progress or to join a party which, in all its history and in all its beliefs, does not believe in going forward but is a party of the past.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): I must remind the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the hon. member permit one question? The hon. member was speaking of a coalition of Tories and Liberals. Bad as that may be, does he think it is quite as bad as the present coalition between the C.C.F. and the communists?

Mr. PROBE: That is a dirty lie.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There is no such coalition, and the hon. member knows it.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): The hon. member for Bruce has the floor.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Will the hon. member permit me to answer the question?

Mr. A. E. ROBINSON (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on the budget, if it is permissible to call such a thing a budget—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: On a point of privilege, I think a question was directed to the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny).

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: On a point of privilege, a certain accusation was made by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair), and the hon. member for Dauphin should be given the opportunity to reply.

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There is no point of privilege.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): I would remind hon. members that the house is not in committee. The hon. member for Bruce has the floor.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Will the hon. member allow me to answer the question?

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): I have to go by the chairman's ruling.

Mr. PROBE: The old coalition is at work again.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There is no such coalition and the hon. member for Vancouver North knows it.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): In rising to speak in this debate on the budget, if it is possible to call it a budget, I shall endeavour to bring out a few facts and suggestions which I think will be of benefit to the gentleman who brings in the budget the next time. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) should have stayed as Minister of National Defence, because I am sure that anybody who would venture to bring in a budget to make so many people throughout Canada mad has a great nerve, and at the present time that is what is required of a Minister of Defence for Canada.

I am told that probably I am the last speaker in the debate, but I want it understood that I am not the least. The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) referred to some remarks of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) to the effect that the Liberals were following too much the tactics of the C.C.F. Well, we do not have to look back very far to find that the government have been exercising a lot of control, and, as I understand the tactics of the party to my left, they, too, exercise a lot of control in their own minds.

The only way in which I will attempt to answer the criticism, though I do not know that I should call it criticism, of the last speaker in regard to what he termed the Tory party—it is the Progressive Conservative party—is to say that we are very glad he is finding fault with us. I might also say that, call it democratic socialism, or C.C.F. or whatever you like, they are still after state control. The hon. gentleman who spoke last mentioned the communists. The communists also want state control. The only difference between those two parties is that, being both after the same goal, they are jealous of each other. I may say, however, that in the provincial election in Ontario which is being held on June 7, Tim Buck and his followers are behind the C.C.F., and any remarks they make are along the line that if a C.C.F. government is elected in Ontario they will be giving them all the power of all their unmoral support which they are allowed to.

Mr. GILLIS: What has that to do with the budget?

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): Quite a bit, because we have listened to a lot of this stuff about Manitoba in the last few minutes. The last few words I said are more or less incidental, because I do not think this parliament will be bothered for many more years with such speeches as those we have heard in the last half hour.

Mr. GILLIS: Or the one we are listening to now.

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): Thank you. I have been sent here to represent one of the best counties in Canada.

Mr. McIVOR: Question.

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): That county is Bruce, and I am proud to be here representing it. I should like to give the house a few facts concerning the county. I see an hon. member smiling. He was born there and he knows that anything I say about it will be true. This year Bruce is 100 years old, and we are proud to say that Bruce has sent more pioneers to the four western provinces than has any other county in Canada.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that we shall be holding a two-weeks home-coming in Bruce this year, and in due course all hon. members will receive an invitation to attend.

Mr. GRANT: The C.C.F. and all?

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): All hon. members of the House of Commons.

Mr. GRANT: The C.C.F. too?

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): Yes. I may say for the benefit of hon. members from the west that a special train will leave Vancouver on July 16, arriving in Bruce on the opening day of its centennial. According to the last reports, that special train will carry three sections when leaving Winnipeg.

Bruce county has 300 miles of shoreline and most of that takes in what is called the Bruce peninsula. That peninsula has been spoken of before as a model site for a national park, and I see that this year we are budgeting for $5,000,000 for national parks in Canada. I hope that the good people of that peninsula will see fit to have that district made into a national park and benefit to a certain extent from that $5,000,000.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): And the fishing is good.

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): Incidentally, the fishing is very good. The people in that county are looking forward to such a thing, because we have under reforestation over 12,000 acres of the district. We have also in Bruce a lot of good farming land. We are blessed with a good agricultural representative and assistants. Owing to the initiative of these representatives, we have tuberculosis testing in cattle under way, soil testing, warble fly control, barberry extermination, calf vaccination for Bang's disease and, as I have mentioned, reforestation, as well as fifteen calf clubs organized.

You can readily believe from what I have said, Mr. Speaker, that we have a wonderful county; nevertheless in the last seven years, the rural population has declined 3,385. This means that there are many empty houses in Bruce. It means that there is a good deal of land not producing to capacity for lack of help.

I charge this government with being responsible for these conditions. I charge the government with encouraging centralization over the last number of years. I can hardly see how the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Warren) can expect ever to come back as a farmer member elected to the House of Commons in view of the record of the Liberal government so far as its treatment of farmers is concerned. The same applies to the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris) and the hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding).

For the good of Canada, whatever government is in power, it must concentrate on ways and means to encourage decentralization both in population and in power. The government must give greater exemptions in income tax to farmers for the long hours of work which the farmer himself puts in and the work done by his wife and family.

Speaking of exemptions from income tax, I would also suggest that the government consider exemptions up to $3,000 for all men and women up to the age of thirty. This is something new and is worthy of consideration by the Minister of Finance. It is sound not only because I thought of it myself, but the more I think of it the more worthy I think it is of consideration. I repeat that there should be an exemption up to $3,000 for all men and women up to the age of thirty. By this, all those young people will save money enough to marry and raise families. Today there are couples who are afraid to get married on the small amount they can save. In my opinion the increasing of population by this method would be much more satisfactory than spending large sums on immigration. It would also do away with a lot of the illegitimate baby scandals we read about in different parts of Canada.

I wish to say a few words about the liquor problem we have in Canada. I know all hon. members will agree that the liquor problem is one of the major problems in Canada today, whether we like it or not.

Mr. GRANT: Oh, we like it.

An hon. MEMBER: We like it too much.

Mr. McCANN: That is not where the kick is.

Mr. MacNICOL: The best thing to do is to leave it alone.

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): In 1945 the dominion and provincial governments of Canada collected $163,386,017 in liquor taxes. A great deal of this tax was taken out of the poor unfortunate people who drink.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCANN: Do not look across here.

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): These are my suggestions; first, lower the taxes on all alcoholic beverages.

Mr. GRANT: No.

An hon. MEMBER: More and better cocktails.

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): Second, earmark a good percentage of the taxes collected for temperance education in our schools. Third, lower the alcoholic content of our beer—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): —along the line of the United States content.

Mr. McCANN: Four point four; we tried that once.

Mr. MICHAUD: Nobody will drink it.

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): I might say that I had the privilege of spending two months in a camp in Pennsylvania, and the beer content was about two-thirds of the content in Canada today. But the men who drank that beer got just as much kick out of it, and had a lot more pleasure the next day than is experienced by those who drink beer with the content we have in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: They must have weak stomachs.

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): To show that high prices do not curtail drinking, I wish to state that in 1893 when liquor was very cheap, the consumption of absolute alcohol per capita in Canada was 0·499 gallons; in 1945, with our high prices, the consumption was 0·630 gallons. These figures I have given might be larger if they were taken up to date. I may say that less liquor revenue would make all governments more interested in temperance education.

I wish to say just a few words about controls, from which we in Canada have suffered so much—

An hon. MEMBER: Birth control?

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): —and from which we would suffer more if we had a C.C.F. government. I know that the C.C.F. group on my left will not agree, because they wish state control of everything, the same as the Labour Progressive or communist party want.

Mr. KNOWLES: More nonsense.

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): Speaking of controls, may I say that from June 1, 1947, to the end of that year, all dairy products were taken out from under control except cheese. During that period, all dairy products except cheese increased in production. Butter alone increased 17,000,000 pounds in that time, compared with production in the same period of the year before. If those controls had not been on dairy products, this house and the senate would not have been debating the margarine bill, and wasting our time in doing so, as we have been doing.

To come back to party politics, I wish to say that in Bruce we have a good active federation of agriculture, and also a few co-operatives. Some people would lead one to believe that both these lean toward the party to the left, the C.C.F., but I think I am safe in saying that in Bruce there is no such calamity hanging over our heads.

An hon. MEMBER: Safe for another election.

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): I would also say, for the good of the federation of agriculture and of all co-operatives, that they must keep out of politics, according to past history, if they want to give us farmers the benefit of their organizations.

I wish to say just a few words about our two Indian reserves in Bruce. One of the chiefs was visiting me the other day. He was here in connection with the revision of the Indian Act. In my opinion our Canadian Indians must be given more control in running their own affairs. They have proven capable in two wars; so why not give them the vote and let them have a say in running this country which was theirs before it was ours?

One of our biggest problems is inflation. What can we do about it? First, the government can drop the eight per cent sales tax on all the necessities of life. Second, industry can operate on a smaller profit. Third, labour can work longer hours for the same pay. Concerning longer hours, permit me to read this clipping, Mr. Speaker. It is headed, "A Farmer Views the Butter Shortage", and reads as follows:

The present shortage of butter and the many reasons advanced for the shortage, together with the many protests from the urban consumers prompts me to submit the primary producers' viewpoint, at least as this producer sees it. The Hon. Mr. Kennedy, and the Hon. Mr. Gardiner have each advanced their viewpoint as to the cause. These men should speak with authority. Also heads of various dairy firms have given their opinion, and in the meantime the urban householder goes without or spreads it thin.

While I am willing to concede that the reasons given by these various persons have a bearing on it; yet, in my opinion, they have all missed or avoided the real basic reason. If our urban friends wish to become acquainted with the real culprit, all they have to do is stand before a good mirror. It is all brought about because urban people have become obsessed with the thought the great ideal in life is less work and more pay for it. Over a course of years they have built up this thing till now they have the eight-hour, five-day week, and by systematic high pressure have been able to exact the same or more pay than formerly came from a whole week. With what result? Industry could absorb more labour. It steadily but surely drew to itself every rural worker that could be torn loose. Some of us have our roots deep in the soil and do not tear up very easily. To illustrate, in our particular area there are about twenty farms in a distance of three to four miles. Good farms, well built on. Every one has hydro, tractors, radio, a few have combines. Several of the homes compare favourably with a fair class urban home. A generation ago every farm was either a father and son set-up or a master and hired helper and some two hired helpers. Today not one hired helper in the outfit. The last one left about two years ago for an eight-hour job in town. Today most of these farms are one-man outfits, and several of these men are between sixty and seventy years of age. A few put in milking machines at an outlay of from three to five hundred dollars.

Many of the rest just let the calves do the milking and from these farms where once there went a steady supply of cream, today these farmers buy their own butter. Can you blame them? Can you blame the hired helper for going to the eight-hour job? I cannot. On Friday night the factory closes till Monday morning. What would happen if the farmer shut his stable door at five o'clock on Friday evening and said "Bye-bye bossies. See you Monday a.m."? Likewise with the hogs and hens? I have gone to some length to set it forth as we see it. And unless and until our urban friends become immunized against the virus which afflicts them with this short-day, short-week, fever, and begin to realize that work and production are what this country needs; until they come to realize this, they are on poor ground when they complain at the price of food which requires careful application six days a week and several hours on the seventh. Unless they are aroused to this, the situation will continue to grow worse until hunger shows it up in its true proportion.

I have just one more thing to discuss, and that is external affairs. I promise you, Mr. Speaker, that I will not talk about something that I do not know to be true. Let me quote a few sentences from a talk given by a Major Burns recently:

In both world wars we have in the end been obliged to impose conscription, and our defence system should be designed bearing in mind this twice-taught lesson . . . There were 730,625 men enlisted or drafted into the army; its peak strength early in 1944 was 495,804. There were about 251,000 in Europe about this time, and the establishment of the fighting formations (divisions and armoured brigades) was about 80,000.

Yet in November, 1944, the army was scraping the bottom of the barrel for reinforcements, after most of its formations had been fighting for only six months.

In view of the unsettled state of the world today, it might be wise to remember that line by Kipling, which I believe goes like this: "The blundering idiot stumbles toward the fire with his bandaged burnt finger." I was glad the other day to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) say:

It may be that the free states, or some of them, will soon find it necessary to consult together on how best to establish a collective security league.

Let me also quote a few lines from what our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said recently:

It is always wise to try to anticipate all the possibilities before they arise. Then you do not find yourself embarrassed when the moment comes.

Well, after past experience, all I can say is that I hope we do not get our fingers burned again. I do not like compulsory service; perhaps that is because I have served voluntarily in two wars. I should like to see our government pay our servicemen wages high enough that, after serving, they would not be beholden to the people they defended, and for whom they had offered to lay down their lives. I believe every man and woman are worthy of their hire. I should like to see the servicemen given a break in peacetime, such as travelling warrants and many other things we can think of. If we offer some of those things the troops have been denied in the past I am of the opinion that we shall have enough men come forward to the services voluntarily.

I should also like to see Canada enter into an extensive exchange of scholarships with every other nation in the world. I believe we have the machinery for this set-up at the present time under the united nations and through UNESCO, but the idea should be followed up. I know it is not new, but I do not believe it has been pushed as far as it should. It would be one of the greatest influences toward better understanding in the world, and would do more to bring peace than anything else I can think of.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I would be quite willing to see a vote on the C.C.F. amendment tonight but for the fact that, once that amendment is out of the way, there will not be much left to talk about. I should not like to be placed in the position of having to vote on the straight, anaemic amendment moved by the Conservative party. It seemed to me that they did not have much to talk about, or much to propose, or any serious objections to the budget, when they merely presented a motion stating that the people of this country have no confidence in the government. I would not want to spend much time in this house, or stay too long in the vacuum in which I live here in Ottawa, trying to tell anyone that I know very much about what the people of this country are thinking. So I am taking these fifteen minutes tonight for the purpose of drawing attention to the amendment moved by this party, and the amendment moved by the Conservative party.

Whether we like it or not, the budget is a document which required careful preparation. It is a bookkeeping statement presented each year by the government in order to set out the financial picture of the country; and in order to criticize it I think one must have something to suggest in its place. At least one must have certain points that he can suggest to the government should be brought in, and I cannot see my way clear to support an amendment which merely states that the people of this country have no confidence in the present government.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Have you confidence?

Mr. GILLIS: I am not saying that, but I say I do not imagine the people of this country have any confidence in the people who proposed the amendment, either. I think that has been pretty clearly demonstrated all over this country. Go to British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan or Nova Scotia; what has happened there to the Conservative party? It has just disappeared. The remnants have their arms around the neck of the government and are holding themselves up as coalitionists.

A few minutes ago the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) threw something at the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) just after he sat down, after having referred to the coalitions in force all over Canada today between the Conservatives and the Liberals, who are trying to hang on to the old, worn-out system. The hon. member for Vancouver North rose and asked, "Well, is that any worse than the coalition which exists between the C.C.F. and the communist party?" The hon. member for Dauphin was not permitted to reply, but the answer is this. I do not blame the hon. member for Vancouver North for being allergic to the situation out in British Columbia. From what I can gather through the grapevine, he expects to inherit the mess out there. He may have to lead the government there some time; and what a position to place a Liberal in, to sit him on the government benches with the remnants of the Tory party and have to make a deal with them as to the kind of legislation that should be passed! So that accounts for the suggestion he threw out, which he knows is absolutely incorrect, because in this house the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and others have clearly stated the position of the C.C.F. with respect to the communist party.

Now I think we have had enough of that sort of thing.

An hon. MEMBER: I think so.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not blame you fellows for being jittery about that sort of subject, because you are very vulnerable. I would suggest that some of you older members brief the younger ones and tell them not to stick out their necks so often.

I want now to get around to the budget. As I said before, it required a great deal of preparation; and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) made a very good job of presenting it to the house. He was convinced, I think, that he was right. This afternoon the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), who had the job of looking after the Department of Finance all through the war, also did a good job. He made an excellent speech, and I am sorry that so far he is the only maritime member to have taken part in this debate. But I should like to say to my hon. friends over here to the extreme right that the Minister of Finance, charged with the responsibility of doing his bookkeeping and keeping the country's financial set-up in balance under the mechanics of the society in which we live, did it in the only way open to him.

This afternoon the Minister of Justice made an excellent speech in support of a continuation of the status quo. He could not make any other kind of speech and be a private enterpriser. But I cannot understand how the hon. member over here in the Tory party who is supposed to be a better private enterpriser than any Liberal, can get up and object to the kind of statement brought down by the Minister of Finance or to the kind of speech made by the Minister of Justice this afternoon. I am giving those hon. gentlemen credit for supporting the mechanics of the society in which they believe; and I am only glad that this gang over here are not over there, because I know the budget would have been much worse. This business of saying, "We believe the people of this country no longer have confidence in the government," and stopping there shows clearly, as the speeches they have made show clearly, that there is very little in this budget with which they can quarrel. They quibble about it, but there has not been any constructive objection in opposition to it, and the amendment certainly—

An hon. MEMBER: We are listening to you.

Mr. GILLIS: And you will hear something before I have finished. I am only fooling with you yet.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): For sure?

Mr. GILLIS: And I will have thirty-five minutes of this tomorrow afternoon. The Progressive Conservative party has offered an amendment of only four lines to this 56-page document, an amendment which says that the people of this country have no confidence in the government. I speak tonight because I would not be able to speak on our amendment, had it gone to a vote tonight.

For the benefit of hon. members over here, I am going to read our amendment, because I am reasonably sure that most of them have not read it. And those who did hear it when it was moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar I am reasonably sure have forgotten it. Let me point this out, that I have heard a good deal of talk today about the low-income group, and that sort of stuff, which is pretty good political capital in this country. But if you will read our amendment, you will find that it says this:

> That the said amendment be amended by inserting after the word "government" and before the word "does" in the second line of the amendment, the following words: ". . . has failed to relieve the excessive burden of taxation on the low-income groups of the Canadian people:
> (a) By failing to increase the amounts of exemption from income tax from the present levels to $1,250 for single and $2,500 for married persons, and
> (b) By failing to remove or substantially reduce the burden of sales and excise taxes which bear most heavily on those suffering from low income and the present high cost of living.
> And further, the government has failed to establish a public investment board to assure the channelling of capital investment into socially desirable projects as a means of maintaining full employment, increasing production and raising the standard of living of the Canadian people, and . . ."

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) and other hon. members over here whom I have heard speak have picked on these very items—not the last one, of course—but on low-income groups, the sales tax and the excise tax. Why did they not include these things in their amendment? Why did they not ask for an amendment to the motion to adopt the budget by writing in specifically the things they believe the government has not done? That is one reason I say the official opposition should withdraw the amendment and get it out of the way. It is that trick of just a non-confidence motion with nothing behind it—it is so old that it has whiskers on it. There is no solution there. Why not just withdraw it and allow the subamendment to be the main amendment? Then hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party could stand behind the things they have said in the House of Commons—those few of them who have expressed any real opinions in regard to the budget.

An hon. MEMBER: Get down to business.

Mr. GILLIS: That is just a little advice I am giving my hon. friends. Let us try to get some clarification into this thing. Let us realize we are discussing a document that has a lot of meat in it. Let us write clearly into the amendment the things the government should have done and has not done. Then let us stand up here and be counted as to where we stand with respect to those points the government did not introduce.

With respect to relief for low-income groups, I have heard the statement made on several occasions by the Minister of Finance that the income tax in Canada is much lower than in the United States, and he placed on record in that connection a table showing the tax for unmarried persons in the country. That table does not coincide with a table I have. I believe the one I have is reliable, because it comes from the Financial Post of April 17, 1948. This table gives the 1948 rates of taxation for a married man with two children, and gives a comparison of Canadian and United States rates. The table states that in the category I have mentioned the taxpayer in Canada pays $36, while in the same category in the United States he pays no tax. I am referring to the $2,000 bracket. Then, in the $4,000 bracket in Canada there is a tax of $430 and in the United States a tax of only $266. This is for a married man with two children. Then, for the $10,000 group the tax in Canada is $1,930, while in the United States it is $1,361. The same ratio carries right through to $25,000.

So that the argument that taxes are much lower in Canada than in the United States does not hold, if the table set out in this issue of the Financial Post is correct.

On motion of Mr. Gillis the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. KNOWLES: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. ABBOTT: Continue with the budget debate.

Mr. GRAYDON: And when we finish?

Mr. ABBOTT: Supply.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 27, 1948

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSING

PROVISION OF MARRIED QUARTERS FOR PERSONNEL OF ARMED SERVICES AND DEFENCE RESEARCH

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, because of its important relationship to the whole question of housing, I would like to announce to the house a very large addition to the program of construction of married quarters for personnel of the armed services and defence research. This will call for completion this year of 2,350 new houses in thirty-six different localities, at a cost of approximately $20 million. This will be a direct contribution to relief of housing shortages in civilian communities, as the moving into service married quarters will make housing available for civilian families.

On January 1, 1947, the armed forces had 1,241 married quarters. By March 31, 1948, 2,863 units were added and 1,864 were under construction, of which 1,179 were new houses, making, with the 1,171 to be begun after April 1, 1948, a total of 7,139 married quarters. These new houses are allocated on the basis of need, not rank, and rental rates will be the normal quarters allowance.

I am making available to hon. members a statement giving particulars of this program, which is one of the largest housing projects undertaken in Canada, and is part of the effort to provide as far as possible the condition of normal family and community life for armed forces personnel, particularly in remote areas.

Mr. PEARKES: Will the minister say whether these houses are being built by the Royal Canadian Engineers, or by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, or by some other agency?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes; twelve hundred of the houses are being constructed under the supervision of the Royal Canadian Engineers, and of these, two hundred are being built by the engineers themselves. The remainder of the houses are being built on plans and specifications approved by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, but on contracts made through the Canadian Commercial Corporation. The supervision, however, is done by officers of the department, and almost entirely by officers of the Royal Canadian Engineers.

Mr. THATCHER: Will the minister say whether any of these houses are being built in Moose Jaw?

REPORT AS TO REMOVAL OF TRELLISES FROM HOUSES IN WRIGHTVILLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Yesterday the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) asked a question concerning the removal of trellises from certain houses built by Wartime Housing Limited. The question was:

Will the government take steps to stop the removal of trellises, which is taking place at the present time, from houses built by Wartime Housing Limited in Wrightville?

The trellises being removed from wartime houses in Wrightville are those which have broken or are subject to breakage owing to frost heavage of the porch posts. These trellises will be replaced by a much sturdier type of construction.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

*UNSURVEYED MINERAL CLAIMS IN YUKON TERRITORY

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

What are the names of the companies and individuals who the Acting Minister of Mines and Resources states have already made substantial investments in mining in the Yukon and are interested in its development in the future and who are unable to ascertain the limits of the properties that can be secured either by purchase or staking referred to in the notices sent to the owners of unsurveyed mineral claims in Yukon by the mining recorders of Yukon on instructions of the Minister of Mines and Resources.

Mr. MacKINNON: I should like to answer this question orally. I have discussed this question with the hon. member and I find that he is concerned lest the order issued by the minister under section 78 of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act should be made to apply generally and arbitrarily throughout the Yukon territory to the hardship of many and without compensating benefits in the way of facilitating development. In this connection may I explain:

1. That there is no intention whatever of taking any arbitrary action. This has been explained to every person affected. If a claim holder is unable to put up the money for the survey, or the surveyor is unable to attend to it, or if there is any other bone fide reason why the survey cannot be made, no action will be taken to cancel the claim. There is of course a responsibility upon the claim holder to make the circumstances known to the mining recorder who will report to the minister for appropriate action. Moreover, I am advised that the surveyor will be able to make the surveys only in the areas which are considered immediately valuable from a development standpoint so there will be no question about the protection of the claim holders in other areas.

2. From the standpoint of claim holders in what we may designate immediately valuable areas, I may say that lest there be concern over the cost of the survey we have decided to set a fee of $100 for the survey of a mineral claim. Those familiar with the quartz mining regulations will realize that this is exactly the amount of one year's representation work on the mineral claim which is required by law. Under the act the survey work can be accepted in lieu of one year's representation work.

I have had a communication, Mr. Speaker, from the hon. member, which I have today fully answered direct.

R.C.M.P.—KINGSTON OFFICES

Mr. KIDD:

1. Has the Royal Canadian Mounted Police offices in Kingston?
2. If so, where are these offices located?
3. Has the lease expired or when does it expire?
4. What rent do they pay?
5. How long have they occupied these premises?
6. Are any arrangements being made for them to occupy new premises? If so, where and what rent do they intend to pay?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull):

1. Yes.

2. 231½ Princess street.

3. The lease expired on February 15, 1948. Now held on monthly basis.

4. $480 per annum.

5. Since February 16, 1941.

6. Up to the present date no arrangements have been made to lease alternative premises.

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. McKAY:

1. How many persons were in receipt of unemployment insurance benefits in (a) the province of Saskatchewan; (b) the Dominion of Canada, during the months of (1) January; (2) February; (3) March; (4) April, 1948?
2. What was the total amount of unemployment insurance benefits paid in the (1) province of Saskatchewan; (2) Dominion of Canada, during (a) 1947; (b) since the inception of the act?

Mr. COTE (Verdun):

1. (a) Persons in receipt of unemployment insurance benefits in the province of Saskatchewan during the following months:

(1) January, 1948	4,276
(2) February, 1948	5,477
(3) March, 1948	6,845
(4) April, 1948	6,235

(b) Persons in receipt of unemployment insurance benefits in the Dominion of Canada during the following months:

(1) January, 1948	106,367
(2) February, 1948	138,417
(3) March, 1948	154,754
(4) April, 1948	139,477

2. (1) Total amount of unemployment insurance benefits paid in the province of Saskatchewan:

(a) During 1947	$1,060,289.09
(b) Since inception of act..	3,204,735.70

(2) Total amount of unemployment insurance benefits paid in the dominion of Canada:

(a) During 1947	$ 32,039,339.36
(b) Since inception of act	117,708,969.12

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

REISING SUB-MACHINE GUNS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many Reising sub-machine guns, 45 calibre, were purchased by the government, year by year, from 1939 to 1946 inclusive?
2. From what individuals, firms or companies were such purchases made and what was value purchased from each?
3. From whom were purchases made from June, 1944, in what quantities and what was the price per gun in each shipment?

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

RATES OF PAY OF WOMEN CLEANERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works on behalf of women cleaners in federal public buildings.

My question relates particularly to Winnipeg, where I am familiar with the situation, but it may apply to other cities as well. Is consideration being given to an increase in pay for these women, in line with increases granted to other government employees?

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): I thank the hon. member for having handed me the question before I came into the house. I can only give the general answer that the rates of pay of these women cleaners are under constant review and consideration by the department. Nearly every week we sign some recommendation sent over to the Department of Labour, who advise us as to the rates of pay given to similar employees by private enterprise in different parts of the country. I will look into the matter so far as Winnipeg is concerned. I am sure the rates of pay of these women cleaners are taken into consideration.

REFERENCE TO PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION IN CHARLOTTETOWN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): I desire to direct a question to the minister of Public Works. Has the minister approved the building location for the dominion building at Charlottetown? If so, when will work on the building be begun?

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): I received no notice of the question, Mr. Speaker. The government is purchasing so many sites from one end of Canada to the other that it is impossible for me to recall exactly the one referred to by the hon. member.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

FRASER VALLEY—QUESTION AS TO PROTECTION OF C.P.R. LINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, a copy of which I gave him. According to the morning press, dikes have broken in the Fraser valley and many farm families have had to be evacuated to safety zones. Mr. C. E. Webb, district engineer of the water power bureau in Vancouver, forecasts very serious conditions in the future, owing to the fact that only a comparatively small amount of spring run-off has occurred. Will the minister say what steps the Canadian Pacific Railway are taking to assist in the protection of their lines from floods, seeing that since 1894—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: —this protection has been entirely paid for by the farmers of the district—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: —and they can no longer meet the costs without assistance from this company.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Great friends of the common people over there.

Mr. GILLIS: Your own members are stopping you.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You are all for the C.P.R.

Mr. BENTLEY: It is your own members.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): In answer to the hon. gentleman's question I must say that while I feel sympathetically towards those who have been evacuated as a result of these floods I have no responsibility in connection with floods, nor have I responsibility so far as the Canadian Pacific Railway is concerned. I shall be glad, however, to bring his question to the attention of the management of that railway.

FREIGHT RATES

REFERENCE TO RETURN WITH RESPECT TO INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport when he will be in a position to furnish the necessary information to complete the return made on May 4 with respect to freight rates? Certain information is not contained in the return. I asked a question about this on May 6.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): My recollection is that in tabling the answer to the hon. gentleman's question I gave all the information that was available, namely, the information that had been filed before the board of transport commissioners. Speaking from memory only, I believe the hon. member asked for additional information which I was unable to table since it was not given in evidence before the board.

Mr. ISNOR: There is no reason why it should not be available in the 1947 returns, along lines similar to those for 1946.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The reason is that the information my hon. friend asks for was not submitted to the board.

Mr. ISNOR: That is an excuse.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. STEPHENSON (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State in regard to a question of mine which appeared on the order paper of April 26 and was passed that day as an order for return. I have had no answer to the question. Can the minister tell me when I may expect it?

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): I shall be glad to look into the matter and have the return brought down.

WHEAT

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE OVERPAYMENT UNDER WHEAT ACREAGE REDUCTION SCHEME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, on February 27 I asked a question about certain regulations under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I wonder if I can get an answer now from the Minister of Agriculture.

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I am not sure I remember what the question was.

Mr. KNOWLES: It was so long ago.

Mr. GARDINER: Perhaps the hon. member will indicate the purport of it. Was it with regard to flooding at Dauphin?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: No. The question was about regulations dealing with the withholding of certain benefits under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act owing to overpayments which have been going on under the wheat acreage reduction scheme.

Mr. GARDINER: I thought I had given that answer orally, when the hon. member was not here. The answer was to the effect that some deductions had been made from the payments that were due under prairie farm assistance on account of wheat acreage reduction, but that that was not in accordance with the general policy and it has been discontinued.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: My question specifically was, under what authority this was done. It is the answer to that question that I should like to have.

[Mr. Isnor.]

Mr. GARDINER: It was done under the authority of an act which provides that when money is owing to the government by any person and money is also owing to that person, one may be deducted to make up for the other.

DAIRY INDUSTRY

QUESTION AS TO FLOOR PRICE ON BUTTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. DROPE (Northumberland, Ont.): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is the minister aware that owing to the delay in announcing the policy of the government in regard to dairy products the dairy industry is in a state of confusion which is resulting in lower production?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that in asking a question he should not make a statement. I would ask him to put his question.

Mr. DROPE: Will the minister inform the house whether or not a floor price will be established on butter, and if so, at what level?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I hope my estimates will be before the house tomorrow, and I will be in a position to discuss the whole matter at that time.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Wednesday, May 26, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I thank hon. members for the applause. I hope it will continue after I am through.

Mr. HARTT: If you deserve it, it will.

Mr. GILLIS: Last evening, Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned, I was discussing the budget; I mention that just in case someone may have forgotten. I had concluded my remarks on the Conservative amendment and was suggesting seriously to them that they might withdraw that amendment and get it out of the way, so that we might take all the discussion on the subamendment proposed by the members of this group. I suggested that because we definitely recommend something that the government did not include in the budget. Second, I was pointing out some of the disabilities of the budget, as I see it. In concluding my remarks of last night I took a few minutes to point out that a table put on Hansard by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), when he made his budget speech, suggested that the tax rates in the United States were much lower than they were in Canada. I also put a table on Hansard having to do with the category of a married person with two children. It showed quite definitely that the tax rates in Canada in that group are much higher than they are in the United States.

I personally feel that the government made a mistake in not giving some relief to those in the low-income tax brackets. I say that for this reason. During the year 1947 the real wages of those in the low-income tax brackets were cut drastically by the increase in prices. We hear a good deal in this house about initiative and incentive. I think that the graduated form of tax as applied to the industrial workers, the farmers and fishermen, who in the final analysis produce all the real wealth of the country, militates against initiative and incentive. I know that many times during the war we seriously suggested to the government that it would be much better to impose a flat rate and make a cut-off at some point, where overtime work was necessary—that is, when during the war you wanted workers in industry to work a great deal of overtime. The same thing applies now.

For the minister's benefit, so that we may be able to amend the section dealing with exemptions, I should like to say this—and I am going to deal now with the part of the country from which I come. I have here an analysis made by the research director of the mine workers, taken from government statistics, which points out definitely that real income in Nova Scotia has been reduced drastically by inflationary prices. It reads:

> From November, 1946, to December, 1947, average earnings of 75,000 workers in Nova Scotia increased by $2.07 per week, or by 6·7 per cent. During the same period the government cost-of-living index climbed 21·2 points or 17 per cent.
> This means that real weekly earnings in Nova Scotia fell during 1947, by as much as 10 per cent.
> For the low income family with more than the average number of children the decline in living standards was much more than 10 per cent.

The minister should at least consider keeping living standards where they were in 1947. Unless there be some move on the government's part to increase the exemption in the low-income groups, there must be a drastic reduction in the living standards of the people in that income group.

To continue—and this is from the same source:

> During the year 1947 the cost-of-food index increased by 24 per cent, and clothing by 23 per cent.

I should like to bring sharply to the minister's attention the fact that ninety per cent of the wages of those in the income group under $1,500 or $2,000 a year goes into food and clothing; and those increases of 24 per cent and 23 per cent brought about a considerable reduction in the standard of living in 1948 as compared with 1947. Here are a few items the prices of which increased in 1947:

Item	Increase during 1947
	per cent
Butter	62
Bacon	20
Lard	37
Potatoes	44
Cheese	20
Tea	27

These are commodities that are on the table of the average working person in this country every day. The exemption from excise or sales tax will not affect these items to any great extent, because, as the minister pointed out, while he is relieving some food items from sales tax, the exemption may not be reflected in the price structure. My guess is that it will not. It will be added to it, because no one in this country today can tell anyone else what price he must charge for any given commodity.

I think that the exemption levels that were advocated by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell)—$1,250 for a single person and $2,500 for married persons—would compensate the taxpayer to some extent for the increase in the cost of living and the lowering of living standards in 1948 for that income group, and would also create some incentive and initiative. But if you are to keep dragging them down, without any recognition, then you are just creating frustration and hopelessness in this country.

I cannot understand the attitude or the mentality of the minister's advisers who suggested that the exemption for persons who are sixty-five years of age and older should be increased by $500 a year. That suggestion might have come from gentlemen in the other place. Most of them will be relieved.

Mr. ABBOTT: No; it was the minister's bright idea.

Mr. GILLIS: It may have come from members of this house, some of whom will be relieved. There may be a few people with substantial annuities who will be relieved;

but it is not going to relieve anyone in that age group who has been engaged in agriculture, fishing, industry, or any of the wealth-producing activities of this country. In the case of ninety-nine per cent of them, when they are finished, when their backs are broken, they are no longer productive and are relegated to the scrap heap, to live on $600 a year if single and a little more if married. They do not come within the income tax brackets at all. I do not believe it was the minister's bright idea, because I think he is brighter than that. There must have been some powerful prodding from somewhere behind the scenes.

Mr. ABBOTT: No; the hon. member is quite wrong.

Mr. GILLIS: I suggest that after serious reflection, instead of making that increased exemption applicable to the age group sixty-five and over, which does not mean anything, the minister might see his way clear to extend the $500 exemption to the income groups recommended by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and step up the exemptions to $1,250 and $2,500. In that way the minister would create incentive. Thousands of young people across this country, men and women, are on low incomes. Many of them would like to get married, make a home, and take their part as citizens of this country. But when they look at the tax structure; when they see the little consideration that is given by persons in high places to the question whether they shall be able to live a full and complete life, they are afraid to take a chance. An increase in the exemptions would encourage people to drive their roots into the soil and really become citizens of the country. There is fear and frustration among many in the low-income groups. To increase the exemption would assist the thousands of families who have suffered a substantial reduction in their standards of living because of the increased prices of the necessities of life which they must provide for themselves and their children. Again, many families would be able to keep their children in school if they had that relief. For humanitarian reasons, therefore, if for none other, I believe the minister should take this suggestion into serious consideration. That is the one quarrel we have with the budget under the present mechanics of society. In my opinion the minister was short-sighted and ill-advised, because I know that in view of increased prices and the lowering of standards which has resulted, the people were looking for some relief through increased exemptions for the low-income groups.

I am not going further with that line of criticism. As I pointed out last evening, the budget itself is merely a statement made by the government to the country, showing what they have done in the field of finance. My quarrel with that sort of budgeting is that in addition to a financial statement from the government I believe it is also a part of the responsibility of the government to the people, in a country such as this, that the Minister of Mines and Resources, or some other minister who may be charged with the responsibility, should bring into this house a capital budget which would take the resources of this country as between province and province and endeavour to develop those resources in order to make for equality in the distribution of income, so far as that can be achieved. Certainly the distribution of income is badly out of line today. We are living in an age when the planning of our resources and their proper development are absolutely essential.

Some members of this house may say: Well, we do not believe in planning. But I noticed yesterday that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) told the house he was bringing in a bill for the purpose of planning the national capital. Surely if the government thinks the planning of this one city as a national capital requires legislation to be passed by this house, setting up a commission and all the rest of it, then the same principle should be followed in the whole economic set-up of this country. If it is essential to plan the capital city of Ottawa, surely it is much more essential that the government, which is charged with the responsibility of exploiting the resources of the country and is the custodian of those resources, should take steps to see that there is justice and equality as between the different sections of the country. I suggest that this kind of capital budget should be brought in also.

I say that for the reason that I come from the maritime provinces. I am sorry so few of the members from the maritimes are vocal in regard to the problems and disabilities of that end of the country. Yesterday afternoon the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) fully justified the present budget, as I said last night, based on the maintenance of the status quo. As I think the minister himself asked at one time, "What is the status quo"? That is the mess we are in; but he justified it on the basis that we are going to stay as we are, that we are not going to make any changes. On that basis he made an excellent speech and an excellent case for the budget. But if we are to remedy some of the injustices that exist under the present system, we cannot just stop there.

I have in my hand a government publication released a few weeks ago. It comes from the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, and is entitled "The maritime provinces in their relation to the national economy of Canada." The opinions expressed in this publication therefore come from the government. I have gone through it very carefully, and for the benefit of the Minister of Finance I should like to point out some of the economic and social conditions that exist in our end of the country. We must remember that the minister, whether he comes from Westmount or from Vancouver, represents all people of this country, including the maritimes, in the finance department. Perhaps the reason he is not paying more attention to the maritimes is that apparently many maritime members are quite satisfied. You know, you do not get a seat in the senate by quarrelling with the government about disabilities that may exist in your part of the country. Here is just an extract from this report; I could pull out dozens of them, but I am going to give just a few which rather stand out, touching various social and economic aspects down there. The first one is at page 29:

> The proportion of persons in the younger and older age groups in the maritimes is above the national average, while for the in-between ages the proportion in the maritimes is considerably below the all-Canada figure. The latter reflects the exodus from the maritimes of workers in the prime of life. They leave after having been educated at the expense of the provinces and when young, vigorous, ambitious, and enterprising. By their departure the maritimes lose not only the most efficient type of workers, but also the enterprising ability important to further development. Their loss reduces, too, the taxable capacity of the region, a fact which is all the more serious in view of the large proportion which the dependent groups—the children and the aged—constitute of the total population of the region. Persons below the age of 15 comprise 30·2 per cent of the total population in Prince Edward Island, 29·2 per cent in Nova Scotia, and 31·9 per cent in New Brunswick—

As compared with 5·2 per cent in Saskatchewan and Alberta. The point I am trying to make for the benefit of the minister is that the productive people of the maritime provinces are obliged to leave that part of the country. What we have there are the youth, those in school whom we are educating. We are spending our resources on them. When these young people are educated we lose to the United States about 15,000 of them every year. We have been doing that for the last thirty years.

Mr. MacINNIS: Longer than that.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) says it is longer than that. He is a little older than I am, and perhaps can go back a little farther; I would say that it is at least thirty years.

The paragraph from the survey I have read means that we have the aged, the unproductive men, persons on small old-age pensions or inadequate company pensions. The paragraph shows that the maritime provinces are fast becoming a place from which we wring whatever little wealth is left in the educational field, so that people can be trained to go to the United States or to be siphoned off into central Canada. That situation is a government responsibility.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Or they enter the civil service at Ottawa.

Mr. GILLIS: I would not advise them to do that, after looking over the salaries.

Mr. BLACKMORE: A good many of them do it.

Mr. GILLIS: The condition to which I have referred is something the government will have to consider. So far they have not made any appraisal of it, with the exception of this statistical survey which will be put into the archives to gather dust. I bring it out today for the purpose of focusing the attention of the government upon it.

I turn now to page 40 of the same report, where it deals with production in the different industries. I shall not read from the report at greater length, because I do not like reading material into the record. I do suggest, however, that hon. members read the report for themselves.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Go ahead and read it.

Mr. GRANT: Give it to the hon. member down here.

Mr. GILLIS: I bring it to the attention of hon. members to my right who criticize controls, condemn government regulations, and all that kind of thing.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The member for Lethbridge will read some himself.

Mr. GILLIS: Just after the war started, and at other times during the war, hon. members referred to the fishing industry as the forgotten industry of Canada. It was pointed out that the fishermen had cash incomes as low as $300 a year, that the fisherman was the forgotten man. I think even the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor)—

Mr. ISNOR: Make your own speech.

Mr. GILLIS: He said that many times. Let me point out to the hon. member that, according to this survey, fisheries production in the maritime provinces increased between 1938 and 1945 by 196 per cent under government regulation and management.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): No civil servants have caught fish.

Mr. GILLIS: Today, in 1948, the fishing industry of the maritime provinces is just about where it was in 1938. Why? Simply because the government withdrew the regulations.

Mr. GRANT: Because the war is over.

Mr. GILLIS: And withdrew its assistance.

Mr. GRANT: No; because the war is over.

Mr. GILLIS: No, it is not because the war is over. There is a greater market in the world today for fish than there was when the war was on. As I have said, production increased by 196 per cent between 1938 and 1945, and since the war it has gone back to about where it was in 1938. These figures indicate, all the way through, the inequality of the distribution of income in different industries. For instance, ten per cent of the population of Nova Scotia are engaged in agriculture, but we receive only 4·6 per cent of the national income from the field. If we were receiving our just due we would have at least ten per cent of the national income. Therefore, I say agriculture is away down. The same ratio would apply in manufacturing, and in all other lines of endeavour.

Let me make it clear to hon. members from Quebec and Ontario that as one of the members from the maritime provinces I am not asking for anything more than a square deal. I would say this to them, that the base for many of their industries in Quebec and Ontario came from the maritime provinces in the first instance. The production is siphoned off by centralization.

Again, in this statistical report—

Mr. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not like to exceed my time, but I could finish in about two minutes if I have permission.

Mr. SPEAKER: Only if the hon. member has unanimous consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. GILLIS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will conclude by reading briefly from the statistical report in support of my contention that centralization of industry in Canada, short-sightedness and lack of planning on the part of those in authority, are responsible for the difficulties of the maritime provinces. We find this at page 96 of the report:

> Concentration grew through the agglomeration process,—

That is a good word; look it up in the dictionary.

> —the tendency of manufacturing and service industries to concentrate where there is already some concentration of industry because of the greater availability of labour, managerial and technical skills, industrial and financial and other services. Moreover, the central provinces are geographically—

Remember this; listen to it.

> —an extension of the greatest industrial area of the United States.

The concentration in Ontario and Quebec is considered merely as an extension of the industrial area of the United States.

> —a fact which undoubtedly stimulated the industrial development of these provinces. United States capital and the establishment of branch plants contributed to the same result.

I shall not read further from the report. I hope, however, that some of the maritime members will make a check of the survey and examine the disabilities outlined in this economic and social survey of the maritime provinces.

I suggest seriously to the minister that that problem has been further aggravated by the increase in freight rates. The picture today for the maritime provinces is bleak indeed, unless the government is prepared, as I suggested a moment ago, seriously to consider bringing in a capital budget to the house which will give to the maritime provinces greater equality of distribution of income and a greater decentralization of industry which has been concentrated in the central provinces. For example, we should break the integration of the two economies and try to stand Canada on her own feet as a nation.

I could go on for some considerable time with this subject, but I shall not. I thank the house for the short extension of time that has been given me.

Hon. W. EARL ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I do not intend to burden the house, if I can avoid it, with repetition of what has already been said. I had not thought of speaking on the budget until I listened to the rather spectacular speech that was made yesterday afternoon by the Minister of Justice.

The budget has been the subject of great national concern, as it properly should be and has been on many other occasions. It is perhaps the largest budget we have had in normal times, and it is a very interesting document. Some have called it a vinegar budget; some have called it a black budget, and I believe the minister has almost admitted that it is an austerity budget. In looking it over and finding that the consumer's dollar is worth only two-thirds of what it was a few years ago, and that there is very little direct relief, one might term it a Black Douglas budget. However, I do find disguised and almost hidden in it a semblance of the old traditional policy of Liberalism, despite the quotas, restrictions and prohibitions. I notice that some duties have been removed, and it is interesting to know that we can now get beeswax and mulberry trees in free. It is an indication that the old dusty doctrine of free trade is not quite dead.

Despite all that has been said, and the almost reckless disregard some have when dealing with billions or hundreds of millions, one is reminded of Canada's greatness and her ability to withstand such a spectacular experiment. This is indeed a great country. I believe that all this country needs is the magic of confidence in ourselves and in our development. Undoubtedly we have more resources than any other country with a similar number of people. Members of this house have basic and common interests and desires for the development of our resources, the employment of our people, their prosperity and security, and indeed national unity as well; therefore I think we are justified in criticizing policies which do not enhance these developments.

We need stability to replace fear and doubt and uncertainty. We need steadiness to replace changes, hectic and reckless as sometimes they appear to be. We hear a great deal about our national pride. We have the minister of external affairs and others talking about our foreign policy and the great part we have to play in world affairs. We sometimes seem to forget that we are just 13,000,000 people. We are reminded of this when we try to match armies overseas with other large powers.

It is a fine thing to have national pride, but it would be a greater thing in this era of change and transition to have a little more national policy and a little less boastfulness about our national pride. I think we should have more national thinking in our economy in Canada and less international dreaming and theorizing as to what we will do in some great world conflict side by side with other nations of 130,000,000 or 140,000,000 people.

Under the regime of those to your right, sir, every year since they have been in power the number of people leaving this country to find employment has been almost more than those graduating from our universities. It is time we began thinking in Canadian terms and having more of the confidence that is essential to our development to which I have referred, and the stability that is required to meet our great obligations.

Stability cannot be restored by borrowing $300 million from a foreign country to maintain an artificial or dishonest dollar here at home. Trade cannot be developed by putting a twenty-five per cent excise tax on our production at home and then putting quotas and restrictions by ministerial decree on articles coming in. Trade has never been built up in that way. I have listened for many years to the great apostles of free trade who have told us that they will reach out to all the corners of the earth and sell what they can sell for the most money and buy what they need for the least money. But I am amazed to find that under ministerial decree we have quotas, restrictions, restraint, and strangulation of trade. Then in order to stop production at home we put on a special excise tax of twenty-five per cent on our requirements; and this at a time when other ministers are talking about the high cost of living. I refer to the tax imposed on frigidaires, vacuum cleaners and kitchen utensils.

Confidence cannot be restored in the development of our great resources, by so few people, by taking $670 million a year more from the people than is required. It is fine to talk about having a surplus, but that is just like a man going to the bank and borrowing $5,000 more than he needs so that he will think he is richer than he was before he left home. Confidence is not encouraged in that way. It is not encouraged either by a difference of opinion among cabinet ministers. It is not encouraged or sustained by political expediency conflicting with government policy. It is not sustained by the Prime Minister making a speech in Geneva and saying we are going to have great international trade, and the Minister of Finance saying at home that we are to have quotas and prohibitions to stop trade. Those things do not help.

A week before the budget the Prime Minister brought down a great health program. We have had periods of progress in this country toward social reform every time there is a provincial election, every time there is a by-election, every time there is a dominion election. It is then that we make strides toward taking a social interest in our people.

I have listened to the same old story every year from 1919. What about Drew? He will be the next premier of Ontario, and his opposition will be doing as his other opposition did—listening to the grass grow on his beautiful farm.

Mr. GRANT: That is what happened to you one time.

Mr. ROWE: The hon. member never got that far. I am not going to be distracted by those who want amusement rather than enlightenment.

The Prime Minister talks of spending millions on health, and yet the Minister of Finance thinks that over and above the expenses of government he must take $670 million from us because we do not know how to spend it. When they are in a hurry they do not need to get provincial approval, but for twenty-nine long years from 1919, action of this kind could not be taken without provincial approval. Now when these old, weary statesmen of the sea begin to see the danger signs in the offing, when they see that there is no chance of retrieving the situation in the province of Ontario, when they see that it is doubtful that they will win any one of the three by-elections, then the Prime Minister says: I promised that in 1919; it was part of my old chart and compass. The ship of state has been drifting around the islands of by-elections in the meantime, but we must pull that one out now.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, they talk about inflation. The ex-minister of finance, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) referred to it yesterday. Hon. members remember how serious he got. He talked about intellectual honesty. I often wish I belonged to some of the fraternities as he does, so that I could get as serious and sanctimonious, and thus make men believe me.

Mr. ABBOTT: You cannot.

Mr. ROWE: I am not speaking about the Minister of Finance.

As I listened yesterday to the remarks on inflation by the Minister of Justice, I could not help thinking what a terrible thing inflation is. I recall, Mr. Speaker, as no doubt you do, for you were then sitting in another place in this house, that when I suggested to the Minister of Finance of that day that he should introduce compulsory savings, he said no. Many hon. members will recall that. The minister said it was true we had the spending power, but it was not enough. It was too close to an election. The following year compulsory savings were started. I believe it did some good in this country. They turned it down the year before. They brought it in, in a farmer's suit, the year before; then they put a dress suit on it and made it a little different. They did not tell the people when they were going to get their money back, or how much was to be taken from them. They left it in a state of confusion and misunderstanding.

A couple of years afterwards the ex-minister of finance, now the Minister of Justice, who spoke last night, brought in his budget speech and said that we were in the most dangerous period in our history so far as inflation was concerned, and that we must be careful; that we must siphon off this tremendous volume of purchasing power. He said that if we did not do that we would run into a spiral of inflation which might ruin this country. Before he was through he said that we would discontinue compulsory savings; we would turn it back, and we would give to families, who were earning more than they ever earned in their lives before, an election bonus. A few weeks before the election they turned back half a billion dollars, first because they had too much to spend, and second, I do not know why; but the government did it.

These things are interesting when you review them, but they cost the taxpayer money. That is why today this tragic course of public business is carrying us into the danger zone. People are nervous. The government seem to act as if they cannot trust anybody. In fact I wonder at times whether the members of the government trust each other, because recently we have seen the fiasco of the prices committee. I have sat in on the proceedings of that committee. I admire and compliment the members of our party, and those from the other side, who have had the patience to sit in there, or who have so little else to do that they can attend the committee meetings. It is said that the committee is costing a thousand dollars a day. Somebody said that one of the economists on the committee was getting $40 a day. He should get more than some of the lawyers, because it is surely an economic problem; but if he is worth $40 a day he should know that he need not be there at all.

One of the greatest fiascos that I have ever seen is this fact-finding committee, which is said to be costing the taxpayers a thousand dollars a day. Before they sit in secret conference they are instructed that they can do nothing. A fact-finding committee; they now threaten not to bring in a report until after the next election. Why, Mr. Speaker, they cannot do anything with the facts that they find. They have no power. Instead of a fact-finding committee it is a fact-binding committee, because when they get the facts they will just bind them up and throw them away. In the meantime, we cannot discuss in proper parliamentary language the reason for the high cost of living. I am not sure that the ex-minister of finance knew any more about finance than the present minister, and that is no great compliment to either of them.

I now turn to the dominion-provincial conference. For years we have listened to the old slogan of national unity. You, Mr. Speaker, remember the slogan about the happy family of Liberals down in your riding, and the wish that we could get them in all provinces. "If all the provinces would return Liberal governments, what a happy family we would be!" was the slogan. What a grand family we have now! Probably in wartime you did not train your children very well, because we find this country more disunited than ever before.

I am sorry the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is not in his place. I was going to ask him why he did not go before the prices committee. Probably he is there today, although the other day he said he would not go. One of his friends said he did not have to go, and the Clerk of the House said he could be taken there, and somebody else said he did not know what they were doing over there anyway. The minister said that if he did go he would go when he felt like it and say what he liked, go in and out as he pleased. However, he did not go. That is the fiasco of our agricultural problem in this country. That is why we are now ready to give the Marshall plan assistance in the way of food that is now so much required, although we have to admit that our bacon and egg production is down 35 per cent. Our leading poultrymen say that there will be 50 per cent fewer chicks hatched this year. The coarse grain men ask whether they will be dealt with as they were last year. They ask whether they will be told that they have fixed ceilings and subsidies on August 1 and then find in the midst of the season in October that conditions have changed. That was what happened last year, Mr. Speaker, right after the York-Sunbury election. Nothing was said about it to the livestock men during the York-Sunbury election, but when the election was over the livestock men in that constituency found that they had to pay an extra 25 cents a bushel on their feed grain. The hon. member for York-Sunbury was elected in the meantime. It was only a coincidence, of course. These are the things that make people nervous; these are the things that make people wonder whether this government should be given the confidence of hon. members on this side of the house. That is why I think our motion is well timed.

The farmers of western Canada have sold their wheat for $300 million a year less than they could have received on the world market. They have been the victims of this fantastic dollar situation. They have taken a ten per cent loss on what they sold to the United States, and these champions of United States trade and United States markets for agricultural products refuse to let beef cattle go to the United States. If the farmers of western Canada could only realize what this has cost them, and what this experiment of the Liberal regime has meant to them, the government would not win a single seat west of the great lakes.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWE: You may win some, but you will not win as many as you think, and you will be lucky yourself if you come back here.

This country needs a government that will keep a strong hand on the helm. We are drifting apart. Our unity is disturbed. Two provinces are out in the cold on the tax agreements. Seven provinces are rudely snubbed on the freight rates issue. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party played ball with the communists until the communists left and tried to play with the C.C.F. Now nobody knows who owns the child. Anything to keep in power.

Let me return now to dominion-provincial affairs, and all these private deals of horse trading—and I know something about horse trading. I know that when you get behind the box-stall door you can make a deal if you give the other fellow enough to boot. It is amusing to realize that when these trades were made behind the box-stall doors in secret conferences—

Mr. ABBOTT: No secret conferences at all.

Mr. ROWE: Not secret—private deals; the public found out afterwards, you mean. In the final deal the dominion collects seven times as much as it pays to British Columbia, five times as much as it pays to Manitoba, I believe about three times as much as it pays to some of the other provinces, and one and a half times as much as it pays to one province. How much am I bid? Going at $1.50; make it $3; make it $7, if necessary. If these provinces had known, they would have made it $9. I would like to be negotiating with you fellows on these deals. I am not at all surprised that our able premier in Ontario cannot negotiate with you.

Mr. ABBOTT: Neither am I.

Mr. ROWE: I did not expect you would be. I believe I have a clipping here from one of your splendid papers. It is a good paper, and it is getting better all the time—the Vancouver Sun, which says, "Hello Sucker!" I will not take the time to read the article. After all, about the only thing that is free in the country now is the press.

In my opinion the government has not very much to boast about, so far as dominion-provincial relations are concerned, in respect to the type of deals to which I have referred. The confidence of the people is not strengthened when the Minister of Agriculture says he will bring in from 12,000,000 to 15,000,000 people to eat our wheat in Canada, and the minister of reconstruction, or the minister of many activities, states that the immigration problem should be left to the provinces.

I am bound to say, Mr. Speaker, that I followed with keen interest the speech made yesterday by the Minister of Justice. I was going to refer to this before now, because I had expected he would return. I have always appreciated the intellectual honesty he spoke about, but I was getting rather confused when he talked yesterday about intellectual honesty, when he said that no one on this side of the house had opposed the revaluation of the Canadian dollar. I remember that on the night it was announced—and, by the way, they must have known about it first on the Montreal stock exchange and in Toronto, because stocks reacted seriously that day—when someone on this side of the house wanted to oppose it, he was howled down by the cheer-crier who saved my hon. friend on so many occasions last night.

I do not doubt the honesty, intellectual or otherwise, of the Minister of Justice. He is a grand gentleman. I must say, however, I was amused last night when he said he was not sure whether his judgment or his memory was failing him. As I listened I thought they were both going, because I could not help thinking—

Mr. ABBOTT: But that was not what he said.

Mr. ROWE: —that he was on a sort of sightseeing tour, the "mystery" tour you sometimes see advertised here. As he went on that mysterious tour he was trying to find excuses for the errors that have been committed by his government, and he went back to July 5, 1946, when he said he did not think that ten per cent either way meant so much. Premier George Drew said it might mean $100 million more, but the right hon. gentleman said he read in a Toronto paper—probably the Telegram or the Star, but an evening paper—an estimate of only $15 million having been suggested, and he said that Premier Drew had no basis in reason for saying that we would have had $100 million more.

On July 5, 1946, when our dollar was revalued at 100 cents, at an artificial value, a dishonest value, it was reported by some that many persons in the department believed that the dollar might go back to sixty-five cents. I think that was absurd, but they were afraid it would go to eighty cents and they thought they would put it at 100 cents and bluff it there. It was mysterious indeed, and it is of great significance, because it was a great change, it was a great risk born of a great fear. It was the putting back of controls when we were told that we were leaving controls. The action was taken because we did not want inflation; we wanted more production at home and less buying abroad; and so they told the people: We will make your dollar worth more where you want to buy and worth less where you want to sell.

It was a new type of economy, apparently, on the part of a controller whose influence is great around here. Probably he was born since I came here first. As I listened to the Minister of Justice I could not help thinking that in the first half of his speech, his voice sounded like the voice of the minister, whereas, in the latter half the hand seemed to be the hand of the deputy minister of finance.

We all know—these are tragic, historical truths by this time—that in the sixteen months subsequent to July, 1946, no matter what anyone says he thinks will happen, what actually did happen was that $1,100 million of American reserves disappeared. We know that we were that much short, $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 per month. The primary producers across the dominion paid a still greater penalty for this novel type of experiment. We know that it encouraged imports, because imports increased; it discouraged exports, and moreover, it very nearly ruined the great gold mining industry of the dominion.

In the old days, when people wanted to praise something, they said that it was as good as gold, and then it was as good as wheat in the bin. We heard investments talked about last night as speculative. We do not consider United States investments speculative; for the fact is that some $7 billion of United States money has helped to make this country what it is.

I listened to the manifestation of intellectual honesty of the Minister of Justice last night when he told us that taxes were higher in the United States than in Canada. Of course you can add up a set of taxes and show almost any figure, and figures do not lie, even though some people figure. But, Mr. Speaker, the minister did not tell you last night that we have a sales tax in Canada. And, by the way, I remember hearing what the Prime Minister used to say when I first came here. I wish the right hon. gentleman were here now, because, as I well remember, he almost wept over the fact that we had a sales tax of two per cent in 1921 and in 1925. It was terrific. In 1935 we were told that we were ruining the people, we were strangling trade, because there was a five per cent sales tax. Now we have a sales tax of eight per cent, and the Prime Minister does not weep at all.

These political twists, turns and manœuvres are all interesting and no less expensive to the Canadian people, but last night I was more disturbed than I was interested when I heard the Minister of Justice say that we had to be so careful. So that I shall not misquote him,—because I have some intellectual honesty too—I wish to quote his views: "But it would be undesirable, I feel sure, having in mind public opinion in the United States, to have a situation arise such as this: that the people in the United States should be keeping their taxes up to the high levels they have now attained, and that Canada, not contributing toward European recovery by way of credits, should seize the opportunity to push taxes down and cash in on the situation in such a way that we would inevitably be severely criticized and penalized by others." I have been a long time in this house, Mr. Speaker, but I have never witnessed a spectacle which more conspicuously illustrated an inferiority complex in relation to a foreign power than that. Surely, by that quirk of policy, the Minister of Justice is not going to force me, after all these years of campaigning in Ontario, to go to the western states and campaign among the farmers there to see if they will allow their congressmen to allow Canada to lower tariffs. It is so ridiculous that I am afraid that some scarcely comprehend the significance of it. I feel that we would be laughed at in Washington. If I made that statement in Dufferin-Simcoe, I am sure I would be laughed at; worse than that, I would not get back here. But, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HARTT: The hon. member does not know what we think.

Mr. ROWE: No. I think you think about the same.

Mr. HARTT: But we don't say anything.

Mr. ROWE: No, you don't say anything, but you think a lot. I do not blame you. The loyalty to leadership is marvellous. You think as you like, but you vote with your leader.

The present Minister of Justice has no monopoly on this at all, because when the twenty-five per cent excise tax was put on the new home builder, the Minister of Finance stated on December 16, 1947, his second reason for these taxes. These are taxes that were put on by order in council, by radio or telephone; I think the Toronto Star had them first, but they were put on anyway, and were collected before they were passed on by parliament. They were to be returned if they were not passed. They finally got through. These were the novel taxes that had to be put on quickly. This is what the Minister of Finance said, as reported at page 336 of Hansard of December 16, 1947:

> A second reason for these taxes was to limit so far as practicable the degree of discrimination—

Follow this, Mr. Speaker:

> —against regular suppliers in the United States and their dealer organizations in Canada. For the time being, many of these suppliers and dealers are losing a part of their business because of the unavoidable necessity of restricting imports from the United States. Regrettable as it is, we cannot help that. But by imposing these excise taxes we are doing something to protect the legitimate longer-range interests of these businesses.

There we have two ministers who are in unison at least on one thing. You can call it whatever kind of budget you like, but it looks like a made-in-Washington budget. It is not novel with the two ministers today, because prior to 1934 I sat in this house and listened to what the present Prime Minister had to say when the Hawley-Smoot tariff closed our markets in the United States to Canadian farmers. The Prime Minister said that we dare not raise tariffs against the United States at this time for fear we provoke the United States of America. I should like to ask the new aspirant for leadership, the Minister of Agriculture, if he agrees with that.

Mr. GARDINER: It is my hon. friend who is the new aspirant over there.

Mr. ROWE: I might be there as soon as the minister; you never know. However, I do not believe I am as anxiously seeking it. In all fairness I am not so sure that I would be as well fitted for it as he will be.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must point out to the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

An hon. MEMBER: Seven minutes yet.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member has unanimous consent, he may continue.

Mr. ROWE: I will not take long. I do not want to debate the matter of how much time I have left. Some say seven minutes and some say three. In view of your courtesy, Mr. Speaker, I will conclude as quickly as possible.

I asked the Minister of Agriculture if he agreed. I know the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Justice agree, and I expect the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) would agree. If they all agree, then I am not much surprised that it was reported the other day in the papers that the present Prime Minister, when he looks over these aspirants to carry the mantle of leadership of the once great Liberal party, is in more distress than ever, and says: "Anyway, no matter who takes it on, I will have to carry on as prime minister." I am not surprised.

Mr. GARDINER: He is a good one.

Mr. ROWE: That gives you encouragement, because no doubt you cannot miss if you can pass excuses on to him for a while. I notice that the Winnipeg Free Press mentions this matter on May 20, on the editorial page, in the following words:

> The position of Mr. King's successor, a man chosen by the party in office to lead it in the House of Commons, would be in a strange position indeed if he were not Prime Minister, and if a statesman no longer a party leader were still head of the government. Under our parliamentary system, power must go with responsibility.

The Winnipeg Free Press believes that. But with the bureaucratic development we have had here, we have seen a great deal of responsibility given to those who are not elected.

I am not going to delay matters further, Mr. Speaker, but will merely say this in conclusion. I hope I am not emphasizing too vigorously the statements that have been made by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Justice and agreed to by the Minister of Agriculture. Surely we do not want to provoke the United States; let us mind our own business. It seems to me that we have to wait and see what the United States are going to do in respect to many things. I can imagine some of my friends to the left—the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) who just spoke, for example—going down and asking John L. Lewis if the miners of the United States would let us reduce the taxes of the miners in Canada. No wonder, Mr. Speaker, our people are nervous. Let us be honest with ourselves and with our neighbours. Let us remove these restraints and this strangulation and get down to business. Let us appreciate the resources we have and unloose the energy and enterprise of our people that made us so great during the war and can do the same in time of peace. Do not be fearful. There is nothing so fearful as fear itself. Nothing so certainly assures failure as to think you are going to fail.

I would urge the minister and, despite his claims and appeals last night that he had not made an error, I urge the Minister of Justice, the former Minister of Finance, to call in all the economists—they are the men who have been doctoring our economy and planning our way of life—and say to them: Let us look this situation over and see if something cannot be done; let us put a "new look" on Canadian development, put new hope into Canadian enterprise, and put a new spirit into Canadian courage and faith in ourselves. Let them say to the people of Canada: We will put an honest value on our dollar, because we know that when we put an honest value on our dollar we will improve the position of the primary producer in Canada and discourage buying in the United States; and, as a business proposition, we will put this country on an honest road to success. Give us a free dollar; give us a free market for our wheat; give us a free market for our gold; give us a free market for our products. Give us free enterprise. I say, Mr. Speaker—and I speak for myself when I say it—that I am convinced, after many years in politics, that the more strangulation, restraint and restriction you place on trade, the more you discourage enterprise, initiative and the genius that made this nation what it is.

I have no apologies to offer to my friends who talk about state planning. They are only one degree worse in the proposals they have made than the practices of those who sit to your right, Mr. Speaker. But I urge upon the one-time traditionally great Liberal party to get back, if not to the principle of laissez-faire they boasted of for fifty years, at least to free enterprise, and give us a chance to take the shackles off and be honest with ourselves.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must apologize to the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I interrupted him and told him he had exhausted his time. Unfortunately I find I made a mistake. He had seven or seven and a half minutes more.

Mr. ROWE: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, perhaps it is a healthy sign of the times when a large budget surplus is frowned upon in this house instead of being acclaimed; and I am sure the minister would be the first to admit that very little enthusiasm was shown in this house, either on this side or on his own side, when he announced the size of the budget surplus and at the same time that there would be little or no relief from taxation. I believe the reason can be found in the concluding remarks of the minister, which will be found at page 4072 of Hansard:

> Canada today enjoys a level of employment, prosperity and national income, and a standard of living and of real social security never achieved before in the history of our country.

I think the government's budget stands condemned by that statement. If it is true that today we enjoy a higher level of employment, prosperity and national income and a higher standard of living than ever before, then certainly there can be no justification for the lack of social security in this country. We have no provision for those who are physically disabled or for the aged widows; no one can feel satisfied with the very low rates of the old age pension, or the amount of money paid the recipients of the war veterans allowance. I would ask how members on the Liberal side could be enthusiastic when they know that today thousands of physically incapacitated people, many of them bedridden for years, have absolutely no provision made for them, of course apart from the blind. How can the Liberals cheer a surplus when today old age pensioners have to take a miserable pittance of anywhere from $30 to $40 a month, while recipients of war veterans allowances are tied down to the same figures? And how can we condone reducing low incomes still further by taxation, while no provision is made in the budget for increasing the exemptions?

