The Minister of Justice is a democrat. It is well known in this city that he does not blush when he gets into a streetcar. He does it naturally, without pose. He is a hard worker and he is honest. I need not say he is a gentleman, because all hon. members of this house are gentlemen.

Mrs. STRUM: No.

Mr. POULIOT: With one exception, which proves the rule. The Minister of Justice is a remarkable debater with whom I have had to cross swords on many occasions. I very seldom agreed with his policies when he was minister of finance, but that has not affected our friendship. It is remarkable the way this house respects freedom of thought and of opinion. We may entirely disagree and yet remain good friends. By the way, the late Colonel Ralston probably never understood why the Minister of Justice and I were friends, and neither could I understand how the minister could be friends with Mr. Ralston; but that did not affect our good relations.

When the Minister of Justice gives his opinion, it is clear cut; and then he has the great merit of acting accordingly. There is no possible mistake about the choice he makes. For a time he had the most thankless job of all cabinet ministers. As minister of national revenue, and as minister of finance in wartime, he was the goat of everybody in respect to his legislation, but no one ever suspected him of having a wrong intention. He meant well, in his own view. Now he is in the Department of Justice, which is supposed to be the kingdom of peace and calm. He is also the Attorney General of Canada, both positions of great responsibility, which he is filling very well. I wish him every success in life. I wish him in the practice of his profession the same success he had in politics, and at the same time I express my very best wishes to his charming wife and to his children.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join in the tributes paid this afternoon to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley). Long after the days of political differences have been forgotten, the basic foundations which support men in public life will remain. One of the things most of us will never forget is the sterling character of the Minister of Justice, both in private and in public life, while he has been a member of the House of Commons and of the government.

Character in public men is always remembered. To the minister's attributes of integrity and honesty, and his generally sound approach to the many matters which came before him in his various capacities, the public will pay tribute long after he has left this chamber. Let me say to him that if in his presentations before the bench he adheres as strenuously to his point of view as he has in respect of arguments made by the opposition, I fancy we shall witness either a succession of judgments in his favour, or a series of resignations by judges; because there will be no compromise. His arguments will be clear-cut and well advanced.

When the resignation of the Minister of Justice becomes effective it will be a heavy loss not only to the government but to parliament and to the country. With hon. members who have preceded me, I wish him every success in the practice of the profession to which he is soon returning.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I did not rise first in the house this afternoon to express what I know is the general regret concerning the announced intention of the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) to resign his portfolio at the end of June, it is because I felt that, happily, the time for valedictories had not yet come. The minister will be with us for another month at least, and will have further measures to introduce. I hope when he places them before parliament hon. members who have shown their esteem by their words and applause this afternoon will realize how important it is that they recognize his wisdom and judgment in matters of the kind.

May I say however, as I said last night when I was asked by the press to express my views respecting the announced intention of my colleague to retire from the ministry, that I know there will be general regret throughout all Canada that the Minister of Justice has found it necessary to consider retiring from his position as a minister of the crown to resume the practice of law.

To his colleagues in the cabinet, certainly his resignation will mean a very great loss indeed. It is one which will be deeply felt personally, and on public grounds by every member of the government. I cannot express too strongly how deeply I personally feel the loss.

It has been a pleasure this afternoon to realize that what I said last night, to the effect that I believe the minister's proposed retirement would be regretted by all parties in the house, irrespective of their political affiliations, has already been manifested. I would say more at the moment were it not that, as I say, the time for farewells has not yet come. There is still opportunity for my colleague to change his mind. We on this side of the house would be very happy if he did; and I hope that, should the minister return to the ministry at some later time, hon. members will recall what they have said this afternoon with regard to his exceptional ability, great integrity and fine record of public service, all of which is more than merited so far as my colleague the present Minister of Justice is concerned.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, at a time like this it is important that we have at the head of affairs in the country and as members of the House of Commons men of wide experience and proven character. Because of these two considerations, among others, we in this group regret that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) has found it necessary to withdraw from the government. We wish him the greatest success, and trust that the work upon which he is about to enter will not prove such a heavy drain upon his physical strength as the duties of the offices he has occupied during the last few years.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice is a great public servant. While those from my native city of Toronto may not have agreed with everything he has done, let me tell him that he has the admiration and respect of the people of that large commercial and industrial city. Speaking personally, I have found the minister most courteous in any contacts I have had with him. He is a man of sincerity, of modesty, and of great ability. I wish him well in the years ahead.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am most grateful to hon. members for the kindly sentiments they have expressed this afternoon. Naturally I had not expected that anything of the kind would occur in the house. Nevertheless I should like to express my gratitude to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for his remarks at the outset, and I deeply appreciate the words of my old friend, the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), who was in the house when I became a member of it in 1926, and with whom my relations have been on the friendliest footing ever since.

I appreciate too what has been said by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and also what he said last night in his message to the press. May I express my pleasure at the few words uttered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and by my old friend, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church).

Naturally it is with feelings of regret that I sever my connections with the House of Commons, where I have been a member for twenty-two years, and thus terminate an experience which, on the whole, has been a pleasurable one.

As the Prime Minister has said, I shall be in the house for another month, and the time for valedictories has not yet arrived. Nevertheless may I say again how pleased and how touched I am by the remarks made this afternoon by hon. members from all parties in the house.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT'S POSITION—ASSISTANCE GIVEN BY FEDERAL AGENCIES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word to the house about the government's position with respect to flood conditions in British Columbia.

Yesterday I was asked a question by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Matthews) with respect to the financial assistance which the government might be prepared to give to a certain municipality which he named. The hon. member had sent me a notice of his question in advance, and I had an answer prepared dealing specifically with the point he raised, namely, financial assistance by the government to a municipality.

I notice from accounts which appear in some of today's papers that an interpretation has been placed upon my answer which is not at all justified in the light of what the government has been doing, and is prepared to do with respect to meeting the very serious situation in British Columbia. I would refer hon. members to the question which appears in Hansard and to my reply thereto. They will see that my reply was directed solely to a matter of procedure and of method. I made it quite clear that what I said related solely to financial assistance. I stated that if there were need for financial assistance to British Columbia or any part of that province, the request for assistance from the dominion should be made through the government of the province. A municipality should make its needs known to the province, and the province would make its representations to the dominion. I shall read the last paragraph of my statement. It will be found on page 4553 of Hansard, as follows:

I assume that if the situation is such that the provinces in which these disasters occur would feel the necessity of financial assistance from the federal government, the government would be so advised by the provinces themselves. I do not believe we would be expected to act on communications received from municipalities. Municipalities would communicate with provinces in the first instance, and our action would be taken in the light of representations that might be made by provinces concerned.

I want to make it quite clear that my reply was to a question which was handed to me by the hon. member for Kootenay East. His question was supplemented by one from the hon. member for Kamloops, asking me to reply in reference to the situation generally. My reply was in reference to the situation generally in so far as financial assistance to municipalities was concerned. I had no other thought in my mind but to deal with the specific matter of financial assistance by the federal government to municipalities which had suffered injury.

May I say that from the beginning of the disastrous floods, our government has taken action, and that on a considerable scale, in co-operation with the government of British Columbia. Possibly the best manner of informing the house as to what has been done would be for me to have my colleagues who have been in touch with the premier of the province and with the situation there state to the house exactly what has been done by their respective departments in the last few days, and what the government is prepared to do.

Let me make this quite clear. From what I have been able to ascertain, I am sure the flood conditions in British Columbia constitute a very serious and grave situation. The federal government should be and is prepared to co-operate to the utmost with the province and help to meet it. We are prepared so to do, but in so doing we must seek to avoid confusion with respect to matters which will come up for subsequent settlement with respect to financial outlays involved.

For example, hon. members will have seen that the premier of the province has been giving directions to different branches of the armed services. That action would be altogether irregular and impossible under existing conditions without the consent of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). I think I should ask the Minister of National Defence, in the first instance, to indicate to the house what has already been done by the armed forces, and then I should like my colleagues in some of the other departments to state just what has been done by their respective departments up to the present time.

May I make it perfectly clear that with respect to any request that comes to us from the province, that request will be immediately considered. The government of Canada is prepared to do all that it possibly can do in the way of co-operation with the province to meet the appalling situation that exists at the present time and which I am afraid may grow even worse.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before the Prime Minister calls on the other ministers, may I ask him to comment on the question which was raised in the house yesterday with respect to the suggestion made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) when he was out there. I think the Prime Minister was going to look into that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my hon. friend knows, reference was made to some remark which the Minister of Trade and Commerce had made. I have not been in direct touch with the Minister of Trade and Commerce since, and I cannot say whether he was correctly reported. I am not in position to answer that.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should be glad to supplement the rather short statement I gave the house last Friday in connection with the work being done by the armed forces in relieving the flood conditions. From the outset of this serious and difficult situation the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian army and the Royal Canadian Air Force, in accordance with instructions from national defence headquarters in consequence of my directions, have been co-operating in every way possible with the provincial and local authorities.

This began on May 23 when the first reserve army unit to get to work was activated at Kimberley. Since then a very considerable proportion of the reserve army units and virtually all the active army forces on the Pacific coast have been working full time.

I have kept in close touch with the situation and am receiving reports several times a day. There is continuous radio and teletype communication between the units in the Fraser valley and national defence headquarters. Last night I had two long-distance telephone communications with Premier Johnson. On the first of these he suggested that in order to co-ordinate relief activities it would be desirable to have them directed by Colonel Snow, the area commander of the Canadian army on the spot. Instructions were accordingly given by myself, both to Colonel Snow in a later conversation and through the chief of the general staff at national defence headquarters. I was also in touch through the night with further developments.

Perhaps I might briefly tell the house something of the activities of the three services so that hon. members will know the extent of the operations involved. As for the navy, these operations have been directed by H.M.C.S. Antigonish, a frigate at New Westminster, with Commander O. C. S. Robertson, G.M., in charge. He has under him thirty naval craft, including tugs, a supply ship, six landing craft, yard craft, motor boats and ships' cutters and whalers which are operating between the mouth of the Fraser river and Agassiz. Officers of both the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve are engaged in this operation.

The naval radio transmitting station at Sumas had to be evacuated this morning. That station is part of a network around the world, and it handles British commercial ship traffic in the northern Pacific. The job is being undertaken by the cruiser H.M.C.S. Ontario, at Esquimalt, which is handling the traffic from there. The R.C.N. have also established a complete communications network for the whole Fraser valley, centred at Aldergrove. It is in communication with Esquimalt and the army signal officer at Vancouver both by teletype and radio. All the various craft in the area are provided with walkie-talkies. These efforts in the field of communications are enabling local authorities to keep in touch with the situation and also enabling ordinary messages to be carried to and from the people concerned.

The army similarly has been doing a very considerable job in connection with signals. It is handling all the ordinary commercial traffic into Prince Rupert as the other facilities have been washed out. The army has been working to set up with the other services a number of wireless circuits operating from Vancouver to Edmonton and from Victoria to Calgary to assist communications. Altogether 120 ranks in the army alone are engaged in this communications work and preparations are being made to handle all commercial traffic in the area should that become necessary. It is a very large undertaking. To assist in this, twenty-one army personnel were yesterday flown from Ottawa to Vancouver.

In addition, the army has been assisting actively in flood control by actual work on the reinforcement of dikes. It supplied all the sandbags asked for. Altogether 290,000 were flown into the area, and there are reserves of another 300,000 established at places between Winnipeg and Vancouver so that they can be flown wherever they are required. The army has made available to the Red Cross large numbers of tents, blankets, and equipment of various kinds, including pumps, assault boats, traction equipment, and so forth. It is working closely with the provincial and local authorities.

The air force has been supplying the air lift for sandbags and other materials, and in addition has been carrying considerable quantities of blood plasma, drugs, tents, signal equipment, water pumps, and so forth. All aircraft in the area have been made available to the authorities in the area for reconnaissance and relief work. A number of reconnaissance flights have been made, flying the provincial authorities over the area so that they can see what is being done. Altogether sixteen aircraft have been employed in the lifts, with five other aircraft engaged on the spot.

The R.C.A.F. has also been asked to make available hangars and other buildings for the reception of evacuated persons at Abbotsford, and the equipment depot in Vancouver; and it has provided cooks, cooking equipment and other facilities wherever required.

I am glad to say that Premier Johnson expressed great satisfaction at the co-operation being extended by the armed forces and it is a source of satisfaction that we should have been able to bring aid to the people in the area who need it so much. I can assure the house that anything further that can be done by way of co-operation with the provincial and local authorities will be done if it lies within our power.

Hon. members might be interested in a message I sent to the army and naval commanders on the spot last night:

> I would like you to know that the great efforts being made by the members of the armed forces to assist provincial and local authorities to meet emergency are greatly appreciated.

Mr. PEARKES: Will the minister give us some idea of the number of army troops actually employed on the reinforcement of the dikes?

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not know just how many are employed on the dikes, but altogether, of the army there are 1,300 assisting in the work of flood relief; navy, 750, and air force, immediately on the scene, apart from those engaged on transport work farther back, 250.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, may I add a few words to what I said the other day with regard to flood conditions in British Columbia. At that time I mentioned that the deputy minister of public works was out there, and he returned to Ottawa yesterday. The situation as described in the newspapers is accurate, my deputy reports. He was out there to direct the work of the engineers of the Department of Public Works.

Our interest in these works on the Fraser river may be divided into two phases. The first is dredging from the gulf of Georgia on the north arm and west of New Westminster, and on the main river. We have been dredging for a good many years on the north arm and on the main river. That helps to increase the flow of the river. We have two dredges working continuously on that part of the Fraser river, and at different times have awarded large dredging contracts. This is one way in which we help to regularize the flow of the Fraser river.

The second kind of work to which we have contributed in the past has been to help in the construction of dikes at Agassiz, Kirkland island and other places. We have contributed through the diking commission of British Columbia to the erection and maintenance of some of these dikes, and we propose, after these terrible conditions are over, that so far as navigation conditions justify we shall continue to help in the construction of these dikes. Our engineer out in British Columbia has been instructed to co-operate and offer his services and those of all his staff to the provincial and municipal authorities, and they are at the disposal of the people of British Columbia to give what help they may.

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago when questions were asked with regard to the floods in British Columbia I said that Mr. L. B. Thomson, director of rehabilitation, P.F.R.A., was already in British Columbia. He had gone there in the first instance to check our engineers at Kamloops and elsewhere with regard to the work that is being done, but when the flood conditions developed we immediately asked him to report fully on all developments so as to make it possible for us to arrive at conclusions as to what might be done to avoid similar occurrences in the future. Since then inquiries have been made with regard to what assistance might be given in providing feed grain and feed for livestock and poultry generally. Wires started to come through about three days ago. Prior to that we had Mr. A. M. Shaw in British Columbia. He is the director of marketing and the member of our departmental staff who had charge of the distribution of feed grain throughout Canada during the war period. Under him Mr. Davidson was carrying on as the director or feeds administrator during that period. Recently he went to the wheat board at Winnipeg. He has been seconded back to the Department of Agriculture and is in British Columbia directing these activities toward maintaining feed supplies at present. The main feature of the directions has to do with export grain which is in the elevators at the coast, and orders have already been issued to retain that grain there until such time as we know that the supplies will be sufficient.

I am informed that there are about two or three weeks' supply of feed grain at most places but there is difficulty in making new shipment into these areas. Grain is being moved as near to the area as possible in order to have it available at any time that there may be shortages. Up to the moment we have replied to all requests that have been made for assistance, to make it certain that grain will be available for feed as time goes on.

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): When the flood conditions were made known last week I communicated at once with the minister of health in the province of British Columbia, and offered the services and the facilities of this department, both in British Columbia and here at Ottawa. I may say that judging from the telephone call I had this morning from Mr. Pearson, the situation under his direction and that of the deputy minister of health, Doctor Amyot, seems to be well in hand. The doctors and nurses, the ward aides and the hospitals of this department in British Columbia, have been placed at the disposal of the department of health of British Columbia for whatever use in the circumstances the authorities deem best. Everything that we can do to help will be done.

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): The assistance which the Department of National Revenue can render in an emergency of this kind may not be very great, but such as it is, it may be appreciated by those affected. The time for filing income tax returns expired yesterday, but in view of the exceptional conditions which prevail in many parts of British Columbia I wish to state that income tax returns of those affected by flood conditions in that province will be accepted up to the end of June, without penalty for late filing.

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I think I ought to say on behalf of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply that other activities that may be of assistance to those suffering by reason of flood conditions are being carried out. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, through the emergency shelter administration, have made available to the Red Cross space in the Dunsmuir hotel and the old Hotel Vancouver for their work, and also for temporary shelter for evacuees from the flood areas. I might also add that Trans-Canada Air Lines have moved all available equipment into the area in an effort to help meet the transportation needs arising out of the emergency.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): The people of British Columbia, and certainly those of us from there who are in this house, will be grateful I know for the assistance which has been given, and which has been detailed by the various ministers who have spoken. I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of what he has said, and the general statements which have been made. The question is this: Are we justified now in assuming that this represents to some extent a change in the position which the Prime Minister announced yesterday, when he said—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. FULTON: —that the primary responsibility rested with the local authorities, and that the government felt—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member should be allowed to say something.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member knows very well that in putting a question he should not make a statement. I suggest that he put his question.

Mr. FULTON: I am trying to do it as briefly as I can. That is the general subject of my question. It is based on the Prime Minister's remarks which are to be found on page 4553 of Hansard. My other question is this. Is any provision being made or contemplated for the extension of financial relief by the federal government to those who have suffered loss as a result of the flood?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Over a good many years I have had to consider problems which related to the provinces, the municipalities and the dominion government, and I have had enough experience in these matters to realize that unless some course is followed which is consistent there are bound to be difficulties arising in the matter of making settlements, especially in dealing with finance. There we are dealing with the people's money; it is certain to be most embarrassing to all concerned if there is any room for misunderstanding. When one is handed a question, or asked a question on the orders of the day, one naturally looks at what the intent of the question is. The question addressed to me yesterday by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Matthews) was in writing. It related specifically to financial assistance to a municipality. I came in the house prepared to give an answer to that question. The answer I gave was that in connection with matters relating to financial assistance, the dominion government would consider these matters when representations were made by the province, but that it should not be expected of us that we should deal with requests that came from individual municipalities, or give undertakings to municipalities. That is the substance of what I said yesterday.

In my reply yesterday the general question of what the government was doing in other directions did not enter my mind, because it was concentrated on the specific question. There is no change in the government's attitude from what it has been. I suggest that the hon. gentleman will see from what the ministers have said that we did not wait a day, in any of the departments of government that were in a position to give assistance, to render such assistance as we possibly could.

The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) has asked me about the financial assistance that we are prepared to give. I would reply to that question that when we receive from the Premier of British Columbia a statement in which the premier sets forth the need for financial assistance, we will take immediately that request into consideration, and will deal with it on lines which we believe will be considered fair and just by the province and by the dominion.

Mr. MANROSS: In the budget debate the Minister of Justice said that the surplus could be used for a rainy day.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): As one of the members from British Columbia may I say this. After listening to the statement made by the Prime Minister, and by the ministers of the various departments, I wish to express my appreciation on behalf of the people of the province of British Columbia for the helpful steps that have already been taken by the government and the ones they are taking now. It has been very interesting to hear what the various ministers have said, but I should like to have heard from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), because after all he is the one who has to do with the people's money.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will understand that I cannot permit debate on this matter. If he has any questions to put to the government, he may do so.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I have no question; I am merely expressing my appreciation of the government's action.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I want to interject one remark in reply to what my hon. friend has said. I made no comment because the Prime Minister has indicated a general statement of policy with respect to financial matters; therefore it did not behoove me to add anything to what he said.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Minister of Finance a question? As the member for Kootenay East has said, we have heard from all the ministers, and they have told us of the work that has been done in connection with the floods. What the people of British Columbia would like to know is just what this parliament and this government are prepared to do in the way of giving cash grants and assistance to take care of the tremendous loss which the province has suffered.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think it is enough for the Prime Minister to say that he is going to consider it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: Some policy should be announced by this government.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not going to make a political speech about that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GRAYDON: You have made some before, so you are experienced at it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must remind the hon. member for Peel that the rules of the house apply to everyone.

Mr. GRAYDON: But surely, Mr. Speaker, the rules apply to ministers as well as to the opposition. We are only trying to get some policy from the government, but they will not give us a policy.

H.M.C.S. "MAGNIFICENT"

REFERENCE TO ARRIVAL AT HALIFAX JUNE 1

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. DICKEY (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister's attention been called to the fact that today is the day on which Canada's new aircraft carrier is to arrive at her home port, Halifax?

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): I am glad indeed to say that the ship Magnificent lands in Halifax today. She is the first aircraft carrier to be equipped with a squadron of Sea Furies and also a squadron of Firefly IV aircraft. The ship is winterized and will make a trip this summer to the arctic as far as Hudson strait. The R.C.N. will welcome her joining them.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member should have given notice of the question.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

EXCISE ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Act to repeal, effective on and after May 19, 1948, the excise duty on spirits used in the production of vinegar.

Mr. FRASER: Under the budget as it was presented to the house I was pleased to see that the minister took the tax off alarm clocks, flatware, and Braille watches, though he should never have had a tax on these watches, since they are for the blind.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): This is the Excise Act, and it deals with the tax on vinegar.

Mr. FLEMING: In what order does the minister intend to have these different resolutions called?

Mr. ABBOTT: Actually I had intended to take the Excise Tax Act, but the chairman called the Excise Act first. Since he has called the Excise Act we will proceed with that; then the Excise Tax Act; then the tax on Braille watches and one thing and another; then the Dominion Succession Duty Act, the Income War Tax Act, and finally the Customs Tariff.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Resolution agreed to.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide, effective on and after May 19, 1948:

1. That the sales tax on the following list of articles be repealed: (a) shortening, soups, rice, yeast, yogurt, barley, split peas, peanut butter, biscuits, cookies and similar articles, pastry, cake, biscuit and similar mixes, cereal breakfast foods not including beverages, foods prepared and sold exclusively for feeding infants, fruit, canned, frozen, dried or evaporated, fruit juices which consist of at least ninety-five per cent of pure juice of the fruit, jams, jellies, marmalades and preserves, corn syrup, table syrups and molasses, meats and poultry, cooked, canned, frozen, smoked or dried, canned fish, spaghetti, macaroni, and vermicelli, vegetables, canned, frozen or dehydrated, but not including pickles, relishes, catsup, sauces, olives, and similar goods, vegetable juices; and (b) hay presses and complete parts thereof; auxiliary internal combustion engines incorporated into agricultural implements or agricultural machinery, and complete parts thereof; crushed stone or crushed gravel; articles imported by or for public museums, public libraries, universities, colleges or schools, and which are to be placed in such institutions as exhibits; wheel chairs and complete parts thereof specially designed for the use of invalids;

2. That the excise tax on the price of admission to places of amusement be repealed;

3. That the excise tax on charges made in places of entertainment be repealed;

4. That the excise tax on bets on horse racing be repealed;

5. That the retail purchase tax on watches specially designed for use of the blind, alarm clocks selling to the user at not more than ten dollars each, and plated table knives, forks and spoons, be repealed;

6. That the special excise tax of three per cent on goods imported into Canada from general tariff countries be repealed;

7. That the rates of excise tax on matches be amended to provide for a proportionate rate of tax on packages of smaller sizes; and

8. That the excise tax of 25 per cent be repealed on 16 mm. projectors for slides, films or pictures, and that the tax be extended to cover projector mechanisms, sound equipment, arc lamps, lenses, bases, and film magazines or reels for moving picture projectors.

Mr. JACKMAN: Will the minister indicate to what articles in the form of processed foods the sales tax is still applicable?

Mr. ABBOTT: Broadly speaking, spices, pickles, relishes, mayonnaise and other specialty articles of the kind.

Mr. ADAMSON: I wish to ask a question with regard to which I have had some correspondence with the Minister of National Revenue, who has probably discussed the matter with the Minister of Finance. I ask it for the purpose of clarification so that other concerns in a like position will know what the situation is.

I have been corresponding with a major producer of canned soups in my own riding, who has stated that while the sales tax had been removed from the final product, at the same time the tax had been imposed on ingredients of the final product. I understand that if the final product is produced under a sales tax, a licence number is given to the concern in question, and if that licence number is given, the component parts of the final product are tax free. When, however, the final product is tax free, these components are taxed. The concern I have in mind wished to announce reductions in the prices of certain products in order to pass on the savings to the consumer. This being so, I think the minister should make a statement on the matter.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am familiar with the case which my hon. friend refers to. I am told that the great majority of the ingredients in the soup are exempt from sales tax. The container is of course exempt from sales tax, and the officials inform me that the content of these prepared soups which is subject to sales tax is relatively insignificant in value. I am told that in one way or another, under the licence system, or otherwise, certainly the major portion of the ingredients of these prepared soups is exempt from sales tax, as is the finished product and the container in which the product is put up.

Mr. ADAMSON: The minister mentioned mayonnaise and other things. Are the articles that are subject to sales tax taxable because of United States content, or because they are considered a luxury item? For what reason are they taxed? It seems strange that any part of a food, even flavouring or spice, should be subject to sales tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, they are not exempt from the sales tax. They are looked upon as coming within the category of specialty goods or imported goods. A large number are imported; but it is fair to say that with the changes proposed here virtually all, and certainly all the staple food products, some of them even processed or manufactured, as in the case of breakfast foods, are exempt from sales tax.

Mr. TUSTIN: I notice the list of articles on which the tax has been repealed includes canned vegetables and fruit juices, but the list does not include catsup and vegetable juices. Why should they not be placed in the same category as canned vegetables and fruit juices?

Mr. ABBOTT: Vegetable juices are included.

Mr. TUSTIN: Vegetable juices are in the same line, immediately under catsup.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is a question of punctuation. The exclusions relate to vegetables, canned frozen or dehydrated, but not including pickles, relishes, catsup, sauces, olives and similar goods. Then there is a semicolon; and then come vegetable juices. It may not be entirely clear, but vegetable juices are exempt and the qualification relates to pickles, relishes, catsup, sauces, olives and similar goods.

Mr. FLEMING: When the minister was introducing his budget he said, at page 4068 of Hansard, that the exemptions which are the subject matter of the resolution now before the committee would result in a revenue loss for an entire year of about $20,000,000. No one in the house will object to these exemptions; the criticism has been that they do not go far enough. The concern of the public will be, I think, that the reductions in taxes levied in the first instance should be passed on to the consumers just as soon as possible. May I ask the minister if his department or the wartime prices and trade board is interesting itself in that question? There were a good many newspaper articles on that point just after the budget speech. In an article in the Globe and Mail I noticed this: "Biscuit makers pass on tax cut. Reduction of two to five cents on a package of biscuits made possible by the elimination of the eight per cent sales tax is being passed on to the consumer." That was an announcement made by the sales manager of McCormick's Limited. I think we all appreciate that it may take a while for some of these reductions in taxes to be translated into reductions in price to the consumer, as inventories move off the shelves. Has the minister any information to give the committee on that point?

Mr. ABBOTT: That question received a great deal of consideration when thought was being given to the removal of this tax, because naturally we are all interested in seeing that the consumer should get the benefit of the tax relief; that it should not be absorbed in the prices or profit margins of manufacturers or distributors. The information I obtained convinced me the situation was such that in the great majority of these items the reduction would be reflected in the prices. Already it has been reflected in the prices of things like smoked meats. If hon. members or their wives have been purchasing these commodities they will have noticed a definite reduction. In cases where inventories were low, that reduction would be reflected quite promptly.

The big items in this $20,000,000 saving will be in the field of smoked meats, that is ham and bacon, and in the canned vegetables and fruits. Those are the items in which there is the large revenue loss; and I am informed that the competition feature there is such that the reduction would be reflected in the prices. I have made no purchases myself to see if that is true, but I have every reason to believe that these savings will be passed on to the consumer.

Mr. KNIGHT: I am sorry to have to differ from the minister, but out in our part of the country it is definitely conceded that there is practically no difference in price. I do not know about ham and bacon, but on ordinary items it is conceded that removal of the sales tax is making practically no difference, and people have written me to that effect.

Mr. ABBOTT: It may be that the distributors have not yet got rid of their tax-paid inventory. We made no refunds.

Mr. KNIGHT: There is also the matter of freight rates. The extra freight must have made some difference, but they say they cannot notice any difference in their family budgets. I think it only fair to report this situation.

Mr. ABBOTT: That may be true, but general statements of that kind do not carry a great deal of conviction. The effect on a can of peas or corn or something like that should be two or three cents, and people might not notice it, but it is there just the same.

Mr. KNIGHT: When you have the head of a great system of chain stores warning the people there will not be any reduction, I am afraid we have to take his word for it.

Mrs. STRUM: I should like to ask the minister how a consumer is to determine the amount of the reduction. Is the government taking responsibility for posting schedules or releasing information? If I go into a store to make certain purchases, how can I tell whether or not the entire reduction is being passed on?

Mr. ABBOTT: So far as I know there is no way in which the individual can tell that, because there is no price control on the particular articles with which we are concerned here. I do not think that could be enforced now. Therefore we must depend on the ordinary competition between stores. If the tax represented an additional amount of eight or ten cents a pound on ham or bacon, or whatever it may be, the normal forces of supply and demand will operate, I am sure, and the price will represent the cost to the merchant plus his margin of profit. Of course if he has to cut the price below that, he will go out of business. To answer my hon. friend's question directly, there is not, and there cannot be, any policing by the government on the individual grocer to see that he gives his customers the benefit of the lower cost made possible by the removal of the sales tax.

Mrs. STRUM: Then this is the list on which these cuts can be expected?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct. There is a long list, but the main items are the cooked and prepared meats, a wide range of canned fruits and vegetables, and things like biscuits, to which the hon. member for Eglinton has referred; macaroni, vermicelli, and so forth.

Mr. TUSTIN: There is quite a difference between the articles the minister has just mentioned. I would like to draw attention to the fact that all canned goods are packed in the summer months. These canned goods are now in the hands of the dealers, not in the hands of the producers. Consequently in the great majority of cases the government collected the sales tax on these goods quite some time ago. But that is not the question I rose to ask. This paragraph does not seem very clear to me as it is printed. Am I correct in understanding that the sales tax is now repealed on tomato juice and all vegetable juices?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. HACKETT: I was going to ask the minister if he would mind restating, because I think he has answered the question in part, whether the articles mentioned in the two last lines of section 1, subsection (a), are excluded from relief because during the war they were manufactured in Canada? I am referring to relishes and sauces, and I have in mind also mustard, which we formerly imported to a large extent from Britain. During the war these commodities were manufactured in Canada. Is the sales tax retained as a protective measure, or what is the reason for excluding these items from the relief which is given to other commodities?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I did not make myself perfectly clear previously. The main consideration was that these are not looked upon as primary foods. They are manufactured articles. They are processed foods, somewhat in the nature of specialty or luxury products. It is proposed to remove the sales tax from all the staple foods, but it is felt that specialty products such as I have indicated contain a high value of processing cost and should remain subject to sales tax.

Mr. HACKETT: A moment ago an hon. member asked what happens to the merchant who has acquired these commodities and paid the sales tax on them. He could not very well charge it when he sells the article at retail. Is the tax exigible from the retail and final sale only, or is it exigible on the sale from the manufacturer to the jobber, from the jobber to the retailer, and from the retailer to the consumer?

Mr. ABBOTT: The tax is imposed, as my hon. friend knows, at the manufacturer's or wholesale level. When the retailer buys his stock of vermicelli or breakfast food, or whatever it is, he buys it with the sales tax included. That represents his cost. No refunds are being made. I made that clear in my budget speech. The retailer will have an inventory on which he will have to get his costs, plus, I should hope, a reasonable margin. It is only after he has disposed of that inventory that he will, in fairness to himself, be in a position to pass on to the consumer the benefit derived from the removal of the sales tax. Business being what it is, some retailers may give the benefit right away. In getting a new stock they may average it out and give the benefit at once. In any event they will have a tax-paid inventory on which they can get no refund, and on which they will have to recoup themselves out of the prices of the goods.

Mr. ADAMSON: It will effect only the current year's crop?

Mr. ABBOTT: In respect of canned vegetables that is true, so far as they have passed out of the hands of the cannery into trade channels. But we are at a stage in the year when those stocks are approaching their lowest point; therefore, as my hon. friend says, on the new crop it will apply in its entirety.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister says that the tax was imposed on the manufacturer and wholesaler. It is only against the one, is it not?

Mr. ABBOTT: I said it was at the manufacturing or wholesale level.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Why is there a difference between the manufacturing and the wholesale level? The manufacturing level would represent a lower price, would it not?

Mr. ABBOTT: The difference between the two is that a licensed wholesaler who buys from a manufacturer can quote his licence number, but the tax is still computed on the manufacturer's price.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I see reference to breakfast cereals and breakfast foods, not including beverages. What beverages could be included? Does it refer to tomato juice?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is to exclude such things as Ovaltine or Vi-Tone, if by any stretch of the imagination they could be interpreted as being breakfast foods.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Celery juice is not included.

Mr. ABBOTT: I pointed out that it is exempt.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is there any tax on spectacles? Is there a tax on hearing aids? I am not sure about that, but if there is, then there should not be.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am informed that there is at the present time.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I notice that the tax is being taken off wheel chairs and complete parts thereof specially designed for the use of invalids. For the life of me I cannot see why people who are wholly or partly incapacitated should be charged for such things as hearing aids. They are expensive enough now. The average price is about $100, and then an additional $8 must be paid for the privilege of having that help, to say nothing of the duty on them when they come in.

Mr. ABBOTT: The tax would be paid at the manufacturer's price.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not see why there should be any tax, especially on articles used by people who are incapacitated or who have not the full use of their faculties. Many persons have to wear glasses. Why should they have to pay an excise tax as well?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have been following my hon. friend's remarks, and I shall give them consideration. I cannot give any undertaking that action will be taken this year, but his observations may bear fruit at some later time.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I notice that the tax on wheel chairs is being taken off; yet they do not cost any more than a hearing aid. Why take the tax off a wheel chair and leave it on a hearing aid? It is only within the last little while that people have realized they can get relief through the use of hearing aids. We know that there are institutions to help the deaf, and they are doing good work. I suggest that as a gesture of good will, and as an indication that the government is willing to help these people who are doing a fine job, it should take the tax off hearing aids. It has been found that many who have not made a full measure of success in business or in their work have been suffering from loss of hearing. Those people are being rehabilitated, and one is surprised at the progress that is being made.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall give consideration to the hon. member's remarks.