When hon. members were discussing the menace of communism they emphasized the fact that the democracies would be at fault if they were hesitant about taking the necessary steps to prove themselves more dynamic and humanitarian than the communist countries. I have heard this budget called many names, but I have not heard anyone refer to it as a dynamic or humanitarian budget. No doubt the minister will call it a cyclical budget; and of course a cyclical budget is based upon the premise that depressions are inevitable. So in good times we tax heavily in order to reduce the national debt and also reduce the standard of living of the people and their purchasing power. In depression years we reduce taxation and increase debt, and at the same time endeavour to prevent the standard of living from falling below starvation levels.

I think all hon. members will admit that this is a rather dreary kind of roundabout, because you never catch up with your objective. In other words, you have to wait for a war before a realistic policy is forthcoming and artificial financial limitations are modified. Then the national debt is allowed to skyrocket. After the war is over, the government once more takes it for granted that booms and depressions are inevitable, and adjusts its policies to that procedure. That has always been the record of orthodox finance. Of course, from the point of view of the usurer that may be regarded as sound finance, but from the point of view of many of the people it is a policy of despair.

If the present situation had evolved in peacetime I would agree that steps were necessary in order to prevent an inflationary rise. But the situation during the past two years has been the inevitable outcome of the war and the national financial policies of the government. That situation is rapidly changing today, due mainly to three things: the fact that people in the low-income brackets have largely spent their war savings; the fact that our loans to foreign countries have been largely spent, and the fact that reconversion in this country has been practically completed. Our plant capacity has been greatly increased, and either is in the process of putting forth or is about to put forth a tremendous volume of consumer goods.

Strangely enough, that situation seems to cause the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) a great deal of concern. I should like to quote what he said on this point during his budget speech, which is to be found at page 4246 of Hansard:

> According to this report, a survey of some four thousand companies, 2,241 of them in operation in 1939 and 1,971 coming into operation since, shows that these companies, when alterations are completed, will have a manufacturing capacity of $8·5 billion, as against $1·8 billion in 1939. In other words, the excess over 1939 is 377 per cent. The comparable figure in the United States is fifty per cent. That is, proportionately we have gone seven and a half times as fast as the United States.
> When I mentioned that the other evening the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply said: Well, what's the matter with that?—or words to that effect.

I would also interject, "What's the matter with that?" As a matter of fact, I think the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) should be highly complimented upon the rapid progress that has been made in reconversion. Then the hon. gentleman went on:

> The answer is this. If we can find markets for all these things; if we can sell all these goods and our producers of natural products can also sell all their goods, so that we will have the home market and the foreign market, that will be fine. But whether or not that is likely to happen remains to be seen . . .

The immediate result of this development is that an inordinate amount of our resources is turned toward this plant expansion, which means far less for the production of consumer goods, which in turn means this has been a most potent influence in the rising prices of consumer goods.

The hon. member points out that our manufacturing capacity has increased approximately four times since 1939. He points out that the plant expansion has been of an inflationary character, but apparently he fears that we shall not be able to maintain an effective demand against the production resulting from that expansion. Well, I would point out that this may well be the case if we press forward too rapidly our so-called anti-inflationary or deflationary policies. In the past, in this house, the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has deplored the fact that we have expanded our money supply by three to one on the basis of 1939. I should like to point out that where you have also expanded your capacity to produce goods by four to one you will certainly need that increased supply of money in order to ensure that the goods being produced can be sold. So I find it hard to understand why the hon. member would deplore the increase in money, while at the same time we had that tremendous increase in capital production.

Strangely enough, at the very time the hon. gentleman was referring to this tremendous expansion in production he was also extolling the virtues of saving. Saving is a good thing during times of inflation, or in the early development of a country, because as a result people postpone their spending. On the other hand, in normal times when people save, it is bound to mean that sales are curtailed, and in that way you reduce effective demand and make it necessary for the government to step in and increase spending in order to see that demand will not fall off, which of course would result in decreased production.

Then also the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario emphasizes the fact that there is no secret source of money. I think the hon. member would agree with me that it is a very good thing the so-called humbug of finance has been exploded. He will recall that it is not so many years ago since the banking fraternity in this country used to try to make people believe that the only money they could lend was their deposits. Yet, today it is common knowledge across the country that loans by banks are made by creating the means of payment.

While that fact is generally known, unfortunately it is not so well known that national money can be used to meet government expenditures, without any danger of inflation, provided that a proper degree of regulation is applied. That is especially true in a time of lag in capital investment, when there is a lag in effective demand.

Coming back to the point I had been making before I proceeded to follow the ramblings of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, I would say I was emphasizing the fact that war savings have been largely spent, that our loans to various countries have been spent, that reconversion has been largely completed and that our productive capacity has been greatly expanded and is now in process of putting forth a tremendous quantity of goods. I was pointing out that these factors will tend in the future—I would say in the immediate future—to offset inflation. Therefore the government's anti-inflationary or deflationary budget policy not only will prolong the hardship of the low-income groups, but may very well endanger our ability to maintain a high level of production and employment in the country.

In other words, I would say it is a deliberate step toward increased unemployment and a lower standard of living, the very thing the minister himself has emphasized may very well come about in the near future. In other words, to put it another way, he has said we cannot expect to maintain indefinitely the high level of employment and the standard of living we now have.

I am glad, however, that the Minister of Finance did emphasize the fact that nothing can be gained by building up a fund for future defence. Furthermore, it is well to realize that you cannot provide for future defence by providing a surplus now; on the contrary it may well weaken our economy. Our best contribution to the future defence of Canada is to keep Canada in a strong condition, our industries in a high state of efficiency and productivity, and our people in the best possible state of health, highly skilled and contented.

We cannot hope to remain strong if we adjust our economy to a policy of booms and busts—or depressions, or whatever you wish to call them. I would say that now is the time to plan against depressions of the future, because to a large extent the cause of depressions is lack of effective demand. Surely we can prevent depressions if we maintain the people's purchasing power at a level sufficiently high to buy the total production of the country and the imports we bring in, in exchange for our exports. We cannot expect other people to buy our products unless we are prepared to buy their exports. We are not able to buy their exports unless the people's purchasing power is maintained at a level which will make it possible for them to make those purchases.

The Minister of Finance insists that we must budget for a surplus in order to reduce the national debt. That appears to be also the attitude of the Progressive Conservative party and of the C.C.F. I think the Progressive Conservative party emphasized the fact that the surplus is too large; and the C.C.F. emphasized the fact that that kind of policy is necessary under private enterprise.

We in this group also believe in reducing the national debt, but we do not believe in doing it at the expense of the misery of thousands of the people. We believe there is an alternative to the minister's budget proposals. During the war we constantly urged a pay-as-you-go policy. That is, to the extent that taxation and borrowing of the people's savings failed to meet government expenditures, we advocated financing through the Bank of Canada. However, instead of doing that, the government financed its deficits as largely as possible through the chartered banks, thereby expanding both the debt and the money supply by over three billions of dollars.

It was then argued by the minister that to finance through the Bank of Canada would be more inflationary, the reason being that when money from the Bank of Canada got into circulation and was deposited in the chartered banks we would be increasing the cash reserves of those chartered banks, and they would then be in a position to expand their loans in the ratio of ten to one on the basis of those increased cash reserves.

In view of the fact that we are advocating the reduction of the national debt through the utilization of the national credit, I say it need not be either inflationary or burdensome upon the chartered banks. When the leader of this group spoke in this debate he advocated the setting up of a national monetary authority, working in conjunction with the Bank of Canada and responsible to the people of the country, through parliament, this authority to exercise effective control over the operation of the monetary system, including the issue and withdrawal of all currency and credit.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) then advocated the reduction of the national debt by the national monetary authority, calling in dominion bonds held by the chartered banks and giving them a credit in the Bank of Canada. In order that the national monetary authority should exercise effective control over the issuing of credit by the chartered banks, so as to prevent inflation and deflation, the following procedure could be adopted—and this at times has been referred to as a 100 per cent system.

It is interesting to note that the 100 per cent system has in the past been endorsed by a number of practical bankers and economists, and also by Babson's Reports Incorporated. Briefly the proposal is to amend the Bank Act to compel chartered banks to maintain 100 per cent cash reserves behind their demand deposits. This increased cash reserve would be provided to the chartered banks by giving them a credit in the Bank of Canada in exchange for dominion bonds held by them.

In the April, 1948, statistical summary of the Bank of Canada we find these figures: demand deposits of chartered banks, $2,201 million; active notice deposits, $629 million. The Bank of Canada classifies one-sixth of notice deposits as active notice, because they are actively drawn on. They therefore have included them in the money supply. This makes a total of $2,830 million.

Therefore sufficient dominion bonds would be turned over to the national monetary authority to provide 100 per cent backing behind this deposit liability. I would ask those who may argue that this would be depriving the chartered banks of revenue which they require if they are to operate efficiently why the Canadian people should be taxed to subsidize the chartered banks to give free service on demand deposit accounts. Let the banks meet their cost of operation by a service charge on the depositors. Let the people who are utilizing the banks pay for that service instead of expecting the government to tax the Canadian people in order to provide additional revenue for the chartered banks.

The result of the 100 per cent system would be to curtail inflationary expansion of loans by the chartered banks. They could lend only the money they had on hand. In order to expand their loans, they would have either to borrow from the national monetary authority or to turn over bonds which they might still have on hand to the national monetary authority, in exchange for funds. Then at times when the government was obliged to seek additional money to that obtained by taxation, national money could be used without fear of inflationary or deflationary action on the part of the chartered banks.

In order to summarize our position in relation to both debt and inflation, we urge the establishment of effective control over the monetary system. As explained already, this will provide for a substantial reduction of our national debt. From time to time, as capital investment lags, the government will be in a position to call in dominion bonds, paying for them out of national money. In that way capital will be provided for private investment, and we shall be able to develop our own resources instead of depending upon the United States for capital. It will tend also to stimulate venture capital in this country and will provide as well for a progressive reduction in the national debt.

We all realize that the only way to overcome inflation and at the same time plan for a maximum standard of living is by converting and expanding our industrial plant to a high degree of efficiency and productivity. It is true that this program in its initial stages is inflationary until the resulting flow of goods catches up to and satisfies demand. We are rapidly approaching that situation today. Obviously, if we had carried on our program of reconversion and expansion of plant more slowly, the situation would have been less inflationary. On the other hand, the sands of time are running fast and people expect today that the same vigorous action which won for us the war by high levels of production must also win for us a high standard of living in peacetime, this to be achieved as rapidly as possible.

As the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has already emphasized, we are rapidly reaching the time when a tremendous volume of consumer goods will be available to the people of Canada. This will bring an end to the inflationary pressure. I urge upon the minister the need of easing up on his anti-inflationary or deflationary policies before they land us in a position where demand lags behind supply and thus reduces our standard of living. With these facts in mind and knowing that three years after the war the people have the right to a certain basic standard of living, the hon. member for Peace River submitted certain proposals to the house as an alternative. For a moment I should like to summarize these briefly since they have been already placed on the record.

I have already placed on the record the proposal for effective control over the monetary system and a reduction of the national debt. The hon. member for Peace River proposed the following changes in expenditures in addition to the expenditures submitted by the minister. He proposed a cancellation of existing reductions in family allowances for each child after the fourth and later, as production increases, a forty per cent increase. He proposed also immediate provision for an increase in old age pensions at seventy years without a means test, with the age limit to be reduced progressively downward to sixty years as production expands.

Also pensions to needy widows of sixty years and to all disabled people not otherwise provided for; provision to increase war veterans allowances from $40 to $50 for single and $70 to $85 for married persons; to increase 100 per cent disability pensions to $100 a month, and the encouragement by subsidy or otherwise of the increased production of primary products the importation of which from the United States had caused a shortage of United States dollars. The estimated cost of those five proposals would be $289 million.

Then the hon. member proposed certain changes in revenue. He proposed that the sales tax and the twenty-five per cent excise tax be abolished, which would cost approximately $395 million. He proposed raising the exemptions for income tax for single persons from $750 to $1,500 and married persons from $1,500 to $2,400, incomes in excess of $3,000 to be taxed on a basis beginning at forty per cent. This would cost approximately $300 million. The proposed changes in corporate tax would not mean much change either way.

The total estimated loss in revenue would be $695 million; adding to that the increased expenditures of $289 million would give a total change or budget upset of $984 million. This amount to be provided for by using from the estimated surplus $484 million with a saving in interest charges of $100,000. There should be an increased revenue from remaining sources arising from taxation over and above the calculation by the minister and resulting from increased buoyancy amounting to $100 million. The remaining $300 million would be taken care of by the use of national credit. If the minister has underestimated the revenue for this year as he did last year there might very well not be any deficit at all.

In the budget debate it is permissible to have only one amendment and one amendment to the amendment, otherwise the hon. member for Peace River would have moved his proposals as an amendment. So I shall say a few words about the two amendments that are before the house. First we have the amendment moved by the Progressive Conservative party, which is a straight vote of want of confidence. This reads:

> This house is of the opinion that the government does not possess the confidence of the country.

That of course, is just a statement of fact which I do not think anyone would dispute.

Mr. ABBOTT: Just wishful thinking.

Mr. QUELCH: Since no alternative proposals are included in that amendment, there is nothing to disagree with and naturally we shall be able to support it.

Mr. KNOWLES: Even the government will have to agree with it.

Mr. QUELCH: They should and perhaps they will before very long.

Mr. GRANT: The people do not agree.

Mr. QUELCH: If you go back to the last election you will find that the statement is true, because certainly the majority of the people did not support the government, and the number will probably be still less at the next election.

Mr. GRANT: A majority over all.

Mr. QUELCH: You did not have a majority. The C.C.F. amendment reads:

That the said amendment be amended by inserting after the word "government" and before the word "does" in the second line of the amendment, the following words:

". . . has failed to relieve the excessive burden of taxation on the low income groups of the Canadian people:

(a) By failing to increase the amounts of exemption from income tax from the present levels to $1,250 for single and $2,500 for married people, and . . .

The only difference there is that we feel the $1,250 should be raised to $1,500. In our opinion it costs a single person more than half as much to live as it does a married couple. In many cases a single person is living in accommodation which could be used for two people. The C.C.F. no doubt feel there should be some form of encouragement to get bachelors to marry, and therefore they will tax them a little bit heavier and persuade them, but we have the obvious fact that some bachelors are what one might call choosy. I do not necessarily mean to say choosy in regard to the type of female they pick up, but rather choosy with regard to the type of accommodation they want to get ready before they become married. Therefore, if you tax them too heavily they will never be in a position where they can set up house. Consequently we feel that we should reduce taxation on bachelors by raising the exemptions up to $1,500.

(b) by failing to remove or substantially reduce the burden of sales and excise taxes which bear most heavily on those suffering from low income and the present high cost of living.

There is no question about it; we would support that.

And further, the government has failed to establish a public investment board to assure the channeling of capital investment into socially desirable projects as a means of maintaining full employment, increasing production and raising the standard of living of the Canadian people, and . . .

We interpret full employment as meaning the full employment and development of our natural resources. With regard to the investment board, we have from time to time urged the setting up of a national monetary authority to control the monetary system, and to bring about a proper relationship between the production of capital goods and consumer goods. We also realize that it is essential to regulate investments in the interests of the Canadian people, and prevent over-development of industries for export at the expense of the home market, and also to expand the production of these goods which at the present time we have to import from the United States, thereby draining away United States dollars. Therefore on the basis of my interpretation, we will support the C.C.F. amendment, although it does not go as far as our proposals to safeguard the welfare of the people; and furthermore, it does not provide any alternative to heavy taxation as a means of reducing our national debt.

Mr. LUDGER DIONNE (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I have not much to say with respect to the budget as a whole, but I understand that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) wishes to take—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Move farther down toward the centre.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the reporter cannot hear the hon. member. I think he will have to speak louder or come down this way.

Mr. MARQUIS: Why cannot you move down?

Mr. NICHOLSON: We cannot move the reporter down.

Mr. ABBOTT: He can hear; he has good ears.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do you not want to hear the hon. member for Beauce?

Mr. DIONNE (Beauce): I have not much to say with respect to the budget as a whole. I understand that the Minister of Finance wishes to take advantage of the prosperous years to try to reduce our debts, and I cannot object to such a sound policy.

However, I wonder whether the minister is logical in his policy in dropping the duty on cotton piece goods imported from foreign countries. The minister should know that British goods are being sold to us at prices far above the British home market. Why? I imagine it is because the Britishers want to make more money in their trading with us. In addition to that, why is it that British industry is bound to sell its goods at a cheaper price for home consumption than it does abroad? Evidently because England wants to avoid inflation at home. If this policy is good for England, I do not understand why it should not be good for Canada. Then, how shall we control inflation in Canada if through a reduction of duty we encourage our people to buy goods from England at fancy prices? That is exactly what our people did in 1947. They bought at any price everything that appealed to them. What has happened? The government had to institute an austerity program to stop this spending spree. Any intelligent man will admit that it is not a sound policy to buy goods at prices above the market. We are no longer in a buyer's market. If the minister had got in touch with Canadian manufacturers of textiles he would have heard that we have definitely entered into a seller's market.

I know many manufacturers of textiles who have orders on hand for hardly a few weeks in advance. I know a lot of them who have a substantial amount of manufactured goods on hand, which are not sold. Mostly all Canadian manufacturers of textiles report that they receive only hand-to-mouth orders from their customers. Precisely at the time when Canadian manufacturers are preparing to undergo a severe depression in their business the minister should be very careful not to create any more undue competition. The enlargement and modernization of textile plants in Canada have been such within the last few years that the Canadian market cannot absorb our production in normal times. Canadian manufacturers are looking for export markets to keep their plants in operation. Unfortunately the sterling area seems to have created an iron curtain which does not permit goods coming from dollar countries to penetrate, namely, New Zealand, Australia, Ireland, India, British West Indies and some other countries.

I shall relate the facts to show how our export markets are gradually being closed by England. Recently a Canadian manufacturer was offered an initial order for textile goods from India, amounting to $150,000. The Canadian manufacturer accepted it. The buyer in India could not obtain a permit from his government to get the necessary dollars to pay for the goods. Why? Last year we bought $10,000,000 worth of goods from India, and we sold to India only $4,000,000 worth. There is no question of a shortage of Canadian dollars in this case. India had $6,000,000 in her favour to buy our goods. Where had the $6,000,000 gone to? The answer is England. This situation exists all over the sterling area. In such a serious circumstance I should like the minister to tell us where we shall sell our surplus of manufactured products. Shall we always be at the mercy of England to dispose of them? If so, I can see pretty tough times ahead for the Canadian people.

Would it not be a better policy for the Minister of Finance to put his natural sympathy aside when dealing with the English people, and act like a businessman. Does the Minister of Finance imagine that the Britishers will protect our national economy? I am sure he does not; therefore, why not act accordingly?

During the war the export of textiles was forbidden by the government. A large amount of business was lost to the Canadian textile mills. On this account most of the connections that textile business had with foreign countries were disrupted. Now that the textile business is trying to regain these markets, the doors are closed by England. How long shall we have to witness our own economy being destroyed in favour of England? Are we Canadians or Britishers? This is a very serious situation, more particularly with respect to the Canadian textile industry.

The fact that Canada imported in the year 1947, 275 million yards of cotton does not prove that our Canadian industry cannot supply our markets. It only goes to show that the shelves were empty at the end of the war, and had to be replenished. The Canadian industry, which had devoted its efficiency to the production of war material, was not in a position to fill the shelves all over Canada all at one time. This explains the large volume of importations of textile goods which took place in the course of 1947, but I do not believe that all these goods are sold. A substantial quantity is still on the shelves and creates an abnormal situation for our Canadian manufacturers, because 275 million yards average over twenty-two yards for every Canadian, including babies, in addition to our own production. At present our Canadian manufacturers have to pay twenty pence to English manufacturers for synthetic fibre or rayons. The price to the English manufacturer is only sixteen pence for the same material. Before the Canadian manufacturers begin to use this English rayon, it costs them over seven cents a pound, or twenty-five per cent more than the English manufacturers.

If you compare the wages of English and Canadian labour you will note that the Canadian manufacturers have to pay at least sixty per cent more than English manufacturers to everyone of their employees. You will have the proof of this in reading the report of the Aronson wage agreement. These were British government appointed commissioners under the chairmanship of Lord

Evershed. This is a part of the agreement with reference to some textile jobs:

	Per week
Picker tenders	22.22
Strippers and card grinders	24.00
Card tenders	13.00
Drawing frame tenders	16.97
Roving frame operators	13.45
Slubbers operators	15.76
Spinners operators	15.76
Repair man	22.22

Anyone can guess the enormous amount of money involved for Canadian manufacturers in this wide difference in wages.

Under such circumstances, I dare say that this drop in the duty may compel many Canadian manufacturers to reduce their production, with the result that numerous employees will be out of jobs and the national unemployment office will have to provide means of living for all of them for an indefinite period, notwithstanding the dislocation it will produce in our industry.

If English labour was not standardized; in other words, if an English employee had the right to work, to the extent of his ability and ambition, our sympathetic minister might have some kind of justification for introducing such legislation. But this is not the case. Textile plants in England are not allowed to operate on two shifts. None of these industries can operate for more than eight hours a day and no employee is allowed to perform more than a certain amount of specified work during his working time. These are the rules and regulations of the unions in England. The English businessman knows all that, but he has no control over the situation. The socialist government in England does not dare to interfere in union regulations, for reasons that everyone knows. Now our Minister of Finance indirectly asks us to support these unsound, uneconomical English labour practices to the detriment of Canadian labour.

A textile plant is so expensive that when it operates for only eight hours a day the overhead is prohibitive and the material produced in such a plant has to be sold at a very high price in order to leave a profit to the producer.

Here in Canada, labour understands this situation and in general is willing to work to the extent of its ability. Mills are operated on two shifts and sometimes three, in order to reduce the cost of the material produced in such mills.

I leave it to the house to imagine what kind of reception Canadian textile labour will give to this reduction in tariff. I do not think the Canadian Minister of Finance has any reason to take the risk of producing such a profound disturbance in our Canadian labour for the benefit of English labour.

It should be the duty of the English government to enact proper legislation in order to enable English manufacturers to produce at a cost which will permit them to compete for foreign business.

The English government is doing exactly the contrary. Precisely when our Minister of Finance announces the drop in duty on English textile, the English government raises the price of raw cottons to British manufacturers as follows: The price of American cotton bought by the English government has been increased from 2·20 to 3·40 cents a pound. The price of Egyptian cotton has been raised 8·40 cents a pound, as published in the May 17 World Market Review of New York.

Furthermore, England is short of labour. She will naturally do as some Canadian manufacturers did last year. She will send raw cotton or synthetic fibres to be manufactured in Italy, Germany or some other country where labour is still cheaper than in Great Britain and where they are willing to work on three shifts.

The same review announces a trade pact by which England will supply raw cotton and bleached sulphite to Germany. This cotton, as well as the bleached sulphite, will be manufactured there into textile goods and filament rayon and will be shipped back to England. It involves a transaction of $55,000,000.

Broadcloth for shirts is in short supply in Canada, as well as filament rayon. We could have made the bargain direct with Germany just as well as England. We could have bought and supplied raw cotton and bleached sulphite to make cotton piece goods and filament rayon and have paid for the manufacturing of it with foodstuffs and thus begun to create a market outside of England for our agricultural products. We could thus have obtained the exact kinds of textile goods which we are short of, at a much lower price.

Unfortunately, we never thought of that. So the United States will sell cotton to England. We shall sell Canadian bleached sulphite to England. England will take a substantial profit on United States cotton and on our bleached sulphite that she will ship to Germany. England will probably pay Germany for the transformation of this raw material into any kind of textile goods with our own foodstuffs, on which she will, no doubt, make another substantial profit. She will ship us back the textile goods that she will get from Germany and again make another substantial profit on them. See how smart these Britishers are. How do we compare in the picture? If England cannot dispose of this $55,000,000 worth of textile goods at market price, she will dump it at any price she can get on foreign markets. She may dump it right into the Canadian market if she cannot succeed in getting the exorbitant prices she is at present asking. How can we reasonably conceive that this enormous amount of textiles will not affect our industry? How can we expect to open the doors of other countries for our textile goods under such circumstances?

Who will get the benefit of this deal? England. Who will pay for these indirect large profits and high prices? The Canadian people. Who will lose by it? The Canadian government. Who will be penalized by it? Canadian labour and the German people, who will have to accept whatever wages England decides to impose upon them.

Now, let us consider the action of the British government in regard to the German people. Here is a nation which has been living on the charity of the American people for three years. The United States wants to help put these people back on their feet and is giving away billions of dollars for this purpose. England is so managing as to make a profitable deal out of it. Is it not a pity to see the British government take advantage of American charity to exploit the misery of the starving German people?

It might be interesting for hon. members to know the national income of our people compared with the income of countries in which some of these textile piece goods will no doubt be manufactured. On referring to page 44 of congressional United States proceedings volume 4, No. 1, December 1947, I find the following information:

"The united nations conference on trade and employment now meeting in Havana, Cuba, had assembled some interesting figures on national income in terms of United States dollars," continued Mr. Javits. "The United States national income of $1,200 per person per year was probably the greatest ever attained by any people. In France, it was $300; in Great Britain, $400; in Italy and Austria, $100 and in Greece, $70 per annum. In Argentine it was $300; in Brazil, less than $100 and in Chile, about $150 per person per annum."

How do you expect our labour to compete under such conditions with labour of foreign countries where the national income is so low? The more I think of the matter, the more I am inclined to conclude that it is unfair, unjust and unwise legislation to impose on the Canadian people.

When England wants to buy something from Canada, she sends representatives here to bargain with us. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) knows something about the matter. My colleagues and I also remember the wheat deal of two or three years ago when England got our wheat at $1.35 to $1.55 a bushel when the market price was around $3 a bushel.

I recall the loan of $1,250 million made to England to buy our wheat. Heaven only knows if we shall ever be repaid this amount. I think the Minister of Finance has still something to learn from these Englishmen. I am practically convinced that if an English minister had the courage to propose to his government legislation such as that now submitted to us by the Canadian Minister of Finance, he would, to say the least, receive a very cold reception from his colleagues.

In proposing that cotton and rayon piece goods be admitted free in this country, the Minister of Finance states that the United Kingdom has for many years supplied an important part of our requirements of these commodities. I question this logic, because for many years England has been gradually losing her market for cotton textiles. Before the war her cotton industry was the despair of her industrialists, and her industry was unable to compete because of the labour unions' refusal to operate more than one shift. Furthermore, the labour unions opposed the introduction of automatic machinery on the ground that it would displace workers. Finally they had to admit in 1944, when they sent an official commission to the United States and Canada, that their textile industry was non-competitive. This is the handicap the English government should try to overcome. This would be a constructive and lasting move in the right direction.

The minister knows that British manufacturers sell their products at prices which are too high for us to buy. He knows these prices are very much higher than those prevailing in England. However, he is ready to let these goods come into Canada duty free. How can he justify such a strange business conception? It is simply amazing to hear such an unusual business proposition.

Does the minister think he is helping England by so doing? I dare say he is simply prolonging her agony. I know of no country, no industry and no people who can prosper without working. England will have to stop scheming and will have to abide by this universal law if she wants to get out of the rut. What England needs is to put her people to work. It is about time somebody told them that such a deal as that cannot help her. It will simply delay the greatly needed cleaning of her house. The sooner she is compelled to do it, the better for all concerned.

With respect to income tax, I have already declared on two different occasions in this house that I did not favour any income tax on revenue of $1,500 for a single person and $3,000 for a married man. I do not like this method of taxation, because it is unjust, unfair and dishonest on account of the many people who evade the law. It is also a matter of great concern and anxiety for the farmers who do not know the law and who cannot comply with such legislation. How do you expect a farmer to answer properly a questionnaire such as the one printed on form T-1, a copy of which I have in my hand? It would take a competent auditor to answer intelligently every question printed on this form, and this auditor would have to follow it up year after year. Many farmers come to my office frequently with such forms asking me what to do with them. How do you want me to answer? I cannot tell them not to obey the law. On the other hand, they are unable to answer properly and intelligently practically any one of these questions. If I advise them to answer to the best of their ability, I know the income tax collectors will start to correspond with them regularly, asking for more information, until such time as the farmers get exasperated and throw the whole correspondence into the stove. Legislation should not be drafted in order to make people miserable.

I realize that the government will lose a substantial amount of revenue in exempting people with revenues of $1,500 and $3,000 respectively. But I have made suggestions to the government to compensate for this loss of revenue. I believe that if my suggestion had been given due consideration it would have helped to overcome inflation and would have been a source of satisfaction among the Canadian population.

I do not speak frequently in this house, but when I do so I try my best to co-operate in the creation of sound and honest legislation. Unfortunately, the suggestions of the backbenchers do not seem to create much of an impression on the Minister of Finance, but I hope that he will amend his ways. If he does not, we may just as well stop kidding ourselves any longer by using resounding hollow words like "autonomy", and take our colonial status which is the only rank we deserve.

Mr. ALAN COCKERAM (York South): In entering this budget debate, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to occupy the time of the house at any great length, but I do wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) a few pertinent facts in connection with the oppressive taxation now existent, and to make a few suggestions which I feel warrant serious consideration.

For a nation of twelve and one-half million people, our burden of taxation is excessive when considered in relationship to the stage of our development, and the problems facing us in this regard. Last year the total revenue of all governments in Canada—federal, provincial and municipal—amounted to approximately $4,058 million. This figure represents no less than 37½ per cent of the national income for 1947. If we consider taxation from the aspect of the personal income of Canadians for 1947, which totalled $10,110 million, 40 per cent was required to maintain our various governments. By far the greater amount of this revenue, $2,819 million, was taken by the federal government.

The effect of this oppressive burden of taxation on the individual Canadian is apparently quite evident to everyone except the Minister of Finance and his colleagues in the cabinet. I am sure that members who support the government in this house will agree with me in that statement.

We have come to the unfortunate position in this nation where forty cents out of every dollar of personal income last year was required to maintain our governments in the federal, provincial, and municipal fields.

One of the reasons advanced for the high percentage of personal income taken by governments in Canada is the demand for services and social security made by our people. Today in Canada, 16·2 per cent of the gross expenditures of our federal government is required to meet the costs of family allowances, old age and blind pensions, and unemployment insurance. Another 14·85 per cent of our gross expenditures goes to meet the cost of veterans' pensions. Agricultural and price control subsidies require another 4·3 per cent. Servicing of our public debt takes another 21·21 per cent. These are all charges which, in the opinion of a great many people, will in the aggregate increase rather than decrease in the years ahead.

I believe that as a democratic nation we must not only maintain but expand our social security measures in this country. As a member of this house I approve the policy of adequate pensions for those entitled to a better deal. I approve the steps which have been taken by different governments in the past in the field of social security, and recognize that the costs to the nation for social security, medical services, pensions, et cetera, will tend to increase rather than to decrease as the years go on.

Last year, 8·87 per cent of our gross expenditures was required for national defence. I believe that our expenditures in this regard will tend to increase rather than to decrease in the years that lie ahead.

With regard to national defence expenditures, I think the present program of the government is wholly inadequate and unsound. Located as we are between two countries where war hysteria is rampant—in one country because of lack of facts outside the iron curtain, and in the other country because of lack of facts inside the iron curtain—our present national defence program is wholly inadequate. We do not know whether or not Canada will be dragged into another war in the not distant future. I recognize, however, that our greatest security is preparedness, and that the Canadian people must spend money and effort to protect themselves.

I recognize, also, that we cannot build up adequate defences for this nation and at the same time lower our expenditures in this regard, and that our defence program must necessarily be a long-range program. Unfortunately, the Russians today are obsessed by their insecurity, which leads them to believe that behind every action by the democratic nations in international affairs there must be some sinister design. As a neighbour nation of Russia, we must realize that probably generations must pass before people of that country can be expected to view the international scene with detachment, and without a feeling that every move by the outside world is designed to attack them.

Recognition of this, Mr. Speaker, should make it clear to the government and to the people of Canada that the need for us, as a nation, to build up our defences for our own security will be with us for many years and will, over those years, cost this nation vast sums of money.

In short, recognizing (a) the cost of essential services, including the servicing of our national debt; (b) the need for adequate defences for our own survival, and (c) the need for maintenance and expansion of social security measures for our people, it means that billion dollar budgets are with us to stay, as I said when I spoke on the budget last year.

I do not, however, approve the method followed by this government in meeting the costs of these things I have mentioned as essential, by the oppressive taxation with which the individual Canadian is now burdened, and which we apparently must bear until we come closer to an election. I recognize, further, that the money has to come from somewhere, and as an alternative to this oppressive taxation I suggest a policy of expansion and development, designed to broaden the basis of taxation and to lower the burden now carried by the Canadian people.

As a first step, I suggest the appointment of a full-time minister of mines, forests and scientific services. The action taken by the government last fall in establishing this branch of the Department of Mines and Resources was a step in the right direction, but unfortunately does not go far enough. I believe that this nation requires a full-time minister for the work now under the jurisdiction of the mines, forests and scientific services branch, and that the expenditures by this government in regard to the work of this department have been most niggardly, and penny wise and pound foolish, in the past.

With a total gross expenditure by this government last year of $2,634 million, the total expenditure to develop and assist the mineral industry of Canada was only $3,356,000. In other words, of every dollar spent by this government, approximately one-eighth of a cent was all that was spent to encourage and assist the mining industry in all its phases; and this, notwithstanding the fact that the estimated value of mineral production for 1947 was approximately $620 million, or an estimated figure of $49.60 per capita.

The mineral industry of Canada, under the able guidance and with the assistance of a full-time minister, is capable of increasing its production to over a billion dollars annually; and if one is optimistic one can look, in the course of a few years, for an annual production in excess of the gross expenditures of this government last year.

I would suggest that the following matters of policy be taken under consideration immediately by a full-time minister of mines, forests and scientific services:

1. Decide with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) what is to be the policy of this nation in regard to the processing in Canada of primary mineral products, giving due regard to domestic demand and ability to sell in foreign markets.

2. Review with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) our present position with regard to existing supplies of strategic minerals both from a domestic and a continental defence aspect. It is no secret that dangerous shortages of strategic minerals exist in the United States today, particularly in regard to lead, zinc, copper, high-grade iron ore, and petroleum, and I would be most surprised if similar conditions do not prevail in Canada at the present time.

3. Review with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) anticipated demands for employment in Canada—a problem which could quite conceivably become a matter of urgent national importance.

It is recognized that for every man in Canada employed underground in the mining industry, employment is provided for ten other people in servicing the demands of the industry in various fields.

4. Review with the minister of immigration the ability of the industry to absorb, in gainful employment, above Canadian demands, those who come to this country from abroad in search of a new home and a new life.

5. Reconsider the question of assistance to the provinces to defray the costs of improving transportation facilities into mining areas discontinued by this government last year.

This work in the past has had the effect of encouraging active development in many promising areas hitherto devoid of transportation facilities. I refer more particularly to the Snow lake district in northern Manitoba and to the Yellowknife district of the Northwest Territories.

6. Provide for scientific technical and other investigations designed to further the development of the mining, metallurgical and related industries in Canada and the production of commercial products from otherwise waste materials.

7. Provide greater governmental research facilities for the purpose of discovering greater efficiency in lower mining costs, and greater recovery from ores at present available.

8. As mineral production increases, and since minerals are a wasting asset, I suggest that such a program is essential and that a greater appropriation should be made for geological survey work than has been provided for in the past.

9. Reverse the present policy of the bureaucrats behind the government of this country, and take immediate steps to develop among Canadians an appreciation of the economic importance of the mining industry to this nation.

I believe that these suggestions warrant serious consideration by this government. True, they involve expenditures beyond those at present provided; but they are expenditures which will be repaid many times over in increased production, increased employment, increased revenue to the government in the way of taxes, and, last but not least, increased security for this nation.

All parties in this house are in accord with the principle of budgeting for a surplus of revenues over expenditures. But we are not in agreement with such a policy at the expense of:

1. Oppressive taxation on lower incomes.

2. Paying off a large proportion of war debts by the present generation without corresponding governmental assistance to facilitate making the natural resources of this country available to the present generation to meet these heavy taxes.

3. Without any appreciable effort on behalf of the government to curtail and eliminate waste and extravagance.

It is significant that in the presentation of his budget the Minister of Finance failed to give concrete evidence of any real effort by his department and other government departments to eradicate duplication, waste and extravagance.

I listened with particular interest to the speech delivered this afternoon by my good friend the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). The hon. member recalled the statement made eighteen years ago when, in the face of the Hawley-Smoot tariff, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) urged parliament and the people of Canada to frame our tariff policies so as not in any case to provoke the United States. He recalled the words of the Minister of Finance uttered in this house six months ago that we must tax Canadian industries twenty-five per cent so as to protect the long-range interests of United States firms.

Last night we heard from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) speaking for the government and telling the house that before tax reductions are considered in this house we must conduct ourselves so that we shall not be "severely criticized and penalized by the United States".

In the words of a member of the press gallery, the budget was written "by the uneasy light of the stars in fear of the stripes".

Mr. H. R. ARGUE (Wood Mountain): Mr. Speaker, when introducing the budget the minister gave us a summary of world conditions today. In my opinion, and I believe it is all to the good, the war hysteria which was so rampant in Canada some months ago has now ebbed considerably. I believe that only through working in the united nations with the other great countries can Canada do her part toward bringing about peace and prosperity in the world.

I am sorry that the government has not yet seen fit to recognize the new state of Israel. Our Canadian delegation supported the partition of Palestine. It seems to me that partition is now a fact, and our government should follow the governments of the United States, the U.S.S.R., and now our sister commonwealth nation, the Union of South Africa, in recognizing this state of Israel, so that Jewish people throughout the world may have in fact their long-hoped-for national home.

It has been said often in this debate that the Canadian people were disappointed by this budget. That is putting it mildly. The Canadian people generally expected more from the government. They expected more, because the government has said to them during the war and also during the 1945 election, "If you elect us we will prevent inflation, we will provide stability of prices and we will implement with the provinces an over-all social security program." So the people of Canada were disappointed. When, on the one hand, they saw a large surplus of revenues over expenditures, namely $670 million, and at the same time they saw in the budget no real evidence that the government was prepared to improve the lot of the average working man, they were disappointed.

In my opinion the government in this budget has done nothing to improve the lot of the average Canadian. Moreover, the lot of the average Canadian has worsened considerably since the budget of 1947, as a result of government policy. The people of Canada at this time were hoping that the eight per cent sales tax would be removed, that exemptions from income tax would be increased and that the government would undertake a social security program to provide better and more adequate old age pensions, and to provide an over-all health program.

There are many people in Canada at the same time—a growing number—who in a sense are not disappointed in the budget because they could not expect much from this government. I refer to the rank and file membership of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation. The C.C.F. has become a national party because it believes that the present free enterprise system of the Liberal government, or any alternative free enterprise government, will not and cannot bring forward the legislation that is necessary to provide all Canadians with a decent standard of living and a fair share of the great wealth Canada can produce.

The members of the C.C.F. party across Canada know that their party has an alternative to the present inadequate, reactionary and backward-looking budget. The C.C.F. record is clear. It stands for price control; it stands for the removal of the sales tax on the necessities of life; it stands for a national labour code with adequate minimum wages and with a work week of forty hours. The C.C.F. party believes that profits of corporations should be kept within reason. Profits should not be allowed to run wild until they reach the point where, as the minister emphasized in his budget speech time and time again, capital expansion on construction and equipment reaches the stage where it adds severely to the inflationary spiraling of prices. The C.C.F. party believes that the only way to handle the great monopolistic corporations which so dominate the economic life of the Canadian people today is to bring those corporations under public ownership and operate them for the benefit of the Canadian people at large.

Canadians did not expect that in May, 1948, three years after the war, the cost of living would be as high as it is. Canadians did not expect to see inflation rampant in this country. At one time the minister prophesied that he expected the cost of living index would settle around 145, but today it is 152. The Ottawa Citizen of January 16 contained an article giving statements by various members of government made during the past few years in relation to the problem of inflation and price control. The statement is headed in this way—

Mr. PROBE: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. I am wondering if we lack a quorum just now?

Mr. SPEAKER: It being six o'clock, I shall now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ARGUE: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was about to deal with some of the commitments made by members of the government to the people of Canada, namely, that the government in the post-war period would undertake such measures as would prevent inflation. I was about to quote from an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of January 16, 1948. The first part of the article reads as follows:

During the past seven years federal cabinet ministers and officials have been giving warning of the evils of inflation and high prices in announcing their determination to guard the Canadian people from them. At a time when inflation threatens to become acute through the abandonment of controls and subsidies, the following quotations make interesting reading.

J. L. Ilsley, May, 1945:

"Sharply rising prices in the demobilization and reconversion period would undoubtedly be followed by deflation and serious unemployment afterward. Stable prices are therefore essential so that there may be a smooth adjustment to peacetime economy."

Annual Report of Bank of Canada for fiscal year ending March 31, 1947:

"Any excessive run-up in prices and costs would set the stage for subsequent deflation. It would affect different economic groups very unequally and the resulting distortions would necessitate fresh adjustments before the basis would exist for a balanced and stable prosperity."

Mr. Abbott, Minister of Finance, January 11, 1947:

"A further orderly removal of emergency controls becomes effective on January 13, 1947. It is part of a deliberate and carefully-considered plan, designed to eliminate war-imposed restrictions as promptly as is consistent with the prevention of the sort of boom and collapse in prices which was typical of developments after the first world war. The goal of the government's stabilization policy has always been and still is to preserve orderly conditions with a view to cutting off the disrupting peak in post-war prices and to avoiding, or at least greatly lessening, the drop which inevitably follows.

Throughout the past seven years, the government has committed itself to an anti-inflationary policy. Through many statements of ministers and officials the government has promised that price controls would be abandoned only after the danger of inflation no longer existed. Events during the past twelve months prove beyond the shadow of a doubt that the government has not kept its commitment to the Canadian people. Instead, it has removed price controls until today the cost of living is so high that the average Canadian finds it difficult to purchase the necessities of life from the shrinking value of his dollar.

In 1946 the increase in the cost of living index over 1945 was only 4 points. Throughout that time controls were maintained; but from February, 1947, to February, 1948, the cost of living increased by 22 points; an increase of only 4 points when the government was maintaining general price controls, with subsidies, and an increase of 22 points when the government abandoned its own program of price controls. So bad had the inflation situation become that the government found it necessary to do something to relieve itself from the attack of the Canadian people upon its price decontrol policy. And so the government set up a committee of the House of Commons to inquire into prices. Members of Parliament well know that, even since that committee has been set up, prices have continued to rise. Not one thing has come out of that committee that is known to have reduced the prices of any important commodities. In my opinion, by setting up the prices committee the government was merely trying to relieve itself from the justifiable wrath of the Canadian people. That committee has turned out to be nothing less than a whitewash, a poor substitute for the government's once good price control policy.

In his budget speech the minister repeated time and time again that one of the main causes of the increase in prices was that corporations were expanding too rapidly in the field of reconstruction and in equipment replacement.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): You mean, employment was too high?

Mr. ARGUE: Oh, don't be ridiculous. I am merely quoting back to you what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has told the house. My hon. friend, being a good independent Liberal, should accept the minister's word for it, as I do. However, Mr. Speaker, the minister's statement bears out the belief of the members of this group that the great financial interests in Canada should be nationalized. If they were placed under the control of parliament those policies could be inaugurated which would channel investments into such industries as at this time would increase the quantity of consumer goods available to the people of Canada.

Throughout the last year members of this group have from time to time quoted figures of various corporations, showing that profits have reached an all-time unprecedented high. When members of this group did that there was a general pooh-pooh from members opposite, who stated that we were merely selecting a few corporations and then making a broad, sweeping statement that all profits had risen accordingly. However, the figures presented in the white paper prove that the great corporations of Canada are making the highest profits in their history. What the Canadian people wish to know is how they as individuals have been taken care of through government policy as compared with the giant corporations.

On December 31 last, the government removed the excess profits tax. That tax on excess profits in the fiscal year 1945-46 yielded the government revenues of approximately $494 million, and in 1946-47, $448 million. These revenues will no longer be obtained because the government has removed the excess profits tax. I believe that tax was a fair tax; it was a just tax; it was a tax on excess earnings, and surely the companies that make excess earnings could better afford to pay taxes to the national exchequer than a single man earning something more than $750 or a married man struggling along on something over $1,500 a year.

The figures in the white paper prove beyond the shadow of a doubt that within the last twelve months corporation income has increased much faster than the income of the Canadian people. Corporation income in 1946 amounted to $1,421 million; in 1947 it was

$1,821 million. That was an increase of twenty-eight per cent. In the white paper the government tells us that personal incomes increased by only seven per cent, so that the profits of big corporations increased in 1947 over 1946 by an amount four times as great as the increase in the personal income of Canadians.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Where do you get your figures?

Mr. ARGUE: Out of the government's white paper.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I am studying it now and I cannot see that.

Mr. ARGUE: Read it carefully and you will find out. Corporation profits after taxes amounted in 1946 to $751 million and in 1947 to $1,017 million, or an increase of thirty-five per cent. That is corporation profits after taxes. Individual incomes, after direct taxes, increased from $704 per capita in 1946 to $741 per capita in 1947, or an increase of five per cent. So that the sum available to business, after paying taxes in 1947, had increased by an amount five times as much as the income of individual Canadians.

That, I submit, shows beyond contradiction that the government's policy within the last year has been one to make certain that the profits of big business in Canada increased to a far greater extent than wages, salaries and incomes of Canadians generally.

The cost of living index in February, 1948, as compared with February, 1947, had increased by seventeen per cent. During that period, personal incomes of Canadians had increased by only five per cent. The cost of living index had gone up by seventeen per cent, and individual incomes had gone up by only five per cent, so that the average Canadian in 1947 had twelve per cent less real income than he had in 1946.

I now come to undistributed profits of corporations, or, in other words, savings of corporations. In 1946 undistributed profits amounted to $411 million, and in 1947, to $609 million, an increase of $198 million, or forty-eight per cent. But individual Canadians within that period were unable to save at the same rate that they had previously, so that we find personal savings of individuals in 1946 were $957 million, and in 1947 those individual savings had shrunk to $588 million, a reduction of $369 million, or thirty-eight per cent. Undistributed profits increased by forty-eight per cent, but the savings of Canadians decreased by thirty-eight per cent.

In a situation such as that, one would expect that any government that had the interests of the Canadian people at heart would increase the taxes of big business and decrease the taxes of individual Canadians. But on page 4061 of Hansard, in his budget speech the minister estimates that corporation taxation in 1948-49 will be $591 million as compared with total corporation taxes of $687 million in 1947-48, or a reduction in the amount of tax levied on corporations to the extent of $96 million.

Personal income taxes, the minister estimates, will produce $15 million more revenue in 1948-49 than in 1947-48, so that, in spite of the fact that corporations have increased profits tremendously, in spite of the fact that the average Canadian cannot save as much as he did a year ago, the government in this budget is reducing taxes on corporations by $96 million and expects to extract $15 million more in personal income taxes from individual Canadians.

The minister, on page 4056 of Hansard, in the budget speech, says:

> As consumers, we are bidding eagerly for a limited supply of goods, throwing into the auction not only most of our current incomes but also part of our past savings and additional funds obtained by instalment credit.

He is saying that the individual Canadian is now throwing into the auction most of his present income and part of his past savings and is going into debt. In other words, the average Canadian is going bankrupt today at a time when big business is making large, unprecedented and unjustifiable profits.

The minister last year, in his budget, which foretold the removal of excess profits tax, which foretold his policy of removing price control, made the following statement on page 2626 of Hansard:

> With the orderly removal of controls, with increasing supplies of material, with efficient and co-operative labour, and with ample markets, Canadian business enterprise is in a most favourable situation. We all expect it to show its mettle, both in production and in marketing.

Then note this:

> We expect it to show its ability to keep down costs and prices. In its own long-run interest, as well as in the national interest, business must keep its prices down and its profits within reason.

The minister last year placed his hope in business. He said that in its own interest business must keep its prices down, but business did not keep its prices down. Prices have gone up tremendously, and still, in spite of the fact that big business had not warranted the faith the minister last year placed in it, the minister in his budget this year is doing nothing about the matter.

Does the minister think an increase in corporation profits of twenty-eight per cent is keeping profits within reason? Does he think an increase of thirty-five per cent in corporation profits, after taxes, is keeping profits within reason? Does he think an increase in undistributed profits in one year of forty-eight per cent is keeping profits within reason?

The members of the C.C.F. group believe that these profits are far too high. We believe that corporation taxation should be increased. If the government did that, they could get hundreds of millions of dollars of additional revenue, and at the same time they would slow down the huge capital expansion program which the minister has said is a factor causing much of the present day inflation. But after last year, when events have shown that the minister's faith in business was not justified, he states this year, on page 4056 of Hansard:

> The policy of the government has been to return to a free price system and to moderate the inevitable increases in prices at this time by whatever fiscal and other methods are possible under such a system.

The minister this year tells the house that increases in prices are inevitable. But last year he was telling business to show its mettle, and to keep its prices and costs down.

Then we come to the changes outlined in the budget. One of the changes was to increase the tax exemption for a married couple over sixty-five years of age. Last year a married couple earning $2,000 paid an income tax of $70. This year they will not have to pay any income tax at all. The people in Canada over the age of sixty-five who last year had a net income of $1,930 will this year be given an additional income of $70 to bring their income up to $2,000. But the old age pensioners, the couple who are living on $60 a month, or $720 a year, are getting nothing from this budget.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): That is not so in British Columbia.

Mr. ARGUE: I said they are getting nothing from this budget of this government. That has nothing to do with the provincial government in British Columbia.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I thought the hon. member referred to the provincial government.

Mr. ARGUE: The minister announced that that proposal would reduce the government's revenue by $5,000,000. Then the minister announced that an estate would in the future be exempt up to the sum of $50,000 instead of the present $5,000, and that the government would, as a result, lose another $5,000,000 in revenue. I think it would have been much better had those changes not been made and had that $10,000,000 been spent on the old age pensioners today. There were 210,000 old age pensioners in Canada in 1947. That $10,000,000 would have meant an additional $48 per pensioner per annum, or an increase of $4 a month.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Why do you not start in with Saskatchewan?

An hon. MEMBER: We have.

Mr. ARGUE: We are paying an additional $5 a month in Saskatchewan and also providing free hospitalization, medical and dental care. I am sure the old age pensioners in Saskatchewan believe that the present Saskatchewan government has treated them well.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Why are they moving out to British Columbia?

An hon. MEMBER: Keep on asking questions.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ARGUE: I think it is a crime that throughout the budget the various changes made by the minister mean that the people in Canada who have already received or are receiving a high income will get a higher income while those people who are struggling along on a low income will get no benefits from this budget.

The C.C.F. group believe in better old age pensions. The government has led the Canadian people to believe, through its proposals to the provinces, that a general old age pension would be paid to everyone at seventy years of age, without a means test; and that the federal government would make a fifty per cent contribution available to the provinces for the pensions of people between the ages of sixty-five and seventy. But the government has not done that. The Liberal government had not provided the social security legislation that the Canadian people were looking for.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): And British Columbia pays for it.

Mr. ARGUE: But the government took care of the security needs of some Canadians. In 1947, this government introduced a bill, and passed it in spite of C.C.F. opposition, which increased the salary of the leader of the government in the other place by $7,000, giving him a total salary of $13,000.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): How about our own increase?

An hon. MEMBER: Was that a salary or a pension?

Mr. ARGUE: I have heard it called an "old man's home"; but when I hear of a salary of $13,000, it seems to me to be a pretty good home.

The same government in 1946 presented and passed in this house a bill to increase by one-third the salaries of judges. The government said, with regard to a judge who had been receiving $15,000, that for him to be a good judge, he must have a good income; and that $15,000 a year was not enough for a judge. So the government said, "We will give him $20,000 a year and we will give the old age pensioners $30 a month."

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Why did we not study law?

Mr. ARGUE: The C.C.F. party does not agree with a policy of that kind.

Then there was the famous pension for the members of the diplomatic service. The government guaranteed them a pension of from $3,000 to $7,000 a year, even if they had been in the diplomatic service for a period of only five years.

The government, in its proposals to the Canadian people in 1945, stated that it was prepared to assume sixty per cent of the national health insurance program. It estimated at that time that that sixty per cent would cost the federal treasury $150 million a year. The government did nothing for a long time after the 1945 election. A few weeks ago it announced proposals whereby the provinces could obtain, through various steps, up to $30 million a year. The federal government in 1945 promised the Canadian people $150 million a year for better health services. It waited for three years and then brought in a scheme to provide only $30 million a year. In this regard, Mr. Speaker, the government has kept its promise to the extent of only twenty per cent.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame.

Mr. ARGUE: I do not think I should end my speech on the budget without emphasizing the problems that face farmers at the present time. I can remember that ten years ago tractor gasoline could be bought for sixteen cents a gallon. That same gasoline todays costs thirty cents a gallon. Combines have gone up until now one of the better combines—a 14-foot self-propelled combine—will cost $5,000. The farmers believe that their machinery is costing from two to three times as much as its value. Imperial Oil profits for 1947 were over $3,000,000 higher than in 1946. Massey-Harris profits in 1947 were almost fifty per cent more than in 1946. The Cockshutt Plow Company profits had increased by fifty per cent. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company in applying for an increase in freight rates, estimated that its net railway income in 1947 would be $14,800,000. Instead of that, its net railway income turned out to be $22,800,000, or $8,000,000 more than it had estimated.

The picture across Canada is the same for almost all other corporations. Profits are going up by leaps and bounds. Companies can now charge everything the traffic will bear. The packing industry has told us that it charges the highest prices it can obtain for its products and that it buys the farmers' produce at the lowest possible prices.

Mr. PROBE: Good old free enterprise.

Mr. ARGUE: The record of the Liberal government today shows that, in all its major legislation, it has increased the profits of big business. It is increasing the net income of certain individuals over sixty-five years of age who are now earning $2,000 a year or more. At the same time it has not increased the old age pension. It is paying higher salaries and pensions to people in the other chamber, to judges and to tired diplomats, and at the same time this government is allowing prices to go sky-high, until today the average consumer in Canada does not know where he will get the money to buy an adequate supply of food and proper clothing, to educate his family, and to pay for a decent home. It is time the government changed its program.

An hon. MEMBER: Change the government.

Mr. ARGUE: We will leave that to the Canadian people. Some seventy-six per cent of the Canadian people believe in price control, and I think it fair to assume that seventy-six per cent do not believe in the government opposite.

The Canadian people would like to see the following changes made at this time:

1. Reimpose price controls on essential commodities and reinstate subsidies on essential goods.
2. Increase corporation taxes and reinstate the excess profits tax.
3. Raise the income tax exemptions to at least $1,250 for a single man and $2,500 for a married couple.
4. Socialize the chartered banks so that loans may de directed in such a way as to increase the production of consumer goods.
5. Increase old age pensions to $50 at the age of sixty-five, without a means test.
6. Implement a national prepaid health service program.
7. Levy the farmers' income tax in a fair and equitable manner; and this is important if we are to get the production we need.

8. Remove the unjust twenty-one per cent increase in freight rates; and I wish to emphasize that the increase in freight rates is a most important issue in the west at this time.

Mr. DOUGLAS G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat says the socialists advocate an increase in the corporation tax. I wonder if he realizes, and if he does not I should like to point out to him, that the corporation tax now collected by the government is figured in the cost of doing business, so that to increase the corporation tax would mean that the products of business would have to go up in price.

In taking part in this debate I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on the way he brought down his budget on Tuesday, May 18, the budget to which all the people of Canada had been looking forward with high hopes for so long. The people of Canada expected some relief from taxation as a result of information which had been given out with respect to the surplus we were to have at the end of the year; but they were sadly disappointed. With the exception of one or two features, this budget was a disappointing document. It marks a departure from sound principles of taxation.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that in 1946 the government budgeted for a deficit of $300 million and showed a surplus of $374 million. In other words, it took in $674 million more than it budgeted for. This may have been an error in judgment, but believe me it was some error. Again in 1947 the government budgeted for a surplus of $190 million and turned up with a surplus of $670 million, a miscalculation amounting to the huge sum of $480 million. In the two years the miscalculation in its forecasts amounted to only $1,054 million. These miscalculations must come as a bit of a shock to many people. It may be a pleasant shock, but just the same it is a shock.

I cannot think they were altogether errors in judgment; they were too large. Even taking into consideration the immensity of the calculations necessary in preparing a budget, it seems to me that a more accurate forecast could have been made. The government had all the information at its disposal; it had the experience of the 1946 forecast, and the actual results that year. I cannot help thinking—and many others feel the same—that it was either the result of a combination of guesswork and incompetency, or deliberately arrived at for some ulterior motive. Perhaps the government felt it would like to prepare for an early general election this year, and wanted to turn up with a surplus of $670 million in order to show the people of Canada what fine fellows they were. It can be fairly assumed that mistakes and errors of judgment are to be anticipated, but surely not on this scale.

As I said before, the surplus was anticipated by the public from at least the middle of the year, according to the information they had been given. In fact they thought it would be closer to a billion dollars; and certainly they thought there would be a substantial easing of taxation in the various fields. What a let-down the people have had! They have been given practically no relief. This year taxes are proposed not only to provide for expenditures but for the sum of $549,000,000 in excess of requirements, the largest amount ever budgeted for in the history of Canada. Apparently one of the objectives is to cut down expenditure by taxpayers with a view to guarding against inflation. This is not a taxation principle; it is but an extension of the controls which most people wished to have diminished as rapidly as possible following the war and finally done away with. This country has been built up and has prospered largely through the thrift and enterprise of its people. I am sure it would be better and safer to depend upon the thrift of the individuals than to take all available money away from them in order to prosecute plans which may not be quite so successful as the planners hope. I believe the people of Canada want to provide for themselves with as little government aid as possible.

It always happens that one control leads to another, and results in an increase in the cost of living. Taxation comes out of all the people, not just a few. The people in the middle brackets are just about as hard hit as anyone. It is very difficult for them to get on with the high rates of taxation in effect at the present time.

The minister tried to point out that the government was exercising every possible economy. It does not seem to me like that. If one looks at the estimated expenditures he will find that the onlv economy contemplated is to be imposed on the taxpayers of Canada. While in 1939 we had 49,000 civil servants, today we have 117,000, all of whom are non-productive.

I would point out that for every thousand millions dollars by which we reduce our debt, we reduce our interest charges by about $27,000,000. Let me point this out, that for every ten thousand civil servants we are able to do without today—and if the government would use better methods of economy, I believe we could do without many of them—we would make a saving of at least $20,000,000 to the taxpayers of Canada.

Going through the estimates, we find that in the ordinary expenditures there is an increase this year of more than $174,000,000—an increase, in this day and age, over last year. That is in the main estimate. It is right there, on ordinary expenditures. Certainly this does not look like vigilance on the part of the government in reducing expenditures. I say there should have been a reduction instead of an increase in these ordinary expenditures.

And, by the way, I should like to quote an article that appeared in today's Ottawa Journal, which states:

> There is another line of attack parliament might take and more usefully. Attack upon expenditures.

It goes on to say:

> Increased expenditures since 1938 due to the war total $831,753,373. Increased expenditures since 1938, not due to the war, total $737,681,383.

And then the Journal goes on to say:

> Here is Parliament's real job. The job of watching what the government does with the great surpluses it has on hand, and will have on hand; checking the temptation to spend which will be born of such great sums of money.

And it goes on to say:

> The checking of estimates, with audit of accounts, is parliament's traditional function. Parliament has been betraying that function.

The article states that is one reason why taxes are high and expenditures are high. That is true. Some method will have to be taken by parliament to check on these expenditures.

It will be noticed that when the estimates are under consideration it is very difficult to get any detailed information on expenditures. For the average member of parliament it is impossible to get from the ministry any details with respect to expenditures. Ministers should be able to give that information. Surely there is some way of getting it, some way in which the ministers of each department could be questioned—in a committee, or in some other way.

For instance, in this year we shall find that hundreds of millions of dollars will be put through before the end of June. There has been much talk about one thing and another; but the real business of parliament is to get down to the matter of seeing that expenditures in this country are kept down, and to see that the government is not overspending.

As I said before, in 1946 there was a reduction in taxes with a budget forecast deficit of $300 million. This reduction was hardly expected, but it came. It is true that when the $374 million surplus was announced in 1947, after the year's operations, the people expected an easement of taxes, and they got it. Now, with an estimated surplus of $549 million for 1948-49 and a surplus of $374 million in 1946 and $670 million in 1947 there is practically no relief for the taxpayer of Canada.

I want to say, no matter what anyone else says, that the people of Canada are good and mad because they have not had some relief from taxation. It is all very well and most commendable to reduce the debt, but in reasonable amounts. In 1946 the net debt was $13,421 million; in 1947 it was $13,069 million, or a reduction of $352 million. In 1948 the net debt was $12,377 million, or a further reduction of $692 million; or a total reduction in two years of $1,044 million, or eight per cent.

People certainly expected they would be given some relief by way of a reduction in taxation. Also I am sure they expected there would be some debt reduction as well. Might I say in passing that there are many more thousands, if not millions, of people needed in Canada to help develop this country, to produce and to work out their living for themselves on their own behalf. The more we have here, the fewer we shall have to feed overseas. The more we have here, the more we shall have to help feed those who are overseas. The more we have here, the more we shall have to help service our $12,377 million debt.

Now, what about the estimated surplus of $549 million for 1948-49? With the example of the 1946 forecast, which was underestimated to the extent of $647 million; and with the 1947 underestimation of $670 million, how accurate is the 1948 calculation? Should it be $800 million, $900 million or $1,000 million?

In any event, the mounting cost of living is not underestimated. Under present government policy it may be expected that the cost of living will continue to rise. It has risen in Canada from an index of 131 in April, 1947, to an index of 152 in April of this year, or an increase of 21 points. The cost of clothing has gone up 36 points. It will probably approach the cost of living index in the United States index of 168. The cost of living in the United States has risen by only 12 points in the year. If this occurs—and it probably will—revenues will increase rapidly. Everything points to a much larger surplus, and also everything points to an election next year.

I do not know whether the minister has deliberately underestimated, for the purposes of an election next year. I cannot say that definitely. But, judging from his budget, I would suggest that this might be so. And what a hurrah there will be when the election is called—when the government is deader than it is now. It will have to have artificial life from somewhere. The public will have to have some kind of shot in the arm in order to keep them sweet with the government. I suppose that shot in the arm from the government will be a huge surplus and huge tax cuts. I cannot say that will happen, but I am bound to forecast that I believe it may happen, and I shall be more accurate than the minister.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), speaking in the house on Wednesday, said that this kind of budget does not provoke immediate commendation. Indeed it does not—it has provoked condemnation. He said that it will get more approval as time goes on, but he does not need to fool himself. The people do not like to be mulcted for political reasons under any guise or excuse, but that is what they think this government is doing. It is a bid for power next year, but they will not forget.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) referred to what the Minister of Justice had given as a reason for there being no reduction in taxation this year, that because of the tremendous efforts the United States people are putting forth by way of aid to Europe we could not do much more than we are doing; they would resent our shoving our taxes down. What utter nonsense!

Let me point out that Canada has done more in this connection on a per capita basis than has the United States. Despite the tables in Hansard with regard to federal and state income taxes, the people of Canada are paying far more than are the people in the United States when we take into consideration sales and excise taxes and customs duties. The people of Canada have nothing to be ashamed of, nor need they make excuses to their friends to the south even if our taxes were lowered. I would also point out that we in Canada are paying for two years more of war than are the people of the United States. So no reduction of taxes because they might be annoyed! In the meantime the people are mulcted of their hard-earned wages.

As I said before, the public expected an easement of taxation. Only last week when I was home in Toronto, several office managers informed me that a day or so after the budget was announced employees began flocking to their offices requesting wage increases. These increases are asked because the government's inflationary policy has increased the cost of living. Increased wages will increase costs, further adding to inflation.

Because of taxes—personal income tax, sales tax and excise tax on soft drinks, candy, cigarettes, et cetera—the average man finds it most difficult to put anything aside. His income is exhausted by taxation and current bills. Wage earners seek relief from the high cost of living by demanding more take-home pay. Without there being some reduction in taxation, that is bound to happen.

What about the eight per cent sales tax? The eighty cents that was paid by way of tax on an article which sold for $10 wholesale in 1939, in most cases, because of the increased price of the article, is now $1.20, $1.40 or even $1.60. Hon. members can see how inflationary that is. It tends to hamper and discourage the production of goods. Production is the real cure for inflation. As I pointed out, even with the present level of the corporation tax, part of the cost of doing business is such that the selling price of manufactured articles must be increased.

Let us consider the inexcusable and iniquitous excise tax of twenty-five per cent. In many cases this tax is imposed upon the retail price which includes the sales tax. Also take the tax on automobiles as another example. The cheapest car on the market sells for $1,655 retail. The excise tax on this car is $256; the sales tax is $82.20, or a total tax of $328. The mark-up of twenty per cent on these taxes amounts to $67, making a total increased cost of $405 to the buyer. Automobiles of this type are not luxuries. There is no more room in the large cities and people have to go to the suburbs. A car is a necessity because the hard pressed man has to get out of the city. But he finds that he must pay $405 more. That is inflation; you cannot get away from it.

All these taxes are being left on with this budget to obtain an advantageous position next year in the case of a general election. The minister says the government is unwilling to lighten the burden of taxation because of its policy of fighting inflation with taxes or, in other words, the planned control of spending. He terms this policy anti-inflationary, but that is a misnomer.

Taxation in this country has aggravated inflationary tendencies because it is too onerous and unjudiciously applied. What has happened? Bank statements show that the rate of public saving has dropped because of the rising cost of living as expressed in the wholly fallacious price index for consumer goods and the heavy impost on personal earnings. The desire to save and the pride of ownership have to a great degree been destroyed. As a matter of fact, they have been made impossible because of these taxes. It is not only those in the low-income brackets who are having a bad time; those in the middle income brackets are having just as tough a time.

As I said, the budget is inflationary because the present taxation brings savings out of the bank or out of the old sock. It tends to liquidate savings in bonds and discourages investment in productive enterprise and thus hinders production. The collection of so much money by taxation tends toward improvident spending on the part of the government. It draws money out of productive employment and spends it on an overlarge army of government employees and bureaucrats, most of whom are non-productive, as well as pumping the money back into consumer channels by way of salaries and wages, with no production of real wealth.

If there ever was a policy which was not anti-inflationary, the policy of this government is certainly one. Talk about controls; one control just leads to another and you never know where you are going to end. It is just about as hard to control individual spending without inflation.

Then, as to the government policy with respect to importations from Great Britain, the minister is reported on page 4063 of Hansard as follows:

> If we diverted our prospective surplus into a reduction of taxes now, it would add hundreds of millions of dollars a year to the already intense demand of Canadians for goods and services—

I doubt that very much.

> —but it would add nothing to the volume of Canadian goods and services available for sale. People would try to buy more, but there would not be more to buy, unless the effort to get it resulted in more imports that we cannot afford and which we would have to shut out somehow or other. Prices would be sure to rise.

Unless it resulted in more imports that we cannot afford to buy. There are imports from Great Britain which we can afford to buy. In fact it is most necessary to do so. We have a staggering but stagnant balance with them now. We all know that Great Britain needs goods and foodstuffs from Canada. London will have to dip into her dollar and gold reserves to the tune of $1 billion for the year ending December. It shows that they do need the money. We must do everything we possibly can to see that they get the money. Canada can produce the food that Great Britain needs, but Britain needs the cash to buy these goods. This government is taxing the people at the present time to buy from themselves to send to Britain; in other words, we are lifting ourselves by our bootstraps, creating a false prosperity. We have that right here at the present time. We are selling to Great Britain for no productive return. Quality and quantity of goods on the market are the best things in the world to stop inflation.

This policy is having only one effect, augmenting and emphasizing the impact of scarcity of consumer goods in Canada, and further increasing inflation. The government is hoping that the Marshall plan, the ERP program, will have some effect and will save Canada from its present dilemma. I think the government's hopes are groundless, if we may judge from the information we get on the condition of the countries over there. In the meantime the government has prohibited the importation of certain goods and placed other goods under quotas and import controls in the austerity program. That is inflation. It prevents the goods from coming in; therefore it increases prices. This program is, of course, government control in Canada—with a vengeance.

Great Britain comes under the same category as that of the United States in this program. Why should this be? Why should Great Britain be placed in the same category, when she needs our funds and our goods? I suggest that all these controls against the importation of goods from Great Britain be done away with at once. There are many hundreds of products of the British isles which could come in here in normal trade. It would be encouraging to the people of Great Britain. The suspension of the preferential tariff on British cottons and rayon goods is to be commended. Remove all the articles, or most of them, from schedule I, the prohibited list and it will increase the supply of goods in Canada and be anti-inflationary. It will help Britain and Canada.

The reduction of taxes, combined with the supplementing of supplies from Great Britain, will aid in reducing prices and combating inflation. The plans of the planners have gone wrong. They have not stopped inflation in prices or reduced the cost of living. Taxes have a great bearing on it. The government must cut down on its expenditures and get away from so much paternalism and regimentation, and the control over the spending of the people. The people want to stand on their own feet. They want an opportunity to make their own way in this wonderful country of ours, to use their own initiative and to spend and save their own money according to their better judgment. I ask the government and the parliament of Canada to trust the people.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the best that one can say of this budget is that its sins are sins of omission rather than of commission. It is indeed the kind of budget that one would expect from a bright young Conservative lawyer called to administer an important government department. If I may be allowed to paraphrase a famous statement I would say of this budget that seldom did a finance minister say so little in so many words; nevertheless there are a few items in it that deserve analysis.

I wish to refer for a few moments to the raising of the income tax exemptions on incomes of persons sixty-five years of age and over. There are valid reasons for raising income tax exemptions at this time, but surely it should be done on the basis of income and not on the basis of age. This is adopting a new principle in Canadian taxation, and may I say it is a most illogical principle. If it is carried to its logical conclusion, some day when you give your little boy eight cents to go to the store to buy a chocolate bar the person behind the counter will ask him, "Is it for yourself or for your grandmother?" That is exactly the sort of absurdity that this principle of making exemptions according to age leads to. Why should a person who has, let us say, the income that I have been receiving for the last few years, namely, $6,000 a year, receive an extra exemption of $500 a year just because he or she is 65 years of age or over? Surely no argument can be made for that sort of thing, but an argument can be made for the change that was not made, namely, raising the exemptions of all persons in the low-income groups by $500.

Mr. McIVOR: There are not many of them.

Mr. MacINNIS: If my hon. friend was not a preacher I would doubt his word. However, since he is, I suppose I have to take his statement, but he will have, when he goes home to Fort William, to square it with the people there.

When the minister made the proposal in his budget speech the other evening he said at page 4067 of Hansard:

> Having in mind the large number of elderly people living on small fixed incomes, and out of consideration for the particular trials and increased expenditures that usually come with advancing years, I am proposing that an additional exemption of $500 be granted to a taxpayer of sixty-five years of age or over.

It is too bad that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) did not have a talk with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) before he drafted the amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act last session. It is too bad that the latter did not have an opportunity to tell the Minister of Finance of the troubles and trials of people in the seventy years of age group, and the increased income they should have because of their increasing disabilities. Evidently that was not done.

I agree with the minister that many in the sixty-five years and over group find it difficult to exist on their present incomes, but I want to tell him that very few of those who need assistance and need it most, will be helped by the exemption, because their incomes are not high enough to be taxed. Surely these are the people who need help.

Having mentioned the old age pensions, let me compare these exemptions with the government's old age pension policy. The old age pension is $30 a month, or $360 a year. Remember also, that if the wife of a pensioner is not eligible in her own right, although she may be sixty-five years of age and cannot earn an income, there is no contribution on her behalf. The two of them have to get along on $360 a year if they have no extra income. If they have extra income, a single person can have income up to $600. A married couple can have an income up to $1,080. If, however, the income goes above these amounts their pension is reduced accordingly.

Surely there must be something wrong with the sort of reasoning that gives an increased exemption to a person who has an income of $750 or over, if single, and $1,500 or any amount over that, if married, and then refuses to allow to a single person the right to increase his income over $600 without being penalized, or a married couple to increase their income over $1,080 without penalty.

Old age pensioners, as I have pointed out, cannot receive benefits. This provision does not allow for it, because under it their incomes are not high enough. According to the 1947 report on the Old Age Pensions Act, forty per cent or more of the population of Canada at the age of seventy or over are now in receipt of old age pensions. The number last year was, I believe, 209,029. I do not know how many will benefit under the government's proposal for raising the exemption, but I am satisfied that it is not anywhere near one-half this number. I would say the figure would be about 80,000, or about eight per cent of all persons sixty-five years of age and over.

Mr. MARTIN: The total number is 275,000.

Mr. MacINNIS: Does the minister say the total number of old age pensioners is 275,000? My figure was for the year ended March 31, 1947.

The economic condition of persons seventy years of age and over is tersely, and I presume correctly, put in the green book containing the government's proposals to the provinces in 1945. At page 37 I find, under the heading of "Deficiencies of the present scheme", that is to say, the scheme we have now, the following:

> The means test is generally recognized as undesirable after a certain age. It has been noted that about 40 per cent of all persons of seventy years of age and over make application, satisfy the means test requirements and receive pensions. There is little doubt that a very considerable number in addition are not able entirely to support themselves, but are dependent upon their family, and refrain from applying for pensions because of embarrassment occasioned by the means test.

None of these people will benefit under these exemptions. Then, as regards those in the sixty-five to sixty-nine age group, the same green book states:

> The minimum age of seventy, though convenient as a dividing line with respect to the payment of any kind of universal old age pension, is nevertheless too high in a number of cases of actual need. A strong case can be made for reducing the age limit to sixty-five in order to provide assistance, at least for those in the age group sixty-five—sixty-nine, who are actually in need.

It seems to me it would be much better, and it would serve a much greater need, if the government, instead of allowing additional exemptions to those who least need them, had done something to help those who are in dire circumstances.

I suggest to the Minister of Finance that income tax on the age basis is wrong in principle, that the people who need assistance are those whose incomes are not sufficient for a standard of living that can maintain health and decency. Therefore, income tax exemptions should apply not only on the income of persons of sixty-five years of age and over but on all incomes below $1,250 for single and $2,500 for married persons.

By way of a little advice to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I would say that the government's proposals for increased exemptions for persons of sixty-five years of age and over make the means test for old age pensions more illogical than ever, and I suggest that he bring in a bill, even at this session, to eliminate that. There is no longer any logic or justice in maintaining it after the proposals for the new income tax exemptions have been approved. The abolition is also, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) reminds me, mentioned in the proposals set out in the green book, in which the government agreed to assume the whole pension without a means test for persons seventy years of age and over.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

I am not quite sure, but I believe the minister said in his budget speech that one of the reasons for not raising exemptions in the lower income groups was the fear of its inflationary effect. On page 4056 of Hansard he said:

> As consumers, we are bidding eagerly for a limited supply of goods, throwing into the auction not only most of our current incomes but also part of our past savings and additional funds obtained by instalment credit.

I am wondering whether the minister realized the implication of his own words. Speaking in the budget debate last year, I drew attention to the fact that instalment buying was on the increase and that this could mean one thing only, and that was that people were not able to buy the necessities of life with their current income. If that was the case a year ago, it is more the case this year, because prices have risen considerably in the meantime.

In a recent report by the dominion bureau of statistics, it is stated that, although the money value of retail sales is still increasing, the volume of goods sold has been decreasing since October of last year, and that the decrease in volume since that time is about ten per cent. What is happening, then, is this, that as consumers we are paying more money for fewer goods. To those in the higher income brackets that is not of very great importance. It means one of two things. They can reduce their savings or they can reduce their luxury buying; but, as far as the essentials or the necessities of life are concerned, they can still buy sufficient to maintain their living standards. For those in the lower income groups the situation is quite different. For them higher prices mean a lowering of living standards and also going into debt. That situation needs to be rectified, in my opinion, as soon as possible. One way of rectifying it is by raising the exemptions and giving more income to those in the lower income groups, even if this has to be done by raising taxes in the higher income brackets.

The drastic increase in prices in the last year and a half or two years make the raising of the exemptions in the low-income groups nothing more than a straight matter of justice. Let us just see what the situation is. The exemption of $750 for a single person and of $1,500 for a married couple came into effect on January 1, 1947. The cost of living index at that time was 127. The index today, as it appears in the minister's budget statistics, is 152, or in other words, there is a rise of approximately twenty per cent in the cost of living. This means that the $750 of January 1, 1947, is worth only $600 now and that the $1,500 is worth only $1,200 now. Yet with all those facts before him, the Minister of Finance and the government expect the people of this country to carry on as if nothing were wrong. I am afraid they will have a rude shock some day, because you cannot treat people over a period of time in that fashion, without producing certain changes in their mental outlook and on their loyalties.

Considerable was said, Mr. Speaker, about the large surplus announced by the Minister of Finance. I will say at once that I have no objection whatever to the Minister of Finance showing a large surplus. Any objections that I have in the matter are based not on the size of the surplus but on the way in which the surplus was raised. Too much of it was raised by indirect taxes and too little from direct taxes, at a time when incomes in certain quarters were at an all-time high. It seems to me that if the government at this time did not provide for a substantial surplus, it would be subject to severe censure by the people of this country. We have a huge debt occasioned by two wars and ten years of depression. Surely we are not to continue paying interest on that debt forever or until, if economic conditions get bad—as they were before the war—we shall be adding again to the debt.

I should like to point out to hon. members who are objecting to this budget that the interest on the national debt last year, in 1947, was $466 million, or more than twenty-one per cent of the total expenditures. May I also point out that that is only $50 million less than the total estimated revenue for the year 1938, just ten years ago.

I think it was the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) who the other day said something about being old-fashioned. I may be old-fashioned. I do not like debt and I do not think debt is any better for a country than it is for an individual. The time when we should budget to reduce the debt is a time like the present when the government finds itself in the same position as the people who appeared before the prices committee who say, according to their evidence, that they made money in spite of themselves. They said they could not help it. When it was pointed out that their profits were unduly high, they replied that they just could not help it, that they made the extra money because the market was that way; and the market was that way because the government removed price control. Because the government did not maintain price controls, it has more money than it budgeted for; and just because it has that, I think the country should get the benefit of it in reduced debt.

There are a number of other items I should like to refer to, but I want to have time to refer briefly to some comments made by the financial critic for the official opposition. I am doing that because the hon. member made a plea for clear thinking. Because he made a plea for clear thinking, I took the trouble to read his speech most carefully, and I am bound to say that seldom have I read a speech that is so full of cliches and catch-phrases as is the speech of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario last Friday. I hope the hon. gentleman will pardon me for saying that, because I have a high regard for him. But as he in the same speech also made a plea for intellectual honesty, I am bound to say what I have said.

I shall refer to only two or three points. At page 4242 of Hansard he is reported as having said:

> I am sure everyone will agree, even those who do not share the view that private enterprise is the solution to our economic problems, that the lifeblood of private enterprise is that new and small businesses should constantly be coming into the picture and be encouraged to become bigger.

It usually happens that a small industry does get bigger, but as it gets bigger, the smaller ones have a tendency to disappear. I have no objection to the hon. gentleman wanting small industries because they are the lifeblood of the country, but when at the same time he says he hopes they will get bigger I really cannot understand him.

Mr. MENARY: You would not want them to get smaller, would you?

Mr. MacINNIS: The average life of an industry in the United States is eight years. From the way they were going under during the ten years between 1930 and 1939, I do not know whether their span of life is longer in this country, but we may find out.

Mr. FULTON: He means he hopes they will prosper.

Mr. MacINNIS: Well, I hope so, too. Then at page 4247 of Hansard the hon. member gets down to the matter of saving. He said:

> I am going to say a word about savings, though one is almost self-conscious in talking about savings these days. Many people think that is a silly old-fashioned thing only talked about by people who are still living in the nineteenth century. My own belief is that there is great danger in the view which is so widely held that wealth consists in pieces of paper. If only we could think of it in terms of goods I believe we would be much more sensible. If we would also remember that at the present time we are living largely on savings, as I say both government realizations and the savings of private individuals, who are spending more than they are saving, as a whole, we would appreciate how important it is.

I think we should be clear in our own minds as to what are savings, because I do not think the hon. gentleman is clear. What are savings? My own definition is that savings are that part of the national income not spent on consumption goods, if it is invested in capital goods for the production of new wealth. As long as savings can be invested in producing new wealth, saving is desirable. When savings cannot be used in that way, saving becomes socially undesirable; it becomes hoarding, and is a detriment rather than a benefit to the economy. As a matter of fact, anyone who believes that the money used to exchange the goods we produce is wealth is backward in his economics. It is so elementary that it is hardly necessary to refer to it.

The fact of the matter is that at present we are not living off our capital; that is, we are not consuming capital without replacing it. In one or two places during his speech the minister said that a part of our trouble was that we were trying to replace too much capital too quickly. I am going to quote some figures, not in dollars but in terms of production.

Mr. HACKETT: Before the hon. gentleman goes on, would he permit me to ask a question, for purposes of information only? Is not unproductive capital about the only kind of capital the proprietor can keep at the present time, in England, under the income tax laws?

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not know what the proprietor in England can do with his money capital; but capital never functions as such until it is being literally consumed in the process of bringing forth new capital or new wealth.

The figures I wish to quote are contained in a newspaper report appearing in the Vancouver Sun of January 5, 1948, under an Ottawa dateline, and they come from government statistics. These figures compare production in 1938 and 1947:

	1938	1947
Pig iron (long tons)	705,000	1,842,000
Newsprint (tons)	2,600,000	4,400,000
Steel ingots and castings (long tons)	1,155,000	2,779,000
Petroleum (barrels)	6,400,000	7,100,000
Cement (barrels)	8,700,000	12,200,000
Electric power (kilowatt hours)	26,100,000	37,700,000

So it goes with a number of other items, showing an enormous increase in wealth; and it is typically so in most of our production.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Then at page 4249 I find the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario lamenting over the misconception of the split personality, whatever that may be. Dealing with this misconception, he said:

I do feel that should be abandoned once and for all.

Then he exclaimed:

What does the phrase "democratic socialism" mean?

By this time I began to understand what he was working around to. He went on to say:

When we look at Italy, Germany and Russia we realize that we should not be deceived by words. We should note what has happened there. Let us not be deceived by the words "nazism", "fascism", "communism"; it is all state socialism. That is in fact what they are.

I really do not know what we should call the system in Russia, but neither in Italy nor in Germany was the system state socialism. It was state capitalism, because the owners kept their interest in the capital and reaped their profits; the government ran their industries with the owners as managers. There was nothing socialist about it; and the proof of that fact is that the governments in Italy and Germany were welcomed by capitalists all over the world. As a matter of fact, no less a person than Winston Churchill exclaimed that if he were in Italy he would be walking with Mussolini's black shirts.

I was in Norway in 1936 and, meeting, while we were there, with a friend of my wife's who had come over from Germany, she said, "Wonderful country! Wonderful country! They have no strikes there!" That was the great thing that every capitalist in every country in the world saw in Germany and in Italy; there were no strikes. And, by God, because there were no strikes, they must be good governments.

Mr. FULTON: Did you hear what your deskmate said about Russia the other day?

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not know what he said.

Mr. FULTON: He said it was the sort of socialism we should have here. The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) said that.

Mr. MacINNIS: There are no strikes in Russia, either—I suppose there are not. And we are getting to the stage where there may be no strikes in this country. John L. Lewis, that champion of private enterprise, was fined twice and his union was fined twice, not so long ago, for going on strike. The railway employees in the United States were told that they could not go on strike, either. And if it comes to a showdown, the railway employees in Canada may be told that they cannot go on strike, either.

Mr. KNOWLES: Or they will lose their pension rights.

Mr. MacINNIS: Let us be reasonably and at least intellectually honest, as the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario says, in what we do and in what we say. There is a tendency—and let me tell hon. members it is a dangerous one—as one hon. member mentioned in the house a few evenings ago, to label everyone you do not like as a communist, a nazi or anything that you do not like.

Mr. CASE: There is a box factory in Saskatchewan run by the government, and the workers were not allowed to strike.

Mr. MacINNIS: The government of Saskatchewan has the best trade union act in Canada. That is not my say-so; it is the assertion of heads of labour organizations in this country. And they have collective bargaining in all its phases, even in the civil service.

Mr. CASE: They would not let them strike, though.

An hon. MEMBER: They fired the strikers.

Mr. MacINNIS: They did not fire the strikers. Everyone of them is back in his job. I see, Mr. Speaker, you are rising to tell me that my time is up, and I shall draw my remarks to a conclusion. I say we are living in dangerous times. When people have proven by their stand on various questions over periods of years that they have integrity, that they have understanding and that they believe in democracy, then other people, even if they do not like their philosophy, should not for political purposes try to confuse the minds of the people; because confusion is dangerous.

(Translation):

Mr. GEORGES H. HÉON (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, the budget proposals for the current fiscal year, presented to this house on May 18, may have seemed perfectly orthodox to those who drafted them, but they were received by our aggravated people with no more enthusiasm than was displayed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in presenting them or by hon. members in digesting them. This statement of the government's tax policy has brought no relief, no easing of the burden of income tax which the taxpayer of less than sixty-five years of age has to bear, whether he be a farmer, a merchant, an industrialist, a professor, an office employee, a professional or a labourer.

Among the chief victims of this new tax policy will be the heads of families, especially in the province of Quebec, where large families are not uncommon. Already they were overburdened by those numerous and irritating taxes, by the dwindling away of their pay envelopes from which were deducted the taxes collected at the source, unemployment insurance contributions and the like, by the ever-increasing cost of food and clothing and by a disheartening decline in the buying power of our Canadian dollar.

In fact, because tax exemptions remain unchanged while the people's purchasing power has been cut down by the higher cost of living, the income tax, though remaining at the same level, may well be considered higher in comparison with former years. This very afternoon, I went to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics to get definite information on the cost of living index.

In April of 1947, it stood at 130·6 while today, May 27, 1948, it has reached 151·6, highest point in the history of this country, not excepting the period that followed the first great war, although at the time there were no such things as controls and cyclical budgeting.

In the past twelve months therefore, the cost of living index has gone up 21 points. In view of this inordinate increase, taxes and exemptions that remain at the same level as last year are causing taxpayers a substantial degree of hardship of which they have good cause to complain. Some waggish newsman has called these proposals a "vinegar budget". Well, many a taxpayer will agree that the expression is sufficiently bitter to describe their feeling in the matter.

Canadian taxpayers, especially those who supported this government in the 1945 general election, had a right to expect a substantial tax cut. In fact, in the Liberal party's 1945 election platform, which I have before me as I speak, I find at pages 4 and 13 the following pledges:

> Tax reductions—the Liberal government will gradually reduce taxes when the war is over. Taxes will be lowered in order to release the people's purchasing power and give Canadians prosperity, employment and freedom.

Then, again at page 7:

> Tax reductions—war taxes will be lowered or repealed on May 11, 1945. Consumer goods will soon be back on the market at 1941 prices. Income tax reductions will come next.

The steady rise in the cost of living index which has now climbed to 151·6 and the government's tax policy are a far cry from the pledges I have just quoted. If that is what is understood by cyclical budgeting, a system praised so highly by various theorists, it were perhaps better to return to the old principle that allowed the taxpayer to benefit fully from any accumulated surplus. This year, the apparent surplus amounts to $679 million, and will be devoted almost exclusively to reducing the national debt that now reaches the astronomical figure of $12,378 million. Is it expected that we shall pay off this debt, resulting largely from our economic and military assistance to Great Britain, by means of cyclical financing? Shall we stick to this new policy of debt reduction by keeping taxation at present levels until the debt is wiped out? I am afraid the Canadian taxpayer will not have the patience to go that far, because after all, he is the one who pays.

During the war, Canadians sacrificed much in the way of life, money and labour. They now have a right to expect tax relief when a huge surplus is declared. It is fitting that part only, say half of this astounding surplus, be applied to debt reduction. And in all fairness and equity the other half should be used to relieve the taxpayer, particularly in those years of high costs. In recent years, Canada has given or loaned without security billions and millions to nations more powerful than itself. Such munificence made us feel strong, wealthy and able to dispose of staggering amounts. It is therefore very hard to understand how today, we must suddenly clamp down and deprive the taxpayers of reductions fully justified by the high cost of living and the surplus declared.

I repeat that the man in the street, the ordinary civil servant, the salaried man of the so-called "white-collar" class, the good industrial worker and above all the family man who, without flinching, witnessed the dance of billions during the war and to whom every promise was given that we might win the war, have a right to complain about those low exemptions and high taxes. Some people go on repeating that Canada has become with the last two great wars a great international power and that she plays a leading part in foreign affairs. Let us be careful lest a too heavy burden of taxes, too long maintained, seem too high a price to pay for the privilege of contributing, from the background, in the making of peace treaties, and lest Canadians decide at last to start minding their own business by looking after their own social and financial security.

We have heard a lot lately about social justice and just salaries; countless labour disputes have broken out these last twelve months and our conciliation and arbitration boards have had their hands full, settling these disputes. It can be stated in a general way that, as a result of this arbitration workers have obtained redress of their grievances while employers have paid the salaries which their income allowed. However, the cost of living has reached the highest level yet, and might increase still further. There will surely be more such claims from the ranks of labour and as most employers will be in no position to increase wages indefinitely, strikes, some of them possibly violent, will paralyse our economy. It is therefore up to the government to follow the only course that is left open if these new conflicts are to be avoided. Income tax exemptions must therefore be raised substantially, both for single people and married people with dependents.

It is unfortunate that the government did not see fit to take note of the suggestions contained in the brief submitted by the Catholic bishops of Quebec, and by other religious denominations, respectfully suggesting an increase of income tax exemptions. I sincerely hope those suggestions will eventually be followed. They are distinguished by their authoritative nature and their plain common sense.

Let us have a look at today's exemptions:

For single persons, the exemption is $750. In view of the high cost of board, clothing, and other necessaries, and of room or apartment rent, how can a single man save anything and prepare to establish a home? This paltry exemption is not far from being antisocial and anti-religious and it should, in my opinion, be raised to $1,500.

For married persons, the exemption is now $1,500. In their case also the cost of living fritters down the exemption enough to make it insignificant, greatly reduces opportunities for saving and establishing a comfortable and modern home. The exemption should be raised to $2,400, which would ensure a reasonable margin of financial security and encourage thrift and industry.

But, to my mind at least, it is particularly with regard to children that the present exemption is distinctly antisocial. At the present time, if a child benefits from the family allowance which cannot exceed $120 a year, the exemption is $100, which makes up a total of $220.

With the pace and requirements of modern life, who can properly feed, bring up, clothe, give an education to a child on $220 a year? It is impossible and even if parents should resort to cyclical finance and jugglery, they will not be able to make both ends meet without denying themselves or borrowing money.

In the case of children over 15 years of age and not in receipt of family allowances, the present exemption is $300. It is well known that at the age of 15, a child usually has completed his elementary course and is ready to undertake classical studies or enter some other institution of higher learning. He needs an entirely new wardrobe, because he has grown up. Clothing, books, pocket money, and fairly high boarding and tuition fees must be provided for. How can parents meet all these necessary expenditures with $300? As everyone knows, that is quite impossible, so much so that higher studies are often abandoned for lack of money or savings. It therefore seems that both in order to encourage large families and to facilitate higher or specialized studies among our people, a total exemption of $500 for each child would be essential, especially in view of the high cost of living. To my mind, such an investment would bring valuable dividends in the future and ensure the living and educational standard to which the younger generation is fully entitled.

It is all very well to practise internationalism, to accumulate huge surpluses, but it is still better and much more practical to grant our own people religious, social and economic security. Tax exemptions should be immediately increased to $1,500 for single people and $2,400 for married people, with an additional exemption of $500 per child. That would prove an excellent means of disposing of our estimated or anticipated surplus.

Since the present budget offers no relief to the farmer, the wage-earner or salaried man of less than 65 years of age—except for the abolition of the tax on alarm clocks, watches, bets on horse races, vinegar and a few consumer goods—and since my electors are dissatisfied with the government for having failed to reduce the income tax or tax exemptions, I shall have to vote against the motion.

Next year, with general elections in sight its system of cyclical financing or financial cycling will no doubt enable the government to grant substantial income tax reductions. Should these reductions be of the kind I have been advocating tonight, and which should have been granted in the present budget, I shall support them by my vote.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, I feel called upon to say a few words on this budget.

First, I must say that, like at least 90 per cent of the Canadian taxpayers, I was deeply and painfully shocked to realize that as I shall presently show—this budget is but a further indication of the anti-family and anti-social policies which have victimized us for so long.

Honest and conscientious citizens are all the more disappointed in finding that this anti-family policy, which is becoming more and more apparent in our legislation, is but an offshoot of an economic system managed by an irresponsible bureaucracy which seems bent on destroying or at least weakening the family sole basic unit of a well-organized society.

I know that many hon. members to your right, Mr. Speaker, watch the developments of this policy with fear; I realize that many of them eagerly wish for more human legislation that will be kinder to families. I know what many of them think of this budget but, unfortunately, party discipline compels them to vote for it though they would like to disapprove and censure the government's policy in this instance.

Surely, I need not speak at great length to prove that the existence and expansion of the family are essential to social life.

To confirm my statement I need only quote the late and lamented Cardinal Villeneuve.

During a week to social studies, in 1923, Cardinal Villeneuve, at that time Father Villeneuve, said, in Montreal, in reference to the family considered as social unit:

> Thus family, not the individual, is the social unit; it is a simple body in society, made up of elements so numerous and so different. To understand social order, one has to begin with the family. Political society is superimposed upon organized families, without however destroying them.

And further on:

> Public legislation, therefore, ladies and gentlemen, should take scrupulous and constant care not to crush or break up the family, a cell in the social structure. On the contrary, according to Antoine, it is the great and peremptory duty of the legislator to recognize, protect, and strengthen the fundamental rights which the family has received, not from the state, but from God, author of nature.

Social organization aims today at protecting, apparently at least, through an abundance of texts, the individual, his fortune, his political rights, his outside relations with his neighbours, but it holds nothing or practically nothing, it destroys all, or nearly all of what is left of old legal traditions that could protect the family against so many undermining assaults. It kills rather the principles of life, the organic ties which sustain the family, and through the family it affects society, and through society human happiness. Neither the authority of the father, nor the primacy of the husband, nor the subordination of the son and the servant, nor the vital indissolubility and the exclusive unity of the matrimonial tie are preserved, rather they are surrendered for the sake of peace, often quite gladly.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that to a certain extent that statement contains a criticism that applies to the budget we are now discussing. Indeed, one of the anti-family aspects of this budget is the fact that, against the hopes of everybody, the wishes of every taxpayer and the request of every family head, no tax reduction has been announced.

There is no doubt that in view of the huge surplus announced by the minister, he should have raised to at least $2,500 the taxable minimum of the married taxpayer. I shall not take time to go over all the reasons already given in support of that request, but there is no doubt that such a change is absolutely necessary because of the increase in the cost of living.

The government should at least have granted relief to heads of families by increasing the exemption to which he is entitled for his children. It is astounding to see how, through this income tax measure, parents are penalized for wishing to give their children the care and education they require. It seems that none of those responsible for the present state of affairs have the slightest notion of what it means to support a son or daughter who wishes to continue his or her studies. There is another objectionable feature in the present Income Tax Act. That is the deduction at the source irrespective of the type of employment. In my constituency, for instance, and in others too, there are quite a number of logging-camps which for part of the year hire only farmers, sailors or fishermen to work in the woods during the off-season.

Were the wages paid these loggers put on a yearly basis, they would be liable to income tax; so the employers have to deduct it at the source.

Now, at the end of the year, those people have to file returns and produce receipts which are often mislaid, and afterwards they have to wait nearly a year before being refunded what has been deducted from their salary. That system causes much inconvenience and trouble, in addition to considerable administration expenses. What is more serious, those taxpayers are generally in urgent need of that money, which is theirs anyway, and as often as not their families have to suffer.

Why does not the government eliminate all those difficulties by deciding, for instance, that the salary of certain seasonal employees will no longer be subject to such a deduction? Since a distinction is made between seasonal and regular employment in other legislation, for example in the Unemployment Insurance Act, why should it not also be done in the case of the Income Tax Act?

In this connection, there is also another matter which I should like to point out. It so happens that quite a number of young people who, during the war, had left their homes to work in industrial plants have gone back to their rural communities. They have settled there, have married and have resumed an occupation which pays less than their wartime jobs, their income being, at times, barely sufficient to provide a living for their new families.

Now a great number of these new heads of families are at present receiving from the Income Tax Division certain claims for balances owing for 1943, 1944 and 1945. I know of many cases where these young bread-winners have had to deny their families the necessities of life in order to repay the revenue department.

This makes for social unrest. I would therefore ask the government to cancel all claims of less than $500, against heads of families, for income tax levied during the war years. The total of those claims would certainly not be very large and it would mean a great relief for those young families.

Mr. Speaker, the government has been swamped with requests for special consideration to family men. The bishops' request for higher exemptions is significant. They had given it much thought and they were surely not looking after their own interests. I agree that during the war every Canadian without exception was expected to contribute fully to the war effort. Perhaps it is necessary to impose unduly high taxes during the war, but I contend that the government is violating the rights of the family by keeping the taxes at the same level in peacetime.

I was particularly impressed by the fact that the minister did not deem it advisable to grant tax reductions, although he encouraged night clubs, places of entertainment and similar organizations, by abolishing the tax formerly levied upon them. It is admittedly a strange attitude. I remember that on the day following the budget speech, newspapers were filled with advertisements from places of amusement, night clubs and so forth, soliciting young people's increasing patronage.

Taxes still fall heavily upon the shoulders of the family man, while habitués of night clubs and other places of amusement are encouraged to patronize such places which certainly do not help bring the family closer together.

As most of those who seek this kind of entertainment are single, everything seems planned to entice them away from their family.

Mr. Speaker, if our legislation were imbued with a more Christian, a sounder moral spirit, there would be no need to fear the menace that is now hanging over society.

It is useless to pass social legislation if we give it the anti-family character found in so many of our enactments such as the Family Allowances Act with its decreasing rate, the various housing acts that promote the building of two and three-roomed apartments and many other pieces of legislation. Such enactments can never be effective; they will give maximum results only if based on the interests of the family rather than on those of the individual.

(Text):

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, the budget produced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will greatly deceive the taxpayers in the low-income brackets. The burden of taxation is still too heavy for the average wage earner with dependents. A government cannot proclaim a surplus and at the same time leave under the burden of taxation and excessive cost of living those who work and toil in the interests of their families and of society.

Everything can be bought at a ransom price because the administration could not or did not want to foresee the present situation. Family allowances have become null and void because the government allowed trusts to accumulate shameful profits at the expense of our families. In these difficult times the good elements still remaining in democracy should unite against the profiteers who sooner or later will ruin it in favour of communism.

The time has come to hand out to the diplomats and public men, responsible for the communist invasion which is now threatening civilization, the treatment they deserve. Many times I have raised this issue in this chamber. I have pointed out often enough the inherent danger of the government's attitude toward communist Russia and its satellites, and I believe I can free myself from the responsibility for the impending danger which will soon destroy the civilized world.

So far as I am concerned, I cannot support the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) when he asks for appropriations for the carrying out of a blameable policy. For a long time, when he was Minister of Justice, he refused to outlaw the communist party in Canada. Why, then, did the minister show such haste in appointing an ambassador to the government of Yugoslavia, a renowned persecutor of bishops and religion? Why manifest this open sympathy toward the deceiving and communist government of Poland? Why mobilize the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in order to locate property which belongs to the church and which the Polish government wished to misappropriate and steal in communist fashion?

Why tolerate in Canada the hatred and treason of the Labour-Progressive party, while refusing to appoint an ambassador to the vatican, whose supreme appeal to charity, justice and peace is the only hope in these extremely difficult times?

The nations refused to receive the illustrious pontiff's appeal to charity, justice and peace. Because they ignore the only logical advice, the allied nations won the war twice and lost peace twice within thirty years.

What has happened to the war aims of the united nations? Christianity was sacrificed to the communists by the very people who claimed they were defending it. In the underworld of international diplomacy Poland was sacrificed with the shameful co-operation of the Canadian government, this same government which declared war when the German hordes were dominating that country, which was invaded and dismembered many times in history.

What did our rulers do? When Poland was agonizing in devastation and ruin, they officially recognized the usurping and communist government of Lublin. As servants of Soviet Russia, they came to terms with the invertebrate people of Yalta in order to impose upon Poland the communist bandits who are now presiding over the destinies of that country.

This hypocrisy has gone far enough. Nobody will believe that an atheistic government was instituted in Poland without the connivance and co-operation of the present government. Tomorrow we shall see the government imposing compulsory military service in order to stop communist Russia, which only recently our government was cherishing, feeding, equipping and arming on behalf of the great principles of the Atlantic charter, which never even existed. This is national and international life. Insidious propaganda, condemnable concealments, lies—everything is used in order to deceive the people. The government proceeded gradually when it imposed upon the population its policy of participating in the war, its mobilization and conscription.

Stalin also proceeded gradually in his policy of invasion. The government of Canada and the Secretary of State for External Affairs freely opened the door for him by recognizing the satellite of the Russian dictator as the communist government of Poland. We shall soon be called to the colours. Once more Canada will sacrifice its blood and its economy through the error of the government, which contributed to installing communism in Poland first, and then in the other satellite countries of Russia.

The war which is threatening the world will be more horrible than what we have yet seen. Whole countries will be destroyed by infernal inventions whose power will be irresistible and frightful. Death germs will be scattered everywhere. Those responsible for this calamity will pose as crusaders. Nobody will refuse to defend Canada if this country is attacked. But I know some people upon whom history will cast a slur because unconsciously they gave away our country to communism. These people will still require the obligation to serve. Since it is easier, but less noble, to vote other people's death rather than one's own, once more they will vote the sacrifice of our sons.

[Mr. Lacombe.]

Hiding in remoteness, they will be awaiting fearfully a guiding light in the night into which their disastrous policies have plunged the world. Because they could not prepare peace, they are now preparing war. In this twentieth century in the Christian era, we are reverting to barbarism through the selfish interests of predatory nations. We are being led to the abyss by military and financial imperialism. The true doctrine of charity and love was trampled upon. The solemn warnings of the Vatican were ignored by Canada as well as by other countries. As an illustration, I only wish to quote the following excerpt from the Vatican organ, L'Osservatore Romano:

Si vis pacem, para bellum . . .

Vatican City (PA)—The Osservatore Romano, the official organ of the Vatican, stated today that the world is reverting to the times of the old principle "Si vis pacem, para bellum", "if you want peace, get ready for war."

Before the Christian civilization, this was the only valid principle. But Christianity has changed this principle; it proclaims: "If you want peace, prepare for peace."

According to certain Vatican sources, this editorial was written by Count Guiseppe Della Torre. It also contained this sentence: "If we are compelled to replace faith by strength, even in a defensive manner, it is because Christianity is far below its object." Is it not deplorable to witness what is now going on? Let no one eulogize democracy, a corrupt and corrupting regime. As we know it today, it is not worth while fighting for it. When governments instil into it the dose of Christianity which it requires to survive, then and then only will it deserve our protection.

The best way to combat communism is to solve the problem of slums and replace them by dwellings worthy of the average man and his family. In this twentieth century is it decent to tolerate in our midst all these shacks and slums? The housing problem is a national one. It is up to the federal government to solve it. Let the government take money wherever it can. Economic liberalism has lasted too long. It is the source of the worst infringements. The Canadian people are fed up with this laissez-faire policy of the government. The average families are shamefully exploited by the ruthless trusts. Some high-class robbers are controlling certain companies which dominate our Canadian politics.

One of the most disgusting instances can be found in the profits accumulated on the sales of butter by Canada Packers. During a short term of eleven months, this company made more profits than during the previous twenty years. And this disgraceful robbery goes on under the eyes of a servile government which reserves all its sympathies for these trusts which are essential to its electoral organization. The exploitation of the people by trusts is the life source of communism.

To this add the co-operation of the government when Poland was betrayed by the most powerful nations on earth, in favour of communist Russia, when they officially recognized the impostor government of Lublin, and then you have the lamentable picture of the leadership of communism in the world.

Czechoslovakia was sacrificed at Munich by five statesmen who were branded by history: Stalin, Hitler, Mussolini, Daladier and Chamberlain. Since then, that country seems to have lost all faith in the great nations which then were at the maximum of their power. It was the same Stalin who stabbed Poland in order better to dominate it. Poland had to undergo the shame of treason; her political leaders are now the victims of the communist gestapo.

Smaller nations were misled by the lies and hypocrisy of powerful democracies and proud dictatorships. Their leaders were not up to their duties, since they were bound by the selfish interests of financial imperialism which has been dominating history and governments for many years. They bear the responsibility for the present situation. Even here in Canada, for many years the motto of the government is the same as Talleyrand's: "Governing means dissimulating." The same situation exists throughout the world. Truth, charity and justice have been replaced by a policy of falsehood, persecution and hatred. The Vatican, where Pope Pius XII is reigning, is the greatest power in the world, because this illustrious pontiff is always preaching a doctrine of charity, peace and love. I have often asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs to appoint an ambassador to the Vatican. The minister does not seem to be interested in the Vatican. He answers by appointing an ambassador to Marshal Tito, the persecutor of the primate of the church of Yugoslavia. This is an insult to five million Roman Catholics in Canada, and an insult to Christianism. The minister and the government do not like me to bring forth this most important matter. They turn a deaf ear to it; but some day they will wake up facing a situation beyond remedy, in Canada and in the rest of the world, for which they will be responsible.

When will political leaders have enough courage to assume their responsibilities and squarely face events? From that day Canada will not be called upon to sacrifice her sons and her economy every ten or twenty years in disastrous and useless wars.

Finally, may I mention a regrettable event which happened recently. The United States refused to consider as persona grata a certain diplomat recently arrived from Czechoslovakia; and our government readily accepted the same individual as consul of his country in Canada. One would think our country has become the refuge of all communist miscreants intent on promoting revolutions and causing trouble.

If a member of this house introduces a bill to outlaw the communist or the Labour-Progressive party in Canada, immediately an endless debate starts, while it would be preferable to remain silent so that the bill could go through. Eventually we shall be convinced that communism is well protected in this country. Such an attitude is not new. During the 1936 session the Liberal party voted the repeal of section 98 of the criminal code, which prohibited all unlawful associations and all associations whose purpose was to undermine lawfully constituted authority in Canada.

We have no use for all these communist agents. The government and the Secretary of State for External Affairs should be extremely firm and should send back to their own countries these communists with double-breasted suits, since among this underworld they are the most affluent and the most powerful. Then only will the Canadian people know security under the protection of the free institutions which Canada won through sacrifice and struggle.

Is he a true Canadian who allows and tolerates the formation of communist cells in our country, and then preaches a crusade throughout the world against this obnoxious doctrine? Such a degree of cynicism is beyond me. I have seen so much treachery during the twenty-five years I have been sitting in this house. I have seen so many solemn pledges violated and trampled upon. I have been a witness to such deceitful and insidious propaganda that I do not hesitate to state that one needs courage to witness the political somersaults of certain politicians who are always prepared to sacrifice Canada in the defence of theories which they themselves created and strengthened by helping atheistic and godless Russia at the expense of small but courageous Christian countries which are now agonizing under Stalin's heel. Let these politicians bear this formidable responsibility.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): After consulting the leaders of the opposition parties, I desire to move the following motion, seconded by the Secretary of State (Mr. Gibson), which seems to meet the wishes of everyone:

That the house shall not adjourn this day at eleven o'clock p.m., and that standing order No. 7 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

And Mr. Speaker having put the question.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Mr. Speaker, before you take the vote I should like to say a few words.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry, but I put the question to the house: Is the house ready for the question? No one rose, and I have read the question. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The house divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Coldwell) which was negatived on the following division:

(Translation):

Mr. DIONNE (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. McLure). That is why I refrained from voting.

(Text):

Mr. JOHNSTON: I was paired with the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver). Had I voted, I would have voted for the sub-amendment.

Mr. QUELCH: I was paired with the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Leger). Had I voted, I would have voted for the sub-amendment.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I was paired. Had I voted, I would have voted against the sub-amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Mr. Speaker, I should like to adjourn the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Johnston, seconded by Mr. Blackmore, moves that this debate be now adjourned. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those in favour will please say "yea".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yea.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those against will please say "nay".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, had I been permitted to say a few words a while ago, I would have kept within the hour of eleven o'clock, but I am afraid that the remarks which I have to say at this time may extend just a little beyond that. In view of the fact that the house has agreed to continue sitting after eleven o'clock, I do not think I should necessarily curtail my remarks.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. JOHNSTON: On this occasion—

Mr. DENIS: Take two hours, if you wish.

Mr. JOHNSTON: —I want to say, Mr. Speaker, first that I would consider myself derelict in my duty if I did not express an opinion on this budget. I am well aware of the fact that some hon. members are anxious to get away. I am also aware of the fact that it is a great disappointment to them. I am equally sure of this fact that their disappointment is no greater than the disappointment the people of Canada had when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) presented his budget. I can assure you, sir, that the people of Canada are getting very little relief today in the way of taxation from the budget which was brought down the other day.

Mr. ARGUE: Take forty minutes.

Mr. JOHNSTON: When the Minister of Finance spoke the other day he said he was fearful lest the tax concessions which might have been given would be taken by those who were conducting business in this country. In order that I may not be accused of misquoting the Minister of Finance, I shall use his own words. On page 4064 of Hansard the Minister of Finance gave the reason why he did not think tax concessions should be passed on to the general public at this time. He said:

> Demands are so excessive in relation to supply that we cannot rely upon competition or other market forces to ensure that the consumer would get the benefit of any general or widespread reductions we might make. Producers or distributors are in a favourable position to gain whatever the treasury gives up, and they could probably find plausible reasons for doing so, notwithstanding the high levels of profits at present.

That is a very weak excuse for the Minister of Finance to give as his reason for not passing on these tax reductions which all the country expected. It is lamentable that we in this country find ourselves in the position that we dare not reduce the taxes to the common people lest some others in preferred places might take that profit. It speaks very poorly for government policy, if they have no better safeguards for the public than that. Probably the Minister of Finance does not know of any way in which the public can be protected. Perhaps he is not aware that already in this debate proposals have been set forth which would thoroughly protect the people of this country, if these tax concessions had been allowed to be passed on to them.

Mr. FAIR: On a question of privilege, I wonder whether hon. members on this side of the house have any rights here, and whether they can be allowed to proceed with their speeches without further interruption from the other side of the house. I think it is about time that a little order was kept here.

Mr. DENIS: That is not fair.

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask hon. members behind the curtain not to talk so loudly.

Mr. DENIS: Proceed.

Mr. JOHNSTON: In case the minister may have overlooked the fact that others who have already preceded me in this debate have already offered him some excellent suggestions as to how the public might be safeguarded against the imposition which he thought should come about, I should like to refer to the speech of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) the other day when he gave an effective safeguard for protecting the people in this country, once the government decided to pass on tax concessions to them. If we turn to page 4259 of Hansard of May 21 we shall see that the leader of this group had this to say:

> Corporate income tax requires considerable adjustment if proper incentives to all-out production are to be provided, and if we are to ensure the passing on to consumers of benefits resulting from sales tax abolition. Therefore I propose exemption from corporate income tax on a basis that would represent 10 per cent return on capital, this figure to be arrived at by a procedure similar to that used by the board of referees, formerly set up and used by the Minister of Finance; this exemption to be conditional upon the corporation furnishing satisfactory evidence that savings in cost resulting from sales tax abolition have been passed on to consumers.

If the government had taken cognizance of such a measure as that I am sure that the people of Canada would have received the tax concessions which they expected would be passed on to them. There are other ways in which purchasing power to the people could be increased without its being interfered with by any group of persons in this country. The ones to which I refer now are those which have been advocated by this party for some time. The first was the national dividend. In the past we have been criticized for advocating a national dividend. It is true that we are not being criticized to the same extent today that we were in days gone by, because the government saw, and quite properly so, that the things which the Social Credit party were advocating were worthwhile. Therefore they did adopt one of them, and one of the most important ones, namely, the national dividend, except that they called it family allowances. In principle I agree with family allowances, and have always agreed with them, but I object to the manner in which the money is raised to pay family allowances. But from the standpoint of principle it is one of the ways in which the people's interests can be protected, if there was a tax reduction. This might be called incentive controls; incentives which would induce people to produce more, because they would know that the consuming public would have the increased purchasing power with which to buy the increased production.

I do not think there is a party in the house; in fact I am positive there is not a party in the house, certainly not on the opposition side, which has put down its proposals in such clear-cut fashion for all to see as has the Social Credit party. We may be criticized on them; but had these proposals been used, instead of the taxation club, to beat the consumer into humble submission, I am sure that the average citizen of this country would be much more satisfied than he is today.

The minister seemed to take great delight in the fact that he had a surplus this year of $727 million. May I say this is not the result of sound economics, but rather the result of an outdated orthodox financial system, which this government is endeavouring to make work, even though it may cause severe hardship on the people.

One of the ways in which the government raised this surplus was by taxation. It was not a true surplus in any sense of the word. It was a surplus which was acquired by exorbitant taxation. The sales tax is one of the most outstanding examples of that. The sales tax is one of those taxes that bear most heavily on the people who are least able to stand the strain. Then there are the other taxes which are referred to as indirect or nuisance taxes, and they, too, bear upon the common people more than upon the others. At any rate, they bear equally upon the rich and the poor, but the rich have the money and the poor have not.

If those taxes had not been so high in the past year; if the government had not used that taxation club to extort this money from the people, the minister's surplus would not have been that grand total of $727 million. Again, the government not only increased their taxes in this budget, but they increased them by twenty-five per cent a while ago in the twenty-five per cent excise tax. The minister might think that is not a tax, but I was interested the other day when I came across the following newspaper article which I clipped out. I think it expresses the thought as well as I could. It is taken from the Ottawa Citizen:

For Mr. Abbott's information.

At least he is getting some worthwhile information today.

Mr. Abbott insists, goodness knows why, that taxes in Canada are lower than in the United States. We would suggest to Mr. Abbott that he try out buying a family car. On the modest purchase of a Ford or a Plymouth he would pay between $500 and $600 more than he would have to pay if he were buying the same type of car in the United States. And if Mr. Abbott thought he would like or could afford something better, say a Chrysler or a Buick, he would pay between $800 and $900 more than if he were buying in the United States. Most of the difference would be represented by taxes—higher Canadian taxes. We hope Mr. Abbott would agree that $500 or $900 would pay (for the average man) a lot of income tax. Also that it would buy a lot of eggs and butter.

So when we thoroughly scrutinize the tax bill which the minister has inflicted upon the people of the country, we find that not only are there all the taxes shown in the budget which he brought down, but there are many other taxes which bear most heavily upon the common, poor people of the country. One outstanding example is that which I have just read from this newspaper.

A car nowadays is not a luxury. It has become a necessity, and when people have to buy these necessities they have to pay an added tax of $500 or $900. Not only is the excise tax inflicted on people through the purchase of automobiles, but it is imposed on other necessities such as electrical equipment for household use, and we find that the veteran today cannot furnish the house he lives in because of excessive taxes which are piled up on top of the already high cost of production. In most cases these are hidden taxes and the manufacturer gets the blame. Of course he is the one who is criticized rather than the one who should be criticized, namely the government.

When looking through the budget speech, I was particularly interested in what the minister said about the great surplus. I was interested in the different ways he had of using that surplus. First of all, he thought the surplus would offset a depression. He was going to put that away for a rainy day.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, we are all conversant with the old saying that you cannot tax yourself into prosperity or borrow yourself out of debt; neither can we tax the country into prosperity. That is a certainty. I am not convinced that the minister will be able to fix his financial position by this surplus to such an extent that we shall be relieved of further excessive taxation. So the people must not expect, even though we have had a large surplus this year, that they will not continue to bear heavy taxation in the years to come.

Another way in which the minister was going to use the surplus was to prevent inflation. I could not help wondering, if the minister were really sincere that this surplus would help to offset inflation, and, if there is a severe danger of inflation in this country, why he should not have postponed the payment of the compulsory savings. By paying out the compulsory savings at this time he was putting that amount of money into circulation. If there was already too much money in existence, that may have caused further inflation, but if it did cause inflation he should not have done it but should have postponed it for a year or two.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Do you advocate that?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Yes; I would under these circumstances, because what has happened is this. He has given the compulsory savings out today and he is taking them back by increased taxation tomorrow. I say definitely that if there were a danger of inflation the proper thing would have been not to pay out the compulsory savings. He may have had them postponed for a year or so, but he would not have had them confiscated as he has in the excessive taxation program.

He will use the surplus in another way also. I do not know whether he will get all the money he wants out of the $727 million, but he also wants that surplus to pay for the excess of exports over imports. How he will stretch it to that extent I do not know, and if that is not enough he wishes to use it for national defence.

Well, Mr. Speaker, all the good that $727 million would do if another war broke out would not be very much, and I wonder what would happen if another war did break out. Would we limit defence preparations to $727 million? I do not believe he could build more than one battleship with that amount. I am sure that if war broke out we would find more money for defence than that $727 million.

We recall vividly that just before the last war, when this country was in one of the greatest depressions the world had ever seen, when a million and a half people were unemployed, we did not have enough money to keep families from starving to death; yet, almost the day after war was declared, we found millions and billions, in fact so much money that our national debt went from three and a half billion to around seventeen billion gross debt or about fourteen billion net debt.

Where did the money come from? It certainly did not come out of taxes, because the people did not have the money to pay the taxes; and if we can finance war to the extent we did the last time, it seems extremely strange that we cannot finance peace as well.

An hon. MEMBER: It is the present system.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Yes, absolutely it is the present system. The government is endeavouring to make the old worn-out orthodox financial system function in time of prosperity and the only time it will function is in time of scarcity. And the government through its present policy is forcing the country into that position of scarcity.

If the minister is not satisfied with using the $727 million that way, he has another way and that is to reduce the national debt. I never saw so many uses for a fixed amount of money. On page 4066 of Hansard the minister said, with regard to the national debt:

> The general policy for this year should be to use our surplus to reduce our debt and thereby to fight inflation in the manner most suited to our type of government and our way of life.

I wonder if the $727 million which the minister has as a surplus would in any way materially reduce our debt? Our net debt is around $13 billion. The interest on that debt alone is in the neighbourhood of $480 million a year. If we reduced that by the approximate $700 million surplus, we would still have a debt of about $12,300 million. I think this will have little meaning as a great achievement by a nearly bankrupt nation. The mere fact that our debt will be reduced to $12,300 million will not in itself make any great difference as far as our financial standing is concerned. For the minister to suggest that this would in any way benefit the nation to any material degree is just pure nonsense. When one considers that we in this country have a national production of around about $13 billion, and that would represent an increase of about twelve per cent or thirteen per cent, that should mean that the purchasing power of the people would have to be increased over what it was last year; that is, if they are to be able to buy the total production.

Some might say that part of that will be used for export. True, it will be. But when you export goods, you must bring back goods in return; either that, or you are giving them away. When those goods are brought back here and put upon our market, our people must be in a position financially to buy those goods and consume them. Otherwise we shall have a continuing spiral of unemployment; and we have quite a serious unemployment situation today. Whenever there is a shortage of effective demand for goods and services which the people are producing, then of course you immediately start into a period of unemployment.

I wonder if the minister was sincere about reducing the debt. I hate to accuse him of insincerity, but I must say that I do not think he was sincere. I say that for this reason. I wish to direct your attention for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to a statement which was made by the governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Graham Towers, before the banking and commerce committee in 1939. It is found at page 80 of the proceedings of that committee and is in answer to a question by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch). The hon. member for Acadia asked this question:

> Is it possible for you to imagine any way by which we are ever going to pay the debt we have got?

Mr. Towers replied:

> As the debts of the government are an asset of the Canadian people, I do not see much point in the thing; except that, to the extent that the government thinks that the distribution of those assets of the Canadian people—which are its debt—is unsatisfactory, it may take steps to remedy that distribution in any way that lies within the legislative power; in fact, in any way, I suppose—by income tax or succession duties or any other action it cares to take.

I should like to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that the governor of the Bank of Canada says this is an asset, and as long as it is owned by the Canadian people it will be all right. But of course we know it is not owned by the Canadian people. I think the estimate at one time was that less than one per cent of the people of Canada owned over sixty per cent of the national debt. That is quite a tribute when the rest of Canada must pay homage in the form of interest to these few. Then Mr. Towers went on further to say, at page 235:

> So that all I can say would be this, that in a country where the sum total of public and private debt was decreasing you have a country which is going backward and which is becoming more poverty-stricken. Generally speaking, in a country where you find there is no public and private debt you have a country resembling darkest Africa; there is nothing else.

Following out the opinion of the governor of the Bank of Canada in this regard, if the minister followed the plan which he says he intends to follow, that of reducing the national debt, he would be putting this country back on the level of darkest Africa; and I do not think anybody will agree with that. I do not agree with it. I do not think that, if we did away with the public debt, it would put this country back on a par with darkest Africa.

But the government has no plan of reducing the national debt. Let there be no mistake about that. If there were a plan, this government would be coming forth with it quickly. If the government were sincere in its endeavour to reduce the national debt, it would do something similar to what the province of Alberta did. Alberta put into operation a plan whereby they would abolish the provincial debt in a matter of twenty-five to thirty years, and it is done on a scientific and logical basis. The dominion government could do that if it wanted to reduce the national debt. I am quite sure that the Minister of Finance agrees with Mr. Towers. If the Minister of Finance wants to find out how to reduce the national debt without putting further burdensome taxation on the people, I would again advise him to refer to the speech made by the hon. member for Peace River, for he clearly outlined the method there.

Some may ask if we should reduce taxation. My personal opinion is that we should reduce it greatly; for certainly the government does not need the taxation which it is putting on the people today. That is evidenced by the fact that the minister had a $727 million surplus. Some of the best monetary authorities in this country agree that we should not at this time go into heavy taxation. Let me refer again to the same governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Towers, when he had this to say about taxation. This was in an argument, or I should say it was in a broadcast put on between different persons; and among those who participated were Mr. Quelch and Mr. Towers. That was on April 4, 1943. Mr. Quelch asked this question of Mr. Towers:

> After the war the need will be to encourage private spending. Heavy taxes and public borrowing will be contrary to the public welfare. Will the government finance all desirable public projects by credit expansion when necessary?

Mr. Towers replied:

In circumstances such as Mr. Quelch describes, I would say there would be grounds for government not meeting the entire cost of its programs by taking and drawing on public savings. The desire would be to encourage private spending and make government investment more of a residual item. If part of the necessary money had to come from credit expansion—and the projects were sound and in the public interest—then I should say go ahead.

That is just the opposite, Mr. Speaker, of what the government is doing. It is endeavouring to take from the people at this time all the taxes that the traffic will bear.

It seems to me also, Mr. Speaker, that if the government were really sincere about helping the people of this country, something could have been done to lift the present tax burden, in view of the fact that the government has lifted the tax on pari-mutuels, which is gambling, and on amusements, taxes imposed upon a minority who are best able to pay. Yet the government has not seen fit to do so.

I want to refer to one other thing that seems important to me. During the last few days here we have heard quite a good deal of discussion in regard to communism, which we are trying to combat. We are assisting the people of Europe by giving them goods and services under the European relief plan, and also by giving grants and lend-lease, in order to combat the forces of communism. Yet here at home we are actually fostering the growth of communism by depressing the standards of living of our own people through excessive taxation. I do not know where this logic is leading us. One of the greatest things we could do to combat communism in this country would be to lay off this tremendous, unjustifiable taxation and raise the standard of living of our people to such a point that communism would not thrive. That is the proper way to kill communism; make conditions in our country such that people will not tolerate a policy of that kind.

Then for a moment I want to refer to annuities, because in my view this is another way in which the government has taken a crack at those in the low-income brackets. To make it short, I should like to read an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen the other day dealing with this subject. It said:

Annuitants are not rich

There is little basis for the suggestion made from time to time on behalf of insurance companies that "in all too many cases" it is only the well to do who have taken maximum advantage of the lower rates for government annuities. When government annuities were established in 1908 they were devised to enable people of moderate means to make provision for a small income in their declining years. That purpose has largely been fulfilled.

In his royal commission inquiry into taxation of annuities four years ago, Mr. Justice Ives, former chief justice of Alberta, found that about 87 per cent of the recipients held contracts for less than $900 a year and that three-quarters of all annuitants were receiving less than $600 a year. In the main those who took out annuities were unable to afford even the maximum of $1,200 a year which the plan permits.

For ten years it was possible to purchase annuities which would return as much as $5,000 a year. Yet at the time of the Ives report there were only 131 annuitants drawing more than $1,200 a year—less than one-half of one per cent of the total.

In 1931 the maximum was reduced to $1,200 a year and it now stands at that figure. At current living costs this is a small amount, especially if it has to cover all the living expenses of the annuitant. Its purchasing power amounts to less than $800 by prewar standards. The government last month sharply increased the premium rates with the result that applications have fallen off. If prices are to remain at anything like their present level the maximum annuity should be raised at least to $1,600. Otherwise it will be impossible to make provision for a moderate living standard in old age.

Here I say the government has taken away the only opportunity of these people in the low-income brackets to assure themselves of some decent standard of living in their old age.

I am not going to detain the house longer, Mr. Speaker, but I do say the case for reduced taxation is overwhelming, and that at the next election the people will demand the results they wish.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Macdonnell, Muskoka-Ontario) which was negatived on the following division:

Motion (Mr. Abbott) agreed to on division.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: In regard to tomorrow, the first matter to be taken up will be the resolution in the name of the Minister of Agriculture concerning the reclamation and development of marshlands in the maritime provinces, being No. 11 on today's order paper. Then the house will go into committee of supply to consider the estimates of the departments of agriculture, transport, national health and welfare, and public works if there is time. I cannot indicate the order, except that the estimates of the Department of Agriculture will be the first to be taken up.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 11.58 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 28, 1948

The house met at three o'clock.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

FRASER VALLEY AND OTHER BRITISH COLUMBIA AREAS—OPPORTUNITY FOR DISCUSSION

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I had intended moving the adjournment of the house to discuss a matter which I consider to be of national importance, namely, the floods in the province of British Columbia, particularly the Fraser valley; but I understand that under the rules it is not customary to move such a motion if we are going into supply.

I do not wish to weary the house, but I must point out that this has become a very serious matter in British Columbia. It is no longer a Fraser valley matter, but a national matter, since the whole economy of the Pacific coast is involved. I should like to have the assurance of the government that I shall be given the privilege of speaking when estimates come up this afternoon in committee of supply.

I am particularly concerned about the situation in my own riding. I have already purchased my ticket for flight home if I can get an aeroplane, because I consider it my duty to be in my riding at this time. As I have said, this is a serious matter, because lives are at stake and the damage has already exceeded millions of dollars. Last night another dike went in Sumas prairie, and if the river rises thirty-two inches more the town of Chilliwack will be flooded and millions of dollars of damage will be done. I should like to have the assurance that an opportunity will be given me to discuss the matter; otherwise I shall consider it my duty to move the adjournment of the house.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will this afternoon be introducing a resolution on the diking of marshlands, under which I think the hon. gentleman could say anything he wished to say and be in order.

Mr. HACKETT: But that is restricted to the maritimes.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copy of an order in council, P.C. 2413, setting up a water board for the three prairie provinces; also copy of order in council P.C. 2412, setting a floor of fifty-eight cents per pound, basis Montreal, under butter.

DEBATES

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, May 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pouliot for concurrence in the first report of the standing committee on debates.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, resuming the debate on the motion for the adoption of the report of the committee on debates, I have just a few words to say. The whole idea is to improve the publication of the debates so that only corrections and not revisions are made in due course. Hon. members had an opportunity to read the report, which was printed both in Hansard and in Votes and Proceedings, and I hope that those who are not members of the committee have read it.

I must pay a special tribute to my colleagues the members of the committee who expedited the proceedings, and to the king's printer, the editor of debates, and Mr. Yves Fortin, who is also a very able man, for the information with which they supplied us. I have one word also to say about the clerk of the committee, Mr. Antonio Plouffe, who was most helpful to the committee and to the chairman in dealing with this matter.

I wish to suggest a slight amendment to the last paragraph of the report, which reads as follows:

> Your committee further recommends that the government consider the advisability of increasing the number of complimentary copies of the daily edition of debates to members from ten to sixteen.

It should read thus:

> Your committee further recommends that the House of Commons authorize the increasing of the number of complimentary copies of the daily editions of debates to members from ten to sixteen.

I hope that the house will agree to that. I want to give credit to everyone in this matter. Each member realizes that Hansard must be a true picture of our deliberations here, that nothing of what is said should be changed except when there is a slip. There is no use in painting the lily. Therefore Hansard should be accurate. That is one thing.

The second thing is this. Not long ago I spoke to the king's printer, and he told me that if this method be adopted, and if the suggestion which came from Mr. Young, the editor of debates, be accepted, it will be possible to have the bound Hansard two months after the date the speech is made. If the method had been adopted prior to this session, we would already have the bound Hansard of January, February and March. It will save money also. But I do not insist much on that point, although the saving would be considerable, because the question of the saving of money on printing comes under the jurisdiction of the joint parliamentary committee on printing. It is an altogether different matter. The purpose of the committee on debates is to see to it that the records of the house are accurate, clear and truthful.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to call the attention of the house, Mr. Speaker, for three or four minutes to this report, concurrence in which was moved in the house last Wednesday. The motion made by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) is one of the most important that we have had before us since the last war started. In the first place, may I point out to the house that the people back home in the constituencies know very little—in fact, almost nothing—about what goes on here. They rely on three agencies for their information. The first is printed Hansard. I am glad to see that a large number of public men and businessmen in the district from which I come read it. But at the present time when we are voting large sums of the people's money—nearly two billion dollars in the present estimates—the people have little knowledge of what goes on in the house.

In our city we used to have three morning newspapers and three evening newspapers. No one could criticize them. They have been doing a great work. Those who represent them in the press gallery are discharging a great public duty. During the war an information bureau, which I strongly opposed, was set up. I always contended that that was a reflection on the press, and a suggestion that they were not doing their duty in letting the public know what was going on. At that time the newspapers were under censorship. Today there is no censorship. We see the result of it in the debates in the house.

I do not care whether members are given one copy, five copies or ten copies. That is not the point I wish to make. My point is that the public are not getting the information they should be getting about public affairs, when we are voting, in the civil estimates, sums running into two billion dollars of their money. They are not getting the news they should be getting back home in the constituencies. The result is that the people have little or no knowledge of what is going on in public affairs. For instance, with regard to external affairs, days after these matters are discussed here some statement is given out, and the public know absolutely nothing about that particular department. We are dependent on the press and on the radio. The radio is like the tower of Babel, if you ask me. Some people turn it off a moment after they turn it on. Nevertheless they must pay for it. The public has very little advantage from it because the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has been turned into a department of propaganda.

It is necessary to see the cause and effect of this lack of information back home in the constituencies. You find it in the halls when you attend meetings. Questions are asked on matters which the predecessors of those who are voters today knew all about. I remember meetings when I was head of the city of Toronto. Some of these were attended by three or four thousand people; the subject under discussion was the taking over of the street railway. In provincial and dominion election campaigns these meetings have been superseded by the radio and all that kind of thing. No one can criticize the newspapers, because they always have the last word.

In conclusion I should like to say this. We must see the cause and effect if the public are not kept informed of what is going on. In Toronto, as I say, we used to have six newspapers. Now we only have one in the morning and two in the evening. The two in the evening are the only two I know of that have not increased their rates, and they have been doing splendid work. But they have instituted here what they call the columnist system, and when you read the various columns you find that some have the tendency to write about what is said by leaders and ignore the others. As for myself I do not care. I do not need that kind of publicity. I have never depended on it. I will say, however, that the people are entitled to more information than they are getting today. What the solution is, I do not know.

I am glad the hon. member who introduced this motion has called the attention of the house to this matter. He has been an able chairman. He has called attention to one of the weaknesses in our democratic system, and the agencies we have for making it work. In the last few years I have noticed in the newspapers pages and pages of sporting news and other matters in which a great many of the people may or may not be interested. We cannot criticize the press. They know their own business best. With the high cost of printing, and with the newsprint situation as it is, I do not know how the newspapers are carrying on at all. I wish to say a word of appreciation of their services to the public. I hope that appropriate measures will be introduced to give the public the information to which they are entitled.

I think the hon. gentleman deserves a great deal of credit for having brought this matter to the attention of the house.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): As a member of the committee, Mr. Speaker, may I in just a word support the motion for concurrence in the report and thank the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), the chairman of the committee, for the slight change he has suggested in the last paragraph. I think I can say on behalf of the committee that it brings the report more into line with what was the understanding of the members of the committee. I am sure that everything in this report is all to the good and deserves the support of the house.

I have just one other word to say. I should like to take this opportunity to express appreciation of the splendid work in connection with Hansard that is done by the reporters on the floor, the amanuenses upstairs, the editor, the associate editor, their staff, the king's printer, and the printers and other workers at the printing bureau. They all do a good job.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Rinfret moves that in the paragraph following paragraph 7 all the words after "that" be deleted and replaced by the words: "the House of Commons authorize the advisability of increasing the number of complimentary copies of the daily edition of debates to members from ten to sixteen."

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I think the amendment moved by the chairman of the committee was that the House of Commons authorize the increase, not the advisability. It was intended to authorize the increase in the number.

Mr. SPEAKER: The clause will read:

Your committee further recommends that the House of Commons authorize the increasing of the number of complimentary copies of the daily edition of debates to members from ten to sixteen.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. POULIOT: Just before the report is adopted I want to join with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in what he said concerning Hansard. Ours is the best Hansard published in the British empire, and probably in the whole world. That is due to the efficiency and congeniality of those who comprise that staff, and they deserve all credit.