Mrs. STRUM: I should like to support what has been said by the hon. member for St. Paul's, and I suggest that the minister should do in connection with hearing aids what he is doing in connection with wheel chairs, including parts and repairs. I have had occasion to go with friends of mine when they were buying parts for hearing aids, and I know that they are delicate and expensive, and the upkeep is fairly heavy. If one is to keep them in operating condition, in the course of a year it will run into a considerable sum of money. As the hon. member for St. Paul's has said, a person who is hard of hearing is under a handicap, and will find it difficult to obtain and to keep certain kinds of employment. This means continuous expenditure for batteries and replaceable parts, which in the beginning are extremely expensive. In my view the cost is out of all proportion to what is put into them. These bits of plastic, wire and batteries add up to about $100—and you can hold one in your hand. Certainly I think there should be no tax, and no duty, because hearing aids involve not only a heavy initial cost, but continuous expenditures for upkeep.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to give my own experience in this connection. I use a hearing aid, although I do not use it all the time. They are expensive to operate. One has to buy batteries, and, while one of the batteries costs only thirty cents, it lasts about two weeks, or possibly not that long if it is used continuously. The other battery costs about $2.50 or $3, and lasts about a month if used all the time. In addition, repairs have to be made. I had mine repaired only recently, and it cost $40. There was sales tax on that. These articles do not last for ever. They have to be adjusted, and they wear out. They are delicate machines. When one considers the disadvantages of lack of proper hearing and what is being done by the institutions which take care of those who are hard of hearing in an effort to make them economically independent, it is obvious that it is not fair to tax the apparatus which persons who are hard of hearing must buy. To my way of thinking it is no more logical to take the tax off wheel chairs than it is to take it off hearing aids, or spectacles for that matter. I cannot make my representations too strong. Those who are not hard of hearing do not know what it is like and the amount of expense that is involved.

Mr. LOCKHART: I wish the minister would consider some amendment there. While he is doing that, would he also clarify the situation in connection with special bed equipment for invalids? Are they exempt from the tax?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am informed that they are.

Mr. LOCKHART: There are special types of hospital beds for invalids which are being purchased by certain fraternal organizations to be furnished to people in the community for use in their homes. Is that type of equipment tax free?

Mr. ABBOTT: That would be exempt from tax when purchased by a hospital. If purchased by a private individual it would be subject to tax the same as anything else.

Mr. LOCKHART: There are fraternal groups which purchase this type of equipment, not just for their own members but for community work. I am told that these special beds are taxed. Mention has been made of hearing aids, and I would like the minister to do something in this connection. I know of three instances in which extensive distribution is being made of special bed equipment.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have listened with a great deal of interest and sympathy to what has been said, particularly about hearing aids and hospital beds. In considering these I must look at the whole field of equipment used for the care of invalids. That is why I would not want to give any special undertaking to exempt hearing aids. Wheel chairs happen to be an item in connection with which we have received a number of representations, and strangely enough I do not recall that we have had representations in connection with hearing aids.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): You had them two or three years ago.

Mr. ABBOTT: I had forgotten about them, if that is so. I shall have to take a look at the whole field of invalid equipment and supplies. I cannot give any assurance that we shall be able to do it at once. If these items are to be exempt, they should be exempted as a whole and not in bits and pieces.

Mr. FAIR: I want to concur in what has been said by other hon. members with respect to hearing aids. I have had representations made to me in this connection. I hope the minister will not need a hearing aid, that his hearing will be good and that results will follow from the representations that have been made today.

Mr. ABBOTT: I hope most hon. members of the house will not have to pay the tax even if it stays on.

Mr. FAIR: There are a number of producing wells in my constituency, and I have been asked to find out whether the government would consider reducing the tax on petroleum products.

Mr. ABBOTT: I take it that my hon. friend is referring to the sales tax on petroleum products, which is a large item. While no special consideration is being given to this matter at the moment, I shall take note of my hon. friend's remarks.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I was not present when the budget was introduced. I realize that there will be a loss in revenue from sales tax, and I should like to know what the loss will be in connection with the items covered by paragraphs (a) and (b) of this resolution.

Mr. ABBOTT: The estimate I gave in the budget speech was $20,000,000 in connection with exemptions on food products. While the exemptions on the other items will be important to the people who use them, the amount of revenue is quite small. My officials did not attempt to make any specific estimate for the (b) portion of the resolution, partly because they did not have too accurate statistics as to sales during the preceding year. The statistics in respect to the food items were more nearly accurate.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We can take it that the loss of revenue for these two items will not run more than $20,000,000?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is the best estimate we have.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: To what extent has the experience of the last few days shown that the withdrawal of the sales tax on these food products has been passed on to the consumer? The total saving to each individual in Canada by the removal of the sales tax will be approximately $1.80 a year and I should like to know to what extent since May 19 the cost of these various items to the consumer has been reduced. Apparently nothing has been done to assure the passing on to the consumer of any reductions of this kind. What are the obstacles to ensuring that reductions will actually be passed on to the consumer, to the end that the cost of living will be reduced?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know whether my hon. friend was in his seat a moment ago when I answered a similar question put by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. First, as to the reflection in the loss of revenues; as hon. members know, this tax is imposed at the manufacturer's level and the manufacturers or wholesalers make monthly returns. Therefore it is too soon for us to have any accurate idea of what the difference in sales tax remittances will be.

As to the effect on domestic prices, we have no official information, but through the wartime prices and trade board we happen to know that a number of firms passed on the saving immediately. For instance, the morning after the announcement was made Steinberg's reduced their prices on smoked meats and canned goods.

As to how this can be policed, as I said before, under our system it can be policed only by the operation of supply and demand and the forces of competition. The alternative would be a rigid over-all price system with inspectors going into every store to investigate the cost, the mark up, and the margin of profit on any particular item. I think it will be readily appreciated that that is impracticable. The only effective way under our system in which these things can operate is through the forces of competition, by dealers assuring that the price which the consumer pays represents the cost plus a reasonable margin of profit. That is the only assurance we have that this will be passed on to the consumer. It is true of many other taxes, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Naturally I am in agreement with what the minister says. The minister must have made some investigation beforehand; he must have statistics covering the experience of the past showing the extent to which reductions in the sales tax have resulted in a decrease in the cost of living. There have been a number of occasions in the past on which the sales tax has been reduced. My criticism of what he has done in respect to the sales tax is that he has not gone far enough, and has not seen to it that at a time such as this, when the people as a whole are complaining about high prices and the high cost of living—now higher than ever before in the history of this country—any reductions made shall be passed on to the consumer. The government, having regard to the tremendous surplus that it has, should have gone a long way further. I sometimes wonder whether the members of the government realize the feelings of the people as a whole regarding the high cost of living. I take it that the sales tax was reduced on these items of food to enure to the benefit of the people of the country as a whole, to reduce the cost of living. Is the government conducting the kind of campaign it conducted during the war, to arouse those in business to a realization that the reduction should be passed on?

The prices committee—and I speak of that body with the greatest respect—has been sitting now for three months, and the longer it sits, the higher go prices. What proceedings are being taken against the small minority in business, and I emphasize those words, are taking advantage of present-day conditions to boost prices?

Certainly, if this action on the part of the government is merely a step in the direction of securing in this country a reduction of prices, it will not be very favourably received. Talk to the man in the street and you will find that the general attitude is that this is merely a sop, that it is actually meaningless in its results. I ask the minister, is he in a position to say to the committee, on the basis of previous experience where the sales tax has been removed in whole or in part, that, apart from the operations of the law of supply and demand, the saving effected will be passed on to the consumer? I know that my hon. friends to my left talk about ceilings. They say that all you have to do is: Do not touch wages; do not touch the prices of farm products; put a ceiling on prices to the consumer and then everything will be well in this country. When I hear those arguments advanced I think of the fact that in the province of Saskatchewan—

The CHAIRMAN: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but we are considering the sales tax.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, and I am arguing that it is being reduced because of a desire on the part of the government to see that prices of the things that the people require shall be maintained at a minimum level. The minister asked in the course of his remarks: Are we to police every business in this country? We in this party believe that one of the ways of reducing the prices of the necessities of life is the removal of the sales tax, and I was just mentioning that my hon. friends to my left say that all you have to do is to put a ceiling on prices and then all our difficulties will disappear.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Chairman, if my hon. friend is to be allowed to refer to the election in Saskatchewan the same privilege must be allowed to us all.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member for Lake Centre realizes that whatever leeway he is allowed must be allowed to all members, and I would ask him to confine his remarks to the reduction in the sales tax.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have found my hon. friends to my left generous in the expression of their viewpoint but equally jealous of the rights of others to place the facts before the committee. However, I do not want to transgress, Mr. Chairman. When we in this party face an issue such as this, my hon. friends to the left always rise and say that they wish the opportunity to answer. If you rule, Mr. Chairman, that I cannot point out that in Saskatchewan there is a law on the statute book permitting the control of prices, and that it has not been used by the government of that province, I shall not refer to it.

Possibly the minister will be able to answer in general some of the questions that I have raised, because the Canadian people as a whole are demanding that something be done to stop the ever-increasing cost of living in this country, and if this be one method of doing it I want the assurance from the minister that the saving effected will be passed on to the consumer.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that I can deal in other than a general way with the question my hon. friend has put. Before deciding on the removal of the sales tax on these items, I did make extensive inquiries as to the probable effect it would have on prices. I was particularly concerned with the two big items, smoked meats such as hams and bacons, and canned vegetables and the like, and the inquiries I made led me to believe that the removal of the sales tax would be reflected in lower prices for these articles. That has been borne out by experience in the short time since the tax has been removed.

My hon. friend will understand that in a period of rising prices, unless prices are absolutely stabilized, the removal of a tax of this kind, particularly at the manufacturer's level, cannot be directly related to the price of the article. Under these conditions it is very hard to say whether the full benefit of the tax has or has not been passed on. There is where the competitive forces come into play, as I say. Unless you have a rigid ceiling policy and say that, at the time the tax was taken off, the ceiling on a can of tomatoes was so much a can, and the tax taken off amounted to so much, and therefore the ceiling is lowered by so much, you have no means of definitely assuring that the benefit has been passed on. However, in the canned goods field particularly I did make pretty extensive inquiries of what the effect would be, and I am satisfied that the benefit will be passed on. I am satisfied particularly, because I have been assured that the competitive position in the field is such that it is bound to happen; but I could not say that you can pinpoint a particular article, say a package of oatmeal, which is included in this list, and say that the full benefit of the tax exemption has been passed on. The information I have been given, and my own inquiry into the matter, satisfied me that by and large that is being done.

The hon. member is quite right when he says that the purpose of taking this tax off was the desire to have the basic staple foods sold at as low a price as possible, and that the tax content should be reduced to a minimum.

Mr. HACKETT: I wish to ask the minister to consider for a moment a question that is possibly ancillary to the one that he has been discussing. He has told the committee that there will be no refunds of taxes on goods that are listed in subparagraphs (a) and (b), and I may say that these are items of relatively small cost, and relatively small consumption. But when he is dealing with items of very great cost, and I am thinking in terms of cosmetics, tobacco, malted goods and distilled goods, it seems to me that the department will have to devise some principle other than that which is being applied here, or subject those who manufacture those goods to great losses, and quite possibly to bankruptcy. Take, for instance, a carload of wine going across the continent. I do not know whether cosmetics are shipped in carloads, but let us take a carload of tobacco. The time after the goods have left the possession of the vendor and reached the consumer is sometimes a week, or possibly two or three weeks. Cigarettes, for instance, could never be sold over the counter and the tax or duty exacted if it had been diminished in a budget speech; if there is no means provided for protecting the manufacturer or distributor against these huge losses, a disaster may result for those who would be affected by the change. My question is as to whether the minister is willing to give consideration to some principle other than that applied to subparagraphs (a) and (b), which will protect those interested against great losses.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am, of course, thoroughly familiar with the grave problem that a reduction in tax on articles of that kind will involve. I am not sure about this, but I think the principle in the past has been that where the tax is increased the man who has the goods on his shelves gets the benefit of the tax. Where the tax is reduced he has to bear the loss. So far as I am aware, that has been the principle which has been consistently followed with respect to the excise tax on such goods as tobaccos, spirits and so on at the time such taxes were imposed. It arises, of course, not only in connection with these items but on a great many other things such as automobiles and all the other goods on which the excise tax is imposed. I am told that the same principle applies to changes in the customs duty. Where the duty has been increased the man who has a stock on hand gets the benefit of the increased duty, and is expected to take it, and conversely when the duty is lowered he loses the benefit. I will give further consideration to the question which has been raised.

Mr. HACKETT: I think that is the answer which is relied upon by some of the departments, but I doubt whether it is a complete or satisfactory answer. As regards customs duty, there may be something to be said for it; but where a certain commodity is liable for the payment of certain taxes, surely the merchant cannot sell the commodity, collect the tax and keep it when he sells the commodity. He collects the tax as agent for the government and must remit it. It would seem to me that the converse does not hold. The tax was on when he shipped the goods, and the consignee getting the goods a week or ten days later is not going to pay the tax because it has been abrogated during the period that the goods were in transit. I do not wish to add to the perplexities of the minister at the present time, but I wish that he would give careful consideration to this aspect of the question because, despite recent bitter experiences, we all live in the hope of a better day.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend will appreciate that I am keenly aware of the problem and I will give it further consideration.

Mr. FRASER: The minister mentioned before that beverages were not included, but that certain powdered goods were. Does that include powdered malted milk which is sometimes used for baby food?

Mr. ABBOTT: Answering offhand, I am inclined to think it would, but I would have to look into the matter.

Mr. FRASER: It is also used for making icing for cakes.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, that would be taxable.

Mr. FRASER: Why is it called a beverage? To the average person it would be a soft drink.

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, it is something similar to cocoa, malted milk Ovaltine and Vi-Tone.

Mr. FRASER: Is cocoa covered by this?

Mr. ABBOTT: Cocoa remains subject to tax; so do Ovaltine, Vi-Tone and all these drinks.

Mr. KNIGHT: In answer to the hon. member for Lake Centre, the minister made a good deal of the free play of competition and its effect upon keeping down prices. I should like to hear him comment on this question. Is it operative to that extent in a market where the goods are scarce, the public clamouring for them and there is not sufficient supply to go around?

Mr. ABBOTT: That depends on the goods. There is no shortage of ham, bacon or canned vegetable goods. In my judgment the competitive forces have free and full play on these articles today, and these are the big items here.

Mr. KNIGHT: My question related to the items where there was not that supply.

Mr. ABBOTT: There are not many of these items that are not in ample supply in Canada.

Mr. KNIGHT: The minister is still not answering the question.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will answer it directly by saying, yes. The situation in connection with the articles on which the sales tax is being removed is that they are in ample supply in this country.

Mr. KNIGHT: The other point I want information on is this. The hon. member for Lake Centre suggested to the minister that there should be prosecution of those people who charged a profit which, in the expression I have heard the minister use very often, was more than just and reasonable. I know nothing about this question at all. I should like to ask the minister or the hon. member for Lake Centre if there is in Canada a definite law under which such people can be prosecuted. Is it not perfectly legal to charge 100 per cent or 200 per cent, or whatever the market will bear?

Mr. ABBOTT: At the present time, so long as the wartime prices and trade board order remains in effect, there is a provision that no one shall charge a price beyond that which is just and reasonable. There have been, I understand, investigations in certain cases, and one or two prosecutions have been started. There was one early in the war in connection with sugar, I think it was, under that particular provision. Lawyers in the house know it may not be too easy to convince a magistrate that a price which has been charged is greater than is just and reasonable, but that is a matter for appreciation by the courts.

Mr. KNIGHT: What we appear to need is a definition of the term "just and reasonable", in terms of figures, or something mathematical.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is only one way in which that can be done. Someone might declare that a just and reasonable price for so-and-so is the price which was charged in December, 1947, let us say. That was done in 1941. It was decided that a just and reasonable price was the level established in November, 1941, and an over-all ceiling was put on, and also a ceiling on salaries and wages. That was the system during the war. I do not know, however, that anyone could pick out this or that item across the country today and say that a just and reasonable price is so-and-so.

The CHAIRMAN: With all due respect to the minister and the hon. member for Saskatoon City, I doubt very much whether this discussion is in order. Any discussion must be directly related to the sales tax, and a general discussion on the cost of living cannot be in order at this time.

Mr. KNIGHT: I need just one line to complete my thought, Mr. Chairman. Lacking omniscience, I suggest that we might as well quit talking about prosecutions. There is no such thing as prosecutions for high prices anyway.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I did not discuss the budget when it was brought down, and I am trying now to get some information from the minister. If the removal of the sales tax from certain food products was believed to be a method of reducing the cost of living, why was not that principle extended to other necessities such as clothing, shoes, and the like? Why was it restricted to the items in the resolution? I believe that the general feeling is that the budget as introduced by the minister provided for a disappointing reduction in taxation which is totally inadequate to meet the needs of present-day conditions.

As a matter of fact, the reductions such as are made in this section, which, after all, is the only pertinent section in connection with reductions in the excise tax, constitute so infinitesimal a saving to the people, if passed on to them, as to amount to only $1.80 for every man, women and child in Canada.

I ask the minister this question: What were the reasons that caused him in preparing this budget, to restrict himself to these few items? Why was it, if he was not prepared to go a long way in the removal of the sales tax, that he did not cover other items so material in the cost of living, and in particular such necessities as clothing, which bear this tax, and from which the people as a whole would naturally like to be relieved?

I think the country is entitled to a more complete explanation for the course he has followed than the minister has yet given. He has not explained why, with costs of living constantly mounting, something more along this line of sales tax reduction was not done. Our people find themselves squeezed between a salary level and wage level, which is not rising in proportion to costs, and an increasing cost of living. They find themselves squeezed between taxation, which is very little lower than it was in the days of the war, and a cost of living which is increasing materially from day to day. In the face of this, all that is done to help the average person is the removal of the sales tax on food products.

I submit that the country is entitled to an explanation from the minister, giving in detail the reasons why it would have been economically difficult or impossible to extend these reductions in the sales tax beyond the items actually covered. If designed to ensure some reduction in the cost of living, in the staple products of food; if it was good in that direction, with a surplus as large as there is, would it not have been proper to remove the sales tax entirely from other necessities, and generally reduce it throughout?

I have read the minister's budget speech, and I find there no complete explanation. What was the actuating reason? Why was not this commendable step carried forward so that this government would by its own action contribute a maximum to the reduction in the cost of living as a whole?

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend was not here when I delivered my budget speech, but he was good enough to read it, as he says. In that speech I devoted a great deal of time to explaining why I felt that the inflationary pressures in this country were still strong and why I did not think this was a year in which there could be any substantial or general reduction in commodity taxes. In that connection, I said, as reported at page 4067 of Hansard:

> In the field of commodity taxes, I have felt it necessary to frame my proposals in the light of the government's general fiscal program, and am, therefore, not proposing any sweeping or drastic reductions in tax rates. I have considered, however, whether anything might be done by way of a direct contribution toward reducing the cost of living at one of those points where it has been felt most acutely, that is, in the cost of food, and where it would create little additional inflationary pressure.

As I mentioned, in reply to the hon. member for Saskatoon City a moment ago, the articles on which the tax is removed are in relatively good supply and I did not think the removal of the tax would result in an inflationary price movement in respect of these articles. Whether my hon. friend found my reasons convincing, as set out in the budget speech, or whether he did not, I must say there is not much that I can add to them now.

Among other reasons, the food articles were selected because already, by virtue of previous amendments or because of the form in which the original sales tax was imposed, a very large number of food items were exempt from tax; and it seemed to me desirable if I could do anything at all, even if it were rather minor relief, to complete that job and take the remainder of the staple food products out of the sales tax schedule. And may I say that once one takes things out of the sales tax schedule, they do not go back in. Any minister of finance must bear that in mind in deciding whether or not to remove certain articles from the schedules. As was pointed out the other day, building materials were taken out from under the schedules within a week or ten days after V-E day. Now we are moving a step further and have taken out the remainder of the staple foodstuffs, so to that extent we are relieving the pressure on prices.

I cannot give my hon. friend any other reason or explanation. I went into the matter in very considerable detail in my budget speech, as to the economic forces which I considered made it desirable not to effect now any substantial reduction in commodity taxes. If that were done I felt the effect on prices would be adverse rather than favourable, that it would create greater inflationary forces in this country which would push prices up and not hold them down. I concede that these are economic reasons, but they were the reasons behind the budget I presented this year.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Can the minister give the total amount collected in sales tax on clothing last year?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I have not that figure here. It is readily available; I can get it and send it to my hon. friend. Perhaps

I should correct that statement; the officials tell me it is not segregated under that heading.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is it under?

Mr. ABBOTT: The total sales tax. The total eight per cent sales tax collected last year was $383,012,443; but it is not segregated under the heading of "clothing" and so on.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How is it segregated? Would the minister give the general computation?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told there is no segregation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has the minister no estimate of the amount of sales tax collected on clothing?

Mr. ABBOTT: We could have one prepared, but it would be only an estimate.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No estimate is available at the moment?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then it can be taken for granted that no direct consideration was given to the removal of the sales tax on clothing?

Mr. ABBOTT: I can assure my hon. friend that no consideration whatever was given to that question.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The tax still remains on chocolate bars and pop, does it?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right. We get a lot of money from those.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): How much did you get from them last year?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know about the sales tax, but from the excise tax on candy and confectionery last year we got $16,398,663, and from soft drinks we got $23,767,353, which was up almost $5,000,000 from the year before. That is about $40,000,000 from those two taxes. And it is taken from more than the kids, too, I may say.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): A great deal of that was taken directly from the children, right out of their hands. One of the minister's arguments for not removing the tax from some commodities is that he will not remove the tax from things that are in short supply, but there is an ample supply of chocolate bars and pop. That $23,000,000 certainly does contribute to the high cost of living.

Mr. ABBOTT: Everyone who has a Scotch and soda contributes to that tax.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is not a tax on luxuries; these things are more than that.

Mr. MILLER: We have one of these so-called pop factories or soft drink establishments in the city from which I come, and I habitually pester the Minister of Finance with letters concerning the removal of the tax on those drinks. As yet I have never heard the minister give the real reason for not taking off the tax on soft drinks.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): He just told us; he gets $20,000,000 from that tax.

Mr. MILLER: If that is the reason I wish he would say so, because every time I go home I am questioned about this tax, which means a great deal to that little industry.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps we are getting a little outside the resolutions before the committee. I have discussed the soft drink tax at some length in this house on other occasions, as hon. members will recall, and I do not think we should discuss it now because we are not touching it this year.

Mr. MILLER: Why not take it off?

Mr. ABBOTT: I will answer in a general fashion. The revenues of this country have to be raised; they cannot just be picked out of thin air. Hon. gentlemen want me to spend money on this thing and that thing, and we have to raise the revenues in order to pay the shot. For the time being we are raising them to the extent of more than twenty million dollars by a tax on soda water, Coca-Cola, and so on.

Mr. JACKMAN: What about the surplus?

Mr. CAMPBELL: I do not know whether the minister will be able to answer the question I want to ask, but I am interested in the sales tax on petroleum products, because it enters definitely into the cost of production of the people in my constituency. I would ask the minister how much revenue was raised through the sales tax on petroleum products, and if there are any exemptions. Is any industry or any group of industries exempt from the sales tax on petroleum products.

Mr. ABBOTT: As I said to the hon. member for Lake Centre, I do not have any breakdown of the total sales tax revenues from different items. An estimate could be prepared, of course; one could take the volume of sales of the different petroleum products such as gasoline, fuel oil, kerosene and so on, and estimate what the sales tax would be, but the figures with respect to the sales tax revenues are not broken down in such a way that I could give my hon. friend how much revenue was derived from that product. It would be substantial, of course, because the sale of those products in Canada is substantial. I could have an estimate made, perhaps, but it would be only an estimate.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Are there any exemptions? Is anyone exempted?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am informed by the officials sitting before me that they know of no case in which an exemption from the sales tax on petroleum products is granted.

Mr. CAMPBELL: For instance, would crude oil used in locomotives be subject to that tax?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is the minister considering relieving the farmers and primary producers of the sales tax on petroleum products in the near future?

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, of course every year consideration is given to all these taxes in drawing up the budget plans, but it is extremely difficult to exclude a particular type of consumer from the operation of the sales tax, for reasons I think my hon. friend will appreciate. The sales tax is not a retail tax like the gasoline tax in the provinces, for instance. It is put on at the manufacturer's level, and when he is producing his product and selling it he does not know who will be the ultimate consumer. So the only way to do that would be through some system of refunds. I should think the better way to approach that subject would be a complete exemption from sales tax, instead of trying to administer it by not making it applicable to a certain class of user. In any event, I am told none of these products is exempted from the sales tax now, and certainly there are no cases where a particular purchaser or user is exempted.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Fuel oil for tractors could be coloured in such a way that it would not be hard to keep separate.

Mr. ADAMSON: On several occasions it has been stated that the sales tax on building materials was removed shortly after V-E day. Being one of those unfortunate people who are trying to build houses, I can assure the minister that a great many building materials still pay the tax. I notice that here he is including crushed stone or crushed gravel. This is one of the basic, and perhaps the most basic, of all building materials. I should like to ask the minister and his department to give a list of the building materials excluded from the sales tax. I know definitely I had to pay a sales tax on copper pipes, bathtubs and things like that only last year.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not on bath tubs; I do not think so. The crushed stone and crushed gravel items are for use in roads. I am informed they have been exempted when used in building construction. They are exempted under the heading of "building stone". Shower baths, bathtubs, basins, faucets, lavatories, sinks and laundry tubs are exempt from sales tax now.

Mr. ADAMSON: I received an invoice quite recently where I had to pay in respect of copper sheeting for flashing. That is definitely a building material. If the sales tax is still being collected, may I suggest that serious consideration be given to widening the group of building materials on which sales tax is not to be collected.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall take note of my hon. friend's remarks. I have no doubt that flashing of the type he has described would be subject to tax. It is used, of course, for purposes other than building. However, prepared roofings are all exempt from tax. Items of this kind, while they are expensive, are comparatively minor when compared with the total cost of any building. The major items are, and for some time have been exempt from sales tax.

Mr. McLURE: Before we leave the food items, I should like to refer to meats and poultry. Does this mean that all cooked, canned, frozen and smoked or dried meat products are exempt?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. McLURE: I notice that in connection with fish the words "cooked, frozen, smoked or dried" are not included, and that mention is made only of the canned variety.

Mr. ABBOTT: They were exempt before. The only type of fish which was not was canned fish, and that is now included.

Mr. McLURE: Then there is a matter which I believe the minister forgot when he was making up this item. I suggest that he did not give consideration to the double taxation in connection with raw furs, especially silver foxes. This matter has been considered for several years, and is one of the many unjust taxes. This is the most unjust of all.

A farmer receives, we will say, $50 for a certain type of fox skin. Then it goes to the processing plant to be processed. The processing plant must pay the government $5 on that skin for the privilege of processing it. The actual processing cost may be only $3 or $4. However, if it costs $5, that brings the skin up to $60. Then it goes to the manufacturer, and his cost would be about $25, bringing the article up to $85. Then a retail mark-up is decided upon, and the article reaches $120. Then the government says, "We must have an eight per cent sales tax on that." This article, which costs originally $50, when it goes into the retail trade is taxed at the rate of about 32½ per cent. It seems ridiculous that there should be double taxation, once for processing and again for manufacturing. I believe this eight per cent sales tax on an article of that kind should have the minister's careful consideration.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would the minister answer my colleague?

Mr. ABBOTT: I understood that he was just bringing the matter to my attention. I know there are two taxes. There is the tax of ten per cent imposed on the processor and dyer, and then the eight per cent sales tax on the manufacturer's price to the retailer.

Mr. McLURE: It seems so ridiculous to have a processing tax. I believe the way it originated was that the people who were imposing the tax did not keep in mind that there was a difference between processing and manufacturing. I believe they thought processing was manufacturing. The fact is that processing is the procedure of getting the article ready for manufacture. The manufacturer then prepares the article for the consumer. I believe, if the minister would ask someone in his department to look into the matter, it would receive consideration. Instead of having an eight per cent sales tax, the consumer is paying about 32½ per cent, which is really ridiculous.

Mr. JACKMAN: Why has the minister retained cocoa in the classification which continues to pay the sales tax? Surely it is not a luxury item. It is preferred by many people, and particularly young children, as a beverage to be used in place of tea, coffee, or milk taken alone. Furthermore, I understand that cocoa is the basis for chocolate, and in view of the fact that there is a tax on chocolate bars, and perhaps other forms of chocolate in its manufactured state, there does not seem to be much reason for retaining cocoa in the class which is subject to eight per cent sales tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: Beverages have not been included in the schedule as being exempt. Tea, coffee, cocoa, Postum, Vi-Tone, Ovaltine and these other beverages are still subject to sales tax. We felt that for this year we were not going into the beverage field, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Are tea and coffee subject to it?

[Mr. McLure.]

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. The hon. member will recall that last fall customs duties were lowered on tea and coffee; but they are subject to sales tax.

Mr. JACKMAN: I would suppose that cocoa would come in first in the form of a bean. It would be imported in that form, and would not be a beverage.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told that it is not subject to sales tax when used in the manufacture of chocolate, or these other things.

Mr. JACKMAN: But it is, when it is bought in a can, for household use.

Mr. ABBOTT: Cocoa for beverage purposes, put up in a can, is subject to sales tax in the same way as tea or coffee or other prepared drinks.

Resolution agreed to.

2. That the excise tax on the price of admission to places of amusement be repealed.

Mr. McLURE: Was this taken off so that the seven provinces which had entered into an agreement with the government in respect of provincial relations might have an opportunity of placing it on? I notice that already several of the provinces have put this tax on at a rate higher than the federal tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: It was not taken off in order that seven or nine provinces should necessarily have an opportunity of putting it on. It was taken off for this reason, that in April of last year during the course of the discussions with officials of Nova Scotia in particular—but it had come up with the other provinces—it was represented to me that this amusement tax and other taxes—there was the amusement tax and the gasoline tax and one or two others—were taxes which, because of their nature, were appropriate for use by provincial taxing authorities. I wrote to the Premier of Nova Scotia at that time—and the letter was tabled in the house—stating that I recognized that the provinces had a special interest in this type of tax, and that it would be the policy of the dominion government to withdraw from this field as soon as it was practicable to do so. It was in pursuance of that statement of policy that it was decided to withdraw from that field this year. I did venture to express the hope in my budget speech that, wherever it was possible to do so, the provinces would not go into the field and the taxpayers would get the benefit. As far as I know, my own province of Quebec has not done so, but in some of the other provinces they have.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It was recognized by the government that this was a provincial field of taxation.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, it was not. It was not recognized as a field to which the provinces could claim exclusive jurisdiction. If I remember correctly, the language I used was that this tax among others was a tax in which the provinces had a special interest by reason of its nature. For that reason we proposed to withdraw from the field as far as it was practical to do so.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The point I am getting at is that the request came from the premier of one of the provinces that it was a field of taxation which they would like to be in. As a consequence, the request was made by the Premier of Nova Scotia that the federal government should get out of this taxation field; that was done because it was understood that the Premier of Nova Scotia wanted to get into the field himself.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, and I do not think he has.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What I say is perfectly logical. It has not been done by the federal government with any thought of saving money for the public. In his statement the minister said that he hoped the provinces would not impose the tax again, but this tax was collected by most provinces before the dominion government stepped into the field. I am perfectly certain that when the Premier of Nova Scotia asked the dominion to get out of this taxation field he did so because he wanted to get into that field himself.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not think so. This tax was put on during the war and we have now withdrawn it. If there were another war we might have to go into this field again. Whether a province does or does not go into the field again I think would be a matter for the province to determine in the light of its revenue position. If it does not need to impose the tax it should not take it from its citizens.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): This was a tax field of the provinces before the war and it was taken over by the dominion by mutual consent when the war came on.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think I am correct in saying that virtually all the provinces were already in the field. It is simply a question of whether they will increase the rate when the dominion withdraws and take the extra amount.

Mr. FRASER: Quebec has its own tax?

Mr. ABBOTT: All the provinces have.

Mr. FRASER: Is not the Quebec tax thirteen per cent?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know what the rate is.

Mr. FRASER: It runs from three per cent up to fifteen per cent.

Resolution agreed to.

3. That the excise tax on charges made in places of entertainment be repealed.

Mr. ADAMSON: What is the difference between a place of amusement and a place of entertainment?

Mr. ABBOTT: I understand that it is defined in the act. This is the tax imposed on the price of meals in places such as the Chateau Laurier grill where there is music and dancing. I remember the hon. member for Qu'Appelle asking a question about this tax. She was concerned over the fact that the price list carried an extra twenty-five per cent excise tax. I told her that she must have been dancing, but she assured me that she was not.

Mr. ADAMSON: Entertainment is something in which you participate yourself while amusement is something you are shown.

Resolution agreed to.

4. That the excise tax on bets on horse racing be repealed.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would the minister indicate the loss to the treasury and also what agitation has taken place to have this tax repealed?

Mr. ABBOTT: This tax is in exactly the same category as the one to which I referred a moment ago. The dominion broke into this field during the war. It was represented to us during the course of discussions with the provinces that this was a field particularly suitable for the provinces and that we should withdraw as soon as circumstances allowed. I said that we would. The revenue last year was $2,518,585.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has the minister the figures by provinces?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not at the moment, but I could get them. As is natural, the bulk of the tax would come from the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. I did hear that the highest per capita revenue was obtained in Prince Edward Island, which rather surprised me.

Mr. McLURE: Will the superintendent in charge of horse racing and betting lose his position, or will he just continue to carry on? He has a very good position because he goes around to the different race tracks. He has a good time and is paid a good salary.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told that the superintendents referred to were under the Department of Agriculture. I assume that they will continue to carry on their valuable function of encouraging the breeding of horses.

Mr. ADAMSON: What was the amount bet on horse racing last year?

Mr. ABBOTT: It would be twenty times the figure I gave, which was roughly $2,500,000.

Mr. ADAMSON: That would be $50,000,000.

Resolution agreed to.

5. That the retail purchase tax on watches specially designed for use of the blind, alarm clocks selling to the user at not more than ten dollars each, and plated table knives, forks and spoons, be repealed.

Mr. FRASER: I want to thank the minister for taking the tax off alarm clocks and flatware; but I am wondering, and so are Canadian manufacturers of cheap working men's watches, why it was not taken off that type of watch. In one industry alone about one-third of the production is made up of non-jewelled watches which sell for less than $5. Their total production is about 6,900 clocks and watches. These inexpensive watches are made in Canada, while the jewelled watches are imported. This means jobs for workers in Canada. One plant in my own riding employs over 700 workmen. As a sample of the type of letter received, I have one here which asks them to cancel any orders for items which are still subject to the excise tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: What is the date of that letter?

Mr. FRASER: May 21. As the minister knows, watches and clocks are carried by hardware, jewelry, drug and all kinds of stores across the country. These stores do not want to have in their stocks anything that carries a twenty-five per cent tax, because it means a lot of bookkeeping and is just a headache all the way through. I was wondering if it would not be possible for the minister to take the tax off these low-priced watches.