Motion as amended agreed to.

SASKATCHEWAN RIVER

BRIDGE AT OR NEAR SASKATCHEWAN LANDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works a question in connection with the bridge at Saskatchewan Landing. Referring to sessional paper No. 201, tabled yesterday, will the minister tell the house if there has been further communication or correspondence since the telegram of May 5 from himself to the Saskatchewan minister of highways; and if so will he table such additional material?

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): I do not know of any other communication in this matter. The only thing I recall is that the governor in council has approved the site and proposed construction, and that a copy of the order in council has been sent to the Premier of Saskatchewan.

DIVISION OF WATERS AMONG THE PRAIRIE PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. C. MILLER (Portage la Prairie): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether order in council P.C. 2413, tabled by the minister today, means that the government of Canada and the governments of the three prairie provinces have agreed or are agreeing upon an over-all scheme to control floods on interprovincial rivers?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker. The meaning of the order in council is that the three provinces and the dominion are agreeing to the setting up of a board whose duty it will be to make recommendations as to the division of the waters, more particularly in the Saskatchewan river system, among the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I believe the setting up of the water board is a most commendable step, but does this mean that before a dam can be built on the Saskatchewan river it will be necessary to have the consent not only of the governor in council but also of the three prairie provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: It means that there is a legal division of the water in streams running from one province into another which has to be established by some authority. That will be established on the advice of this board. Once the amount of water to which Saskatchewan is entitled is established, of course the other question will be determined by whether we are taking more water than we should take.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: As I read section 5 it simply means that after the water board has determined allocations, before any steps can be taken there must be unanimity among the three western provinces.

Mr. GARDINER: To all intents and purposes that is what it will mean. If one of the provinces or if the three provinces desire to have money spent by the federal government, they will have to agree on some division of the water.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Unanimously.

Mr. GARDINER: We are not taking on any lawsuits with regard to the amount of water we may take from one province as compared with another. That question will have to be decided and agreed upon, and I presume an order in council will have to be passed by each province.

IMMIGRATION

AMOUNT OF CASH ALLOWED TO PERSONS ENTERING CANADA FROM BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Will the acting minister of immigration make a statement today or early next week with respect to aid granted to immigrants to Canada by allowing those coming from Britain to secure more cash, and what action if any is being or has been taken in the matter?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources): I shall be glad to do so.

LIVESTOCK

APPLICATION OF BASIC HERD PRINCIPLE TO OTHER DOMESTIC ANIMALS THAN CATTLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue whether the government is considering the advisability of extending the basic herd principle, now applicable to cattle, under directive No. 78 of September, 1947, to include sheep, swine and other domestic animals? If this change is to be made, can the minister say when it will come into effect?

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): The matter of extending the basic herd principle is being given consideration by the government, and it will probably extend to swine, sheep, purebred horses and so on, but not to poultry. It will be applicable in the year 1948.

EMPIRE TRADE

SUGGESTION AS TO ADVISABILITY OF CALLING CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. TIMMINS (Parkdale): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Having regard to the fact that Canada is suffering a disastrous decrease in her trade with the sterling area countries, will the minister give consideration to taking the necessary steps to call an empire trade conference at an early date?

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): I should like to treat this question as a notice and have an answer given later.

CONTINUATION OF CEILING PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. DROPE (Northumberland, Ont.): In view of the fact that under an order in council tabled by the Minister of Agriculture a floor price is established for butter, will the minister tell us whether it is the intention of the government to continue the ceiling price as well?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is that the ceiling price is being continued.

Mr. MILLER: I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Agriculture in that connection.

Mr. GARDINER: It will be quite in order to discuss that whole matter in connection with my estimates, which will be up shortly.

DREDGING

KINCARDINE HARBOUR DREDGING CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. ROBINSON (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works. Is his department doing anything toward having the 1947 contract for dredging at Kincardine harbour completed as soon as possible?

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I understand the contract was not completed last year, and we will proceed with it.

MARSHLANDS

RECLAMATION AND DEVELOPMENT—ASSISTANCE TO MARITIME PROVINCES

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to assist the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island in the reclamation and development of marshlands in the said provinces by the construction and reconstruction of works necessary therefor and the purchase of required machinery and equipment. Works may be undertaken only on the recommendation of an advisory committee to be established under the act and upon terms and conditions agreed upon with the province concerned prior to the first day of May, nineteen hundred and fifty-five. The Minister of Agriculture is empowered to appoint necessary temporary officers and employees to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund with provision also for the payment of expenses of members of the advisory committees.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take any more of the time of the committee than is absolutely necessary, but I believe I should speak briefly concerning the flood situation, particularly as it concerns my riding and, I suggest, as it concerns the whole of Canada.

Flooding in British Columbia is more now than a matter of local concern. I might explain briefly that in the Fraser valley area surrounding the cities of New Westminster and Vancouver there are some seven diking districts. The last flood we had was in 1894, and the last break in dikes was about 1920 or 1921. I mention the date of the last break in order to bring to the attention of the committee, through you, Mr. Chairman, the importance to the whole of Canada of preventing these breaks.

At the time of the last break in 1920 or 1921 the great Canadian National Railways were put out of action for forty-eight hours. We were able to stem the hole in the dike at that time, but despite that fact the Canadian National Railway lines to the Pacific coast were out of action for that length of time.

I would emphasize, sir, the gravity of the situation as it is today. I am particularly concerned, of course, with my own riding of Fraser Valley, but I must point out that the present situation concerns the whole economy of Canada. What would happen if any unfortunate international incident should take place —I will not go into details—involving the cutting off of the Pacific coast for some months through the inability of the two great trans-Canada railway systems to get through? What would happen to the economy of Ontario and Quebec if the trans-Canada railways were cut off for two or more months?

As I have said, we were able to stem the hole in the dike on this earlier occasion; yet one of the railway systems was unable to get through for hours. Two dikes remain at the present time; if they go, then both the trans-Canada railway systems will be unable to get through for two to six months. Hon. members must realize how important this is not only to the Fraser Valley constituency alone but to the whole country.

Only last night and this morning naval boats were sent in to evacuate hundreds of families in the Fraser valley area. No estimate has yet been made as to how much stock is lost, but we have an idea how much money has been lost, and it can be counted in millions of dollars.

Many hon. members have had the pleasure of visiting British Columbia, and are no doubt familiar with the fertile Chilliwack area. Today at twelve o'clock if the river rose another thirty-two inches the town of Chilliwack and the whole of the surrounding district would be under water. This would mean a loss of millions upon millions of dollars. While I do not think this matter should be considered from the point of view of dollars and cents, let us not forget that the dominion government has millions of dollars invested in the Canadian National Railways in that area. Both the railways would go out of action.

I am told that the brother-in-law of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) lost his farm the day before yesterday. In the particular district in which I live the dike is holding. My own farm buildings are above the high-water mark, and cattle have been brought there from the surrounding district. They are on my high land today, because they cannot be left on the lower ground. Farmers have moved their stock out of the buildings to places behind the second remaining dike.

I wish to impress upon the house the seriousness of this matter. On Friday last school children six or eight years of age and upwards worked in filling sandbags in an endeavour to hold the water back.

A few weeks ago hon. members of the opposition held a convention in Ottawa, upon which occasion a friend of mine, the former provincial president, came here from Agassiz. His drug store is now flooded. I know the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) has just returned, and he tells me that the water is adjacent to the railway. As I say, I do not know how much money has been lost, or how many cattle have been lost. I do not think, however, that that is the important point. When even one life is at stake in Canada, this house must give the matter serious consideration.

The reason for the flood this year is exactly the same as it was in 1894. We had heavy snowfalls this year in the mountains, and a very late spring. Ordinarily we have a gradual run-off, the high water averaging about 17 feet. Measured this morning it was up 22 feet, due to the cold and late spring in British Columbia, and the fact that the run-off came very suddenly.

I wish to point out, through you, Mr. Chairman, that in my opinion—and I am expressing the opinion of the people of my riding—there would have been no damage if the great Fraser river channel had been kept clear. Opposite Matsqui islands, where the large river boats used to come up, and where the river was about three quarters of a mile wide, any time now at low water you can throw a stone across. The sandbar has filled it up. The water cannot get away. Even if we have a normal run-off, the sandbars are there. The only protection we have is one dredge forty years old. This one dredge cannot even keep the mouth of the river open. That is why I think the federal government comes into the matter.

We cannot afford locally to finance the damage that has been done. We cannot afford to finance the protection that is needed if in the next forty-eight hours, or maybe within the next week, the ports of Vancouver and New Westminster have to be protected by keeping the two railways running.

One of the ministers is now out in British Columbia. We are now asking the dominion government to assume its responsibility because it is not a matter which concerns only the Fraser valley or British Columbia. It is a national matter, and the economy of Canada is affected.

I wish to say we have every confidence in the engineer who is in charge in British Columbia, but we are suggesting it is not a local matter, and that the government should send out there immediately either a deputy minister or the chief engineer. I would also suggest that the Minister of Agriculture should send out a responsible representative of his department to check on conditions as they affect agriculture, in order that they may, in co-operation with the minister now on the spot, give to the matter the serious consideration which must be given at once to protect the economy of the Fraser valley and of the whole dominion.

I am about to fly out there, because I believe it is my duty under these conditions to be in my own constituency. If I can be of any assistance, that is where I should be. I believe that is where any member should be when it is a matter of assisting his constituency. I hope that some farm member in the opposition will see that I am protected while I am away. I have enough confidence in hon. members to feel sure that that will be done.

I want to impress upon the government, upon the Minister of Public Works in particular, upon the Minister of Agriculture and upon the Minister of Finance, who is not here, that this is not now a Fraser valley matter; it is a national matter which must be attended to, and at once.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Fraser Valley has suggested that I immediately send the deputy minister of public works out to British Columbia in order that he may see the flood conditions prevailing there. I want to tell him that the deputy minister has been out there now for two days. Along with the resident engineer, Mr. Morton, he has been looking over the conditions in that area.

I am not prepared to discuss flood conditions throughout the country. Every day or so during the last two months an hon. member from Ontario, Quebec or some other province has stood up to question the Minister of Public Works about flood conditions in his province. The legal authorities of the government inform me that the only jurisdiction the federal government has over waters in the different provinces is that which concerns navigation. We are supposed to look after navigable waters so that navigation will not be impeded by obstacles or works which might be constructed on the river or stream.

I am informed further that these flood conditions would not come under the jurisdiction of the federal government. I must admit that in the past we have entered into agreements to relieve conditions in certain parts of the country, especially in Ontario during the depression years and periods of unemployment. It has not been the practice, however, to undertake works to protect municipalities from floods, and I am told that that is not our responsibility.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley puts it on a wider plane; he says that this is a national situation, a national emergency. I suppose that that could be argued, and I am not going to start an argument with him today. Nobody sympathizes more with these people than my department, because we are in daily contact with those who live along these rivers and streams. Wherever we have works or dikes that are causing any damage we attend to the repairs and maintenance of those works, but we would not like to intervene because the provinces are jealous of their autonomy and resent encroachment upon their jurisdiction.

We are hesitant to do anything which is not within our jurisdiction in a province. I am not saying that it has not been done, but I know that in certain provinces whenever we try to do anything that is within provincial jurisdiction they are always ready to say: Why don't you attend to your own affairs? I want to tell you that in public works we are trying to do just that.

We are receiving requests from all over the country, especially during springtime, to relieve these conditions. I do not know that we have done very much so far. Personally I would be elated if this matter came under federal jurisdiction, because in my own district right across the river there is a town of 2,400 people which is flooded out nearly every spring to such an extent that fifty per cent of them must move out. Before I became a minister of the crown I made representations to the government and asked for relief, but the answer I received was just about the answer I am giving today.

Mr. FULTON: I fancy you were dissatisfied?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I will not say that I was satisfied. Then I tried to get help from the proper authorities, but I do not know that I was so successful there either. I knew that the municipality could not cope with the situation. It had no means to do so, and it certainly had no control over the flow of the river, especially in the spring.

I do not want to get into an argument, but I recall that in the green book containing proposals of the federal government to the provinces there was reference to public investment, and I believe there were a few paragraphs concerning works of this nature in connection with which the federal government declared itself prepared to co-operate in order to relieve serious conditions in the provinces. I am not reflecting upon what took place at the conference or what was discussed there, but those proposals have never been withdrawn. They are still in the green book which was presented to the premiers of the provinces.

My officials in every part of the country have been instructed to do their utmost, with the staff and the means we have, to help local populations. I am more than pleased to be able to say that my deputy is out there now. Perhaps he foresaw what was going to take place in British Columbia, because he flew out there on Monday or Tuesday. I think he will be back next Tuesday, and if any further questions are put concerning the situation I will be ready to give all the information I can.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take three or four minutes of the time of the committee to discuss this particular resolution. In the first place, I should like to see a national policy adopted which would apply not only to the maritimes but throughout the whole country. A number of hon. members visited the city of Toronto some time ago and they saw the marshlands in the Ashbridge's Bay area. The city built two large dredges at considerable cost which pumped about two and a half million cubic yards of sand and water a day which was used to reclaim this area.

I support the principle of the resolution. The hon. member for Davenport has taken a great deal of interest in this matter. The other day he showed some pictures in the railway committee room which indicated what could be done in this country in the way of reclaiming marshland throughout the country. I believe in certain cases the provinces should contribute towards works of this kind.

Since confederation the only works carried on by the federal government have been those concerning navigation. The public works department erect breakwaters, harbour works and all that sort of thing on navigable waters or streams. Many of the reclamation works carried out in the three prairie provinces have been good so far, but I do not agree in the policy involved. Somebody must be responsible for the construction of these works. We should have a national plan but it seems difficult to get a plan at the present time for these reclamation works. I do not think an advisory committee should be appointed. The works are to be undertaken by an advisory committee upon terms and conditions agreed upon with the province prior to May 1, 1955, and the Minister of Agriculture is to be empowered to appoint the necessary officers and employees to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund. There should be a national policy of flood control undertaken in conjunction with the provinces. Some of the dredging plants of the federal government could be used in connection with this work.

Floods are causing widespread damage in every province. We should have a national policy of bonuses, subsidies and subventions on reclamation and flood control. It would not only improve conditions all over Canada and develop our national resources but provide employment. I commend the principle of this resolution. We shall await the bill for details.

Mr. FULTON: I endorse everything that has been said by the hon. member for Fraser Valley. I saw the Fraser river on Tuesday of this week. It was then four to six feet below the level of the C.P.R. main line, just around Agassiz, a little bit east of where the hon. member comes from. I was told that the previous day it had been below the level of the telegraph poles alongside the railway, and when I was there it was about a foot and a half up the telegraph poles; so you can see the rate at which the river has been rising.

Although my own constituency is not at the moment suffering from major floods, it has rivers which have washed out bridges on highways and railways, but no comparable area to that which has been inundated in the Fraser valley. Although that is true, I support entirely what the hon. member for Fraser Valley said. I agree that it is now a national emergency which must have the consideration and co-operation of the federal government and of all federal departments, although the greatest emergency exists in the hon. member's area and in the area from which the hon. member for Kootenay West comes. I understand he is now out there to see what he can do to help. It is a situation which threatens the whole of the province.

[Mr. Church.]

I am intimately acquainted with the rivers of the Fraser river system, the lower end of which flows through the hon. member's riding, but the tributaries of which, many of them, rise in and flow through my own riding. I think we are required to consider two aspects of the matter: first, what we can do to deal with the present condition, which has caused deaths and damage and threatens further damages and possibly further deaths of men and women and of course of all kinds of livestock; second, we must consider how we can prevent such occurrences in the future.

I do not agree with the Minister of Public Works when he says that at the moment there is no way in which the federal government is directly interested in the matter. The Department of Fisheries certainly does not take that view. They go around blowing up dams on our rivers when those who know the situation tell them that if they do so, thereby allowing rapid spring run-offs, they may aggravate the danger of floods. They say they have the power, and they blew out a dam at the end of Adams lake, despite strenuous objections from local people who knew the situation. I am not going to say that that alone actually caused the floods this year, but those who understand these problems tell me that it contributed to them, and that what should be done is to control the run-off where it is most easily controllable—that is, at the source of the trouble, the outlets of our lakes where they become rivers and where you could put a dam which, by raising the level of the water, in the lakes only, from four to six feet, would store a tremendous body of water and also catch the run-off from the mountains. It is at these places that you can control the run-off and prevent such floods as we are now having. That is the proper way to tackle this problem. That is one way which has been urged for some years now.

The federal government has been urged to co-operate with the provincial authorities in making surveys and putting in such installations. In the United States they put in projects covering waterpower, water for irrigation, power for industry and also for irrigation, and projects which will control floods and prevent soil erosion and damage to farms from sudden spring floods. It is that approach we must make to the problem in Canada, and which we have urged on the government for at least two years that I know of in connection with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Mr. GARDINER: We have been doing that for ten years.

Mr. FULTON: Not in British Columbia, and not to any great extent throughout the rest of Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: To a very considerable extent.

Mr. FULTON: In the past two years I have asked the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Public Works and the Department of Fisheries, in co-operation with the provincial authorities, to make a survey of the whole Fraser river system to find where projects can best be installed so that we can control the run-off and prevent floods and build up a power system that will also provide irrigation and power for industry. I have been in communication with all these departments, and I had an answer from the Minister of Public Works earlier this year, replying to a letter of mine asking what progress was being made in respect to such a survey. I take it that the minister will have no objection if I read his answer.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): If I wrote it to you, you can make it public all right.

Mr. FULTON: I take it that the minister is a little more cautious than other members of the government, who occasionally find the things they have said embarrassing. The minister in his letter said:

> This matter is at present receiving the active attention of the department, and I propose taking it up with my colleagues in council with a view to obtaining the necessary authority for the formation of a board to carry out the required surveys and to submit a complete report on its recommendations, with an estimate of cost of its proposals.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): If I might intervene, this is an old question, as the hon. member knows. We have had engineers making surveys in the Fraser river valley to try to avoid the conditions described by the hon. member for Fraser Valley, right down to where the river flows into the ocean. Listening to the hon. member for Kamloops, it occurred to me that he seems to know a lot about rivers and streams and dams, and the measures to take to avoid floods. But the reports we have to date are not conclusive. They are to the effect that it is very difficult to deal with conditions in the Fraser river valley. When I wrote that letter we had in mind the constitution of a board consisting of engineers appointed by this government, by the province and by interested municipalities, to make a study and survey and report to the different governments. I can tell the hon. member—without giving the exact date, which I cannot recall—that the government did authorize me to get in touch with the province and municipalities and help to constitute this board. I believe that one of the outstanding engineers of my department will be a member of the board, which, if I remember rightly, will also have representatives from the departments of fisheries and agriculture. I have not the details, because I was not expecting this debate to come up today, but I know that British Columbia and the municipalities have agreed to appoint representatives. I am not sure whether the surveys have yet been started. The object of this would be to try to devise means to relieve the actual conditions incident to floods in the spring, and also to do what work is necessary at the mouth of the Fraser river, to be carried out by my department each year, in the effort to remove the sandbanks that impede or form an obstacle to navigation. But we take part in these studies only because navigation comes under federal jurisdiction, and we do not shirk our responsibility. As I listen to hon. members in the house speaking of flood conditions, they seem to think that this is a federal problem, and I am simply trying to explain to them the status of the matter. They are not addressing themselves to the right person. I have never said a word against the other bodies which are responsible for the works in connection with these conditions, and I am trying to co-operate. I would ask these hon. members, when the session is over, to get in touch with their friends in their provinces and make to the governments there the same representations that they make to our government, which is the last one to have responsibility in the whole matter.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Chairman, may I interject—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I must call the attention of the committee to the fact that what we have before us is a resolution to assist the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island in certain respects. The hon. member for Fraser Valley, rightly I believe, brought to the attention of the house an emergency situation which exists at the present time, and I believe he had in mind the question whether anything could be done to help the people concerned in this emergency. However, I would ask hon. members who are discussing that situation in British Columbia to confine their remarks to the emergency, and as soon as they have finished with that we shall go on with the resolution which is before us. I think hon. members should try to confine their remarks to the situation as described by the hon. member for Fraser Valley.

Mr. GARDINER: On the point raised by the chairman, perhaps it would help if I were to say this. I was going to suggest that we confine ourselves to the matter which was brought up by the hon. member for Fraser Valley, the reason being that—at least this is my hope—as soon as this motion passes the resolution stage and we get the bill into the house, we can go on to deal with the estimates; because some of the matters that are being discussed now could properly be taken up under P.F.R.A. or under special votes provided for British Columbia and other parts of Canada. Most of what has been said by the hon. member for Kamloops should really come under those items. It would be better to discuss them then than to take up so much time now, and then have a discussion again on the items I have indicated. Both the matters having to do with the prairies and with the valleys generally in British Columbia can be considered better under the other items.

I may say that the director of P.F.R.A. is already in British Columbia. He has been there since Tuesday of this week. The director of marketing went up yesterday and will be taking note of all that is happening in that section of the province, and he will then report back to us.

Mr. FULTON: I appreciate the point that you have made, Mr. Chairman, and also the remarks of the minister, and I will conclude briefly along the lines you have suggested.

I would point out that to some extent this emergency is aggravated by the conduct of the Department of Fisheries in blowing up a dam without regard to the representations made by farmers and others familiar with the conditions in the district. I would point out further, while I am not going to go into any further details regarding the general approach to the question, that this matter is so serious that we must immediately take steps to prevent a recurrence of these conditions. In my opinion the Minister of Public Works is and should be interested in these measures, because the rivers to which I refer are navigable, and I have a direct interest in the flood conditions in that province because there will be floods in my own constituency this year. They are starting now. Though they are not yet as serious as they are in the Fraser valley, nevertheless they are developing and we fear they may become very serious. I hope therefore that the three ministers, of agriculture, fisheries and public works, will, in conjunction with our own departments in the province, send their officials to our area; and while taking steps to relieve the present emergency they should, I suggest, bear in mind details in connection with a long-range program such as I have spoken of. I have urged such a program for the past two years and I think it should be implemented. Incidentally, I know that the ministers in British Columbia are in general in accord with a project along the lines that I have suggested.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I think hon. members will bear me out when I say that I was not offering criticism generally. I am talking about the present national emergency, though I may say that I shall have a good deal to say about the minister's department and other departments as well. There are things he should do that he has not done. However, I was speaking of the emergency. What I am trying to do is to impress upon the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of National Defence the importance of this question, and the urgency of the situation. The Minister of National Defence has a very large camp in that particular area. There is also situated there the second best airport in the dominion, and I was trying to impress upon the ministers that this is a national emergency which must be considered by the government as such. I entirely disagree with the Minister of Public Works in his interpretation of the facts relating to this condition. I repeat, it is a national emergency and as such it must be considered at once by the government. So far as the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture are concerned, they do not amount to two bits compared to this question.

I know that the Minister of Agriculture wants to get away to some other area—I do not know for what purpose—but at the same time I must urge upon him the importance of dealing with this situation. I am not depreciating the marshlands of the maritimes, but that is something that can wait until tomorrow. There is no need to rush it through while the whole Pacific coast is in danger. I deprecate the idea of rushing estimates through when not only the economy of the dominion but lives are at stake.

Mr. CLAXTON: I think it might be interesting to hon. members to hear something of the steps that are being taken in this connection by the Department of National Defence, which has been in close touch with the situation. I did not anticipate the discussion that has arisen this afternoon and therefore I have not a full report, but since the discussion began I made some inquiries and I can speak briefly on what we are doing.

Rear Admiral Mainguy, commanding the Royal Canadian Navy on the Pacific coast, sent a signal to H.M.C.S. Discovery at Vancouver: "Render any assistance", and also to all ships on the Pacific coast: "All power boats are to be brought on short notice to assist in flood emergency on Fraser river; above boats to be fuelled, watered and provisioned". A navy tug was dispatched to New Westminster. All these boats are furnished with emergency and life-saving equipment. Yesterday the signal service took over the ordinary Canadian National railway service of telegraphs through some of the flood areas, which was interrupted because the poles were down. The air force is dispatching one or more Dakotas from No. 12 group of the northwest air command, carrying sandbags to Cranbrook for use at Kimberley. At Chilliwack we have the engineers' school and training establishment, which is working full-time assisting in flood control. Also at one or two localities reserve units have been put on active service at the request of the local authorities, and instructions have been given to all three services to do everything that can be done, and that is necessary, in co-operation with the provincial and local authorities.

I should add that the Canadian armed forces, as I think hon. members know, are not equipped in the same way as are the United States forces, because in the United States the army engineers do a large part of all public work. That has never been the practice in Canada. Perhaps we should do more of this work in order to gain training experience; but whenever it has been possible to put at the disposal of local authorities such facilities as the armed forces have, we have done that as a work of national service, and also because it is of direct value in connection with training. But here in this case we have a direct and immediate interest because our own establishments are endangered by reason of the flooding. Other steps are being taken. I have given instructions that everything possible be done.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I wish to support all that has been said by the hon. member for Fraser Valley and the hon. member for Kamloops. I am also interested in what the Minister of National Defence has just said. It bears out the assertion that what has been happening in British Columbia is a calamity of the first magnitude which should take precedence over the rest of the business of this house.

I listened with great interest to what the Minister of Public Works had to say a little while ago, when he was emphasizing the division of responsibility between the federal department and the provincial department. I should like to say to him that there are times when these disasters are of such magnitude that they sweep away all jurisdictional prejudices that may arise.

I was in telephonic communication this morning with the mayor of my home town of Fernie, which has been isolated by road and rail for all of this past week. Highway bridges have gone out, which of course the provincial government will be prepared to take care of; also a C.P.R. bridge has gone out, which the C.P.R. will be prepared to take care of. But what I am greatly concerned about is what is happening in the town of Kimberley in the riding of Kootenay East. A small creek, called Mark creek, runs through the centre of the town. There has been a flash flood; and the creek has gone completely on the rampage. Many homes have been washed away and destroyed, and several hundred people have been rendered homeless.

I want to say here a word of thanks to the Red Cross for the splendid way in which they moved in at once to render all the help they possibly could, and also to the Minister of National Defence for the way in which the militia department stepped in, shipping in thousands of sandbags and men ready to assist in any possible way. But what I am mainly concerned about is this. Who is going to help the people who have lost their all? They are not worrying about whether it is a federal responsibility or a provincial responsibility. Through no fault of their own and certainly I am not attributing any blame or negligence to the provincial department or the federal department; you might call it an act of God—everything they possess has been swept away. I for one cannot see how we in the nation's parliament can just sit here and say: Oh, it is too bad, but it has nothing to do with us. May I refer for just a moment to the fact that we have been discussing in these last few days a national budget, in which the minister has shown that he has a surplus of about $670 million. Surely it will do no harm to take a few million dollars of that money and use it wisely in the various parts of British Columbia which are suffering so terribly, in order to help to relieve cases of necessity that are most pressing. Of course it would be a matter for consideration on the part of the federal department as well as of the provincial department to see that help is rendered to the most needy cases. I do not think that we here in Ottawa can realize the magnitude of what is happening in British Columbia. I have known, as has the Minister of Public Works, for many years the difficulty that is experienced in Gatineau Point from year to year. But they know what happens there almost every year, and they can be prepared for it. Out in British Columbia, however, this is something unusual. It is the greatest flood damage in fifty years, caused by excessively heavy snowfall in the mountains—a sudden spell of hot weather which brings down all that water—and people suffer. Surely the needs of these people can be aired, and they are entitled to the assurance that aid will be given.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): First of all I want to concur in all that has been said by various members from British Columbia, because I can assure hon. members that in parts of the prairie provinces we have gone through the very same thing this past spring. Not only has there been danger of loss of life; a dozen lives have actually been lost through flooding in the prairie provinces. Many hundreds of people have lost their homes. This has been going on for nearly two months; and now in northern Manitoba, in The Pas area, the same thing is happening as happened in British Columbia; many hundreds of people there have lost their all, their life savings. They have no place in which to live. It is a serious business.

As the previous speaker, the hon. member for Kootenay East, has just said, this has been an abnormal season. In our part of the country we did not have ordinary winter thaws. We had heavy snowfalls, then extremely heavy rains taking the snow away, and the run-offs could not handle the water.

Apart from the serious business of the loss of life that has occurred and the many more lives that are in danger, many who make their livelihood on farms will lose their entire year's operations this year. They will have no income whatever. While we think we have been fortunate in having had the P.F.R.A. and P.F.A.A. in the prairie provinces, the regulations under those two measures will not take care of many of the people who have lost everything owing to flooding.

I want to pay a compliment to the minister of National Defence. The troops under him helped a great deal, as was so well described by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie a while ago, in connection with flooding from the Assiniboine river. The troops worked night and day, and we cannot thank them too much. They have rendered splendid service wherever they have happened to be stationed in western Canada. This flooding business is certainly a national disaster, affecting as it does thousands of people west of the great lakes, right through to the western coast. It is a serious source of trouble.

I know, as the minister has said, that under our governmental set-up these matters are first the duty of the municipality; in turn, when the municipality cannot settle them, they must go to the province; and the province in turn goes to the federal government. But this is truly a national emergency. The people in some parts of Manitoba have probably been more accustomed to this sort of thing, on the Red river and on the Assiniboine, and out on the Souris where I have been, and you have not seen anything about it in the press. Many farmers in my constituency will not seed an acre this year and have not an acre of pasture for their cattle. They are losing their only opportunity to make any revenue for the entire year; therefore we are facing disaster which will require federal assistance. That of course we can discuss at the appropriate time.

To deal for a moment with the resolution which is before the committee, I should like to raise a question before the minister replies. The resolution reads:

> That it is expedient to present a bill to assist the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island in the reclamation and development of marshlands in the said provinces by the construction and reconstruction of works necessary therefor and the purchase of required machinery and equipment. Works may be undertaken only on the recommendation of an advisory committee to be established under the act and upon terms and conditions agreed upon with the province concerned prior to the first day of May, nineteen hundred and fifty-five. The Minister of Agriculture is empowered to appoint necessary temporary officers and employees to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund with provision also for the payment of expenses of members of the advisory committees.

To me that seems exactly the same as the duties and objects set out in the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, with which I have had some experience. For the past two years I have had on the order paper the following resolution:

> That in the opinion of this house the government should take into consideration the advisability of expanding the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act into a national soil conservation and farm rehabilitation act and extending its activities to all the settled farm areas of Canada.

The point I want to make is that we have this administration already set up. As I read the resolution the bill will call for exactly the same kind of work and the same kind of advisory committees. It is true that some added personnel would be required, including persons who are conversant with that particular area; but I should like to know why it is necessary to bring in a new bill instead of amending the existing act to take advantage of the administration already organized. It seems to me that would be far more efficient.

For some sessions now various members from the maritimes, including the hon. member for Cumberland, the hon. member for Colchester-Hants, the hon. member for Saint John-Albert and others, have been pressing the government to do something about the reclamation of these marshlands, and I am sure those hon. members will have much to say on this measure. When the minister speaks, however, I should like him to tell us why it would not be more efficient to deal with this matter by amending the act already on our statute book and making use of the experienced and efficient men who are in charge of that organization, instead of setting up a new administration which will require a complete new staff, new equipment, and so on.

Mr. ISNOR: I should like to speak briefly on the resolution, but before doing so, as a member from Nova Scotia, our extreme eastern province, I am sure I am expressing the thought of every maritime member when I extend our sympathy to the people of British Columbia who find themselves in such difficulties today because of floods. We in Halifax have gone through two explosions. We know what an emergency is, and the hardships that follow; therefore we can appreciate the plight of the people of British Columbia in the circumstances in which they now find themselves.

My first words in respect to the resolution, which deals with assistance to the maritime provinces in the reclamation and development of the marshlands, must be to express, on behalf of all maritime members, our appreciation and thanks to the minister. I think perhaps the Minister of Agriculture deserves more credit in this matter than any other single member of the cabinet. He has been very sympathetic to our representations over a period of years. I recall that in 1937 or 1938 I was a member of a committee which waited on the minister in this connection. As I recall it, the hon. member for Westmorland was chairman of the committee, which included Mr. Purdy, former member for Colchester-Hants, and certain senators.

Since that time various committees have been set up, and the suggestion has been given strong support by all members of this house. The hon. member for Cumberland has been very active. The hon. member for Saint John-Albert and other hon. gentlemen on the opposition side, as well as hon. members from all parts of the maritimes sitting on the government side, have given their strong support. On all occasions we have been courteously received by the minister. Later more definite representations were made by the premiers of the three maritime provinces, who recently placed certain proposals before the minister. I am hopeful that as the outcome of those representations a bill will be introduced, founded upon this resolution, which will provide the necessary assistance to bring about the results for which we have been working for these many years.

While I am on my feet I wish to add the name of another friend of the maritimes. I refer to the splendid representations which have been made, not once but on many occasions, by the hon. member for Davenport. The other evening we listened to the hon. gentleman deal with the development of the maritimes in regard to the production of coal. That was just one more example of his friendly feeling toward the maritime provinces, and I know he will join with those of us who come from that area in supporting this measure and giving credit where credit belongs, in this case to the Minister of Agriculture.

For the benefit of western members, more particularly those coming from the prairies, let me say that while our Nova Scotia farm production is small in comparison to theirs, it has shown a steady increase. In 1938 our farm production amounted to about $17,700,000. By 1945 it had increased to over $26,000,000, and by 1946, the last year for which I have figures, to about $42,000,000. If this development takes place in connection with our marshlands, particularly in Nova Scotia, we believe that production will be greatly increased. In my province of Nova Scotia we have 33,000 farms, representing a population of 150,000 people; so you see we are very much interested in the industry of agriculture. That also applies to dairying. Our production still is not what we would like, but we do produce seven million pounds of creamery butter per year. It is because we need these marshlands for the further development of the production of butter, dairy products and feed for our cattle that we have been asking for so many years that some action be taken.

The dikelands of the maritimes bear a relation to agriculture there similar to the relation the prairie lands bear to agriculture in western Canada. While the acreage of the prairies is vastly greater, the dikelands of the maritimes are equally essential to the basic industry of agriculture.

I said I was going to speak briefly. I believe the majority of hon. members are familiar with our dikeland conditions. They have been written about in fiction and history, and have been referred to time and again on the floor of this house. We need reconstruction in a big way in the maritimes. We have, roughly speaking, 80,000 acres which will come under this reclamation scheme, if carried out as requested. It is because of that, and the conditions in which we find ourselves, that we are particularly interested in the bill which will be introduced.

Surveys have been made. I have correspondence covering a long period of years, and while I am not familiar with the details of the bill which the minister will introduce, or with the various points which will be set out in the sections, I know there were three definite proposals placed before the minister in respect of the manner in which this could be carried out. One involves a fairly modest amount, and a second one would run into several millions of dollars.

We are hoping that this will be a permanent undertaking, one which will have a lasting effect upon the development of agriculture in the maritime provinces; not just an emergency measure to tide us over or to satisfy us for the time being.

Mr. GARDINER: This covers the whole thing.

Mr. ISNOR: Thank you; I am pleased to be advised by the Minister of Agriculture that this scheme is broad enough to cover the full program as placed before him by the three premiers in their recent conference on this subject. I take it from the minister's statement that it will be only a matter of years until our total marshlands will once again be properly protected so as to give us an opportunity to cultivate on those lands produce which will be helpful to our province.

I have endeavoured to speak as briefly as possible, so as to permit other maritime members, if they so desire, to join with me in extending thanks to the minister. Once again I thank the government and particularly the Minister of Agriculture for having brought this legislation before the house.

Mr. GARDINER: Perhaps if I were to give some details so that hon. members would have some information as to the nature of the legislation, it would help them in anything they might desire to say. I was hopeful that most of the discussion would take place on second reading of the bill. The bill is in print and ready for distribution as soon as this resolution passes. With the bill before us, we would be in a better position to discuss points such as those mentioned by the senior hon. member for Halifax.

[Mr. Isnor.]

At present, however, I should like to reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Souris. As he said a few moments ago, for a period of years he and other hon. members have been advocating that we should have legislation similar to that known as the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, which would be applicable to all Canada.

In so far as it has been given consideration by the government, it was thought that if such action were taken there should be two bills, one covering the problems we have from Manitoba west and the other covering problems from Ontario east. Those problems are different, due largely to the nature of the country and to the difference in climate in the different areas. It was thought, therefore, that there should be two bills.

May I say that, among others, I have become a little bit tired, if I may use that word, of waiting for these larger bills. The suggestion made a few moments ago by the senior hon. member for Halifax is correct in every particular. Since coming to Ottawa and going to the maritimes to see for the first time the marshlands there, and the experimental work which was started there the year before I took over the department, and which has been continued since that time, I have been convinced that one of the most important works to be done in Canada was the rehabilitation of the marshlands.

I recall that from my earliest days in school in Canada I was taught that one of the highest tides in the world was that in the bay of Fundy. I did not realize what that meant until I had an opportunity to go there and to see it. The situation is one which has been dealt with over a long period of time and by different authorities. Although I have not measured it, I was told, while I was very young, that the water rises to a height of forty-two feet.

Mr. ISNOR: To sixty feet.

Mr. GARDINER: It was stated conservatively in our geographies at forty-two feet, although I would suppose that at some point or another the figure of sixty feet would be correct. In any event, forty-two feet is a very high tide; and a rise of sixty feet, as has been suggested by the senior hon. member for Halifax, is a considerable rise indeed. Hon. members will realize what this means, and that it is different from the matter about which we had been talking this afternoon. This is not something that happens once in every fifty years or in every ten years; it happens twice a day. The water rises under the tide twice a day, and this goes on year in and year out.

A long time ago, in the first instance when the area was ruled over by the French, the French government thought this important enough to conserve these lands from the sea, the lands on the flats which are flooded every time the tide comes up. The French put their armed forces and others to work at building dikes alongside these marshlands to prevent the rising of the water from flooding twice a day these very lands.

A hundred years ago the British had gained control of that area. It will be kept in mind that in both instances it was not the federal government which acted; rather it was imperial governments a long distance away from the work, governments across the ocean. But they took sufficient interest in the matter to see that these dikes were built. First it was the French and later the British.

The dikes were built. We like to pride ourselves upon our engineering skill today; but the engineers of that time built those dikes so soundly that they gave very little trouble over a long period of years. The aboiteaux built to control the going-out and coming-in of the water, with the assistance of some maintenance on the part of either local bodies or the provinces, since the confederation of the provinces, have remained intact, and have given good service. For some reason which I shall not discuss at the moment, agriculture was not paying as well in the maritime provinces in more recent years as it had been in the earlier period, and there was not the same care taken of these high producing pasture lands, nor was the same care taken of the dikes themselves. The result was that some of these dikes became damaged and the seawater began again to come in over these flats which are capable of producing great amounts of fodder.

As an indication of just how much they can produce, let me point out that we took over a small acreage of it alongside our experimental farm, and have been operating it since the first year I was in the government. The area was taken over in the year previous, although the experimental work had not been begun when I took office. I went to the maritime provinces, looked at the area, and the surrounding area, and decided that the work should proceed. I have been back there since to see the plot of land taken over. On one side of the road we find a condition today where a certain amount of fodder such as alfalfa or other hay is produced, while right across the road on the plot which has been properly handled under experimental conditions we find three times as much being produced from each acre.

This gives some indication of the possibilities in the area by way of increasing production through the proper handling of these lands. Long arguments have gone on as to whose responsibility it would be to make the necessary improvements. I have been convinced from the beginning that it did not make any difference whose responsibility it was, that no government short of the national government could do any considerable part of the work that had to be done. If it were to be done at all it had to be done on the same basis as the French did it in the first place and as the British did later on; it had to be directed and partly financed by some central authority and put into shape where the local people could handle it.

In the past the dikes were there, and the practice that was followed was to have provincial legislation under which the land behind the dikes could be managed and under which certain levies could be made in order to cover the cost of maintenance. This is administered in very much the same way as what has been done in connection with drainage in provinces across Canada.

The bill to be founded on the resolution provides for the federal government building or rebuilding or reconstructing the dikes. We think it is better that there be a division of authority rather than there be a division of funds; that there be a division of responsibility rather than that there be a division of funds. We will go ahead and do a certain job and then the province will do a certain job. Then those who will have benefits from the land will do something further, to be provided for under provincial legislation.

The job we have taken upon ourselves to do is that of reconstructing the dikes to keep out the sea. When we have completed that job we hope that there will be no possibility—if there is a possibility we may have to do something further with regard to it—of the sea getting in to damage these lands. Then the province undertakes under the legislation to do certain works behind the dikes. There may have to be some negotiation when we get down to the final determination of what is to be done by one or the other, as to just where the one stops and the other starts, but what each is responsible for is pretty clearly written into the legislation and we can discuss the details when the bill is before the house.

So far as the federal government is concerned, the total expenditures in connection with the 80,000 acres referred to a few moments ago by the senior hon. member for Halifax will be $3,210,000. This is made up as follows:

30 miles new dikes at $10,000 a mile	$ 300,000
70 miles heavy reinforcing dikes at $6,000 a mile	420,000
200 miles medium and light reinforcing dikes at $2,500 a mile	500,000
10 very large aboiteaux at $80,000 each	800,000
20 large aboiteaux at $30,000 each	600,000
35 medium size aboiteaux at $6,000 each	210,000
200 small aboiteaux at $1,000 each	200,000
200 breakwaters at $700 each	140,000
80,000 acres, surveys and plans at 50 cents per acre	40,000
Total	$3,210,000

Those are the expenditures under division No. 1. Then division No. 2 covers the expenditures to be made by the provinces. The estimated cost to construct, straighten, dig or clean laterals, sub-laterals and dale ditches in 80,000 acres of dikelands and marshlands and to clean larger drainage ditches or canals is $4,230,000, made up as follows:

50 miles large canals at $10,000 a mile	$ 500,000
130 miles large creeks at $5,000 a mile	650,000
120 miles of laterals at $4,000 a mile	480,000
600 miles of sub-laterals at $2,000 a mile	1,200,000
7,000 miles of dale ditches at $200 a mile	1,400,000
Total	$4,230,000

Expenditures under division No. 3 are to be undertaken by the dikeland owners. The 80,000 acres are to be replowed, limed, fertilized and reseeded at $18 per acre, or a total of $1,440,000. Those are the estimated figures at the moment. The works referred to a few moments ago by the senior hon. member for Halifax as being temporary were started in 1944-45 and consisted simply of patching up holes in the dikes and that kind of thing. There was nothing permanent about it. The federal government have spent on such activities in 1944-45, 1945-46, 1946-47 and 1947-48 a total of $207,601.33. These works will be continued during this year. The activities under the bill which I intend to bring before the house will start with the next season.

It is estimated that it will take anywhere from five to ten years to do the work, depending upon how much we are able to accomplish each year. In their proposals the provinces suggest that it should take nine or ten years, but we are hopeful that the work for which we are responsible can be done in a much shorter period. We think the most important thing to do now is to keep the water out. When we have spent the amount which is required to cover the federal government's responsibility in connection with the dikes, it will then be possible for other work to be carried on by the provinces behind the dikes. If the province desires to take a longer period of time or if those interested in the land desire to take a longer period, it will be most helpful to them if our work is carried out in a shorter space of time.

In answering the hon. member for Souris who asked whether this bill would be similar to the P.F.R.A., I would say that it will not be similar. This bill covers just the one thing. So far as we are concerned, it covers the building of the dikes. That will be done by the federal government and the staff required will be an engineering staff.

I presume the advisory committee will be much the same committee as we have had for a number of years. The chairman of that committee is the superintendent of the experimental farm in Nova Scotia and he has a number of others associated with him. These men have studied the question fully and have made reports from time to time. I presume it will be that committee, or some variation of it, that will function in connection with the whole activity.

I should like to get the bill before the house as soon as possible. I may say to those who are concerned about my getting away that I am not going away for a week. Nobody needs to be in any hurry about my going away. I shall go away when the time comes whether the legislation is through or not. There is nothing involved in my going or staying in so far as the legislation or my estimates are concerned. It is simply a question of getting along as rapidly as we can with the ordinary business of the house. Even if my estimates and this bill are through, I shall probably be here until about a week from today or a week from yesterday, so that we can go on discussing these matters to the satisfaction of all who are here.

However I think we could accomplish more and get greater satisfaction out of the discussion if hon. members would put me in a position as soon as possible to get the bill into their hands and that can be done right after this resolution is passed.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): We need you but can get along without you.

Mr. HAZEN: A good many of acres of land that will be improved when this proposed legislation becomes law and is put into effect are located in the constituency that is represented in this house by the hon. member for Cumberland. On a number of occasions during the past number of years he has brought to the attention of the members of the house the deplorable condition of these marshlands, and has asked the government that some action be taken. I am not in a position to say and I do not say that it was wholly through his energetic efforts that this resolution has been brought down and that the legislation is to be introduced, but I think he is entitled to some credit for what he has done for his constituents in this matter, and I think also there are other members—

Mr. ISNOR: I gave him credit.

Mr. HAZEN: I admit that, and there are other members from the maritime provinces who are entitled to credit for what they have done in this matter.

There is in the county of Albert, which I have the honour to represent in this house, a considerable acreage of these marshlands that front on the bay of Fundy. Some improvements have been made through arrangements between the dominion and provincial governments and the landowners in the past few years to restore the dikes and reclaim these lands, and probably the experience that has been gained in these operations has been or will be of service in the drafting of the bill that will be brought down.

I do not want to discuss this resolution now at any length. As the minister has suggested, I think it would be much better to do that when the legislation is before us. But I would point out this fact, that this legislation is of a most unusual character. As a rule, the dominion does not assist people whose property has been destroyed by floods. That matter has been discussed today in connection with the floods in British Columbia. The government does not assist owners of property whose lands have been destroyed by floods or by forest fires, nor does it assist people who permit their properties to fall into such a state of disrepair as to be no longer useful or productive. But in this case public funds are to be used to assist a number, and a considerable number, of land owners to improve their own properties.

These dikes in years past were raised by the hands of farmers, with labour incessant, to shut out the turbulent tides. They did that work with their own labour, with the French government possibly assisting at one time. The work was done first of all by the French settlers and later by English settlers, and the dikes were maintained and kept up by these settlers. With the ceaseless rise and fall of the tide there must be a great wear and tear on these earthworks to keep out the seas. For many years past they were maintained by the owners of the land, and the work was done at their own expense. But now for some reason or another, possibly a combination of reasons or circumstances—the minister referred to the fact that agriculture had been depressed in that area—the government is to do this work. For some years past the owners of the land failed to keep up these dikes; they failed to look after their own property, and as a result the dikes went down, the seas came in and the land was destroyed or made unproductive.

Now if public moneys, the moneys of the people of this country, are to be voted and spent on erecting these dikes and putting these lands into shape for their owners, I think it is essential that arrangements be made to see that the owners of the land keep up the dikes after they have been built. It is essential in this legislation or in the agreements that are referred to in the resolution to provide that the owners of the land maintain the dikes after they have been built. If that is not done the money of the people of this country that will be spent on the enterprise will be wasted.

Mr. BAKER: Coming from Nova Scotia, I just want to say that I am delighted, as I am sure the other members from the maritimes are, that the government has found it expedient to reclaim the marshlands in the three maritime provinces. I shall not go into details because I want to see the bill first, but I want to express the satisfaction it gives us all to have the minister make this pronouncement. We need all the arable land we can have in the maritimes. I can assure the committee that this is not a partisan matter at all. It is something that all of us from the maritimes have asked for in one way or another, some vocally on the floor of the house, some of us more quietly perhaps, by correspondence and by direct representations. That goes for all parties in the maritime provinces. I appreciate very much the general support and interest shown by the rest of the committee in this matter.

Mr. BENTLEY: I think it is proper that someone from the prairies should say something on this resolution. I suppose someone may accuse me of supporting this measure simply because it affects the province of my birth. I am glad to do so on that account, of course, but that is not the main reason. We in the west have felt for many years that it was necessary to have some assistance to carry us over places where water was scarce, because we believe that the production of foodstuffs is an extremely important thing both for our nation and for the world at large. We have been given some measure of relief for some years by P.F.R.A., which has done excellent work in the Palliser triangle, and we hope, of course, that much more will be done. It does not make much difference whether the land is submerged under water or has not enough water, for in neither case does it produce the foodstuffs it could. I believe that the people of the west generally will welcome the extension of this assistance, although it is not called P.F.R.A., and obviously it could not be, to the maritime provinces, because the result will be to bring more land under cultivation.

I remember some of that section of the country pretty well. One member has said that the people who owned these lands have permitted the dikes to get into a condition of disrepair. I do not believe we should go back into history to place the blame on any particular person, because you cannot alter the facts anyway after you have found out who was responsible. The fact remains that there were times when it was utterly impossible for the owners of the land and the province itself to do the maintenance and reconstruction work that was necessary, and which will be necessary, as the minister says, to bring this land back into cultivation. Whatever errors were made in the past, the thing now is to see that the necessary corrections are made, and I agree with the minister and others who have spoken that this government should take the lead. When that is done, undoubtedly there will be quite a number of people occupying these lands who will be new settlers, probably young farmers, and they will no doubt get encouragement to go ahead and do their part in building and maintenance to make this possible. This will all add to the productive power of Canada and will be of great help to the maritime provinces in rebuilding their industries there, which they regard as their right. It is a pity that more of the same thing could not be done in connection with other industries in order to make them as productive as we all know they can be.

The early part of the debate this afternoon was taken up with a discussion of conditions in the Fraser valley. In a way, I felt let down to think that while the lives of people, and a tremendous amount of personal and public property, were in danger, there should be any discussion whatever over questions of jurisdiction on the part of governmental bodies. When there is such a crisis it should be dealt with as rapidly as possible by whoever has the means to deal with it, and then the responsibility could be assessed afterwards if necessary.

[Mr. Bentley.]

After all, if someone pushes a baby into the river, the first thing that anyone who is able to rescue it will do is to get the baby out, and then find the person responsible and take whatever action may be necessary to prevent his doing the same thing again.

I think the hon. member for Fraser Valley has brought up a question which is of importance not only to that part of the country but to all of us; and the government here, being the strongest in Canada, should take immediate, active and efficient steps to do whatever should be done.

I appreciate what the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of National Defence have said they are doing. One minister has had his deputy out there for the last two days and no doubt he has been assisting in the work. The Minister of Agriculture has officials in the locality, and if one of them is the person I have in mind he will give a tremendous amount of impetus to the work there. But he cannot do anything without the necessary machinery and manpower. The Minister of National Defence has his engineers on the job. But that is not enough. This afternoon the newspapers indicate that something more rapid should take place.

Mr. GARDINER: The army and the navy are there too.

Mr. BENTLEY: Some of the army and some of the navy, and it may be necessary to have them all there. When there is a battle on, it is important to have everyone fighting.

Mr. GARDINER: I think everyone is there who should be there. Everyone is there without direction from the federal or the provincial authority. Everyone out there near enough to be helping is helping.

Mr. BENTLEY: Are there more on the way?

Mr. GARDINER: The question to be considered is not what can be done now, because, as I said, everyone is doing everything that can be done at the moment. The question raised by the hon. member for Kootenay East is the important one, as to what is to be done with regard to those who have lost property; but that is a thing that does not have to be decided today. As to the other things that can be done, I repeat, everyone is doing whatever he can.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am glad to hear that, and I am sure the hon. member for Fraser Valley will be glad to hear it also, because

I thought he rather felt that everything was not being done that could be done, and I thought he should have the support of the committee if he was correct in his assumption that everything was not being done that could be done. If, however, the minister is right and everything is being done that can be done, that will be a source of satisfaction both to the hon. member for Fraser Valley and to other members from British Columbia.

I will not take up more time on this resolution except to say that we sympathize with the people of the maritime provinces and we hope that those who put this measure into effect will be able to do so as expeditiously as possible. We hope they will meet with the success which has attended some of the work of a similar kind done in our part of the country.

Mr. MacNICOL: I endorse what the hon. member for St. John-Albert said in giving credit to the minister. In this House of Commons we too seldom, in opposite parties, give credit to those on the other side who do try to do something, and as far as I know the present minister is the first federal minister who has really put his teeth into this problem.

I compliment the minister, as did the hon. member for St. John-Albert. I also appreciate what was said by other members representing Halifax, Cumberland, where the works are going on near the experimental farm, to which the minister referred, Royal, Queens and other parts of the maritime provinces. We can include all hon. members from the maritimes.

Since I have been here, on one occasion or another I have spoken of the marshlands of the maritimes. Last October I spent some time in Albert county and also in the area in Nova Scotia about which the minister spoke. I must pay tribute to the early French pioneers. They did a marvellous job without machinery. They must have done it all with wheelbarrow, shovel, pick and so forth.

In the county of Albert last summer I saw one of the aboiteaux in action. In English, this means a valve in a trough or box, through which the water flows. It hangs on a hinge; when the water is draining off the land, this flap or valve moves seaward, and when the tide is coming in, the flap is pushed shut so that it keeps the sea out. The engineer on the job told me that these aboiteaux were built 200 years ago by the early French pioneers. That is a great tribute to those people.

I support this resolution and I will support the bill as well, for in my judgment it is long overdue. Anyone who heard the figures given by the minister will realize that the completion of the job would be too much for either Nova Scotia or New Brunswick by itself. The province of Prince Edward Island would like to have dikes too, but I have not heard so much about that. I believe the whole house will support the bill.

One thing that struck me favourably about this debate was the sympathy of everyone for any province that is in distress. The feeling of members generally toward any part of Canada that is in distress is something admirable, and it brings home to us the fact that all Canada is our business and not merely the little bailiwick that each of us represents for a short time. The country at large is our concern, and every member has been in sympathy with this proposal. Some members have referred to their individual troubles, and they are very real no doubt, and should be attended to as quickly as possible, but all those members supported the resolution.

I have heard the amount of acreage stated at between 80,000 and 100,000 acres. Even 80,000 acres are well worth reclamation. It would mean a great deal to the productivity of maritime farms. The farmers roundabout apparently grow hay on the marshlands, but for some years they have not been able to do so. Years ago these activities yielded great returns, but of recent years the farmers have not been able to do much in this way.

Last summer I spent some time at a delightful little town called Hillsborough where the gypsum plant is located. They were rebuilding the dikes there. As one drives south, I presume, from Hillsborough toward the gypsum plant, the roadway lies through lowlands.

The day I was there the water was over that roadway. The tide was in. After the tide went out, I myself went along the roadway across there at the other side of the depression. The land between the roadway and the bay was under water. But when the works now being constructed are completed that land will be reclaimed.

One of the engineers gave me a copy of the bill, or maybe I got it later in Fredericton; I have forgotten which it was. I presume it was a bill passed by the New Brunswick legislature last year or the year before. It stated that the gypsum company, the railway whose line was flooded when the tide was in, and the owners through an agreement were providing for a dike or the repair of that dike. So I hope that, when this bill goes through, the people in Albert county who certainly had great expense—and that includes the railway, the gypsum company and the owners of the land—will be considered for the return of what they spent. They may not be through yet. More money may have to be expended there.

If the minister goes there, he will find the town of Hillsborough a very nice town. It has a fine hotel, which serves the best meal I believe I ever tasted. If I go back there, I am going to head straight for that hotel. I have forgotten its name, but it is on the left side of the street going south. It is well operated and serves fine meals.

In closing my remarks, may I say that I just rose because I know the areas about which the minister spoke. Having seen the tide across the road and across the low lands, I heartily support the reclamation of these lands.

Mr. QUELCH: I should like to say that we in this group are glad to give our support to this measure. I remember that, when the reconstruction committee of this house was sitting, we made a review of history of the conditions in this area, the history of the building of the dikes, how they had been allowed to deteriorate and how the marshlands have been developed. At that time we came to the conclusion that the problem was one which was altogether too great for the province to handle. Therefore we made a recommendation that reclamation of the marshlands be carried out as a national project. At that time we felt that it would help to increase the wealth of the dominion and could well be regarded as a self-liquidating project.

It was quite evident from the history that was given to us that deterioration of the area of the marshlands had come about largely during the depression times. It was explained to us that, owing to the depressed condition of agriculture, the farmers had not been able to afford the cost of maintaining the dikes, the cleaning of the ditches and so on. It is just another example of the heavy cost we pay in times of depression, and for some time in what we might call a deflationary period. We perhaps do not realize at the time the high cost we pay. It is only at a later time that we realize that the cost of a deflationary period may be much greater than the cost of inflation that we are constantly having brought before us.

I would also say we are glad to see that steps are being taken to give immediate help in the Fraser valley. Then, of course, the next question is this. What is to happen afterwards in regard to the people who have lost a great deal of their property, whose stock maybe has been destroyed, and who will have to be given assistance? One hon. member mentioned that it is a new idea that the federal government should accept responsibility for damage from floods. I do not think it is a new idea at all, because back in 1937, when we had the terrible droughts in the west, the federal government in part accepted that situation as a national responsibility. The federal government gave the prairie provinces a great deal of help in regard to drought conditions, and in bringing in feed. While flood may be the opposite of drought, nevertheless it is a condition that may absolutely bankrupt the farmers. Just as we accepted as a national responsibility the need for help in relation to drought, so I think we should accept the need for help in regard to damage from floods. We shall also have to accept that as a national responsibility and, when the damage can be reviewed, provide measures by which assistance can be given to these unfortunate people.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Before the resolution carries, I should like to make one or two observations. First, I will say that I am in favour of this resolution for the reason that those who are affected by it are close to the communities which, in days to come, might consume the products which might be produced on these marshlands. In the second place, those who live in the proximity of these marshlands are the people who are the very basis, to my mind, and the very life of those features of our Canadian way of life which we like to think of as being of a pioneer character.

Thousands of people from the maritimes have gone west and have developed that part of the country. They left these lands because they were marshlands. Even though they left the midst of these communities—and I am sorry the senior hon. member for Halifax has left his seat; I have something to say to him and I hope he will come back—even though they left the community whence comes the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, I still have a mid-Victorian idea in my system that those who left the marshlands and went west are people of a kind that did wonderfully well on behalf of Canada. As I say, I may perhaps be mid-Victorian, but I should like to hold that pioneer stock within the confines of the maritime provinces in order that we might have some well-spring, as it were, or some source from which to draw the greatest of our Canadians to help to make up for the loss of those who found it necessary, through reasons of one kind and another—for instance, that they might get a better financial return—to leave the maritime provinces and go west.

But not nearly as important or as tragic is it that some left the maritimes to go west as it is that others left to go to the New England states to develop another country which does not fly the same flag as we do. I should like to hold them in the maritimes. I say to my hon. friends in the maritime provinces that within the last quarter of a century, right at the mouth of these very marshlands, I have seen three old pioneering families which I visited, during the last two or three decades stay home in the maritimes. I ask the hon. member for Saint John-Albert—and he knows of whom I am thinking—if one, two or three of those individuals did not accumulate within the last two decades a million dollars in the end of these marshlands, by staying home and attending to their knitting within the province of New Brunswick?

One Sunday morning I hired a car and went out to Moncton to see one of these men at the end of the bore, the bore being one of those channels cut by the tide. This gentleman was on his verandah, and he said, "You, coming from the city of Toronto the good, will, I suppose, not talk business on a Sunday." I reminded him that I had already been to church and had driven out in the same car to see him. Finally, in a cold sort of way he said, "Well, come in off the verandah," and I had the pleasure of taking lunch with him at his home and then selling him forty or fifty cars of goods. After that, he thought those of us from the central provinces were perhaps not too hard to deal with. He finally consummated the sale, even though it was Sunday, and while he still thought Toronto was the good, he felt perhaps it was not quite so good after all.

My hon. friend about whom I have been asking has not yet entered the chamber. We are all members of a confederation. Over a period of two or three decades, the maritime provinces may have been overlooked. Coming from one of the central provinces, I say to my hon. friends in the maritimes: We love, admire and respect you, and hope you may be able to develop your economy so that you will be on a par with the other provinces of the dominion. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am in favour of this legislation. I think we should help them in any way we possibly can. Why? For the simple reason that we owe a debt to the maritime provinces of Canada, and I think we ought to pay it. This legislation, little though it may do, will perhaps help. I am sure the provinces of Ontario and Quebec will do anything they can. If hon. members coming from the western provinces find themselves asked to vote some assistance to the maritimes, many of whose people travelled west and helped develop that part of the country, I am sure they, too, will favour any possible help that can be given so that we may develop the maritime provinces as a strong entity, which will cling to us.

If we do not do that, who will rise in his place in this house and blame or criticize those in the maritime provinces if, after mature consideration and the experience of half a century, they decide that perhaps at the time of confederation they were not too wise in their decision to remain with us? That is what worries me when I think of the years that lie ahead. Within the confines of those three provinces is a great opportunity for the development of natural resources, including those they can dig out of the top six inches of soil and what they can garner from the seas surrounding them. But in addition there are the intellectual resources, those qualities of body and soul which those progenitors have passed on to their sons and daughters, which we need if we are to make of Canada a country of which we may be really proud.

I do not know whether I have made clear the idea in the back of my mind. Perhaps in days gone by we have not been too fair with that far-flung part of our dominion. If that is the case here is an opportunity to do at least something to help the maritimes; and I think it is a great chance.

I should like to put on record something which may stimulate the ideas of one hon. member who seems to think he is the sole representative in this house, and on every committee which functions here, capable of expressing the ideas which permeate the people of that part of the country. The hon. member for Halifax, whom I have had paged half a dozen times in the last ten minutes, has not as yet arrived in the chamber. I am referring to the hon. gentleman who until recently was the junior member for Halifax, who likes to think he represents everything worthwhile in the maritimes. I say to him that if he would try to strike a sympathetic and co-operative chord in the minds of hon. members coming from Ontario and Quebec he would be doing greater service to his constituents and to the maritime provinces in general. He should approach us with the feeling that we are with him to a man, because we know what the maritime provinces have done for Canada, instead of in an attitude which to my mind might be considered cynical, for lack of a better word. If he would cease telling us that we moved the head offices of his banks from the maritimes up to Montreal or Toronto or some other place he might get along better. We did not do that.

We love, admire and respect the Macdonalds, the Mackintoshes and all those people down there, the sons and daughters of those who came over on the steamer Hector, the sons and daughters of the highlanders who fought on the plains of Abraham in years gone by, most of whom came from the maritime provinces. We in central Canada have not forgotten the great contribution the maritime provinces made to this country, and the idea we have is to nurture and help them now.

Therefore, coming from Ontario, I support this legislation. I say to the senior hon. member for Halifax, who mentioned the French Canadians, the Acadians and what not: Voulez-vous, s'il vous plait, entrer dans la salle de la chambre des communes et poser votre derrière sur une chaise, and say something worthwhile on behalf of the maritime provinces. You will get the support not only of those who come from Toronto, the city of the good, but of all those representing Ontario as well as my colleagues in the province of Quebec and those from the west. I say to all my colleagues: Support the maritime provinces. Hold the maritime provinces. A few miserable dollars do not matter. Therefore it is a great pleasure for me to support the legislation now brought down by the Minister of Agriculture in this connection.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I wish to say only a brief word in support of the resolution and to say also that I am sure we appreciate the sentiments of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. The ancestors of several of my colleagues in this group were from the maritime provinces, and I find them to be industrious and worthy members of the House of Commons.

As one who comes from that part of Manitoba which has suffered from flood conditions, may I say I sympathize with the conditions described by the hon. member for Fraser Valley. I hope the government will continue to do everything possible to look after that immediate situation.

I am inclined to agree with the statement of the hon. member for Souris that it might be necessary and desirable to extend the Prairies Farm Rehabilitation Act so that it would apply to all parts of Canada. That would be a step toward solving the recurring arguments and disputes about jurisdiction, because we would then have one piece of legislation applicable to all parts of Canada, and the matter of jurisdiction would no longer come up.

Recently in Manitoba we suffered severe damage from flooding. In at least two instances the dominion government has a definite share of the responsibility. However I shall not discuss the matter now. There will be an opportunity on another occasion. But if the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act were revised so as to make it applicable to all parts of Canada I believe we would save ourselves a great deal of time in disputing just where the federal government should take over.

I would leave one further thought in connection with the reclamation of land. Now that immigration is again on the increase, it is particularly important that we look toward possibilities of reclaiming land, whether it be in the east, the west or any other part of Canada, where it is possible. Although this is a large country in area, unfortunately much of the land is not arable. There is a certain amount of submarginal and marginal land which, with the application of certain public works and reclamation projects could be brought under cultivation.

If the Minister of Agriculture is to make good his dream of 15,000,000 people in the prairie provinces, and if he is to find room for a portion of them on the land, I believe it will be necessary to carry out projects in other parts of Canada where land may be reclaimed and put into useful production.

As a member from one of the prairie provinces, I am happy to support the resolution, remembering well that in the years of drought and of other misfortunes the people from other parts of Canada came willingly to our assistance.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I add my word of appreciation to the minister for having introduced this legislation. I believe it is fitting to put all Canadians behind the maritimers. This is a move in the right direction. As the hon. member for Davenport has said so well on many occasions, Canada as a whole must stand as a whole; all parts of Canada must be behind those in need, and each part must be interested in every other part, so that this magnificent heritage can be kept at its highest possible degree of value and passed on in that condition to the generations to come.

As the hon. member for Dauphin has just said, the reclamation of our soil is extremely important. I am not sure that up to now we have fully realized how precious and sacred our soil is. Anything that tends to destroy it in any part of Canada is a threat to Canada's strength, and must be resisted and overcome.

This brings me to the conditions in the Fraser valley already mentioned. I feel keenly sympathetic toward the people of the Fraser valley because of their great misfortune. It was only a short time ago that my area was in danger of flooding. I would urge upon the government that they take the dollar sign right out of this question of the Fraser valley flooding. In my view the Fraser valley must be rescued, salvaged and rehabilitated at the earliest possible day, because it is an important part of Canada. The federal government must lead, in collaboration with British Columbia, to put all Canadians behind British Columbia in its time of distress.

If the minister has not already heard, I am sure he will be pleased to know that the St. Mary's river dam, in which he has been so deeply interested, and for the forwarding and building of which he has done so much, has now passed one great crisis. That grand tunnel which had to be constructed in order to divert the water to permit the building of the dam was completed on Saturday, May 22, according to the Lethbridge Herald. That means great rejoicing in my constituency and through southern Alberta. I personally rejoice and I wish to give the minister full credit for his share in this accomplishment.

This helps me to understand how glad members of the maritime provinces must be because of the measure now to be introduced. I wish to assure people from the maritimes that we Albertans and westerners are just as glad as they are.

Mr. PEARKES: Mr. Chairman, like other hon. members I am pleased to see the bill is being introduced to reclaim land from the ravages of the sea. I regret exceedingly, however, its limited aspects. It deals with the lands in three provinces, and three only. It is about time Canada realized that there are more than three provinces which may be claimed as being maritime provinces.

British Columbia is a maritime province. Manitoba borders on salt water. So does Ontario; and there will be opportunities in the future, if indeed they do not already exist, when land will have to be protected in all those provinces from the inroads of the sea.

It might not be desirable to include protection of prairie lands in the same bill as protection of marshlands against the sea; but I can tell the minister, who has recently returned from a trip to the Pacific coast, upon which occasion he made certain promises in various parts of British Columbia, that in my constituency there are lands which are spoiled by the inroads of the sea—not through any unusual circumstances, such as the very sad circumstances now being experienced in the Fraser valley, but from the day to day rising of the tide.

There was a few years ago a seawall or dike, if you wish so to describe it, protecting a certain valuable acreage just on the outside of Victoria. It was built not by the early pioneers, not by a benevolent imperial or benevolent French government, but by this government. And when one asks that that dike be continued or be completed for the few remaining feet yet required—and I refer to the locality known as Islandview Beach—we are told there is no money available for the reclamation or for the building of works to prevent the inroads of the sea.

I feel that this measure definitely falls short of much that might be required, in that it limits the ability to spend money for this particular type of work only to the Atlantic seaboard.

As is well known in the house, there has been a tremendous influx of people to the southern part of British Columbia. They need food and any food that can be raised is adjacent to a market. Difficulties have been enhanced recently by the increased freight rates on commodities such as potatoes and other vegetables which must be shipped in. I should like to see the provisions of this legislation extended so that dikes required for the protection of lands on the Pacific coast may also be built. If they cannot be constructed under the bill to be brought in, then I hope the Department of Public Works will complete the dikes which it started, thereby making acreage available for the growing of potatoes and vegetables urgently needed on the coast of British Columbia.

Mr. ASHBY: Mr. Chairman, I received a letter from home some time ago telling of the tremendous amount of soil that was being carried down the creeks and rivers of Alberta, apparently going into Hudson bay to be deposited so that perhaps some future generations may reclaim it. When this resolution was brought forward here I thought what a shame it was to permit our soils in the western provinces to be lost by erosion, wind and so on and then have to try to reclaim them somewhere else.

Dikes were built in Nova Scotia when the first settlers arrived from France and they are still holding back the sea, while those that have been built since have broken down. Orchards have been flooded, fields ruined and at odd times people have actually been forced to abandon their farms. I know I have harped on this subject many times, but here is a solution of the problem which was offered by a man in 1821. He said:

> It appears impossible that the land owners should much longer submit to these intolerable burdens on their estates. They must get off these taxes or lose their estates, they must do a great deal more than that indeed, but that they must do at any rate.

I doubt if any finer soil can be found than is the fine silt deposited in these salt marshes.

If this land is reclaimed it will last for hundreds and hundreds of years without any fertilizers. Speaking of fertilizers, by the way, I never use commercial fertilizers on my farm. The use of commercial fertilizers constitutes one of the greatest hazards that agriculture has to face today. Natural fertilizers preserve the soil. You may not get as good crops if you turn the straw back into the land, but—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I would ask the hon. member to be kind enough to deal with the resolution which is to assist Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island in the reclamation and development of marshlands.

Mr. ASHBY: I realize that there has been a lot of talk this afternoon outside the resolution. I simply wanted to point out the value of this soil where no commercial fertilizer will be required for hundreds and hundreds of years. It is well worth reclaiming and I am not objecting to the legislation for one moment.

We should use the experience that is already available in the individuals who have inhabited and made use of this area. They are not individuals who have been trained in our schools, colleges or universities, but they know how to build dikes. As I said before, hundreds of years ago dikes were built by individuals who had never received training in any institution and those dikes are still in existence, whereas those built in modern times have broken down.

The solution is to remove taxes from these people who do not create money but who actually create valuable assets. That should be done as a reward for rendering this service. However, they are being penalized the very money they require to maintain these dikes and reclaim the additional land. Remove that hindrance from them and there will be no need of the government going near the people to construct dikes of any kind.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Gardiner thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 328, respecting the reclamation and development of marshlands in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Experimental farms service—

15. Branch farms and stations and illustration stations, $3,372,320.

Mr. HLYNKA: The other day I inquired whether the Department of Agriculture made any grants to farmers who were operating illustration stations at their own expense, and the minister replied that the department pays a small rental to farmers who own and operate illustration stations of from fifteen acres up. I should like a little more information on that, since there are several farmers in my constituency who operate illustration stations. They have been able to build them up but now find it difficult to maintain them and to obtain sufficient help who would explain the results to visitors.

There is one farmer in particular in my constituency, William Zazula, of Willingdon, who has one of the finest orchards I have seen. He wrote the department asking if anything could be done to help him in the matter of expenses, in order that he could pay the hired help required to look after visitors. Thousands of people from all over Canada and the United States visit this particular farm. It is only six acres in extent, but in addition he has several acres of flowers of various kinds. Could something be done to help him? Could the Department of Agriculture, for instance, not make a grant after they have assessed the value of the station to the community, and this is more than a community affair? I think the department should encourage such illustration stations in western Canada.

I have on my file a letter written by the deputy minister of agriculture to the gentleman of whom I spoke, and in that letter the deputy minister says that, so far as the western provinces are concerned, the department had no appropriation for such assistance. Why limit such assistance to any part of Canada? I think such assistance should be given equally in all parts, particularly in the west, where the pioneers in this field are rendering a great service to this country in experimenting with various types of fruits and vegetables, grasses and so forth. I would ask the minister to consult with his officials to see whether any assistance can be given in this case. I would appreciate it if the minister would indicate how one should proceed in order to get such assistance.

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): We do, of course, negotiate with each individual who is going to establish an illustration station and enter into an arrangement with him as to what the payment is to be. Payments are usually made on the basis of so much per acre, by rental, and the operator gets the produce of the land and sells it for his own benefit. It is an arrangement entered into with the individual who operates the station. Of course we endeavour to have a uniform basis, taking into consideration the different conditions, the number of acres, and so on.

Mr. HLYNKA: Whom would this farmer have to get in touch with? Would he have to apply to the branch of the department in Edmonton or write to Ottawa?

Mr. GARDINER: If he wrote to Ottawa we would put him in touch with the proper party. There is a supervisor of illustration stations at Lacombe, who draws a salary, I notice, of $2,580, whose job it is to supervise the stations in that area. There is an organization right across the country, but the nearest supervisor to the farmer my hon. friend mentioned would be the one at Lacombe.

Item agreed to.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY OF CANADA

On the order:

Third reading of Bill No. 8 (letter C of the Senate), intituled: "An act respecting The Bell Telephone Company of Canada."—Mr. Rinfret.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Mr. Rinfret moves that Bill No. 8 be now read the third time. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. KNOWLES: On division.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Broadview was on his feet.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy but a very few minutes of the time of the house. I simply wish to draw attention to one thing about this bill, and that is that those who oppose it have had no opportunity in the public press of the country to have the case put before the people. I bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the statement that appears in one report, that Mr. Church said the utility should be made a part of the Post Office Department. I never used that phrase. I was referring to 1928 when the capital sought was $75,000,000, and at that time I thought it was a good opportunity for our province to take over the system. But that was twenty years ago, in 1928, and I gave my reasons for opposing the bill both in the house and on many other occasions. I am not one of those who change their vote, who go uphill politically one day and downhill the next day, those who are on again, off again and on again. When I take a stand I maintain it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the motion carry?

Mr. KNOWLES: On division.

The CLERK: Third reading of this bill; troisième lecture de ce bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Rinfret moves that this bill do now pass and that the title be as on the order paper.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I have been three times on my feet, Mr. Speaker. On the third reading of the bill I should like to make one or two observations. Many of us are public ownership minded and at the same time we are private enterprise individuals. I do not see anything contradictory in those two positions. Public ownership has done a great deal not only for the province of Ontario but for the dominion and I am in favour of it. At the same time, I am one of those who admire and respect individuals who exercise private enterprise, initiative and industry.

My objection to this particular bill is this. This company went ahead from $75 million to $100 million odd, and then they stepped aside at a time when Canada had to finance a war effort. For that I pay them homage and respect. But when they suddenly jump from $150 million to $500 million, that is rather too much. I would have been happier to see them take two bites at the cherry, moving along in an orderly sort of way, so that generations to come could look back and say that they had made steady progress. This sudden jump from $150 million to $500 million is too great to ask of the Canadian people, and in the same sentence may I say that it savours of taking advantage of the investing public, the Canadian people.

The Canadian people during the war subscribed to victory loans and what not and received a substantial return for their money, and now that it is no longer necessary to raise victory loans the Bell Telephone Company find a good open market from those who must of necessity invest funds, namely, life insurance companies and other companies, followed by many private individuals who have to invest some of their funds so that they will not remain dormant.

Fortunately perhaps for the Bell Telephone Company, they struck a period in Canada's history when interest rates were low. Whether or not they should be privileged, by those of us who are charged with the responsibility of administering Canada's affairs, to step into the money market with very low interest rates, is a matter of concern to the Canadian people. Perhaps I should compliment them on being smart enough to do that. At the same time I think of many persons in Canada who are imbued with the idea of public ownership of public utilities, and they are perhaps distressed to see a great public utility enterprise walking into the market and picking up low interest rate moneys to further their own great enterprise.

I do not for a moment detract from the greatness of the telephone enterprise. They are doing a wonderful job on behalf of Canada, setting an example perhaps for the entire world, since we have more telephones per capita in Canada than any other nation. We are highly privileged to be in Canada and to enjoy this convenience; but let us be honest with the public whom we represent here and say to them: Yes; this great enterprise has entered the low money market and taken full advantage of it—too great an advantage of it. They should have crawled a little before starting to gallop. They should have moved up to double what they had before; but when they treble that sum, some of us in this house who are private enterprise men, men who are anxious that our fellowmen should receive the rewards that are due them for their enterprise, initiative and industry, cannot stand by and allow the people to be trampled by big interests. And this savours of big interests.

This bill will pass with reservations on the part of many of us who are convinced that we are not a people who will tamper with public industries that are in need for the benefit of a few. This is a great and necessary public utility; it is expanding, and we want it to expand. There are half a million telephones required and they will make life much easier for our people and raise our standard of living. We appreciate that. At the same time I want hon. members to know that some of us who, so far as private enterprise is concerned, may be called 100 per centers, are convinced that private enterprise, with its initiative and industry, is the best thing that Canada can have, not only in our generation but for many generations to come.

Do not think, Mr. Speaker, that we divorce ourselves from the interests of the ordinary individual and give carte blanche to what the man in the street may call big interests. We do not want big interests. In fact, "big interests" is a misnomer. I have been privileged to be part and parcel of private enterprise having the objective of improving conditions in Canada and not profiting at all therefrom. While we are privileged to be in a category which handles funds and helps the industry of Canada, at the same time we are thinking of what our duty is to our fellowman in the street. I decry the matter of this increase in capitalization. I am sorry that this organization saw fit to gallop before it started to walk, and to jump away up into this high category. I feel disposed to charge it with taking advantage of a situation which developed through no fault of its own, of this house, or of anyone whatsoever, but as a result of a set of conditions in which you, Mr. Speaker, I, and the rest of the hon. members in this chamber did everything in our power to encourage investment in war loans.

The war is now over. That war bond field is gone. But a great public utility comes in and gets that field while that money is around. That is all right. It is perhaps better that it should be this company rather than some great private enterprise; because in the final analysis, what it is planning to do in its developments will, to my mind, be for the general advantage of Canada; I hope and pray that it will be. Being for the general advantage of Canada, I am ready and willing to sit down and say nothing more about it.

At the same time, on the third reading of this bill, I did not think it should be allowed to pass without some of us who are interested in private enterprise and the development of our great institutions in Canada, criticizing those charged with the responsibility of conducting the affairs of this great enterprise for being just a little bit too hungry at this time, and for being just a little bit too anxious at this time to take advantage of a condition which was not of their own making but which developed on account of a world war tragedy which you, Mr. Speaker, and I have sat in this chamber and studied and talked about during the last decade. They are taking advantage of that world tragedy, in my opinion, to get a maximum of cheap money from the investing public of the Dominion of Canada for the furthering of their enterprise.

I thank God that their enterprise is an enterprise of public utility. If it had not been that, it would have been my privilege to have fought tooth and nail against this legislation from the very inception of it, even though in the same sentence I say to you that I am a private enterprise man. I feel that way about it, never for a moment setting aside in my own mind the fact that, being a private enterprise man, I am also one of those who believe that public utilities for the general welfare of our fellowman are something that should receive the support of all of us, but at the same time all of us should be left free to develop private enterprise, initiative and industry as it moves forward, as it is bred in the heart and soul of the average Canadian to do, and as you and I like to do.

As to public ownership across the board, I say "No"; but as to public ownership for the great and necessary public utility enterprises, I say "Of course." Let us have private enterprise for all the possible enterprises there are in this great country of natural resources; and fortunately for you and me, and for our fellow Canadians, there are thousands of them, perhaps scores of thousands of them, ready and waiting for the hand of your sons and mine to develop in this great country of ours.

I will close by saying this. I am sorry that this great public utility enterprise saw fit to grab off from the Canadian economy this tremendous sum of money when perhaps two or three bites of the same cherry might, in the course of a decade, accomplish the same purpose.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): I had not planned, Mr. Speaker, on speaking further at length on this legislation.

An hon. MEMBER: Why do so?

Mr. NICHOLSON: But having objected to the granting of third reading last week, I am happy that this opportunity was given for the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) to voice his objections to the passage of this legislation.

Our position has been clearly presented in previous sittings, but I think one final word should be said to express the hope that the company will not wait until they require an extra billion or billion and a half dollars before again coming to parliament. I think it would be in the best interests of this important utility if, should the need develop, the requirements were placed before parliament periodically; and if a satisfactory explanation can be given for the plans for development, I am sure that parliament will grant reasonable concessions without such prolonged debate. I wish to speak on behalf of our group, expressing our continued resistance to the passage of legislation of this type.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: On division.

Mr. CHURCH: How can they pay eight per cent? It means an increase in rates almost immediately.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the third time.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Mr. Rinfret moves that this bill do now pass and that the title be as on the order paper. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. KNOWLES: On division.

Mr. CHURCH: On division. I am for 100 per cent increase.

Motion agreed to on division.

THIRD READING

Bill No. 205, respecting the Canadian Marconi Company—Mr. Whitman.

CANADIAN SLOVAK BENEFIT SOCIETY

Mr. D. F. BROWN (Essex West) moved the second reading of Bill No. 210, respecting Canadian Slovak Benefit Society.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the second time.

Mr. BROWN: May this bill be now referred to the committee?

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Mr. Brown moves, seconded by Mr. Whitman, that this bill be now referred to the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. BROWN: No, Mr. Speaker; I do not believe it is properly referable to the banking and commerce committee. It is not for the incorporation of a company.

Mr. KNOWLES: It should be to the miscellaneous private bills committee.

Mr. BROWN: It is only for the consent of the house for an extension of time. I do not think it is properly referable to the miscellaneous private bills committee either.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Mr. Brown moves, seconded by Mr. Whitman, that this bill be now referred to the committee of the whole. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN CO-OPERATIVE PROCESSORS LIMITED

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 212, to incorporate Canadian Co-operative Processors Limited.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. CHURCH: Would the mover explain the bill? This is the first time I have seen it.

Mr. MAYBANK: The purpose of the bill is to incorporate this co-operative organization, which has been operating for some time under a Saskatchewan incorporation, whether by private bill of the Saskatchewan legislature or by letters patent I am not sure, but I think under letters patent. They have found they cannot carry on business satisfactorily in the different provinces any longer under that form of charter, so they are seeking here the same powers they have enjoyed in their own province, at any rate, up to the present time.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): We are seeing this bill for the first time. What is it about?

Mr. MAYBANK: It is to incorporate a co-operative society which has existed in Saskatchewan for some time and now seeks incorporation by dominion charter because it has been found impracticable to carry on as heretofore. That is all there is to it.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I see the incorporators are George Chester Stewart, rancher; Cornelius Jahnke, rancher; Robert Thomas, farmer; Charles Horatio Powlett, rancher and farmer; and that this is to be a body corporate and politic under the name of Canadian Co-operative Processors Limited. This is to be a million-dollar company, but I presume that is not the money of these individuals. I am not quite sure whether it is the money of the province of Saskatchewan, though from what I see in the press from day to day it may be that they are playing around with the money of the province rather than with their own money. However I do not think it is either; I believe it must come from some other group, so that perhaps the sponsor will tell us whence the million dollars will come and to whom the interest will be paid in the final analysis.

[The Acting Speaker.]

Mr. MAYBANK: I did not quite understand what the hon. gentleman desired when he asked for an explanation. It is true that this appears to be an ordinary share of capital proposition, but as hon. members will see further along in the bill it is not an ordinary joint stock company that is being organized. The shares of $1 each will be subscribed as any other shares are subscribed, it is true, but I believe the money will come from various people who deal with the organization. They do not, however, pay money dividends but dividends upon patronage; and the whole set-up is of a co-operative nature.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): As I say, this is the first time I have seen the bill; perhaps that is my fault. The shares are listed at $1 each; and among other things the company is being formed to purchase or acquire the undertaking carried on by the Horse Co-operative Marketing Association Limited. In the first place, shares at $1 each will not pay for the horses. Then the company is to carry on "the business of producing, collecting, buying, receiving, handling, feeding, slaughtering, processing, transporting, grading, selling, marketing, dealing in, with or without taking title thereto, livestock and livestock products."

This has reference particularly to the handling of horses. From my experience of some thirty or forty years, I should say that today some money may be made in the handling of horses for slaughter, for human consumption. Perhaps thirty thousand of them have gone through hands for which I was responsible during the last three decades, and today I believe some real dividends or returns might be made on an investment of a million dollars. That condition will not last long, however, because I believe the day of the horse is past. In the west I understand that horses are being slaughtered at the rate of two or three hundred a day, and soon they will be all gone. For the benefit of those who may be asked to invest in this company, I say that today, and for perhaps another year or two, your money will return dividends; but these horses are going to be shot, processed for human consumption and shipped to Europe.

Not long ago I think the hon. member for Swift Current brought us a sample of this horsemeat, to look at or eat if we felt so disposed. I can tell the hon. gentleman that as far back as 1932 I had the pleasure of eating horsemeat in Rotterdam, Holland, so that in common with a few other hon. members I may know something about it. I can remember in my younger days that in one short year I shot ten thousand horses and turned them into pickled beef, the sort of meat that was served at a banquet in Swift Current not many moons ago. You enjoyed it, too; it was good food. It is good food for our friends in Europe who today are starving. So I say more power to you in the development of this co-operative organization incorporated under this bill. It would be a great thing for Canada to get rid of those horses, which are eating the grass off our cattle ranges. Then we could put cattle in their place.

But that is not my purpose in rising this evening. Just now we are ready for the harvest in making real money out of the slaughter of horses, and for several reasons. First, the people of Europe are hungry. The people of Europe are anxious for beef, meat and food. The people of Europe enjoy eating horsemeat.

As a matter of fact, I remember being in Holland in 1932. The first course we had at our meal was cheese and crackers. Then we had lemon pie; and the last and best course was horsemeat. I had that in Amsterdam. It was served as the last and perhaps the best of the three courses served in a full-course meal.

It is to the general advantage of Canada to get rid of these horses. Perhaps I might take a minute more of the time of the committee, and in doing so I shall make sure that my hon. friend has an opportunity to have his bill passed before the hour expires. In the old days, back in 1925, 1926 or 1927 we let horses run off the range, right up to the far north as far as the Thompson river, and Kamloops. We chased them all down through the foothills of the Rockies and across the border to the state of Montana, I believe it was. Swartz Brothers had planned the slaughtering of 10,000 horses a year south of the border; and these horses traversed the border free of charge. This firm, in turn, slaughtered them and manufactured them into edible horse beef which, in turn, was shipped to Holland. Holland was the central point for the market. Holland sent the horse beef into Belgium and into Germany at prices f.o.b. Rotterdam which were at least ten to twenty per cent higher than prices existing in Rotterdam for ordinary cow beef. In other words, horse beef sold at a premium on the European market over cow beef.

Part of the reason for the premium was this, that quarters of horse beef properly cured and properly taken care of by those who know how to handle horsemeat, and who handle it in a manner similar to that in which we handle moose meat, were placed on the market. Instead of cutting a cross-section of the meat, as you do with beef cattle, you follow down the seam and pull out eight or nine-pound chunks of horsemeat covered by muscular film which encloses those eight or nine pounds, leaving that muscular film around those eight or nine pounds, and then pickling, curing and packing it, and shipping it to Europe where, in turn, it is smoked in large warehouses in Rotterdam and Amsterdam. You leave that muscular membrane around the eight or nine pounds of shoulder, ham or some other part of the horsemeat, and you find—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I shall have finished in a minute.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We are now discussing section 1 of the bill, which deals with incorporation.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and I shall stick religiously to section 1. Before section 1 is the preamble, which prays that this petition be granted. It is a petition pertaining to the persons hereinafter mentioned, and I am referring to those persons hereinafter mentioned. And the persons to whom I am referring are those who are incorporating. These are the persons, sir, who have the great idea that not only will this be for the well-being of the people of Canada, but that it will be for the greater advantage of Canada.

Let me say to the persons who are mentioned in the preamble and in section 1 that I am referring to the product in question, prepared as I have tried to illustrate in what I have said thus far. I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, realizing that I cannot go much farther in discussing that phase of the matter.

Let me add this one sentence, however, that I have seen in scores of farmers' back kitchens in Holland, Belgium and Germany four, five, six, seven, eight or nine-pound chunks of horsemeat, smoked, hanging in those back kitchens. And when the labourer, the breadwinner, went out to work he would have a loaf of rye bread under his arm, and his dear wife would pull down these eight or nine-pound smoked hams.

Probably they were from Canada, but they were shipped from the United States. She would cut off two or three slices; and with those two or three slices, along with that loaf of rye bread, he would go out and work for twelve hours. That is the man who, in the final analysis, will be affected here. These are the men who are praying for this petition in the preamble and in section 1 of the bill. But I wish to warn the committee that the supply of horsemeat in not inexhaustible. The day will come when there will not be as many of these horses available. And I want to warn the committee that that day may be already here, when those who consume this product, in connection with this million-dollar investment, will not want to buy from Canada; and this, for a very simple reason I should like to state in two or three sentences, namely, that they remember that in 1932 the empire trade pacts were passed, at which time Canada took away from the people in Holland and in Belgium what is commonly known as the pig market, or the meat market adjacent to them in London. At that time the market was given to us in Canada.

Therefore they in turn will buy their horsemeat, and the products I have mentioned, from the United States, in preference to buying it from Canada. That is why the condition is such today, and has been ever since the empire trade agreements.

The petitioners in the preamble to this bill may have great ideas about how much money they will make out of this million-dollar investment—from a province, by the way, which I did not think was asking for outside investments. I think it is our duty to warn them that in the days to come they might not make as much profit out of this venture as they might be making now, when there is a shortage of foodstuffs throughout the world.

Mr. JACKMAN: I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the sponsor of the bill might have made some explanatory remarks when he was introducing it. I should like to know a little more about it before it passes. Perhaps the questions which have come to my mind as I have read it over for the first time might be easily answered; but I think the sponsor should say a few words about it.

May I ask him why a joint stock company will not suffice for this particular form of organization, and why they have asked for a special act of parliament.

Secondly, I would ask him why the present charter, which I presume is a provincial one, is not adequate for the purposes of this particular organization.

Thirdly, I suggest that either this committee of the whole or some committee to which the bill should be referred ought to go into the matter of how this company is being taxed or is allowed to be free of taxation; because in recent years this particular business which the company carries on has grown to a substantial size.

I shall not discuss the sections of the bill individually, but I would point out that they contain peculiar powers; and I should—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We are now discussing section 1.

Mr. JACKMAN: Yes, incorporation. I should like to ask if this bill was before the committee of banking and commerce of the other hon. house.

[Mr. Harris (Danforth).]

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member had been in the house a few minutes ago he would have heard the bill referred to the committee of the whole. It was referred to this committee, and we are now dealing with section 1.

Mr. JACKMAN: I would still ask the sponsor of the bill to give us an outline of the reasons why they seek incorporation under a special act of parliament.

Mr. MAYBANK: If I understand the questions, the first one was this: Why will not a joint company charter under the ordinary laws of Manitoba or perhaps under the laws of Canada or those of the Secretary of State suffice for what is desired here? The answer is that these statutes do not provide for co-operative concerns of the sort this company is. That has been gone into carefully by competent legal authorities and they have concluded that the legislation simply is not there for them.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I ask—

Mr. MAYBANK: May I just answer the second question, and then the hon. member can go on with the eighth, ninth and tenth? As I recall the second question, the hon. member wanted to know why Saskatchewan incorporation was not sufficient. Had this co-operative organization been carrying on business only in Saskatchewan, then a Saskatchewan incorporation would have been sufficient because they have a statute in Saskatchewan which permits the setting up of this type of organization.

They have been running into some difficulty with regard to doing business in Alberta, to which province they expanded some years ago. They are doing quite a bit of business there. Alberta has been co-operating with them and allowing them to carry on, but that province is doubtful whether its laws permit the registration of an organization of this kind built up under the Saskatchewan statute to which I referred. Similarly, they have been experiencing questions in this respect in Manitoba, although the amount of business there has been relatively small. For these and other similar reasons they have concluded that the only way in which they can carry on in all the provinces is to obtain dominion incorporation.

The question of taxation has been raised, and the answer simply is that, whatever are the laws with respect to co-operative organizations, this organization will be under those laws. If there is no taxation of co-operatives, they will not be taxed; if there is, they will be taxed. If they come within the class of those who do pay a tax, then of course the tax will be paid just the same as by any other co-operative.

I can quite understand hon. gentlemen who do not like co-operatives endeavouring to prevent incorporation of them, and I am not referring especially to my hon. friend who has just spoken. I say that can be understood, but surely we in this parliament, when dealing with an organization which is a co-operative—

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The hon. member is imputing a motive to hon. members of this house.

Mr. MAYBANK: I made no reference to the hon. member for Danforth.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I ask for a ruling on my point of order. Will you give me a ruling on my point of order, Mr. Chairman? My hon. friend is imputing motives to other hon. members of this house by saying that other hon. members may be opposed to co-operatives.

Mr. MAYBANK: I did not say that at all; I did not impute motives to any hon. member of this house. I said it could be understood that persons who did not like co-operatives would not like to see them incorporated. There was no reference, for example—

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I would like the hon. member to state who those persons are so that any imputation of motive may be withdrawn from any hon. member.

Mr. MAYBANK: Let us clear it up. If there has been any imputation of motives contrary to the rules of the house of which I am guilty, I withdraw the alleged imputation but I deny the allegation.

On the whole, the co-operative organizations which have been springing up all over the country are a good thing for the Dominion of Canada. While I do not go as far as some who say that it would be well if all business were conducted in that way, I think this House of Commons will take the position that it is desirable to give leave to operators to operate and to help them in every way possible. There may be differences of opinion as to just what is the best way of doing it, but I am sure that it will be considered the best part of wisdom to encourage co-operatives and not to refuse or delay charters to such organizations.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: If hon. members will read the clause under discussion—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. JACKMAN: The hon. member has told us why this particular organization could not seek incorporation in one of the western provinces; but why could it not seek incorporation under the ordinary law of the Dominion of Canada? How is it that the ordinary co-operative is able to function without a special act of parliament?

Mr. MAYBANK: The answer is that the matter has been taken up with the Secretary of State and there is no dominion law under which this sort of incorporation could be had, or of co-operatives generally.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I ask if every co-operative has to have a special act of parliament to be brought into being?

Mr. MAYBANK: I cannot answer that, because the hon. member is taking in too much territory.

Mr. JACKMAN: The hon. member seems to indicate that this company cannot do it; therefore no other company can seek incorporation under the ordinary law. The only deduction to be drawn, with which you must agree, is that every co-operative must have a special act of parliament.

Mr. MAYBANK: Could be.

Mr. JACKMAN: I think someone should answer that.

Mr. BENTLEY: That question can be answered. Until there is a dominion co-operative act, any co-operative association that desires to operate throughout the dominion will have to get an act through this house.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Capital.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Perhaps the sponsor of this bill, or even better the hon. member for Swift Current, can tell me about this section 3, which reads:

> The capital stock of the company shall be one million dollars of common stock divided into one million shares of one dollar each.

Can the hon. member tell me if any of that stock has been subscribed up to the moment, and by whom? Where is it proposed to get this stock? Where do they propose to get $1,000,000 and why do they want $1,000,000?

Mr. MAYBANK: If I understood the questions correctly, the first one was whether any part of this million dollars has been subscribed. I presume not. I do not see how they could subscribe to a not yet existent organization. I do not know whether that was the question asked, but if it was that would be the answer I would give. Sometimes the hon. member speaks clearly and stentoriously and it is a pleasure to listen to him, but at other times his voice is very low and one does not always hear him.

I think another question was where the $1,000,000 was to come from. It is to come from those who subscribe it; that is all.

I think the other question was why they wanted $1,000,000. I suppose the answer to that is that a company would make arrangements for capitalization up to a certain amount; but, as we all know, they do not have to have it all subscribed before they can do business. As I recall, ten per cent must be put up in cash. They would be governed by the usual laws of Saskatchewan, Manitoba, British Columbia or any other province, the usual public utility laws governing stock subscriptions.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): My hon. friend is having some difficulty with regard to the scale through which my quiet words range. I will raise it to a little higher pitch and I hope he hears what I am trying to say. Perhaps if I go more slowly he will be able to absorb the questions which I am trying to ask. What is the use of my hon. friend rising in his place and saying that there is no particular investment here?

Mr. MAYBANK: I did not say that.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I ask my hon. friend the member for Swift Current to be a witness when I say there is a substantial investment in this same enterprise in Swift Current which is being extended to Edmonton and Alberta. I know whereof I speak because I have been privileged to sign some cheques for their by-products. There must be a substantial investment in this enterprise, and for the sponsor of the bill to intimate to the hon. member for Swift Current or even to the disinterested hon. member for Danforth that there is no substantial investment there, and that this is something new for which they are asking $1,000,000 is all eyewash.

Mr. MAYBANK: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The statements my hon. friend are attributing to me are entirely incorrect. I did not state the sort of thing he is declaring I stated. He is just in error. I made no such statement.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Chairman, I am in the same position as my hon. friend who has just taken his seat; I did not hear what he said. I reiterate the statement I made a moment ago. The investment is not only there now to the tune of $90,000, but I know that forty or fifty carloads of by-products have been sold by this organization within the last twenty-four months. Of that I do not complain. I say that is for the general advantage of Canada. But to leave the impression on this assembly that this is not a large and going concern, when it has been going for some twenty-four months or more—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): It is not carried. I say, Mr. Chairman, that is giving a wrong impression to the committee.

Mr. WHITMAN: Hear, hear.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): With all due respect to my hon. friend, he does not know what he is thinking about, much less what he is talking about; and when you do not know what you are talking about, keep quiet. It so happens that I know and the hon. member for Swift Current knows the facts, and I would like to smoke out the hon. member for Swift Current. I will back him up on the great job that Swift Current and this organization are doing for the well-being of Canada. The hon. member for Swift Current probably knows a great deal more about this than the hon. gentleman who is sponsoring the bill, and I would like to smoke out the hon. member for Swift Current. I wish there was time for him to get up and tell the story, and if he does, I will correct him where he makes an error.

Do not be in a hurry, Mr. Chairman, because it is not my purpose to talk this bill out. My only purpose is that the members of this house shall be honest with themselves and vote honestly. The only question I am asking the sponsor of the bill is this: Who will have this million dollar share to play around with in the next decade. If people want to invest their money in this enterprise, that is their business; but those who are charged with representing the people of Canada, like the hon. member for Swift Current and myself, have the responsibility of being honest with the house.

When we look forward to what may happen in the next ten years and see some danger perhaps to the investment of this $1,000,000, shall we not rise in our places and say to our people: Be a bit careful. It is all right to make money today, but the mares may not be coming forward with colts in the same numbers as when you and I were young Maggie, and where are you going to get the dividends to pay on this $1,000,000? I hope the $1,000,000 comes from Saskatchewan to teach them something about co-operatives, and I hope it will teach the people of the rest of Canada to be a little slow about venturing into a line of business which, in the course of the next ten years, may not pay dividends.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Objects.

Mr. JACKMAN: Paragraph (e) reads:

(e) purchase or redeem and re-issue shares of the company, provided that such purchase or redemption shall not reduce the number of shareholders to less than five; provided further, that the powers of purchase or redemption of shares shall not be exercised when the liabilities of the company exceed fifty per cent of the value of its assets.

What I want to be certain of, and others I am sure, is this. Why is this very peculiar power being asked for that the company shall not reduce the number of shareholders to less than five? Also, what would happen to the assets of the company if the business were wound up, as the hon. member for Danforth suggests might happen if there were no product for the company to work upon? I should be interested in having an answer.

Section stands.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): The hour for private bills having expired, the house will revert to the business before six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Production services—Health of animals—

17. Administration of Animal Contagious Diseases Act, and Meat and Canned Foods Act, $2,611,508.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I am not criticizing this vote, because I know it is necessary, but I want to ask a question which has to do with the estimates generally and which is of importance to the people of Canada. I notice that the amount for temporary assistance is increased by something like $121,000. That may be necessary; I do not know. Would it not be possible for the Department of Agriculture to submit its monthly payroll to the bureau of statistics, showing the number of employees and the amounts paid for their services, so that the people of Canada would know whether economy was being exercised throughout the service? It would be a check on the spending of the government. As I say, there is an increase of $121,000 for temporary assistance. Yet the minister was able to get on with less than that during the war. So many of these items for temporary assistance throughout the service are increasing. Session after session I have asked for a return showing the number of employees in the government service and the wages paid monthly. We get them some time after. I wonder if the government has not some system of accounting so that it can keep up to date from month to month. Perhaps reports could come from the bureau of statistics so that the people would know what is going on.

Mr. GARDINER: The temporary employees in connection with this vote are largely the part-time veterinarians in the country who are checking cattle for tuberculosis. I think it will be admitted by all hon. members who have been following the discussions that it is the wish of most members of the committee that there should be more rather than fewer of these men. As a matter of fact, we are hiring all we can find and putting them on work that has to be done, and that necessitates higher payments in salaries and expense accounts.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That does not answer the question. I said I was not criticizing. I heard the debate in the house the other night when some hon. gentlemen who know all about this matter asked for more men. What I am asking is that there be a report not only from the minister's department but from all the departments, submitted once a month, showing the number of employees in the various services and also the amount of money paid by way of salaries and wages by the department. That would provide a check on expenditures. I think the public would like to know the numbers. We never hear this until the budget comes on. That is the only time we get the comparison from year to year. When one asks for such returns it usually takes two or three months to get the reply, and that does not seem right to me. With civil servants in the department, a report such as I speak of could be got right out, without trouble, by a well administered department. They ought to have some idea of the monthly payroll if they pay the bills. They must know how many people there are employed. That would provide a check on expenditures from time to time.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course, as the hon. member has intimated, there is a paylist every month and it shows the numbers. It can be taken off that. One of the difficulties in getting returns out in answer to questions is the difficulty I have experienced. A few days ago I brought down a return, which hon. members will find in Hansard, stating the number of employees we have in the Department of Agriculture. It starts back in 1912 or thereabouts. There was a question as to how many we had that year, how many we had, say in 1915, in 1920, in 1930 and so on. Records were not kept in the same way back in 1912 as they are today, and it is difficult to bring down in a short time an answer which is comparable for the different years, though there is no difficulty in bringing it down to the end of last year or the last month for which the records have been made up. That can be done on short notice, and a statement of the kind that has been suggested is possible at the end of any month, as to what the paylist is.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have these records going back for some time. I always ask for one every year to bring it up to date. But even so, it takes two or three months to get the return. I ask for a return and it takes two or three months to get it. It would be a good idea to have a return made once a month for all departments. It might come a month late, but it would not involve a great deal of work. You have the payrolls every month and the number of people employed during that month, and it would give some indication as to whether there was economy in the department or not. I am not criticizing the number of people the minister has employed as temporaries, because I do not know enough about the matter. Some members have been asking for more on account of certain tests, and I am not criticizing that, but I say that the public would like to have these statistics month by month.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): This vote covers all items under No. 17. I am not rising to express any particular criticism. Rather, I shall try to enunciate an idea which I think will be for the general advantage of Canada. This item for the administration of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act covers the feeding of swine with garbage, does it not? This covers matters relating to hog cholera?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Hog cholera in the areas surrounding our cities is, as the minister knows, a serious matter. Herds of from 100 to 1,000 are often wiped out in forty-eight hours or less. During the last thirty years the department has done a good job in the inspection of these feeding establishments. With hogs selling at present-day prices, these feeding establishments are a popular line of endeavour for some of our people to get into, particularly those who have returned from the last war. I know of three young men, a major, a sergeant and another returned man, who invested their entire savings during the war in a venture of this kind.

The department is doing a good job in the inspection of such premises, the owners of which undertake to feed refuse or garbage from the large centres of population, and I encourage them in this, but I would ask the minister to look up the records and put on Hansard the incidence of hog cholera in the suburban areas surrounding our large cities.

Naturally I am thinking more particularly of the city of Toronto; but I am also thinking of Ottawa, where there is a sizeable industry in the feeding of hogs on garbage collected in the city, and I am also thinking of Calgary. I wish the minister would be good enough to put on the record the incidence of hog cholera in Canada. We go along for four or five or six years with very little hog cholera, and suddenly it breaks out in the maritime provinces or western Canada or Ontario or western Ontario—out Chatham way and Windsor way —and these outbreaks will wipe out the entire investment of hog feeders in different parts of the country.

The feeding of hogs on garbage is for the general advantage of Canada, because the production of hogs by that means is of real magnitude in the output of hog products in the country. I would ask the minister to put on the record the figures in regard to hog cholera outbreaks during the last year, let us say, for the guidance of those who are investing money in the business of which I have spoken.

Mr. GARDINER: As my hon. friend knows, those who feed garbage are licensed. The number of licensed feeders across Canada is 579, and the approximate number of hogs fed is 52,750. Of course instructions go out for the cooking of the garbage; and I am informed that if they are carefully followed, and if the feeding lots or pens are kept in the condition required by the regulation and no outside contact is permitted, it is possible to avoid having hog cholera. It has been suggested that I put on the record what has happened in connection with it. How many years back would the hon. member like me to go?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Just a couple.

Mr. GARDINER: For 1947 there has been none. There was one outbreak in 1946-47, and forty-four hogs were involved. That was in Ontario. In 1945-46 there was one outbreak in Nova Scotia with 184 hogs involved; there were two outbreaks in Ontario, with forty-four hogs involved. For the three or four years prior to that, there was a great prevalence of hog cholera. The most difficult year was 1941-42 when there were three outbreaks in Nova Scotia, with 406 hogs involved. In New Brunswick there were three outbreaks, with 186 hogs involved. In Quebec there were nine outbreaks with 1,044 hogs involved. In Ontario, there were fifteen outbreaks with 6,437 hogs involved. In Manitoba there were eleven outbreaks, with 619 hogs involved. There has been none since 1942 in Quebec. There has been none in Saskatchewan since 1940. There has been none in New Brunswick since 1944-45, none in Nova Scotia in 1946 or 1947, and none at all in Canada last year.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I want to thank the minister for the information he has given. I should like to makes one observation for the benefit of the record. During the last five or six years there has been a great advertising campaign carried on over every radio station to which one listened, with regard to using more soap and more detergents of one kind and another. For the benefit of the minister's department, I am asking it now to do some research work on the question I am about to raise.

In washing down the dishes, thousands of pounds of cleansers of one kind of another and thousands of pounds of soap and alkalis of one kind or another find their way into the garbage can and from the garbage can, after being properly handled, into the systems of these 50,000 hogs. In the days to come, in the next decade, those 50,000 hogs the minister told us about, which are being produced every year, will get more and more doses of alkalis and soaps. I am asking the department to study this problem, to do some research work and to give some advice to these 1,044 hog feeders across Canada in the handling of their garbage before they feed it to the hogs, so that Canada's economy may be implemented by the production of 50,000 hogs from this garbage.

Mr. GARDINER: We shall be pleased to have that matter looked into.

Mr. HLYNKA: In view of the shortage of veterinarians in Canada, what possibilities are there for the utilization of the services of veterinary surgeons who recently arrived in Canada as displaced persons? I understand that a number of them are graduates of various universities in Europe, but that they find it difficult to obtain permission to practise their profession. One of these young men wrote to me and told me that he took this matter up with the provincial authorities in Manitoba and also with the university there, but was told that, before he would be allowed to practise his profession, he would have to write an examination that the Department of Agriculture in Ottawa prepared. Is that right?

I should also like to ask this question. Most of these young men do not yet speak the English language. Would there be any possibility of arranging an examination in the language which they understand? I do not think these men should be held back if there is a shortage of veterinary surgeons. They do not necessarily have to speak perfect English to understand the cows. I am sure that they could render good service to this country. What procedure could these young men follow in order to be able to find some employment in their particular line?

Mr. GARDINER: We have been making some study of the possibility of getting veterinarians from D.P. camps and elsewhere; as a matter of fact, we have made a check on the number that are in the camps, the number who speak English and the number who speak other languages. I quite realize that there are certain sections of western Canada, particularly in the rural areas, where it would probably be an advantage to be able to speak some other language as well as English, or probably even to speak some other language even if unable to speak English.

But that is not the deciding factor. The deciding factor is whether or not the person is a veterinary and has graduated from an institution which is recognized in Canada as being of as high a standard as that of the two institutions we have here. If so, and if they have passed examinations in those institutions which are recognized as being of equal standing with ours, then they have a right to register here and will be dealt with in the same manner as persons coming in from any other country would be dealt with at any other time. Up to now there are none that we know of who have been registered in any of the provinces. But we have been doing something about the matter ourselves with the idea of encouraging them rather than otherwise. We have had these lists, as I say, and we have been negotiating with the associations and otherwise to try to get some of these men out, because we want the work done.

Mr. HLYNKA: I know two persons who arrived recently. One is a young man and the other is a young girl. Both are graduates of European universities in that profession, and both, of course, do not speak the English language well enough to be able to write an examination. Could these examinations be arranged in the languages which they speak; and would that have to be done through the colleges or the provincial department of agriculture?

Mr. GARDINER: Of course the difficulty in connection with that is largely involved in what the provinces themselves would require. I imagine it would be possible for the western provinces to find persons who could examine these people in their own language. But if that were not possible, then, of course, an examination would require to be conducted in English. The main point upon which the authorities will have to be satisfied is the standing of the university from which these persons received their graduation; and an examination of the courses that are given there I think would make it possible for a qualified person here to determine whether they had been fully instructed. But even after that, it might be required that there be some examination written in the province in order that they might be admitted. If that were true, I think it would either have to be in English, or they would have to be able to secure someone who could set the papers and examine them in their own language.

Mr. DROPE: Now that the city members have exhausted their questions, there may be a chance for someone from rural Ontario to ask one. Is the department making any progress in regard to the T.B. testing of cattle? As far as Northumberland is concerned, some attempt at checking was made last year, after the tests had been discontinued for many years; but, as far as I can ascertain, not even a township was completed. It was a hit-or-miss program. They did parts of townships, apparently with no idea of cleaning up any of them at all; but, as far as I can find out, nothing has been even started this year. So I would ask the minister if there is any intention of completing that county this year, or what his policy is in that regard.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that they started to inspect there in August of 1947. They have been doing their best with the men at their disposal. I understand that the test is not completed, but it will be completed at the earliest possible day the men can be made available.

Mr. CHARLTON: A moment ago the minister intimated that the D.P. situation had been thought about by the department. I wonder just how far they have gone in that regard, whether anything definite has come out of that investigation, or whether any decision has been reached.

[Mr. Hlynka.]

Mr. GARDINER: My information is that the matter has been discussed by the Ontario and Quebec associations, and perhaps some of the others, but no final decision has been reached from the point of view of the associations, as far as we know. We have been keeping as closely in touch with it as possible, but up to the moment there has been no final decision.

Mr. CHARLTON: All the associations are being asked for advice.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not so certain their advice has been asked, but I understand that some have been discussing the matter on their own initiative, and some at our request.

Mr. STEPHENSON: During the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I asked if there had been any increase in the number of veterinarians in Ontario, and also whether any increases in remuneration had been offered veterinary inspectors in order to attract more men into the service. I should like to ask also whether there has been any increase in the compensation paid when animals have to be destroyed. Further, I want to ask whether it is necessary to follow through on all the red tape when the department hires a veterinarian for part-time work. I am told by private veterinarians back home that they have to make out so many reports for the department that they become exasperated and say, "Well, if we have to do this we would just as soon not bother with departmental work". Then in 1946, again in 1947 and again this year, I was promised that a re-test would be carried out in Durham county, but as yet that has not been done. Can the minister say when this test will be commenced?

Mr. GARDINER: As to the pay of veterinarians, the hon. member will find that the other evening I put all that information on record, and indicated that there had been a considerable increase in the pay. I do not think it necessary to go all over that matter again tonight.

As to the returns, it depends a great deal upon the work the veterinarians are able to drum up for themselves, as to whether or not they are anxious to do this kind of work. A few years ago I was plagued in season and out by veterinarians all over the country who wanted to work for the government. Now they are not quite so keen. The reason is, of course, obvious, now that there is more money in livestock. A person is more likely to call in a veterinarian to save an animal when it is worth $200 than he would be when it was worth only $20, and that has altered the situation materially. But when you are making reports on animals being checked for T.B. you must have records. There is no possibility of accepting anything but complete records, because otherwise they do not mean anything. Or if you are checking animals for Bang's disease or T.B., before they are sent to the United States, complete reports are necessary. Anyone who does not want to make out those reports is not of much use. It would not pay us to have these people do part-time work if they did not give us complete reports. We must have full reports, and anyone not prepared to make them cannot be employed part-time.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Then can the minister tell me when the test will be commenced in Durham county?

Mr. GARDINER: Durham was first tested in 1936. Some 38,900 cattle were tested and the reactors numbered 2,483, or 7·3 per cent. It was rechecked in 1943, when 44,286 cattle were tested with only 184 reactors, or ·41 per cent, which is not a bad record. They should have been retested in 1947, but up to the present we have not had a staff sufficiently large to permit us to carry out that recheck. In the light of the check of 1943, I should not think conditions there would be bad at the present time.

Mr. CHARLTON: Last Friday evening the minister said he thought there would not be more than four or five graduates coming into the service this year. Has he anything more definite to tell us now?

Mr. GARDINER: No, I have nothing more definite than that. We can only guess even at the four or five.

Mr. CHARLTON: You have had no applications at all?

Mr. GARDINER: Not beyond that number.

Mr. CHARLTON: You have had four or five applications?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. That is as near as we can give it to you, just offhand.

18. Compensation for animals slaughtered, $507,845.

Mr. BRADSHAW: May I ask the minister if this increase represents a greater amount to be paid per head, or simply an increase in the amount of work?

Mr. GARDINER: There is no increase per head. It is an increase in the total amount to be paid out. In other words, more inspections are being made and more money will be required.

Mr. BRADSHAW: Since our county is under test, I want to point out to the minister that the farmers have a real grievance in regard to the compensation being paid. It does not seem to be enough. The total expenditure on agriculture in this country is far short of what I think it should be. From time to time it has been said of some departments of the government that Canada is doing more than any other country. I want to point out that in the United States the appropriation for agriculture is $1,247 million. We are about one-twelfth the size of the United States; therefore we should devote about $100 million to agriculture. Last year we spent a measly $28 million, and this year it will be something like $41,810,000. I am not advocating that we should spend $100 million on agriculture, but I am suggesting that in some particular cases we should spend more money.

The young farmer who has bought a herd, or the veteran who has bought a herd, and loses it, is not getting a proper compensation at this amount per head. The minister has pointed out that the value of the beef at the present time compensates in this matter. But I would point out that, in respect of the dairy herd, the farmer whose herd goes down is not the seller, because those animals are sent to the slaughterhouse where the packer becomes the buyer and the seller, and the farmer gets just what they give him. In that respect he does not receive proper remuneration for the value of his milk cows. I would urge that this compensation be raised to at least a comparative figure to compensate these people for their loss.

Mr. GARDINER: The position is that there has been no inclination to change these amounts as prices go up and down. I must say, however, that the compensation has been higher in the past at times than it is now. It was higher back about 1918, about the end of the first war when, I presume for the reasons now being stated, prices of cattle were higher.

But we have hesitated to change the amounts up and down any more than is absolutely necessary, because there is always the question as to whether people need more money when the valuations are low than they do when they are high. People who are getting only $20 for the animal perhaps need $100 more, when it is worth only $20 in somebody's market, than they do when they can get $100 for what is left, for what they could sell, in addition to whatever remuneration they could get. Speaking personally, the last animal I had that went down I marketed in the city of London, and I got $105 for it. I did not collect anything from the government on it; but I could have collected for a purebred animal two-thirds of $150. That would not be bad if you could get two-thirds of $150, and then get $105 in addition. The higher the value of the animal, the more likely you are to be able to get a reasonable return. Many of these animals which go down have only a gland in the neck, or something of that kind, which shows reaction. When that is cut out, the remainder of the animal can be utilized quite safely, and the animal is sold.

However I know there are cases such as those mentioned a moment ago, where there are dairy cattle which perhaps are not very useful for meat purposes, and very little can be obtained for them. They are put into tankage, and it does not bring much to the individual. All I can say is that we shall look into the matter, check what has been done over the years, and see whether any adjustment can be made.

19. Livestock and poultry, $1,022,390.

Mr. PEARKES: Mr. Chairman, recent events have brought handicaps to the poultry industry in British Columbia. I crave the indulgence of the committee for a few moments to explain the growth of that industry, the difficulties under which it labours, and to ask the minister if he is prepared to offer any solution, so that confidence may be restored in the industry.

During the past six or seven years the government has encouraged people on the Pacific seaboard to go into the poultry business. There have been representatives from the federal government and representatives from the British food interests urging small farmers to increase their flocks and to construct additional houses.

To give some idea of the enormous growth in the poultry industry as a result of the impetus given by the government, let me point out that, while in 1939 the value of the egg crop in British Columbia was something over $4 million, in 1947 it had increased to almost $16 million.

A few years ago the amount of eggs produced n British Columbia was only one-tenth of hat produced in Ontario. We are now producing one-third and the industry in British Columbia has become second only to that in Ontario. However, in addition to egg production, the production of dressed poultry has increased tremendously. I believe last year something like 12,000,000 pounds of dressed poultry were shipped to Great Britain. I know that even within the last few months carloads of turkeys and dressed chickens have been shipped to points throughout Canada and to the United States. In so far as breeding stock is concerned, shipments of chicks and poults to other parts of Canada have been given a new impetus, as a result really for the first time of the movement of these day-old chicks and poults by air. This remarkable achievement has been accomplished largely through the assistance given by the government.

In 1942 the government offered assistance to the poultrymen of British Columbia by a freight assistance policy. Last year, according to the figures I have, over 100,000 tons of wheat, 33,000 tons of mill feeds and 46,000 tons of barley were sent into British Columbia, on which freight assistance was given. Now we find the ceiling has been removed from the price of that feed grain going to the poultrymen of British Columbia. Before that ceiling was removed, however, the British Columbia poultry industry agreed to sell twenty-five per cent of its entire production of eggs to Great Britain at the definite price of 36½ cents per dozen for eggs in the spring, this price to increase to 43½ cents per dozen on September 1. Although the price remains the same, the cost of production has gone up, largely due to the removal of the ceiling price on feed grains.

Not only that, but as everybody knows, in the last few weeks freight rates have been increased; and, as has been pointed out many times in the house, this affects British Columbia particularly because of the unsatisfactory mountain differential. In addition to that, costs of other materials, such as lumber required to go into the construction of breeding pens, houses and the like, have gone up. The result of that is that egg production this year is estimated to drop by something like sixty-six per cent. I believe those were the figures given by Professor Lloyd of the poultry division of the University of British Columbia. The British Columbia poultry industries council have asked that a subsidy be placed upon eggs in order that confidence may be restored. I do not know whether that is possible or whether that is the intention of the government, but I think the minister is aware of the difficulties facing the poultrymen of British Columbia and I would appreciate it if he could indicate what is to be done.

Mr. GARDINER: There has been an increase in the return under the British contract. Beginning with January 1, the price of eggs was put up for the spring period. Then it dropped down for the period we have just entered, and it goes up again in September. As was suggested in the last few remarks of the hon. member, I met the British Columbia poultrymen's association last week when I was in Vancouver and they made representations with regard to their present position. I did not feel that I was in a position to consider properly the details with regard to all plans associated with the British contract and with the future, so I agreed to send out to British Columbia our chief poultryman, Mr. Brown, and I asked Mr. Shaw to accompany him.

Mr. Shaw is the director of marketing, and some of this could be better discussed under marketing when I shall have more information here. Mr. Shaw was to be along with Mr. Brown for this particular matter and also to make some check on the other difficulties related to British Columbia that we were discussing this afternoon.

My understanding is that what they desire to have done is to have the date in September when the price is increased under the contract advanced. I have reason for thinking Mr. Shaw and Mr. Brown will be able to make proposals to them which may be satisfactory; if not satisfactory, they will be helpful. They will be along the lines of their suggestion that the date be advanced and that some increase be allowed. This is not altogether to take care of increases in feed, although the price of wheat either has advanced or may advance in the period after the new crop comes in, as a result of wheat going up to $2 a bushel. That will have some effect upon the price at which wheat will be sold both for human consumption and for the feeding of livestock.

There will be some effect and probably that will be taken care of by advancing the date at which the increase in price will take place for eggs bought in the fall season, but in any event the men are out there discussing it with them. Whatever is applied there will be applied right across Canada.

20. Plant products—seeds, feeds, fertilizers, insecticides and fungicides control, including grant of $31,000 to Canadian seed growers' association, $963,764.

Mr. CHARLTON: I have a rather peculiar situation to bring to the attention of the minister. Item 61 in the auditor general's report for 1947 reads:

61. Vote 477.—Beginning in 1943-44, the agricultural supplies board entered into contracts with growers, under a plan styled "The Dominion Seed Program," to ensure adequate production of vegetable seeds. Seed produced by growers, but not disposed of by them, was purchased by the board and stored pending resale. The cost of seed thus purchased was $234,358.74, including freight and storage. Sales amounted to $9,615.25. Thus, $224,743.49 is invested in 208,898 pounds of unsold seed.

I figure that out at $1.07 a pound. Could the minister give us any information about that?

Mr. GARDINER: I am afraid I shall have to leave that until we reach item 47, special products board.

Mr. McCUAIG: What progress has been made in the development of chemical weed killer, especially in connection with field crops in the west?

Mr. GARDINER: I think the hon. member will realize from his own experiences that great strides have been made in the utilization of chemicals for the killing of weeds. The enormous distribution which is going on this year would indicate that farmers are convinced that this is a most effective method of dealing with weeds. We are following other activities and are carrying out experiments ourselves at Indian Head and elsewhere.

Mr. McCUAIG: I realize that the minister cannot keep in step with all developments, but this is of great importance to the west. You cannot kill weeds in our part of the country like you can in Ontario, because you do not get rain and they do not germinate. You have trouble when you summer-fallow and then put in your crop. Of course the chemical weed killer will kill the weeds and your crop comes along. I thought the minister might know just what supplies would be available and what would be the cost per acre. I understand that they are developing a machine.

Mr. GARDINER: Supplies are available, but I am sorry that I cannot give the cost per acre of utilizing this weed killer. I understand that demands are being met.

Mr. JUTRAS: There is one suggestion I should like to make. This weed killer can do more good than anything else to prevent weeds from developing along roadways and on properties that are not being used. Weeds often start in the west along highways and road allowances. Quite often the municipality or the province or the federal department do not look after these lands, and weeds develop and gradually move on to the fields. Manitoba intends to go into this work on a large scale. I mean spraying the road allowance or highways and preventing the weeds from spreading over the fields. I suggest to the federal government that if the provinces do that work it should co-operate and do the same thing on federal property.

Mr. WRIGHT: As the minister says, there will be a great extension this year of this type of summer-fallowing and of weed killing in western Canada. There are a number of formulae on the market, some of which are good and some of which may not be so good. The department would be well advised to check the formulae and issue information to the farmers who are using them as to their strength and usefulness. Otherwise I fear many people will be gypped. There has already been a large sale of these spraying appliances in western Canada. In the area I come from enough appliances have been sold to cover half the area with sprays of various kinds during the coming year. These formulae should be checked to see that they come up to certain standards, and information should be issued to the farmers as to their usefulness, or I am afraid somebody will be gypped this summer.

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the information readily available as I would have had earlier, because this really comes under scientific service. These formulae are checked. As a matter of fact, we have a publication out recommending the farmers to use one of three formulae. That publication can be obtained by anyone. It has already been widely circulated. I think the matter was fully discussed at the weed conference at Regina last January, and it was intimated then that this publication was available and that these checks had been made and that the department was in a position to recommend three different formulae as being effective.

Mr. WRIGHT: I hope that information will be given to all municipal councils if that has not already been done, so that they can give the information to their ratepayers. I think that is the best way of distributing information throughout western Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: I would think all the municipal offices in the west would be either on our mailing list or on the provincial lists. The way the information would go out would be through the provincial governments to their usual mailing lists, which I think cover all the municipal offices.

21. Grants to fairs and exhibitions, under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council and subject to allocation by the treasury board, $382,400.

Mr. FULTON: I had correspondence with the minister's department last year with respect to making a grant available for the winter show at Kamloops. I pointed out to the minister at that time that the Vancouver winter fair was not being held—it has not been held for a number of years—and we wondered whether some or all of the grant allotted to that fair could be made available for our winter fair at Kamloops, which is quite a big show. I see nothing here for that purpose. What is the present position?

Mr. GARDINER: The Kamloops show does not get a grant.

Mr. FULTON: Not for the winter show?

Mr. GARDINER: Kamloops is not really entitled to the special grant it gets now, because it is not a B fair. We are not supposed to give a grant to anything but A and B fairs, so that I think we have done very well by Kamloops.

Mr. FULTON: I do not see how you can say $900 is doing very well when you are prepared to give $5,000 to Vancouver which does not put on a winter fair at all. I understand that our winter fair is within the classification which would qualify it for a grant. You were prepared to pay $5,000 to Vancouver, which does not put on a winter fair.

Mr. GARDINER: No. Our position is that we have made agreements with different agricultural associations and societies covering, say ten years in such places as Vancouver where they have built a special building for fair purposes. During the war years it was not utilized for fair purposes, but we had to pay our share of the building costs as it came due. I do not think there is any case of our making a grant where there is not a fair, although there may have been some years when a fair was not held because of special circumstances.

Mr. FULTON: That is the point I am making. Here you have an item of $5,000 for Vancouver, which I understand was not paid last year because they did not hold a fair, and when we asked for a grant for the Christmas show in Kamloops we were told no, that the main winter show in British Columbia was supposed to be the Vancouver winter fair, for which there was an appropriation of $5,000. That fair was not held and has not been held since the war. I know the money was not paid last year, but the department took the position that that was the main winter fair in British Columbia and that they were prepared to grant it $5,000. I do not see why you should not make a smaller grant to Kamloops which continues to hold a winter fair.

Mr. GARDINER: There are three systems of grants. We pay grants to A and B class fairs, and the provincial governments pay to smaller fairs. My understanding is that Kamloops does not qualify for an A or B grant, but for some special reason we made them a grant. So far as I know, it is one of the few places, if not the only one, that get a grant under those circumstances. I think they are quite lucky to get it.

Mr. FULTON: That is a different matter altogether.

Mr. GARDINER: We could not pay them a grant on the other basis because they do not qualify.

Mr. FULTON: What about the winter fair?

Mr. GARDINER: It would not make any difference whether Vancouver held its fair or not. Vancouver can qualify if they do hold it, and we set aside $5,000 for that purpose. If they do not hold it we do not pay it.

Mr. FULTON: But I understand that our Christmas show qualifies.

Mr. GARDINER: If it qualifies it will get it.

Mr. FULTON: No, because we were told that the main winter fair in British Columbia was the Vancouver one. The correspondence went like this, that $5,000 had been authorized in the estimates for the Vancouver fair, and the department could not make a second grant available to Kamloops. In other words, Vancouver had the prior position. They did not hold their fair but we held ours, and I do not see why, so long as Vancouver does not hold its fair, we should not qualify for a grant for our Christmas show, leaving out altogether the question whether our spring show qualifies for a grant or not.

Mr. GARDINER: There are arrangements made right across Canada whereby certain districts get grants for winter fairs. The winter fair in British Columbia has been at Vancouver. There is a possibility that it might be changed from Vancouver to Kamloops, but that change will have to be made before we can pay a grant, and we would have to discontinue paying it to Vancouver. We may decide to do that. Up to the moment we have not decided to do it. I understand that representations have been made to the effect that it ought to be done. If that decision is made, that is what will be done, but until that decision is made we are not entitled to pay the grant to Kamloops.

28. Livestock and livestock products, $965,787.

Mr. CHARLTON: Has the minister taken into consideration the suggestion I made some time ago in regard to setting a price for hogs in the old country market under the British contract? That is important, in that, under the contract as stated by the minister, the price would not be set until some time this November or December. That, I contend, is not good enough, because the maximum price guaranteed for 1949, according to his own words, is only $25 a hundred, and with the production of pork going down as it is across Canada, I think the only hope of increasing production is to get a higher guaranteed price.

I suggested on the former occasion that the price should be set two years in advance, that there be a minimum and maximum price, a floor and a ceiling, and that it be reviewed each year. To give examples, I suggested previously a floor at $30 and a ceiling at $35. That is $5 better than the present floor which is guaranteed for 1949, and I believe the farmers would be satisfied to carry on and increase production on a floor near that. The floor would not necessarily be set at $30, but the price would be within a range of $5 between the floor and the ceiling. That should be for two years, and each year the price could be set at $32 or $33 or $34, somewhere within that range. It would give the farmer a better guarantee. Has the minister taken into consideration anything of that kind, and when will the price be set?

Mr. GARDINER: It is not a matter of taking it into consideration. Since 1939 we have been negotiating with the British off and on for many years on these contracts. We did endeavour for some considerable time to have the period increased from one year and were successful in getting it up to two years for a period. We did everything possible last December to have the price set for 1949. There must be two parties to any bargain, and the British absolutely refused to set the price for 1949 any further than to set the floor. I do not know what we can do beyond that. We will negotiate the price as soon as we can persuade the British to sit down with us and discuss it. As a rule, that has been done in the fall, some time after September, and I have some doubts as to whether they will negotiate it before that time this year. It is not a matter of what we want to do; it is a question of what the other parties wish to do in the negotiations.

Mr. CHARLTON: It is not setting a good example for forward contract prices, and it is not very promising for the next year's price if Britain has refused to go the two years. She wants to leave it until this fall, and we must suppose the price will be lowered considerably compared with what it was.

Mr. GARDINER: Do not suppose too much.

Mr. CHARLTON: It only proves that Britain is making sure she will not guarantee more than the world price. That is quite an admission on the minister's part.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not make such an admission, because I said, the last time we were discussing these estimates, that our price was higher than the United States price. Tonight the price in the United States is higher than ours. I do not know where it will be next week and no one else knows. It is going up and down, whereas our price is set. Their price depends on whether there is a strike on or not, and some other factors enter into it as well. I am not in a position to say where it will be by next August or September, but we do know that we have a guaranteed price until the end of December at the present rate, and it is a very high rate. I do not think anyone will dispute that.

I was looking at the records tonight giving our position and the United States position in regard to hogs. On the barley hog ratio ours has been at 19, and back in the period around the beginning of the war and prior to that it stood at 19 or 20. The United States corn hog ratio stood at 17 or 18. Their hog ratio stands at the present time at half that, 9. So that when you take into consideration the cost of feed on the United States side, as compared with the price of hogs, and take the cost of feed on this side of the line as compared with hogs, our position is twice as good as the position in the United States, considering that one factor.

Mr. CHARLTON: The price of feed is now practically twice as high over there. But the point is this. I do not care where the price is now. It is the price next year that I am interested in. The farmer is not worrying about the price at the moment.

Mr. GARDINER: I know.

Mr. CHARLTON: He is worrying about what the price will be next year.

Mr. GARDINER: You are worrying about the same thing that we are worrying about, but the other fellow is worrying too.

Mr. CHARLTON: He will not get increased production at that maximum price.

Mr. GARDINER: He is not asking us to increase it. We have more bacon now to supply Britain than Britain is prepared to take at the moment. Whether we shall have more in September I do not know.

Mr. CHARLTON: I think the minister does know if he will admit it. He knows very well. If you continue to do what you have been doing in the last three or four months the contract will be filled by September; but will you continue to carry on until September? I doubt it very much, and the minister will agree with me.

Mr. GARDINER: We have already made negotiations which result in more being delivered to Britain than the contract calls for. But what I am saying is that there are more hogs coming onto the market now week by week than the British contract takes; that is in addition to what we are consuming in Canada. We can sell them in the United States at the present time at prices a little better than to Britain, but if we do that we shall have to open the United States market for grain and we shall not be in a better position but in a worse one.

Mr. CHARLTON: There is no chance then of that price being negotiated sooner than November or December this year?

Mr. GARDINER: From September on.

Marketing service—

29. Marketing of agricultural products, including temporary appointments that may be required to be made notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, the amount available for such appointments not to exceed $6,000, $25,000.

Mr. WRIGHT: I wish to ask the minister a few questions with regard to the marketing of rape seed. What if any exports have there been of rape seed or rape seed oil to the United States or other countries during the past year? I understand that one company is processing rape seed in Canada under contract, and I have been told—I do not know whether it is right—that a certain amount of rape seed oil has been exported. Can the minister give any information on the amounts exported, or the amount of oil exported?

Mr. GARDINER: I am sorry I have not that information. That really comes under trade and commerce. The oil price or the price for rape seed was announced some time ago by the Minister of Trade and Commerce as six cents a pound.

Mr. WRIGHT: For the next year?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. It is handled under trade and commerce. I wish the hon. member would take it up under those estimates.

Mr. STEPHENSON: What is the situation with regard to buckwheat? I have a request from a feed man in my riding where he has a car of buckwheat. He has got into contact with all the larger milling companies and they are not in the market for buckwheat. He has been trying to get an export permit to ship this car of buckwheat but has been refused. He has made every effort to dispose of it, but none of the milling companies are interested. Is it possible for him to get an export permit?

Mr. GARDINER: I would think there would be no difficulty if he is not able to find a market here. I do not think he would have any difficulty in getting an export permit, but he would have to apply to the Department of Trade and Commerce and they in turn would probably refer the matter to us. I have not heard of the case, and I have never heard the question of buckwheat discussed in connection with exports.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Applications have been made for an export permit, and I was informed that they got in contact with the Department of Agriculture three or four times and were refused as a matter of policy. I cannot understand why, when this man has got in contact with all the milling companies and they are not interested, he should have to lose his car of buckwheat. Here is a letter from the Maple Leaf Milling Company, as one instance. They reply to his letter and say in effect: In reply to your letter of recent date we regret to advise you that we are not in the market for buckwheat at the present time. He has about seven or eight other letters of that kind. Yet the department will not give him an export permit.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the hon. member bring that to my attention tomorrow, and I will see what I can do. I do not think there will be any difficulty about that.