The other watches come in from Switzerland and, as I have said before in this house, in many cases they are being manufactured in plants which manufactured for the Germans during the war. This plant in Canada is the largest of its kind in the British empire, and I feel that it should have some consideration. The protection in the way of duty is not really enough to protect the workmen in the plant.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to say a few words in regard to the retail purchase tax in so far as it affects the jewelry business. Representations have been made to the minister from time to time by the thousand or more jewelers across this country with a view to the removal of this tax, which was first applied in 1942 as a war measure. I remember well, when it was introduced, that it was stated by the then minister of finance that the reason for its introduction was to divert wartime earnings into war savings. It has been continued since the war, and has had the result of discriminating against those engaged in the jewelry business.

It might be pointed out that if one sets up housekeeping a diningroom can be equipped with furniture that is not subject to tax, whereas the silver dishes and plates on the table are subject to the tax. I do not know whether the minister realizes the degree to which many jewelers generally throughout the country are experiencing a falling off in business since the end of the war. During the days of the war their business incident to the departure of men and women into the armed forces was satisfactory. Of late jewelers in my constituency and throughout the province of Saskatchewan have informed me that their businesses are shrinking in total sales and that one reason is the continuance of the purchase tax. Having regard to the fact that this tax was introduced during the days of war for one purpose, I would ask the minister if the time has not come for the removal of this tax in the interests of one specialized form of business which alone is subject to its effects.

Taxation is necessary, as the minister has pointed out, and must be secured by him in order to meet the cost of government but surely one business in our country should not be singled out for discrimination. If we believe in the maintenance in this country of private business and private enterprise, everything possible should be done to equalize taxation among all classes of business, instead of placing on the shoulders of one group performing and discharging, as do the jewelers, a necessary function and service, a tax more grievous to be borne than that borne by any other business. I ask the minister whether he will not even now give consideration to the removal of this tax which rests so heavily on this one business.

Mr. KNIGHT: I should like to endorse all the things which the hon. member for Lake Centre has said.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Except private enterprise.

Mr. KNIGHT: I did not specify, but I endorse most of the things the hon. member said. The jewelers in my constituency, and particularly in my home town of Saskatoon, have been writing to me continually about this tax. They were, of course, tremendously relieved at the removal of the tax on silverware and on some clocks. I suggested to my correspondents that the Braille watch might be some relief. I did it with my tongue in my cheek and got the kind of answer that I expected. One jeweler said that he had not sold one in three years. I was surprised to find that Braille watches had ever been taxed. I think that, like hearing aids, they should have been exempt from taxation. I would ask the minister what revenue he has been getting per annum from these Braille watches?

Mr. ABBOTT: Actually we have been remitting the tax by order in council.

Mr. KNIGHT: One other point. Some of my jeweler friends complained bitterly that they were facing competition from some of their own people who were not as honest as they might be in the matter of the collection of this tax. Where is the tax collected? On a retail basis?

Mr. ABBOTT: From the retailer.

Mr. KNIGHT: This man said that an honest jeweler was under a distinct disadvantage because certain competitors were saying: Just forget about the tax. The result was that they were getting all the business, and my honest friends were losing out by that. I suggested a more thorough system of inspection, and they told me that they were supposed to be inspected but had not seen an inspector for three or four years. I do not know anything about the authenticity of these statements but I thought I should draw them to the minister's attention.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is a tax which I should like to get rid of just as soon as it is feasible. In common with a good many other members, I have had letters and representations and have met delegations from the jewelers' association, who presented their case objectively and very fairly, but I did not feel that this was a year in which I was justified in removing the tax. Last year they said the tax was having an adverse effect on their business, but that is not borne out by the facts. The hon. member for Lake Centre said he understood that sales were falling off. But here are the taxation receipts for the last three years: 1945-46, $6,883,130; 1946-47, $8,165,293; 1947-48, $8,413,875. The monthly figures continue to show a rise in tax receipts.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has the minister the provincial figures?

Mr. ABBOTT: No. As I said, I should like to get rid of the tax at the earliest appropriate time, but this is not a year in which I felt the tax could be removed, inflationary pressures being what they are and the volume of public spending being what it is. The figures show that people are still purchasing these articles in pretty substantial volume. The removal of the tax on flatware will, of course, reduce our revenues appreciably. That is the sort of article from which I should be glad to see it removed. I do not know that one can quarrel too much with the twenty-five per cent tax on such goods as costume jewelry and the like at the moment.

The hon. member for Saskatoon City is quite right when he says it is the type of tax that lends itself to evasion by the small dealer who is not too honest. That is one of the reasons why it is the sort of tax that I personally would like to get rid of as soon as I could, but I do not think that in a budget such as I am bringing down this year, a budget in which there is no substantial reduction in taxes, and by which we are trying to counteract inflationary forces and pay off debt, I could go out of the jewelry tax. That is the reason which prompted it. I say frankly it is one of the taxes that was put on during the war, and one which I would like to get rid of just as soon as circumstances will permit.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The removal of the tax would not be inflationary, would it? It would be anti-inflationary.

Mr. ABBOTT: I say it would be inflationary. My hon. friend may have his own opinion as to that. He and I differ there.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I should like to say a word about this tax in view of the fact that when I was home at Easter I called at one store in Calgary and at another in Drumheller. I did mention at that time that a presentation would be made to the minister when his estimates were before the house. In the stores in smaller towns where jewelry is sold it is quite a hardship to have a twenty-five per cent tax charged on these items. It will be generally agreed, though, that the reduction on silver-plated articles will do a good deal to relieve the situation; but, generally speaking, the jewelers in the small places are finding it extremely difficult to compete in markets where other items are available. Particularly do you find that in western Canada.

So far as I could, I have endeavoured to get a comparison between the jewelry business in the east and the west. It is a pretty difficult thing to look at stores and try to estimate where the greater amount of business is done. In my opinion much more business is being done in the city of Ottawa than in the city of Drumheller. I think the reason for that is that Ottawa is what might be called a government city. There is a steady payroll in this city. On the other hand, in the western country most of the trade of the jewelry stores comes from the country areas. This tax imposes a great deal of hardship on the smaller communities, and they have made strong protests against what they call a discriminatory tax. I quite appreciate the minister's view in expressing the opinion that he had to get revenue from somewhere, but some of these businesses are pretty hard pressed. Some of them find it difficult to keep going. If some relief could be given to them I am sure that they would all appreciate it. If the minister would give consideration to it, even in this budget, it would be of great benefit to many business people.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister has indicated that this is the kind of tax he would like to get rid of if the time were ripe. I wish to suggest to him in all seriousness that he will never have a better opportunity to get rid of it than now. He does not need it for revenue purposes, and the discrimination which was so abundantly proven last year, has been proven again this year. It has been established that it will continue unless he greatly expands the scope of the present budget proposals. As a matter of fact, his recognition of the problem presented by this discriminatory tax is manifested in the fact that he has brought in this resolution at all. But the resolution is in such restricted terms that very little relief will be given by the proposals. After all, it is confined now simply to plated flatware and to alarm clocks that have a retail selling price of not more than $10. I suggest that the problem which is recognized by the minister, but for which there is no adequate solution in the budget resolution, is one that does call for re-examination of the situation.

It has been pointed out here, as it was pointed out last year in the budget debate, that this luxury tax, as it has been called from the outset, owed its origin to government wartime policy, which was a deliberate policy on the part of the government to siphon off production from this class of commodity into those commodities which more directly assisted the war effort. That entire situation which occasioned the imposition of the tax in the first place is gone. The whole basis of the case offered by the government in support of the tax when it was first imposed has gone. We should remember the words used by the Premier of Nova Scotia in a communication to the government on April 21, 1947. Speaking of these taxes, he said:

> These taxes, along with a considerable number of other taxes such as those on gasoline, soft drinks, candy bars, luggage, clocks, jewelry, furs and the like, were imposed by the dominion during the war emergency. I imagine that most governments are more anxious to take taxes off than to put them on.

I commend these words of the Premier of Nova Scotia to the Minister of Finance. I urge upon him that the time has come—some of us think the time has long passed—when this tax ought to be removed in its entirety.

Mention has been made of the discrimination that it creates as against the jewelry trade. That has been abundantly shown. The hon. member for Peterborough West has shown how it operates so unfairly against manufacturers of watches and other forms of jewelry. There is also quite a broad range of articles that perhaps do not lend themselves to classification, directly speaking, as jewelry, but are nevertheless handled through the same outlets as jewelry. The minister has referred to costume jewelry, but there are a great many other things to which this tax applies. There are all the leather goods, and luggage of all kinds. If my recollection is correct, luggage bears a thirty-five per cent tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is not the same tax.

Mr. FLEMING: No. I am dealing with the taxes that are imposed upon goods that are handled through the same outlets in many cases. If I remember rightly, the tax on luggage is thirty-five per cent. To that you add the eight per cent sales tax, which makes forty-three per cent right there.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is at the manufacturer's level.

Mr. FLEMING: Yes, and with the pyramiding that goes on, I am informed by those who are dealing in these goods that it is nearer sixty per cent or seventy per cent by the time it reaches the consumer.

With respect, Mr. Chairman, I should think there is no occasion now to continue taxes of that kind; there is no occasion for such heavy and harsh taxes being continued into peacetime. Pens and pencils are another example. Surely to goodness we are not going to say that fountain pens and pencils are a luxury in 1948 to which a luxury tax of a heavy amount should be applied. These taxes keep on pyramiding and pyramiding.

Then, there are very unfair applications of these taxes. Last year in my remarks on the budget I drew attention, or sought to draw attention, to the way in which this indirect tax was collected from the consumer. In the case of purchases from florists, this is the situation to which I drew attention. If you buy cut flowers in a florist shop today you do not pay the luxury tax, but if you buy flowers in a vase you pay tax, not only on the vase but on the flowers as well.

That has a counterpart in connection with leather goods. A wallet or billfold, if there is a pad of paper included with it, even of cheap quality, can be sold today as an article of stationery and does not pay the tax. If the same wallet or billfold did not have the cheap paper pad inside, it would bear the thirty-five per cent luxury tax imposed on leather goods.

This kind of tax has been called discriminatory, and it is so in many respects. It is discriminatory as against the retail vendors who sell goods of this description. It bears heavily upon them, and in that sense they are being singled out for the imposition of the tax. Those who are purchasing this kind of goods are also singled out. Along with that, you have a number of anomalous situations created by the effects of this discriminatory tax.

I suggest to the minister that the way to correct the anomalies is to go to the root of the problem and eliminate the tax. He has expressed his dislike of it, and I think it is fair to say he has expressed disapproval of this kind of tax. I urge him to go the whole way now. He has recognized the problem, and he will never have a better opportunity of eliminating a tax of this kind, which has no legitimate excuse for continued existence. I urge him to go the whole way and cut the tax out.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The minister himself has conceded the possibility of evasion of the tax and I am curious to know what his estimate may be. Do we get half of what we should get, or a quarter, or what?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is anyone's guess. I do not know how many dishonest people or how many dishonest merchants there are in the country. I have proceeded on the assumption that the majority of people are honest and pay their taxes and their bills, and I should think that, in proportion to the amount of tax collected, the loss would be small. But there is no means of forming a particularly accurate estimate. The officials of the department inform me that there have been a considerable number of prosecutions, and that always has a salutary effect in helping people to maintain their naturally honest instincts. I have no doubt that it is helping in the collection of the tax.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Has the minister considered putting it on the manufacturer's level? The minister would be sure of collecting it; it would ease the burden on the consumer, and he would get as much money.

Mr. ABBOTT: Speaking generally—I do not wish to have the words I say twisted—I prefer a tax of this kind, on the manufacturer's level, to a retail tax, if only to avoid the sort of thing suggested by the hon. member for Saskatoon City, that it is obviously harder to collect it from a large number of retailers, and to police it, than where taxes are imposed at the wholesale level. On the other side of the picture, where you impose a sales tax at the wholesale level, it tends to pyramiding a bit, and the retailer takes his margin of profit on cost plus tax. I cannot say that I disapprove this tax, as the hon. member for Eglinton suggests, but it is the type of tax I should like to eliminate at the earliest available opportunity. This budget, however, does not present that opportunity.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Does the United States tourist pay the tax?

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, yes. It is a retail purchase tax.

Mr. FRASER: That is what is hurting Canadian business.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): If the Americans allow their people to take back $400 worth of goods, this would be an excellent way to export things Americans want to buy, in the line of jewelry. They could take back $400 worth, and anything we could do to encourage them would be all to the good. If this type of goods could be exported through the mails without payment of tax that would be helpful.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told that can be done. The tourist can purchase an article and have it shipped to his home town and it will be free of tax, but I do not know whether he could avail himself of this tourist exemption of $300 or $400, because my understanding was that he had to take the goods back with him when he returned. I would not be sure, but I do not think it applies to goods shipped out.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Is English fine china subject to taxation?

Mr. ABBOTT: Not if it is for serving food or drinks.

Mr. ISNOR: I take exception to the loose manner in which the minister and other members speak of pyramiding. It is not fair to the retailers of Canada. They are doing business under conditions that are harder than ever before. They are using closer mark-ups today than in years gone by, owing to increased prices, and there is no such thing as pyramiding a twenty-five per cent increase. The buyer goes in and looks at an article. It is sold at $1, $1.50, $2.00, and it is easy to compute the twenty-five per cent. There is no pyramiding of any kind so far as that is concerned. I certainly think it is unfair for so many members, as well as the minister, no doubt unintentionally, to use the word "pyramiding" in a wrong sense. I think I should say that in fairness to the retailers.

Mr. ABBOTT: My remarks were not intended as a criticism of the retailers, and perhaps the word "pyramiding" was unfortunate. It is proper and necessary for the retailer to add his mark-up or margin of profit on cost, which includes the tax involved; and I was simply saying that, in the case of a retail tax, the retailer puts the tax right on and the purchaser knows what he is paying, whereas, when it is imposed at the wholesale level, of necessity it is collected by the manufacturer and there must be a percentage mark-up by the retailer; otherwise he could not stay in business.

Mr. FLEMING: "Pyramiding" is a proper term to apply to what happens, and it is not used in criticism of the retailer, the wholesaler or the jobber. They all do the same. It is inherent in that kind of tax. It is no use talking about an eight per cent sales tax as though that were the tax the consumer pays, because in practically all cases it is about doubled by the time the article is sold over the counter to the consumer, since the wholesaler has his mark-up and so have the jobber and the retailer. No criticism of the retailer is intended.

Mr. ISNOR: That is a lawyer talking.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister has not yet dealt with the question presented by this kind of tax, namely the discrimination involved. Why should he continue for another year a tax on such things as fountain pens, watches, trunks, billfolds and shopping bags as a luxury tax, when oil paintings, oriental rugs and expensive furniture are not and have not been subject to such a tax.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

DAIRY INDUSTRY ACT

PROPOSED REPEAL OF PROVISION PROHIBITING MANUFACTURE, IMPORTATION AND SALE OF BUTTER SUBSTITUTES

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Sinclair for the second reading of Bill No. 4, to amend the Dairy Industry Act.

Mr. EUGENE MARQUIS (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, on April 20 last, before moving the adjournment of this debate, during the few moments at my disposal I placed a few remarks on record. May I recall to you that I then brought to the attention of the house the necessity of protecting and maintaining our dairy industry, which has been established and developed in Canada for three centuries in conformity with the geographic and climatic conditions that exist here, as well as the nature of our soil, so that today the production of milk and butter can be increased to an extent beyond the requirements of Canadian consumers. I also urge that the huge amount of money invested in livestock, buildings and equipment for the maintenance of the dairy industry should be taken into serious consideration, and that, as a matter of principle, artificial production should not supersede natural production.

Having this in mind, let me go on to point out that most of the vegetable ingredients used in this new, so-called good and nutritive margarine have to be imported, with the greater part of the oil seeds required being grown in the United States. Soya beans are grown in Canada on only a very small scale, and they are neither the best nor the cheapest source of oil for margarine. In the United States today the chief sources of oil are cottonseed and peanuts, neither of which is produced in Canada. Even if we tried to do so, it is hardly likely we would succeed in cultivating cottonseed and peanuts here. So the greater part of the oil seeds used in the fabrication of oleomargarine cannot be acclimatized to our country. On the other hand, if soya beans or any other oil seeds that are grown here should be used in the manufacture of margarine the result would be a greater shortage of oils for other domestic uses.

Can we forget, Mr. Speaker, that a few weeks ago this house adopted a measure imposing restrictions on a long list of commodities, which until that time we imported from the United States. If we were to abolish the ban on the importation of margarine we would also have to permit the importation of oil seeds, thus directly contravening the intention of a measure adopted by this house for the conservation of our currency.

What would happen in future if margarine should be thrown on the Canadian market? In a short time we would have a surplus of perhaps 100,000,000 pounds of butter for which we would have no market. In the United States, approximately one pound of margarine is consumed for every two pounds of butter. A similar trend in Canada would result in the displacement of over 100,000,000 pounds of butter, with a milk equivalent of two and a half billion pounds. It would then be a disaster not only for the dairy industry but for the economy of the whole nation.

Perhaps one may answer that the surplus should be converted into cheese; but this market would not be unlimited, and then we would have a surplus of cheese unsold and unconsumed. Canada has never been an exporter of butter, except spasmodically, because of her inability, on account of geographic and climatic conditions, to compete against countries with lower production costs. In some other dairy export countries the economy is based upon butter. For Canada the only reliable market for our export surplus of milk products in volume is the United Kingdom market for cheese, where Canada has the top rating and commands the highest price. If, however, surplus milk were provided through the decreased consumption of butter in Canada the result would be a corresponding increase in the production of cheese for export to the United Kingdom; and with larger supplies in prospect from New Zealand and Australia that market would be over-supplied and unable to absorb the additional supplies from Canada. Under such circumstances, the dairy industry in Canada would be demoralized, with the inevitable result that dairy herds would be cut and farm income reduced.

Let us assume, Mr. Speaker, that the present situation is caused by a world shortage of foods, especially grains. One or two good world harvests would bring relief; but to make a revolutionary change in the economy of the dairy industry in the present temporary emergency would have disastrous effects upon that industry and upon the general economy of the country. There are some 500,000 dairy farmers in Canada engaged in an industry contributing over $400 million to the national economy. To depress the standard of living of this large portion of our population, together with their families and other people engaged in agriculture, could not avoid having far-reaching effects upon their ability to purchase manufactured goods. In the province of Quebec, the dairy industry furnishes thirty-five per cent of the income of the farmers. It is the backbone of our rural economy. Here is a natural process of converting into milk products our yearly crop which otherwise could not be sold or consumed. On our individual farms each member of the family contributes to the production; and milk production is intimately connected with cattle and hog raising, ensuring to the country more and more livestock to meet the needs of our urban population.

Any policy tending to decrease the production of butter will naturally reduce the output of milk, which is a most essential food for the health of the nation. If, in some cases, margarine can be substituted for butter, oil cannot replace milk. As to the present situation of oils in Canada, it is as follows:

Minimum import requirements for the current year to supply Canadian needs of edible oils for shortening, mayonnaise, etcetera, are approximately 123,000,000 pounds, divided as follows:

	Pounds
Peanut and sunflower oils	70,000,000
Soybean oil	15,000,000
Cottonseed oil	13,000,000
Edible palm oil	11,000,000
Coconut oil	14,000,000

In addition, this year's estimated domestic production is:

	Pounds
Soybean oil	6,000,000
Sunflower oil	2,500,000
Rapeseed oil	5,000,000

Despite heavy imports, Canada is still short of supplying the domestic demands for these commodities. The question arises, therefore, where further quantities are to be obtained, in view of the world shortage. The statement has been publicly made by the chairman of Lever Brothers in London that he estimated the world shortage of oils and fats at 4,000,000 tons annually, and that controls in one form or another must continue for some years. Allocations are still made by the food advisory council. If our allocation is increased, it should be distributed to meet the needs of workmen in lumber camps or in similar trades. They are frequently making demands for a larger supply of oils and fats to be used in cooking.

It would appear that the efforts to legalize the manufacture and sale of margarine in Canada, resolved themselves into trying to have a product, for which the raw materials are not available now; and when the day comes that these raw materials are available, other products, including butter, will also be in full supply. History and logic indicate that butter prices move with those of other commodities, and at that time butter will be available to consumers at a relatively low price.

I take exception to the opinion of those who state that this question is a matter of freedom. The first principle of economic freedom is to protect and maintain the well balanced economy of the country and consequently the farming industry. The physical and economic health of the nation depends on it.

Butter is a superior food and natural product of milk. Margarine is an artificial imitation of butter. Those who advocate the manufacture or importation of margarine should offer this so-called food, as it stands when made with oil without any colour and flavour for the imitation of butter, as shortening and lard are used in food. Shortening is used as shortening. Seed oil should be used as such in cooking. Margarine may be called "butter under false pretences."

Some people object to the actual price of butter. But what about the other commodities? Here is a list of commodities with comparative prices from the basic period to October, 1947. Mr. Speaker, if I have permission I should like to place this table on Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the house any objection to giving the hon. member permission to place the table on Hansard?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. MARQUIS: This is the table:

Commodity	Retail prices Basic period	Retail prices October, 1947
	cents	cents
Strawberry jam .....24 ounce	24	60
Marmalade .....24 ounce	21	42
Canned peas	11	19
Eggs .....dozen	43	64
Canned tomatoes .....28 ounces	12	28
Canned salmon .....½ pound	20	37
Coffee .....pound	41	59
Tea .....pound	84	1.14
Corn starch	8	17
Bread .....24-ounce loaf	6	13
Peanut butter .....pound	16	40
Corn syrup .....2 pounds	29	35
Butter .....pound	35	62

Beef, boneless roll	35	49
Lamb, leg	26	51
Bacon	44	64

And what about clothing, shoes, automobiles, et cetera?

[Mr. Marquis.]

Consumers have to remember that for many years milk and butter prices were far from being on a parity with manufactured products.

The same conditions existed during many years for farm and sea products, which were at such a low price that their owners were obliged to dump a great part of them as a total loss. Nobody complained at that time that the consumers did not give an adequate payment for farm products, and it would then have been of the utmost stupidity to qualify dairy industry as a monopoly. Today, the nature of this industry is the same. Those interested in it are men and women who work with their own hands and toil, from dawn to dusk, to feed our population.

Far from being a monopoly, the dairy industry is the prototype of private and individual enterprise. When butter was sold at twenty-five cents a pound, it was because the dairy industry was obliged to accept the prices fixed by monopolies. But what would be the nature of the margarine industry? Oil seeds would be for the greater part imported when only a small part of them would be grown here by farmers. But the industry would be operated by one or two powerful companies which would be the exclusive manufacturers. They would control the price paid to oilseed growers and the price of margarine. There is a real danger of creating a monopoly.

I wish to say a few words concerning the needs of the consumers. During and since the war, there has been a shortage of many commodities on account of the fact that we are contributing largely to the relief of European countries. Milk products in the form of cheese and concentrated milk are exported. Our allocation of oil and fats is insufficient for the needs of our own people. This is one of the reasons why butter was not available to all consumers during a short period of time. When I object to this bill, my view is not to refuse food to the consumers but to secure for every class of our nation, and particularly workers, butter in sufficient quantity and at a reasonable price, and to supply them with oil and fats in an adequate proportion. If, by the introduction of margarine into Canada, the production of butter be curtailed, then, in the near future, a serious shortage of butter will happen, leaving manufacturers of margarine free to sell their imitation of butter at the price of their choice.

Margarine is indeed a compound of oil and fats, which can be consumed in a form other than butter.

Some advocate that we should consume more vegetable oils and that, on this point, the United States standard of living is higher than ours. Let us compare the fat consumption in the United States and Canada for 1945:

	Pounds per capita
	United States	Canada
Butter	10·5	28·6
Margarine	4·2	..
	14·7	28·6
Lard	11·9	4·7
Shortening	9·9	7·9
Other fats	6·2	1·4
Grand total	42·7	42·6

We see that our consumption of butter is nearly twice that of butter and margarine combined in the United States. Would it be preferable to increase the consumption of imported lard and oil and decrease our farm production? I sincerely think this proposition would not resist a serious analysis.

A statement has been made that the high price of butter has caused a reduction in consumption. This is not in accordance with the facts. On the contrary, consumption of butter in Canada has increased about 33,000,000 pounds to the end of October, 1947, compared with the same period in 1946.

Some advocates of artificial butter contend that this false-coloured fat would be cheaper and consequently available to the consumers in the lower income brackets. I do not think it is fair to keep good natural butter for the more fortunate citizens and offer a substitute to the workers. Every citizen of this country is entitled to consume our best Canadian food.

Actually they consume shortening and lard, oils and fats in their daily meals. What would be the use of adding oil to oil and to discard such a good Canadian food as butter? On the contrary, we should encourage the consumers to use more and more milk products. It would be the best way of increasing the production and decreasing the price. But even at the actual rate milk is cheaper than other drinks, particularly beer, wine and alcohol. Indeed, the cost of milk is $6 a hundred pounds.

Let us see now what is spent for alcoholic drinks. From April 1, 1944, to March 31, 1945, the consumption of alcohol, wine and beer in Canada was as follows:

Alcohol, 3,719,918 gallons at $21 a gallon or $210 a hundred pounds, valued at	$ 78,118,278.00
Wine, 3,712,456 gallons at $3 a gallon or $30 a hundred pounds, valued at	11,137,368.00
Beer, 110,223,815 gallons at $1.90 a gallon or $19 a hundred pounds, valued at	209,425,248.50
Total	$298,680,894.50

This represents for each of the Canadian families an average expense of about $120 a year. If we compare the consumption of butter with that of beer, wine and alcohol we find that the whole production of 1946, 325,591,000 pounds at the rate of about seventy cents per pound, would cost $227,913,700, that is over $70,000,000 less than the disbursement for beer, wine and alcohol.

These figures are cited in order to show that propaganda is often made against farming products, when publicity is intensified to favour some other high-priced commodities. The price of butter has attained its peak on account of the fact that the production is rather small and more expensive during the winter. The price will decrease during summer, but it should not decrease to the low level known in the past.

If there is a surplus of oleomargarine in countries which grow oilseed on a large scale, this quantity should be diverted toward European areas which need fats and oils. We are now sharing our food with those who are menaced with starvation. Why should we import margarine which is absolutely necessary to feed those who cannot have fats and oils for their own living?

There is an open market for the exportation of such a product. It we want to support other countries we must maintain the stability of our national economy in order to produce a larger bulk of our own commodities and supply them with cheese, powdered or evaporated milk, and even butter, if possible.

In conclusion, I sincerely think members of both sides of the house should join together to protect the dairy industry in Canada. If a multilateral trade pact is agreed upon for the security of our future economy, steps should be taken to guarantee the maintenance and the development of our farm industries.

Such an agreement would probably be of great benefit to the farmers, but its acceptance does not imply the obligation of repealing the ban on the importation of margarine. An opinion has been given by legal experts, stating that in a country where the law prohibits the importation of a certain commodity it would not be necessary to amend the existing law in order to comply with the requirements of that multilateral pact.

Should the provision of the agreement be interpreted in a different way, I would urge this government to impose then very high duties on margarine. Personally, I am opposed to the principle of importing or manufacturing a substitute for butter.

I sincerely believe that God created cows for the production of milk and butter and has never put on the earth such a species as "vegetal cows".

(Translation):

Mr. J. OMER GOUR (Russell): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in protesting against the enactment of this bill which would allow oleomargarine being manufactured in Canada or brought in from outside because such a measure would be detrimental to the interests of farmers and of Canadians as a whole.

It is fitting that I should say a few words on the bill since in that fine constituency of Russell, which I have the honour of representing in this house, the number of electors in the rural areas is approximately the same as in the towns. In my opinion, if the cost of living is on the increase, it is not due mainly to the price of milk and butter. Some people say it is terrible to pay 15, 16 or 17 cents for a quart of milk or 70 and 75 cents for a pound of butter. However, they do not complain when buying large quantities of soft drinks at from twenty-five to forty cents a quart and liquor at anywhere from $5 to $10 a quart.

Theatres are jammed with people who spend anywhere from seventy-five cents to $3 for tickets. People think nothing of paying $1 to $5 for admission to a wrestling or hockey or a boxing match, and so on. Ladies are quite content to pay $5 to $50 for a tiny wisp of some sort of material, trimmed here and there with a few flowers which, when put together, they call a hat. Well and good, but current prices for milk and butter are considered dreadful.

I shall now tell you a little anecdote about an incident that happened when I had a visit from one of my friends who was bitterly complaining of the price of milk and butter. I said to him: "We will see if you are right. Your wages are $1.50 an hour, with three weeks holidays with pay and time off with pay for sickness. I will order my chauffeur to drive us to a good farm owned by one of my nephews, and if you are able to milk enough milk in one hour to produce $1.50 of butter value, I will give you the cow, the pail and the barn too".

(Text):

May I tell hon. members who do not understand French a little anecdote? Not long ago I had a visit from one of my friends who was complaining of the price of milk and butter. I said to him, "We will see if you are right. Your wages will be $1.50 an hour, with three weeks holidays with pay, and time off with pay for sickness. I will order my chauffeur to drive us to a good farm owned by one of my nephews, and if you are able to milk enough milk in one hour to produce $1.50 of butter value, I will give you the cow, the pail, the bench on which you sit, the milk, and the barn too." He refused the offer, and I now make it to any hon. member.

(Translation):

I make the same offer to any hon. member of this house. A hundred pounds of milk, in the form of butter, quality 3·4 brings only $2.45. As a liquid, it sells from $3.25 to $3.75 a hundred pounds, according to the fat content, that is about 8 to 10 cents a quart. That is all it brings to the farmer. The difference between 8 and 16 cents pays for distribution to homes in cities or towns.

I wish to assure my hon. friends that the importation of margarine would harm Canadians in general. Indeed, because they do not earn enough from the sale of butter, our farmers would reduce their herds and, having no milk substitute to feed calves and piglets, they would have to quit raising them.

What would happen to city people if farmers lacked means to buy manufactured goods? It would mean a slump in the manufacturing industries as well as in agriculture, and the country would go bankrupt, as it did from 1930 to 1935 under a conservative administration.

Mr. MICHAUD: Hear, hear!

Mr. GOUR (Russell): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say rural families buy four times more manufactured products than urban families, in proportion to population. Farmers buy implements of all kinds, vehicles, tractors, harrows, ploughs, cars, building materials, fence wire, threshing-machines and a great many other products necessary on a farm. They need more clothes than city-dwellers because of the variety of chores they have to do.

Mr. MICHAUD: That is true!

Mr. GOUR (Russell): I believe that every hon. member knows all about the different kinds of clothes the farmer needs to work in the rain, in the mud, in the stables and so on. Farm work is hard work, and so shoes, clothes and all other garments wear out much more rapidly than elsewhere. We must not forget that our farmers work 300 days a year—

Mr. GAGNON: Only 300?

Mr. GOUR (Russell): 300 days a year . . . Just a moment, it is my turn to speak . . . from twelve to fifteen hours a day, and five to eight hours on Sundays and feast-days in order to look after the cattle, etc. That totals 365 days.

Mr. MICHAUD: Hear, hear!

Mr. HARTT: Give them a bit of encouragement!

Mr. GOUR (Russell): These people have no holidays—

Mr. RINFRET: That is true!

Mr. GOUR (Russell): Their children begin to help them on the farm when they are nine or ten. Their salary is also quite small. Many of them earn fifteen, twenty or twenty-five cents an hour.

Mr. MICHAUD: That is true!

Mr. GOUR (Russell): Not 75 cents or $1.50 or $2 an hour as certain labour organizations request; egged on by communists. Workers often demand salaries of even $2 to $2.50 an hour. In my opinion, if the remainder of the people in Canada and throughout the world worked only two-thirds as much as farmers do, production would increase and goods would sell for less—

Mr. MICHAUD: He is absolutely right!

Mr. GOUR (Russell): This would help lower the cost of living. Goods cannot be cheap when people will not work.

Mr. HARTT: That is true!

Mr. GOUR (Russell): I want it understood that by farmers I mean people who indulge in mixed farming, farming on a large scale, those who raise cattle and poultry and so forth, as well as those who have taken up general farming, including grains and vegetables. We cannot call these people "gentlemen farmers", the latter growing mainly grain, as do most farmers in western Canada, where I was last year.

In western provinces those people call themselves farmers. Now our hon. friends speak on behalf of such farmers, though less than half are genuinely that. They are "gentlemen farmers" who work only three or four months a year and forever request large sums of money from the central and eastern provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that excess profits taxes should be reapplied, for statistics show that many companies are making too much profit by asking more than they ought for their goods, thus raising the cost of living still higher. Steps should be taken to put an end to this state of things. I feel that a labour code, under federal control, is necessary right now.

I congratulate the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) for introducing such a bill in the house. I trust all the provinces will support it. Those who like the premiers of Ontario and Quebec refuse to come to terms with the federal government, are working against their province and the country as a whole.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. GOUR (Russell): Through their stubbornness, they prejudice the interests of Canadians of all ranks who might profit from improved social legislation.

The provinces of Quebec and Ontario are richer than the others. All the more reason why they should help the needy provinces. When Quebec and Ontario were in need, they got help from the central government. Now that they are well off, let them not object to the need of other provinces. Let them rather co-operate with the central power which always assists needy provinces, as in the case of the recent floods in some of the provinces and the adoption of bills for the protection of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Those provinces were badly in need of help. I believe that we have reason to criticize the prime ministers of Ontario and Quebec for refusing to help the other provinces when they are in need.

Mr. THATCHER: Hurrah for Quebec!

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think I must call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that the bill we are discussing deals with the dairy industry.

Mr. DION (Lake St. John-Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the hon. member is quite in order, since he meant to say that the two central provinces are milch cows for all the other provinces in this country.

Mr. GOUR (Russell): Mr. Speaker, I cannot see anything in my remarks that can be detrimental to the interests of our country. This is the fourth time I have spoken in the three years I have been here. True, I might not be quite in order, but there are some here who take up three-quarters of the time of the house to say things which are of far less value to this country than what I am saying now.

I see nothing profitable in the import or production of margarine. To begin with, it has been proven that it is much inferior to butter and that there would be very little difference in its price and the present price of butter, and almost none in normal times. We must not forget that from 1930 to 1935 butter sold at from eighteen to twenty-five cents a pound here in Canada. I wonder what a margarine company could sell for less than that, except axle grease.

Are we going to permit the sale of a product which will be of no benefit to consumers while discouraging our farmers who are already only too prone to abandon their farms in order to live in cities where they increase the number of shelterless people.

I regret to be compelled to say that there are in my constituency over one thousand farms, with fertile land and good buildings, which have been abandoned by their owners and which can be bought for the price the house alone would fetch if it were located in a village or a town. I call upon city people who claim that our farmers are making such large profits to buy those farms; we shall welcome them and they will be in a position to find out by themselves whether there is really so much money to be made on a farm, especially with butter and milk.

I suggest that members of the consumer's delegation who came to Ottawa some time ago, submit their grievances to provincial parliaments who control these products, and ask them for subsidies on milk and butter. If provinces claim they lack revenue, let the delegation ask that part of the taxes on liquor and cigarettes be used to subsidize milk and butter.

The money used for paying those delegates, who instead of making useless trips and delaying us at the House of Commons, would be more profitably spent on dairy products for people of slender means.