Mr. CHARLTON: Can the minister give us any idea what the price of Ontario soft wheat will be for this season?

Mr. GARDINER: That is trade and commerce. I do not like to announce their prices.

Mr. CHARLTON: Is that entirely under trade and commerce?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage (does not include the costs of survey and engineering work on the Medicine Hat irrigation and Red Deer diversion projects in Alberta and the South Saskatchewan river project in Saskatchewan, which costs are to be made available from the item of $1,000,000, No. 409, Department of Reconstruction and Supply), $3,000,000.

Mr. MILLER: This afternoon I was going to ask some additional questions about P.C. 2413, and the minister suggested that they could be brought up under these estimates. Perhaps this is the proper time to do so.

Mr. GARDINER: Just before the hon. member proceeds, may I answer a note I received from the hon. member for Lake Centre? I have not another copy of the order in council.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister says he has not a copy?

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is not one either in the returns office, so it makes it rather difficult.

Mr. GARDINER: I have not one here. I am not sure whether there is one in my office or not.

Mr. MILLER: I have a small matter to discuss. In reading over the order in council quickly, I noticed that in section 4, subsection (d), the board was given the power to report on any questions relating to specific projects for the utilization or control of common rivers or lake systems. Then, under the following section, or a later section, the recommendation of the board with regard to subsections (c) and (d) of section 4 shall become effective when adopted by order in council. When I read that I was of the opinion that, without much stretching of the wording, or that with any reasonable interpretation of that wording, we might perhaps have some system of control of rampaging rivers, at least the ones that are interprovincial. But I think the minister has answered that today by pretty well saying that it is not so. I should like him either to affirm or to disaffirm that.

While I am talking on these matters, I should like to refer to some of the flood conditions in my own riding. I have just returned from a hasty trip up there to look over the flood situation. While it is perhaps not on as big a scale as the British Columbia flooding, about which we heard earlier in the day, yet it is a serious matter.

So far as the Department of Public Works is concerned, on the Assiniboine river, which interests me the most, I must say that on the whole I would not be prepared to criticize what they have done. They have done a reasonable job there and have complied, as far as possible, with the reasonable requests not only of myself but of the members who have previously represented this constituency. There is, however, still more for them to do.

The point I want to talk about today is this. This Assiniboine river rises away up in the Saskatchewan. It is an interprovincial river. Not only that, but the basin of the Assiniboine is a huge one. The Assiniboine river comes down from northeastern Saskatchewan and works in through Manitoba. I think it is joined by the Qu'Appelle before it crosses the Saskatchewan boundary, later by the Souris which is not only interprovincial but also international, and also by the Minnedosa and other smaller rivers and creeks. From Portage la Prairie on to the Red river, all the water from this tremendous basin, or rather from these basins, has to be funneled through that one river, through which it flows slowly, with a comparatively small drop of about 112 feet from Portage to Winnipeg. The result is that we are faced with these flooding conditions.

It is all very well for the Minister of Public Works to say what he did this afternoon. I have no doubt that he was speaking only upon the opinion of the law officers who advised him. It is all very well for him to say it is not a federal problem at all, but is provincial or municipal. The provincial authorities are equally positive that it is not a provincial matter at all, but that it is a dominion matter. It is cold comfort to the farmers, who have thousands of acres flooded and under water in the Assiniboine basin, to be standing there while two authorities, to both of which they pay taxes, stand aside and attempt to wash their hands of this particular problem. It must be somebody's.

An hon. MEMBER: There is lots of water.

Mr. MILLER: Yes, there is lots of water for them to wash their hands. It must be somebody's problem. It is not reasonable to say that the municipality of St. Francois Xavier—which is on the east of my riding, and which takes a terrific beating when there is flooding of the Assiniboine; it is a small municipality of about 48,000 acres—is responsible. It is ridiculous to say that it has any financial responsibility for keeping the Assiniboine river under control, when the Assiniboine river comes from Saskatchewan and just passes through this small municipality; and the Souris river, which I think rises somewhere south of Regina, not only meanders through Saskatchewan and Manitoba but also, I believe, takes a bend into the United States. As I say, it is ridiculous to say that the municipality of St. Francois Xavier has any responsibility there at all. But somebody has. If it had not been for that diking system that is there now, there would have been half a million acres flooded this year in the municipality which is represented by myself and the hon. member for Macdonald.

Whether the matter is dominion or provincial, I do not care, so long as some scheme is evolved. But there should be some authority in this country of ours that will make a survey and develop an over-all scheme. I think it should be the dominion. They should make a survey. Then, if the dominion thinks it is a provincial responsibility or the responsibility of several provinces, the dominion should take the initiative and should not expect the farmers who are flooded to run to the municipality, from the municipality to the provincial government, and from the provincial government to the dominion government. There should be an over-all scheme, and it should be worked out by the dominion.

If the Minister of Public Works is correct, and if the law officers who have advised him are correct, well and good. But if there is a divergence of opinion between the law officers of the dominion and the law officers of the province, I say that in all reason and in all common sense the dominion government should submit the whole question to the supreme court for a decision. Then, if we find out that it is a provincial responsibility, the farmers whom I and others here represent, can go to the proper determined authority to get our relief. As the situation is now, we do not know where to go. We are just pushed around from one authority to another. That is the situation not only in my constituency but in every other constituency that is affected by this flooding. There should be a whole dominion-wide scheme, an over-all scheme of control of these rivers. There should be a survey made of these rivers, and I think these rivers which are interprovincial should be the care of the dominion government without any—I was about to use the expression "passing the buck", but I do not think that is fair to the Minister of Public Works. But I think the P.F.R.A.—and that is under the Minister of Agriculture—should make a survey of the Assiniboine river basin, and of the tributaries of the Assiniboine and see just what can be done or what ought to be done in the matter of control by a system of dams, diking or something?

It is just a tragedy that this year some of the best farm lands in the Dominion of Canada are under water to a depth of not only a few inches but several inches. It was just a miracle, and also by reason of the fact that the farmers and the citizens worked together day and night for over two weeks, that half a million acres of the best farm lands in this country were not under water. I do not think it is good enough for the government of the Dominion of Canada or the governments of the provinces to be standing by, each trying to evade whatever responsibility there might be, lest they be handicapped by some responsibility which they do not want to assume, and that they should pass the buck from one to another. This question must be determined at once, even if it is necessary to have a reference to the courts to ascertain whether it is a provincial or a dominion matter.

As far as these estimates are concerned, I suggest to the minister that he give some study to the wording of P.C. 2413, which was tabled today, to see if the intent and wording of the order in council and the agreement attached to it are not wide enough to permit some such survey as I have requested to be made, in an attempt to arrive at a permanent cure for all this flood damage that is being caused.

Mr. GARDINER: As to the last matter the hon. gentleman discussed, that is the survey on the Assiniboine river, that survey has been under way for a year and a half. We have already spent $6,000 on it, and we expect it may take another year to complete the survey. But it is being made. One of the proposals is that we put a reservoir in the province of Saskatchewan up near the headwaters of the Assiniboine; and borings are being made there to locate the proper place to put the dam to create the storage in that area necessary to prevent the water from coming down with a rush.

I think one reason that floods have been more prevalent in recent years is the fact that the trees have been pretty well cut in the northern areas. The snows used to go away more slowly when the trees were there, and the water came down more slowly. The trees have now been trimmed off, and the water comes down with a rush. We believe it is possible to correct that condition by building dams and creating storages to let the water come down gradually instead of coming down with a rush, and that survey is now being made.

It is possible to have surveys of that kind made under this order in council. We were making them before, without the order in council, but this is intended to facilitate that work. The intent of the order is that each province will appoint its chief engineer; we will appoint our chief engineer under P.F.R.A.; mines and resources will appoint their chief engineer, and those five men will constitute the board. That board will make a study of the information now available, and we think we have most of the information with respect to water flow and all that sort of thing already on record at the offices in Regina. But if it is not on record, then any one of the provinces or the federal government can ask for further information to be obtained, and it will be obtained by this board. The necessary staffs will be provided; and when we have the complete records with regard to the flow of water in those streams and what might be done with it, recommendations will be made by this board to the governments concerned. It may be that in some cases only the federal government and one provincial government will be concerned, but where all four governments are involved the recommendations will be made to all.

The chief responsibility of the board under this order is to determine how much water we should allow to pass the boundary line from Alberta into Saskatchewan, and how much should be allowed to pass the boundary line from Saskatchewan into Manitoba. It has taken us over a year to have this order in council, as it is now, agreed upon. Last year we had one we thought was satisfactory. We sent it to all three governments and finally persuaded two of them to accept it. The third government, Manitoba, was not prepared to accept it; and perhaps they had some reason for their position. They have muskrat farms in the northern part of the province, which are supplied with water by the big run-off in the spring. In the discussions we took the position that, after all, muskrat farms were not the most important thing; that if we were to control the water in the way suggested by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, namely holding the water back by dams and letting it come down gradually, thus avoiding floods, then the flooding which has taken place in the lower levels may have to take place higher up, for the time being, and the muskrats would have to go up there and have their homes.

Some of those things, I think, will have to give way to the development of the larger idea, that idea being that there is not enough water, and that we should not allow it to rush away to Hudson bay in the spring, but should provide storages all back along the route wherever they can be usefully placed, and that we should permit the same amount of water to go through in the twelve-month period, but that it would be spread over the year instead of all going down in two or three months and then there being none at all for another period. That is the idea behind it, and this board is set up for the purpose of recommending to the provincial governments and ourselves what should be done.

After those recommendations come in, it is assumed that the federal government will provide the money for the storages. We do not undertake to provide the money to put in irrigation or to put in power developments, but we undertake to provide money for storages. Once we have decided that a storage can be utilized effectively either by a province or by some local organization which has been set up, or by the municipalities, then we may undertake to build that storage.

Mr. MILLER: Or for the purpose of controlling floods?

Mr. GARDINER: Well, I would say it will serve the two purposes at the one time. In most cases it will be to provide power or to provide water for irrigation. For example, if they create a lake on the Saskatchewan river by building a 200-foot dam, that lake will be 145 miles long. It will be 200 feet deep at the dam and some fifty-three feet deep north of Swift Current.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is it not the intention of the dominion government to expend some sixty-five or sixty-seven million dollars, provided that this dam proves feasible?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not sure it will spend $66 million. It will spend whatever part of $66 million is necessary if it is once determined to go ahead with the program, and if we have the consent of all the provinces to go ahead with it.

Mr. BENTLEY: Then may I ask this question?

Mr. GARDINER: Not too many questions at once.

Mr. BENTLEY: I think I had the floor.

Mr. GARDINER: But I was answering a question asked by another hon. member.

Mr. BENTLEY: Any single province has the power of veto on this, has it not?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: Not now. The order previously drafted provided that any one province would have the power of veto, but that is not this order. That previous order was not signed; it has been changed. The present order does not provide that this board shall make any decisions. It simply makes a recommendation to each province. We did not want it that way, but that was insisted upon by the three provinces. We finally agreed in order to get somewhere. We were a year trying to get them to agree to the other proposal, that the board should make the decision in the matter, but they do not want that. We have agreed to allow recommendations to go to each province and to us; but we are trusting that the provinces will pass the necessary orders in council, when the time comes, in order to make it possible to proceed.

Mr. BENTLEY: Then each province still has a veto?

Mr. GARDINER: No such thing as a veto is involved, but if they do not pass an order in council nothing will be done.

Mr. BENTLEY: In effect, then, they can block it?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did I understand the minister to say that the dam to be erected somewhere near Elbow will raise the water at Swift Current or at Saskatchewan Landing to a height of sixty-six feet?

Mr. GARDINER: No; fifty-three feet. I understand that if a 210 foot dam is built at Elbow, which is the one recommended by the engineers, that will necessitate building a dam 110 feet high along the east side of the Saskatchewan river to prevent the water from going down the Qu'Appelle. Both those dams would have to be built before you could have that supply of water provided in the Saskatchewan river; and I imagine the water would be 200 feet deep at the dam.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister did not get my question. He says the dam to be erected somewhere near Elbow will be 200 feet high. I understood him to say that would raise the water in the vicinity of Saskatchewan Landing north of Swift Current to a depth of about sixty feet.

Mr. GARDINER: To fifty-three feet.

Mr. MacNICOL: One further question; that would wipe out the possibility of a low-level bridge being erected there.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that what they are proposing to do now is to put in the abutments for a 53-foot bridge, but to build the low-level bridge. That is the situation at the present time, so far as I know it. A 14-foot increase in water would result from a different dam altogether from the one at Elbow. There have been a number of investigations made, and if a dam different from the Elbow dam were built, then it might be possible that the lake would only create an increase in water level of fourteen feet. I understand that the province intends to go ahead and put in abutments which will carry the high-level bridge. But they intend at the present time to build a low-level bridge.

The advice that they have and that we have is that the steel structure put on the low level can be jacked up to the higher level, and the full abutments are built to carry that higher level bridge, if it is ever necessary in the future. Then they would have to add approaches at both sides back to the higher level of the river banks.

Mr. MacNICOL: The suggestion was made a while ago to build another dam at Saskatchewan Landing, which would mean a lower dam at Riverhurst or Elbow, and then have that new dam at Saskatchewan Landing.

Mr. GARDINER: There is only one dam being discussed at the present time, and that is the 210-foot dam at Elbow, which would necessitate a second dam on the east side, because the bank of the river opposite the Qu'Appelle is only ninety feet high. If you build a dam 210 feet high, you have to build another dam along the east side of the river to prevent all the water from going down and flooding out all the people in Manitoba. So there has to be a great deal of construction. The plan has been suggested which will take a considerable amount of money, if proceeded with, and some time to build.

Mr. MILLER: Has the minister anything to indicate from his records where the proposed dam would be on the Assiniboine river?

Mr. GARDINER: They have not completed the borings. But it is somewhere up in the Saskatchewan area, in the vicinity of Kamsack.

Mr. MILLER: It would have to be above the Minnedosa and the Souris.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. FULTON: I should like to ask some questions respecting the extension of this act to British Columbia. Just for the information of the minister and of the committee, I should like to review what I was going to describe as changes in policy which have taken place thus far. This was urged as a specific measure by myself and by others in 1946.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. GARDINER: That could be discussed under item 36, the British Columbia item.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. This item deals with:

Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage (does not include the costs of survey and engineering work on the Medicine Hat irrigation and Red Deer diversion projects in Alberta and the South Saskatchewan river project in Saskatchewan, which costs are to be made available from the item of $1,000,000, No. 409, Department of Reconstruction and Supply).

Mr. FULTON: This item deals with the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. We have been urging for some years that it be extended to British Columbia. The minister said this afternoon he would prefer that we delay discussion until we reached the P.F.R.A. item.

Mr. GARDINER: But this is not that item.

Mr. FULTON: The item the minister has in mind is item 38.

Mr. GARDINER: No, item 36.

Mr. FULTON: Yes, item 36. But that deals only with specific projects in British Columbia. It refers to isolated projects.

Mr. GARDINER: But this item does not deal with British Columbia at all.

Mr. FULTON: But it does deal with the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Mr. GARDINER: And that does not apply to British Columbia. In the discussion of the British Columbia item we can discuss everything that can be done in that province under that item. We cannot have prairie farm rehabilitation in British Columbia. You can have something done in the mountains, or in some other place, but it would not be prairie farm rehabilitation.

Mr. FULTON: Last year the minister said he was in favour of an extension of the principle of the act to British Columbia.

Mr. GARDINER: And we have it in this other item.

Mr. FULTON: No, it is not. The other item deals with specific projects.

Mr. GARDINER: There is not a nickel in this item for British Columbia—

Mr. FULTON: And my point is that there should be.

Mr. GARDINER: —and there cannot be any money put into it for British Columbia. Therefore we cannot discuss British Columbia under this item. But you can discuss anything you like in connection with British Columbia water development under item 36.

Mr. FULTON: The minister is being very generous, but he does not actually control the committee.

Mr. GARDINER: The rules control the committee.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The committee would make more progress if it dealt with the items as they come along. This item has nothing to do with British Columbia. The hon. member will have an opportunity to deal with British Columbia later on.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: On a point of order, surely there is no other place where questions as to whether or not the act is being applied in British Columbia can be asked.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am rising to a point of order.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member knows very well that it is the rule in committee to deal specifically with the item under discussion.

Mr. GARDINER: This is not for the province of British Columbia.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Surely to goodness the hon. member will not argue that this is the proper place to discuss the problem in British Columbia.

Mr. FULTON: I read in item 30 that it refers to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Go on.

Mr. FULTON: And there is a note to say that it does not apply to two specific projects. But the general item refers to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: As the hon. member knows, the point he now raises does not come in here. Is he suggesting that British Columbia comes under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act?

Mr. FULTON: No, with respect, I do not. The point I am trying to make is that we should have an extension of the principle of the act, and water storage, in British Columbia.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Now the hon. member is saying that a principle is involved, which is not to be dealt with under a particular item. The item itself may be dealt with specifically.

Mr. FULTON: The term "water storage" is sufficiently broad.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We are not going to make progress if we keep on arguing about the matter.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, with all due respect, this matter has recently been discussed in British Columbia, and the question of the extension of P.F.R.A. to British Columbia was specifically referred to in the last few days by the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. GARDINER: No, it was not.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, it was.

Mr. GARDINER: I did the discussing, and I know what I discussed. I discussed item 36.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I rule that under this item the discussion of British Columbia problems should not be continued. We shall make progress if we proceed as we should proceed.

Mr. BURTON: I have a number of questions I should like to ask, which certainly do come under this item. First, may I remind the minister that during the past few years I have been quiet and considerate in asking for any information concerning the matter I have in mind. But, after the tremendous snowfall we had during the past winter, and the tremendous amount of run-off water, I should like to inquire from the minister as to how much water is impounded in Wolverine creek by the dam built by P.F.R.A. southeast of Humboldt in the summer of 1943. Have any repairs been made to this dam in the past year, and, if so, what was the total cost of such repairs?

Mr. GARDINER: The dam at Wolverine creek is really an underground dam.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is a new kind of dam.

An hon. MEMBER: An election dam.

Mr. GARDINER: No, it is a sensible kind of dam. The underground structure is of gravel and no better water in the world can be had than that stored in gravel. Steel piling is driven down at the end of the area in which the water is stored. The run-off in the spring soaks into that and is stored. A total of $479.75 was spent last year on repairs.

Mr. BURTON: For what purpose?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not sure of the purpose, but I presume it had something to do with the structure. I imagine my hon.

friend knows more about it than I do, because he lives close to it.

Mr. BURTON: My information is that a wooden overflow structure was burned by a prairie fire. I do not know just to what extent the department has repaired it, but in repairing it I hope they see that this dam which is supposed to hold water will not be consumed by a prairie fire.

An hon. MEMBER: Firewater.

Mr. BURTON: I should like to find out how much water is now impounded by this dam. Last year and the year before, I made special trips out to the dam, one time right after there had been a cloudburst in Humboldt which had raised the level in Burton lake near my farm to about ten feet. When I got to the dam there was not enough water to permit a respectable duck to take a bath. I want to know whether this dam is going to hold any water at any time.

Mr. GARDINER: I think if my hon. friend took a jump down one of the wells down there he would find that there is more water in it than there ever was before.

Mr. BURTON: I hope the minister is not suggesting that I go down a well?

Mr. GARDINER: It was never intended to be a duck pond. It is on the same principle as that by which water is supplied to Moose Jaw. Water comes down from the Saskatchewan river seventy miles away, it is pumped into the sands, and then Moose Jaw pumps it out again and takes it eighteen miles into the city. This dam is some six or seven miles from Humboldt and there is a graveled underground area in which water is supposed to be stored. So far as I know, Humboldt has never attempted to pump water out of it and, until they do, they will not know whether there is any water there. I presume there is water there because the dam is properly constructed.

Mr. BURTON: The town of Humboldt and their advisers in the matter of water supply have been hesitant to undertake the placing of a pipeline to that dam, because until this spring there has not been sufficient water to warrant the expense. The minister's statement that this dam was constructed with the idea of checking the flow of water underneath the surface is understandable—

Mr. GARDINER: Is correct.

Mr. BURTON: Then why was it necessary to construct a dam forty or fifty feet in height if it was intended to hold water flowing underneath the ground? The engineers of the department must have had some idea that sufficient water would back up behind the so-called underground dam to raise water on the surface against the dam. The minister or his officials can find out much easier than I what water is impounded by this dam. There was a tremendous amount of run-off water this spring.

Mr. GARDINER: Both the hon. member and I will be out there before very long and we can look at it.

Mr. BURTON: I hope the minister will so arrange his trip that I can have the pleasure of driving him to that dam. I assure him that I will not invite him to jump in a well because I know we can get along very well without that.

Mr. FULTON: What amount will be spent this year in British Columbia under P.F.R.A.?

Mr. GARDINER: None under P.F.R.A. on construction. The money that is being spent in British Columbia is being provided from two sources. One is the Veterans Land Act. A considerable amount of work is being done under that act in different parts of British Columbia and our engineers are doing the work. There will be other expenditures in British Columbia made under item 36, which has to do with the Lillooet river. I will ask the hon. member to deal with this matter when we reach that item. Then I would point out that item 38 has to do with land reclamation and there will be expenditures under that.

Mr. ADAMSON: In view of the minister's earlier remarks that the cause of all this flooding we have had is the destruction of forest cover to the north, I have a question to ask which has a particular bearing upon northern Ontario. What steps, if any, are being taken to replace the forest cover?

Mr. GARDINER: All the work being done to replace forests I presume is done by the provinces because the forests belong to the provinces.

Mr. QUELCH: If one province refuses to adopt the recommendation of the water board with respect to the allocation of waters of a specific river, are we to understand that all development of water storage will be held up until such time as the recommendation is adopted?

Mr. GARDINER: We are spending the money and that is exactly the point of view I took with the provinces. I said, "If you are going to delay expenditures I do not think anyone here is going to insist that we spend money in the province". This is doing work which, according to the discussions we have been having, is really the constitutional responsibility of the province. We are prepared to drop that and do the job up to a point. So far as we are concerned in this department, we have our troubles in getting money. We have to discuss the matter with the Minister of Finance, with the whole council and with all those who are interested in the matter. We have our own difficulties the same as any department has in getting the amount of money which we think ought to be expended. If the provinces are going to say, "We do not want it expended," that will make it more difficult. But I think you will find as you go along that the provinces will expedite it. I do not think there is any occasion for setting up hypothetical cases and saying they will not.

Mr. JUTRAS: Has the minister had any communication with Manitoba with regard to work being done in the southeastern part of that province? The minister will recall that last year and the year before, I pointed out that there was a great deal of work to be done in the southeast corner of the province, east of the Red river. This area has two or three very large swamps which overflow every spring. There are only two small rivers, the Rat and the Roseau, to take the water away and their banks are not high enough to take care of the flow, so that there is an overflow over the country generally every spring, which makes it very difficult for people to settle there. They have to restrict their settlement to the higher places.

In the past the argument brought forward by officials of P.F.R.A. was that it was more a problem of drainage than irrigation. However, an engineer has come out with the suggestion that probably one storage dam located somewhere on the Roseau about the centre of the area would hold back the main waters from the swamp, and the rivers would then be able to take care of the rest of the drainage. There are several thousand acres that could be settled and cultivated and put to real use in that area with proper drainage. I commend this project to the minister. I was given to understand that he had discussed it on many occasions with the officials. Is the minister in a position to make a statement on that?

Mr. GARDINER: The present situation is that the area east of the Red river in Manitoba is in much the same position as all other parts of Canada outside the P.F.R.A. area, which is the Palliser triangle, and the area east of the Red river is not in that triangle.

Mr. JUTRAS: I was referring to the eastern side of the Red river but only to the extent of five or six townships east of the Red river. As I understand the present regulations, most of this area would come under P.F.R.A. because it includes the water basin of the Red river, and the area I am speaking of is part of the water basin of the Red river. I was given to understand that by the official.

Mr. GARDINER: If it is in the P.F.R.A. area, of which I have some doubts, it would come under P.F.R.A.; but, if not, it would have to come under another item which provides a special fund for doing works in different parts of Canada.

Mr. JUTRAS: I am satisfied that it comes under P.F.R.A.

Mr. GARDINER: If so, it could be considered.

Mr. JUTRAS: Has the minister had any communication from the province about it?

Mr. GARDINER: Not that I recall.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I should like to bring up a matter which seriously affects Dauphin constituency. I assure the minister that it will not require any subterranean dams or anything of that kind. The minister will recall that about a year ago—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I wonder if the hon. member would give way to the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario, who was out when we were dealing with item 29 and wanted to ask a question on it?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Yes, certainly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DROPE: Thank you very much, and I also wish to thank the Chairman for his courtesy and to assure him that we make good progress when he is in the chair.

My question was in regard to the marketing of cheese. Is it the intention to requisition cheese for overseas shipment this year? We were interested in the announcement the minister made this afternoon concerning that other great dairy product, butter. It appears doubtful whether this country will have enough butter next winter, with the low price announced today, which I think will have a tendency to discourage production. We have to bear in mind that our population is increasing in this country, and it is questionable whether we can go on exporting dairy products for any length of time and still have enough left for the home market. We know the tremendous shortage of butter that we experienced last winter and the great demand by consumers for a subsidy. I would hope that the policy of the government will not lead us into that position another year. At least the ceiling should be taken off butter at the present time. Would the minister make a statement on that?

Mr. GARDINER: With regard to cheese, the price in the contract is thirty cents. It sets a floor under cheese. The requisitioning of cheese depends on two or three things. One is whether we can buy cheese from week to week as we go along in order to fill the British contract. Another one is whether we shall be able to get funds to be able to pay for all the cheese in the month or two toward the end of the season. In my opinion we ought to be able to get our proportion of the cheese every week during the summer, and I have expressed that opinion to the cheese producers in the last two or three days. They are discussing that matter with the possibility of bringing it about, so far as the cheese producers of Quebec and Ontario are concerned. I am not in a position to say anything more until those discussions are completed. It is not our desire to requisition cheese, and I hope we shall not have to do so. We hope to get the cheese as we go along, rather than have to take it in the last month or two. I think that is advisable. Nor do the British want it all in the last month or two, but week by week, and that is the way we ought to deliver it. But if we cannot deliver it in that way we shall have to make some different arrangements from what we have now.

We have not lowered the ceiling on butter. We have simply said that if it goes down to fifty-eight cents we are prepared to buy it. But butter has not gone down to fifty-eight cents, and I do not know whether it will or not. We have not lowered the ceiling. It is still sixty-seven cents. The papers said seventy-three cents, but there is no such ceiling on butter. The ceiling is a wholesale ceiling of sixty-seven cents, and the fifty-eight cents is in relation to sixty-seven cents, and not in relation to seventy-three cents. The selling price, as everyone knows, is sixty-seven cents, basis Montreal, and the price at which we shall buy, if it goes down to that, is fifty-eight cents.

Mr. DROPE: Does the minister think we shall get enough butter to supply the consumer demand next winter at that price?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not sure that it will go down to that price. The price today is sixty-three cents. It has gone down from sixty-seven to sixty-three cents within the last three or four days. Whether it will go lower I do not know, but we are hopeful that butter will come in at these prices. As a matter of fact, the greater part of the surplus butter comes from places where cheese is not produced.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): On Monday we intend to proceed with the second reading of Bill 328, which was introduced by the Minister of Agriculture today concerning the reclamation and development of marshlands in the maritime provinces. Then we shall move that the house go into committee of supply and call two new departments. We shall not discuss the new items but proceed with the estimates of agriculture, transport, national health and welfare, and public works.

Mr. MILLER: What are the two new departments?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Mines and Resources, and Secretary of State.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

15. Branch farms and stations and illustration stations, $3,372,320.

Health of animals—

17. Administration of Animal Contagious Diseases Act, and Meat and Canned Foods Act, $2,611,508.

18. Compensation for animals slaughtered, $507,845.

19. Live stock and poultry, $1,022,390.

Plant products—

20. Seeds, feeds, fertilizers, insecticides and fungicides control, including grant of $31,000 to Canadian Seed Growers' Association, $963,764.

21. Grants to fairs and exhibitions, under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council and subject to allocation by the treasury board, $382,400.

22. Grants to agricultural organizations, as detailed in the estimates, $43,500.

Marketing service—

23. Marketing service administration, $138,771.

24. Agricultural economics, $341,535.

25. Dairy products, $547,244.

26. Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act, and grants, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $730,494.

27. Fruits, vegetables and maple products, and honey, including grant of $5,000 to Canadian Horticultural Council, $823,000.

28. Live stock and livestock products, $965,787.

29. Marketing of agricultural products, including temporary appointments that may be required to be made notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, the amount available for such appointments not to exceed $6,000, $25.000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 31, 1948

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHURCH—CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL TRADE FAIR

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): As a matter of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I should like to call your attention and that of the members of the house to the Canadian international trade fair, a regular world fair in itself, which is being held for two weeks at the Canadian National Exhibition grounds. It was opened by His Excellency the Governor General, Viscount Alexander of Tunis, last Saturday, May 29, at which time you were present, Mr. Speaker, as well as representatives of all parties in the house.

The Canadian international trade fair contains exhibits from all over the world. I desire to congratulate not only the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) but his predecessor, the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) and his deputy, Mr. M. W. Mackenzie, on the great success of this vast undertaking for the good of the people of Canada. It must have been a great revelation to our governor general, his wife and party; to you, Mr. Speaker; to the government and to all those representing both houses of parliament who attended the opening last Saturday. The exhibits from the dominions and also from Britain, France, Czechoslovakia, China, Brazil and all the countries on the seven seas were most outstanding. I wish to thank the board of trade, the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the Canadian National Exhibition authorities, and the mayor and the corporation of the city of Toronto for the co-operation they gave in this great national undertaking.

Yesterday I requested the chairman of the board of education, Mr. George Arnold—and also wired the chairman of the separate school board—to endeavour to secure a half holiday for the children so that they might visit this exhibition. I hope that all our members may see it before the end of next week when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is to open Sunnybrook hospital in Toronto on Saturday, June 12.

Those who were there saw the value of continuing overseas trade with the sterling countries that have done so much in the past to develop the industries of this country and to provide markets for our great agricultural production, both in the overseas dominions and in many other countries of the seven seas; and they also saw the need of furthering such overseas trade accordingly, as this country has now become the fifth country of the world in foreign trade and commerce.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I was at the Canadian international trade fair, at which I saw you and many of our colleagues in the queen city of the hon. members for Broadview and Davenport. This international trade fair is something to see, because it shows the progress that Canadian industry has made. Exhibits from all over the world are on display. I hope that Canadians will take advantage of it to see for themselves, as we have done, the evidences there of the unbelievable progress that has been made by our industry.

May I say that the international trade fair will do more to promote Canadian trade throughout the world than any multilateral agreements concocted at Geneva and signed or amended at Havana or anywhere else. This is the sound practice of trade as exemplified by Abraham, by Jacob, and by Job after he became rich again—display; let people see what we have to sell. It is pure common sense. The practice of trade is ancient but it is not too old and odd, because it is based on common sense and the practice of the centuries.

Just one more word, Mr. Speaker: yesterday morning after attending church I was surprised to find that I had nothing to do in the city of Toronto, so I walked along the streets and admired the displays. I wish to congratulate especially the Robert Simpson company upon their magnificent display advertising the international trade fair. The way was paved by the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon)— the genial minister who sits near me—and his successor in office (Mr. Howe), who understand the importance of this matter; it is so important that it cannot be overlooked by any one of us. Therefore I was happy to see you there, Mr. Speaker, as the first commoner, as well as many others who are our colleagues and friends. They did well to go to the fair, and I hope that their example will be followed by many for the benefit of the country at large.

Mr. J. H. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I desire to associate myself with the remarks of the two previous speakers with respect to their visit to the international trade fair in Toronto over the week end. I should like to say, not only for myself but for the other members of this group who participated in that visit, that we appreciate the kind invitation of the government to be their guests on that occasion, and to express the great pleasure that was ours in visiting the fair. The government, and particularly the Department of Trade and Commerce, are to be congratulated on the efforts they have put forth in bringing to Canada the representatives of various countries and exhibits from those countries indicating what they have to sell to us; as well as showing what goods we can sell to them. While I understand this is the first great fair of its kind we have staged in Canada, I sincerely hope it will not be the last. My one regret is that all hon. members were not able to visit the fair; for I am sure those who did go brought back with them pleasant and profitable memories of what they saw and a definite impression of what we may hope for in the way of trade.

Once again I wish to thank the government for the kind invitation to visit the fair.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS

TELEGRAM FROM PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA FOLLOWING SOUTH AFRICAN ELECTION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I notice a Reuters news agency dispatch from Pretoria which reads as follows:

> Prime Minister Mackenzie King has sent a telegram of good wishes and sympathy to General Jan Smuts after his defeat in the South African elections, it was disclosed here Saturday.

The dispatch is quite correct, but it may convey to some an erroneous impression as to the nature of the message sent. Of course I would not for a moment think of commenting upon the results of the election in South Africa, but Field Marshal Smuts is a very old personal friend, and when I read the results of the elections I followed my natural sympathies and inclinations in sending him a message. In order that there may be no mistake as to exactly what I said, and the purpose of the message, I think perhaps I should place it on record. The message is dated Ottawa, May 28, 1948, and reads as follows:

> Field Marshal Jan C. Smuts,
> Capetown,
> South Africa.
> Personal. I realize that it would be most improper for me to comment upon a matter so completely related to the domestic affairs of another nation of the commonwealth as that of the results of the general elections in South Africa. I hope, however, I may be permitted to say to you personally how very much I regret that at the end of a life so completely devoted to public service in your country and in the arena of world affairs you should have met with defeat in your own constituency, and that the results of the elections should have compelled your resignation as Prime Minister before the time came that you felt you, yourself, should lay down this high office. I hope the outcome may be for you a sense of relief from burdens which become increasingly heavy with the advance of years, and of freedom newly and honourably won for what may remain to you of the eventide of life. My warmest personal regards.
> W. L. Mackenzie King.

JUDGES ACT

DISCONTINUANCE OF SPECIAL SALARY FOR DIVORCE COURT JUDGE IN NOVA SCOTIA

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 329, to amend the Judges Act, 1946.

He said: This is a very brief bill. It strikes out the additional allowance for a divorce court judge in Nova Scotia. All the judges of the supreme court of Nova Scotia are now being given divorce jurisdiction; therefore it is not appropriate that there should be any special additional remuneration for any one of them.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HEALTH INSURANCE—DOMINION COUNCIL OF HEALTH

Mr. TIMMINS:

1. What studies have been carried out by the department in respect to health insurance and in respect to a national health plan?
2. What persons have been engaged or retained in these studies and for what periods of time, and what amounts have been paid as salaries, emoluments, or otherwise, in respect to such studies?
3. How many full time, qualified doctors are now employed by the department on health insurance studies, where are they engaged, and what are their names?
4. What is the Dominion Council of Health, and what officers and staff are engaged in the work of the council?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. The 1945 dominion government proposals for health grants and health insurance have been under continuous study and review by members of the staff of the directorate of health insurance studies and the research division. In addition, as a part of an over-all study of social security, in which Dr. H. M. Cassidy of the university of Toronto acted as a technical adviser to the department, work was carried out in the health field by the directorate of health insurance studies and the research division.

2. Dr. Kenneth Gray and later Dr. J. L. Little succeeded the late Dr. J. J. Heagerty in directing health insurance studies. After Dr.

Little accepted the post of executive director of the national cancer institute Dr. B. D. B. Layton was temporarily released from his responsibilities as chief of the division of venereal disease control to continue the work in the health insurance planning field. Mr. J. W. Willard, officer in charge of the research division, formerly executive secretary of the Canadian medical procurement and assignment board, and one of those who directed the national health survey in 1943, has been in charge of the health program planning carried on by the research division in collaboration with the directorate of health insurance studies. Dr. Layton and Mr. Willard had the full-time assistance of the following research assistants: J. H. Horowicz, LL.D., Miss M. VanDusen, Mr. C. D. Allen, Mr. J. A. Macdonald and Miss B. J. Stewart, together with supporting clerical and stenographic staff.

With respect to specific grants under the health program various members of the departmental staff have been advisers: in the field of mental health, Dr. C. G. Stogdill, chief, mental health division; for general public health, Dr. H. A. Ansley, assistant director health services; for hospital construction, Mr. H. G. Hughes, chief, hospital design division and Dr. P. E. Moore, director, Indian health services; for crippled children, Dr. E. Couture, chief, child and maternal health division; and with respect to legal aspects of the program, Mr. R. E. Curran, legal adviser. It is not possible to assess the actual portion of the salaries of these advisers that should be allocated to health insurance planning. The deputy minister of national welfare, Dr. G. F. Davidson has made an invaluable contribution in an advisory capacity. A considerable portion of the time of the deputy minister of national health, Dr. G. D. W. Cameron, has been devoted to a study of various proposals and aspects of the health insurance program.

Annual salaries for above officials:

Dr. G. D. W. Cameron....	$10,000
Dr. G. F. Davidson.....	10,000
Dr. P. E. Moore.....	8,000
Dr. C. G. Stogdill.....	7,200
Mr. H. G. Hughes.....	6,900
Dr. H. A. Ansley.....	6,600
Dr. E. Couture.....	6,000
Dr. B. D. B. Layton.....	6,000
Mr. R. E. Curran.....	5,625
Mr. J. W. Willard.....	3,825
Dr. J. H. Horowicz.....	2,580
Miss B. J. Stuart.....	2,580
Mr. C. D. Allen.....	2,580
Mr. J. A. Macdonald.....	2,160
Miss M. VanDusen.....	2,064

[Mr. Martin.]

Fees and expenses paid to Dr. H. M. Cassidy—$3,496.70.

Travelling expenses incurred by departmental staff.

Dr. B. D. B. Layton.....	218.45
Mr. H. G. Hughes.....	144.78
Mr. J. W. Willard.....	139.91

3. It is anticipated that a nationally-known figure in the public health field will be appointed permanent director of health insurance studies within a few days. In addition to this director, Dr. B. D. B. Layton and Dr. C. G. Stogdill are presently employed full time on the health insurance program. Further, several other qualified doctors of the department are giving part-time service (see answer 2 above).

4. The dominion council of health was established under the Department of Health Act, 1919, to consist of the deputy minister of national health as chairman and the chief executive officer of the provincial department or board of health of each province, and such other persons, not to exceed five in number, as may be appointed by the governor in council to hold office for a period of three years.

The council was perpetuated by the Department of Pensions and National Health Act, 1928, and by the Department of National Health and Welfare Act, 1944.

The duties and powers of the council, as prescribed by order in council are:

(a) The consideration of matters relating to the promotion or preservation of the health of the people of Canada and the initiation of recommendations and proposals to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and other appropriate authorities in regard thereto; and

(b) The furnishing of advice to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in respect to the matters provided in section 5 of the Department of National Health and Welfare Act, relating to the promotion or preservation of the health of the people of Canada, over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction.

The deputy minister of national health acts as chairman of the council. The Department of National Health and Welfare employs a full-time secretary to the council, who is assisted when necessary by a stenographer who is also a member of the staff of the department.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

ELECTRIC POWER PLANTS—PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF POWER COMMISSION

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to facilitate the construction and operation of electric power plants in the Northwest Territories and the supplying of power thereby generated to mining and other interests. The bill provides for the establishment of a power commission as the authority to carry out the construction and operation of the projects referred to in the bill. Provision is made for advances of moneys from the consolidated revenue fund to the commission to enable it, if and when required, to carry out its undertakings with provision also for the remuneration to be paid the commissioners.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Bertrand (Laurier).]

YUKON ACT

AMENDMENTS RELATING TO THE GOVERNMENT OF YUKON TERRITORY

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Yukon Act to re-establish the positions of commissioner and of administrator of the Yukon Territory, to increase the indemnity of members of the Yukon council and provide for their travelling and living expenses, and for other purposes relating to the government of Yukon Territory.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

PRESS REPORT AS TO PROBABLE MEETING IN LONDON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, a Canadian Press dispatch from London today indicates at least the probability, so far as press speculation is concerned, of a meeting of commonwealth prime ministers in July. Can the Prime Minister tell us how far the formal or informal discussions or negotiations have progressed toward that end?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): All I can say to my hon. friend is that there have been communications between the government of the United Kingdom and, I understand, all governments of different parts of the commonwealth respecting the holding of a meeting of prime ministers either some time in July or in the autumn. No final conclusion has been reached as yet; but as soon as a decision has been made I will give my hon. friend the information.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

SASKATOON-VANCOUVER—SERVICE FROM MONTREAL TO PACIFIC COAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, I sent a copy of a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who is not in his seat. Perhaps in his absence the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) will answer. Is the Trans-Canada Air Lines service from Saskatoon to Vancouver to be discontinued on June 1? If so, has the government considered establishing a service from Saskatoon to Calgary to link up the direct Trans-Canada service from Montreal to Vancouver?

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is that the service will not be discontinued. It will still be available, although on a schedule different from the present one. The second question is answered by my answer to the first one.

Mr. KNIGHT: This would involve passengers staying overnight at Edmonton.

Mr. McILRAITH: I am sorry, but I cannot give the precise times of various connections.

Mr. KNIGHT: The point is that direct service—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member will realize that he cannot enter into a debate when asking a question.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

KIMBERLEY AND OTHER BRITISH COLUMBIA AREAS —QUESTION OF FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister, a copy of which I have addressed to him. In view of the terrible flood damage sustained by the town of Kimberley, British Columbia, estimated to be well over $1,000,000, will the government give earnest consideration to the granting of some financial assistance to those who have been rendered homeless and who have lost their all? I may say, sir, that I have received a telegram from the mayor of Kimberley asking if it is possible to get some financial assistance from the government.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): Before the Prime Minister answers, may I ask if when he is answering he will deal with the whole problem in British Columbia because there are other areas in exactly the same position, and I had intended to ask a somewhat similar question.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when I received a copy of the hon. member's question I did have prepared a statement to give to the house respecting the government's position in the matter of dealing with flood conditions, and the like, which I shall read to the house. I would however direct the hon. member's attention to the wording of his question. Judging from the text, it would appear to be more for the purpose of conveying certain information than of asking a question. I cannot take any responsibility for the accuracy of the statement that losses are over a million dollars, or that they are estimated as such. The question as to the government's being prepared to consider what it should do in a matter of this kind I shall be glad to answer. My answer, however, will relate rather to the general situation, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Kamloops.

I should add that on Friday last my colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) dealt, I thought, rather fully with the situation when he replied to a question put by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). I shall now supplement, if not repeat, what the Minister of Public Works said on that occasion.

The responsibility for assistance to those suffering from floods and similar disasters of nature lies with provincial governments and local communities, as well as with non-governmental organizations such as the Red Cross, to which voluntary contributions have been made for this purpose. The government has no reason to believe at this time that these authorities and organizations will not be able to discharge their responsibilities in dealing with the unfortunate sufferers from the disastrous floods that have recently occurred in British Columbia and elsewhere in western Canada. The dominion has not the constitutional responsibility for dealing directly with assistance to victims of local disasters.

I assume that if the situation is such that the provinces in which these disasters occur would feel the necessity of financial assistance from the federal government, the government would be so advised by the provinces themselves. I do not believe we would be expected to act on communications received from municipalities. Municipalities would communicate with provinces in the first instance, and our action would be taken in the light of representations that might be made by provinces concerned.

Mr. FULTON: In the light of the statement the Prime Minister has just given, would he care to make further comment on a report which appeared in the press to the effect that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who is now out in British Columbia, is reported to have said that the dominion government would put up dollar for dollar with the provincial government in providing relief for the flood victims. I wonder if the Prime Minister would amplify his own statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: First of all, I have not seen the statement to which my hon. friend refers, although I have no doubt he has reported it correctly. I would wish to communicate with the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself as to what he may or may not have said before I would attempt to answer.

MARSHLANDS

RECLAMATION AND DEVELOPMENT—ASSISTANCE TO MARITIME PROVINCES

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 328, respecting the reclamation and development of marshlands in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I regret I was not in the house last week when the resolution was introduced. I was visiting Nova Scotia, the first opportunity I had to do so since Easter. Those of us who come from outlying sections of Canada are at a great disadvantage, as compared with those from central Canada, in the matter of visiting their homes and constituencies.

I appreciate greatly the action of the minister and the government in introducing this legislation and in making these proposals providing for large appropriations for the reclamation and drainage of the marshlands of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. I also appreciate the sympathetic response the measure has had since it has been before the house, from all hon. members.

I had occasion to bring this matter up soon after I came to Ottawa in 1940, at which time I made a comparison of the negligible expenditures made in the maritimes with those which had been made in western Canada in connection with prairie farm rehabilitation.

No proposal had more wholehearted support from all members of the committee on reconstruction and rehabilitation than the proposal for the reclamation of marshlands in the maritimes. My colleague from Nova Scotia, the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) was so much impressed by the soundness of the proposal that he placed on the order paper a motion recommending action in this regard. Expenditures amounting to about $25,000,000, beginning back in 1935 under a previous government, have been made in the west, with many millions more for irrigation. Those expenditures have been made from year to year by the present government under the direction of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), but there has been very little for the maritimes.

I have had a number of discussions personally with the minister about the reclamation and drainage of our marshlands, and I have been satisfied from the beginning the project had his support. It also has the support of the deputy minister, the director of experimental farms, and the officials of the department. It has had the active support of the governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The premiers and the ministers of agriculture of those provinces came to Ottawa to make representations before the committee on reconstruction and rehabilitation. The committee made a favourable report to parliament which was adopted unanimously. We have been disappointed in the delay in making that report effective.

The appropriations which are being made on the definite recommendations of the provincial governments are generous, although they may not be sufficient in view of today's costs. If the pioneer owners of years ago had had anything like this assistance in bringing their marshlands to a high state of fertility, they would not have believed it possible.

I have not had an opportunity to read the debate of Friday, nor have I had time to examine the bill now before the house for second reading; therefore I shall not be able to deal with the details. It is recognized that the farm lands at the head of the bay of Fundy are the very basis of agricultural activity and prosperity in eastern Canada. This proposal will mean the reclamation of these lands. Many acres of uplands should be restored also to a high state of production, as in the past, as far as twenty miles from the marshlands.

Under this legislation a responsibility is being imposed upon the marshland owners. While they are receiving what would be called generous support from this government and the provincial governments, a responsibility still rests upon them. Costs today are many times what they were a few years ago when the pioneers undertook the reclamation of these marshlands by the building of dikes and aboiteaux. Practically all that work was done by hand labour, but today it must be done by machinery. One of the necessities in undertaking this program is the designing and construction of the proper machinery for the handling of marsh mud. A committee has been doing such work in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, but machines to make the smaller ditches have not been perfected.

Farmers and marshland owners have a responsibility to rebuild barns for storage purposes. There is on some areas only one storage barn today where there were ten or fifty years ago. The cost of building or restoring barns is much more today than it was when the former barns were constructed. This will mean a large outlay on the part of marshland owners. While they appreciate what is being done, there may be some who will not be disposed or able to take advantage of what is being done for the whole area.

I would say to the marshland owners that if they have not confidence in this program they should hand over their marsh properties to others who will work with the governments. If there are not enough men locally to undertake full cultivation, then the government should bring in immigrants from Holland, Normandy and other European countries. There are many people in the old country who have had experience in agriculture under conditions something like these, although they have not had to deal with the tides we have. I think it was said the other day that the tides run as high as sixty feet. That is an extraordinary tide, but the usual high tides run to almost fifty feet.

I suggest to the minister that the experimental farm should take over some new areas of average quality marshlands. They should take a block of at least 100 acres, bring it to a high state of fertility and show the public what can be done in the production of hay. It would be an example to the farmers as to costs and quality of crop in that area stretching from Annapolis county to the riding of the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Hazen).

A large block should be put into pasturage, because this is the best type of soil for pasturage purposes. Another block should be taken over for experimental purposes in the production of cereal and root crops.

This area should be the best live stock and dairy district in eastern Canada. For that reason alone I am going to support the dairy interests in their stand against the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine. We should give the dairy interests every possible encouragement in order that this may be made the finest dairying section in all Canada.

I do not know that there is much more that I need to say. On behalf of the marshland owners and agricultural interests in the maritime provinces I express appreciation of what the minister and the federal government and the provincial governments are doing. I appeal to the marshland owners that they respond wholeheartedly, and I hope that it will revive agriculture in eastern Canada.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I commend this bill to the house. In the province of Ontario there is a very warm feeling in regard to the development of the maritime provinces, and there always has been, partly because there is such a large number of the Scottish race in our province.

In 1923 I brought in a bill for a national fuel policy, which would have been of great assistance to the maritime provinces. I urged the repairing of the dikes and breakwaters, many of which were erected by the early French settlers. I again urged this policy, which would have aided in the development of the maritimes, in 1916 when I saw the 75th battalion off at Halifax; I made an address there in which I urged a federal hydro policy, a national coal policy, reclamation of marshlands, and flood control.

This bill is limited to the three maritime provinces, and includes not only the reclamation of the marshlands but other benefits which are most commendable. I believe that such a policy is in the public interest for all the provinces as well as the maritimes. I hope that the work will be carried on expeditiously.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, matters affecting the maritimes should not be discussed only when we have by-elections or other situations which encourage people to make favourable statements to please certain parts of Canada. There is no such situation at the moment. I agree with the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) that there is a very warm feeling in the province of Ontario toward the maritime provinces and a desire to help them where help can be given. I was one of those who went down to add my little weight, which turned out to be very small, in the Halifax by-election—

Mr. ISNOR: We were pleased to see you.

Mr. GRAYDON: That was the trouble. I think you were glad to have me because you thought I might help your side. In any event I did not greatly help those I was trying to help, but I have always appreciated the hospitality that is so characteristic of the maritimes, and it was not lacking on that occasion. My hon. friend is fortunate in that he comes from a part of Canada which has that quality so well developed, and it is one of his own personal characteristics. At the time, as one coming from central Canada, I took a strong stand in favour of the development of the maritime provinces, and what I said was not prompted only by the occasion; because there has always been in central Canada a strong feeling, much stronger than our maritime friends sometimes realize, in favour of the development of the maritimes and doing what we can to see them get on their feet again.

It has often been said that prosperity in the world is indivisible, just as peace and war are indivisible. Certainly we cannot have a prosperous Canada if sections here and there are not prosperous. The disabilities under which the maritime provinces suffer have often been pointed out in this house, with much greater eloquence, perhaps with much more conviction, and certainly with more knowledge, than may be attached to my words. Sometimes I fancy the members from the maritimes are a little diffident about stating their disabilities, because they are a modest people and do not like to spread their woes and troubles across other parts of this land. Nevertheless the maritime provinces suffer from certain disadvantages, and I think this house ought to know that those who come from other parts of Canada are concerned in their problems and are prepared to help them in any practicable way. I realize that there are many obstacles, but we as a parliament and as a country ought to set our sights high in endeavouring to bring back the maritimes to what they ought to be—an integral part of this great dominion, flourishing and prosperous. The particular proposal in this bill cannot perhaps be regarded as a major factor in bringing the maritimes back to prosperity, but it is a step in the right direction. I would like to see more steps in this direction taken from time to time, because despite what has been said in the past, a goodly measure of support for maritime development will come from other parts of Canada, and this the people of the maritimes have perhaps not always expected.

As I went through the marshlands on one or two occasions I realized, as everyone must who sees them, the need for this kind of work. It seems to me that we should look upon it as just a beginning of a forward movement in the provinces down by the sea. I hope that this government and succeeding governments will take it as a precedent and will see that Canada throws its full weight behind many more such moves, to show that this country recognizes what the maritimes have done for Canada and that it is not going to forget those great contributions now.

While I cannot speak with the knowledge and experience of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) or the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) with reference to this particular proposal, I would like the people of the maritimes to know that there are large numbers of people all over Canada who are greatly concerned in the advancement and promotion and return to prosperity of the maritimes. It is something we have very much at heart, and I hope that similar assistance will be given to the maritime provinces in other directions, because they have many other problems; we should not stop with the reclamation of the marshlands, but go on from time to time in an effort to remove their disabilities so that they may enjoy the prosperity that many other parts of Canada enjoy. I am hopeful, Mr. Speaker, that in the days to come that will be done.

My sole object in rising was to lend support to this undertaking, because there are many who regard the maritimers as great people in our political, economic and national life.

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): It is on very few occasions that I can rise in this house and endorse what a Conservative has said on this particular issue. On this occasion I do support the scheme that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has introduced in the house. I spent my boyhood days beside a tidal river, and perhaps I understand this proposal a little better than other hon. members who have supported it. I think I am quite safe in speaking for this group. I support the scheme and hope it will have all the success that the minister holds out for it.

Mr. C. T. RICHARD (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say anything on this bill, but after listening to the last three speakers I am glad to know that after so many years the economic situation of the maritimes is arousing a certain interest throughout the rest of Canada. I know that these marshlands can be made very valuable. I wish particularly to thank the two hon. members from Ontario for having said that the economic conditions of the maritimes are appreciated and understood, and that a solution of these conditions is looked for by people in other parts of Canada. I want to impress upon the house the truth of the words used by one hon. member when he said that what is good for one section of Canada is good for the whole of Canada.

This confederation of ours is just as strong as the weakest link. If the maritime provinces are weak, it will mean a weak confederation of provinces. We all know that the economic situation of the maritimes is subnormal, and that that condition has existed for years. In order to appreciate the situation one must go back to the remote past. Some writer has said that the present is intelligible only in the light of the past. In order to understand the economic situation of the maritimes today we must go back to pre-confederation days. The other day one speaker referred to the promises that had been made to the maritime provinces when confederation was consummated. It might be wise for some hon. members to read the speeches of the fathers of confederation, and to learn from those speeches what was the economic situation of the maritime provinces at that time. It was higher than anywhere else in Canada, but it fell on the consummation of confederation. We must ascertain the causes of that, and try to find a remedy. It will not be simple. In the maritimes we do not demand that certain public works be undertaken just for the sake of spending money. We want to bring the economic situation of the maritimes on a par with that of the other provinces. I think this is a beginning.

As one hon. member said a while ago, there are other projects which might be undertaken there. There is one right next door to this project of marsh reclamation, namely, the Chignecto canal. That could be studied. In the maritime provinces we have all contributed our share to public works in the development of the rest of Canada, and we want the rest of Canada to come to our assistance and to study our situation. There are other projects we might study. There is the question of the development of our coal fields, our ports and our fisheries. I am glad to hear, therefore, that hon. members from other parts of the dominion feel that the maritime provinces deserve special study with a view to bringing us up to the point where we can hold our heads high with pride and march along with the other provinces of Canada.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): While those of us in the Social Credit group live a long way from the part of the country which is affected by this bill, we have great pleasure in supporting the views expressed by other hon. members. I feel that every part of Canada has its own particular problems. In the prairies we realize that we have problems which are not confronted in other parts of the dominion, and we know that in the maritimes they have their own particular problems. As the hon. member who has just taken his seat has said, we should all work for the betterment of Canada. To that end we in this group are certainly doing our utmost.

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I just want to add one word. I presume that the minister will have something further to say on this matter. When he replies I trust that he will explain to the house why this bill is so specific. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Richard) referred to another project which was closely allied to the marshlands. I have in mind certain other things which might be included. I am thinking of all-embracing projects which might be of general benefit to Canada as a whole—fuel supplies, and matters of the kind. Why is this legislation so specific? There may be a reason for it. When the minister replies perhaps he will cover that point.

Mr. JOHN R. MacNICOL (Davenport): It certainly is very pleasant to my ears to hear hon. members from all parts of the house speak unanimously in favour of maritime reclamation. I have been preaching reclamation so long myself that I am glad to see others doing the same thing. I hope that the remarks made today will have a wholesome effect on some certain columnists.

On Tuesday last I made some remarks on another matter in connection with the maritimes, and hon. members and the press were generally unanimous in their support; but one columnist of our great papers failed to see that reclamation of the maritimes and reclamation of the west would mean prosperity for Ontario. I might say that it was not an editorial writer who expressed that opinion; it was one of the writers for the paper in question. I cannot understand that, because anyone who thinks for a moment—I mean a Torontonian, a Hamiltonian or anyone else living in Ontario—will know that prosperity in every other part of Canada means prosperity for Toronto and Canada. This particular writer did take quite a fling at me. I do not mind that; it is like water under the bridge. So long as I feel I am doing my duty, and can satisfy my conscience that I am right, I do not care a fig what anyone else thinks against what I say. I do the best I can.

This measure is being initiated by the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). As I said on Friday, I believe he is the first minister who has really put his teeth into the problem, and I have no hesitation in saying again that he deserves credit for the action he has taken. It has been talked about on many occasions in the house by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black), who has been persistent in asking for action in the matter.

Last October the hon. member for Cumberland took out his car after I had landed in his city and drove me over parts of these marsh areas, particularly through the part about which he was speaking today, where the agricultural college is situated. I have always been happy to support what the maritime members have said. They knew their problem, but they did not get very much attention paid to it. It is a delight to me to see them now all receiving support of what they have been fighting for for years. I should just ask if the minister will apply similar reclamation measures to marshlands or flooded lands in Ontario. Recently I was in the onion area in Kent county, western Ontario, an area which the minister knows about. Some 2,000 acres of rich onion land in Kent county are threatened every day with flooding. I hope he will consider making sure that those rich lands in Kent county will also receive consideration.

One further word. The house will support a program like this, and it will support similar programs in other parts of Canada. It must be a comfort to the minister to know that when a reasonable proposal is brought forward, non-politically—and this is entirely non-political—it will receive consideration. I presume that the reclamation departments or the public works departments of the three maritime provinces will co-operate in the whole program. When the bill is in committee I shall have some questions to ask about the organization which is to control the various projects. In New Brunswick considerable study has been made of the question of reclamation of marshlands. On Friday I referred to a bill which was passed last year, I believe. It was a good bill. If the minister has not a copy of it, I shall be glad to send one over to him.

Mr. GARDINER: I have it. Nova Scotia passed one, too.

Mr. MacNICOL: The bill I referred to on Friday pertains to Albert county in New Brunswick. Apparently the maritimes are working together harmoniously and co-operatively. If everyone does that, we will be sure to get somewhere.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is remarkable to see the degree of unanimity which on occasion can be found in this house when a matter of national importance comes before it. I listened with interest to the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black), and also to those of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Richard). They could not but have a profound effect on the thinking of all of us in this house. The bill now before us represents an attempt on the part of the national authority to meet a situation prevailing in one or more provinces. It would have been easy for the government to say that this matter was one of municipal or of provincial jurisdiction rather than to do what they did—recognize that the improvement and reclamation of the areas in question are necessary to the welfare of all parts of Canada.

As one who lives on the prairies I want to say to those who come from the maritimes that over the years we have been appreciative of the wonderful spirit of helpfulness shown to us by members from all other parts of Canada in the difficult days of drought through which we passed. In supporting this measure we but show our appreciation of the support that has been given to us over the years.

There is one further thing I want to say in this connection. I said at the beginning that it would have been easy to say that this is a matter of provincial or municipal responsibility. We should realize that conditions of distress prevailing in British Columbia, while local in extent, may amount to a disaster national in scope. I hope that the responsibility of providing compensation to the flood sufferers will not be placed upon the municipal or provincial authorities in British Columbia. That matter too is a one of national importance; the support of all members in this house must be secured to the end that compensation may be provided nationally, not provincially, to those who have suffered. The same spirit in which hon. members in all parts of this house support the need for reclamation in Nova Scotia calls for a recognition of conditions in British Columbia as a matter of national responsibility.

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I should like to reply to one or two of the remarks which have been made and some of the questions which have been asked.

The question was asked why the bill is confined to this one objective. I would answer that by saying that this is a question which has been under discussion for a long time. Some hon. members have referred to the fact that it has been discussed throughout the whole period that I have been here as Minister of Agriculture. That is thirteen years now. I know it was discussed before that, because this ten-acre plot we have—it is a small acreage compared with that suggested by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black)—which is associated with the experimental farm, was taken over the year before, so that is fourteen years ago; and I presume there was discussion about it prior to that.

Naturally at the beginning, as in all proposals of this kind, we were confronted with the question of responsibility. Our constitution lays it down that a certain authority has the right to collect revenues from certain sources, or to give the right to other bodies, such as municipal bodies, to collect funds from certain sources, and that then, as a result of having that right, they become responsible for doing certain types of work. I think that is generally acknowledged by all political parties right across Canada, and they have been inclined to adhere to that principle. But I am inclined to think that there are many developments which cannot take place on the basis that all funds that are collected must be charged up to lands affected by the expenditures. It has been proven, for example, over a long period of years, that it is impossible to have irrigation developments based upon the price of the land that will benefit thereby. The same is true with regard to projects of this kind. In other words you cannot just say that you can apply a certain method of revenue collection and then take sufficient out of the land affected by the expenditure to pay all the capital costs and other costs of making use of the water, or whatever it may be, in order to make it possible for people to live there. The theory is that somebody must step in and spend money in order to make the project a possibility at all, and that when that money is expended, others can make charges against the land or on the province as a whole and go on with further developments.

When we started to discuss this project that is the one question which always came up: this is a provincial responsibility. The provinces and the dominion were inclined to try to get a bill which would cover all these different projects. Two years ago we had one drafted to bring into the house, but for certain reasons I do not need to discuss now it has not reached the house. So, having reached that stage I rather took the position that it would be very much better to take some of these larger projects, which everyone is disposed to agree ought to be proceeded with, and pass a bill having to do with each, in order to get on with the work.

This bill does not bring up for discussion the hundred and one other ideas that people have with regard to drainage and everything else that might be involved. For the time being we are concentrating on the marshlands and the necessity of having dikes before those marshlands can be utilized at all. The difference between ourselves and the provinces, to begin with, had to do with where we should divide responsibility. As long as we maintained the attitude that we were going to spend one-third, the provinces one-third and those who were to utilize the land one-third, and that we would get it all into one vote and do this, that and the other thing with it, we were not able to get very far, because we could not agree on the various details. This bill, therefore, says the federal government will do the thing someone has to do before anything else can be done—that is, keep the sea out. This bill says we will build the dikes and we will build the aboiteaux in connection with those dikes. We will keep the water out; and the provinces say: If you keep the water out we will start to do the things that must be done behind the dikes before the individual farmers can utilize the land. Then they set up legislation which makes provision for the construction of laterals, in the first place, and for the maintenance of those laterals after they are constructed.

That is the principle on which we are proceeding. In order to eliminate everything else we have confined this bill, as far as we are concerned, to the building of the dikes; then the provinces may undertake, in written agreements which will be signed under the terms of this bill, to do certain things behind those dikes after they are constructed.

Mr. LOCKHART: This would not apply, I take it, to any other project where dikes had to be built and water kept out?

Mr. GARDINER: It applies generally speaking to all the lands in the maritime provinces that require to be diked, but not to anything outside those provinces. There would have to be separate legislation if we were going outside the maritimes. This has to do with the maritimes provinces only, and the necessary diking in connection with these lands. That is one question which some hon. members have been asking, and I wanted to clear it up.

Another question was suggested by the hon. member for Davenport, as to the set-up. I have in my hand a record of what has been done by the governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; and the only reason similar action has not been taken by Prince Edward Island is that up to the present the question has not been discussed in relation to that province. But there are some small areas that require diking in Prince Edward Island, and we thought it well to include them in this bill while we are covering the other two provinces.

Both Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have advisory boards or committees. They have both appointed the same chairman, W. W. Baird, superintendent of the experimental farm at Nappan. Each board has also appointed the same secretary, who is George R. Smith, of Truro, Nova Scotia. They have a common chairman, therefore, and a common secretary. The New Brunswick board is composed of J. A. Roberts, director of agricultural engineering services of the department of agriculture at Fredericton; Donald C. Oxley, assistant district highway engineer of the department of public works, Sussex; W. C. Harper, farmer, of Sackville, and Roy Tingley, farmer, of Midway. Nova Scotia has appointed John E. Belliveau, chief engineer of the department of highways; Angus Banting, agricultural engineer, department of agriculture; Charles Logan, of Amherst, Nova Scotia, and Lebaron Troop, of Granville Centre. These men form the advisory committees mentioned in the bill; and I am sure the same committees would be continued. These men have made a thorough study of the whole situation and have advised in connection with the activities that are to be undertaken under the bill.

I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything more at this time. If hon. members desire to ask questions when the bill is in committee I shall be glad to try to answer them. I only want to join with other hon. members in saying that we feel that in dealing with these larger projects consideration should be given to the possibility of the federal government doing the thing no other single authority can do in order to make it possible for those who must assume responsibility after this work is completed to carry out their responsibilities in that connection. This is the idea that has entered into the development of works under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act in the prairie provinces. It is the idea behind what we have begun to undertake in British Columbia during the last two or three years, which possibly will be discussed still further on my estimates. It is the thing which has been considered also in relation to the central provinces, but which so far has been put into effect only during periods when relief has been required, in connection with flooding on some of the rivers, the cleaning out of river basins and other activities that have been carried on in central Canada. As has been said, however, this is a beginning, and we hope it will aid in the general development right across Canada.

I agree with what has been said as to the necessity for development in the maritimes. I have travelled extensively across Canada. I have never had any personal interest in the maritimes, but I have never gone there without feeling that there may be some reason for the suggestion so often advanced that they did not gain from confederation as much as might have been expected. One has only to look around when there to realize that; and I am satisfied that one of the main tasks we ought to undertake here in Ottawa is the removal of any such feeling from the minds of people in any part of Canada by doing the things that are essential to their development. If this is a step in that direction, then I hope it may not be the end, but that we may have results from this beginning which will be beneficial to the whole dominion.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. HAZEN: How many acres of the marshlands which this bill will affect are in Prince Edward Island, how many in Nova Scotia, and how many in New Brunswick? What is the average acreage owned by the different landowners in New Brunswick?

The CHAIRMAN: I suggest those questions might more properly be asked on section 3.

Mr. HAZEN: Very well.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Minister may construct dikes, etc.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to add one or two further questions in connection with section 3. Perhaps the first is a minor one, but I note that in line 14 the word used is "aboiteaux"; I suggest it should be "aboideaux". I do not know where the spelling with the letter "t" was found, but I have looked it up in Funk and Wagnalls New Standard dictionary and I find the word is spelled "aboideaux". I have been familiar with this word for some time, and I discovered that perhaps it is the one word which originated in the maritime provinces and has become part of the English language. My suggestion is that the spelling be changed to "aboideaux".

In the New Standard dictionary the word is spelled "aboideaux" and is described as a noun; there is a note that it originated in New Brunswick. It is defined as a dike—and perhaps the definition is not a good one—to exclude tidewater from low land.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think that is what this is.

Mr. HAZEN: Will the minister look into that point?

Mr. GARDINER: I shall be pleased to look into it, but I hesitate to change the word. The word is not mine, but rather that of the draftsman. In connection with the definition just given, I would say it is my understanding that this applies only to the gate in the dike.

Mr. HAZEN: Exactly.

Mr. GARDINER: The word meaning a gate may be different from the word the definition of which the hon. member has just read, which defines it as a dike to exclude water from certain land. That is not what this is intended to be, because we have covered that by using the word "dike". An aboiteau, as mentioned in the bill, is just the frame for, and valve which swings on hinges, as was described a few days ago by the hon. member for Davenport. The dike is something different altogether.