Looking over the statistics, we can easily find out that almost as much money was spent on spirituous liquors in the province of Ontario alone during the year 1947 than is spent on butter and milk by the whole population of Canada. I mention my own province because I do not want to meddle with the affairs of other provinces where consumption per capita is just as large. Now, if it is found that in spite of the fact that there is plenty of money for purchasing that product certain families are still in straitened circumstances, since for a reason or another there will always be some in such a situation, it behooves first the province, and afterwards the municipality, as well as welfare organizations to take whatever steps are necessary to provide milk and butter to those less privileged families.

(Text):

Now you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, to bring to this house the argument of some hon. members who have spoken in favour of oleomargarine, saying that its production would give work to the labourers of this country. We must not forget that the butter factories all across Canada give more work to labourers in Canada than a few factories or one factory manufacturing oleomargarine would give in large cities. What we want is more factories in small centres.

I may ask the financiers to come to my riding where we have the best advantages in Canada, lovely little towns where they can build factories for the manufacture of some commodities that we do not produce or that we produce in too small quantity for the needs of this country, and therefore are obliged to buy from the United States, when we are always short of United States dollars. I could mention flax and linen factories, for example, which would give work to thousands and thousands of people. We are producing, and are able to produce, all the necessary fibres to manufacture all the linen we need for this country as well as for sale, for millions and millions of dollars, to other countries, and thus we shall be able to replace the linen and all other textiles that we are buying from the United States and other countries. This would render a better service to the Canadian people than the manufacturing of oleomargarine, which would destroy our farmers.

I know very well this product "oleomargarine", for I sold and ate some when it was permitted on the Canadian market. It was just better than nothing, and at that time most of the buyers preferred lard, for to keep it fresh it has to be kept at a very cold temperature; otherwise it is not eatable.

There are only a few of my electors who are in favour of this product, and after short discussions they agreed that it was not favourable to the welfare of the Canadian people as a whole. Why, if this product can at all be compared with butter, will the Americans pay $1 and more for a pound of butter when they are able to get a pound of oleomargarine for half the price? Do you believe, Mr. Speaker, that the American people do not know what is best for them to eat? And if there were as much butter in the United States, and at as low a price as it is in Canada, there would be very little oleomargarine sold there.

I believe that there should be more details and explanations given to our Canadian people, so that we may keep the farmers on the farms; and the people should not be so alarmed when, for a short period, the farmers have the advantage of making a little bit more money. You will admit with me, Mr. Speaker, that butter has been scarce only lately, and not for such a long period.

As usual, farm products are the last to go up and the first to come down. Some people try to convince us that inferior products are needed for those of smaller means, but everyone needs the best of food, especially those who are working hard. We in this country are proud to say that we have the best quality food for even the poorest class.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all our people, labourers and others, are such good Canadians that they would be glad if a measure of this kind were never put into force in Canada. They know it is necessary to help our farmers if other sections of the people are to benefit. The people in my riding are fifty per cent farmers and fifty per cent urban. There are as many electors in urban centres in my riding as there are farmers, and perhaps a few hundred more, and I am sure that they wish to protect the interests of the farmers. I have no doubt I speak for them on this question.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the sponsor of this bill made a strong case for it. It seems to me that those who are opposing the measure we have before us tonight will hurt the dairy industry. This bill will not hurt it, but it is the attitude which we see exemplified tonight in the two speeches or essays to which we have listened. The industrial workers of Canada need some protection, and I suggest that we might as well regulate the production of the tea or coffee we use. Is this twentieth century liberalism which we see in the free trade party across the floor? I have always supported the bill. They have allowed two cases of oleomargarine to come in at the depot here from the United States, consigned to our parliamentary cafeteria, undelivered, and no one can use the product. In my opinion the government is making a serious mistake, and I think the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) should adopt the principle of freeing the house, so far as this question is concerned, and allowing the members to vote, not from the party standpoint but from the point of view of the nation as a whole. I submit that we should consider the interests of the consumer as well.

On motion of Mr. Menary the debate was adjourned.

EXCISE TAX ACT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock it was considering section 5 of the resolution to amend the Excise Tax Act, which section deals with the retail purchase tax on watches, and so on. Does the clause carry?

Mr. FRASER: I would ask the minister to reconsider this tax as it affects non-jewel watches selling at less than five dollars. That is the poor man's watch.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have considered the question and I cannot hold out false hopes. I am afraid I cannot make any change in the decision. It was decided to restrict the relief to alarm clocks and not to extend it to watches. However, my hon. friend's representations, needless to say, will be borne in mind in future budget considerations.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is not good enough to say the representations of the hon. member will be borne in mind. I understand that the jewelers' association waited on the minister not only one year ago but two years or more ago and left his office under the impression that this was a tax which had been put on for war purposes only and that it would disappear with the termination of the war. Last year's budget brought no relief, and in the budget this year there is no attempt by the minister to live up to the impression, if not the promise, he gave them.

Mr. ABBOTT: No promise was given anyone, needless to say.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am sure the minister would not give a promise, but he left an impression with them which they took in good faith.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I cannot be responsible for impressions which may be given. I am particularly careful, in connection with all delegations to see me in regard to budget matters, to make no commitments. I think that is an entirely proper attitude to take. I receive delegations sympathetically, I hope, and listen carefully to their representations; but I do my best to give no indication of what may be the result of their presentation. In this case I am sure the delegation were not mistaken as to the result.

Mr. JACKMAN: In this house we find no doubt whatever left in our minds. The minister speaks with great clarity of expression and we know exactly what he has in mind. I have no doubt, however, the delegation did receive the impression, and rightfully so, that some relief would be afforded to them and to their industry, because the whole purpose of the tax has disappeared. It does seem a very great and grave discrimination that a luxury tax, if you want to call it that, or a retail sales tax of twenty-five to thirty-five per cent should be levied against a certain class of goods, particularly when there are so many other goods which come within the luxury class. You can spend your money one way, if you wish, which involves labour and materials; but you cannot spend it another way. The people of Canada, not only as purchasers but also as retailers and producers, are a little tired of having the government tell them what they can do and what they cannot do when it makes no difference to the national economy which alternative may be chosen. They can spend their money in certain ways which will perhaps involve United States exchange but not in other ways which would also involve United States exchange, all because some bureaucrat far removed from the people decides that they shall do this and they shall not do that. The Canadian people are sick and tired of it, certainly those in my constituency; and the merchants of Toronto are thoroughly disgusted with the treatment they have received in connection with jewelry.

I should like to say just a word about the so-called inflationary aspect were this tax to be removed. I suppose the minister will say that the government is taking in six or eight million dollars a year from this tax, and that if the tax were removed that much money would be available to be spent for other things. However I think the minister and his department overlook entirely the fact that the demand for jewelry, luggage, watches and articles of that sort would expand rapidly if the tax were not there. Indeed sensible people, unless they are in urgent need of a particular article, are postponing their buying until such time as this government will live up to its intentions, if not its promises; and now that the reason the tax was put on has disappeared, the tax itself should disappear. So I am suggesting to the minister that if the tax were not there the demand for these articles would not decrease; I am sure he would go with me that far.

[Mr. Abbott.]

The minister mentioned costume jewelry as one item. Certainly the amount of labour going into the production of costume jewelry cannot be very great. If the minister wants to divert a substantial amount of money from other channels, where goods are in short supply and where inflationary pressure is being exercised, then I suggest to him that as a hard-headed businessman he take a good look and see what would happen if this tax were removed and, as I suggest, more money went into the jewelry trade. Despite the figures the minister gave us, some jewelers, particularly the smaller ones, are having to take on other lines in order to keep up their volume of sales, pay their overhead and obtain some return on their investment.

So once more I suggest that if the tax were taken off the minister would find inflationary pressures removed from other and more necessary articles which are in short supply, and therefore he would substantially help our economy.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I wonder if we might revert to the point raised this afternoon by the hon. member for Peterborough West with respect to these non-jeweled watches selling for less than $5. I do not know whether the minister is familiar with retail outlets in Canada, but in many cases you do not have a jewelry store in your immediate vicinity. I am thinking of the hundreds of commissaries and small trading posts in the constituency I represent where the single item on which they have to make returns to his department may be these cheap watches; and it seems to me there would not be a great volume of tax involved. If it were possible to assist by having the tax paid on these cheaper watches at the wholesale level, for example, I believe these people would get away from a great deal of the difficulty they are now experiencing. So I would ask the minister to take this point under consideration and see if he cannot make it a little simpler. After all we have plenty of forms to fill out in Canada today, without going into this line of small stuff.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not think that could be restricted to watches. It is true that in some of the stores such as my hon. friend mentions the cheap type of watches are sold, but there is a great deal of what I roughly described as costume jewelry also sold, which is subject to tax.

I have said this is a tax I would like to get rid of, along with some others; but I must say this is not a tax with which we should start, in a year like this. The figures given me show that sales of these products have been rising steadily year after year. Today they have reached an all-time high, not only for this period but for the wartime years as well.

Mr. JACKMAN: Are you objecting to greater prosperity?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that we need to give tax encouragement to stimulate the sale of jewelry. That may be desirable; I do not know; but if we were making broad, general tax cuts we should start with some other things I can think of. Frankly I do not feel that this is a year in which we need to do this; and for reasons I have tried to make abundantly clear I can think of some other taxes I would want to remove at least at the same time as this one was removed.

This is not a matter to which I have not given consideration. Let no one be under any misapprehension. It is a great deal more pleasant for a minister of finance to take off taxes than to resist this constant urging to take them off. I am sure I would not be fooling anyone if I were to say I get pleasure out of resisting this urging to take off taxes. I know it is much more pleasant and much easier to do that; but for reasons I tried to give in my budget speech I do not think this is a year for a general reduction in taxes, and I do not think we should start with this jewelry tax.

Mr. JACKMAN: The minister says this is not the time to take the tax off these so-called luxury items, though some are not in that class at all. I would agree with him, but for the fact that this tax was put on this industry when it was not put on other types of industry. This was a discriminatory tax applied for the one purpose of diverting industry into war production and away from needless, if you like, or unnecessary production during the war. All we ask now is that the discrimination which this industry suffered during the war years should be removed. There are other restrictions still in effect. They are only allowed to import a certain percentage in value of the watches they imported before, for instance; they cannot get certain synthetic stones and other materials to make their products. Why should a discrimination imposed during wartime, for war purposes, he continued in the third year of peace?

When it comes to a general reduction of taxes, which is long overdue, I hope that reduction will be made applicable to this business or industry to the same extent as to other industries and businesses. This is a special case, brought about by the war; but after three years the minister has not seen fit to relieve these people of the rank discrimination they have been suffering.

Mr. FRASER: I appreciate what the minister has said with respect to these cheap watches, and I feel quite sure he will do what he can in this case.

I should like to bring up one other matter at this time, which was particularly brought to my attention last evening. I was informed by a dealer who is in the drygoods business that he has on hand some few hundred outboard motors he is unable to sell, even to companies that use them for commercial purposes. I do not mean just for pleasure. Outboard motors are used by the hundreds by guides who look after our tourist trade coming in from the United States. That trade is most valuable to us. Before this tax went on many of the Americans who came here would not bring in their own motors, but would buy them here, and then perhaps take them back with them. Now they will bring their own motors from the United States.

I was about to mention how these motors are used for commercial purposes. They are used by guides. The forest rangers throughout the whole of Canada use them day in and day out. They even carry them on their aircraft to take them to the different little lakes. Tourist hotels find that they must have a number of these motors for their clientele. They are used by motor taxis. Trappers use them all the time, as do fishermen and lumbermen. I believe some consideration should be given to the use of these motors for commercial purposes.

There is on the market a cheap motor which will be sold this year. But the high-class product will not sell, and the dealers throughout Canada will have them remaining on their shelves. This is hard on the dealer, and extremely hard on the manufacturer. I believe I have not mentioned more than two or three times in fact that in my constituency we have the only outboard motor manufacturing company in Canada. That company manufactures a dozen or so different types. I hope the minister will give consideration to taking the tax off.

Mr. ABBOTT: I know the hon. member has in his riding one of the best manufacturers of outboard motors in the country. I have one of its products myself. This is the type of tax we want removed as soon as we can. Indications so far would not show, however, that there has been any serious falling off in the domestic demand for outboard motors. It is difficult to have exemption for a special class of user, as my hon. friend will appreciate. If you exempt the guide in respect of the portable type of motor, I am afraid, to use a slang expression, it would soon develop into a racket. We would find people buying them ostensibly as guides and then passing them on to other people.

I am well aware of the handicap that this places upon manufacturers of outboard motors, under ordinary normal conditions, and my hon. friend can rest assured it will be taken off as soon as possible.

Mr. FRASER: On the tax alone it means an outlay of $50 by the guide, before he even gets the motor. That is a good many days' pay.

Mr. ABBOTT: The guide who takes me out fishing has raised his price in the last couple of years. I suppose that is to take care of the added cost of outboard motors.

Mr. FRASER: He is taking care of his income tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: He does not pay a tax; he does a cash business.

Mrs. STRUM: I should like to ask the minister about the knives and forks mentioned in resolution 5. Does that mean that the tax now applies only on sterling?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mrs. STRUM: But it has been taken off all plated tableware?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Resolution agreed to.

6. That the special excise tax of three per cent on goods imported into Canada from general tariff countries be repealed.

Resolution agreed to.

7. That the rates of excise tax on matches be amended to provide for a proportionate rate of tax on packages of smaller sizes.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Would the minister explain what this means?

Mr. ABBOTT: We received representations from match manufacturers to the effect that the present arrangement of the schedule of taxation on matches prevented them from putting up matches in certain small-sized packages. There was a unit tax, whether the package contained fifty, seventy-five or 100 matches. I have forgotten the exact number. By merely altering the schedule of the tax the difficulty will be removed, with no significant loss of revenue. It is really just to make a smaller unit for the match package subject to tax. It may favour the use of book matches as against box matches, but I am not sure of that.

Resolution agreed to.

[Mr. Abbott.]

8. That the excise tax of 25 per cent be repealed on 16 mm. projectors for slides, films or pictures, and that the tax be extended to cover projector mechanisms, sound equipment, arc lamps, lenses, bases, and film magazines or reels for moving picture projectors.

Mr. FRASER: Are any motion-picture machines made in Canada?

Mr. ABBOTT: I understand there are. I am told there is a 16 mm. projector factory in Eastview, although I have not seen it.

Mr. FRASER: This is put on to protect our own industry?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, it is not put on for that purpose. This was a special twenty-five per cent excise, and it was removed because I received representations from ministers of education in the different provinces and from different religious denominations to the effect that these 16 mm. projectors were used largely in connection with schools, churches and the like. It was pointed out that this added cost was a heavy burden on that type of educational work. While some are also used privately after going into the matter thoroughly it seemed to me that the better course to follow was to remove the tax completely since, quite clearly, the major portion of these machines was being used in schools, churches and places of that kind. That is the reason for its removal.

Mr. FRASER: In the latter part of the resolution it states "that the tax be extended to cover projector mechanisms, sound equipment" and so on. That is putting on a tax, not taking it off.

Mr. ABBOTT: The reason for that is that they were coming in as parts, rather than as finished projectors. It was really a method of evading the operation of the tax, by bringing in half a dozen different parts, then putting them together and making a projector. So it was really a means of evading the tax.

Mr. FRASER: The projector now would be allowed in free.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is not a tariff matter; it is a matter of excise tax. The twenty-five per cent tax would not apply to the assembled projector.

Mr. FRASER: It will not apply to the duty, or anything like that?

Mr. ABBOTT: It has nothing to do with duty.

Mr. FRASER: It applies to the excise tax?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: And they will be allowed in excise tax free?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not a question of being allowed in, because it is not a customs tariff item. The twenty-five per cent tax will not apply to the completed 16 mm. projector.

Mr. FRASER: But they will be allowed to come into the country?

Mr. ABBOTT: And it will not apply to 16 mm. parts.

Mr. ADAMSON: I have an amendment to this resolution. I move, in amendment:

That after the words "16 mm." the words "and 35 mm." be added.

I note that at present the resolution reads:

That the excise tax of 25 per cent be repealed on 16 mm. projectors for slides, films or pictures, and that the tax be extended . . .

And so on. It is the first line in which I am interested, where reference is made to slides, films or pictures. The vast majority of slides, particularly for church and institutional work are shown on 35 mm. projectors. That is, the still projector is not a 16 mm. but is a 35 mm. machine. I believe the minister will recall that during the war these projectors were used extensively to aid in sales in various war loan campaigns. They are the machines which take ordinary commercial 35 mm. coloured film or still film, and they are used extensively in this type of work.

As a matter of fact, I believe the Society for Visual Education, otherwise known as S.V.E., is the major manufacturer of this type of projector. I make a strong plea to the minister that this type of machine be allowed in, because they form a definite part in educational work in the showing of still pictures or slides. You do not show slides on a 16 mm. projector; your show them on a 35 mm. projector. I move this amendment.

Mr. ABBOTT: I question whether the amendment would be in order, because it would affect the balance of ways and means, being an amendment to remove a tax. If I may speak to it, the reason why 35 mm. projectors were not included in the tax relief given to the 16 mm. is that the 35 mm. projectors are used by the regular moving-picture industry. I have no doubt that, as my hon. friend has indicated, they are used for other purposes. My information is that the vast majority of the projectors used in schools, churches and the like are 16 mm. For that reason I do not feel that we would be justified in extending the tax relief to the other types of projectors which, incidentally, are imported from other countries, although that may not be particularly relevant here. For that reason I am afraid that I cannot accept the amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON: Apparently the minister does not understand the type of projector I am speaking of. I am referring to the projector for the showing of still films or slides, not a moving-picture projector. These were used extensively for the sale of victory bonds and they are used also to illustrate lectures and for church work.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall look into the representations made by my hon. friend and see whether tax relief of this kind can be given without letting in the other types of projector. Under the provisions of the act by which this twenty-five per cent tax is imposed, it can be done by order in council. I cannot accept my hon. friend's suggestion as a formal amendment because I think it is out of order, but perhaps he will accept my assurance that I shall look into his representations at once and, if the still projector as he calls it is not of the type used by the ordinary moving-picture commercial enterprise, if it is in the school and church category, I will consider including it with the others.

Mr. ADAMSON: I withdraw my amendment after the assurance of the minister that it will be looked into.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. ABBOTT: We might be able to do it when we bring in the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON: The manufacture was originally by the Society for Visual Education in the United States. They are really the modern equivalent of the old-fashioned magic lantern.

Mr. ABBOTT: I know my hon. friend has a good deal of technical knowledge on these matters. I shall look into it at once.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Were any representations made in regard to 8 mm. projectors?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, we have had no representations on those.

Resolution agreed to.

DOMINION SUCCESSION DUTY ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Dominion Succession Duty Act and to provide, effective with respect to any succession upon the death of a person on or after January 1, 1948:

1. That the general exemption of estates not over $5,000 be extended to estates not over $50,000.

Mr. HARKNESS: Would the minister explain exactly what this means? I have looked into the matter to some extent and I must confess that I am a little confused. According to the provisions already in force, this might mean that an estate of $49,999 would pay no succession duties, whereas one of $50,001 might have to pay succession duties of $3,000. I would like the minister to tell the committee whether that is the case.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct. The exemption of $5,000 now in the act will be extended to $50,000. In view of the point raised by the hon. member, I might say that there will be included in the bill what is technically referred to as a notch provision. By that I mean that in the case of an estate in excess of $50,000, or $50,001, to use the example of my hon. friend, the tax would be limited so that the effect would be not to reduce the value of the estate passing to the beneficiaries below $50,000. I cannot say exactly at what point that would be, what the gross value of the estate would be, but after the tax is imposed in the regular way it would not reduce the net going to the heirs below $50,000. When the bill is brought in it will contain a notch provision of that kind.

Mr. HARKNESS: Do I understand from the minister that the present section 7(4) will not be applicable as far as estates of $50,000 and those immediately above that amount are concerned?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct. Section 7(4) to which my hon. friend refers contains the words "five thousand" and the amending bill will substitute the words "fifty thousand".

Mr. NICHOLSON: Will the minister indicate what the loss of revenue will be?

Mr. ABBOTT: I did that in my budget address. The best we can estimate is that it will amount to $5,000,000 a year and will involve about ninety per cent of the estates.

Mr. HARKNESS: I am not quite clear yet on this. From what the minister has said, I understand that $50,000 of any estate will be completely exempt.

Mr. ABBOTT: No. If an estate is $75,000 the tax will be assessed in the regular way, but there will be a notch provision that if an estate is in excess of $50,000 the tax to be levied and paid will not reduce the net amount of the estate passing to the heirs below $50,000. In effect the exemption would not apply to an estate of $75,000, $100,000, $200,000 or whatever you like; in other words, the $50,000 is a starting point, not an exemption.

Mr. HARKNESS: The effect will be that estates of $50,000 or $53,000 or $54,000 would all yield the same amounts to the beneficiaries?

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot answer that offhand, but quite possibly that might be the case.

Mr. MILLER: No doubt the minister, like some of the rest of us, has had representations made to him with regard to exempting life insurance policies made payable to the receiver general or the crown. We used to have that in Manitoba, and I believe they had it also in some of the other provinces. Provision would be made for the payment of succession duties by the taking out of a life insurance policy made payable to the provincial treasurer. That was practically free of succession duty charges.

I did not know until recently that was not the case under the Dominion Succession Duty Act. I wrote to officers of the department to confirm that there would be no such exemption. Would it not be good business and sound policy for the minister to exempt life insurance policies which were specifically earmarked for the payment of succession duties up to the amount of the succession duties?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not thoroughly familiar with this procedure, but personally I am very much against it. It would be a splendid thing for the life insurance companies because it would be a good selling point. But, after all, the average life insurance policy represents the building up of a fund by the person who pays the premiums. There is a certain element in it to take care of the mortality risk, but the savings element in a life insurance policy is clearly determined. It is based upon time and the rate of interest. If I pay $200 a year as a premium for a certain number of years I build up a fund which, at an assumed rate of interest, will yield me a certain return at the end. I do not see any reason why the man who chooses to build up a fund to take care of succession duties by life insurance should be in any better position than the man who sees fit to build up a fund by depositing money in the savings bank or by buying government bonds. In either case you are allowing him a succession duty-free asset, and I do not think that is justifiable. That is my own personal view. In my own province of Quebec years ago we used to have succession duty-free bonds, which sold at a very low rate of interest. They have not been sold for years now, and I think properly so. With certain reservations, I think the same reasoning applies to a man who builds up a fund in a life insurance policy in order to pay succession duties. I am personally opposed to that type of succession duty-free assets.

Mr. MILLER: I am not worrying about the life insurance companies making money, but the succession duty rates nowadays is something to worry about, and it is only prudent financing for a person whose estate will have to pay succession duties to make provision for that contingency. I think also it would be sound business for the government to make certain that the funds to pay the succession duty will be readily available. I do not reckon it as an asset if it has to go to the government. Otherwise it seems to me you are depriving people of the means of taking care of this future liability which is hanging over their heads all their lives. I think it is well to make certain that the estate is not called upon to pay a large sum of money when it is extremely inconvenient to pay it, with the widow and family to be taken care of. I consider it sound business judgment for a person to take out a life insurance policy payable to the receiver general to pay the succession duties, and good business for the government to have them taken care of in that way. I am not advocating this so that the life insurance companies can make money, but for the reasons I have given.

Mr. ABBOTT: This does not deprive anybody of the right of taking out life insurance to pay succession duties any more than it deprives a man of the right to buy victory bonds to pay succession duties. The man who sees fit to buy life insurance to provide for succession duty liabilities has to take into account what the duties will be. The point which I am making, and which I know cannot be successfully contradicted, is that it is a method of creating a succession duty-free asset out of which to pay the succession duty liability, and in my view that is not justified. I am a great believer in life insurance. It is one of the best means by which professional men like myself can save money, and I carry as much as I can afford, but I do not think any form of asset of that sort should be succession duty-free. There is this privilege, that earnings of life insurance policies are exempt from taxation, and properly so. I can only repeat that I do not think a man should be permitted to set aside money to purchase a life insurance fund which will be exempt from succession duties.

Mr. MILLER: It is not set aside; you are taxed on that.

Mr. ABBOTT: You are taxed on any savings.

Mr. MILLER: It is not equivalent to setting aside $10,000 in victory bonds. You are gambling with the insurance company. You pay the insurance company so much a year and gamble that you are going to win, and they gamble that they will gain. You may pay only one premium.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is a good enough lawyer to know that the business of life insurance is not gambling but a business based on averages. If it were gambling, life insurance companies would be out of business next week. I may pay only one premium, but my neighbour may pay twenty. The whole thing is based on mortality tables. I have studied life insurance law in my time and know something about it. A life insurance policy contains a saving element, whether you pay quarterly or annual premiums. It also contains an item for the mortality risk. But it is a form of saving. If you take out an endowment policy and reach the stipulated age the amount you receive represents the amount you have paid in, plus 3·1 interest, or whatever the rate may be, for that period of years. It is just another way of building up a capital fund, and it was never anything else.

Mr. FLEMING: Would the minister enlighten the committee further as to how this will operate in connection with provincial succession duties? There are two aspects of the problem. First there are those provinces which have not a succession duty but simply share in the dominion duty. Then there are provinces which have their own succession duty laws and collect succession duties, but in whose cases the dominion permits an exemption from the dominion succession duty to the extent of one-half, whereas the provincial duty is sometimes in excess of that. The resolution does not make clear how this will work out in connection with the provinces in these two different classes. Would the minister make a statement on that?

Mr. ABBOTT: We are simply increasing the exemption limit from $5,000 to $50,000. As I said in my budget speech, the dominion, in effect, is going out of the succession duty field with respect to estates of $50,000 or less. The two provinces which still impose succession duties will continue under their laws to collect succession duties at whatever rates and with whatever exemption limits may exist in those provinces, and the dominion will collect no succession duties in those provinces, because this exemption will apply to every Canadian, no matter in whatever province he may be domiciled. In the case of the other seven provinces there will be no succession duties collected on estates of $50,000 or under.

Mr. FLEMING: The last point is, I think, of interest to the committee. Will it mean in the case of those seven provinces that the dominion, by abandoning the field of succession duties on estates of $50,000 or under, will thereby reduce to some extent the revenue of those seven provinces from succession duties?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, they are not collecting succession duties at all now.

Mr. FLEMING: They are not getting any direct benefit from succession duties out of the agreements they have signed with the dominion?

Mr. ABBOTT: They have the option of remaining in the succession duty field if they wish to do so, and the dominion in that case would give credit for the provincial duties paid up to fifty per cent. As a matter of fact, none of the seven provinces which have tax agreements with the dominion is collecting succession duties, so that the practical effect of this will be that in those provinces there will be no succession duties collected on an estate of $50,000 or less.

Mr. FLEMING: Is this clear, that those seven provinces will not lose any revenue by reason of the dominion's abandonment of the succession duty field up to $50,000?

Mr. ABBOTT: None whatever.

Mr. ADAMSON: An estate of $60,000 will pay succession duties at virtually the same rates as today?

Mr. ABBOTT: At exactly the same rates.

Mr. ADAMSON: But they will pay on the whole $60,000? This is not an exemption?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct. It is a starting point, except, of course, for the notch provision I mentioned a moment ago.

Mr. HAZEN: I would draw the attention of the minister to a matter that perhaps does not arise directly out of this resolution. It has to do with the gift tax. The rate of the succession duty tax is provided in the act we are now amending. The gift tax, I think, comes under the Income War Tax Act. There is a difference in rate between the succession duty tax and the gift tax. It seems to me that if a person wants, during his lifetime, to dispose of what he owns, he should not have to pay any higher tax on it than if he disposed of it by will, or if he died intestate and it passed in succession to his next of kin or his heirs at law.

What I should like to direct the minister's attention to is that fact. If he will examine the two acts he will find that the rates are different. It seems to me that the Dominion War Tax Act should be so amended as to conform with the Succession Duty Act so far as rates are concerned. I hope the minister will look into that. By bringing this matter to his attention, I am not suggesting that he should raise the succession duty rates, but I suggest that he bring the gift tax rate down to the succession duty level.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall have to look at that. I imagine there are some differences.

Mr. JACKMAN: Is there any restriction on the amount of gift one may make to a charity in any particular year? You have to stay within your limitation?

Mr. ABBOTT: Under the Income War Tax Act, as my hon. friend knows, there is a limitation to gifts which one can make and deduct for income tax purposes. There will be no limit under the Succession Duty Act; there never has been under the succession duty acts of the various provinces. There is now in the succession duty act of the province of Ontario or of Quebec. The result of the proposed amendment here will be to bring our act in line with the laws in the provincial jurisdictions.

Mr. JACKMAN: There is a limitation on the amount which one can give without being subject to gift tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is in the other act.

Mr. JACKMAN: Perhaps there are two things. First of all, you may give away only ten per cent of your income and get a tax deduction; but if you want to give away additional amounts so that it might exceed the statutory limitation under the gift tax provision, is there a tax on the amount that you may give to charity?

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no gift tax on a gift to charity out of capital.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I ask the minister a question with regard to the notch clause? It is not quite the same as giving a gift to the crown in excess of $50,000. Does it work as severely as that?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know whether it will work out the same way. I will not go into the details here, but the effect of what is described as the notch provision is this. Let us say that the gift is $51,500 or $52,000. You have passed the point at which the tax on the amount passing would be less than the excess over $50,000. Well, at that time the so-called notch provision ceases to apply, but up to that point all the excess over $50,000 would be taken in taxes.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is much the same as a gift to the crown of the excess.

Mr. ABBOTT: Obviously the point at which it is reached would depend on the degree of relationship. I am informed that the maximum point would be somewhere around $60,000 in the case of a stranger, and it would be very much less for someone in the direct line, a wife or children.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am referring to this expression, "the general exemption of estates not over $5,000 be extended to estates not over $50,000." I am not very familiar with succession duties—

Mr. ABBOTT: You are pretty young yet.

Mr. JACKMAN: Yes, but one has to think of them, unfortunately. The general exemption there refers to the bulk of the estate, not to the tax on the recipients.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, the general exemption refers to the figure of $5,000, which is now mentioned in section 7, subsection 4, and which was referred to by the hon. member for Calgary East.

Mr. JACKMAN: An estate of $50,000, if it goes to a stranger in blood, let us say, has a larger tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, the exemption is $50,000. That is the starting point.

Mr. JACKMAN: No matter who gets it?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The minister says that $50,000 is the starting point. Suppose the estate was $55,000. Would the succession duty apply only to the $5,000?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; I have been trying to explain that the succession duty would be on the full amount, but it would not reduce the estate of $55,000 below $50,000, if the whole estate of $55,000 were left to a complete stranger. I may just say this. If the duty were in excess of $5,000—I am told it would be about $8,000—

Mr. JOHNSTON: Not on the full $50,000.

Mr. ABBOTT: —nevertheless the amount of duty that would be payable would be only $5,000. The estate would pay $5,000 and the stranger would get $50,000. You maintain that starting point of $50,000. In the case of the estate of $55,000, in effect it is just as though the estate consisted of $50,000. We do not touch that at all for succession duty purposes.

Mr. WRIGHT: If I understood the minister aright, he said that gifts out of capital were exempt.

Mr. ABBOTT: To charity.

Mr. WRIGHT: To charitable institutions. But that there was a limit on the amount of gifts out of income.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. WRIGHT: How do you determine whether it is out of income or out of capital?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is very simple. A person cannot claim deductions from income for tax purposes in excess of ten per cent in the case of an individual. If I have an income of $15,000 I can claim up to $1,500 for charitable deductions. If I were a corporation I could claim only up to five per cent.

Mr. JACKMAN: If you were a farmer you would not know the difference.

Mr. FLEMING: Will the minister tell us what the estimated saving is to the taxpayer on resolution 2? In his budget speech, the minister gave a figure of $5,000,000 for resolution 1.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is very hard to estimate. The estimate I have been given is that this will cost the treasury about $250,000 to $300,000 a year in tax.

Resolution agreed to.

2. That the limit on exemptions for gifts to charitable organizations of 50 per cent be removed; and—

Resolution agreed to.

3. That for the purpose of the act, shares of companies incorporated in Canada shall be deemed to be situated in Canada.

Mr. TIMMINS: Will the minister explain the purpose of this resolution? Is it for the purpose of curing some law that has been decided, because we have all had the experience of having a company such as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company with head office in the province of Quebec and also having its stock registered in New York, and there has been a conflict. It has taken us some time to have the matter cleared up. Is that the purpose of this resolution?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, that is the purpose of it. All of us lawyers are pretty well acquainted with situs of shares, and how they could be effectively dealt with and so on. Under our tax treaties which we have entered into with the United Kingdom and the United States, it has been established as a rule for situs of shares for succession duties that the situs will be the country in which the corporation is incorporated. Therefore it seemed appropriate that we should incorporate that definition in our law. Of course that would have no effect so far as possible provincial succession duties are concerned, but it will make our law conform with the treaties which we have entered into with the principal countries in which there is a foreign holding of shares.

Mr. TIMMINS: Where do we find that; where does it come in—in our trade treaties?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, in these reciprocal tax agreements. We have only two at the moment which have been ratified by parliament. We have one with the United Kingdom and another with the United States. Another one is being negotiated with France, and another with New Zealand. I am sorry, it is only an income tax one which has been negotiated with New Zealand. I imagine there are not many foreign holdings in New Zealand. The two we have at the moment are with the United Kingdom and the United States. We are negotiating one with France which I hope will come before the house for confirmation at an early day.

Mr. JACKMAN: There used to be a great many companies created in Canada which were held entirely by outsiders, non-resident-owned companies and others. Does this section mean that in the case of the beneficial owner of the security in such a company as that which merely has a head office in Canada, has merely a Canadian charter, Canada will collect the succession duty and not the country where the man is domiciled? Does it go that far? It must be important for us, or important to the countries where the beneficial owners have their domicile.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct. We collect the tax at the source, and in the case of persons in the countries to which I have referred, they are given a tax credit in their own jurisdiction. It works both ways.

Mr. JACKMAN: Is this not too much of a good thing for our country? I am surprised that we were allowed to negotiate such a treaty with other countries, because surely Canada is the only country that has a great many of these charters under which people outside the country own all the shares of the company. Or is it pretty well on a reciprocal basis? How did we manage it?

Mr. ABBOTT: I would say it is not to the disadvantage of Canada. The United States have that as a general rule, apart from treaty provisions with us. We have this effectively dealt with rule, and I am familiar with it, because I had a case in which it was invoked, which went to the privy council, so that I know all the arguments pro and con. I think this is a sensible sort of rule and it is certainly not to the disadvantage of Canada.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. JACKMAN: How does it work out in respect of a Canadian who may hold shares with a Bahamas company that holds all the securities?

Mr. ABBOTT: We would tax him on all his assets, wherever he was domiciled. The only practical effect is in connection with shares of non-residents, persons not resident in Canada, who own shares in Canadian companies. Under the rule laid down, the transfer place could be established in Bermuda or the Bahamas and the shares effectively dealt with there, and Mr. Smith, who lived in Czechoslovakia, could have his shares registered on the Bermuda registry and he would not be subject to succession duty in Canada. Under the proposed amendment that will not apply. If he lives in the United Kingdom or the United States it will not have a practical effect because, while we will collect the tax at the source, he will get credit for it in the jurisdiction of his domicile.

Mr. JACKMAN: Suppose a man has shares in a company incorporated in Bermuda. That is where the situs is.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is in virtue of the legal maxim mobilia sequntur personam. It would be taxable at the domicile of the owner.

Mr. ADAMSON: I should like to bring up an income tax matter in connection with charitable organizations. As the minister knows, there are a number of arenas and war memorials of different types that are being erected across Canada today, and I have had considerable correspondence and several interviews with the department in regard to deduction from income tax for the erection of such structures. I noticed in the paper—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. There is a resolution dealing with the Income War Tax Act which has not yet been considered by the committee, and I believe the remarks of the hon. member would be more appropriate under that resolution.

Mr. ADAMSON: That is all right if I am given an opportunity there.

Mr. ABBOTT: We could discuss it there.

Mr. ADAMSON: I just want the chance to discuss it; that is all.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am not clear as to resolution 3. As I understand it, if a Canadian dies owning shares in the Standard Oil of New Jersey, those shares will be taxed in the United States jurisdiction and the Canadian gets credit for it.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: Is that due to a treaty of reciprocity between the two countries?

Mr. ABBOTT: Reciprocity helps out. If it were not for our treaty with the United States, the Canadian would be taxed there and would get no credit in Canada, because the Americans proceed on the principle that they collect succession duties on the shares of a company incorporated within the United States. Under our treaty with the United States, the United States authorities would collect succession duties at the source, on Standard Oil of New Jersey, but the heirs of the deceased would take credit for it on his tax liability in Canada, and the reverse would be the case.

Mr. JACKMAN: If the shares were owned by a Canadian but belonged to a Bermuda corporation, who collects the tax there?

Mr. ABBOTT: In that case a man might be subject to double taxation. This statute would have no bearing on that case at all. In the case of a man who lived in Ottawa and dies domiciled here, owning shares in Bermuda, or in Tanganyika or anywhere else—

Mr. HACKETT: The shares being situate here.

Mr. ABBOTT: Because he is domiciled here he cannot get away from that tax, so that what he is exposed to is double taxation. Bermuda may impose a tax; he may then have to pay a tax to Ontario, to the dominion and to Bermuda. We have no control over outside taxation jurisdictions. This proposed section does not affect in any way a person dying domiciled in Canada, because all his assets, no matter whether they are shares of Bermuda companies, or English companies, or French companies, are subject to tax in Canada.

Mr. JACKMAN: This section, then, is just to catch foreigners who hold shares of Canadian corporations. They will be taxable in Canada?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. JACKMAN: There is a reciprocal provision, working vice versa, with the United States and Great Britain?

Mr. ABBOTT: And within a short time we hope to have one with France.

Mr. MILLER: I wish to raise a point which is not pertinent to the matter we are discussing; but there is a cause of grievance in Manitoba, and it is true of all the provinces except perhaps Ontario and Quebec. I do not know what can be done about it except for the suggestion I am going to offer, which the minister may not wish to adopt. Take the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Many people in the west own Canadian Pacific shares and, when they die, we have to transfer the shares at Montreal, the registry office being there. Before we do so, we have to file succession duty papers in the province of Quebec and pay Quebec succession duties, which is not justified. The man may have lived in Manitoba all his life, never having seen Quebec, and I do not see why his heirs should pay succession duties on his estate because he has shares transferable on the books at the point of registry in Montreal. In fairness to the citizens of other provinces, the dominion should put in the Dominion Companies Act, or in the acts of companies incorporated under a dominion act, a provision to meet this situation. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company has a special act; other companies come here for incorporation, and I think it should be provided that they should establish registry offices in the other provinces so that shares can be transferred in the province in which a man dies and in which he has resided. I do not think tribute should be paid to another province from which he received no benefit and in which he had never lived.

Mr. ABBOTT: The banks do that. The suggestion is an interesting one. I sympathize with the position of those who pay double duties in that way. I have done my best for some time to eliminate that evil, but only with partial success.

Resolution agreed to.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income War Tax Act and to provide:

1. That, in addition to other deductions, a deduction from income for the 1948 taxation year of $500 be allowed to an individual who has attained the age of 65 years prior to the end of the year.

Mr. FRASER: I have received many letters as well as resolutions from different organizations and societies asking that people, especially in the low-income brackets, be given a little more relief. I have a communication from the county council of Peterborough asking that the exemption for single persons be raised from $750 to $1,500, and for married persons from $1,500 to $3,000. This year the minister has given no relief whatsoever.

Mr. NICHOLSON: You voted against it.

Mr. FRASER: I did not vote against it. I have always been in favour of giving the fellow with the small income a decent break. They have not had a break this year.

Mr. KNOWLES: That was our amendment, and you voted against it.

Mr. FRASER: I never voted against anything of the kind. The men and women who are hit hard this year are those in what might be called the white-collar class. They have not had a break at all. Their incomes have remained at the same old level, with no chance of an increase, but the income tax goes on forever. I feel, and I am sure the people across Canada feel, they should be given a break. So I hope the minister will see fit to bring in some sort of amendment to give these people some relief this year, particularly in view of the high cost of living.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have received a great many letters myself—

Mr. FRASER: I'll bet you have.

Mr. ABBOTT: —and a good many representations. Again in this regard I did my best in my budget speech to explain why this year I felt it was not desirable or in the interests of the Canadian people as a whole that we should give any further income tax exemption. I reiterate that since the high point of income tax during the war there have been three substantial income tax reductions amounting on the average to fifty-one per cent; and for reasons it is not necessary for me to repeat now I came to the conclusion, and the government came to the conclusion—

Mr. HACKETT: Fifty-one per cent of what?

Mr. ABBOTT: Reduction in tax from the beginning of 1941. That is not generally appreciated; the public memory is very short.

Mr. HACKETT: I know my income taxes have not been reduced by fifty-one per cent.

Mr. ABBOTT: But my hon. friend is in a very high bracket, and I am speaking of the average. I do not know that my taxes have been reduced that much, either, and I am not in nearly as high a bracket as my hon. friend. In any event, I indicated why I did not feel this was a year in which we should make any general reduction in income taxes. A substantial reduction was made last year, which it is true in 1947 was effective for only six months, but for the current year will be effective for the twelve months, and which on the average was a reduction of some twenty-nine per cent. That reduction was much higher in some of the lower brackets; and even up to such appreciable incomes as $15,000, $18,000 and $20,000 the reduction was as much as twenty per cent last year. But in view of the economic situation existing today, and for reasons I gave in my budget speech, I felt that this was not a year for further income tax reductions.

Mr. FRASER: The minister said the income tax had been reduced by fifty-one per cent. He must also realize that from 1939 on the income tax went up like a skyrocket; and fifty-one per cent of that very high income tax does not mean very much. Certainly it does not get us back to pre-war levels.

I should like to mention another matter at this time, which was brought to my attention the other day. I do not know whether it should come under this item, but it has to do with income tax and if I do not bring it up now I may not have another chance. This man owns a grocery store. In his return he listed the amount that should be allowed for the food of one kind and another he took out of his store for his own use. Then the inspectors came along and said, "You have taken that out at the wholesale rate. You should have taken it out at the retail rate."

Mr. ABBOTT: Quite right.

Mr. FRASER: No, it is not right. I would not doubt but that the minister himself buys at the wholesale rate in some cases.

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. FRASER: Well, other people do. If you buy in a chain store you may pay a different price from that in another store. Many people buy at wholesale, and in a store of this kind they should be allowed to charge the price they paid for the goods. Otherwise it is not fair to the man in the grocery store or meat store or whatever it may be.

Mrs. STRUM: This most peculiar kind of social security I think violates all the ordinary tax procedure we have been taught to expect from the Minister of Finance. Income tax is usually calculated on the basis of income, not on the basis of age. This sort of exemption may permit a man to drop into another category, which will let him off and save several hundred dollars, if he happens to be in the right place on the scale. But it does not put a dollar into the pockets of the people who do not have money. Therefore I think it defeats its own purpose. I am sure the minister was thinking of people in terms of social security when he adopted this method, just as he used the excise tax as a kind of rationing to discourage people from buying things which required United States dollars. I think, however, this is a departure and a contradiction in method in the approach to income tax.

Furthermore, as has been said in this house, this proceeds from the wrong end of a person's life. Today money has shrunk to a degree which scares me. When I go into a grocery store, as I do several times a week to buy simple things like milk, bread, eggs and the ordinary things people eat which are not luxuries—

An hon. MEMBER: Butter.

Mrs. STRUM: Yes, and butter—the value of money seems very small. And look at shoes. The shoes for which you used to pay $9 are now $15, and the shoes for which you paid $4 or $5 are $8 and $9. Shoes are not a luxury in this country. So this sort of thing does not benefit in any way the people who need money most. I believe the whole income tax structure is wrong, because the government has permitted the decontrol of all the things people eat and wear and use, not as luxuries but just in order to exist. If we are to permit prices to go up I believe exemptions should have gone up as well; but not at this end of a person's life, when his children are married and independent and no longer require consideration, and the grandchildren have begun to arrive. So I believe the minister should be severely criticized for this kind of social security legislation. It is to the wrong group; it is at the wrong age, and it does not do a thing for the people who need social security the most, those who are struggling with young children, those who are on old age pensions, those who are living on small annuities, who come within the income tax brackets but who are not paid at that level.

Mr. HACKETT: I do not think the minister would want a false impression to go out. He made some reference to a reduction of fifty-one per cent. I do not think he intended the public to understand that the receipts from personal income tax have been reduced by fifty-one per cent, did he?

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, no, of course not. Perhaps I did not put it in this way, but this statement has been made publicly; it was made in my budget speech last year. I said the average income tax rate on the average Canadian is down fifty-one per cent from the peak of 1942. Of course the income of the average Canadian is away up. The aggregate national income this year will be something like $15,000 million or so, I am told, as against something in the order of $6,000 million in 1939. So that, while the take as far as income tax receipts are concerned is higher, what is left in the hands of income tax payers is still greater.

Mr. JACKMAN: I think it would be interesting to learn just how the minister makes up that figure of fifty-one per cent. It would be comforting to some of us who do not feel quite that way about it to realize that the figures are arithmetically correct. As the hon. member for Stanstead said a moment ago, direct taxes on individual incomes amounted to $813 million in 1943-44; and it is estimated that for this year, with the fifty-one per cent cut, they will amount to practically $660 million. That is a reduction of about eighteen per cent. So I think we should know exactly how the fifty-one per cent, which undoubtedly is a figure arrived at somehow, has been reached. Obviously it did not take into consideration the total taxation on incomes then and now, and say there has been a reduction of fifty-one per cent, because that is not so. The reason the minister gave may be sound, that the total income of the people has gone up during that period. I think we should know exactly how the percentages were taken, so that we can understand what that figure means. Perhaps it will redound to the minister's glory, and perhaps he will be glad to put it on the record.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not care particularly whether or not it redounds to my glory. I am interested in the income tax itself, and I know my own income tax is down appreciably. I cannot tell my hon. friend how the computation was made.

Mr. JACKMAN: I did not think so.

Mr. ABBOTT: But it was made by officials of my department, and very carefully too. They took the number of taxpayers in the latest year and worked out what the same number of taxpayers, having the same incomes would have paid in 1942. The same number of taxpayers, with the same incomes would have paid fifty-one per cent less tax in 1948 that they paid in 1942. I approve the fashion in which those computations were made. It is perfectly true that in the higher brackets the reduction no doubt has not been as great as fifty-one per cent. But if my hon. friend will take his income for 1947 and relate it to his income for 1942, and figure his tax on the two rates, he will find that there will be an appreciable percentage reduction in his tax. And, incidentally, the fifty-one per cent excluded the refundable portion of the tax in 1942.

Mr. JACKMAN: And also excluded the increased cost of living.

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, that is another topic, altogether.

Mr. KNOWLES: When the minister tries to answer my hon. friends to the right, by saying that the fifty-one per cent figure is worked out as an average, I am reminded of the interesting and forceful speech made by the Minister of Justice a few days ago when he replied to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, and tore his averages all to pieces.

Mr. JACKMAN: The Minister of Justice was wrong in his computations.

Mr. KNOWLES: As the Minister of Finance knows, nothing could be more deceptive than an attempt to talk about averages.

Mr. ABBOTT: A great many taxpayers have had a 100 per cent reduction in the lower brackets. Some 500,000 taxpayers were taken right out of the income tax brackets last year.

Mr. KNOWLES: Because their incomes are so tragically low. The minister also mentioned taxpayers in the upper brackets not getting the percentage reduction in income tax that people in the lower brackets have had. That is true when you talk in percentages. But when you talk in terms of dollars and cents, those in the upper brackets have had a much greater reduction than those in the lower brackets.

I wish to support, however, the contention of those who have been arguing that these increases in exemptions afforded in resolution 1 should have been afforded right across the board, rather than to a particular age group. My colleague the hon. member for Qu'Appelle has already pointed out that this introduces a principle completely foreign to the whole theory of taxation, which is supposed to be based in some way upon ability to pay.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is in both the United States and United Kingdom income tax laws. Your labour friends ought to take it out, I suppose.

Mr. KNOWLES: That still does not necessarily make it desirable income tax legislation, or necessarily desirable in this country.

Mr. ABBOTT: I agree.

Mr. KNOWLES: I feel strongly that if the government were anxious to donate some small portion of its huge surplus to the older people of Canada, it could have done so in a much fairer way. The minister said in his budget speech that this provision would reduce the revenue of the government by about $5,000,000. In other words, in 1948 the government proposes to let Canadians of sixty-five years of age and over retain $5,000,000 that they did not have for their own use in 1947. Well, surely the logical way to donate $5,000,000 to Canadians sixty-five years of age and over is to give it to those who have the least, rather than to give it on the basis of a schedule which means that the more you have, the more you get.

I have gone to the trouble of working out a table showing how this applies under the scheme proposed by the minister. I worked it out by myself, and hence—

Mr. FLEMING: I am trying to follow the hon. member's argument. However I have been unable to follow his last remark about this proposal being based upon the theory that the more one has, the more he should get. It is based upon age.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am saying that with reference to those in the age group of sixty-five years and over the effect of the minister's proposal is that the more one has, the more he gains.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is true of any exemption. It is true of increasing the exemption to $1,500 or $2,000.

Mr. KNOWLES: This proposal adds to the insult which has already been given this further injury in the age bracket where the concern of the Canadian people is mainly over those who need help.

I am going to read this table to the committee. It is not a long one, but I have worked it out myself, and I would not for one moment ask to have it placed on the record without reading it. It shows the results of the minister's proposal. This table is in two parts, the first of which relates to single taxpayers or single persons sixty-five years of age and over, and the second part of which refers to married couples sixty-five years of age and over or where the taxpayer is that age. I have divided the table into four columns, the first of which shows the income per year; the second, the amount of tax at the old rate, or with the old exemption; the third gives the amount of tax with the new exemption, and the fourth shows the net gain. The table is as follows:

Single Persons 65 Years of Age and Over

Income per year	Amount of tax with old exemption	Amount of tax with new exemption	Net gain
$ 750 or less	Zero	Zero	Zero
850 ...	$ 10.00	Zero	$ 10.00
950 ...	22.00	Zero	22.00
1,050 ...	36.00	Zero	36.00
1,150 ...	52.00	Zero	52.00
1,250 ...	70.00	Zero	70.00
2,000 ...	220.00	120.00	100.00
6,000 ...	1,055.00	945.00	110.00
15,000 ...	4,152.50	3,940.00	212.50
20,000 ...	6,515.00	6,265.00	250.00

Married Couples 65 Years of Age and Over

Income per year	Amount of tax with old exemption	Amount of tax with new exemption	Net gain
$1,500 or less	Zero	Zero	Zero
1,600 ...	$ 10.00	Zero	$ 10.00
1,700 ...	22.00	Zero	22.00
1,800 ...	36.00	Zero	36.00
1,900 ...	52.00	Zero	52.00
2,000 ...	70.00	Zero	70.00
2,750 ...	220.00	$ 120.00	100.00
6,000 ...	890.00	770.00	110.00
15,000 ...	3,840.00	3,640.00	200.00
20,000 ...	6,140.00	5,890.00	250.00

It will be noted that in the table for single persons the term "zero" appears in the three columns following the initial amount of $750 or less. This bracket includes perhaps the largest number of Canadian people of sixty-five years of age and over. They receive no gain whatsoever, although they are the people who need it most.

It will be noted, further, that I give the computation for the amount of $6,000 with respect to both single and married persons, because this is an amount concerning which hon. members in this chamber and in another place have some knowledge.

I presume that, since I have read that table, Hansard will reproduce it in tabular form so that it will be easier to follow. It simply points out that this proposal of the minister gives nothing at all of this $5 million to single persons of the age of sixty-five years earning $750 a year or less, and it gives nothing at all to married persons of age sixty-five years earning $1,500 a year or less. But it does give these increasing amounts to those who move up into the higher brackets.

Mr. FRASER: Did the hon. member figure in the surtax?

Mr. HACKETT: It would not make much difference.

Mr. FRASER: It would be misleading unless surtax was included.

Mr. KNOWLES: It would not change the basic saving. If you took in the surtax it would change the total that is now paid and the total that will be paid, but it would not change the net gain.

Mr. FRASER: It would not change that, but it would show the payment for income tax.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is right. It would show the payment for income tax as being slightly different in columns 2 and 3, but the net gain in column 4 would be the same.

Mr. JACKMAN: Whose money was it that the minister stated he was giving to these people?

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister said that this provision will cost the federal treasury $5 million. In that sense it is $5 million which was collected from these people last year but which will not be collected from them this year. In other words, the people in these upper brackets in particular will get these gains. They are not great because, as I said, in no case will it amount to over $500, but the principle is there. These people will get these gains at the expense of the federal treasury, whereas we contend that if the federal treasury is to make this contribution of $5 million it should have been made to those in that age group who need it.

Mr. JACKMAN: Whose money was it that the state is giving to these people?

Mr. KNOWLES: It is money which, by virtue of our general income tax laws, is collected by the state for use by the state in the interests of the people as a whole. There are some other figures I should like to have, but I am afraid I shall have to ask the minister for them. He said in his budget speech that this would cost the government about $5 million. I assume that he must have had some basis for arriving at that figure.

I find that in 1941 there were 767,815 persons in Canada of the age of sixty-five years and over. That figure is probably higher now; it would be at least 800,000 and more likely 900,000. Of the 800,000 or 900,000 persons who are sixty-five years of age and over, 275,000 are in receipt of old age pensions. They would all be down in the lower brackets and would not get any of this benefit at all.

I should like to know from the minister how many of the 800,000 or 900,000 Canadians who are sixty-five years of age and over are taxpayers; how many of those who are taxpayers are down in the lower brackets, say $1,000 or less for single and $2,000 or less for married, and how many are in the upper brackets. In other words, can he tell us how this $5,000,000 is being distributed.

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot break it down quite as far as my hon. friend would like, but the best estimate that the income tax statisticians were able to give me was that this proposed exemption would be of benefit to between 80,000 and 100,000 Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. JACKMAN: I think I should say to the committee that I can assure them that there are no members of the C.C.F. over sixty-five years of age who are single and who receive more than $1,250 or who are married and over sixty-five years of age and members of the C.C.F. who receive over $2,000.

Mrs. STRUM: How do you know?

Mr. JACKMAN: Or you would not be talking that way.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Could the minister explain the machinery that will be used to determine the age of persons applying for this benefit Most hon. members know the difficulties old age pensioners have in getting birth certificates and proof of age. What will be the requirements? Will a person who attains the age of sixty-five years during the tax year be entitled to the benefit for the full year?

Mr. ABBOTT: He will require the usual proof of age. The taxpayer who now claims exemptions for taxable children must state their ages and they are subject to proof. I presume that in most cases the department will take the taxpayer's statement, but no doubt there will be the usual spot check to see whether they are correct and the taxpayer will have to prove his age if it is questioned. Whether a person is sixty-five years of age or over is a question of fact; the taxpayer is entitled to the exemption only if he is in fact sixty-five years of age or over. If the income tax inspectors are in doubt as to his bona fides when he claims that he is sixty-five years or over he will have to prove what age he is.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Before a person gets an old age pension, a birth certificate or some proof of age must be supplied. Will everyone have to submit proof of age before he can claim this benefit?

Mr. HACKETT: That should be on the record already.

Mr. ABBOTT: I could not answer that offhand. I imagine the administration will work it out in a sensible sort of way. I doubt if they will ask every income taxpayer to send in a birth certificate.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I do not recall any form that I have ever signed in connection with income tax that contained my age. I am sure that some women taxpayers, particularly those in the thirties, would object very much to giving their ages.

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot say just how it will be administered. It will be recalled that during the war people over sixty-five years of age were exempt from paying the refundable portion of the tax and the income tax people apparently were able to administer that without serious difficulty.

Mr. HACKETT: Do not the ages of most people already appear on the returns because they would be given when deductions were claimed for them as children?

[Mr. Jackman.]

Mr. ABBOTT: If an individual was a child at the appropriate time after 1917 that would apply, but some of us were pretty close to being twenty-one years of age at that time and so that record might not exist.

Mr. MILLER: I did not speak on the budget and there are two or three items I should like to bring up. I have not any particular objection to this exemption of $500 for people of sixty-five years and over, but I think it should apply to other classes of people such as have been referred to this evening. When the average man gets to be sixty-five years of age his family generally has reached the stage where they are no longer his responsibility, but the middle-aged man of forty or in the late forties usually has a family at a most expensive stage. It is practically his last chance to make provision for his old age. I feel that the exemptions allowed to them are not nearly adequate; in fact they are not adequate for people of any age. I take strong objection to the fact that the exemptions were not raised this year.

It is not hard for the minister to say that the government have to have the money. If you have to get money from Canadians who are struggling for the bare necessities of life and are getting no more than $2,000 a year, then Canada is not as great as I have always thought it was. There must be some other way. Tax collections have increased largely in the last twelve months. Wages have increased, but that means little because the cost of living has also gone up, and the increased wage hardly offsets the increased cost of living. Then, lo and behold, when next April comes around, or before that if you are working for wages, you have to pay increased income tax on your increased wages, which means that the little bit of extra money the wage earner got to help meet the increased cost of living went in income tax. This question of greater income tax exemptions cannot be dismissed lightly, because the income tax takes the cream off what men and women are earning, and they have no more chance, particularly those of middle age, of saving money for their old age than they have of flying to the moon. Apparently the only way in which a person can make money and keep it nowadays is to buy something on capital account, like a farm; one day you may wake up and find it is worth $10 an acre more than you paid for it, and that capital gain is not taxed by the Minister of Finance.

The minister in his budget speech made a plea for budgeting for a surplus for a rainy day. If it is sound policy for the country to budget for a surplus, which I am not prepared to dispute tonight, it is equally sound policy for the minister to permit the ordinary common individual in this country to budget for a personal surplus. The minister says he dare not do that because, if he let the people have any money over and above what he takes from them, they would waste it, spend it in such a way as to put more pressure on scarce articles. I say to the minister, and he knows it just as well as I, there should be greater income tax exemptions for the people for whom I am pleading, because they are not the class of people who, if given increased exemption, will be buying goods in the luxury class, or scarce goods, or spending their money in such a way as to contribute to inflation. No, that type of person today is scraping night and day trying to get enough money, not to put pressure on scarce commodities, not to increase inflation, but to get enough to eat and wear for his wife and children and himself. If the minister answers that increased exemptions for this class must result in modifications for those in the higher income tax brackets, that is his worry. I maintain that the man who does not get more than $2,000 a year should not pay a nickel of income tax.

So far as those sixty-five years of age are concerned, I do not object particularly to the exemption that is being provided for them, but I say a substantial proportion of them are in no more need of additional exemption than the young people who are coming along with young families and are faced with high rentals and the high cost of living today. Many of these young people are worried to death to know how to make ends meet, and it is like tossing a wet rag in their face to suggest that if they get $2,000 income tax free they would waste it or contribute to inflation. It would mean an additional few dollars in their pockets to help them in the purchase of the necessities of life, food, clothing and shelter and, in spite of the determined stand which the minister has taken, I think he should consult with his colleagues and work out some system whereby men and women in this country, particularly those in the low-income brackets, will be granted an additional exemption. I know what I have said is not being said for the first time, but I have always taken this position, and no doubt the minister has heard it until he is sick.

Mr. ABBOTT: Year after year.

Mr. MILLER: But I believe it is of sufficient importance that, until the minister acts upon it, we should continue to drum it into his ears. So far as I am concerned, I owe it as a duty not only to myself as a member of the house but to the people I represent, and before whom I have time and again advocated the principle of increased income tax exemtpions, to bring this matter to the attention of the minister and the committee, because I believe it is an urgent necessity in the economic life of our country today, particularly in western Canada, which I know best. I am making this plea tonight with the minister, because I believe it is my duty to do so and to place my views on record.

The CHAIRMAN: Before we proceed, may I draw the attention of members to the fact that we are considering clause 1 of this resolution, which deals with an additional exemption of $500 to those who have attained the age of sixty-five years. This clause does not permit a general discussion of income tax or of exemptions generally. That was permissible in the budget debate, but I do not think it is permissible now.

Mrs. STRUM: I should like to give the minister some advice on how to draw his budget next year to give the greatest assistance to people of sixty-five years of age, whom I think he sincerely desires to help. I think the minister had in mind that when you are sixty-five, old age seldom comes alone, but people of that age are often ill and need surgery or special treatment for the ailments that come with advancing years. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre so clearly illustrated in his table, the great majority of the people who are sixty-five years of age and over have no security, either for medical benefits or for earnings or for meeting living costs.

I would suggest to the minister that next year he make provision in his budget for universal health insurance for all the Canadian people, and then we shall know that these people do have health security. I would also urge that he bring in at sixty-five years of age universal superannuation, so that we shall put a floor under income as New Zealand has done, and that he use the ordinary tax structure which applies to everyone to recover excess income. We already do this with the family allowance. Regardless of the income of the members of this house, the family allowance is paid out to everyone and any excess income is recovered through the ordinary tax procedure. If we did that, we would know that the people who had the greatest need, those of sixty-five years of age, would be covered in their medical needs, in their food needs, and in their housing needs, that they had shoes and clothing, and that the ordinary decencies and comforts of life were not beyond the reach of the pioneers who, in their earlier years, had helped to build up this great nation.

We know that the national income is up; we know that in terms of the value of the gross national product it is sometimes misleading, but when you look at it on a unit basis it is still pretty good. There is no one in this house who has not tremendous faith in Canada as a great and growing nation. If we use this other approach, and put a floor under income to take care of the medical needs of this group who need it far worse than the younger people, and see that we would not have poverty, privation and despair in the hearts of people sixty-five years of age and over, and then use the ordinary income tax mechanism to recover excess income, we would have gone a long way toward establishing a tax structure of which we could be proud.

Mr. FLEMING: One observation made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre deserves some comment. In his attack on this budget proposal, he did not content himself simply with his argument that it was unfair to apply this to persons of the age of sixty-five years and over. He went on to attack the idea of the increase in exemption, because the people who were going to draw most benefit from such an increase in exemption would be those who had more income than those just over the present exemption.

In attacking the proposal on that basis, he has attacked the whole idea of increases in exemption at their very foundation.

Mr. KNOWLES: Not at all; I asked for it for all ages—right across the board.

Mr. FLEMING: The whole point of the table put on the record by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was that the people who had a somewhat higher income derived very much more benefit from the increase in exemption than those who had just a very little over the amount of exemption. That argument, if it is sound, applies to every increase in exemption, regardless of amount, regardless of the nature of it, and regardless of the people who receive it. What the hon. member has just succeeded in doing is levelling an attack, as far as his conception of logic would carry him, against the very idea espoused by his party in its amendment to the main budget resolution. You will recall, Mr. Chairman, that in the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar on May 21, which will be found at page 4255 of Hansard, the budget was attacked, and properly attacked, on this among other bases, first, that the minister had failed to increase the amount of exemption for income tax purposes from the present level to $1,250 for single persons and $2,500 for married persons.

An hon. MEMBER: Did you vote for it?

Mr. FLEMING: I certainly said that I advocated increased exemptions.

Mr. KNOWLES: I voted for it; you voted against it.

Mr. FLEMING: The hon. member says that he voted for it; but tonight he has made a direct attack on the idea of increased exemptions which certain members of this house have proposed for a long time.

It is too much to expect consistency from hon. members of the C.C.F. party. Perhaps it is too much to expect them to see the same problem on June 1 in the same light as that in which they appeared to see it on May 21. The fact remains that if there is soundness in the argument that the exemption should be increased—I for one say there is—then undoubtedly an increase in exemption will have the very effect that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre deplored in his remarks tonight.

My quarrel with the present resolution is not on that basis at all. I say certainly the exemption should be increased for those who will be benefited by the increase here proposed. My quarrel with the proposal is that it does not go far enough and include others. It would be a vastly improved budget proposal if the minister would change the word "sixty-five" in the last line to "fifteen." If he did that he would greatly help those who badly need assistance in the way of increased exemption at the present time, the people referred to by my colleague, the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, the married people, the people with families, the people on whom the brunt of the cost of living is being cast so heavily at the present time. They badly need increased exemptions.

In his resolution the minister has not done anything wrong. The only trouble is that he has stopped so far short of a desirable objective. There can be no quarrel with this resolution as far as it goes. The quarrel that the committee would like to have with it, if it were free to speak its mind in all quarters, is that it does not go nearly far enough.

Mr. HERRIDGE: In order to abide by your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest a method by which the minister might avoid in future giving a special exemption to people over sixty-five; that would be by giving a satisfactory exemption to people in the lower income groups at a lower age now. I support the proposals put forward by other hon. members in that respect. I am not one to rise in my place and demand social services, and things of that type, and at the same time suggest that we can get those services without paying for them. I know we have to be taxed, and that we have to pay for social services in this country. But I suggest that we have to put our taxation on a more equitable basis if it is to be fair at this time to all concerned.

Just briefly, Mr. Chairman, take business in this country at this time. Its profits were never higher. Professional men in this country are doing very well, but most of the working people are just making a living. When it comes to business, it is allowed to charge costs and depreciation. Anybody who knows anything about manufacturing establishments knows there is a great amount of capital investment put into business. That is charged up to maintenance and costs. Professional men have their costs and certain allowances. The principle we work upon is that business is allowed its costs before its profits are shown; and then depreciation and all that goes with it; but when it comes to the human machine, we do not even allow the worker enough exemption to pay for the costs of running the human machine or reproducing the human machine. I suggest that our system of taxation would be much more equitable, particularly at this time, if the government commenced to raise the exemptions so that at least the working people of this country would get an exemption large enough to pay for the cost of running the human machine and maintaining it properly.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I do not want to keep the committee long on this matter, but I do want to say a word about it. I want it to be clearly understood that I am not objecting to the resolution as it stands in so far as it relates to the age limit of sixty-five years and allowing those in that particular class to have a further $500 tax exemption, but I cannot quite see the logic of the minister's remarks. It seems to me that a married man who is earning a maximum of only $1,500 and who has a family to keep, young children to send to school, to clothe, to feed and to shelter, is just as deserving of an increase in his tax exemption as a person sixty-five years of age or over. I would think it would be much more commendable if the minister had seen fit, provided that he did not have the revenue, to continue the tax on horse-racing and betting, in other words, gambling, or night-club entertainment. I think it would have been much more preferable to retain the gambling tax and the night-club tax. If he had done that, perhaps he would have had sufficient revenue to increase the exemption, not only of those of sixty-five years but also of all people, raising the tax exemption to $2,000. I think the minister's conscience must bother him a little bit in that regard. I would suggest to him that he sleep on this tonight, and if he can come back here tomorrow and tell us that he has not had any bad dreams I will support him, but I am sure he will not be able to do that. If he sleeps on this tonight I think he will soften up a little bit and give an increased tax exemption to all married people up to $2,000, and to single people as well.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, I think the strongest argument for the picayunish nature of this concession was given by the minister himself when he indicated in reply to my question that it would benefit to a greater or lesser extent only some 80,000 to 100,000 persons. As has already been pointed out, there are 800,000 or 900,000, perhaps 1,000,000 Canadians sixty-five years of age and over. In other words, this benefit will go to only one in ten Canadians of sixty-five years of age and over, and it goes to the one in the ten needing it the least, not to the nine who need it, as has already been made clear from the table I have given to the committee.

The second thing I wish to say is this. I do not think the minister took as seriously as he might the question asked by my deskmate, the hon. member for Mackenzie with reference to proof of age; or perhaps I should say I hope that, after he has had some experience in this and has found that one can be sensible and reasonable about it, he will pass on the benefit of his experience to his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

There are under this provision people who will benefit this year to the extent of $100 and $250 in some cases, and $250 is more than the old age pension was when it was first put on the statute books; yet, in order to get that original pension of $240, or the present $360, the applicant has to give definite proof of age.

Mr. ABBOTT: Why does my hon. friend not raise this question on the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare?

Mr. KNOWLES: Because I am talking about the minister's treatment of the question asked by my colleague. The minister seemed to think there was nothing in it. I submit that if such stringent regulations are made for those who secure a benefit of $240 or $360 in another department, so far as proof of age is concerned, then the minister should either make the regulations the same as his colleague's or get his colleague to follow suit to him.

The other thing I want to do is to make a brief comment on the interesting remarks made by the hon. member for Eglinton. Apparently the hon. gentleman let the cat out of the bag as to why he and his hon. friends argue so much for increased tax exemptions. Apparently they are aware all the time that if you simply raise the exemption level, without making any other change, the greatest benefit goes to those in the upper brackets. Apparently that is what they wanted all the time. My hon. friend the member for Eglinton did not vote for it when he had a chance a few days ago.

Mr. HARKNESS: It was covered with a lot of socialistic nonsense.

Mr. KNOWLES: That same socialism seems to have fared pretty well in Yale yesterday.

Mr. JACKMAN: We have heard that several times.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member for Eglinton tried to make out that there was something inconsistent between my voting for our amendment which asked for an increase in the exemption level, something inconsistent between my supporting my leader in that request, and the table I put on the record tonight. Apparently he did not listen to the speech made by my leader, or he has not read it, because on page 4252 of Hansard my leader made it clear that, along with raising the exemption levels, he felt and we felt that the rates of taxation on corporations, and on personal incomes at the higher levels, should be retained at their present figures. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar made it clear—

Mr. FLEMING: He said he would keep the present rates.