Mr. HAZEN: But it is the intention of the dominion government to build these aboideaux?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not profess to be an authority on these matters, but I do believe the correct word should be used.

On Friday the minister told us that part of the money to be spent by the dominion government on this plan will be used for surveys and plans, to an estimated amount of $40,000. As I read the section the minister is given authority to construct and reconstruct and to assist the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island in the construction and reconstruction of dikes, aboiteaux and breakwaters. I was wondering if at the end of that section we should add, "and to give authority to make surveys and plans for that purpose". No mention is made in the section that the minister has authority to make plans and surveys, unless such is implied.

Mr. GARDINER: The Department of Justice considers that it is implied.

In connection with the spelling of the word, may I point out that I have here the submissions made by the provinces, and they spell it the way it appears in the bill. The draftsmen have checked the word and have used the same spelling. As a matter of fact I was corrected when I used the other spelling, and I take it from that there is some reason for spelling the word as we have it in the bill. Perhaps we should leave it that way.

With respect to the acreage covered in each of the provinces, let me point out that the bill is not confined to any definite acreage. Under the bill it is possible to carry on in connection with any acreage in those three provinces which may be affected by this measure. We estimate that it covers about 80,000 acres. I believe there are only two small areas in Prince Edward Island, comprising perhaps a few hundred acres. I should say about sixty per cent is in Nova Scotia and about forty per cent in New Brunswick, and it is about on that basis the division of funds has been made in the last two or three years in making repairs.

Section 3 of the bill sets out what the dominion government is supposed to do. It states:

> Subject to the provisions of this act, the minister may, for the reclamation and development of marshlands in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island, construct and reconstruct and assist the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island in the construction and reconstruction of dikes, aboiteaux and breakwaters.

That is all my department can do. The next section states:

> No work shall be undertaken in any province pursuant to this act unless . . .

And so on. Paragraph (b) states what the province undertakes to do. Those two sections separate what the federal government is going to do from what the provincial governments are to do. The section we are now discussing says that the dominion is to build these outer works. Perhaps I should add that a short time ago the premiers of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were here, along with their officials, and they made submissions to the dominion government as to what they thought they should do. There is only one difference between what they submitted and what is provided in the bill, and that is on the question whether we should do work behind the dikes. The only work which was suggested we might do behind the dikes was the building of main canals and the cleaning of old canals and creeks which had become more or less blocked. We have decided that the dikes should be the place where the division of responsibility is made. We build the dikes and make it possible for all the other works to be carried on behind the dikes, but we thought the responsibility for those works should rest with the provinces.

Mr. HAZEN: About this word "aboiteaux", before I came into the house this afternoon I examined three standard dictionaries and I could not find "aboiteaux" in any of them. I suggest that the minister change the spelling before the third reading if "aboiteaux" is not correct.

Mr. GARDINER: We will do that.

Mr. HAZEN: How many owners are there of these 80,000 acres? What is the maximum acreage owned by any owner? What is the average acreage? What is the value of the land today? What is it estimated the value will be after the improvements are made?

Mr. GARDINER: I am sorry that I have not information as to the average acreage, but from what I saw of the area down there—my hon. friend probably knows a great deal more about it—the farms together with the marshlands would be around a hundred acres, similar to the family-sized farms in other parts of eastern Canada. According to the statement made by the committee which reported upon it, the lands were valued at from $80 to $200 per acre in 1911. I understand that in recent years the valuation has been from $50 to $80 per acre. I presume the objective we would have in mind would be to raise the values to what they were at the earlier stage.

I want to repeat what I said on second reading. If we had followed the general reasoning that passes through people's minds with regard to this kind of thing we would never do it. If you take the cost of these outer works and apply it against the acreage and say that the land must be saleable at the total cost, you would never undertake it. If we approached it from that point of view we would stop right here. That was the main difficulty I had to overcome as the minister who was responsible for convincing the officials and others. I am sure that if we went back and discussed it again we would arrive at just the same place, that these lands probably will never sell at enough to cover the cost of the dikes plus all the other works that must be erected in order to utilize the land. For that reason I do not think it is important that we should argue the matter from that point of view. My memory is that the cost involved would run it up to somewhere between $150 to $200 per acre.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I think the estimate of the minister is correct. Land at the experimental farm has been brought to a high state of cultivation and in a good year it will grow three tons of excellent timothy and clover hay. Such land is worth $200 per acre. Of course the cost of maintaining it in that state of cultivation would be high. It will take a few years, but I think this land should be brought to a state of cultivation where it would have a value of around $150 per acre.

With regard to the word "aboideau", I remember the first address I made in the house dealing with marshlands in 1940 or 1941. At that time I used the word "aboideaux", and my recollection is that Mr. Young called me in and asked what the word was so that it could be checked as to spelling. A search was made and they found the word referred to by the hon. member for St. John-Albert.

There was another word used by the old Acadians; it sounded like "pamang". I am afraid I do not know how to spell this word. It refers to the method of using sod in building the face of dikes. This is one problem which will have to be faced by the commission that is to have the responsibility of building these dikes. When the early Acadians built their dikes they retained the sod on the face in a rhombus shape with the grass against the tide. One sod was fitted into another to form the early dikes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Have plans been submitted for constructing the aboideaux? Are there to be concrete walls into which the aboideaux will be fitted or will a framework be used?

Mr. GARDINER: I understand it is to be the old style construction of wood and brush.

Mr. MacNICOL: It was that type of construction that really permitted the whole business to break down. The water got around the framework and washed backward and forward as the tide came in. They were not looked after and finally the whole thing was destroyed. I have sufficient confidence in the engineers to know that proper construction will be used. This is really the important part of the whole dike.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Locally "aboideaux" means the whole structure across the stream or drainage channel, not just the sluiceway. The sluiceways have always been built of wood. As they are kept continuously wet with salt water there is little deterioration. Aboideaux built by the Acadians 200 and more years ago are still there. Deterioration occurs by the water washing away the earth around the sluiceway and undermining the whole aboideau.

It takes a great deal of practical skill to construct these aboideaux. Most of the men experienced in this work have passed away. One of the last of them was Mr. John Lusby of the town of Amherst, Nova Scotia, who died about a year ago. Because of his wide practical experience he was called into consultation by the two provinces. An engineer, unless he has practical knowledge and can by study acquaint himself with the requirements will have considerable responsibility on his shoulders in placing these aboideaux, embedding them with brush, then the woodwork, and then the top. It is quite an undertaking.

Mr. RICHARD (Gloucester): I have listened with a great deal of interest to the suggestions that have been made as to the word "aboiteau" or "aboideau" and as to the construction of these works. I quite agree with the hon. member for St. John-Albert that the proper word is aboideau. I have seen the other word used, but I think the proper word is aboideau. I have forgotten its derivation, but you have to go back into Acadian history to find where the word comes from.

As far as the construction of the aboideaux is concerned, some of them, as the hon. member for Cumberland has said, have stood for 200 years. There is a knack in constructing them, and the Acadian people were the only ones who had the knack. They had brought it over with them from the old country and they could construct these works to withstand the strength of the tides. Whether the engineers of today can improve their methods I do not know. Somebody has suggested that the works be of concrete. I do not think it would work at all, because there is no sort of foundation for concrete. I do not know how far down you would have to dig before you came to rock; and the old settlers, having discovered that, used these wooden structures, which seemed to last for generation after generation, even though constantly submerged. As one hon. member has said there are very few people there now who have the knack of constructing these works. This may appear strange to some people, but you have to see the construction itself to know just why these works are so difficult to build. They have withstood the seas for two centuries. I know those who will have charge of constructing these works will have made a study of the works that exist there today and will know whether up-to-date engineering can suggest anything better.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I have had a French-Canadian dictionary brought to me from the library, and I should like to read the definition of this word in French; the English translation will be found on page 4600 of Hansard:

Aboiteau (abweto) s.m.

1. Aboiteau, barrage, obstacle mis au cours de l'eau.

Fr.—Le peuple prononce aboiteau.

Can.—Les aboiteaux sont des remblais établis sur le bord d'une rivière.

2. Vanne, dans un barrage, disposée de façon qu'elle se ferme automatiquement quand la marée monte et qu'elle laisse s'écouler l'eau quand la marée est basse.

Dial.—Aboiteau=petit batardeau fait pour retenir l'eau, Saintonge.

3. Masse de glace désagrégée que les rivières charrient dans leurs débâcles.

4. Abrivent construit avec de la neige, des branches, pour s'abriter contre le vent (sur les lacs, les rivières, où l'on fait la pêche l'hiver).

That is about all I can find in this dictionary.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): And what is the spelling? There is no problem as to the spelling locally. They always call it "biteau". I would ask the minister this question. Have the provincial governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick agreed to the modifications in their proposals, as set out in the bill submitted to the house? Is there an undertaking on behalf of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to enter into agreements on the basis of the legislation now before us?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know that I can say there has been an agreement, but there has been discussion back and forth between the provinces and the dominion. There has always been the question just where it should end, but never any great difference of opinion about it. Naturally the provinces would like us to construct the canals and clean out the creeks, because that is going to cost some money. I do not think there will be any great difficulty about it. It may be that the provinces will want to take longer to do their share, with responsibility for the creeks and canals placed on them. My own opinion with regard to the matter is that it is important that the outer dikes be built and that we get right on with that job. I would like to see it done within three or four years rather than spread it over ten years. A certain amount of work may have to be done to the creeks and canals inside the dikes immediately, and we may have to reach some agreement about that. It should be done while the equipment is there. I do not think there will be any great difficulty about coming to an arrangement in regard to it.

I think I should explain to the committee that the provinces recommended to the dominion, when we had a meeting some time ago, that the dominion government do those main ditches and clean out those creeks, but there has been some difference of opinion about that, and I thought we had better get along with the job.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not want the hon. member for Gloucester to think I recommended concrete. I merely asked if concrete would be suitable, not because I wanted it to be used. Last spring, Mr. Chairman, you will remember the pictures that were shown under my auspices in the railway committee room, a lovely moving picture of the construction of dikes. Some of the pictures I took myself, but most of them were films of the national film board, showing how to construct a large aboiteau, the framework and so forth on land, and then float it out to where it was to be sunk. It is quite a problem. It would be an interesting picture for the engineers who are to construct these works to see, and I suggest that the minister might arrange to have the picture shown again some Saturday. The maritime members are nearly always here on Saturday. The pictures would be of interest to them and to anybody else who would like to see them.

Mr. HAZEN: The people of the maritime provinces, the French-Canadians and the English-speaking, have added a new word to the English language and that is "aboideau".

Mr. GARDINER: We can have the proper word put in when the bill goes to the senate.

Mr. HAZEN: I think it would be a great mistake not to use that word if it is the word intended. Possibly in the French translation of this act the other word should be used, but in the English version I feel that the word "aboideaux" should be used.

Mr. GARDINER: We shall have all this discussion referred to the legal authorities, and if that is the proper word to put in, then we shall have that amendment made in the senate when the bill is before the committee there. On the other question, all I should like to say is that we shall have to leave it to the engineers. I would not like to take any responsibility for saying how these aboiteaux should be built.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Have the governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick had a copy of this bill we are now considering placed in their hands?

Mr. GARDINER: No, not as it is drafted. There is no difference at all in the bill. I have a copy of the submissions here, and I heard all the discussions, and took part in them myself. The bill is in accordance with what the provinces asked for. Everything is in it that they asked for, except the one thing that I have spoken of. Under this bill we have not undertaken to do the creeks and canals. I again submit that that is not a matter which should hold up the general procedure in getting these outer works done. If it must be discussed further at some other time that can be done. There is no reason why it cannot be done at a later time and changes made, but for the time being I think the bill ought to go through as it is.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Is the minister satisfied that the provincial governments will assume full responsibility for what is assigned to them under this measure?

Mr. GARDINER: I am quite sure that they will, yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—No work to be constructed unless recommended by advisory committee and agreement made with province.

Mr. HAZEN: Has a form of clause been drafted and agreed to with the provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: No, there has not been a form drafted for this particular purpose. We thought that could not very well be done until the bill was passed. We have had a form of agreement with them on the works that we have already been doing. I have a copy of it here. I may say it seems to have passed all right for a year or two with the word spelled as we have spelled it in the bill. It is in that agreement that we have it.

Mr. HAZEN: Has any consideration been given to what will happen if the provinces, either with or without assistance of the marsh owners, fail to live up to the conditions of the agreement in maintaining the works after they have been constructed?

Mr. GARDINER: There is not a great deal that can happen. If we build the dikes the dikes will be there, and I do not think anyone will pull them down. If they do not make use of them we shall at least have done our share. We feel that a great many people will make use of them. It may be that there are some who occupy or own some of the 80,000 acres who may not do so. I do not think any penalty will be placed upon them so far as we are concerned, but we feel that a sufficient number of them will make use of the dikes to make this bill effective.

Mr. HAZEN: Dikes have to be constantly maintained. There is the wear and tear of the tide every day which comes against the face of these dikes. Unless attention is given to them yearly, they are bound to go down, and somebody has to see to them. If one part goes down and the sea comes in, it gets around and into the others. I know what happened at Hillsborough. One dike was washed out, or part of it, and then the sea got in and came around what might be called a lateral dike. I do not know whether that is the proper expression to use, but it went on to another area of dike land that was looked after by a different commission. That was washed out, and gradually the whole thing was destroyed.

The responsibility must rest on somebody to maintain these dikes after they are built. Perhaps the law having to do with the maintenance of the dikes has been revised. I think it will have to be revised if the dikes are to be maintained, if they are to serve the purpose they are intended to serve by this bill, and if the money that has been expended is to be properly used and not wasted.

Mr. ISNOR: It is only reasonable to assume that in a three-way agreement under which the federal government is paying a certain proportion and the provincial governments are paying a certain proportion, and these two are paying $93 an acre toward the re-establishment of this land, and the landowner in turn pays another $18, they will look after the land. As I understand it, the agreement is practically the same as that which was presented by the provinces, with the exception of two items. The first two items which the provinces asked the federal government to take charge of have been included in the provincial government's proportion; otherwise the agreement is as presented to the federal government.

Mr. HAZEN: As I understand this bill, the landowner does not have to sign any agreement. Will he have to sign one with the provinces? Does the dominion spend so much money, the province spend so much money, and the landowner not have to sign any agreement at all? When the minister spoke on Friday he mentioned three divisions. He mentioned what the dominion was supposed to do, what the province was supposed to do and what the landowner was supposed to do; but the bill does not say that the landowner has to enter into an agreement with either the provincial or the dominion government.

Mr. GARDINER: The bill gives the minister authority to make an agreement with the provinces involving all the matters which are now under discussion. The questions which are now being discussed will be discussed at that time. Either we will agree or we will not. I expect that we will agree. The province has made submissions to us with regard to the point that is now being discussed. A part of the submission reads as follows:

> Nova Scotia and New Brunswick will control, operate and maintain, as provided for by legislation, and organization thereafter, of approved dikeland projects constructed or reconstructed under this agreement or transfer by Canada to Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, such lands, rights or interests in lands acquired by Canada in respect of such projects.

There is a submission made by the provinces along that line having to do with all these matters, but that submission does not bind them, and it does not bind us at the present time, but it is in the form of a model agreement. We will sit down and discuss all these things, and finally sign an agreement. This afternoon I do not want to try to say what agreement we are going to sign. I do not know. The particular point that is now being discussed will be a point of discussion between us. I would assume that they may say we should have certain responsibilities with regard to maintenance. We may be prepared to assume some responsibility with regard to maintenance, and the whole question of what is done with other works behind the dikes may come under discussion. At the same time the provinces may say, provided that you do so-and-so we will do so-and-so.

We may have to come back with an amendment to this bill at some future time. We have a temporary arrangement with the provinces under which we are proceeding this summer. We do not require this legislation at all for what we are doing this year, or for the responsibilities we have this year. With this bill in the hands of the provinces and ourselves we shall be in a much better position to sit down between now and the next session of the house and attempt to draw this agreement. If there are certain things that may have to be done or certain amendments brought in, we would be in a position to do that. I think it is better to put the legislation through as it now is, and then have our discussions between now and the next session and be in a position to make any amendments, if they are necessary.

Mr. HAZEN: Under the temporary arrangement to which the minister has referred, does the landowner pay a third?

Mr. GARDINER: The provision is that the province can collect up to one-third, they are not allowed to collect more than a third; but they may not collect a third, or they may not collect anything. We pay up to $60,000 in one case and $40,000 in the other; three-fifths of the total is in Nova Scotia and two-fifths of it is in New Brunswick, or $100,000 altogether. We agree to pay up to that figure. Then the province agrees to pay double that amount, which makes $300,000 altogether, and they undertake to collect not more than one-third of that from the individual. That means that we pay a third, the province pays a third and the individual pays a third, if the province collects a third.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I agree with the minister that this legislation should be enacted as quickly as possible. I think it is unfortunate though that the agreement is not entered into with the provinces as soon as this legislation is enacted. There will be little work done this year under the three-way agreement referred to by the hon. member for St. John-Albert. Proprietors will not assume responsibility for undertaking construction that will impose upon them a much larger percentage of the cost than would be required after this legislation is passed. I know of aboideaux and stretches of dike that are out now, with respect to which, when this legislation is passed, the proprietors would not be required to contribute. They must contribute to the earlier work. They must bring their land to a high state of fertility and production under the present undertaking. There should be an understanding with the provinces as soon as this legislation is passed, that the legislation will apply to all work that will be done this year; and it should be made effective just as quickly as possible.

On section 7—Purchase or rental of machinery.

Mr. HAZEN: Is it the intention of the government to build these dikes by calling for contracts, or do they intend to do some of the work themselves? I see they ask for the right to purchase or rent machinery. If they intend to let contracts, why do they want the right to purchase machinery or to rent it?

Mr. GARDINER: In all probability we shall have most of the work done under contract, through calling for tenders. But I would imagine that we must have machinery of our own while the work is under construction. In any event, it will be our responsibility to see that it is there; and even if we do not do any of what one might call the actual contract work, it will be necessary for us to have machinery. We are profiting by our experience in work we have done in western Canada. We have machinery, although all of our large projects are done under tender, by contractors.

Mr. HAZEN: You rent the machines to the contractors?

Mr. GARDINER: There may be cases where machines are rented to the contractors, and there may be cases where we rent machines from them.

Mr. HAZEN: And do some of the work yourselves?

Mr. GARDINER: And do some work which has to be done in some of these cases, such as levelling land and that type of work which may be done by the government.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I think this should go a little bit further. The advisory committee or the minister should take authority to construct or alter machinery according to the experience they may gain. This is a particular type of machinery. Marsh mud is one of the hardest types of soil to handle. Some machinery has been utilized that works well, but no machinery has yet been devised or built that I know of that will properly handle this marsh mud under all circumstances. The minister or the advisory committee, or whoever has responsibility, should be given authority to construct and experiment in the building of certain types of machinery. They may have to build one machine and then make changes in it after they have put it into actual operation. Someone will have to have that authority, if you are to get the full benefit of mechanical equipment in undertaking this work. I should like to ask the minister if, under this legislation, there is authority to build machinery.

Mr. GARDINER: I should not like to put my legal knowledge up as final on anything of that kind. But section 3 gives us all the authority that is necessary to build a dike. If we have to build a machine to build a dike, I suppose we can build a machine to build a dike. What this clause has in mind is simply to limit the minister in what he can do. I cannot buy any more than $5,000 worth of machinery, and I cannot sell machinery worth more than a certain amount. We can buy it but it is limited in amount. If I want more, I must come back to council in order to get authority.

Bill reported.

Mr. GARDINER moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. KNOWLES: Did I understand the minister to say he would see to it that the senate look into the question of the spelling of the word, whether it is "aboideau" or "aboiteau"?

Mr. GARDINER: I suggested that we shall see to it that the legal authorities look into the spelling of the word; and if an amendment is required, we shall have it done in the senate.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

DISPLACED PERSONS AND REFUGEES—BRITISH IMMIGRATION

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to discuss a matter that I had intended to discuss on Thursday evening last, but in order to allow the vote to be taken on the budget I agreed to make my speech at this time.

This is the seventh time in the last three years that I have risen to discuss the problem of displaced persons and refugees. I do so, knowing that displaced persons, in their present position, cannot speak for themselves. In one month from now the present session will likely be concluded and up to this time in this session but few references have been made to this tragic and extremely important problem. I desire, therefore, to take this opportunity to review in a sort of documentary way the displaced persons problem under the heading, "What have the democratic nations done to solve the displaced persons problem?"

First I wish to deal with repatriation. From the D-day landing in Normandy in May, 1944, to the present time the policy of the west has been the repatriation of displaced persons to their places of origin. That was the policy of UNRRA and it is now the policy of the preparatory commission of the IRO. UNRRA's United States zone headquarters administrative order No. 199 of November 11, 1946, is a good sample of the many orders issued in all zones from time to time in reference to this matter. It stated:

> UNRRA and military authorities are in agreement on the advisability for speedy return of the greatest possible number of displaced persons to their homelands. . . This policy represents the substance of resolutions under which UNRRA now operates and is in keeping with the Yalta agreement.

Similarly the policy of the preparatory commission of IRO in this matter is based on the constitution of IRO, article 2, section (a), which states:

> To encourage and assist in every way possible the early return to their country of nationality or of former habitual residence of those persons who are the concern of the organization . . .

Four methods have been used to carry out the repatriation programs of UNRRA and IRO. The first method was that of forced repatriation. For more than a year following the end of the war in Europe, repatriation was carried out by every means, including the use of force. Persons who were both citizens of and actually present within the boundaries of the territories held by Soviet Russia on September 1, 1939, were forcibly repatriated in accordance with the terms of the ill-omened Yalta agreement to which the United Kingdom, the United States and the U.S.S.R. were signatories. Many persons who came from territories which, following world war II, were annexed to the U.S.S.R. were also forcibly repatriated. This is what Life magazine had to say on this matter in its editorial in the issue of September 29, 1947:

> The first thing that happened to them in the hectic hours after V-E day was that, wherever they found themselves outside the Soviet zones, masses of them were herded by British and American troops back over into the Russian side of the line . . . several millions of people who had been pulled out of Russia and Russian occupied territory and who now didn't want to go back went back whether they wanted to or not. And quite a few went back tied up in ropes, delivered like African slaves in the blackbirding days . . . The more loath a non-returner is to return, the more eager the Soviet union is for his return. You can guess why. Let loose in the capitalist world, he would not serve as a very good propagandist for communism. In short, these people are "not displaced persons." They are, in the simplest terms, political refugees. They are refugees from communism . . . If the American people and their representatives were agents of the Kremlin, they could have scarcely done more to deliver these refugees to the assassin and slave master.

After a year of this bloody business, which is so vividly described in the editorial just quoted, the west discovered that most displaced persons would rather commit suicide than return to their places of origin. Many actually committed suicide; but finally the horrible tragedy stirred the conscience of true Christians in the United Kingdom, the United States, Canada, France and above all in the Vatican, and as a result appeals were made to the British and United States governments to terminate the policy of forced repatriation. Consequently forced repatriation was largely discontinued, except for three classes of persons, namely only those persons who were both citizens of and actually domiciled within the territories held by Soviet Russia on September 1, 1939; that is: (1) those who were captured in German uniforms; (2) those who were members of the armed forces on or about June 22, 1941, and were not subsequently discharged therefrom; (3) those who, on the basis of responsible evidence, have been found to be collaborators with the enemy, having voluntarily rendered aid and comfort to the enemy.

Although the terms to which I have just referred lend themselves to various interpretations, nevertheless the amended directives were an improvement over the previous vicious terms to which the west agreed at Yalta on February 11, 1945.

The second method which was used in repatriating a large number of defenceless and unfortunate D.P.'s was a practice privately arranged between the U.S.S.R. repatriation officers and some camp and area directors. Under this scheme the director would be conveniently absent from the camp when the Soviet repatriation teams called. With the use of firearms the Soviet officers would round up a number of D.P.'s and load them on trucks, and that would be the last anyone would see or hear of them. This kidnapping method of repatriation was employed until about a year and a half ago.

The third method followed in the matter of repatriation is still being used to this very day. Under this scheme the Soviet repatriation personnel are granted permission to carry on in camps what is called an "educational campaign". This is done by means of the distribution of literature depicting the "happy life" under communism. The moving-picture technique is also being used. Following the showing of a movie, or an educational program, appeals are made to D.P.'s by Soviet officers to return to their places of origin. In the past Soviet repatriation officers have been assisted in this work by UNRRA officials, while at the present time the IRO personnel is under obligation to render such assistance. However, this system of repatriation brought disappointing results, and for that reason still another system was initiated two years ago and is still being used.

The fourth system is called voluntary repatriation by incentive. The nations of the west adopted this system as a face-saving scheme. However, in the net result its operation is very much similar to forced repatriation. Under this method of repatriation, food rations are reduced considerably below the number of calories required by a normal person. The second step of this softening-up process as used in certain areas is the transfer of D.P.'s from camp to camp several times during the year. Orders are issued to move the occupants from one camp to another, in order to break their morale. Following such food reductions and camp movements, extra rations of food and better clothing are offered those who volunteer to be repatriated.

To those who have not followed this problem closely, my statements undoubtedly appear somewhat farfetched; but let me quote what was said on this matter by Mr. T. J. Keenan, former Canadian UNRRA officer, in his submission to the senate committee on immigration and labour, as it is recorded at page 108 of the proceedings of that committee for April 30, 1947. Mr. Keenan said:

> My work dealt chiefly with Polish repatriation. We established a policy in Lubeck . . . of moving Poles from one camp to another simply to overcome the inertia of those people wishing to remain in one place. Always we had more Poles for repatriation when we had such a camp move.

As you will gather, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Keenan was describing what was done in the Polish camp of which he had charge, but the same practice was followed in camps in which Ukrainians, Yugoslavs and others were housed.

Another Canadian, the Reverend Ian MacKay, also a former UNRRA worker, in a statement to the immigration and labour committee at page 63 of the April 24, 1947, issue of the report quotes from a letter from his UNRRA co-worker as follows:

> During the early months of winter most of our D.P.'s were shunted unmercifully around the country under a plan to hand back as much accommodation as possible . . . Necessary, but hardly humane, as some of them have suffered five moves in three months.

Then, less than two months ago I received a letter dated March 19, 1948, from an official of the preparatory commission of IRO, stating that the shifting on D.P.'s from camp to camp is being continued. This is what this official has to say:

> The D.P.'s in our camps have done a wonderful job in converting stables into living quarters. Both these camps have been improved out of recognition, simply by the work of the people themselves. One of our camps was recently threatened with a move to another camp. The committee and I went up in a truck one bleak Sunday to look over the new camp and on seeing it the spirits of the members of the committee sank to zero. Some of the blocks were damp and badly in need of repair. All of the blocks contained large rooms. Do you realize what that means? No privacy! Two or three families in one room. Then there was no ground for vegetable gardens. In fact, the place seemed like a desert. The D.P.'s would have had to begin all over again from scratch and, for some of them, this would have been the third or even the fourth move.
> But after an awful struggle, we managed to have the move cancelled, but only after agreeing to take 500 more people into one of our camps. There is nothing more distressing for these poor people than to be moved from one place to another. They have made homes out of their over-crowded living quarters; they have established schools, churches, theatres, workshops, they have cleared away ruins and rubble; they have repaired the heating system, plumbing and electricity. What for? Only to be moved on to another camp to begin the same story all over again.

As I have already stated, after several moves such as I described, those who volunteer to be repatriated are offered extra rations of food and better clothing. To quote from Mr. Keenan's presentation once again, this is what he had to say on that point:

> The director general of UNRRA arranged a 60-day ration to be given to each person on arrival in Poland by UNRRA warehouse team, stored there for that purpose. UNRRA repatriation teams ran a transit camp in Lubeck where another warehouse team provided extra cigarettes and chocolate bars for those on their way back . . . Our policy was to "freeze" the better clothing for . . . repatriation. In my warehouse there were sixty-eight fur coats donated in the bundles for UNRRA, from either the United States or Canada. Some of them were damaged somewhat, but they made quite an impression when we started giving them out to the women who were going back . . .

In addition to Mr. Keenan's revealing statement, I also have in my possession official UNRRA and IRO charts showing what effect the bribe of a 60-day or a 90-day promise of extra food ration had on repatriation. Life magazine, in the same editorial from which I have already quoted had this to say on that point:

> For two years UNRRA team directors were told to "subjugate" all ideas except repatriation, for which they had to work "heart and soul". Other pressures were used. . . . Camp papers and even schools and shops were discontinued in an effort to break up the anti-repatriation sentiment. Leaders of the sentiment were sent to separate camps. And those who had been repatriated and had then returned and been taken into custody, were likewise isolated.

The reason I have emphasized this particular point is that there is a moral principle involved and to show also to what lengths the nations of the west have gone in appeasing the evil totalitarian regimes even at the cost of suffering, and life itself, on the part of the defenceless D.P.'s. To me, that has only one meaning, namely a new form of slave trade in the twentieth century. It is obvious that such anti-Christian treatment of people does not belong to the western world, nor can such treatment be reconciled with our concept of civilization. The use of bread as a bait in forcing starving, broken-down, unfortunate and defenceless Christians into the clutches of tyrannical and atheistic regimes will remain a hideous blot on the conscience of the west for generations to come. It is barbarism, regardless in what clothes of respectability it may be garbed.

The second phase of the D.P. problem with which I propose to deal has to do with the care and maintenance of displaced persons. It has been the responsibility of UNRRA and now it is the responsibility of the preparatory commission of IRO to provide displaced persons with living accommodation, food, clothing, hospital and medical care. The following per day per capita maintenance cost is involved in the caring for the D.P.'s in the various regions:

Care and Maintenance

(a) Analysis of per capita cost programs:

	Per capita per diem
Germany, British zone	$ .20
Germany, United States zone	.29
Germany, French zone	.35
Austria, British zone	.10
Austria, French zone	.05
East Africa	.60
Egypt	.98
India	.65
Lebanon	1.33
Palestine	1.33

(b) Cash assistance programs:

Belgium	.76
France and North Africa	1.00
Netherlands	.42
Portugal	1.48
Spain	1.22
Czechoslovakia	.42

For this direct assistance, not only D.P.'s but their relatives in many parts of the world are grateful to UNRRA and to the preparatory commission of IRO, but more particularly to the nations which so generously contributed to the budgets of these two organizations. World Report publication stated that the United States, United Kingdom and Canada contributed ninety-four per cent of the total budget of UNRRA. During the past few months of the operation of the preparatory commission of IRO some twelve or more countries committed themselves to the budgetary expenditures of IRO. I noted that Canada's contribution is $1,360,179.28. This money has been contributed with a view, of course, to solving the D.P. and refugee problem.

I have already stated that both UNRRA and the preparatory commission of IRO deserve credit for much of what they have done. In this connection I should like to pay a sincere tribute to a large number of conscientious men and women who served with UNRRA, and I should like to pay an equally sincere tribute to the conscientious workers who are now serving with the preparatory commission of IRO. During my tour of displaced persons camps a year ago, I personally met many of them. Of the majority of UNRRA and IRO personnel I will say that they are persons who have devoted themselves to a humanitarian and Christian task. But I must also make reference to a small number of former UNRRA personnel, and the same would apply to IRO personnel, occupying strategic positions, who looked for their directions to Moscow and not London or Washington. It was on account of the infiltration of these persons into the service of UNRRA at all levels that UNRRA fell into disrepute and finally had to be absorbed by the preparatory commission of IRO. It is regrettable that a small number of Soviet sympathizers succeeded in changing UNRRA into a repatriation organization and also into a Soviet propaganda agency.

Many directives which originated in UNRRA offices have been of the most vicious type. Under these directives, the people in the camps were screened and re-screened. They were moved from camp to camp. Camp publications were suspended. Newspapers published in the democratic countries of the west, in the languages in which D.P.'s could read, were not allowed into the camps. Anyone failing to produce sufficient identification cards was refused acceptance into the camp. This further reduced the ration of camp occupants, because they had to share their food with those living outside the camps. The facts are that a large number of genuine D.P.'s have not received and are not at present receiving any assistance. This assistance was refused to them, while they would have been entitled to it under a more humane set-up.

Before leaving this point I should like to put on record a decision which was made by the preparatory commission conference of IRO and which appeared in a statement issued to the press on October 15, 1947. Included in the list of classes of persons to whom IRO is forbidden to give any assistance is found the following clause:

> Persons who, since the end of hostilities, have become leaders of movements hostile to the governments of their country of origin.

May I ask: To which governments have the leaders of displaced persons been hostile? Obviously to the communist governments in the totalitarian countries. It follows therefore, in fact, that this IRO resolution prohibits displaced persons from opposing communist regimes. I leave that statement to hon. members to ponder over.

I now come to the third phase of my discussion namely, the one on emigration. Millions of people having been repatriated and some thousands having been settled in the various countries of the world. In January, 1948, there still remained in the camps, supervised by the preparatory commission of IRO

626,200 D.P.'s. An additional 79,200 receive care and maintenance from sources other than the preparatory commission of IRO. A further 846,500 D.P.'s of various classifications do not receive care or maintenance from any organization. The net total of all D.P.'s is, therefore, 1,551,900. Of the last group mentioned, only a portion will qualify for emigration. For practical purposes a figure of 750,000 is the immediate concern of the countries that signed the IRO charter.

If at the end of my speech the house would permit me to put the latest table on the record showing the number of D.P.'s of various origins and where they are, I am sure that those who are following this question closely would appreciate having these figures.

Keeping these people in the camps is costly, in spite of the fact that many of them live on a below-subsistence level, and to continue keeping them in the camps will not solve the displaced persons problem. The obvious thing to do is to resettle them in the various countries which will accept them. The task of resettling this remaining number of D.P.'s was commenced about a year and a half ago by the inter-governmental committee on refugees. The work of IGCR has, however, been taken over by the preparatory commission of IRO, together with the responsibilities which were formerly carried by UNRRA, namely, those in connection with the caring for the D.P.'s.

The preparatory commission of IRO has in the past few months made a beginning in what may be considered an ultimate solution of the problem. It is a source of satisfaction to know that in the course of the past year or so a number of D.P.'s have emigrated to the United Kingdom, Belgium, Holland, France, Canada, the United States of America, Australia, South Africa, Switzerland, Guatemala, Argentina, Brazil, Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, Paraguay, Peru and Venezuela. The last nine countries mentioned have agreed to admit refugees and immigrants in considerable numbers, under mass settlement agreements, or as individual migrants. The United Kingdom, although in a weak economic position, is leading all countries in accepting the D.P.'s. The South American countries have made offers to accept large numbers of D.P.'s, but climate and settlement conditions in some of these countries are not entirely suitable. From a press report from Lake Success, of May 12, this is what appeared in the newspapers of May 13, 1948:

> Guatemala offered to accept 50,000 European refugees, but on closer inspection the offer looked more like the harsh indenture contract

. . . For five years D.P.'s accepting the Guatemalan government's offer would have to work in clearing and farming the remote Ixican valley at a wage of 16 cents a day. There would be guards to see they did not escape to commercial centres.

Thus far the United States of America made no special provision for admitting D.P.'s. It has, however, admitted a number of D.P.'s under the existing United States regulations, under a quota system. I notice in the press that the United States is now considering legislation which, if adopted, would provide for the acceptance of a substantial number of D.P.'s over and above the quotas provided for under the immigration act.

Canada has made a beginning in accepting D.P. settlers. According to the statement included in the proceedings of the committee on immigration and labour of April 28, 1948, out of a total of 16,010 D.P.'s who arrived in Canada up to April 26, 1948, 10,336 were workers brought over by various industrial firms through the Department of Labour. Of the remaining number, 5,168 were relatives of Canadians. I need hardly comment on the number admitted, except to say that it is also in Canada's interest to help in the solution of the displaced persons problem. At least one of the many considerations is that it is in the interest of the west to remove the D.P.'s from Germany and Austria as early as possible and before the peace treaties are signed.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): If my hon. friend would not go quite so fast we could all hear what he has to say. He is going too fast to hear. I hope the hon. member will accept my apology for interrupting him, but I know he has so much to say and it is so important that he should keep within the confines of the rules of the house which say that we must listen to what he has to say.

Mr. HLYNKA: I want to get this message over in the time at my disposal and that is the reason I am hurrying.

At this point, on behalf of those who have already been admitted to our country since the end of the war I wish to express sincere thanks to those who in any way made it possible for these unfortunate, but now fortunate, people to come to Canada. I should particularly like to pay tribute to those industrialists on whose responsibility and through whose initiative a number of displaced persons workers were brought to Canada and for offering them employment. I quite realize that there may be an odd employer who may be taking advantage of the D.P.'s, but I have met a large number of D.P.'s who expressed gratitude to the management of their firms for bringing them here, employing them and for the treatment they receive.

In spite of the fact, however, that a certain number of D.P.'s have been accepted by various countries, the problem of displaced persons has merely been touched. This is what a top-ranking preparatory commission IRO official had to say in his letter to me of March 23, 1948, about the displaced persons situation in Austria. He says:

I am very glad to hear from you again and only wish that I could report some real progress in the refugee operation. Unfortunately we are still struggling with the same obstacles and prejudices that you and I discussed a year ago. Although we have re-established a large number of people as workers on a more or less individual basis, the actual problem has not been touched. . . I had hoped that a scheme for group settlement, particularly of Baltic and Ukrainian people in the United States and Canada, would have been set up and in operation by this time. However, we are still as far from that as ever.

A similar view is expressed in a letter to me of March 19, 1948, by another important preparatory commission IRO official in charge of a number of camps in the United States zone of Germany. He says:

About 400 people from this camp have emigrated, mainly to Belgium (families) and England (single people) to work in the mines or on the land. We are still waiting for news that large numbers may emigrate and not just the young physically fit, but families and older people. We wait and wait and hope and hope. Over half a million people have their eyes fixed towards the west, straining to catch a glimpse of open doors and hands stretched out to welcome them before it is too late. Alas, the doors are closed. They only open now and then to admit some physically perfect specimen—a much needed labourer or specialist. Then they close again hastily lest his mother or wife and child should manage to squeeze in with him.

Such is the displaced persons situation, Mr. Speaker, and in order that Canada may do her share in the solution of this problem, I wish to submit to the house and the government the following ten points for sympathetic consideration:

1. In view of the fact that the majority of those already admitted have been brought to work in the mines, forests, and factories, I suggest that a land settlement scheme be worked out with the provinces and that a generous number of displaced persons be admitted to settle on the land. I have in mind the fact that Canadian-born young people are not likely to go into new settlements to start from scratch for, as we know, many of our young people are moving into the cities, and as our manufacturing industry expands they are being absorbed by these industries. In view of this fact, we would be well advised to admit a generous number of displaced persons families, and other immigrants, to open up and develop the unsettled areas, particularly in the four western provinces. The statement is often made by those who are prejudiced against immigration or by those who do not know better that there is no arable land left for new settlements, and therefore the possibilities of further land settlements are discounted.

I have here a table based on a study giving the figures of land settlement possibilities in Canada. This study gives the number of farm units, each capable of supporting an average family unit of five persons. The farm units may be anywhere from a few acres to as many as 200 acres, depending on the type of soil and other conditions. I should like to place on Hansard this table dealing with agriculturally usable land. The table follows:

Unoccupied agriculturally usable land (acres) in territory served or likely to be served by rail transportation as designated

Province	C.N.R.	N.A.R.	Other R.R.'s.	Total
Manitoba	1,134,400	....	427,400	1,561,800
Saskatchewan	3,292,000	....	1,932,760	5,224,760
Alberta	4,579,120	9,219,520	1,794,160	15,592,800
British Columbia	1,840,300	1,100,000	1,210,700	4,151,000
Total	10,845,820	10,319,520	5,365,020	26,530,360

Farm units it is possible to establish on the above-noted land

Province	C.N.R.	N.A.R.	Other R.R.'s.	Total
Manitoba	3,846	....	2,090	5,936
Saskatchewan	13,117	....	7,907	21,024
Alberta	20,665	45,465	6,501	72,631
British Columbia	20,396	5,500	20,860	46,756
Total	58,024	50,965	37,358	146,347

Mr. KNOWLES: What is the source?

Mr. HLYNKA: As I mentioned a moment ago, this is one of the large organizations. The publication had not been put out, and I could not divulge it before it was published.

On the basis of these figures, an average family of five persons may make a comfortable living on each farm unit. Multiplying the farm units by five will give us the number of persons that can be supported in the proposed settlements. According to these figures, therefore, Manitoba can settle an additional 29,680 persons; Saskatchewan an additional 105,120; Alberta an additional 363,155; and British Columbia an additional 233,780, or a total of 731,735 persons in the four western provinces. So much for land settlement possibilities.

2. Relax excessive health standards which were presumably set for the pre-war period and which do not take into account the human consideration that should enter into our dealing with these stateless people who are the victims of war and communism. The only life they have known in the past nine years was six years in the actual theatre of war and now three years in the camps. Official preparatory commission IRO figures show that in the British zone of Germany hospitalization of camp population is 2·8 per cent; in the United States zone of Germany the population of hospitalized cases is 2·25 per cent; in the French zone of Germany the population of hospitalized displaced persons is 2·4 per cent. In Austria the rate of hospitalization is 2·4 per cent. These percentages are in excess of the normal rate, which is generally considered to be two per cent. But there are many reasons for this higher than normal percentage:

(a) Lack of facilities for the sick in the camps;

(b) Not sufficient fuel in sick bays;

(c) Under-nourishment and lack of varieties of food;

(d) Lack of fresh air due to over-crowding;

(e) Many camp occupants spent a number of years in German and Soviet concentration camps;

(f) Psychological factor of hopelessness as to the future.

At any rate, the rejections by selection immigration missions, which are from twenty to fifty-six per cent, are excessive, if the element of humanity enters into the picture at all. Under a much less exacting health examination than that of any other country, of the 30,500 D.P.'s that the United Kingdom accepted to November 30, 1947, only ninety refugees were returned to the camps.

Rejections on the following grounds should be reconsidered:

(a) D.P.'s who are slightly underweight are not accepted, even though under the existing conditions it is impossible for them to gain in weight, but a few weeks in a new country and some additional food would solve the problem for the underweights;

(b) A person minus a finger or two is now rejected;

(c) A person with a natural mole on the body is rejected;

(d) Persons fifty years and over are not readily accepted, although of the total D.P. population in the camps only 12·9 per cent are over forty-five years of age;

(e) Endemic goitre which is due to local conditions of the water in certain countries, such as Austria and southern Germany, causes rejection, although the fitness of the person is not affected by it, and this condition could easily be remedied, especially upon removal from the region;

(f) Mild cases of heart ailments without decompensation, and otherwise fit in every way, have been rejected;

(g) Persons with healed minimal tubercular lesions which have been healed for some years are condemned as unfit, those who cannot produce a five-year test of cure. This test of cure is normally impossible for D.P.'s to furnish.

The exacting health requirements break up families or discourage them from accepting immigration. Consideration should therefore be given to the relaxation of health standards for persons who are members of a family unit in order that the stronger members of the family may assist a weaker member and the skill of one member balance a lack of skill in others.

3. Extend the regulations to include not only immediate relatives, but also cousins, nephews, nieces, uncles and aunts.

4. Give sympathetic consideration to applications made by Canadians who are in a position to guarantee employment and support to D.P.'s, regardless of profession, occupation, or age.

5. Accept a number of people of cultured talents and professions. Among the D.P.'s there are many top-ranking artists.

6. Make provision for the acceptance of a number of specialists in the various fields. The British government has already accepted a number of such specialists and has granted to them the right to practise their professions, provided that they can produce evidence that they are qualified.

7. I would suggest that the government accept a number of intellectuals who have lived under communism for twenty-five years but escaped, in order that they may tell Canadians the truth about communism. Why the government has not done this up to this time I cannot understand.

8. Arrangements should be made by the immigration missions to process entire families at the same time as the breadwinner. At present, in some instances, examination of all members of the same family is not made at the same time, and the result is that the family unit is broken up or the examined members of the family refuse to leave.

9. Make provision for allowing a certain number of orphan D.P. children. Representations have been made to the department to allow a number of D.P. children to enter Canada; but, for instance, not a single Ukrainian child has been allowed to enter Canada up to this time. Many well-to-do persons are anxious to adopt D.P. orphans. If organizations or private citizens desire to accept the guarantee for these children, why not improve the lot of them, or are we still thinking that by repatriating them we may gain the good will of the communist regimes?

10. My last point has to do with the matter of correct information with respect to procedures and certain decisions in connection with immigration matters. For instance, the preparatory commission of IRO issued a statement on January 5, 1948, regarding transportation grants to group movement of immigrants and also individual immigrants. The people, however, do not know about this decision, and yet it is extremely important to those who cannot afford to pay transportation costs for their relatives. The following information was released by the preparatory commission on January 5, 1948:

Policy—

1. The temporary restriction imposed on September 18, 1947, limiting applications for assistance under mass resettlement schemes to those in receipt of care and maintenance was terminated early in November and, similarly, applicants for individual migration assistance are no longer required to contribute a minimum of 50 per cent of the total cost of their movement. At the present time all eligible refugees and displaced persons who come under section C of part I of annex I of the constitution are entitled to apply to PCIRO for resettlement assistance under either mass resettlement schemes or as individual migrants.

May I close with two quotations which sum up the whole problem better than I can do. This is what was said in the New York Times on May 5, 1948. The article is headed:

Hypocrisy on DP's is Laid to Nations

Geneva, May 4.—William Hallam Tuck of the United States, executive secretary of the preparatory commission of the international refugee organization today bluntly accused the governments that undertook to solve the problem of the displaced persons after world war II with hypocrisy and lack of charity. He was addressing the opening session of the commission's sixth meeting.

"The refugee problem is not being solved," Mr. Tuck told the governmental delegates. "It is not being solved because we have too little of too many things—too little time, too little money, too few ships, and most important of all too little Christian charity among nations."

Mr. Tuck, speaking more frankly than any international official has dared speak before on this subject, charged the governments with looking upon the refugees as so much labour fodder, ignoring the human element and taking an extremely short-sighted view of the consequences of their current policies.

He said refusal of the governments to admit families and dependents was creating a situation among the displaced persons that soon might lead to a reflux of persons to camps in order to join their families. "We are menaced in the relatively near future by something far more serious than the hard core of aged and infirm", Mr. Tuck said, citing soundings among the displaced persons that had indicated that despondent families were beginning to refuse resettlement rather than risk indefinite separation.

Stressing that the problem was no bigger than the settlement of one million persons, Mr. Tuck said passage of legislation admitting a substantial number of displaced persons into the United States "would go a long way toward providing a solution to the major portion of our problem". He ruled out Palestine as a haven of any importance because of the political troubles there. Many more could be usefully resettled in western Europe, he said, if family groups could be admitted together.

"Those governments which created our constitution", he said, "indulged in the luxury of adopting a high moral position. They declared that no refugee who feared to return to his country of origin should be forced to do so. They have not paid the price called for by the position they adopted."

Mr. Tuck revealed that officials of the refugee organization were seriously concerned over the effects of German propaganda on the refugee policies of the member government. Pointing out that the anniversary of the "liberation" of displaced persons comes at the end of this week, he said that during that period the animosity between the Germans and their victims had increased. On the part of the Germans the "means for giving vent to animosity have also increased", he said, adding that the Germans painted the displaced persons as a wayward element. "The record shows that displaced persons are more law-abiding than the population among which they live", Mr. Tuck said.

[Mr. Hlynka.]

On the credit side, Mr. Tuck said he confidently expected early ratification of the international refugee organization's constitution by Brazil, Denmark or Venezuela. The addition of any of these countries would give a permanent status to the organization, he cited new agreements for large-scale resettlement with Brazil and Canada, but he stressed the difficulty of getting transportation. This is so serious that Mr. Tuck said a financial saving was anticipated from transporting displaced persons by air to certain countries.

May I add a few of the Prime Minister's words of wisdom spoken in this house on May 1, 1947:

Apart from all else, in a world of shrinking distances and international insecurity, we cannot ignore the danger that lies in a small population attempting to hold so great a heritage as ours.

Finally, I wish to conclude with a short quotation from Life magazine on the subject of political asylum to stateless persons:

We used to have in this country, and in those of our real allies, a great and glorious tradition of political asylum. The communist Trotsky, for one, was very happy to flee to New York from czarist Russia. But get this for a switch: Nowadays the Soviet union recognizes no right of asylum—its own escapees being branded as traitors and eligible for death—except to those "friends of the working class" who may have to scuttle back to the U.S.S.R. from abroad. . . .

Ever since we have had a government, we have, like all the rest of the world's free lands, offered a haven for oppressed or political fugitives. Has our national memory lapsed? If we took in all the present European crop, Jews and non-Jews, it would increase our population by less than one per cent. And who knows by what amount it would increase our democratic beacon light in an ever-darkening world?

Can any nation say it was not enriched by those to whom it afforded hospitality? Can any say it was not impoverished by those who fled?

We have the example to set in providing asylum for some part of these million fugitives from communism. Literally and piously, for God's sake let us get these people out of their cages. And let us bring in those who wish to come to us.

I hope and pray, Mr. Speaker, that Canada will also establish the principle of providing asylum to those needing it who believe in democracy and God.

Before sitting down, I should like the permission of the house to place on Hansard an interesting table with regard to D.P.'s and refugees.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. HLYNKA: The table follows:

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to say anything this afternoon, but in view of the previous speaker opening up this subject I feel I must put forward a few of my own ideas and the ideas of hundreds of thousands of men in this country who are associated with me in a great organization. During the past week I had an opportunity to attend as a delegate at Saskatoon the Canadian Legion convention, a convention composed of approximately one thousand men who volunteered their services to defend this country. This organization has a right to be and is very much concerned about immigration; a question of national importance. Because of that, Mr. Speaker, this organization has had a committee on immigration for some years. In 1946 this matter came before the dominion convention, but because of the fact that hundreds of thousands of veterans had to be re-established under after-war conditions, the Canadian Legion took the stand that large-scale immigration was not desirable; but now, owing to the fact that greater numbers of our men are re-established and conditions in this country have changed, that policy was changed by unanimous consent at the convention which I recently had the honour to attend.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Before the house rose at six o'clock, I had just started to bring to its attention the immigration policy proposed and suggested by the Canadian Legion. As I mentioned previously, it is an organization of some 300,000 or more veterans who served this country in war and who are anxious to serve it in peace. It is an organization that represents veterans in all provinces and the majority of racial stocks. Because it wishes to serve this country in peace, it gives serious consideration to national problems that are concerning the Canadian people as a whole. Therefore I wish to bring to the attention of this house the considered and unanimous opinion of the Canadian Legion as expressed at the recent convention held in Saskatoon.

I must say, before proceeding, that I fully realize the difficulties which surround this subject, particularly for the Canadian government. It is complicated, complex and presents difficulties that are not seen by the man in the street. But I suggest that the recommendations of the Canadian Legion offer a firm basis upon which to build an immigration policy that will receive the support of the majority of the Canadian people.

The committee that dealt with this question was appointed by the legion at the 1946 dominion convention in Quebec. It was a committee made up of some of the most responsible gentlemen in this country, and they gave a great deal of study to the question, considered it from all aspects in view of the rights and interests of Canadians at present resident in Canada and the necessities of Canada for the future.

The over-all tenor of the resolutions submitted to the committee clearly indicates that since the Quebec convention two major factors have been established.

As I previously stated, at the Quebec convention the legion was of the opinion that large-scale immigration was not desirable until the veterans were re-established and conditions had become more stable in this country. Now the legion suggests:

First—that the veterans of the second world war have been re-established to the point where it may now be considered to be in the national interest that immigration should be contemplated on a larger scale; and

Second—that in connection with the over-all rehabilitation of Europe, Canada must assume her fair share, through immigration, in solving the problem of the displaced person.

I am now reading from the report of the committee on immigration adopted unanimously by that convention:

In connection with the immigration of displaced persons, it is the belief of the committee that, while Canada should stand prepared to do its fair share, the basic desire of Canadians is that the major proportion of new immigrants should be of British and kindred stock, and that immigration activities should be designed to that end.

Then in this report there is reference to the committee's receiving many resolutions in connection with the bringing of immigrants to this country, shall we say, by a process of indentured labour, and strong objection taken to a procedure of immigration which might develop and cause immigrants to be formed into pools of cheap labour. Strong objection was taken to that by many branches of the Canadian Legion; but, owing to the statutory conditions being changed, no action was taken to express an opinion in that respect at the convention. I am sure, however, it is the considered opinion of the legion that they could not support that type of immigration policy. I shall deal briefly with the policy, because I do not wish to take up the time of the house more than is necessary. I am now again reading from the policy of the Canadian Legion on immigration:

The Canadian Legion is of the opinion that entry into Canada of considerable numbers of immigrants is desirable and should be encouraged, subject to rigid control and supervision. This opinion is based on the following premises:

(a) Increased population would reduce the per capita cost of governmental and other services;

(b) Canada is one of the richest, but one of the most under-populated countries in the world. No other country in the temperate zone has such a great wealth of undeveloped natural resources.

(c) An increase in population is necessary to strengthen Canada's position in national defence;

(d) Increased population is necessary to maintain our industrial capacity which so greatly expanded during the war, and we must have increased consumption at home for the products of our fields, mines, forests and factories, as well as to enlarge our export markets;

(e) There is no pioneer or basic labour available in Canada, which is so necessary for the development of our natural resources;

(f) The legion places strong emphasis on maintaining a favourable balance of British emigrants but appreciates the necessity of assisting to the utmost the problem of absorbing suitable displaced persons in Europe, now the responsibility of the united nations; provided that adequate measures are taken to avoid embracing in such movements of displaced persons any with a philosophy or ideal alien to our free democratic way of life. It is believed that persons with special skill or craft entering Canada from displaced persons camps will enhance our economy by introducing new industries, which in turn will provide further opportunities for employment of our citizens. This has already become evident.

And finally:

(h) The legion considers that with the enlarged importance of immigration it is now time to restore the establishment of a separate and well-organized department under a federal minister concerned only with immigration and settlement, instead of permitting immigration to continue as a somewhat obscure branch of the Department of Mines and Resources which has a multiplicity of other unrelated problems to deal with.

I think that is a sound program so far as immigration is concerned.

I wish to deal briefly with the question of displaced persons and of British immigration before resuming my seat. The question of displaced persons is receiving a great deal of consideration from people all across Canada. I am quite sure that the majority of the Canadian people are anxious that we shall play our part in bringing desirable displaced persons to this country. But there is a certain feeling of uneasiness as to the type of some of these displaced persons who are coming to this country, with regard to whether they are suitable people or are receiving suitable location and so on. I might say that, from my conversation with some representatives of organized labour, I find considerable uneasiness in this connection. Only recently I had a letter from the mother of a girl who served with the women's auxiliary corps during this war and who wished to enter domestic service. She did not secure the position because a displaced person offered to take the job at a lower rate of pay. These things are concerning organized labour. I think the government must pay strict attention to that sort of thing and see to it that these people who are brought into this country are not exploited because of their ignorance of conditions, and their natural desire, shall I say, to do something to express their appreciation of being allowed to come to Canada.

I might also say, Mr. Speaker, that the veterans are concerned about this problem. I have talked to a good number of veterans and I find many of them seriously concerned. When I was proceeding to the convention at Saskatoon there were two carloads of displaced persons on the train on which we were riding, and with a number of veterans—and incidentally some from the province of Quebec —I made a tour of those coaches. The least I can say in that respect is that we were not impressed with what we saw.

Quite recently I had occasion to have a conversation on this matter with an official of another government from Germany; and as a result, I would say the Canadian government has been too late in acting to secure the best type of displaced person to bring to Canada. From the information I received, it is my opinion that many of the best of these people have gone to other countries. I am all in favour of bringing to Canada the relatives of good citizens of this country. They can be provided with homes; they have contacts which will enable them to obtain jobs. I am all in favour of bringing those we are certain were on our side during the last war, who were willing to go to concentration camps for the sake of their principles, and who suffered. I know there are those who for political reasons, cannot return to certain European countries, but any man who is a political refugee and also a sound democrat should be able to come to this country.

At the same time, from what I hear, I am of the opinion our screening of these people is not entirely satisfactory. In making this criticism I fully realize the difficulties. We want to be certain that the people we bring here are those who will accept and develop our democratic ideals and our attitude toward life. We also want to make sure that when they come to this country they are not going to displace a veteran or another Canadian from a home, but that they will be able to find homes and employment, and can be properly absorbed.

Reference was made by the speaker who preceded me to the fact that a great many of these people are very suitable to go on the land, and I have no doubt that is true. Personally, however, I do not think we should take such a pessimistic view of Canadian youth as to suggest that they all wish to go to the cities. This government, and other governments in this country, must put forth a greater effort to make rural life attractive to young Canadian men and women. To me it is deplorable to see the sons of the pioneers who built this country leaving the farms and going to the cities. Why are they doing that? In many cases it is because rural life is not on a par with urban life as far as certain conveniences, remuneration and rewards are concerned. I believe we have to remedy that situation, if we are going to keep young Canadians at farming.

I want now to say just a word or two concerning British immigration; naturally, as an Englishman born, this subject is very dear to my heart. During the last two sessions I have been interested in reading the minutes of the committee on immigration of what I think is officially termed in this house "the other place." During those two whole sessions I challenge anyone to show that more than five minutes have been given to a discussion of British immigration. I think that is out of all proportion. It may be said that thousands of British people have been brought to this country, but if you take out of that total the wives and dependents of veterans who married overseas you will find that a very small number indeed of Britishers have been brought to this country since the conclusion of the war.

I brought up this matter previously in the house, and at that time the minister said the British people were welcome to this country. I believe that is so; if they can pass the health tests and comply with all the regulations, they may come here. But that is not sufficient when we have in Britain over 180,000 ex-service men who stood side by side with us, who fought for us and who stand for the same type of civilization, desiring to come to this country.

Therefore I believe that if this country is to have a balanced immigration policy, as between displaced persons and British and kindred people, this government must give consideration to making arrangements for transportation for those people. They do not want charity; they do not want their fares paid. All they ask and all the legion asks of this government is that something be done to provide shipping, so that they may pay their fares and come to this country in the near future. I remember in the early days of this century seeing many British immigrants of the type generally known as cockneys, a fine people, arriving at Halifax and Montreal. They were not met by committees of ladies with buns and hot coffee and popcorn and all the rest of it. They had their baggage on their shoulders, got into colonist cars and went to western Canada on their own, where they made a great contribution to the development of this country.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I do ask this government to give consideration to taking some steps to make it possible for the thousands of veterans and others in Britain who wish to come to this country to obtain transportation, for which they are anxious and willing to pay.

CHRISTIAN SOCIALIZATION OF MEANS OF PRODUCTION AND DISTRIBUTION OF NECESSITIES OF LIFE

Mr. E. L. BOWERMAN (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, before Your Honour leaves the chair, I should like to make a brief statement. On February 25 of this year, as recorded in Hansard at page 1621, I read to the house the following quotation from the report of the committee on evangelism and social service of the United Church of Canada:

> We are driven to the conclusion that the only thing that will solve our present day social and economic problems will be the absolute Christian socialization of the means of production and distribution of all the necessities of life.

I went on to say it was no wonder church bodies took this position, and I repeated the quotation I have just read. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) then interjected with this question: "Does that include the farmers?" In keeping with the view of the United Church which I was then quoting, I quite naturally replied: "That would include everybody." It is perfectly clear that in my reply to the hon. member for Peel I expressed the belief that the views of the United Church applied to everyone. After all, the church believes that Christianity is for all, including the farmers, of whom I am one.

However I regret to say that this statement has been widely distorted outside this house by people who know better. In many newspaper editorials and advertisements it is being alleged that my remark means that the C.C.F. proposes to socialize farm lands. This is a deliberate distortion of what I said, and is completely untrue. Everyone knows I was simply asserting that the doctrines of the United Church apply universally and in particular to all its members, including the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), who at present is trying to spread this falsehood in Saskatchewan. Since Mr. Tucker is a member of the United Church, I assume he agrees with its views. If so, his distortion of the views of his own church is really amazing. If he wishes to quarrel with his own church that is his privilege; but I wish to make it clear that the interpretation he is trying to place upon what I said on February 25 is completely and utterly false, and he knows it.

PALESTINE—THREAT TO WORLD PEACE

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, what I am about to say I had intended to say during the debate on the budget. In order to expedite the taking of the vote last Thursday evening, I agreed to defer my remarks until a motion for the house to go into committee; otherwise I would have spoken on the budget.

Tonight I wish to discuss a situation which I think is dangerous, and becoming more dangerous. I refer to the zionist-communist propaganda which is general not only in the United States but in Canada, and which is strongly anti-British. I refer particularly, of course, to the Palestine question. I am not going to discuss the actual conditions in Palestine itself; that matter does not concern me at the present time. What I am concerned about is how the war between the zionists and the Arabs is extending outside, or is likely to extend outside beyond the boundaries of Palestine and to bring about—indeed it is bringing about—a great deal of ill-feeling and hostility among nations which otherwise would be friendly and together.

In fact, if one reads the propaganda or listens to the radio, and statements made, one might believe that Great Britain is a foreign country. Canadians are being told to regard Great Britain, and those countries which agree with her foreign policies, as enemy countries.

According to the press, zionist high command have appealed to Russia for assistance not only against the Arabs but against Great Britain and the Arabs. That is the statement which appeared in Saturday's press. Let me quote first of all a British statement dated at London, May 22. which says:

> Britain was reported reliably today to have told the United States preservation of Arab friendship is essential to safeguard the middle east against the march of communism.

Again it says that the United States ambassador saw Mr. Bevin and discussed the situation, and continues:—

> Though official sources refused formal comment, it was learned British officials here and in Washington have told the United States Arab-British relations must be maintained as a "great barrier against the flow of communism to the south."

Taking that as a basis, which I do—I accept it as the soundest statement that can be made on the subject—it now appears that in the united nations organization Russia and the United States are lined up against Great Britain. That is the situation which has arisen as a consequence of Palestine policy.

I should like to read this statement by Sir Ellsworth Flavelle which was printed last week in the press:

> At this point I wish to state as a warning my profound conviction concerning the Irgunists and Sternists. My feeling is shared by my colleagues of the world committee and of the Canadian Palestine committee. The future prestige, welfare and indeed survival of this modern Jewish state depends upon the success of its government in eliminating from the Palestinian Jewish community the activities of these terrorists whose operations as gunmen and assassins have been deplored and condemned by all civilized peoples.
> Failure to suppress these terrorists will alienate opinion and support from the Jewish state among men of good will throughout the world, and, through them, the support of their governments.

That may be the opinion of Sir Ellsworth Flavelle, but that is certainly not a true picture so far as the situation is concerned, because these terrorists operate not only or even mainly in Palestine, but outside as well. And all those people of good will who have seen the danger of the situation for several years and who have done their level best to inform and to warn the Canadian people—not only the Canadian people but the American people and the British people—as to its dangers; those of us who have tried to inform public opinion of the dangers we saw so clearly have come under the same terrorist organization as British soldiers and officials in Palestine itself. I shall give proof of that before I take my seat.

Then Sir Ellsworth Flavelle says:

> All the world knows that the UNO are giving final form and substance to the best legal and moral judgment of united nations.

That also I shall show is not the opinion of everybody by any means. It is all very well to say that we condemn the methods of these terrorists, but what has been done effectively? Has anything effective been tried to put a stop to them?

Let me quote from an advertisement in the United States paper freely sold and circulated throughout Canada, from one side to the other. I refer to the New York paper PM. It states:

For the British the situation in Palestine deteriorated only when the Arabs began to run. Hagana and Irgun took over Haifa. Irgun pushed into Jaffa, took Manshiyeh quarter and turned it over to Hagana. The Arab-nazi gangsters were thrown into panic. The Arabs began to run like rats. The British were shocked. They had expected the Arab-nazi stooges and pimps to slaughter "the Jews". By that time they expected to be well out of Palestine. Then Bevin could look the world in the eye and say: "Who, me? We weren't even there. Can we help it if the Arabs and Jews kill each other?"

I say that sort of propaganda is absolutely unfair and it is a menace to world peace. It states further:

Sanctimoniously the British will say, or are already saying, that they are sending their troops back to reinforce the truce to serve the U.N. Our state department—

That is the United States state department.

—is exerting itself to help foster this lie. It is a lie. The only truce the British will support in Palestine is a devil's truce designed to wipe out the Hebrews.

It is hardly necessary for me to mention the zionist intimidation and terrorism, the sending of bombs and of letters threatening death, the different methods which have been carried out in more than one instance even at the risk of innocent people being murdered. In contrast to this, I should like to quote a news release by the Canadian Arab news service which I, along with other members of the house, received last week. This is issued by Mr. Massoud, who I believe is president of the Canadian Arab friendship league:

"The hatred and propaganda dispensed by some high-pressure groups of this country and the United States has resulted in the present slaughter of thousands of innocent people in the Holy Land. Our warnings of the past five years and our appeals to the Jewish people and their fanatical supporters have not been heeded. Now that Arabs are fighting and defending their homes and while the battle is about to gain momentum, we are again appealing to all those responsible, including the members of the various governments who favoured partition of the Holy Land, to realize the implication of their action of the past.

"The Canadian Arab friendship league," Mr. Massoud said, "will have no part in the fighting. We are firstly Canadian citizens and, as such, have done our duty when we worked for peace in the Holy Land. We also know that none of the Arab countries now engaged in the struggle would ask for our military assistance. There will be no maple leaf battalion fighting on the side of the Arabs, no matter how many similar groups may be recruited by the News."

I quote that to show the difference in the spirit of the two sides. It cannot be said that these things are being done only by groups like the Irgun and other so-called terrorist organizations because, as I said before, no effort has been made by the high command to suppress these people. In fact the terrorist groups are in the van leading the zionist troops. It was stated officially by these zionist terrorists that any British who were caught or captured in the war would be shot as criminals. I wonder what the reaction would have been in Canada if that threat had been made by the Arabs against the late "Buzz" Beurling. Had "Buzz" Beurling been fortunate enough to have survived and unfortunate enough to have been captured in Palestine, I have no doubt he would have been treated by the Arabs as an honourable prisoner of war. There again is the difference in the spirit of the two sides. That difference is not confined to Palestine; it extends outside Palestine.

I mentioned zionist propaganda and their control of the radio and the press. From time to time I have made radio broadcasts based on speeches I had made in this house in an effort to throw some light on a dangerous situation. One broadcast was simply suppressed; not one word was put on the air, though I knew nothing of it until afterward. The last broadcast of a few weeks ago was censored. I shall not mention the name of the station or of the manager, because I do not think that would be fair.

I do not hold this manager responsible, because he is in fear of this same terrorist organization. That is quite obvious from what he said when he objected to certain statements which I had made in my broadcast.

In particular, I find in your speech such statements as, page 5, "And so it is with zionism: All zionists may not be communists, but all communists and fellow-travelling socialists back zionism."

That is a fair statement and I make it without fear of successful contradiction. Then I mentioned that Henry Morgenthau is an international financier and zionist. I had to cross out the words "and zionist" for the same reason. Another statement to which he objected was:

In my speech I was glad to pay my humble tribute to the British soldiers and policemen in Palestine who through all these years have borne the brunt of savage zionist gangsterism.

More than 300 British soldiers and policemen in Palestine have been murdered in cold blood by these same zionist organizations, but I was not to be allowed to pay that tribute over the radio to our own kith and kin. The station manager went on to say:

> Within the listening area of this station there are many Jews of the highest probity and reputation—some of our best and most substantial citizens are of that race. I cannot think that it is in the public interest, nor that it is fair, for them and their race to be maligned and attacked.

In other words, I might hurt the feelings of these fine gentlemen by expressing my sympathy for the 300 British men, our kith and kin, who were murdered in Palestine by zionists.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And in a Canadian broadcast.

Mr. JAQUES: Have those fine citizens ever raised their voices against these murderers? If they have I have never heard them. Have they ever come out and publicly condemned the terrorists in Palestine? If they have I have never heard them. I have every sympathy with the manager of this station because I know the power of this organization. He goes on to say:

> I do not think that my obligation as the licensee of the station compels me to carry speeches containing quotations such as those outlined in the quotations given.

Everybody knows today that radio is one of the greatest means of expressing public opinion. We are told that if we are to preserve our freedom we must preserve the freedom of the press at all costs. But when you want to deal with political zionism there is no freedom in the press or on the radio, as I shall prove.

I might mention, and here I am betraying no secrets because it was made public at the time, last December, the editor of the paper run by the movement of which I am a member published a statement which I put on Hansard the last time I spoke, and as a result of my attempts to warn the country of the danger of this situation, the Canadian Zionist League—this is their statement, not mine—forced the resignation of the two editors of the Canadian Social Crediter, because of its anti-Semitism, and it went on to say that the one chiefly affected would be Norman Jaques.

I have said it until I am tired of saying it, that to criticize political zionism is no more anti-Semitic than it would be for a Tory to criticize a socialist or a socialist a Tory. But even if it were anti-Semitic, let me point out, that recently a case went to the high court in Great Britain in which an editor had in an editorial in his paper given vent to his feelings as a result of the outrages against his own countrymen in Palestine, and he was sued for seditious libel. That case attracted world-wide attention. It did not get too much publicity in this country; but I took the trouble to send for the evidence which I have here word for word. I am not a lawyer, of course, and I am only quoting counsel for the defence. Counsel for the defence said that subject to the ruling of the court, a man had as much right to criticize the Jews as he had to criticize anybody else. The judge, Mr. Justice Birkett, in summing up told the jury that the most vital aspect of the case was the preservation of the freedom of speech; that it was of the utmost importance that nothing should be done by the court which could in any way impair or injure freedom of speech and freedom of the press. Yet, as I say, with regard to the Palestine question, neither in the press nor on the radio in this country has one been free to make full statements other than for the zionist cause.

I might quote two members of congress. Speaking in the house of representatives on December 18, 1947, the Hon. Lawrence Smith said:

> Let us take a look at the record, Mr. Speaker, and see what happened in the united nations assembly meeting prior to the vote on partition. A two-thirds vote was required to pass the resolution. On two occasions the assembly was to vote and twice it was postponed. It was obvious that the delay was necessary because the proponents did not have the necessary votes. In the meantime, it is reliably reported that intense pressure was applied to the delegates of three small nations by the United States members and also by officials "at the highest levels in Washington." Now that is a serious charge. When the matter was finally considered on the 29th—

That would be the 29th of September.

> —what happened? The decisive votes for partition were cast by Haiti, Liberia, and the Philippines. These votes were sufficient to make the two-thirds majority. Previously, these countries opposed the move. Do not forget, Mr. Speaker, that they are considered satellites of our own country.

That is of the United States, of course.

> The pressure by our delegates, by our officials, and by private citizens of the United States constitutes reprehensible conduct against them and against us . . . Time will tell, and this congress should authorize a full-dress investigation so that the people of this country may know that the united nations has been used in this instance as a vehicle of torture, and not as an instrument of international justice.

The fact is that faith has largely been lost in the united nations, and more on account of this Palestine question than anything else, and today we find that Moscow and New York are lining up against Great Britain. That is the situation which we face today. The people who have advocated political zionism, which they have a perfect right to do, have gone beyond that and maligned those who have taken the other view and tried to point out the dangers of what they knew must develop. I say that all those people who have banned criticism of political zionism will now have to rise and testify whether they are on the side of Russian communism or on the side of Canadian democracy and British freedom, or world freedom, for that matter.

I should like to quote another member of the United States Congress. Hon. Edward Gossett, addressing the house of representatives on December 11 last, said:

> It seems to me to be ironic and tragic that we should be fighting communism with the one hand and encouraging it with the other. I refer to what seems to me a stupid, if not a criminal, act on the part of our delegation to the united nations in the partition of Palestine and in the delivery of that part of the world to communist influence. By that act alone we have taken a major step toward antagonizing the whole Moslem world . . .
> In this Palestine partition we have played petty partisan politics on the very threshold of what should be an American century. We have jeopardized American leadership by such tactics; we may have signed the death knell of the united nations. It seems to me it might be well for the foreign affairs commitee to investigate the part played by American delegates to the united nations. Not only was their action in the partition of Palestine a great disservice to the Jews but it was also a very real service to communism in the far east, the middle east, and in the near east.
> It is doubtful that all the money we have spent and will spend in Europe can offset the evil we have done in the rest of the world by our meddling with the Palestine question.

That opinion agrees with the British official statement which I quoted at the beginning of my remarks, in which they said that if communism is to be stopped spreading in the near, the middle and the far east, then we must retain the good will of the Moslem world. As I say, those who have supported the zionist cause, which, of course, they had a right to do, could plead that, up to now they were mistaken; but they cannot say that any longer in the face of the situation as it is today. We have to choose. We have either to make a stand for British, western and world freedom or take our stand in support of world communism. That is the situation, and without being political in the least I make the statement that one reason the communists are supporting the C.C.F. is that the C.C.F. as an organization, support and strongly support, have gone out of their way to support, political zionism. It is a fact that not only the C.C.F., but socialists everywhere support zionism. I do not mean labour when I say socialists. The C.C.F. backed the zionists and the communists back both. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Do the C.C.F. concur in that?

Mr. JAQUES: I am quite willing to acquit them of any wrong intention. I am quite willing to believe that they did not understand just what they were doing. I am quite willing to give them that credit. I am perfectly sure that the rank and file have not the faintest idea of what it is all about.

Mr. ARGUE: You know it all, of course.

Mr. JAQUES: I know plenty about it. Any time that anyone wants to debate it with me publicly I shall be very glad to debate it with him. I have nothing to fear.

We are now faced with this situation. The zionist leaders have appealed to Russia for help against not only the Arabs but against the Arabs and Great Britain. That is the situation as it exists today. Those people who have, as I say, supported zionism, and who have smeared and tried to discredit the few people who have from the first, seen the danger of this situation, and have done whatever they could to open people's eyes to it, these pro-zionists sooner or later will be faced with making a decision whether they are going to stand and support Great Britain and freedom, Canadian freedom, western freedom, world freedom, if you like, against the threat of communism; otherwise all this talk about the threat of communism is so much nonsense. It is either true or it is not true. If it is true; if communism is a threat to our way of life, then I say that communist threat is intensified by the actions of zionist extremists and their supporters in this country, in the United States and elsewhere.

Before I close, I might mention the recent election in South Africa, the result of which apparently came as a great shock to some people. I do not think there is any doubt as to one reason for the result. I forget how long ago it was, but shortly before the election Prime Minister Smuts, without saying anything to any other dominion, so far as I know, told the world that his government would recognize the new state in Palestine. A few days later he went to the polls and was defeated. If that recognition did not defeat him, it did not help to save him from defeat. I might say that so far as I can gather, the South African election was largely determined on the question of sovereignty. That was made clear by the new prime minister. He was asked what his ideas were with regard to a republic, and he said, "We are not bothering about a republic. Under a republic we should never have more or better freedom than we have today as a sovereign country within the British commonwealth."

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but he has exhausted his time.

Mr. JAQUES: If I might add one more sentence.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless the hon. member has unanimous consent, he cannot proceed.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Let him finish.

Mr. JAQUES: I merely wish to refer to a referendum in Australia, where the result was determined by a vote against the federal authorities retaining the controls, formerly belonging to the states, which the federal authorities had assumed during the war. This vote showed that the people of Australia do not believe in centralization. They voted to return to the states of Australia the powers which formerly had been taken from the states by the federal government.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—POSTAL SERVICE TO GRIERSON ESTATE, EDMONTON

Mr. PATRICK H. ASHBY (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of my fellow members of parliament a matter of the utmost importance, namely, the growth of bureaucracy in this country which is completely ignoring the sovereignty of the people, and establishing the supremacy of rules and regulations over their lives. Today the people of Canada are being forced to adjust their lives and living to fit into rules and regulations instead of rules and regulations being adjusted to fit their needs and wants. Bureaucracy, or stateism, has reversed the functions for which these bureaux were originally established.

I shall deal briefly with only one department of the government at this time, taking up only fifteen minutes or so, and that is the department known as the Post Office Department. I have deliberately avoided using the words "the postal services", because the Post Office Department no longer serves the people of Canada, but is rather using the people as a means of obtaining revenue from which these bureaucrats in control can obtain their livelihood. I should like to quote from a broadcast I delivered some time ago, which outlined somewhat briefly the original functions of the postal services as established:

> The postal services were originally established by far-seeing men for a purpose, and that purpose was to carry and deliver the mails to their destination; to carry news and knowledge; to promote mutual acquaintance; to bring the people of our nation closer together and not only the people of our own country, but of all peoples of all the nations who would associate with the postal services of our great British commonwealth of free nations. The postal services were established to bring peace and good will among all men and women no matter what colour or creed. The individuals employed by us in this great service were messengers of sympathy and of love. They carried messages that would console the lonely, that would be a bond holding together scattered members of a family. They carried news from departed friends and loved ones. The postal service in those days used as their motto "service first".

A motto that was apparently not known to the Postmaster General himself when I asked that question some time ago. Today the motto of the Post Office Department is apparently "service last."

> In days gone by, the individuals employed in this wonderful service prided themselves on delivering His Majesty's mail if humanly possible. In fact, the first mails ever carried were messages from the king himself, and even to this day the postage stamp bears the likeness of our sovereign and king.

It is the king's mail today as always and refusal to deliver His Majesty's mail is an insult to our king and sovereign as well as to the sovereign people of Canada; for our king does not represent party politics, but the people of our great British commonwealth—all the people. That is why I say the people are sovereign in this country, not these hired bureaucrats nor their paid elected representatives who are sitting in this house today.

The people of Canada do not live in this country to serve this institution—the Post Office Department—or any other institution. All these institutions were created for no other purpose than to serve the sovereign people.

I should like now to quote from an early bulletin issued by the Post Office Department:

> The post office opens up new territory in advance of the railways. As soon as a trail is blazed—

Not paved or gravelled sidewalks and streets, let it be remembered.

> —and settlers break new land for a home in the wilderness, the post office links up the new community with the other parts of the country.

In Rudyard Kipling's verses "The Overland Mail", he pays tribute to the carriers of the people's mail in these words:

> Is the torrent in spate? He must ford it or swim.
> Has the rain wrecked the road? He must climb by the cliff.
> Does the tempest cry halt? What are tempests to him?
> The service admits not a "but" or an "if".
> While the breath's in his mouth, he must bear without fail.
> In the name of the Empress, the Overland Mail.

In those days, unfortunately of long ago, the postal services prided themselves, and rightly so, on visiting with kindly friendship and service every fireside. They mingled with the throbbings of almost every heart in our great British commonwealth of free nations. They administered to all the varied climates of our vast empire, from the far northern outposts amidst snow and perpetual ice to the steaming jungles of the tropics, with the same eagerness to serve the sovereign peoples. His Majesty's mail was delivered to its destination, and like a delicate stethoscope held to trusting ears, families and isolated individuals and even whole nations whispered their joys and their sorrows, their convictions and sympathetic understandings to each other though separated by thousands of miles of prairie or mountain ranges.

Now let us compare those wonderful services rendered by this institution years ago with the services they are rendering today. I should like to show hon. members the photograph of a postman delivering the mails in the city of Edmonton this spring, not in any particular area, but one of the many wearing rubber boots and tramping through the water. This was postman Wes. Ferry who braved the elements to deliver the mail. During the year January 1, 1947, to January 1, 1948—that is 365 full days—there were only eleven days when postmen had need to wear rubbers to deliver the mail in the Grierson estate area—in which are living 125 families of our veterans who purchased their homes through the D.V.A.—in order, of course to keep the boots of the postman free from mud. All winter long the ordinary footwear was sufficient to enable the postman to carry out his duties. Only during muddy conditions would he have need to wear rubbers; then only on eleven days had this condition existed, and even then he could have walked on the grass instead of on the rough gravel.

I should like to bring to the attention of the house another postman, named Alfred Forrest of Edmonton, who served the people faithfully for thirty-eight years. This is what he had to say when he was told that the Post Office Department refused to deliver mail to these veterans and insisted upon concrete sidewalks:

> Sidewalks indeed. I once had to build a raft to deliver mail on my route in the Norwood district of this city of Edmonton. The mail had to get through—

Remember that was the motto of days gone by.

> —so I hunted around, found some planks, lashed them together and made my raft. I slung my mail pouch over my shoulder, grabbed a pole and put out to sea. I delivered every letter as usual although I had to punt from door to door.

That was during the pioneer days of years gone by when the motto of the postal service was "service first," and mighty proud were the postmen of those days to wear the badge of the postal service and mighty proud were we of our sons and parents who delivered the mails.

I have here another photograph of a fourteen-year-old boy, named Terry Stubbert, of the city of Edmonton who volunteered to carry His Majesty's mails to each of these homes, along with the daily newspaper, the Edmonton Bulletin. This boy has delivered the Edmonton Bulletin regularly to these homes ever since they were first inhabited. They get all the services from private institutions. Laundry is picked up and delivered; groceries are delivered. Every service is rendered except that by a government controlled institution which forces these people to pay for these services and then refuses to render them.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Hurrah for free enterprise!

Mr. ASHBY: That is right; that is what we want, free enterprise. I will guarantee that if the postal services were run as a free enterprise, in competition, postal rates would immediately be reduced fifty per cent and a better service would be given. I want to quote a letter from the Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand) himself, dated February 14, 1948, in which he says:

> Governmental policy for the coming fiscal year calls for the reduction of controllable expenditures to the absolute minimum and for the postponement wherever possible of the introduction of new services and enlargement of existing ones. This means that no letter carrier services can be granted and that extensions of delivery beyond existing boundaries will have to be withheld, except where the need is most urgent and where conditions are ideal.

In other words, the Post Office Department admits its failure to render efficient service to the people who now pay fully twice as much for these services as they have ever paid in the past.

Of course it is always easy to criticize, I know, and I sometimes hesitate to do so; but this is such a glaring instance of inefficiency, and I think I can say bureaucratic bungling, that I must bring it to the attention of hon. members. I sent a telegram to the Postmaster General last March. When I left Edmonton on April 1 no acknowledgement of that telegram had been received. When I arrived in Ottawa I got in touch with the Postmaster General, reminding him that I had received no reply to this telegram, and he assured me he would reply to it, which apparently he did immediately. But instead of sending the letter from his office to my office, a matter of a few yards, the letter was actually addressed to me at box 34, rural route No. 3, South Edmonton, Alberta; and it was mailed on April 5, the very day I was in my place in this house. Apparently they did not even know parliament was in session. This letter was carried thousands of miles to my home, where it was delayed a week because of the condition of the roads. My family could not get back into town to forward the letter. Then again it travelled thousands of miles back to me here, in order to be delivered a few yards from the office from which it was originally mailed.

In this letter the Postmaster General states that the rules and regulations must be obeyed. He says first the householder must do his part. He must have a letter slot in his door; the house must be numbered, and there must be a sidewalk from the door to the street. Then the community must provide suitable walks and roads; the streets must be named, and so on. When all these conditions are fulfilled and ideal, then and not until then will the Post Office Department give the matter consideration.

You see, Mr. Speaker, the whole thing has been thrown into reverse. That is why one day I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself to tell us why members were originally elected by the people to assemble in parliament. The purpose was to prevent forced taxation of the people; and until we reverse the present process and abolish all forced taxation we shall gradually drift into dictatorship. Bureaucracy, of course, is the first step toward dictatorship.

The situation in the Grierson estate is this. We have 125 houses occupied by veterans and their families, all within the city limits of Edmonton, with no vacant space between this area and the old, established mail delivery routes. In other words, mail is delivered on the east, the west and the south. It is delivered on one side of the street, but not on the other side. In fact one family told me their mail was delivered at the front door but the mail man would not drop the mail of another family living at the back, even though he had to walk right past the door, because it was not supposed to be on his route.

All services are rendered by free enterprise without taxation; let us remember that. No one taxes these people for these services which are rendered voluntarily by free enterprise. There is no forced payment of any kind. But the Post Office Department forces these veterans to pay through taxation for this service which is not being rendered to them.

I saw the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg) about this matter, and he asssured me his department would do all they could. I believe he has done so. I know he is extremely busy, but he has co-operated with the city of Edmonton, and his department has undertaken to pay $2,700 toward the cost of graveling these roads. The city of Edmonton will pay up to $2,550; but, since $7,800 is required, the sum of $2,550 is still lacking, and the sidewalks will not be built until that amount is forthcoming. Where is that money to come from? We cannot blame these veterans; they have done their part. They were willing to go overseas and fight. They did not ask for paved sidewalks, or even umbrellas. They left their homes, their business, their education. They made every sacrifice in order that we might be preserved as a free country. When they came back they looked forward to this wonderful new social order they were promised. These homes were not given to them. They had to buy and pay for them at high cost, plus interest. Now they find they are not to be given postal service. We cannot blame them. We cannot blame the postmen, the sorters and others in the Post Office Department. They are all loyal workers and many have volunteered to deliver mail to this very area. As a matter of fact, the department has discharged men from the Edmonton post office since the war, claiming they were not required. These men begged me to help them remain in the service. They liked the work and wanted to remain there. They were quite willing to deliver mail in this area, but their request was refused.

So we cannot blame the postmen. Nor can we blame the people of Canada, who have done all they possibly could. I do not think we can blame the bureaucrats, the higher-ups, because they tell me, "We are merely carrying out the rules and regulations laid down by you people in parliament." Therefore the only people we can blame are ourselves, who have permitted these rules and regulations to be introduced into this house and passed. Therefore, since you and I are to blame, we should pay for this extra service, which would mean but a matter of $10 each.

So, on behalf of the returned soldiers of this country I am assessing each member of the house the sum of $10. We get $4,000 a year plus $2,000, tax free, which we voted for ourselves; and it is nothing but fair and just that we should do so. Therefore in my hat I place my $10, and I shall go around and collect it from the other members.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for Lake Centre has the floor.

Mr. ASHBY: May I pass the hat, sir?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to take his seat.

VETERANS LAND ACT—ADMINISTRATION, SASKATCHEWAN—REFUGEES AND DISPLACED PERSONS

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member has not carried out his threat to call on all of us. Before Your Honour leaves the chair, there is one matter I should like to bring to the attention of the house, namely the administration of the Veterans Land Act. During the period of the last two or three years I have had occasion, on more than one visit among my constituents, to hear complaints made in respect of the administration of the act. Within the last three or four months a change has taken place in the directorship. It is now presided over by Brigadier Rutherford who, in March last, in accepting the new position said that many of the anomalies in connection with the administration of the act would be removed. He pointed out particularly the necessity for an improvement in public relations. Among other things he stated that, in the administration of the act, he intended that the officials should—and I use his own words—"Never forget that they are servants of the veteran and of the public".

During the past two or three years on more than one occasion I have raised strenuous objection to the fact that, in settling individual veterans under the act, in too many instances areas within the province of Saskatchewan were being discriminated against. I very well realize that the objection taken by the administration in connection with new settlers going into certain of these areas might be justifiable. But in too many cases veterans who have returned to the areas in which they were raised have been denied the opportunity of settlement there. On a number of occasions I have brought these matters to the attention of the department, and I feel that, conditions not having improved or changed, the time has now come to bring the matter to the attention of the house.

I am not going to speak at great length this evening, but in support of my contention that in the administration of the act discrimination has been practised as against certain areas, I point out that various areas in my own constituency have regularly been denied settlement by soldier settlers desirous of maintaining themselves adjacent to their parents' farms.

Then, too, in addition to the fact that there has been discrimination, one has no opportunity to find out the reasons why settlement is denied; for whenever an individual asks why he is denied settlement in an area, or why his application has not been accepted, the answer in every case by the department has been similar to the one I now have before me, as follows:

> We regret to advise that our opinion of this farm must be treated as strictly confidential; and we are therefore unable to set out the reasons for declining.

I say that is unfair. When a decision is made against a veteran who desires to settle in a given area, the veteran should at least be entitled to the reasons why he has been denied the right to settle in the area where he believes he could make good. I would ask that this discrimination against certain areas in the province be removed, so far as veterans living in those areas and who are desirous of settling there are concerned.

My second objection to the present administration is that it is dilatory in its decisions. Veterans have to wait too long in too many instances for decisions regarding their applications. To show the effect of that, I would refer to one case only where a soldier settler intending to settle on land applied in 1946, and on January 14, 1948, received word that his application had finally been accepted. He also applied to purchase certain machinery. During the period between the time he made his application and the decision was rendered by the board, the machinery required for his purposes had materially increased in price. In 1946, when his application was made the price of an Oliver 70 tractor was $1,258; and by the time his application was decided the price of the tractor had gone up to $1772.25, or an increase of $487. He also required a 10-foot Oliver combine. At the time his application was made that combine could be procured for $1,460.90, but by the time the decision was made the cost had gone up to $2,046. Surely delays such as that should not be permitted. I realize the minister is not here at the moment, but I am suggesting that he make a full investigation of the situation with a view to removing those anomalies.

Then, too, I would place before the house the request of one branch of the legion in Saskatchewan—and it is generally approved now—that the amount of Veterans' Land Act grants and loans should be materially increased. I have before me in that connection a resolution passed by the Govan branch of the Canadian Legion, which summarizes the viewpoint generally held in that regard. Instead of enlarging upon it, I shall merely place the resolution upon record. It states:

That the dominion government be asked to increase the V.L.A. grants and loans to veteran farmers so that the amount of the grant or loan will have the same purchasing power today as the grant or loan to the veteran farmer had in September, 1945.

It points out increases which have taken place in prices of commodities the veteran has to buy. It points out that if there is to be reasonable equality as between veterans who today settle on the land and those who settled in September, 1945, there should be a material increase.

I pointed out discrimination against the prairies, and in that connection I have here a number of resolutions passed in various parts of the prairie provinces asking why it is that in their areas this is being practised. I pointed out instances of dilatoriness which I think are inexcusable. Then I want to refer to some of the arbitrary regulations which have been passed and which pare down the rights of the veteran under this act.

We in this house so often find ourselves in the position of passing an act which is generous in its application and then, because of regulations, we discover that the rights which flow from that act are greatly pared down by departmental officials. Prior to 1936, when regulations were to be passed under an act the act invariably contained these words or words to the same effect, "The regulations shall not increase or detract from the powers contained in the act." It is different today when we so often give the power to the governor in council or to officials to pass regulations uncontrolled in their application.

Under this act there are too many cases of regulations being passed which deny that fair and generous interpretation which the act should provide. I want to point out an instance of what I believe is an arbitrary attitude adopted by the administration of the Veterans' Land Act. I shall take the specific case of a number of veterans in Prince Albert who built houses on small urban holdings for which the act provides. They moved into their houses early in 1946. Each had been given a definite final price and they were promised certain further improvements.

After they had taken possession, they were advised that the price which had been quoted to them was incorrect and that a larger price would have to be paid, the increase being approximately $400. One man had actually signed an agreement for $5,575. He had made his monthly payments, but he was asked to return the agreement he had signed and to execute a new one for $6,020. That happened in eight cases in Prince Albert.

The veterans were advised that, unless they paid the larger price, they would have to vacate their premises. I say that is unfair and unjustified. Finally the one who had signed an agreement refused to sign another agreement. He had certain grants and allowances coming to him, and he received a notice from the departmental officials that unless he paid the larger price, unless he returned the agreement he had already executed and entered into another agreement for the price then asked by the department, he would be denied the allowances to which he was entitled. These are some of the reasons why I believe an investigation should be made even at this time into the administration of the Veterans' Land Act to the end that any injustice may be remedied.

I should like to see provision made for closer co-operation between the administration of the Veterans' Land Act and veterans in connection with providing machinery and the like. I found that when Mr. Mackenzie was minister and these matters were brought to his attention he invariably endeavoured to do what was humanly possible in order to assure a proper and necessary supply of the machinery required by the veteran. I realize the difficulties, but some provision should be made for priority of machinery, in particular priority of combines and the like when the present harvest season comes around.

I referred a moment ago to how regulations detract from the working out of the act, and I have here an example of an unjust interpretation of a regulation. The Veterans' Land Act provides an opportunity for veterans to take up land. I have before me the record of a veteran whose total disability was ruled in January last to be five per cent. Prior to his enlistment, this man had been a farmer, but he was turned down under the act on the ground that his physical condition would deny re-establishment as a farmer.

These are a few of the things which have caused injustice, which have caused unfairness and which have caused many veterans to believe that the administration of the act has not been as generous as the parliament of Canada intended it to be. I am not going to say any more at this time, but I ask the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, to review the situation in the prairie provinces generally and in Saskatchewan in particular, in order to remove the discrimination that is being exercised today against individuals who wish to settle in the areas in which they were raised, to the end that delays will be done away with as far as possible, that dilatoriness will be considered inexcusable in connection with matters such as this, that regulations will be widened rather than restricted as at the present time and that the provisions of the act will be carried out in accordance with the desires of parliament and the welfare of the veterans in general.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to discuss briefly a matter which was raised earlier this afternoon by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) and the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). I believe the house will agree that the provision of sanctuary to refugees is one of the oldest international institutions we know of. I have been looking around for a good definition of "refugee". I came across a little pamphlet written by John Hope Simpson, a gentleman who has been most intimately connected with refugee work from 1926 to 1933. His definition of "refugee" is as follows:

A "refugee" might be described as an involuntary migrant. He would rather remain where he is, but conditions religious, economic, political, or social have rendered his life there so uncomfortable or, indeed, so unbearable, that he is forced to migrate from his home and to search for more tolerable conditions of life elsewhere.

On the basis of that, I believe Canada has a definite responsibility to give sanctuary and help to refugees, regardless of whether they may be political, religious or any other sort of refugee. Aside from the more formal commitments we have made as a member of the united nations and as a participant in the international refugee organization, we have a moral responsibility, which I think is set out very well in the draft declaration of human rights which has been before the committee dealing with human rights and fundamental freedoms, and has found pretty general agreement among those who participated. I should like to quote from the second paragraph of article 10 of the draft declaration on human rights:

Individuals shall have the right to leave their own country and, if they so desire, to acquire the nationality of any country willing to grant it.

Article 11 reads:

Every one shall have the right to seek and be granted asylum from persecution. This right will not be accorded to criminals nor to those whose acts are contrary to the principles and aims of the united nations.

I think on the basis of the definition I have given of "refugee" and the draft declaration I have just quoted, we in this country, regardless of where we sit in this house, can subscribe to the sentiments expressed in that declaration and to the commitment that Canada has entered into in promising to do her share in providing a sanctuary for refugees and displaced persons.

Since some question might arise concerning the attitude of organized labour in this country toward the entry of displaced persons, I should like to quote from the evidence given by Mr. Mosher, president of the Canadian Congress of Labour, before the standing committee on immigration and labour in July, 1946. Speaking on behalf of the congress, he said:

The admission of refugees, though it has, of course, economic aspects, is primarily a humanitarian question. Canada is under an obligation to humanity to admit her due share of refugees even if it costs her something. It may actually bring her important economic benefits. But even it it does not, she must do her part.

That is the official attitude of the Canadian Congress of Labour. I should also like to quote a paragraph from a brief submitted by the Ukrainian Catholic Council, and endorsed by the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Diocese of Canada:

It is desirous that the dominion government, at the least, arrange for the immigration of the refugees who already have affidavits from their Canadian next-of-kin, and for whose transportation and welfare guarantees have been made by these Canadian citizens.

Lastly I want to quote from a speech by my own leader in this house on March 29, 1946, a passage which met with general agreement on all sides of the house:

Displaced persons or refugees who are relatives of persons living in Great Britain are permitted to enter upon request being made and certain assurances being given by those persons in Great Britain. It seems to me that if the British people with their many problems can open their hearts in this way, a country like Canada with its sparse population can give refuge at least to persons in the situation just referred to by the hon. member for Davenport.

Further on he said:

We are most anxious to see our country give refuge to those who have suffered, regardless of race or religion, particularly when they are relatives of persons in Canada who can offer them a home and a new beginning in life.

As I say, that statement met with general agreement on all sides of the house, and the debates on this question and the comments made since that time have shown that the members of this house are anxious to contribute toward the realization of that ideal.

I should like to make a particular plea to the government in connection with the many thousands in Canada who have applied to bring their relatives to this country from displaced persons camps in Europe and in whose cases action has not yet been taken. I do not say that in any spirit of criticism, because I realize the many difficulties with which the department of immigration is faced, but I would point out that many of those who have applied have given the best assurances possible that their relatives, on arrival in Canada, will not be a charge upon this country or displace any one from work, or take up anybody else's living space, for their relatives here have made arrangements for their housing and employment and have guaranteed to look after them in case of illness or unemployment. These applicants have been waiting now in some cases for two and two and a half years, and it is difficult to keep these arrangements open indefinitely. They cannot continue to wait year after year without knowing whether their relatives in Europe will be permitted to come and what the decision of the immigration department will be. I do hope that the government can find some way to expedite the applications already on file on behalf of displaced persons for whom the best possible arrangements have been made so far as housing and employment are concerned.

I would emphasize that a displaced person who has a relative in Canada is probably the most desirable type of immigrant, because he will find employment and become a useful citizen immediately upon arrival. I do not believe that we are now entering into a serious era of unemployment, but there are pockets of unemployment across the country today. Naturally some people are fearful lest new arrivals may displace labour in this country, but the ones of whom I speak are assured of employment and housing and a start in life by their relatives in this country. I hope, therefore, that the government will do everything possible to expedite the consideration of these applications so that these displaced persons may find a haven and a new start in life in this great country of ours.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): I think I should call the attention of the house to the ruling which His Honour the Speaker gave in connection with airing grievances such as have been aired tonight. He pointed out that it was perfectly in order for an hon. member to raise any grievance; but, having done so, if some other member raised another grievance, it was not permissible to go back to the grievance first raised. I did not want to interrupt the hon. member when he was speaking, but I think I should call the attention of hon. members to that ruling, by which we must be governed.

Mr. LEWIS MENARY (Wellington North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on agriculture. I have the honour to represent one of the best agricultural counties in Canada, if not the very best.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member is out of order in raising that question. The estimates of the Department of Agriculture have been before the committee and will be before the committee again as soon as the house goes into committee of supply.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to give a silent vote on this question regarding Palestine. I do not think the matter should have been brought up here, because a committee on external affairs is investigating that question. The Jewish people have been a very law abiding class of citizen, some of our best citizens.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): The hon. member is out of order. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) dealt with the Palestine question; then we moved to another problem, and it is not in order for the hon. member to go back to the Palestine question.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to point out two or three facts. We should have discussed this question, as I wanted to, regarding the scuttling of the British empire a year ago last spring. This scuttling has been going on in India and in many other places. We have an authority in the person of the high commissioner, Sir Alan Cunningham. He said that Britain could have brought peace to Palestine if she had been left alone. The Archbishop of Canterbury said that the UNO work has been dilatory and futile in bringing the parties together. There are many people who ruled that country beside the Arabs. They were the Persians, the Tartars, the Egyptians, the Greeks, the Romans, the Turks, the Christians and the Moslems. They have all inhabited and ruled the country. We should have some statement from the government if we cannot discuss all the aspects of this matter. If you are going to rule me out of order, Mr. Speaker, the question should have been ruled out of order at the start.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): I should like to point out to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) that the hon. member for Wetaskiwin was in order when he discussed that question; but since other grievances were brought up after that hon. member spoke, it is not in order to go back to that subject again.

Mr. CHURCH: The Turkish people owned and ruled that country for many years past. During the first great war Lord Allenby went in there victorious, and Britain received Palestine under a mandate. I contend that we should have had a debate on this subject a year ago last spring when the matter was brought up. As I understand it, inasmuch as this question has gone to a committe you are ruling me out of order. I do not see why others were allowed to discuss it for two and a half hours. Many statements have been made which should not have been made. Britain is not to blame for the situation.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order. I tried to explain to the hon. member as best I could that the hon. member for Wetaskiwin did raise the point, but after he had spoken, other grievances were aired. It is not permissible now to raise that point again. The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. CHURCH: I cannot argue with your ruling, but I want to say that if Britain had been left alone we never would have had any of this trouble. It is time that Britain helped her dominions before mandated countries. I say that the UNO has caused all this trouble, and the United States is on again, off again, on again. Their policy has been one which has led to the whole trouble regarding Palestine, and the empire seems to be scuttled accordingly. Britain is one country which has defended the Jewish people all through its whole history, and she is getting nothing out of this but abuse, heartaches and headaches. That has been the result of this mandate, which she carried out to the best of her ability. The Arab people have been in that country for many years past. There are two sides to the question. I am sorry that it has got mixed up in Canadian politics, because we have nothing to do with it. We are only a small country. The five big powers settled this question. The British government and Washington are to blame for this trouble and for the efforts to scuttle the empire. One of the places scuttled was Palestine; others were India and the Suez canal. We lost our lifeline to the Mediterranean.

I have been a great admirer of the Jewish people. They are among our best citizens. The UNO has proved to be a failure. If it would only close up for about a year we would have some hope of peace again.

[Mr. Church.]

DISCOVERY OF POTASH DEPOSIT IN SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. H. R. ARGUE (Wood Mountain): A matter which I wish to bring to the attention of the house tonight for a few minutes is something new, and something which I think is of considerable importance. I refer to the discovery made some time ago of a potash deposit in Saskatchewan. I should like to explain to hon. members that before that discovery no potash was known to exist in Canada. The fertilizer need of Canadian soil is large and growing. I should like to point out that surveys made by the Department of Agriculture, by the men who are qualified to make them, state that the present consumption of fertilizer in western Canada is some 57,000 tons. These experts estimate that future requirements will be approximately 237,000 tons, or four times the present consumption. In 1936 the consumption of fertilizer in eastern Canada amounted to something over 215,000 tons. In 1946 the use of fertilizer had increased to 571,000 tons, or an increase of 265 per cent.

I should like to point out that the main constituents of fertilizer in Canada used by Canadian farmers are phosphates, nitrates and potash. Of these three, potash is probably of the least importance, but it is of some considerable importance. Also, since 1944 Canada used 44,000 tons of potash.

As I said a moment ago, a potash deposit was discovered in Saskatchewan. It was discovered in connection with the drilling of a gas and oil well at Unity. The deposit was eleven feet in thickness, and had an average potassium oxide content of 21·5 per cent, which compares favourably with other potash deposits being mined at the present time for commercial production in other parts of the world. Because little was known of potash mining in Canada, experts from the Saskatchewan department of national resources and the dominion bureau of mines and resources paid a visit to New Mexico to study mining methods there. It was found that in New Mexico the potash deposits occurred much nearer to the surface. It was estimated by some of the experts that the potash deposit in Saskatchewan was perhaps too deep for commercial development. However, I want to point out that the oil and gas exploration work in that particular vicinity has been completed, and it is not known whether or not the potash deposit—

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member is also out of order. There are items in the agricultural estimates which cover fertilizer. If that is so, then he would be out of order.

Mr. KNOWLES: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, while the hon. member made reference to fertilizer, his interest is in the development of potash resources which, I understand, comes under the Department of Mines and Resources, and not under the Department of Agriculture.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is correct, then it is out of order. So long as it comes under any estimate it is not in order to raise the point as a grievance. If, as the hon. member said, it comes under mines and resources, then an opportunity is given to discuss it under that head. Matters that come up on the estimates cannot be raised as a grievance as hon. members are doing now.

The estimates give members an opportunity to discuss these problems when they come up. It is only when there is not that opportunity that hon. members should take advantage of the opportunity, when we are going into supply, to raise some grievance.

Mr. MacNICOL: These are not grievances anyway.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): No.

Mr. ARGUE: Other members have taken part in the discussion this evening and have raised various matters. If you enforce a rule such as that, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it would make entirely impossible the discussion of any matter on the motion to go into supply.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): For the benefit of the hon. member himself and that of other hon. members, I will read what His Honour the Speaker said to hon. members the other day at page 3987 of Hansard:

Mr. Speaker: Before I leave the chair I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to citation 488 of Beauchesne, second edition, page 148:

"Whenever an order of the day has been read for the house to resolve itself into the committee of supply or the committee of ways and means, the motion 'that the Speaker do now leave the chair' must be proposed, except in cases provided by standing order 28. When such motion is proposed, it shall be permissible to discuss any public matter within the powers of the federal parliament or to ask for the redress of any grievance, and it is not necessary to move an amendment for that purpose; provided that the discussion and the amendment, if one is moved, shall not relate to any decision of the house during the current session nor to any item of the estimates, nor to any resolution to be proposed to the committee of ways and means, nor to any matter placed on or whereof notice has been given in the order paper."

I should like also to bring to the attention of hon. members the last part of citation 345 at page 137 of Beauchesne, third edition:

"Members may discuss various matters on the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair without any amendment being proposed. . . ."

Then I call attention to the following:

". . . but once debate is stopped on one matter and another matter intervenes, members cannot again discuss the former."

That was the point I was trying to raise. It is quite clear that if the point the hon. member is now bringing to the attention of the house comes under any estimate, then he has full opportunity of discussing that under the estimates. It would not be in order to raise it as a point of grievance. I think we should abide by the rules.

Mr. KNOWLES: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make clear what I said a moment ago. This matter which the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Argue) is raising, comes under the Department of Mines and Resources; but I think his point is that there is no specific item in the estimates providing for that which he is asking to be done. If the interpretation of the rule that you are making holds, it would mean that there is literally nothing that can be discussed on a motion to go into supply. That same ruling, if applied strictly, could have stopped the discussion on immigration, on the ground that the matter could be discussed under the estimates of the immigration branch; the same rule could have stopped the discussion on Palestine, on the ground that it could be discussed under the estimates of the Department of External Affairs and so on with regard to all the matters discussed today. But I would point out also, Mr. Speaker, citation 243 of Beauchesne, second edition, which reads as follows:

243. In determining whether a discussion is out of order on the ground of anticipation—

And that is what you are doing, Mr. Speaker; you are telling the hon. member that he must anticipate the fact that he can do this at another time.

—regard shall be had by Mr. Speaker to the probability of the matter anticipated being brought before the house within a reasonable time.

I submit that it was under that latitude that Your Honour or Mr. Speaker himself permitted the other discussions, and that under that same latitude the hon. member for Wood Mountain should be permitted to go ahead with this point; because I submit that the probability of this subject being brought before the house within a reasonable time is somewhat remote.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): The rule that the hon. member has read would not apply. The estimates will be before the house; indeed, some of them are now before the house. I submit that this discussion is out of order, and that we should go on with the business of the house.

FLOOD CONDITIONS—BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, and having regard to the ruling to which you have referred, I think the subject I should like to discuss for a few minutes at this time is in order, it being a matter that cannot be discussed at any time under the estimates, one which has arisen within the last few hours and one on which I should like to ask the government to take action which so far they have not indicated that they are willing to do.

I refer again to the flood situation in British Columbia; and I do so because I have just received word, through a Canadian Press dispatch headlined Vancouver, 9.11 p.m., to the effect that the Premier of British Columbia, Mr. Johnson, has declared martial law in the British Columbia flooded areas, and that he has implored the army to conscript civilians. There is another item, datelined 9.18 p.m., reporting the declaration of an emergency and calling on the local army commanders to call out all troops available in the province to assist in handling the situation. As hon. members will have seen by the press, apparently the floods are becoming worse hourly. The last actual information we had was that the Kootenay and Columbia river systems were now going on the rampage, had burst a dam and inundated some 8,000 acres of wheat land and were—I do not state this as fact but as a rumour—imperilling the Consolidated Smelters plant at Trail, British Columbia, or at least placing it under some danger.

I rise to speak on this matter now, because this afternoon, when it was raised before the orders of the day were called, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) indicated in a statement he made that he felt there was no reason to believe that the local authorities, the Red Cross and such other charitable and auxiliary organizations could not cope with the situation. Although I have not had a chance to see the report of his remarks in Hansard, as I recall it he went on to indicate that the present feeling of the federal government was that it was not a matter on which they should, of their own accord, take any action; and he supported the stand in that regard set forth by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) on Friday last.

That to my mind indicates clearly that, with respect to initiating any action, the federal government have not up to the moment felt that they should do anything of the sort. Now that we have this situation growing so much worse that the premier of our province has had to take the important and serious step of declaring martial law and asking that the troops be called out—not to impose order but simply to help him handle the situation—I think that fact speaks for itself, and it must be obvious that the situation is far beyond the control of any local authority. Therefore I take this opportunity of raising the matter as a grievance, because I think it certainly would give us cause for a grievance if the government should not change their attitude. We ask that they change their attitude, that they now take the initiative in calling out the troops and in taking measures to make available, of their own accord, funds with which to buy materials for the relief of those suffering from the floods; also to make funds available to provincial and local authorities for the same purpose; and also to make supplies available.

I should like to pay tribute to what the forces are doing at the moment in the supplying of sandbags, tents and, I believe, food supplies as well in these stricken areas. But it is obvious that not only to cope with the existing situation but to rehabilitate the areas being devastated will be very expensive, and will require a great quantity of supplies. So I think the federal government should take the initiative in making funds available to assist in that work and in gathering together those supplies and sending them in the quantities in which they will be needed, as I say, to deal with the floods and to rehabilitate the areas, to drive the waters back and to divert the streams to their former channels.

Then I think the question will arise in regard to compensation for those who have lost their crops, their homes, their livestock and so on in the floods; but that will have to come up later. The request I make at the moment is that the government change its attitude. We have three ministers in the house at the moment. I wish the Prime Minister were here. but perhaps one of the hon. gentlemen who occupy the front benches at the moment will communicate with his colleagues in the government; and in view of the emergency that exists I am sure they would be willing even to have a special meeting so that we might have some assurance, if not tonight, then the first thing tomorrow, in regard to what has been done and what will be the future action by this government to assist our own province to deal with this terrible emergency.

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The answer given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) today, as I understood it, was in reply to a request from the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Matthews), which in turn came from the town of Kimberley. The answer was to the effect that this government would not deal directly with the town of Kimberley or any other town or city, but that this government would deal with the provincial government through the premier of the province. Any appeal made to this government by the premier of British Columbia certainly will receive consideration and will be acted upon. That has already been demonstrated. The troops have been made available; the navy has been made available, officials of the various departments have been made available; I understand that the health department have offered their services in taking care of persons who may require medical attention, and I believe every assistance that has been asked for so far has been granted. As far as I know, nothing that has been requested through the proper channels has been denied; and I am quite sure anything that can be supplied will be forthcoming. The only suggestion made this afternoon was that requests should come from the correct source, that is through the premier of the province, and I am sure, when those requests are received, everything possible under the circumstances will be done.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as one coming from a different part of the country, may I take just a moment to support wholeheartedly the remarks of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and the statement made this afternoon by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Matthews), together with the appeals for British Columbia made on previous occasions by other hon. members from that province. We all know and appreciate the steps that have already been taken by the Department of National Defence, the offer made by the Department of National Health and Welfare, and anything else that may have been done by the federal government. But I want to say further that anything done by the federal government in the name of the people of Canada as a whole to assist our stricken fellow citizens in British Columbia will, I am sure, have the support of Canadians from coast to coast. I happen to come from an area which only a short time ago suffered a flood condition which we felt to be extremely serious, but even parts of Canada that have not had this experience will, I am sure, support me when I say that in a time like this we are Canadians all and anything this government can do for the people of British Columbia, even if the cost should run into large figures, will have the support of all the people of this country.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Special—

30. Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage (does not include the costs of survey and engineering work on the Medicine Hat irrigation and Red Deer diversion projects in Alberta and the South Saskatchewan river project in Saskatchewan, which costs are to be made available from the item of $1,000,000, No. 409, Department of Reconstruction and Supply), $3,000,000.

Mr. BENTLEY: When we were dealing with the agriculture estimates the last time we were in committee the minister told about the interprovincial council or water board, as I believe he called it, and explained that they were acting in an advisory capacity, but that any recommendations they made which were acceptable to the four governments concerned, which I suppose would be the governments of the three prairie provinces and the dominion government would be put into operation. I believe that is correct?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): That is going a little further than I went, I think. We are not committed to get any project under way. This board is called the prairie provinces water board. It considers projects that should be recommended, and makes recommendations; but that does not compel any of the authorities to go ahead with the work.

Mr. BENTLEY: But I believe the minister said, if this government accepted it and passed an order in council, and the province affected also passed an order in council, that would be the go-ahead signal?

Mr. GARDINER: At that time I was speaking of the division of water as among the provinces. When that is accepted and the provinces pass orders in council that will go ahead. But I assume no order in council will be passed by the federal government until we are prepared to proceed. When we pass an order in council the money will be available and we shall go ahead.

Mr. BENTLEY: In the event of a project being undertaken after this procedure has been followed, I should like to be clear on one thing. Let us say the project was a large water storage undertaking which had to be agreed upon by all the provinces, since it had reference to a river passing through two or more of the provinces. In the storage of this large amount of water, one province might have many of its citizens affected in their property, farms and so on, or grazing land, or whatever might be wherever the lake is created to store the water. In addition, roads and other public services, even telephones lines, might be disrupted. Would the province affected in that way have to stand the whole of that cost itself, or would there be an arrangement under which that province would be reimbursed by this government and the other two provincial governments concerned?

Mr. GARDINER: An agreement will be drawn up between the governments concerned and this government as to what is to be done. For example, we have an order in council which has already been passed and which has been accepted by each of the provinces, which indicates that, before the federal government will proceed with any project, we must have an undertaking from the province that any lands belonging to the province which are to be flooded will be turned over to the dominion. Then there is the further undertaking that the water will be utilized, that either the province or some organization set up for the purpose will utilize the water for irrigation or power purposes. These undertakings will be given previously; and the conditions under which any particular project will be carried on will be written into the agreement. But, in so far as any works we have done up to the present are concerned, when we have flooded roads we have had to put a new road in, if that were possible. Where it has been necessary to raise grades because of the storing of water, we have raised grades. Where it has been possible to put in a bridge, we have put a bridge in.

Mr. BENTLEY: The P.F.R.A. branch of the department?

[Mr. Bentley.]

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, at Valmarie, and dams which have been put in outside of Regina and elsewhere. We have taken care of any extra costs put on because of the work. In some places where railway lines have had to be changed, we have become responsible for them. We make our decision on that before we enter upon the project. If we decide that it will be too expensive we do not enter upon the project; but if we decide to go ahead with them, then we have done those things.

Mr. BENTLEY: To be specific, what is worrying me in connection with this is that the Minister of Public Works has just announced that an order in council has been passed permitting the building of a bridge at Saskatchewan Landing but with conditions. One of the conditions is that the provincial government would be responsible for any damage that might occur if the bridge should be submerged by reason of the P.F.R.A. building a water storage at Tichfield, or whatever it happens to be.

It may be difficult for Saskatchewan to agree to any large water storage plan, or to pass an order in council for any large water storage project such as might be considered later on, unless the government here is prepared to give consideration to taking care of that additional cost. I think we should have some announcement in that regard.

Mr. GARDINER: So many things are involved before we get that far that I do not think an announcement would be of much use at this time. All I can say is that it is estimated there will be a certain cost result because of the bridge already across the Saskatchewan river south of the point in question where the dam is to be built. That area will be flooded. The railway goes across at that point. The cost of taking that bridge out of there altogether and putting the railway across somewhere else is all involved in these costs.

On the other matter, as to the bridge north of Swift Current, as I said the other night it has been estimated that if a certain dam were built—not the one the hon. member is speaking about, but another dam—to serve a little different purpose, the water would be raised only fourteen feet. And if it is raised only fourteen feet, then all that is required is a bridge to take care of that. That is what I understand the provincial government intends to build. But they are being asked to put in abutments which will carry a bridge fifty-three feet higher. And when that time comes, if we were going to build the dam I imagine there would be some cost which would have to be taken care of as part of the costs of putting in water storage. But as to what part it would be, I am not in a position to say; and I do not think anyone can say. There would be some part of the cost of raising the bridge, of putting it at a different level, which would probably have to be taken care of as part of the expense of doing the construction.

Mr. BENTLEY: By all concerned?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to add something to what has been said with respect to water storage on the Saskatchewan river and the use of that basin's water for the two main purposes of irrigation and power.

I would judge, from what has been said by the minister, that the program as to what is to be carried out is not yet in definite form, and in my opinion that is all to the good. It is a big job, and it will have to be surveyed from every angle. Having covered most of the great rivers in western America which have been put under control for irrigation and power purposes, I can also say I have covered the Saskatchewan river. Five different trips were required to do the full job, and these were taken in as many recesses of parliament. During those recesses I did cover the river from its main source in the Columbia glacier right down to Grand Rapids. I do not mean I traversed every step of the river; but I investigated every pertinent area which had anything to do with flood controls, water conservation or irrigation.

Across the line they have followed the very same procedure and have set up a good program or a series of programs in connection with their control over their great rivers. I, myself, thoroughly surveyed the Platte river basin from its source in the mountains to its mouth where it pours into the Missouri river. The Missouri river program is not yet complete, but I have covered most of that part which is complete.

It starts in the Rocky mountains and flows into the Mississippi. I did the same in connection with the Colorado river, one of the great rivers of America, from where it rises in the southern part of Wyoming, Utah and northern Colorado right down to a point below Boulder dam, where the river flows between California and Arizona. In like manner I have investigated the Salt river valley in Arizona from its source in the mountains.

So I feel I have had some little experience in these problems. In each of those basins, the basin is under an authority. I have in mind the Tennessee valley authority, which I thoroughly surveyed from beginning to end. It was the first valley to have an authority. It was ten years or more ago, after the defeat of the Bennett government. I do not recall exactly whether the minister was in the house at that time, but if he was he will recall my proposing to the house that we should have a Saskatchewan river authority, so that there would be a unified program agreed upon by the different departments having to do with this matter in the three western provinces, in association with the federal government.

In the United States that is all under control of the bureau of reclamation. But its program is laid out after consultation with the very states through which the rivers flow. For instance, in connection with the Colorado river the conference takes place between Utah, Colorado, Wyoming, California and Arizona; and I believe one source in and of the river also touches the west of New Mexico. There are six or seven states in all.

In respect of the Tennessee river, it was a conference of seven states, through which the Tennessee flows or the boundaries of which it touches. In respect of the Platte river the states of Colorado, Wyoming and Nebraska were involved. The same program is now in operation in connection with the Columbia river which, I might say, has the greatest flow of any river in the United States with the exception of the Mississippi. It is a very great river indeed.

Mr. GARDINER: That is what this board is for.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to hear that. Perhaps it has not come to fruition yet; but if the minister follows that program, a program similar to that followed by the bureau of reclamation, he will be on eminently safe ground, because each of those states has its own rights and privileges, the same as our provinces would have. In a conference you would decide how much of the flow would belong to each of the provinces in the west. In our case I would say approximately ninety per cent of the flow comes from Alberta. At Fort a la Corne I believe the average volume is about 56,000,000 tons per twenty-four hours, or something between 27,000 and 30,000 cubic feet per second.

The North Saskatchewan and South Saskatchewan have not the same flow. At Cole rapids the average flow of the North Saskatchewan is about 9,500 cubic feet per second, while at Saskatoon the average flow of the South Saskatchewan is about 11,000 cubic feet per second. The South Saskatchewan has the larger flow of the two rivers.

While it may not come under this vote, I think I should compliment the minister upon what he is doing on the St. Mary river. There he is following the program carried out in the United States and, as I have often recommended, of commencing conservation operations at the headwaters of all the source branches of the main river. I should think the board or authority set up to take charge of the Saskatchewan river basin should plan along the same lines as those followed in the United States. It should try to do on the other headwaters of the Saskatchewan river what you are now doing on the St. Mary river.

There are at least twenty-four splendid reservoir sites at the headwaters of the North Saskatchewan and at least six on the South Saskatchewan. There are more than that, but I have not seen the others. All those sites should be included in the final basin program for the conservation of that water. Water is the second most priceless resource of the prairie provinces. The first is land, but neither the one nor the other is worth anything unless they are both included in a program of conservation.

The land in the west has all the required chemicals to produce the food necessary for the maintenance of peace in the world. With a minimum rainfall of about ten inches, the water requirements of the whole basin can be met if conserved as outlined. The volume of water here is not the same by any means to be found in the United States rivers. In Salt river basin in Arizona they are able to provide three to five feet per acre. I doubt if they could raise any crops there without that water, but even with that amount they cannot raise any more in that hot climate than is raised in Alberta with a minimum of eighteen inches of irrigation water per acre, and even that is not always available.

I have made a careful study of the effects of water in southern Alberta. I learn that until July, 1947, they had average moisture conditions, but in July it went down to as low as ·21 inches of rainfall. That amount of rain is almost worthless. During the summer time they had only a flow of about 400 to 500 cubic feet per second from the St. Mary river, but with that they were able to produce about $85,000,000 worth of crops and livestock. If they had had all the water they should have had with a normal rainfall of about ten inches, they would have been able to produce crops of two more bushels of wheat to the acre than they did, or twenty bushels per acre.

The program the minister has in view will provide water, and I for one am going to support it as strongly as I can. We should store the water that God has given this western country. As I say, I have seen many good reservoir sites, at the cost of a great deal of exertion, particularly those on the North Saskatchewan. There is the large and splendid site at the gap and another one at the whirlpool, and twenty-five or more others, each of which could store a large volume of water. I am speaking from memory, but I believe I am safe in saying that there could be stored on the whole Saskatchewan river basin, mostly within Alberta, approximately 30,000,000 acre feet of water, water which now runs away to melt ice in Hudson bay.

I am glad the minister has taken hold of this project. If he is long enough in office, which I cannot say he should be—as long as he is in office, I for one will support this program to survey thoroughly and conserve the priceless water resources of the Saskatchewan river for use for irrigation and power.

If my memory serves me correctly, there could be developed, if the water is judiciously used, 5,000,000 horsepower more or less from the source to the mouth of the river. That is a lot of power. That would include the diversion of the river at Cedar lake, down through lake Winnipegosis and lake Manitoba. A very large amount of power can be developed where the diverted river would fall into lake Winnipeg at Dauphin river.

From my point of view it does not matter how much money the government must have to conserve the water on this watershed and to use it properly. As I said a few moments ago, in southern Alberta below Lethbridge, where only 250,000 or 300,000 acres are partly irrigated with approximately eighteen inches of water per acre, they were able to produce in 1947 $85,000,000 of new wealth. That would never have been produced without even that minimum amount of water. They are not getting maximum amounts like they do in Arizona.

The program the minister has envisioned is a gigantic one. It may cost $100 million, or perhaps $200 million, with the power development. On the basis of a 20-year program that means approximately $10,000,000 a year. That would be simply an investment; it would not be a charge at all.

I do not want to prolong this discussion. In a word this covers what I have in mind about the Saskatchewan river. This is a gigantic profit-making program, and I am willing to support such a program which will be for the benefit of Canada.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I listened with great interest to the discussion of the hon. member for Davenport and I am in agreement with his views respecting the great possibilities and potentialities connected with power development on the western plains. But I do not share with him quite the optimism with which he views the immediate future and the probability of this development taking place, in view of the agreement entered into as between the provinces and the dominion.

I am very much in favour of the setting up of a water power board. It is necessary by reason of the divided jurisdiction between the provinces and the dominion covering the development of our natural resources. But order in council P.C. 2413 in my belief may well postpone indefinitely or for many years to come any development in connection with irrigation in Saskatchewan. I point out this, and I wish the minister would deal with it at some length. In the preamble to the order in council these words appear in paragraph 3:

> And whereas in view of representations received from the provinces concerned it is now considered desirable that any recommendations of the board should become effective only upon ratification by the two or more provinces concerned and by Canada;
> Therefore, His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Agriculture and the Acting Minister of Mines and Resources, is pleased, hereby, to approve the revised form of agreement, of which a copy is hereto attached.

Apparently some negotiations have gone on between the provinces and the dominion in the past two years in regard to this matter, and I would suggest to the minister that, in order to clarify the meaning of that portion of the order in council, he table in the house and make part of the proceedings of the house the reports or correspondence which have passed between the several provinces and the dominion with respect to this matter.

To this order in council is attached an agreement which I have in my hand. It provides for the setting up of a board to be known as the prairie provinces water board, to be composed of five members, two to be appointed by the governor general in council, and one by the lieutenant governor in council in each of the provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Its functions are set forth, and those functions are mainly administrative, to collate and analyse the data now available relating to the water and associated resources of interprovincial streams with respect to their utilization for irrigation, drainage, storage, power, industrial, municipal, navigation and other purposes. Those powers are merely administrative powers.

The essence of the agreement is this:

> Upon the request of any one of the three provinces or the dominion to recommend the allocation of the waters of any interprovincial stream among the respective provinces.

In other words, the power of this board is restricted to the administrative job of collating the information and finally, upon the request of the dominion or the provinces, recommending the allocation of the waters.

I try to picture the situation—each of the provinces jealous of its own rights and powers, each of the provinces anxious to conserve as much as possible the waters that would ordinarily flow through its territory. Well, a recommendation is made, and then the trouble begins, because section 5 of the agreement reads:

> A recommendation of the board with respect to any matters referred to it under subsections c and d of section 4 hereof—

One of those has to do with the allocation of the waters.

> —shall become effective when adopted by orders in council passed by Canada and by each of the provinces affected thereby.

I fully realize the difficulties in getting an agreement with the provinces, but we have all had experience in recent years of the emasculating effect of the veto.

Mr. GARDINER: How would you propose to get around it?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am just pointing out the difficulty at the moment. The effect of that is this, that nothing can be done without unanimity.

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, no.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I will read the section again:

> A recommendation of the board with respect to any matters referred to it under subsections c and d of section 4 hereof shall become effective when adopted by orders in council passed by Canada and by each of the provinces affected thereby.

The minister says that is not the effect, that it does not require unanimity, that any one province may not apply the veto. I say to him this: that is the way I read it; that is the way it is drafted; that is the purport of that section of the agreement in its present form. The minister asks: How are you going to get around that? I realize the difficulty, but I would point out this—

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend is missing altogether an obvious thing. As the hon. member for Davenport has just said, somebody will have at least $100 million; the only authority that can have that $100 million is the federal government, and I cannot conceive of the three provinces sitting down and saying: We are not going to allow the federal government to spend that money. The hon. member is starting off with the idea that the provinces will be doing something and spending a lot of money and that we shall not join with them. But the fact is that the provinces are going to start off with the assumption that the federal government is prepared to do the work and spend $100 million in the three prairie provinces, and actually there is $110 million involved in the program already outlined, to be spent over so many years. We go to the provinces and say: Before we can start, we must have a division of the water as among the provinces. It is not difficult at all to determine how much water did go over the boundary line; under any scheme of water rights the group down below can claim the total amount or a certain percentage of the water that flowed over the boundary line into its area, and that goes for the next 100 years as far as we are concerned.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is what they did on the Colorado.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, and it cannot be done in any other way. That is what is being done on the St. Mary river now. We must, before some particular time, take advantage of the fact that this water is allotted to us, and that is why we are building the dam at this moment on the St. Mary river to store up the water to which we have a right as a result of the decision of the international joint commission. This board will operate in exactly the same way. There is nobody going to sit down and veto things like the Russian government. The provinces will be anxious to have the money spent in their respective provinces. They will be anxious to have the work done.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If they are so anxious, they would not have asked for the powers of veto.

Mr. GARDINER: They did not ask for the powers of veto. They refused to have an order in council with the power of veto in it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: All right; let me complete my argument. The very fact that the minister immediately jumps before I get even part of the way indicates that I have touched a point of pronounced interest.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. GARDINER: No, it does not indicate that at all; it indicates that the hon. member is trying to put up a theory which does not exist, and talk until eleven o'clock so that it is given publicity over the country and goes out that way. It just cannot go out that way in view of what I have said.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I say to the minister that if he has a plan for the expenditure of $110 million that is today being dangled before the western provinces, why did he not submit that plan to the provinces and secure their agreement to that expenditure, provided that it could be proven efficacious.

Mr. GARDINER: That plan was submitted to the provinces two years ago.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is fine. If it was submitted to the provinces two years ago, why is it that they are not prepared to accept the plan that was submitted to them? If it has been submitted to them, then we already know that plan has not been accepted by each of the provinces.

Mr. GARDINER: No; the point is this. We did not assume the position that we have all the knowledge on the matter. We submitted to the provinces the plan which they thought they could improve upon. We have accepted some of their suggestions and put them in the form of this resolution.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In order to clarify the whole situation, I am pointing out that if the people of western Canada believe that the plan which the minister has placed before them could be carried into effect without the consent of the provinces they are due to be undeceived.

Mr. GARDINER: They are not being asked to do that; they are going to consent.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am suggesting, Mr. Chairman, as I suggested a moment ago, that the minister table the correspondence which has passed between the provinces and the dominion. Again I repeat what I said a moment ago. If the general scheme for the expenditure of $110 million has been placed before the provinces, certainly—

Mr. GARDINER: Placed before this house and the country.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I appreciate the general plan, but I want to see how it was placed before the provinces. Certainly, as far as this house is concerned, what was placed before it was merely a generality. I wish the minister would table the correspondence passed between the provinces and the dominion on this matter—

Mr. GARDINER: May I point out to my hon. friend that a considerable part of it is right in front of him, and he is discussing it under an item under which he is not entitled to discuss it at all. The whole plan is enunciated in the items that are recited, one being this very item, but part of it is covered in the next item, the St. Mary river dam project, which is already under way, and a very considerable part of it constructed. Then you go on down through the items and you find parts of it on the next page. The items have already been dealt with session after session. If you take the items which are mentioned in No. 30 and add them to the St. Mary river dam project it will amount to $110 million.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am directing my attention at the moment to the general scheme which has been brought to the attention of the people of Saskatchewan. That scheme will cost approximately $66,000,000.

Mr. GARDINER: That is one of the projects.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What we have before us under item 30 amounts to $3,000,000 in 1948-49, and item No. 31, the St. Mary river dam project, amounts to $2,200,000.

Mr. GARDINER: In the projects that are here, there are: the Medicine Hat irrigation scheme, which is $4,000,000; the Red Deer diversion project, which runs somewhere between $15,000,000 and $20,000,000; the South Saskatchewan river project, which is $66,000,000. These items together will come very close to what is being proposed, and then there is the St. Mary river dam project, which will cost $15,000,000 to $20,000,000. These total up to around $110 million. The whole program is right in front of the hon. member.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Merely a survey of these various projects.

Mr. GARDINER: They have to be surveyed first.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am asking the minister this simple question. Our people are being led to believe that within a couple of years a great construction proposition will be undertaken in our province, provided that it is proven by surveys to be efficacious and efficient.

Mr. GARDINER: And provided that the province is prepared to go on with the development.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, we have that veto. It still rests with the province.

Mr. GARDINER: It is not a veto at all. It is whether they want to spend the money, that is all.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: So that we can get this out of the sphere of a more or less ephemeral promise or the expectation of a hope, I am asking the minister to table the correspondence regarding the particular matter, and I am not going outside my own province. All I am asking for at the moment is the correspondence that passed between his department, or any other department of government, and the governments of Saskatchewan and Manitoba respecting the river projects in Saskatchewan.

Mr. GARDINER: I will answer that by saying that every bit of discussion and correspondence, and the forms in connection with it, have already been tabled in this house. The main part of it is the report of the engineers, and that has been a matter of discussion as between the province and ourselves. We have spent the money with regard to it, and we have the report. We have put the report on the table of the house. We have said to the provinces, Are you prepared to proceed with the development of irrigation or power as a result of the building of the dam, if it is built?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Are these questions in writing?

Mr. GARDINER: These discussions have all taken place, most of them orally as between the governments, but everything of importance in connection with the matter is in writing. It is set down, and it has all been placed on the table of the house.

Mr. KNOWLES: On a point of privilege, I wonder whether the committee might give unanimous consent to sitting on for another hour. If we were to do so we might get the minister's estimates through, and we might also have more complete returns on the Yale by-election. They are pretty good at the moment. They are as follows: C.C.F., 3,383; Liberal, 2,589; Progressive Conservative, 2,572. That is for 35 out of 122 polls.

Mr. GRAYDON: We will wait until a week tonight to get the real returns.

Mr. KNOWLES: That may be the end of Drew.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall I report progress?

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Tomorrow we shall proceed to consider the budget resolutions, and if they are passed we shall take up second reading of Bill No. 228, to amend the Excise Act, and second reading of Bill No. 229 to amend the Customs Act.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The following is the English translation of remarks made in French on the date indicated.

Monday, May 31, 1948.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull):

Aboiteau (abweto) s.m.

1. Aboiteau, dike, obstacle to the flow of water.

Fr.—The popular pronunciation is aboiteau.

Can.—Aboiteaux are embankments constructed on a river bank.

2. Sluice, in a dam, laid out so as to close automatically when the tide rises and to let the water out at low tide.

Dial.—Aboiteau: a small cofferdam to impound water. Saintonge.

3. Mass of disintegrated ice drifting on rivers at break-up time.

4. Windscreen of snow and branches, as a shelter against the wind while fishing on lakes or rivers in the winter.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 1, 1948

The house met at three o'clock.

THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE

TRIBUTES TO MR. ILSLEY ON HIS REPORTED RETIREMENT FROM MINISTRY

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as members of this house I feel we would be remiss in our duty if we did not take this first opportunity to say how sorry we were to get the news last evening of the intention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) to retire from the government. In this house it is inevitable that among the different parties there will be differences of opinion, and that was so in this case. On the other hand I think I can say on behalf of members of this group and hon. members generally that there is no member on the government benches for whom the house as a whole and the country has had higher respect than the right hon. gentleman. He will be remembered in particular for the service he gave this country as wartime minister of finance. Even in that capacity people at times took his name in vain, but the job he did, particularly in the field of price control, will long be a monument to him.

Some of us might hope he could be persuaded to change his mind, but our experience with him has taught us that he is the kind of person who reaches a point where finality must be recognized. If it is definite that he is leaving us, we can only say that we are sorry indeed, but we wish him the very best.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, this is an occasion on which I agree entirely with what has been said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I have known the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) for a long time. He is an old-timer in this house; and he must feel some comfort in hearing praise that is usually reserved until after a man is dead.