Mr. KNOWLES: He would maintain the present rates in the various upper brackets so as to make it possible—that is the only way in which it can be done—

Mr. FLEMING: You cannot have it both ways.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is the answer to my hon. friend. You cannot use the money that he would use to save income taxes in the upper brackets and use the same money for the benefits he advocates for those in the lower brackets. My leader made it clear that, in order to provide exemption in the lower brackets, which we were asking for, it would be necessary to retain the rates in the upper levels, bracket by bracket, and that is the point the present Minister of Finance and other ministers of finance have made from time to time, that you have to consider the effect of raising the exemption level on the upper brackets, as well as on those you take out of taxation altogether. My leader made it clear that we want the rates retained in the upper levels, to make it possible to give a worthwhile benefit to those in the lower levels. Perhaps that is why my hon. friends did not see fit to support our amendment.

Mr. FAIR: Many of us did not take advantage of the main budget debate to say some of the things we wanted to say; and lest anybody, particularly the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue, should feel that I am satisfied with the income tax exemption, I wish to make it plain that I am not satisfied. I am satisfied of course, to some extent, with the increase for those over sixty-five years of age. But, like the hon. member for Bow River, I feel that the exemption should be increased materially. By that method we shall increase the production of the country to a great extent and reap benefits that will far exceed those which are being reaped today under the excessive income tax levels and under present exemptions. I see that you wish to call it eleven o'clock, Mr. Chairman. When this discussion comes up again I shall have more to say.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps we can pass this section.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall resolution 1 carry?

Resolution agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. ADAMSON: I have remarks to make on this general clause.

The CHAIRMAN: Clause 2 stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Tomorrow we shall continue the consideration of the budget resolutions, and take up the second reading of Bill No. 228, to amend the Excise Act, Bill No. 229, to amend the Customs Act, second reading of Bill No. 327, to amend the Canada Evidence Act, and second reading of Bill No. 329, to amend the Judges Act. If we conclude these items we shall go into supply, agriculture.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at three o'clock.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Fifth and sixth reports of the standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Rinfret.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

PERMITS FOR EXPORT OF BARLEY

Mr. WINKLER:

1. By years since 1940, how much barley was exported to the United States, and for what portion were export permits granted?

2. By years (or months or any convenient period therein) how much per bushel was charged for these permits?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Exports of barley to the United States:

Calendar Year	Bushels
1941	2,608,273
1942	7,390,389
1943	44,631,379

1947	120,074
January to April, 1948	194,923

On August 25, 1941, barley came under export control and a permit was required for all exports.

2. A fee of $2 was charged for all export permits, regardless of commodity, until May, 1946, when the practice was discontinued and permits were granted free. An equalization fee, however, was placed on barley in 1943, and the following table indicates the amount of equalization payment which was recovered on exports of barley.

*UNSURVEYED MINERAL CLAIMS IN YUKON TERRITORY

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

What are the names of the companies and individuals who the Acting Minister of Mines and Resources states have already made substantial investments in mining in the Yukon and are interested in its development in the future and who are unable to ascertain the limits of the properties that can be secured either by purchase or staking referred to in the notices sent to the owners of unsurveyed mineral claims in Yukon by the mining recorders of Yukon on instructions of the Minister of Mines and Resources?

Mr. MacKINNON: Mr. Speaker, may I answer this question orally? It is not customary, nor, except under most unusual circumstances, is it appropriate, to make public reference by name to persons who communicate with departmental officials on matters of private concern. To violate this procedure might result in the disclosure of the personal and business interests of individuals or companies in a way that would be unnecessarily detrimental without serving any valid public purpose. In the present instance it is felt that the publication of the names of the persons and companies involved would not result in any public benefit, but would be an unwarranted disclosure of documents which it would not be appropriate, nor in accord with official policy, to publish.

The question of substance involved in this matter has been fully answered in earlier replies to questions asked by the hon. member for Yukon.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Perhaps I might speak, on a question of privilege. The minister says that to answer the question would not be in the public interest. It would be more appropriate to say that it would not be in the interests of some private institutions, and the minister knows it.

UNITED STATES BASES ON BRITISH TERRITORY

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Have there been any negotiations with the governments of Britain or the United States, with reference to the bases which the latter country was granted for a 99 years lease by Britain during the battle of the Atlantic, with a view to having this lease cancelled and charged to lease-lend, as is proposed?

2. What action is being taken in the matter, or are any conferences being held in relation to the same?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. The Canadian government has not taken part in any negotiations on this subject and is not aware of any negotiations.

2. The Canadian government is not taking any action in this matter and is not aware that any conferences are being held in relation to it.

INDIANS—TUBERCULOSIS

Mr. McIVOR:

1. What is the number of Indians under treatment for tuberculosis in each province?

2. How does this compare with the number under treatment ten years ago?

3. Is the present level of treatment considered adequate?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. As at December 31, 1947:

Yukon	15
Northwest Territories	76
British Columbia	441
Alberta	269
Saskatchewan	97
Manitoba	298
Ontario	243
Quebec	74
New Brunswick	5
Nova Scotia	22
Prince Edward Island	4
	1,544

2. In 1938 there were less than 200 Indians under treatment for tuberculosis.

3. No. There are approximately 900 deaths per annum from tuberculosis among Indians. It is considered by competent authorities that for a fully adequate program there should be three patients under treatment for each death per annum; in other words that an efficient survey program would find about 2,700 cases requiring treatment.

HOUSING—NATIONAL DEFENCE—DUNDURN AND CHURCHILL

Mr. KNIGHT:

1. How many houses under the national defence housing program (a) have been completed; (b) are now under construction; (c) are not yet commenced but are planned for 1948 (i) at Dundurn, Saskatchewan; (ii) at Churchill, Manitoba?

2. Of these houses at these points how many have been built, or are to be built (a) directly by national defence forces; (b) under contract?

Mr. CLAXTON:

1. (a) (i) None.
(ii) None.
(b) (i) 4 Permanent married quarters.
(ii) 12 Permanent married quarters.
(c) (i) None.
(ii) 32 Permanent married quarters.

2. (a) 48 by civilian and military day labour under military supervision.

In the case of Churchill, electrical installations inside and outside, plumbing and heating, asphalt tile flooring, siding (asphalt shingles), roofing, and all outside utilities, (water etc.), will be carried out by contract arranged through the Canadian Commercial Corporation, Ottawa.

(b) Nil.

RADIO BROADCASTING—TELEVISION

Mr. ISNOR:

If and when television is established and operated in Canada, will it come under the supervision of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or the national film board?

Mr. WINTERS: The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, under the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936.

USE OF FLUORINE IN DRINKING WATER

Mr. WARREN:

Is anything being done in Canada to discover whether the addition of fluorine to public drinking water supplies will reduce tooth decay?

Mr. MARTIN: The dental health division of the Department of National Health and Welfare is co-operating with the city of Brantford and with the national research council to discover the effects of adding fluorine to the water supply at that city. A survey team is now at work. The teeth of the children of Brantford will be compared with those of two other Canadian cities (Sarnia and Stratford). This will require dental examination of about 5,000 children during 1948. It is expected that the examination will be repeated every two years for eight years.

2. What was the number of certificates to individuals in group plans issued by the government annuities branch from April 1 to April 19, 1947? How many were issued from April 19 to April 30, 1947? How many were issued during May, 1947?

6. What was the total number of government annuity group plans (a) governmental bodies, and (b) non-governmental bodies, in effect as at the latest date for which (a) provisional, and (b) final figures are available?

CANADIAN EMBASSIES AND OTHER AGENCIES

Mr. CHURCH:

What embassies or consulates or immigration or trade and commerce agencies, have been created by Canada and in what countries (a) in 1947; (b) in 1948, and has a vote for the same been sanctioned by parliament?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

RAPESEED AND RAPESEED OIL

Mr. WRIGHT:

For a copy of all telegrams, letters or memoranda exchanged and agreements or contracts entered into between the government, any department or agency of the government and Prairie Vegetable Oils Limited of Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, or any official thereof with respect to the processing, extraction, storage or sale of rapeseed and rapeseed oil.

IMMIGRATION

AMOUNT OF CASH ALLOWED TO PERSONS ENTERING CANADA FROM BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources): A few days ago the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) asked the following question:

Would the Acting Minister of Mines and Resources make a statement today or early next week with respect to aid granted to immigration to Canada by allowing those coming from Britain to secure more cash, and what action if any is being or has been taken in the matter?

The Canadian government through the office of the High Commissioner for Canada in London, has been in consultation with the government of the United Kingdom in connection with this matter. We would be glad to see the present heavy restrictions on export of currency outside of the sterling area lifted in favour of immigrants coming to establish themselves permanently in Canada. However, we understand the difficulties with which the United Kingdom is faced and for the time being the restrictions announced by the chancellor of the exchequer are still in force. Immigrants from the United Kingdom are allowed £1,000 payable in four equal annual instalments. This, of course, is a matter in which the government of the United Kingdom and not the government of Canada has the final responsibility.

[Later:]

Mr. DOUGLAS G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to ask a supplementary question arising out of the statement just made by the Acting Minister of Mines and Resources. I notice from the newspapers that some arrangements have been made in connection with the interest-free loan of $700 million which was made to Great Britain. Could the minister comment on that? Probably some arrangements are being made in order to give immigrants from Great Britain cash when they get here.

Mr. MacKINNON: I am not in position to make any comment on the situation, nor do I think it would be proper for me to attempt to do so.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Perhaps the Minister of Finance could let us know.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I am afraid I was not following my hon. friend very closely, because I understood he was addressing his question to my colleague.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I will ask the question again. I understand that some arrangements have been made in connection with immigration into Canada and the starting of new businesses under the interest-free loan of $700 million which was made some time ago. I should like to know what arrangements have been made.

Mr. ABBOTT: I know nothing of any such arrangement. Of course that would be a matter entirely within the competence of the British treasury and not under our jurisdiction.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I understand from the press that that is so. I understand that we would not insist on any further repayment of that interest-free loan in the meantime.

Mr. ABBOTT: The report is completely without foundation.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is in the papers.

WELLAND SHIP CANAL

QUESTION AS TO TRAFFIC REGULATIONS AFFECTING TOURISTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) which arises out of numerous protests that have been received from my own part of the country. I notice the minister is not in the house. I sent him notice of my question with regard to this important matter, and I was hoping that I might get some information at once. My question is this: When will the traffic regulations be lifted in connection with tourists visiting the Welland ship canal? Grave complaints are being made in this regard.

(Translation):

COMMUNISM

COMMUNIST SUPPORT FOR LIBERALS IN THE QUEBEC PROVINCIAL ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. ROSS THATCHER (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand). Would the minister tell me whether his attention has been drawn to a report which appeared this morning in the Montreal Gazette, to the effect that communists intend to support the Liberals in the coming Quebec election? Will the Liberal party accept such support?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having asked his question in my mother tongue. The Liberal party accepts no responsibility as regards communists.

Mr. THATCHER: Neither does the C.C.F. party.

Mr. BERTRAND: The Liberal party is only too happy to know with whom those people mix at the present time.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

REFERENCE TO PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION IN CHARLOTTETOWN

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): On Thursday last I directed a question to the Minister of Public Works, to be found on page 4445 of Hansard. I should like to know whether he can give me an answer today.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): I looked up the question, which concerns the choosing of a site for a public building at Charlottetown. The answer is that a decision has not yet been made. A second question was as to when the work would start. I cannot say that now.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

2. That, for the 1948 taxation year, interest be allowed at the rate of 2 per cent per annum on overpayments of tax to the extent of $5,000 and ½ per cent per annum on overpayments in excess of $5,000 (no interest less than $1 to be payable); and that the rates payable on overdue taxes be increased from 4 per cent and 7 per cent to 6 per cent and 8 per cent, respectively.

Mr. FLEMING: The first part of this resolution has to do with the rate of interest to be allowed on over-payments, while the second part has to do with the increase in the interest rate payable to the government on overdue taxes. Until several years ago this rate was eight per cent, but it was reduced at that time; it is now proposed to eliminate that reduction and to go back to the higher rates of interest that previously prevailed.

If the overdue taxes were attributable in all cases to default on the part of the taxpayers I do not suppose any of us would waste any great amount of sympathy on the taxpayer in arrears. But the difficulty in so many of these cases is that the overdue tax is attributable directly to the fact that that taxpayer does not know that he has not paid the full tax because he has not received his assessment.

I drew the attention of the house, in speaking to this matter on May 24, to the fact that a return brought down to the house by the Minister of National Revenue two or three months ago showed that the number of income tax returns on which assessments had not been made as of December 31, 1947, was 2,336,879, and to give the house some idea of the length of time that some of these returns had been awaiting assessment I gave this further information. For 1913 and prior years —that is to say, some of these returns have been awaiting assessment for at least four years and some of them longer—the total number awaiting assessment was in round figures 44,000. For the year 1944, the number of returns awaiting assessment was 110,000; for 1945, 265,000 and for 1946, 1,905,000.

What happens in altogether too many of these cases is this. The taxpayer makes his return. He thinks he has made a complete return and that his tax has been paid in full. But through some departmental ruling or some difficult question of interpretation of which he was entirely innocent at the time of making his return an assessment goes out three or four years after he has made his return showing that a substantial additional tax is payable by him, and interest is imposed, not from the date of the assessment but from the date on which the tax was originally payable. If the minister would make this increased rate operative only from the date of assessment, I do not think anyone would take serious objection to it, but these heavy rates of interest are most unfair when the taxpayer has waited a long time for his return to be assessed. If we ever get to the point, as I hope we shall, where the accumulation of returns to be assessed is caught up with by those engaged in their assessment and there are no long periods of waiting, this question may not be so important; but when there is a large accumulation of returns to be assessed this is not the time to increase imposts on the tax payer by collecting additional interest charges.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): My hon. friend's presentation, of course, has a superficial air of complete equity and reasonableness, but if the return has not been assessed, no interest penalty runs beyond twenty months after the date of filing the return. We have found by experience that a great many taxpayers are deliberately underpaying their tax. They compute their tax correctly but do not make full payment of the tax at the time they file their income tax return. They know they can borrow money from the government at four per cent, and they know that, because of staff difficulties, and so forth, it may not be possible to assess their return for a year or eighteen months, and they figure it is a pretty cheap way to borrow money—at rates much less than those at which they could borrow money at any commercial bank. The interest charge of six per cent is frankly in the nature of a penalty; it is intended to induce the taxpayer to pay the full amount of his tax promptly. There may be cases, of course, in which the taxpayer honestly underestimates the amount of tax due, but after all, he has the use of the money for twenty months, so this six per cent interest charge is not too excessive a rate. A great many people cannot borrow from their own bank at much less than six per cent. I do not think there will be any serious hardship in charging six per cent for twenty months. The penalty rate only applies thirty days after the date of the mailing of the assessment. We know from experience, unfortunately, that there is a great deal of underpayment of tax presumably because it is a cheap way to borrow money from the government.

Mr. CHURCH: No public utility charges a rate like this.

Mr. FLEMING: No one has sympathy with the taxpayer who deliberately underpays his tax. I suppose it is impossible for the departmental officials to make inquiry as to the particular state of innocency of the taxpayer at the time of making his return. But surely twenty months at six per cent is too high. Will the minister, if he is going to press for this increased rate, not consider reducing the period of twenty months, which I regard as too long? If we are to accept as a government responsibility the duty of assessing all returns, I submit to the committee that twenty months is too long a period on which to charge this high rate of interest.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will give consideration to that. I have inquired of the chief assessor, and he tells me that the number of cases of innocent under-estimation of tax is very limited.

Mr. CHURCH: In the first place the budget was brought down very late in 1948. Secondly, many industrial workers have had their tax deducted from their pay envelopes. I do suggest that in view of the high cost of living, high rents and everything else, this rate is very high, and if a person has not the money to pay the penalty, a heavy debt is placed upon him.

Mr. ABBOTT: This proposed amendment relates only to the 1948 tax liability for which the individual returns will be made on April 30 of next year.

Mr. HAZEN: I am inclined to question the statement that the number of persons who innocently underpay their tax is limited. From my own personal experience, every year when I prepare my form and file my income tax I find I am unable to estimate it correctly, and it is not a very complicated form. To get the thing straightened out I always have to go down to the Department of National Revenue, see one of the officials in the city in which I live, and have him check it over. In most cases I find that my figures are wrong; that I have made a wrong assessment, probably an under-assessment, although it may be an over-assessment. Certainly it is not a correct assessment. Although the average Canadian does not not like to pay taxes, he does not want to get out of paying it, and he is prepared to pay it if he knows what the correct amount is. When he files his return he can make out a cheque and pay the tax. It is not right that he should have to wait sometimes four years, as has been pointed out here. As of December 31, 1947, some 2,336,000 people had not been assessed. The explanation of the minister is not good enough, and I am going to move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) that the resolution be amended by deleting therefrom all the words after: "no interest less than $1 to be payable." That would leave the interest rates as they were.

Mr. ABBOTT: I understand my hon. friend's amendment. He is suggesting that we allow the provision to remain in the Income War Tax Act under which anyone who chooses to do so may not pay his tax, and thus permit people to borrow money from the government at four per cent per annum until such time as the income tax department are able to assess his return. That is the effect of the amendment. I am leaving aside the question whether the amendment is in order or not. I will discuss that in a minute.

The effect of the amendment is this. What the hon. member is saying is that anybody in this country can file his income tax return, pay five per cent of the tax and pay only four per cent interest on that return until the assessors are able to reach it. I do not think that is in the public interest. I do not think a four per cent rate on unpaid taxes is sufficient. Perhaps the six per cent rate is somewhat higher than the commercial rate, but I do not think it is an excessive rate. I think it is a rate which should be put in the act in order to constitute a real deterrent to the sort of thing that is mentioned. It is perfectly true, as my hon. friend has said, that it is difficult for people accurately to estimate the tax, particularly if they have a complicated type of income, including a lot of dividends and income from other sources, and so on. I readily concede that it is difficult, particularly as applied to types of income where one is allowed to take certain deductions for depletion and so forth. But the information I get from departmental officials is that the amount of under-estimating is far greater than can be accounted for by innocent under-estimating. The cases of genuine under-estimating are of relatively small amounts, and the amount of interest which is involved is not a significant factor. By this amendment we are trying to get at the taxpayer who deliberately refrains from paying the full amount of the tax which he knows is due, realizing—

Mr. SKEY: Perhaps he cannot pay.

Mr. ABBOTT: Whether he can pay or not—realizing that it will be physically impossible for the income tax department to catch up to him for a year or eighteen months. That is the sort of practice that I do not think should be encouraged, and that is why we are putting the six per cent rate in here instead of four per cent.

Mr. HACKETT: Should the minister not provide for the case that he has referred to? I agree that a person who has intentionally withheld amounts from the department might be treated as a person who is attempting to escape his duty; but the minister has not told us what proportion of the taxpayers fall into this group. I ask him to remember that the taxes are extremely high at the present time, and even if a person were to leave a balance owing, the penalty of six per cent is a very heavy one, because the current borrowing rate from the banks today, with reasonable security, is three per cent.

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, no.

Mr. HACKETT: Oh, yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, no; I am a borrower, and I know.

Mr. HACKETT: I will tell the minister that with a security—

Mr. ABBOTT: Of victory bonds.

Mr. HACKETT:—of victory bonds—

Mr. ISNOR: Three and a half per cent.

Mr. HACKETT; No; you can borrow at three per cent, and a great many persons, especially those who owe any considerable sum of money to the government, have victory bonds upon which they—

Mr. ABBOTT: Then they should go and borrow at the bank and pay their taxes.

Mr. HACKETT: Yes; that is the assumption the minister is making, and I challenge it. He is imposing a hardship upon the total body of taxpayers because there is an occasional one who is unfair.

Mr. ABBOTT: Let me assure my hon. friend that it is not an occasional one.

Mr. KNOWLES: Can the minister give us some figures to prove it?

Mr. HACKETT: I cannot, of course, peer into the minister's record, but he has not given the committee any information which entitles it to believe that the mass of taxpayers are tax dodgers, and nothing else would justify—

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not tax dodging. It is a thing which the statute allows.

Mr. HACKETT: If it is not tax dodging, then surely the individual should not be penalized because the minister has—

Mr. ABBOTT: We are giving him too favourable terms; that is the point.

Mr. HACKETT: The minister is imposing punitive measures upon persons who innocently and honestly make a mistake. Unless he can state that a very large number of taxpayers are dishonest, there is no warrant for this punitive measure.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not suggesting that the great majority of people are dishonest taxpayers or dishonest people. What I am saying is that the law, as it now stands, permits any income taxpayer in this country legally to get an unsecured loan from the government at the rate of four per cent a year. I say that is not proper; it is not in the interests of the taxpayers who pay their taxes promptly. I say that it should not be open to any taxpayer who wishes to do so, because he has not the money on hand at the moment, or because he wants to buy a new motorcar, to file his return showing he has a tax liability of $2,000, $3,000 or $4,000, send in $1,000 on account and say: "Well, they will not be able to assess my return for a year or a couple of years, and in the meantime it will cost me only four per cent interest." I say that is not good business; it is not fair or in the interests of the majority of the taxpayers.

Mr. FULTON: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. ABBOTT: You will all have your chance in a moment. That is my submission. I say that there should be an element of penalty in the interest rate on overdue taxes.

Mr. HACKETT: Make it after notice.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think a good case could be made for the old rate of eight per cent.

Mr. HACKETT: That was when the current rate was six per cent.

Mr. ABBOTT: That existed up to two or three years ago. What we are suggesting here is a rate of six per cent, which is somewhat higher than a commercial borrower, with good security, can get from the bank.

Mr. HACKETT: It is double.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not double, if my hon. friend will forgive me. If anyone wants to borrow from the bank, under section 88 of the Bank Act, he pays 4½ to 5 per cent. I know what I am talking about.

Mr. HACKETT: Not if he goes in with victory bonds.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, they are virtually cash, or life insurance policies with a cash surrender value equal to the amount of the loan. In that case he can borrow at four per cent. But that is not the type of taxpayer who should be underpaying his tax and borrowing from the government at four per cent because it happens to be convenient for him to do so. I am putting before the committee the exact purpose of the amendment, and I say without fear of contradiction that it is a perfectly sound and equitable proposal. The law is clear. People should estimate their taxes as closely as they can, and most do. Most of them do not much underestimate their taxes. A good many do not pay in full at the time they file their return, and the law does not force them to do so, except that for underpayment there is a penalty of four per cent until assessment. That is not an adequate penalty, and the purpose of the amendment is to meet that point.

Mr. HACKETT: Why not, when the government pays only three per cent on money it borrows?

Mr. ABBOTT: Because government security is the best in the world, whereas the security in respect of underpaid taxes is slim.

Mr. HACKETT: Let me put this to the minister. Why does he not remove the mote from his own eye? If there is—

Mr. ABBOTT: Which mote is that? I have so many.

Mr. HACKETT: If there is delay in the payment it is because of deficiency in the department—I do not say his department, but the department that collects the tax—

Mr. ABBOTT: There is a fallacy in that.

Mr. HACKETT: —because of the volume of work in that department. The taxpayer therefore is left for many months, sometimes for many years, through no fault of his own, without knowledge of the correct amount of his tax, and in fact without the ability to overcome the delay. He should not be treated as a criminal.

Mr. ABBOTT: He is not treated as a criminal; moreover, he is left with the use of his money.

Mr. HACKETT: Yes, at four per cent. Is it not possible, without going into a great deal of additional expense or vastly increasing the personnel of the department which has to do the collecting of the income tax, to send out a notice advising the individual that he has paid less than he owes and putting him on investigation? Then he can go, if he must, to an accountant. He has some means of protecting himself against the penalty imposed upon him without his being aware of it.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend's suggestion is not a bad one, but one must assess the return before one knows there is an underpayment. The gravest abuse is not on the part of those who substantially underestimate the amount of tax but on the part of those who underpay the amount of the tax they estimate when they send in a return. They send in a return showing that they owe x dollars, and they pay only ten per cent, and they say: "I will wait for a while, and when I am assessed I will pay it". In the meantime it costs only four per cent interest, and that, I have suggested to the committee, holds out too great an inducement to take advantage of an easy form of borrowing at a rate of interest which compares favourably with highly secured loans in any commercial institution. That is why the rate should be six per cent. There is no question of anyone being a crook or doing anything that is improper. That is what the law says they have to pay, and delay in assessment is provided against. Everyone knows that with 2,000,000 taxpayers, and with the difficulties under which the staff has to work, it is not possible to assess returns within less than six months, and in some cases considerably longer, depending upon the complexity of the return. Actually, I am told, they are on the average only about two years behind. In the case of small income-tax payers, where for the most part salaries and wages are involved, notices of assessment are out within three, four, five or six months, and that is being gradually cut down as increased staff is taken on in the Department of National Revenue. The situation is, that because of the physical limitations involved in the assessment of returns, it is not possible to assess them all within a month or two after they are filed. There is a limitation of twenty months in respect of liability for interest. If the department cannot assess the return within twenty months, interest stops then, so that the maximum penalty is six per cent for a period of twenty months on the underpayment of taxes, when the return has not been assessed. If hon. members will think it over they will, I believe, come to the conclusion that the penalty is not an unreasonable one to put upon the underpayment of taxes.

Mr. SKEY: This change in the Income Tax Act arises, I believe, from the lack of consideration, on the part of the government, of the human factors that should be kept in mind. People today are caught between rising prices and heavy taxes. In my opinion they are greatly overtaxed, especially in the income tax field. We know that the machinery for the collection of taxes is not as efficient as it might be, and this change which the government has proposed is merely a whip to make people pay. I suggest that the committee should vote for the amendment moved by the hon. member for St. John-Albert.

Mr. ABBOTT: I indicated earlier that my hon. friend's amendment is entirely out of order, because he is asking for a change in what is in effect a rate of tax. I am prepared to discuss the question, but I make that point now.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: Before the hon. member speaks, I may say that I have been considering this amendment and I am under the same impression as the minister. Does the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wish to discuss the regularity or irregularity of the amendment?

Mr. KNOWLES: No, I wish to speak to the substance of the matter.

The CHAIRMAN: Then I had better rule on the amendment. The responsibility for raising taxes is entirely a responsibility of the government, and a private member cannot move an amendment such as is proposed.

Mr. FULTON: Mr. Chairman, will you permit discussion of your ruling now, or after you have made it?

The CHAIRMAN: Not after.

Mr. FULTON: Will you permit it now?

The CHAIRMAN: Very limited discussion.

Mr. HACKETT: Why limited?

Mr. FULTON: The point raised by the minister falls under the general heading, in his submission, of a motion which would upset the balance of ways and means. Is that the idea?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is the general view.

Mr. FULTON: I submit that it does not fall under that heading, for the reason that the proposal is to increase a penalty and not to increase a tax. It is to increase the penalty if the department rules that the tax has been underpaid. It is not as though it were in effect now. We are not making a motion to reduce the amount of revenue already collected; we are simply trying to prevent the department from increasing the penalty. The minister cannot say that he has predicated the balance of ways and means on the assumption that he will get greatly increased penalties as a result of the amendment.

Mr. ABBOTT: On that point, I feel strongly that the proposed amendment will have a substantial effect on the flow of revenues.

Mr. JACKMAN: Oh, no.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend makes it a debating point that it does not affect the balance of ways and means. The amendment is clearly out of order.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Chairman, we shall have before the committee presently a resolution which asks for an increase in penalties as a deterrent to smuggling. I do not think the minister would suggest to you that it was out of order for an hon. member to recommend a reduction in that penalty. It has absolutely nothing to do with the revenue of the government, unless we attribute to the government omniscience and a view of the future which enables them to say who is going to break the law in the future. This is a pure incident; the proposal in question cannot, I submit, by the widest stretch of the imagination be regarded as in the category of a money bill.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is not suggesting that anyone be charged any penalty for breaking the law. It is merely a proposal that the rate of interest on overdue taxes be set at six per cent instead of four per cent. I do not think that my hon. friend would suggest that the amendment could go so far as to say that no interest should be payable on overdue taxes. But in principle that is exactly what the amendment is doing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HACKETT: That is not the argument.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. HACKETT: The argument, Mr. Chairman, is—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I think I have heard sufficient discussion on the point of order.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Will the hon. member kindly resume his seat?

Mr. HACKETT: Yes. Will the hon. member kindly observe the rules of parliament?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: Withdraw.

The CHAIRMAN: Was the hon. member referring to the chairman?

Mr. HARTT: This is not a police court.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member for Stanstead was referring to the chairman and reflecting on the Chair, I shall have to ask him to withdraw his remark.

Mr. HACKETT: I will begin by withdrawing anything that I said in haste. At the same time I will ask the Chair to permit members to express their views on the question which is before the Chair, and I hope it will not be necessary to render a decision until those views have been wholly expressed. I regret sincerely if I said anything that might be interpreted as offensive to the Chair, and I withdraw wholeheartedly.

The CHAIRMAN: Thank you.

Mr. HACKETT: But I ask for permission to address the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: It is customary for the chairman to ask for the views of hon. members on points of order. Of course the discussion should be limited. I do not want to curtail discussion too greatly, but I thought I had heard enough. If the hon. member for Stanstead has something further to say, I certainly will not refuse to hear him.

Mr. HACKETT: I merely wish to point out that I understood the argument of the Minister of Finance to be that too many people were availing themselves of delay because the interest rate was low. Then he said there was a large body of people who made inaccurate returns and paid less than was owing. He made a distinction between the two groups. It seems to me that from his argument we must conclude that the excess in the amount of interest exacted is a penalty, and that, in consequence, this is not a money bill and does not come within the category of legislation which can emanate only from the government. I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for enabling me to state my case.

The CHAIRMAN: The resolution before the committee is not a money bill, as the hon. member for Stanstead has said, but it is a resolution preceding a money bill. As I said previously, the government must take full responsibility for the raising of taxes. I would refer hon. members to Beauchesne, third edition, citation 497:

No member other than a minister of the crown may introduce a bill for reduction of duties. The government must take full responsibility for the taxation levied to provide the revenue.

The ways and means resolutions are for the purpose of raising revenue and there can be no reduction in taxation which would affect the balance of ways and means. The government must expect to receive some revenue from this rate of interest. If it were reduced, it would affect the balance of ways and means; therefore I must rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. FULTON: With respect, Mr. Chairman, for the reason that I feel that your ruling is not within the terms of the citation which you read, I regret that I must appeal from your ruling.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I do not know whether the hon. member for Kamloops realizes that an appeal from the chairman's ruling is not to the committee but to the house, and that I would have to report to the Speaker. The ruling would then be presented to the house.

Mr. FULTON: I realize that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ADAMSON: While you are waiting, sir, may I ask the minister a question for the purpose of clarification? Do I understand—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am speaking on the same subject.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. ABBOTT: Summer is here.

The CHAIRMAN: The ruling has been given. I am about to ask the Speaker to resume the chair.

Mr. ADAMSON: All right. I thought I might ask a question before you left the chair, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McCANN: There has been no protest against your ruling, Mr. Chairman. Your ruling stands unless there is a protest.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Kamloops appealed.

Mr. McCANN: He indicates that privately, but he has not indicated it to the committee.

[Mr. Hackett.]

Mr. GRAYDON: Oh, he has indicated it all right.

The CHAIRMAN: I shall be glad to put the matter in a formal way.

Mr. FULTON: If the minister wishes a formal appeal, all right.

Mr. McCANN: No.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not wish anything. I just want to get on with the resolution. If we are to do it by a vote, let us do it.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Kamloops has indicated that he wishes formally to appeal to the Speaker. If I am wrong, I should be glad to know.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is wasting half an hour.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and the chairman of the committee made the following report:

Mr. Hazen moved an amendment to clause 2 of the Income War Tax Act resolutions as follows:

"That clause 2 be amended by deleting therefrom the following words: 'and that the rates payable on overdue taxes be increased from 4 per cent and 7 per cent to 6 per cent and 8 per cent respectively'." The chairman ruled the amendment out of order on the ground that it disturbed the balance of ways and means. From that decision Mr. Fulton appealed.

Mr. HACKETT: Before you render your decision, Mr. Speaker, will you be good enough to read the whole of citation 497?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HACKETT: Only part of it was read.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call the hon. member's attention to the fact that I have no ruling to give. I have just to put the question to the house, to determine whether the ruling is to be confirmed.

The question before the house is an appeal from a ruling given by the chairman of the committee of ways and means. Mr. Hazen moved an amendment to clause 2 of the resolution with respect to the Income War Tax Act, as follows:

That clause 2 be amended by deleting therefrom all the words after, "no interest less than $1 to be payable."

The chairman ruled that the amendment was out of order on the ground that it disturbed the balance of ways and means. From that decision Mr. Fulton appealed.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say a word of explanation? In the excitement of the moment I quite overlooked the fact that I was paired with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) and I voted inadvertently. When I saw my mistake I asked our whip if he would kindly refrain from voting so that the count would be the same, and he did so. I think this all goes to show that even the best of us may go astray at times.

Mr. GARDINER: May I say to the house that I did not notice that the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) was not in his seat, and I voted inadvertently, but I had the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) pair in my place.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I was paired with the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver). Had I voted, I would have voted against the ruling.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I noticed that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) was not present, so I refrained from voting.

Mr. FERGUSON: I was paired with the hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Lapointe). Had I voted, I would have voted against the ruling.

Mr. PEARKES: I was paired with the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), but when I saw the Prime Minister voting I thought all pairs were off.

Mr. CASSELMAN: The hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding) was inadvertently paired with two members on this side, I being one of them. I therefore refrained from voting, the other member of the triumvirate having voted at my request. Had I voted, I would have voted against the ruling.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I was paired with the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Mayhew). Had I voted, I would have voted to confirm the chairman's ruling.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I thought I was paired with the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). Had I voted, I would have voted against the chairman's ruling.

Mr. NIXON: I was paired. Had I not been paired, I would have voted to confirm the chairman's ruling.

Mr. HEALY: I also was paired. Had I voted, I would have voted to confirm the ruling.

Mr. GARIEPY: I was paired with the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield). Had I voted, I would have voted to confirm the ruling.

And the house, having resumed in committee of ways and means:

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, the minister has stated that the reason for the amendment now before us is that there have been extensive abuses of underpayment of tax. Can he give us some statistics on that point? Can he tell us roughly how many people have taken advantage of the act to borrow, say, fifty dollars from the government at a low rate of interest, and how many have taken advantage of it to borrow five hundred or a thousand or a million dollars?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not detailed information of that kind here, but it could be obtained from the income tax records. Some idea could be given as to the average amount by which the tax is underpaid, but I could not give my hon. friend any detailed information today.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am inclined to go along with the minister's argument on this point, but I do think that those who take the other view would be justified in asking for the information I am seeking, although I have noted they have not asked for it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We have to leave something for you to do.

Mr. KNOWLES: My hon. friends to my right say they do not accept the minister's statement, and I would like to know what is behind it. I hope that my hon. friends to my right will note that I am agreeing with them in seeking support for the minister's statement. I do think that when the minister comes before the committee and says that he is asking for a certain provision to correct abuses that have been widespread, he should have the facts and figures to support his statement, and to show the extent of the abuse.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will see what information I can give when we are in committee on the bill. Frankly I did not expect that I would be asked for detailed information today. I am afraid I took it for granted that others would take for granted what I know to be so—that there are substantial underpayments of tax. The law does not impose any penalty for that, other than the interest penalty, and human nature being what it is, when April 30 rolls around, if you have money and there is something else you need, you are inclined to say: The government can wait a little while, and it will only cost me four per cent interest.

[Mr. Healy.]

Mr. KNOWLES: Has the minister figures now as to the total amount of arrears, or the average amount of arrears?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not in my department. The interest rate has always been in the act. At one time it was eight per cent, and in recent years has been reduced to four per cent.

Mr. KNOWLES: And what happened?

Mr. ABBOTT: My information is that there are substantial arrears of tax. The information I get from the officials of the Department of National Revenue is that apparently some advantage is being taken of this lower interest rate, and it is for that reason I suggest we establish it, not at eight per cent, but at six per cent.

Mr. HACKETT: Why not make it five per cent?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I should do a little horse trading with my hon. friend. I will give figures to the committee, but it will take a day or two to dig them up. I will see what I can get for the committee when we come to the relevant section of the bill.

Mr. FULTON: The minister is basing this change mainly on those who make their own assessment and then send a cheque for less than the amount they have assessed themselves—a wilful or knowledgeable underpayment. But is there not room to distinguish between persons in this category and others who innocently make a mistake in their assessment and send in a cheque for the full amount for which they have assessed themselves? Surely a distinction can be made between those two groups.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no doubt my hon. friend is right in theory; it should be possible to make a distinction. But my hon. friend is a lawyer, as I am, and he knows that it is sometimes hard to tell from an income tax return whether there has been a deliberate underestimate, or say a claiming of expenses which could not properly be claimed, or an honest mistake. I know that from my own experience. There are undoubtedly these two types of cases, but it would be difficult for the average assessor to distinguish between them. I suggest to the committee that six per cent for the use of money which in fact is the government's money from the time the return is filed, while in excess of the ordinary commercial rate, is not too greatly in excess of it. The information I have is that the cases of honest underestimates of tax are relatively small in number. I say frankly to the committee that the type of case we are trying to discourage is where there is a deliberate underestimate or a deliberate failure to pay a reasonably substantial amount. We want an interest rate that will discourage that sort of thing, and I would hope that this rate will do it. In hardship cases, where there is an honest mistake and it is felt some relief should be given, it is always open to the minister to recommend a remission of the interest penalty. But I feel from my experience in the administration of the act that the general rule should be there. The honest man who has innocently made a mistake and feels there is an injustice can ask for a remission.

Mr. HACKETT: I am going to suggest to the minister that before he arrives irrevocably at a decision he read Nehemiah, chapter 5, verse 4:

> There were also that said, we have borrowed money for the king's tribute, and that upon our lands and vineyards.

If he sees what happened in the sequence I think he will be inclined to be more temperate.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mene, mene, tekel, upharsin.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall certainly read my hon. friend's reference.

Mr. GILLIS: I agree with the minister in what he is trying to do. It is just a matter of guarding against sharp practices by smart people who might want to get hold of $10,000 at four per cent and invest it at fifteen per cent. But there is another group who will be affected by this change. Suppose a person in computing his tax makes a mistake of a hundred dollars or so. The income tax department after eight months or a year—

Mr. HACKETT: It may be twenty months.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes; they tell him that he has made a mistake and he is charged interest on the underpaid tax when he thought he owed the government nothing at all. If the minister intends to insist on the resolution going through as it is, the least that should be done is that, where the amounts are small, if the income tax department did not notify the taxpayer within a reasonable time the interest should be waived.

I have run into another problem which has to do with service personnel, persons who up to 1942 were working in industry. They went into the service in the latter part of 1942, filed an income tax return and went overseas. They came back in 1945 and then received a bill from the income tax department for arrears of taxes in the year 1942. They are also being charged with three or four years interest on back taxes; in other words, the period during which they were in the services.

Mr. JACKMAN: With interest on interest, I suppose.

Mr. GILLIS: That is true. I agree in principle with what the minister is trying to do, but there should be some reasonable safeguard, even if it was administrative latitude given to the department, in cases where there are extenuating circumstances. Interest should be waived in the case of a man who was in the service. Mind you, up to date the department has been adamant against waiving that interest. I have had one or two specific cases brought to my attention. While $5, $6, $10 or $15 may not be very much money to the average person, to some people on a very small income, with families to maintain, that amount added at the end of the year for taxes imposes a considerable hardship on them. I suggest to the minister that there should be some regulation under which the first $100 is exempt, or if the income tax branch did not notify the taxpayer within a reasonable time, say two or three months, or something like that, the interest should not go beyond that. The interest for which the service personnel are now being dunned, and which accumulated during the period they were in the services, should be waived.

Mr. ABBOTT: They were given exemption for the time they were in the services and a year afterwards.

Mr. GILLIS: What I am talking about is what they owed on their income in 1941 or 1942, before they went into the services. It accumulated, and the interest ran on all the time that they were in the services. With that exception, I am quite satisfied that the minister is taking the right step against the type of persons who may try to get money very cheaply from the government in this way and invest it at higher rates of interest.

Mr. CARDIFF: I should like to ask the minister a question, but I am not sure whether it is out of order or not. Like all other hon. members, I receive a salary and the tax is deducted at the source. Of necessity I have to make a return on my farm. If that farm shows a loss on the return, am I entitled to offset the amount shown on that return?

Mr. ABBOTT: You are not entitled to write off the loss on your farm against your indemnity. As I understand it, it depends on which is the principal source of income. A man who operates a farm as a side line can write off losses on his farm against other secondary income which he may have, but he cannot write it off against income, or salary, or wages in his main occupation. It is a legal question. I suppose I should not attempt to give a ruling in the committee. It really revolves around whether my hon. friend's principal occupation is that of farming or that of being a member of the House of Commons.

Mr. CARDIFF: The reason I ask the question is this. In the first return I ever made I was satisfied to let them take the amount from my salary at the source. They said I had to make a return on the farm, which I did. Others are in the same position as I am. It does not affect only me. Many hon. members in all corners of the house are in the same position. Take my own case as an example. I have shown a loss on my farm back to 1942, but I have never received a rebate from the government.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps my hon. friend had better consult his own adviser in the matter. On the facts as he has given them, if his chief occupation is farming, and he shows a loss on his farm operations, he is entitled to charge that loss against his indemnity. These free opinions are worth just what you pay for them. Therefore I think the hon. member had better check with his own lawyer.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Suppose a person overpays his tax one year; is that overpayment applied to an underpayment the next year without notification?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am informed that each year is taken by itself. I am not too familiar with departmental administration.

Mr. STEPHENSON: That is the point I wish to speak on now. The person to whom I should like to refer had an overpayment of $27 and some odd cents for one year. The next year he was short $21.61. The department did not refund the overpayment. He was notified that he owed the government $52.05. His underpayment was only $21.61, but the tax penalty was $30.44, making the total which he was required to pay $52.05. He had not been notified that he owed that money until some four years later. At the same time he had a balance of $27 coming to him which could have been applied to pay the $21.61. I cannot see the justice of that, and I cannot see the argument for the six per cent, particularly when a man has overpaid and there is money on hand to pay the amount. That money is worth as much to him as it is to the government, particularly if he had to go out and borrow the money to cover the $27 or whatever he may be short. On that amount he has to pay five per cent or six per cent while the government holds his money, and yet the government charges him interest at six per cent because it has him over the barrel.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is very difficult to deal with individual cases such as that without knowing all the facts.

Mr. STEPHENSON: These are individual cases.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am sure that if my hon. friend took the matter up with the office of my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, or if he saw the deputy minister, he would have it cleared up.

Mr. STEPHENSON: There are thousands of these cases in the country. This happens to be one particular case. Last year when I spoke on it I asked if the penalty interest was justified, and apparently there was no answer. I asked the Minister of Justice if it was justified and he said the government was infallible.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I think the hon. member for Durham has a real point there. This is one of the sore spots with the taxpayers of the country. I could never understand why the Department of National Revenue did not have a ledger sheet of each individual with the credits on one side, the debits on the other and the balance carried forward.

Mr. McCANN: That would mean ledger sheets for everyone.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): As the minister says, that would mean ledger sheets for everybody, and the balance that a man owes ought to be the figure on which he pays interest.

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer there is that perhaps it would be desirable to change the law and make it a current account. The law provides that each man owes a tax each year on a certain basis. He is called on to estimate his tax, file a return and pay the tax. If he does not do that he is subject to the usual penalty of interest on what he does not pay, and each year is taken as a separate unit. There are the provisions for averaging, of course, in the case of farmers and for writing back losses in the case of businessmen, and so on; but, broadly speaking, the principle of the law as it stands, and as it stood in 1917 when it was brought in, is that each twelve-month period the individual taxpayer, or the corporate taxpayer, must file a return and pay his tax for that year, or the balance of tax for that year. Now it is on an instalment basis. One way of borrowing money for your business at a cheap rate is to underpay your instalments. That is why I am so anxious to have this somewhat higher rate in the law. Tax collection is not a popular pastime any more than tax paying is a popular pastime. Taxes have to be collected if the services of the country are to be maintained, and that is the job of my colleague the Minister of National Revenue. Neither he nor I will win any popularity contest by pressing for taxes or charging interest on under-payment of taxes, but most businessmen know that some measures of that kind have to be enforced.

Mr. STEPHENSON: When the taxpayer overpaid the tax, why was not the overpayment returned?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is impossible for me to answer hypothetical questions in the house on a set of facts which I have not had a chance to look at. The answer is this. If a return is assessed and it is found that the taxpayer has overpaid the tax, a cheque is sent for the overpayment. If he owes the crown money, then the usual law of offset is applied, and a ruling must be got from the Department of Justice, or a certificate. But that applies in commercial life. If I owe a man $50 and he owes me $75 I do not send him the $50 and let him send me $75. He sends me a cheque for $25.

Mr. STEPHENSON: The minister is not consistent in his policy, because he would not apply the over-payment to the next year's tax in order to bring the taxpayer up to date. As regards the refundable portion of the tax payable now, the government arbitrarily says, "We will take that and apply it to back taxes without asking the taxpayer's permission to do so."

Mr. ABBOTT: They could not do so if he did not owe them money.

Mr. McCANN: When an assessment is made and it is found that there is an overpayment of, let us say for the sake of argument, $25, that is stated on the assessment return. The taxpayer has the option of getting that in cash or indicating to the department that he wishes it to be put to his credit for his next tax year.

Mr. STEPHENSON: In the case I am speaking of, the taxpayer was not notified that he had any tax to pay, but when the matter was taken up and the mistake was brought to light they decided to apply it to 1944.

Mr. McCANN: Did he get a notice of assessment?

Mr. STEPHENSON: Yes. He missed 1943 altogether and was charged $30 interest on a payment of $21. It is hardly consistent.

Mr. ISNOR: I am surprised at the attitude taken by many members sitting in the opposition. It is true that many of those who have spoken are lawyers. There are very few businessmen who have spoken against this proposal of the minister, and I wish to give the minister my support. Everyone seems to be objecting and to be criticizing the minister for carrying on in a business-like way.

May I deal briefly with the small taxpayer. Today he is paid through his weekly envelope or monthly salary and deductions are made at the source; in fact, ninety-five per cent of his tax is collected in that way. There is really no opportunity for him to have large means at his disposal. On the other hand, the businessman receives a form and he is asked to estimate from the previous year his income for the current year. Then he is requested to make, I believe, four quarterly payments of twenty-five per cent. If the businessman, or the firm, decides to use two of the payments, he has fifty per cent of his total tax available for business purposes. Instead of going to the bank and paying 3½ per cent, putting up Dominion of Canada bonds as collateral, or paying 4½ per cent or up to six per cent as a business transaction, he borrows from the government, using government moneys for a certain period. Why should the businessman not be compelled to pay the same rate of interest to the government as to the bank or to any other lending institution?

That runs into many thousands of dollars. It is only, or it is very largely, the businessman who is being charged this particular interest rate, and I do not believe there are many of them who are opposing this change. It is a clear-cut business method of carrying on; and I rather compliment the minister, instead of criticizing him, upon the action he has taken in this respect. I should think every member sitting with the C.C.F. would welcome this, since it would be a clear indication that they were looking after the smaller man.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. ISNOR: The facts prove it is so, and "Oh, oh" does not count if you look at the matter in the right way.

Mr. KNOWLES: We are trying to get the facts from the minister.

Mr. ISNOR: Those are the facts as I see them. In regard to overpayments, if any hon. gentleman had to pay $5,000, $6,000 or $7,000 more, he should have entered it as E.P.T. in 1944, 1945 or 1946, and automatically it would have been transferred to his income tax. In that way the account would be more or less balanced and kept alive, and he would not be charged interest on that particular amount of his income, which otherwise might have been the case. Such a transfer is proper. Quite often in the past, businessmen have found that they had paid too much in the form of excess profits tax. I have before me a tax bill from a certain taxpayer showing that he has a credit of $7,066. That taxpayer will be credited from his E.P.T. to income tax.

An hon. MEMBER: He must be a rich Liberal.

Mr. ISNOR: I just happened to have that bill here, and that is a real case. That taxpayer will have to pay, but he will be in the fortunate position of not having to pay as much income tax as he had anticipated for 1947-48.

I wish to congratulate the minister on this businesslike step he has taken. I make that statement as a businessman, because in my opinion he is trying to carry on in a businesslike way.

Mr. ADAMSON: The love feast of joy and good-natured felicity among the Liberals—how pleasing it is to pay taxes and even to pay interest on taxes unpaid!—is marvellous. It indicates a strange philosophy and shows a wish to get somewhere, where they are not at the present time.

Mr. ISNOR: I wonder what the hon. member means by that. Would he explain? Would he enlarge on that?

Mr. ADAMSON: The hon. member will read my remarks and understand them perfectly.

Mr. ISNOR: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that I was the last speaker, I think the hon. member will be fair and will not imply any such thing as that. I would ask him to be good enough to explain.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am not imputing motives at all. Nothing in my remarks implies the imputation of motives.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is a very worthy imputation.

Mr. ADAMSON: I wish to ask the Minister of Finance this one question.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. ISNOR: Mr. Chairman, as a matter of principle, I suggest that the hon. member has implied something in regard to myself. If he will be good enough to say he does not imply it in connection with myself or my remarks, I am happy: otherwise I will ask him to withdraw. There is no hidden motive as far as I am concerned.

Mr. ADAMSON: It is like the hidden reserves in the banks. There are no hidden motives.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member is not man enough to withdraw.

An hon. MEMBER: Now, now.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member for York West has stated that there was no motive implied.

Mr. ISNOR: Did he say that?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, definitely.

Mr. ISNOR: That is fine.

An hon. MEMBER: Do you apologize?

Mr. ISNOR: No.

Mr. ADAMSON: I want to ask the Minister of Finance just one question, if he will listen. Suppose a man has underpaid his income tax substantially. He does not get his assessment for the year for four years; I refer to his final assessment. That is quite a common occurrence among some of the taxpayers.

Mr. McCANN: No, that is not common at all.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes, it is.

Mr. ADAMSON: Unfortunately, I know of several cases where that has happened and where the assessment was not received for three and four years. He is charged this four per cent or six per cent on the twenty months of the four years before he gets his assessment, and not on the other two and a half years.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct. At the end of twenty months, interest ceases to run if the assessment has not been made. Of course, thirty days after the mailing of the notice of assessment, the interest rate goes up on the amount due. There are thirty days in which to pay any balance of assessment, and then it goes up.

Mr. ADAMSON: I assume that. I think it would be a great relief to taxpayers to have their assessments just as soon as possible so that their liability to the state would be known.

Mr. McCANN: I should like to say a word in reference to that matter. It is the object of the department to have the business in such a position that the returns of one year will be assessed before the returns of the next year come in. For the year 1946 there were 3,566,000 returns. That is a great deal of business. That constituted 600,000 more returns than for the year 1945. The reason for that was that the men in the defence forces had returned to Canada. During the time they were overseas they were not taxable. They had returned and had gone into business or into some type of money-earning occupation, as a result of which they had become taxable. In addition to that, this large number of returns indicates a high level of earnings by the people of this country. Over 600,000 more returns were received in the year 1946 than in the year 1945. For the year 1947, returns for which were made at the end of May, there are many hundreds of thousands more than the 3,566,000 for 1946. I think it is fair to estimate that for the year 1947 there will be at least 3,800,000 returns, or somewhere between that and 4,000,000.

When the hon. gentleman says a great number of returns for years back—as much as four years—have not been assessed, he is not speaking according to the facts. If the percentage is taken, it is exceedingly low. There are reasons for that. All during the war years the staff of the taxation division was greatly undermanned. Business came along and took from us our trained assessors, auditors and chartered accountants. Why was that? Because of the level of the salaries, for the most part, that were being paid to those who were in the salaried positions in the taxation division. That has been changed. We have a great many more assessors. We have added to our personnel something over 2,400 people throughout the country, so that we are now getting to the stage where we believe that, within one to two years from now, we shall have the assessments made on a current year basis. At that time there may be a change made, so that if the assessment is not made in a period less than twenty months, the interest rate will not apply. At the present time we are approximately twenty months to two years behind in some cases, but that condition will be improved as time goes on.

Mr. FULTON: It was interesting to hear the senior member for Halifax speak from the point of view of the businessman, of whose situation he has intimate knowledge. He was probably accurate in what he said with regard to the purely business basis of this tax. But I do not think he showed any great accuracy or knowledge of the situation as it affects those others for whom we have been speaking. I refer to the small taxpayer, and particularly to the farmer, who does not make his return on a quarterly basis—

Mr. ISNOR: I dealt with the small taxpayer.

Mr. FULTON: —and who has no knowledge of interest or why he should be charged interest when the error was made in good faith, and particularly when the time lag is not his fault. That is our main objection to this particular piece of legislation. One must appreciate what the minister is trying to do with regard to those who deliberately underpay their own assessments. But I do not think any legislation is good which, because of a certain situation of which a few people are taking advantage, hurts everybody simply so that those few people will no longer be able to take advantage of it. The suggestion we have been making is that the particular offenders should be dealt with, instead of the whole mass of honest taxpayers being penalized, as large numbers of them will be penalized under this legislation.

I wish to refer to a case as an illustration of what happens. A certain taxpayer, a farmer, in 1943 asked to be permitted to go on a different basis. He had been on a cash basis and wanted to go on an inventory basis. He received permission, furnished information back to 1936 and established his inventory as of that date. A few months ago he received a final assessment showing that he had some $1,100 additional taxes to pay because of the additional income which that change in the method of assessment involved, from 1936, and requiring him to pay an interest penalty on the unpaid taxes of $500, or nearly half of the tax arrears. I believe that particular case is to be adjusted, but I refer to it as an example of what happens when assessments are late and when the government insists on charging interest on taxes which are in arrears for no other reason than that the assessment has been delayed.

The amendment which we moved has been ruled out of order, but I think we shall have another one which would take care of the situation. I ask the minister again to consider whether it would not be advisable, rather than to pass this new resolution in its present form, to provide that the interest penalties shall apply only to those who underpay their own assessments. That is the group to which he referred and on which he based his argument. That is the group which is obviously, shall we say, taking advantage of what he says has been a low interest charge by the government in the past. But certainly some taxpayers have been charged interest when the twenty months' period has been exceeded and when the delay has not been their fault. Before this resolution is passed, I should like to know that more consideration will be given to preventing honest taxpayers from being penalized because there are a few whose motives are in question.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not a question of penalizing honest taxpayers, as I have tried to explain. This is a complex subject, and it covers all taxpayers. One of the ways in which substantial advantage can be taken of a low interest rate was touched on by the senior hon. member for Halifax. In the case of businessmen, they have to estimate their tax for the coming year. They estimate it on the basis of last year's tax. They are entitled to do that. Then they pay one instalment. Then, for one reason or other they do not pay the second instalment or the third. They know pretty well the chances are that, while last year was not such a good year, this year will be pretty good. There are many ways in which that can be done, and it is not illegal, but it enables a man to use money in his business which properly belongs to the government.

The cases of small taxpayers, about which so much has been made here, where they under-estimated the tax, honestly and otherwise, are usually pretty small. They might run to $25 or $50. The interest on that, even if it were $100, is only $6 for the first twelve months. And somebody can calculate rapidly what it would be for the next eight months.

All that is being suggested in the proposed amendment is that the present rate of four per cent, which I consider is too small or too low to accomplish the purpose for which it is placed there, should be placed at six per cent.

The hon. member for Eglinton suggested that consideration might be given to reducing this period of twenty months to a somewhat lower figure. My colleague the Minister of National Revenue has already touched upon that. Perhaps, if additional staff were obtained in the department and greater headway made, that period might be reduced in another year. But I say, as I said before, I think this is a section which it is in the public interest to have, and it will not cause hardship to anyone who pays his honest bills. Incidentally, this applies only to the 1948 tax period, returns for which will be filed next year.

Mr. TUSTIN: How long has the twenty-month period been in existence?

Mr. ABBOTT: Two or three years. I cannot remember offhand, but I am told it is up to and including 1945.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. HARKNESS: Does the hardship provision about which the minister has been talking apply in respect of a farmer in this situation. On account of the way in which farmers' income tax is collected, he may, from the point of view of his figures, show a very large income in a particular year in which he has no income at all. For example, in the fall of 1947 a farmer might go to the bank and borrow $10,000 with which to buy cattle and another $5,000 to buy feed. Then, in the spring of 1948 he sells those cattle for probably $16,000, making a profit of $1,000 for his work. But so far as income tax is concerned, he is charged with having an income of $16,000.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, no.

Mr. HARKNESS: Oh, yes, he is.

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. HARKNESS: I have made these things up myself and I know. When a man is on a cash basis every cent he gets in from the sale of stock is considered as income.

Mr. ABBOTT: On a cash basis; but he can average his income over three or four years.

Mr. HARKNESS: But supposing he has not been operating on the three-year average. That is true of most farmers; they have not been on the three-year average, and in most cases they have not paid income tax at all. But the man in this particular instance is charged income tax on $16,000, plus any other crop he may have. Let us say there is another crop valued at $4,000; then the result is that he is shown as having a total income of $20,000 for 1948. And on that, of course he is charged a large amount of income tax. I do not know what it would come to, because I have not figured it out. But he does not have the money to pay it.

In a case of that kind, what adjustment is made; and is the hardship clause about which the minister spoke brought into play? A man in that position is in a hopeless situation.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would not think that would be a case where the hardship clause would apply. In the circumstances which have been given, the farmer goes to the bank and borrows $10,000 with which to buy cattle, which he sells for $16,000. He got the money back, plus a profit and he owes the government income tax. If he has not the cash he has to go to the bank and borrow money, the same as any other businessman who wishes to pay his liability. I can see that if he suddenly switched to a cash basis, in the circumstances given here it might sound as though his income were not real, and he would be taking this averaging procedure in the next year. Anyway, it is a problem of administration.

Mr. HARKNESS: No, it is not. This is the case of the farmer who did not pay income tax at all in 1947. He borrowed money from the bank to buy cattle. I know of one or two cases where this particular point applies. Then the farmer turns in his income tax return for the next year. According to the way in which he has to make up his return he is charged with having income of $20,000, and the tax is levied on that amount. But he has not made that amount of money, and he has not the money to pay the tax. What I want to know is: What happens in a case like that?

Mr. ABBOTT: The same as happens in respect of any other businessman. He has to find some way to pay his obligations. I should have thought that, in the light of the facts set out by my hon. friend, that particular taxpayer would be well advised to prepare his return on an accrual basis. He has the option of doing it in that way. If he prepared it on an accrual basis his income would be the $1,000 to which my hon. friend has referred. If he filed it on a cash basis, then I suppose he does it either because he is badly advised or because there is some advantage in doing so.

Mr. HARKNESS: When the minister refers to the accrual basis he means the inventory basis?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. HARKNESS: But that will not help the man so far as the first year is concerned. And if he goes on a three-year average basis it will not help him so far as the first year is concerned. In other words, he is still caught for a large false income, and that is the thing about which I am asking the minister. What is he going to do about it? How is it to be adjusted? There must be some way.

The CHAIRMAN: I have not interrupted the hon. member but it does seem to me that we are getting away from the resolution under consideration. We are considering resolution 2 which deals with the interest payable on amounts paid in excess of the amounts chargeable, and also interest charged on amounts which are not payable. This resolution deals with what happens after the tax has been paid; not before.

Mr. HARKNESS: The reason I am discussing it is that the farmer about whom I have been talking is charged with a tax on several thousand dollars, and he has not the money to pay it. Then he is charged interest at six per cent, and later at eight per cent. That is the manner in which I am dealing with the matter. My first question was as to whether the hardship clause would apply in a case of that kind.

Mr. ABBOTT: It does not sound like a case in which it would, no.

Mr. HARKNESS: Secondly, I should like to know whether there is any provision, so far as the income tax law is concerned, whereby this man can get relief. Can the minister answer that?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, would answer that. It has not much to do with this resolution.

Mr. HARKNESS: I think it has.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask a question about the other side of the picture, where the income taxpayer pays too much. I have here a letter from a taxpayer advising me that, through an error in making out his assessments in 1942, 1943 and 1944, he used tables which applied to a single man. He is a married man with a child, and the result is that he has overpaid to the extent of $300. He has asked me to find out if he has any redress, or if he will be able to get the overpayment back again.

I might add that in my own case I have overpaid two or three times, and I must congratulate the department upon its accuracy. They looked over my assessment carefully, and where I overpaid they sent me a cheque for the amount I had overpaid, or stated that I could deduct it from next year's payment.

Mr. McCANN: The case to which the hon. member for Davenport has referred is one where the person in question can ask for a re-assessment. If it is not barred by statute his application would be granted.

Mr. HAZEN: In support of the second part of this resolution which deals with an increased rate of interest on overdue taxes and provides an increased penalty, the minister has told us that the purpose of the resolution is to prevent under-payment where payment is due. He mentioned a class of persons who, he says, when April 30 comes around, decide to spend their money to buy automobiles or for some reason other than paying their taxes. He says these people do not pay the full amount of their tax when they file their returns. There may be some people like that, but there is another class of people, the people who from year to year endeavour as best they can to rake up the money with which to pay their taxes when they become due. However, a man may meet with a misfortune. For example, his child or his wife may go insane. He may not live in the central part of Canada where he can get the best of medical treatment, and therefore he must bring his wife or child to Montreal or Toronto or some other place where specialists are available. He may have to go to much more expense than he can really afford. It seems to me that his first duty is to his family and not to the government. He must spend the money upon those in whom he is interested in order that they may have the necessary treatment. Then a man may have his property destroyed or meet with some other misfortune.

These people do not fail to pay because they do not want to pay; they do not pay because they need the money for some other purposes. It seems to me that they are entitled to consideration. This may be a minor class, the same as those who want to buy an automobile.

As the minister knows, these returns are usually changed in some particular from year to year. It is difficult to make out a return correctly, but the average man attempts to do it. He computes what he owes and then he pays it. That is really a difficult task for the ordinary citizen. Then, after some considerable period of time he is informed that he has not paid sufficient taxes and this excessive rate of interest is imposed. These people should be protected and, in order to protect them, I am going to move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops:

> That the resolution be amended by adding to clause 2 the following words:
> "That the said rates shall become payable only from and after the date notice of assessment has been sent to the taxpayer by registered mail."

Mr. ABBOTT: Obviously I must take the same legal objection to this amendment as I did to the other. The effect of the amendment would be that any obligation of a taxpayer for payment of taxes to the crown would bear no interest until such time as the notice of assessment was mailed to the taxpayer. I think it will be recognized that it would be physically impossible for any income tax department to get notices of assessment out to the great majority of taxpayers within less than two or three months, even at the best. In the interim the taxpayer would have the free use of money owed to the government for that period, whatever it might be. I think this amendment is, beyond question, one that affects the balance of ways and means and is therefore out of order.

Mr. FULTON: While the government is responsible for ways and means, the house has the fullest freedom to criticize it, and that freedom can be exercised by way of a motion to reduce the amount of taxation. Earlier this afternoon Your Honour read the first part of citation 497, to be found on page 182 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, but I should like to read the second part of that citation, which is as follows:

> But the house enjoys complete freedom to make every representation possible to the government with regard to the manner in which the ministers discharge this responsibility. This duty the members may perform by moving amendments to reduce the taxes proposed by the administration.

Although this actually does not reduce the tax, it reduces a proposed increase in penalty, and I submit that it falls within the same paragraph.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to read citation 511 of Beauchesne, second edition, which is as follows:

> Each resolution can only be dealt with by being agreed to, reduced, negatived, superseded, or, by leave, withdrawn . . .

Mr. KNOWLES: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I hope that one can speak to these points of order without being tied down to the substance of the amendment before the committee. But I feel that we should be consistent, in what we do in the house and in this committee. I am interested in this amendment, and I am particularly interested in how far a private member can go. I would remind you, sir, that on another occasion this session when some one in this group—it may have been myself—moved an amendment to cut out one of the taxes in Bill No. 3, it was ruled out of order.

Later on, having had my attention drawn to the citation that I intend to refer to now, I moved an amendment that a certain tax be cut out but that another one be put in its place so as to preserve the balance of ways and means. The chairman allowed that amendment as being in order. In other words, it substituted an alternative tax and kept the balance of ways and means.

The citation on the basis of which the second amendment to which I have referred was allowed, whereas the first one was not allowed, is citation 500 in Beauchesne, third edition, to be found a little further down on the page from which the hon. member for Kamloops was reading. He draws attention to the fact that you, Mr. Chairman, a while ago had read only part of citation 497 and he then went on to read the rest. I am going to go a little further and read citation 500. Before we get through, we shall have read the whole book. Citation 500 reads:

Though it is the function of the committee of ways and means to impose rather than to repeal taxes, example of the repeal of taxation effected in this committee are to be found upon the journals. Proposals for the variation or modification of taxation can therefore be made in the committee; but these proposals must be grafted upon the financial scheme submitted by the government, and must not affect the balance of ways and means voted for the service of the year. Amendments, therefore, can be proposed to substitute another tax, of equivalent amount, for that proposed by the government, as, for instance, a proposal to substitute probate and legacy duty on real property as an alternative for an inhabited house duty, the necessity of new taxation, to that extent, being already declared on behalf of the crown.

The point I am making is that, on the basis in citation 500 and in line with what was done in committee of ways and means when we were considering Bill No. 3, this amendment, which merely strikes out a tax or a source of revenue and offers no alternative, is hardly in order. If the hon. member had moved some alternative tax so as to maintain the balance of ways and means, I think, Mr. Chairman, you would have a difficult time ruling it out of order.

Mr. FULTON: Mr. Chairman, if I may—

The CHAIRMAN: Before the hon. member for Kamloops speaks, I should like to assure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and all other hon. members that it is never my wish to rule any amendment out of order. All I wish to do is to see that the rules of the house are observed.

Mr. FULTON: Dealing further with the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I do not think he read far enough. The point at issue is this. This is not a tax the repeal of which we are suggesting. What we ask in this amendment is that the penalty be not increased. I have read in support of our contention that our amendment is in order, citation 497 of Beauchesne. I now read citation 502:

A private member may move that certain specified taxes be readjusted and that the scope of tax exemptions be enlarged.

Mr. KNOWLES: You told me it was not a tax.

Mr. FULTON: I have read, in answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that it is not always necessary to move something in addition so that the balance of ways and means may be preserved.

Mr. KNOWLES: But the hon. member for Kamloops just said that this is not a tax.

The CHAIRMAN: I thank hon. members for going into this matter so carefully. As I said previously, I like to hear the opinions of members of the committee before I make my ruling. I find, though, that when I do so a number of members of the committee call out: "Make your ruling." However, in spite of that, I usually listen to members, but I must decide when I have heard sufficient representations, and I think on this point I have heard sufficient representations. May I remind the members that we are in committee of ways and means and that this committee is now considering resolutions on which money bills will be based and which are a part of the financial proposals of the government. Those resolutions have now been presented to the committee. Amendments must not be such that they will disturb or interfere with the financial scheme of the government. The amendment which has been moved obviously would affect the moneys coming to the government; it may be to only a slight extent, but in any event it would disturb the balance of ways and means at least slightly. Therefore, in accordance with the citations which have been read, I must rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. FERGUSON: Speaking as a private citizen, as a businessman, not a lawyer, and as a member of the House of Commons; speaking on behalf of what the C.C.F. would like to believe is the big man; speaking on behalf of all the citizens of Canada, both big and small, for they are the ones who sent us here, I think we should make more rapid progress if the Minister of Finance would turn the screw on the man who is trying to gyp the government.

But that is not the attitude we should take regarding the taxpayers of Canada in general. I do not believe that the majority of our citizens are trying to hurt the government or to use the government's money. I believe that what we are trying to arrive at is an over-all picture of a fair rate of interest during a period when interest rates are low, and I believe that five per cent, which is definitely the prevailing rate of interest today, would be adequate. Holders of government bonds are receiving only three per cent, and municipalities are selling their debentures at 2½ and two per cent, so I believe that five per cent under the circumstances would be adequate. If the minister would reconsider this, he could solve the difficulty by making the interest rate five per cent. That would be doing a service not only to the little man but to my friends whom the C.C.F. would call the big men, men who have been successful in business in this dominion. They are just as much entitled to consideration as the little man.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I just reply to the hon. member by wishing him today a happy birthday.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not want to intrude myself into this. As a matter of fact, I think that if members of the house had read what I should call McCann's book on income tax for the benefit of farmers, many of their difficulties would be answered. That 44-page booklet answers everything, and at the end of it the farmer finds himself in the position of wondering just what will happen to him. He asks himself: If I die who will make out my income tax return?

Mr. McCANN: Do you mean the farmer or me?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am just congratulating the minister on that 44-page masterpiece which his department has put out, but he does not seem to take my congratulations in the spirit in which they were intended, but rather truculently. As a matter of fact, the Minister of Agriculture also had something to say in regard to taxation of the farmers.

Mr. GARDINER: But not about the book.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But about the results from the book. I would ask the minister this question. Have his advisers informed him that, by raising the interest rates from four to six per cent and from seven to eight per cent, there will be less evasion or less delay than there is today? What is the real reason for these arbitrary figures? Why were they fixed at these rates?

Mr. ABBOTT: The rate used to be eight per cent instead of the six per cent we are now proposing. Following discussions which took place in the house, it was decided two or three years ago that eight per cent was excessive and we lowered the rate to four per cent. The indications are that the lowering of that rate has resulted in a greater deferment of payment of tax than existed before. It is, of course, hard to pin that down. The arrears may be due to the fact that there are more taxpayers and more taxes due. Nevertheless, there is a greater amount of taxes not paid on the due date, and my advisers believe that the four per cent rate may have had something to do with that, because it was easy to borrow the tax money until the assessment could be made and notice of the assessment sent out. I dare say that all of us at some time or another have got a little bit behind in our taxes. I know that on occasions I have had to go to the bank and borrow money to make my tax payment. That is the only answer I can give to my hon. friend. This was not aimed at any particular group. Obviously the salaried man or wage earner, as the senior member for Halifax has pointed out, has not much chance to get behind in his payments because they are deducted at the source. The man who does have the opportunity is the professional man, the lawyer, the doctor, the businessman, the corporation and so on. I think it is fair to say that experience has shown that the low rate of four per cent has, to some extent, encouraged the deferment of payment of taxes which are due.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am not going to take up any time, but I believe that the Minister of National Revenue is today engaged in a definite campaign to secure payment on a widespread scale from farmers throughout the country. The campaign in the western provinces has been very direct. Numbers of individuals working for the department are going from farm to farm, and going back over the records of farmers for a period of several years. As a matter of fact, I think this additional penalty will in the main fall on farmers who, over the years, may not have been paying taxes because they did not have the returns that made possible the payment of taxes. They now find themselves in the position of having a careful examination made of their records. In the main they are the ones who will be penalized as a result of this change.

Mr. ABBOTT: This will not apply to them, because the four per cent rate would apply to taxes for 1947. The four per cent rate applies to previous years; it is not retroactive.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I appreciate that, but the fact remains that a definite campaign is on today. I think the minister would be frank to admit that, since assuming the position of minister, he has placed in the field a considerable number of officials who are doing everything possible to secure payment of income tax from farmers on every hand. There is no use in making representations to the minister in this connection, but I feel that the addition of this extra amount will add a still greater weight upon those people who, over the years, have not made payments because farming conditions were not what they should be. Today they are finding it very difficult to fill out the forms, and as a result of the delay they will find themselves penalized once more by an additional amount. I hoped that the minister would have adopted the suggestion that there be no increase.

I was particularly impressed with the suggestion of the hon. member for Simcoe North that the bank rate be charged. However, the minister takes the stand that he will not do that. There is very little use in doing anything other than recording one's objection. Once more I point out that in the ultimate result it will, in the main, fall on farmers throughout this country who are today being forced to pay income tax generally in all provinces.

Mr. FAIR: There was one thing that the hon. member for Lake Centre left unsaid, namely, that a very large percentage of the farmer's income tax has been collected by the government through low prices being fixed for the products which he raises. That should have been stated by the hon. member for Lake Centre. Because he forgot about it, I am saying it now. The farmer has paid many many times the income tax he should pay by receiving much less than he should have received for the products which he grows.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I do not know why the hon. member for Lake Centre did not raise that question. It may have been because he thought it was out of order. I rather think a discussion along these lines would be out of order. May I ask hon. members to confine their remarks to the resolution under consideration.

Mr. ADAMSON: I want to correct an impression that seems to be in the minds of certain hon. members in the committee, that there was something ethically wrong or dishonest in the under-payment of taxes in order to utilize the money for some other purpose. The minister is imposing this extra interest because he wants the government to have the use of the money, and is making it a little less advantageous for the individual taxpayer to retain the money and make an under-payment of his taxes. I see his point, but I thought I should correct the impression that he is correcting an evil or something that is ethically wrong. This amendment does not do that; it merely makes it less advantageous for the individual to withhold his tax payment.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is quite right.

Mr. STEPHENSON: I have one further question I should like to ask the minister. It has to do with exemption for children going to university. Some have claimed it after the children have reached the age of twenty-one years, but they have had to pay the taxes. The question has come up several times. It is one that should be considered by the government in this way. Owing to the curriculum that is followed in the schools today, it is impossible for children who are taking a Bachelor of Arts honour course, or medicine in particular, to get through the university at the age of twenty-one years. They are just as much a charge on the parent at twenty-four or twenty-five years of age as they are at twenty-one.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. STEPHENSON: My point is well taken, because persons have claimed exemption on that ground, and they have had to pay the extra tax. Would any consideration be given to children attending a university who can supply a voucher that they are doing so until they have finished their various courses?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have dealt with this question each year on budget resolution to my certain knowledge for at least the last four years. I have given at length the reasons why it is felt that it is not justified to contribute out of tax money to the education of children at university. Since my hon. friend has made his little speech, I suppose I had better answer it again. The reason behind it is this. An exemption of $300 is allowed for children attending school or university up to twenty-one years. The normal exemption expires at eighteen. It is assumed that their ordinary arts course will be about finished by that time if they matriculate at seventeen. It may be true that some do not, but certainly it should not be the responsibility of the state to subsidize—because that is what it would be—the cost of university education, the post-graduate education or otherwise of these students. Suppose the average person sending children to college has an income of $4,000. The value of the amount of $300 exemption may be in the order of $45 or $50. The sum of $45 or $50 deduction is something, but it is not a substantial contribution toward the cost of sending that particular young person to the university. I think some other way must be found, if assistance is to be given for university courses, than a tax exemption. Anyway, that is the reasoning which lies behind the cut-off date at twenty-one years of age. I have given this reason year after year. That is the reason why the exemption stops at that point. Perhaps my heart or that of some other minister of finance may soften at a later day.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. member kindly resume his seat? I have allowed this discussion, since I was under the impression that the point was whether or not this tax should be charged against those who did not pay the full income tax because they thought there was an exemption for children going to university. I cannot allow the discussion to continue on that point. Does the resolution carry?

Mr. McLURE: I have sat here for two hours and forty minutes and did not rise to take part in the discussion. I do not think I should allow the opportunity to go by without saying something. I learned something from this discussion, though, and from the decision of the chairman. I learned that taxes and penalty are the same thing in the eyes of the government. They say that, according to the ruling, this was put in for income purposes and not as a penalty. I thought it was a penalty, but now it is worse than ever because the rate of interest charged is fifty per cent higher than it was in other years. It is from four per cent to six per cent.

Mr. ABBOTT: It used to be eight per cent.

Mr. McLURE: It was only six per cent. You have raised it from four per cent to six per cent, which is a fifty per cent increase. The purpose is to bring in more income to make still greater this huge surplus that has been boasted about. There is another side to it. While it is a splendid thing to be boasting about this great surplus, I suggest that if the minister's ear were to the ground he would have found that not only was this the greatest surplus in all the history of Canada but also that the cost of living today is the highest in the annals of Canada or of any other country.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. McLURE: I come now to the reflection that has been made against those who are trying to pay their taxes, and I will speak of my own constituency. The people there are trying to pay their taxes, which perhaps are not quite as high, in proportion, as taxes paid in other places, owing to the absence of wealth on the same scale. However, the people there are being dogged, one might say, by tax collectors, letters and bills, especially the people in the low-income brackets. They are quite willing to pay, but they cannot get the money at the present time, and now the department comes to them and says: There is no redress for you; we are going to whip you with the lash of scorpions and charge you fifty per cent more interest if you don't come across and pay in 1947-48.

I do not think the Minister of Finance was responsible for putting that provision in there, increasing it from four per cent to six per cent. I believe some undue influence was brought to bear.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, he was all in favour of it.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. McLURE: I did not think he would be as hard as that on the people. I suggest to him now that this item should stand until he has given it further consideration, and possibly tomorrow he will propose that it be put back where it should be.

Resolution agreed to.

3. That special deductions from income or taxes be allowed to taxpayers engaged in exploring or drilling for natural gas, oil or minerals in respect of expenses incurred in 1949 operations on the same basis as the deductions allowed in respect of 1948 operations.

Mr. PROBE: What is the nature of these deductions?

Mr. ABBOTT: They are exactly the same as those that have been made for the last two or three years. They are made, as my hon. friend knows, for the purpose of encouraging the development of natural resources and particularly having regard to the desirability of increasing the development of such products as oil and petroleum, which for exchange and other reasons we are anxious to have in this country. The deductions are these. First, they are allowed a write off on off-property expenses for exploration purposes, which under ordinary circumstances, under ordinary rules, would be capital expenditures. They are allowed to charge these against profit and loss account.

Mr. ADAMSON: In toto.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. That rule is general for mines, oil and gas wells. In the case of what are known as deep-test wells—and incidentally these have to be certified as such by the Department of Mines and Resources,—the taxpayer is allowed credit, in addition to what I have stated, of thirty per cent of the cost of such deep-test wells against his tax liability on other operations.

Mr. PROBE: I am not quarreling at the moment with the fact that there is a deduction with the object of encouraging the exploitation of natural resources. However, the minister has not indicated whether we should interpret this resolution as suggesting that there is a comparable deduction for people who do drilling of other types required in primary production. I suppose the minister would say it is only with respect to drilling for natural gas, oil and minerals that this deduction could apply. As he knows, every year, at any rate since I have been in the House of Commons, a request has been made of the Minister of Finance for something corresponding to this type of deduction in favour of people who drill for water. This is a matter of importance to the people in the area which I represent. In the Regina district, from Regina to Weyburn, in the heavy clay lands of southern Saskatchewan, the trend away from horse-drawn vehicles, and the tendency to get away from the raising of livestock, is, in my opinion, due in some measure to the cost of the deep wells that are necessary to provide water.

There has been some provision of surface water through various agencies provided by the Minister of Agriculture, but these are not a certain source of water supply and the farmers must drill deep wells down to 600, 800 and even several thousand feet. As a matter of fact, in the city of Regina our water supply comes from deep-bored wells. The city of Regina is not interested in this item, but rural residents of my area are, because if there is to be a reduction from income tax for the exploitation of natural resources by means of drilling, it would seem to me that drilling for the purpose of guaranteeing the production of primary necessities such as farm products and livestock, and the retention of livestock on the farms, should be taken into consideration and a proper deduction made from income tax, comparable with the deduction that is indicated in resolution 3.

Could the minister give some indication as to why there is that cut-off as between the exploitation of natural resources, of the type set out here, and the exploitation of primary products on the farm?

Mr. ABBOTT: This is not really in connection with the exploitation of natural resources. It is a form of incentive to encourage the expenditure of money to discover new sources of a particularly valuable product such as petroleum, in which the country is sadly deficient.

Mr. PROBE: We are also sadly deficient in water.

Mr. ABBOTT: But we do not have to import water from the United States, whereas we import petroleum products. This is a special type of legislation and that is why we continue it from year to year. The committee might be interested in the results obtained to date. These are deep-test wells, which are expensive operations:

Number of wells approved	32
Number of wells completed	28
Footage drilled for completed wells	226,260
Estimated footage for uncompleted wells	36,150
Number of successful wells	2

This last includes Imperial Woodbend No. 1, which came in this year as a crude oil producer, and Pincher Creek No. 1, which came in as a major wet gas producer but is being deepened in an endeavour to strike crude oil.

Estimated cost of completed wells .. $6,675,000

So it is clear that, unless something more happens, the fact is that, although people have put their own money into sinking these wells and tax credit has been given, results have not yet been produced. But it is done on a year to year basis. I do not think one could go into a large-scale system of assistance by tax credits for all types of natural products. I believe everyone is anxious to try to develop petroleum in this country particularly, because it is so essential to the economy of any modern country. When one must buy from outside the country, it involves exchange difficulties and the like. That is the reason why this special incentive legislation was brought in some years ago and has been continued from year to year. I personally am not yet convinced that it should be a permanent part of one's tax structure.

Mr. PROBE: I agree that there should be an incentive in some form—although I am not saying that this is the proper form—for the finding, exploration and exploitation of what natural resources we may have. That is commendable, although I see by the minister's own figures that he must have given a tax rebate of some $2,000,000, roughly, on those two producing wells we now have.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes; over $4,000,000 has been spent and with little result so far.

Mr. PROBE: Yes. I am conceding that. But the saving in foreign exchange is not the primary motive, because, as the minister says, this form of tax rebate started some years ago. Boring generally of an exploratory or prospecting nature is being given tax credits. There is not uniform treatment with regard to our farming communities, where people must bore expensive and deep wells as compared with others. It so happens that where I farmed as a young lad we could get water at sixteen feet to twenty feet from the surface. But that is not true of the Regina district; and there is no compensation to the farmer comparable with this provision.

Mr. HARKNESS: To begin with, I should like to point out, for the benefit of the hon. member for Regina City, that there is no benefit to any oil company from these so-called special deductions, unless they have sufficient income from other wells or other sources so that they can deduct what would otherwise be a loss from the profit.

Mr. PROBE: I am arguing only against the restrictive feature of this clause.

Mr. HARKNESS: In other words, drilling an oil well is not comparable with drilling a well on a farm. I am certainly not going to talk against giving aid with respect to the drilling of wells on farms. But I should like to point out that the two things are not on a comparable basis.

Mr. PROBE: As the clause stands, exemptions for oil and water drilling are not comparable. I am not arguing your point with respect to oil.

Mr. HARKNESS: The point is that there is just no relation between the two things. For example, a company which owns a quarter of a section of land, drills a well on it and finds that the well is dry, gets no benefit from this whatsoever.

Mr. PROBE: No.

Mr. HARKNESS: Absolutely none. On the other hand, if a company has three wells which are producing oil and another one which is dry, they can get benefits under these clauses. In the last three years I have been urging—sometimes in strong language—the Minister of Finance to improve the so-called special deductions from income tax and so forth, in order to encourage the production of crude oil in this country. I am sorry to say that my representations up to date seem to have had no effect. I shall not repeat them at the present moment, inasmuch as I summarized them again this year in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

However, I should like to ask the minister this question, first of all. What consideration has been given to making these so-called special deductions a part of the permanent tax structure? The oil people have been asking for that to be done for five or six years, at any rate, so that they would always be in a position to know what the situation was likely to be for the coming year. As it is now, they do not know whether or not they will have, in the following year, these deductions or this particular treatment with regard to taxation. That fact creates uncertainty. It reduces the amount of drilling which might go on. If for any reason the minister wants to change the tax structure, he can do so here in the house at the time he brings down his budget. I can see no reason in the world why these so-called special deductions and so forth should not be a part of the permanent tax structure of the country. Then the oil men would know where they stood. There would be a greater feeling of permanence among them with regard to their operations, and there would be more confidence. Before I go further, would the minister tell me what consideration has been given to doing as I have suggested?

Mr. ABBOTT: Some consideration has been given; as a matter of fact, a good deal of consideration has been given to whether it would be appropriate to make this a more or less permanent feature of our tax structure. But I felt that it was of such a special character that it should not yet be done. By the introduction of this legislation now, and the announcement that it will be in effect for 1949, those who are contemplating drilling are given a good long notice. They have, one might say, eighteen months at any rate. They could start a well now and have the full year of 1949 to do it in. Possibly at some later day—

Mr. HARKNESS: If the minister will excuse me for interrupting, I might point out that next February they will not have anything like that notice, or next March. In other words, they do not have it until the budget comes down. Just before the budget comes down they have a relatively short period in which they do not know what the situation is.

Mr. ABBOTT: They know now. We are saying now that throughout 1949 this will be available. Under ordinary circumstances, budgets are brought down some time before the middle of the year and as nearly as possible in March or April, because that is the time at which the estimates are prepared and at which it is possible to prepare a budget. They would have at least seven or eight months before the end of 1949 to know whether the deduction would be available for 1950. I have not had any serious complaint, from those who are interested in this deduction, that there was not sufficient notice given to enable them to take advantage of it if they desired to do so. I have not felt that it is desirable yet to incorporate this as a permanent part of the tax structure.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: We are considering the Income War Tax Act resolutions, and had been discussing resolution 3.

Mr. HARKNESS: When the committee rose at six o'clock I was on the point of asking the minister, through you, Mr. Chairman, as to the regulations in effect so far as deep-test well tax deductions are concerned, and as to the depth to which it is necessary to drill in order to obtain that concession. I was interested to hear that the Woodbend well of Imperial was one which came under that provision. I wanted to know how far to the east a man could drill and still come under that provision.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that I can give my hon. friend an answer at once. As he is aware, the question as to whether a deep-test well is one which qualifies under the provisions of the resolution is determined by the Department of Mines and Resources. My understanding is that the geologists or other officials of that department consider the circumstances in a particular case and approve, or otherwise, a particular project as a deep-test well qualifying under the legislation. However I cannot say as to what the depth is. I shall get the information and give it to the hon. member later this evening.

Mr. HARKNESS: As the minister said at the beginning of this discussion, this is incentive legislation. I should like to make again the point I have made on several occasions before, namely, that it does not provide sufficient incentive. I would ask the minister once more to consider the various requests made to extend the deduction in various ways, that is in respect of deep-test drawback, depletion allowance and the like, so as to provide increased incentive to people to drill oil wells. I believe it is agreed by all that one of the things we need in Canada more than anything else at the present time is an increased production of crude oil, so as to make ourselves independent in respect of that important resource, particularly in view of the current shortage in the United States, which has been our chief source of supply. I suggest that this whole matter of incentive provided to people to drill oil wells might very well be reviewed, with a view to improving the legislation and increasing the incentive.

Mr. LOW: I agree with what has been said by the minister in connection with resolution 3. I believe he has accomplished many things by placing this provision in the act, and making it applicable to gas and oil wells. I was interested this afternoon, however, to hear what the hon. member for Regina City had to say, although I know his remarks may not have come strictly within this resolution.

In many sections of Canada, particularly in southern Saskatchewan and in areas such as the northern Peace river district the farmers do have to spend considerable sums of money to obtain water. Many times they have to go down 4,000 or 5,000 feet in order to get an ample supply. While I am satisfied that special legislation should not be passed, such as that which has been passed to induce exploration and discovery in connection with oil and gas, yet some provision should be made for a more liberal allowance as an exemption from income tax, so that a farmer could take care of that capital cost over a period of years. It is a costly process in many instances to get water in these areas.

Mr. BRYCE: I am sorry I was not able to be in the house this afternoon, and because of that I may have lost contact with what has been said about obtaining water, the subject to which the hon. member for Peace River has referred. I have run up against that difficulty, myself, in connection with boring a well. My well cost me about $700. I thought it would be only fair that I should be allowed to take that off my income tax over a period of years. It is something that is useful for a long time.

I hope the minister will give this matter consideration. I do not wish to discuss it in further detail, however, because I do not know what has already been said. Perhaps I should ask to be excused for butting in at this time. I think, however, it is something to which the department should give consideration.

Mr. ABBOTT: The matter was discussed at some length. The hon. member for Regina City pointed out that the drilling of wells for water in certain sections of Canada, particularly his own section, involved a very considerable capital expenditure, because they have to go down to great depths.

Hon. members in the committee will realize that this question of capital expenditures in connection with the drilling of wells for water, or other things, is a broad one. I have taken careful note of the representations made. Perhaps I should say to the committee that it involves an important principle, namely the distinction between capital expenditures and expenditures for revenue. Obviously these expenditures made for deep-test oil wells are capital expenditures, and they are so recognized in this legislation. This special tax concession, or whatever one cares to call it, is a special type of legislation to encourage this particular type of search for petroleum. I have serious doubts as to whether one can employ that general principle in connection with capital expenditures in drilling for water or other things. The matter has been brought to my attention, however, and I shall consider it.

Mr. BRYCE: You cannot get milk without water.

Mr. HARKNESS: I was going to say something about water. Can the minister say whether a well bored on a farm, from which a man gets water, can be depreciated. I have an idea that it can be, but I am not sure. I believe it is two or three per cent a year.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know what the rate would be; but a capital expenditure of that kind, creating a capital asset, could of course, be depreciated in accordance with the appropriate rules for that type of asset.

Mr. LOW: I think it is provided at five per cent.

Mr. HARKNESS: There is just this further point in connection with the matter. I have upstairs a letter from a man who complains that he spent about $1,200 in drilling a well for water, and that he failed to get water. He had to go ahead and drill another one. He was not complaining about the second well from which he got the water, but he did complain bitterly when he was not allowed anything in respect of income tax in connection with the dry well. He was of the opinion that the expense he had in drilling that dry hole should have been considered for income tax purposes, and that he should either be able to depreciate it over a period of years, or be allowed it as a straight expense. Could the minister give us any information or tell us what might be done in those circumstances.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I cannot do that offhand. I could not give a definite answer. This question, of course, as to what is a capital expenditure, and what proportion of it can be charged to current income, is one of the most difficult and complex parts of any income tax law. In the revision of the old act and the preparation of the new this one thing has perhaps given us more difficulty than almost any other. I certainly would not want to hazard any offhand opinion here in committee as to what rule should be followed.

Speaking generally, the rule is that a man has a right to depreciate capital assets over the earning life of the capital asset. Depreciation is allowed at varying rates on varying types of asset. Whether a dry water-hole could be written off in the same way as off-property exploration for oil I would not undertake to answer offhand.

Mr. HARKNESS: If you get water you can depreciate on the basis of the tubing you put in and so forth. I think that is the basis upon which it is worked. You can write off a certain amount of depreciation, but apparently you cannot charge a hole that is dry as an expense for income tax purposes. It is just a dead loss, and this does not seem fair.

Mr. ABBOTT: That may be. I do not know offhand just on what basis one could justify a deduction from income tax, which means a deduction from federal revenues, for an unproductive capital expenditure. If you accepted that principle I think you would have to expand it to a much wider field than the drilling of wells where you do not find water. The general principle on which depreciation is allowed is that you depreciate on the cost of a productive asset. The theory is that you take something which is a wasting asset, and you are entitled to get your capital back and not pay a tax on income for something that is not income. In a good many cases people make capital expenditures which are unproductive; risk capital is ventured in things which do not produce results. The fellow who risks it has to take his loss.

Mr. HARKNESS: Drilling a well on a farm does not come under that.

Mr. BENTLEY: Let me tell the minister a thing or two. He said that he would not like to give an answer offhand, but it should not be necessary to give an answer offhand. For at least three years the united farmers of Canada and the Alberta farmers' union have been submitting briefs along this line. They should have given the minister and his predecessor and the departmental officials an opportunity to discuss this matter among themselves and to have a reply ready.

I leave that for the moment. The minister has said that venture capital put into the digging of a well that turns out to be unproductive is a difficult thing to allow for purposes of taxation. Granted that it is, but by this resolution we are giving exactly that privilege in connection with exploration for oil. If you strike oil you usually strike something that is productive for a long while. That oil will be used to operate cars and machinery and do many other things. That may be used to operate cars and machinery and do many other things. That may be much more spectacular than the pail of water which goes into a cow or a horse, but we must not forget that if you strike all the oil in the world and do not have enough water your oil will not do you much good.

You have to have beef to move around in your trucks that are being operated by your gasoline. You have to have many other things to be used in a similar way. When a man puts capital into digging a well and gets a dry hole it is a serious matter. Anyone who knows anything about farming knows how difficult it is to haul water in a tank for long distances. It is an expensive and arduous farming operation, one that must be carried on in both winter and summer.

We need stock in this country. The farmers can only do what the oil people do, survey their land and get an expert with a willow or some other fellow to try to find water the best way he can. Even with all the advice or experts they can get, they sometimes do not get any water after drilling many hundreds of feet. It cost a lot of money to do that. If there is no water it means that they have either to return to the old method of tanking or else to try again. Eventually it may mean the difference between a prosperous farm, one that is just barely getting by, or one that is actually going in the hole.

If the minister is not prepared to give an answer tonight I suggest that he give serious study to the submissions made last year, the year before and, I think, the year before that by the farm organizations and to the representations made here tonight.

Mr. ADAMSON: I should like to say a brief word about this. First, there is probably nothing that is more important to Canada today than the development of a real oil field. We have indications of an oil field in Alberta that may possibly become a major field. This is the first time in our history that such a statement can be made. The oil is apparently a heavy type crude, which would seem to indicate a large reservoir of oil. Great possibilities open up for that part of Canada, and when I say that I ask the committee to think of the effect on the whole of Canada. If we can develop a major oil field a great part of our dollar difficulties as well as those facing our whole economy can be solved, because we shall be able to produce the essential fuel to drive the machinery of this country and to utilize the petroleum industry in a way we have never been able to do before.

I am entirely in favour of this resolution. I should have liked to have it made a permanent part of our tax law. We have the indication, and it is certainly the hope that a major field at Leduc will be developed. As yet we cannot say that is the case, but it is encouraging. The development of a major oil field takes usually a matter of years, not just one or two. That is so, despite the surprising successes recently in Texas and in California in previous years. The development of an oil field represents hundreds of millions of dollars of venture capital. I say that advisedly, because that is what it has cost to develop major oil fields throughout the world.

I want to suggest to the minister and to the committee that those who, in the years to come, will make available the venture capital which we hope and pray will develop an oil field, should be given encouragement that, if they lose, they will at least be able to get back their venture capital if they are successful elsewhere. I think that is all anyone who risks capital can ask. If he loses he loses, but if he loses in one place and hits oil in another he should be able to recoup for his dry wells through the wells which are producers.

I do not think there is anything more revealing in this whole matter than the statement by the minister that up to the end of 1947, out of some thirty-two deep wells, only two have become producers; two out of thirty-two, or a proportion of one in fourteen, or just a little better than a seven per cent bet. The average depth of these wells is from 8,000 to 10,000 feet and it costs several hundred thousand dollars per well to drill. I suggest to the minister that if he intends to encourage big capital to come in and develop this country he will have to say: These are the rules, gentlemen, for a period of years, and we are not going to change them next year or the year after, so you know what the conditions will be for a period of years and you can go to bat, knowing the rules of play and the condition of the field. That is very important.

One thing more. There have been in the province of Alberta one or two most encouraging discoveries, including a discovery of brine, which I understand is second to none in the North American continent and perhaps in the world. It may be the foundation of a great chemical industry in that province. Given fuel and the possibility of a chemical industry, the dream that we have had of an industrialization of the west may possibly be realized. All the internecine and interregional difficulties that we have in Canada would be overcome if we could only build up an industrial west. I suggest that every possible encouragement should be given to anybody who explores for anything, whether he hits brine or oil or new deposits of metal or anything else. So long as he is risking his capital for the development of the natural resources of this country, the rule should be that he will not be taxed until he gets his capital back.

We have hopes of a great new nickel deposit in northern Manitoba and hopes that there may be a great new copper-zinc development in that same area; development here too should be pushed. Our troubles are troubles of regionalism and sectionalism, and if we can only encourage the development of these areas in which people now hesitate to risk capital because of the uncertain taxation future, we shall indeed make Canada a union, instead of having a split country comprising the central provinces, the west, and the maritimes. Therefore I suggest to the minister that every possible encouragement be given to anybody who wishes to explore, whether it be for oil, brine, coal, or even for deep-test wells for water, which is so essential to farming. Anybody who is prepared to risk his capital to do something for the development of this country should get recognition under this clause.

First, I suggest that this clause should be made a permanent part of the tax law of Canada. I also suggest that it should be more embracing, to cover all those who are engaged in prospecting, now a dying profession, developing oil or gas or in speculative pioneering work for the development of any of the mineral resources of this country. Nothing is more speculative than mining or oil drilling. We had a very successful year in 1947; yet only one in fourteen of the holes drilled struck oil. I ask any hon. member of this committee, would he bet at a race track if he expected to back only one winner in fourteen?

Exploration and development for oil involve the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars and the odds in your favour are only one in fourteen. I ask the minister to grant the man who risks his capital in the development of this country the full allowance for his capital before he begins to be taxed. I think that would help to solve our problems: first of all, the development of a major oil field, and secondly, the development of a great industrial belt east of the Rocky mountains.

Resolution agreed to.

4. That, for the 1948 taxation year, no expenses in respect of the earning of wages or salary may be deducted except where a taxpayer is an employee of a person whose principal business is transport and his duties require him to be absent from his home regularly, in which case expenses for board and lodging may be deducted, and where a taxpayer is employed to sell property or negotiate contracts, is required to pay his own expenses and performs his duties away from his employer's place of business, in which case expenses may be deducted from commissions or other fees; and . . .

Mr. FLEMING: The effect of this resolution is confined to those whose income consists of wages or salaries earned.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps my hon. friend would allow me to make a brief explanation.

Mr. FLEMING: Perhaps the minister would cover these two points in his explanation: first, whether the definition of wages and salaries will include commissions. The other point has to do with the position of railway pullman conductors and others of the running trades who have to lie over. There have been several rulings by the Department of National Revenue dealing with these cases, and at the present time the ruling is, I think, to the satisfaction of the running trades. I should not like to see anything come out of this resolution to impair the position enjoyed by the running trades under the existing ruling.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am glad that my hon. friend has brought up that point. The main purpose of this resolution is to make statutory the provision in the Income War Tax Act with respect to the deduction of travelling and other expenses from salaries and wages received by railway employees. The general rule of the Income War Tax Act for years has been that salaries and wages as such are net income, but an exception has existed to that rule since away back in the early 1920's with regard to certain railway employees who were paid on a mileage basis.

Mr. KNOWLES: Or on an hourly basis.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. By a ruling, that was extended last year to other groups of railway employees doing similar work such as parlour-car conductors, pullman attendants and so on. It seemed equitable to extend the provision to those who are engaged in the transportation industry. Those who were engaged in that industry, railway conductors and drivers of buses, for example, have to leave their home at a given day and go, let us say, from Montreal to Toronto and stay there overnight. They have to pay for their board and lodging overnight, and come back to their homes the next day. The same thing applies to pullman conductors and parlour-car conductors. I suppose the same thing applies to men operating buses.

Mr. BENTLEY: Does it include truck drivers?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, transport drivers. The effect of the proposed amendment is to give statutory recognition to what has been recognized in the last year or so by an administrative ruling of the Department of National Revenue. It is being restricted, as I say, to people who are engaged in that type of activity. It is being done, because it has been recognized in the case of these workers over a great many years that this is a proper type of allowance. In a good many other cases it can be charged as an expense, or it will be paid for by the employer and charged as an expense by him. In certain other cases it is included in the wage scale, but in the case of railway workers that wage scale or salary scale has become pretty well fixed by tradition, and does not include any provision for board and lodging expenses of this kind. That is the purpose of this proposed amendment. I cannot recall whether my hon. friend had any other question.

Mr. KNOWLES: Before the minister leaves the point of railway workers, will he answer one or two more points for clarification? He spoke of the line that was drawn until perhaps a year and a half ago between railroad train conductors on the one hand and sleeping-car conductors on the other. I take it that it is now quite clear and statutory that sleeping-car conductors get the same benefit as train conductors. There was one other group that was always a problem, namely the sleeping-car porter.

Mr. ABBOTT: They are included. The proposed legislation which will be based on this resolution covers workers engaged in that industry. It will cover such people as porters, sleeping-car conductors, travelling telegraphers who have to be sent away overnight for purposes of relief and so on. It covers those engaged in this particular field because of two things: first, because of the nature of their work, and, second, because of the particular wage structure in that occupation.

The second point which the hon. member for Eglinton referred to had to do with the question of commissions. This will allow a deduction from gross commissions of expenses incurred in earning those commissions, if the nature of the commission earner's salary is such as to require him to pay his own expenses and perform his duties away from his employer's place of business. In that case expenses may be deducted from the commissions or other fees. It seemed reasonable that that should be done. It could not be deducted, of course, from salary; it could only be deducted from the portion of his remuneration which was based on commissions.

Mr. JACKMAN: Why do you put this in statutory form?

Mr. FLEMING: I am glad that the minister is taking the action proposed with reference to pullman conductors and others. I wonder if he will just clarify one point. He has indicated that the administrative ruling which was made about a year ago is to be given statutory effect by the resolution. I should like to be sure that there will not be any conditions introduced in the statute that would narrow the effect of the administrative ruling, because that was a good and sound ruling. In looking at the equities of the situation, I think it was fair. I may say I had some occasion to go into it, because I was acting for a number of these pullman conductors. I want to be sure that there will not be any condition attached by the statute.

Mr. ABBOTT: I agree with my hon. friend that it is fair. There will not be any conditions in the statute. I think that, under the law as it stands, there was no statutory justification for the ruling which was given. I question whether the law as it stands justifies that deduction. As I have said, this proposed amendment is to give statutory recognition to a practice which has prevailed for twenty-five years in connection with the running trades which are paid on a mileage or hourly basis. It will be extended to others who perform similar services but who are paid on a somewhat different basis. It will cover trainmen, engineers, parlour-car conductors, parlour-car porters, and others of that kind, who, in the performance of their duties, are required to be away from home overnight, but it will not apply—it never did apply—to train crew on yard engines, for instance, who are operating switching engines in the yards. I may say I discussed this matter at some length with the representatives of the railway brotherhoods, and they assured me that, in the case of yard enginemen, yard trainmen, yard foremen and so on, they were not entitled to claim deductions of this kind, and were not claiming them. It is for those whose duties require them to be away overnight in the performance of those duties. They can claim their actual expenses for board and lodging.

Mr. FLEMING: The doubt expressed by the minister as to the—

Mr. BENTLEY: Who is doing the talking, Mr. Chairman?

[Mr. Jackman.]

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Eglinton has another question.

Mr. FLEMING: A doubt has been expressed by the minister with respect to the legality of the ruling. I take it that it will not be intended on this statute coming into effect to upset the ruling which was applied in earlier years.

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, no, of course not.

Mr. BENTLEY: I want to ask the minister two questions. The questions have to do with two different parts of this resolution, and I shall ask them one at a time, if I may. The minister said that all the running trades on the railroads, also bus drivers and truck drivers who are required to be away from home are included.

Mr. ABBOTT: If they are engaged by a transport company.

Mr. BENTLEY: Yes, of course. That would apply also to air transport crews?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. BENTLEY: Does it apply to water transport crews, crews on canal boats or lake seamen, or even seamen on the salt water?

Mr. ABBOTT: No. This applies to what I might describe generally as the overnight type of employee, the man who is not away for extended periods of time. The others should be taken care of now either by the employer or by the wage scale. But there are a great many transport workers, railway employees, bus drivers, truck drivers, aeroplane pilots and so on, who have a home at a given place where they spend most of their time, but their duties are such as to require them necessarily to be away overnight at the end of their run, and they have to make an expenditure for board and lodging which, if they could go home at night, they would not have to make. For instance, it does not apply to deep-water seamen who may be away for four or five months at a time, or, to a lesser degree, to those who operate on the lakes.

Mr. BENTLEY: I thank the minister for that answer. The resolution goes on to say:

. . . and where a taxpayer is employed to sell property or negotiate contracts . . .

It almost looks as if it refers to one who is engaged in the sale of real estate. I notice that it does not say goods or merchandise. I wondered why it was worded in that way.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told by my legal advisers that property is all-inclusive there, and as a lawyer I would agree with that. It includes property movable and immovable. It is intended to describe in the resolution the sale of tangible assets; and negotiation of contracts refers to such things as arranging the sale of an insurance policy, and that sort of thing. The essence of it is that if a man is engaged on a commission basis and receives his remuneration in the form of a commission he may deduct from those gross commissions the expenses he is put to in earning them.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have one other question with respect to the other part of this resolution. The hon. member for Eglinton just asked the minister whether his doubt about the legality of the administrative order would have any continuing effect. Perhaps I should ask my question of the Minister of National Revenue. Has that administrative order been carried out in the last year and a half or the two years that it has been in effect in all parts of Canada? The reason I ask that is that one has sleeping-car conductors and sleeping-car porters speaking to him about these matters on the train. Although the men in the west learned of the provision and were able to take advantage of it, I have learned that sleeping-car conductors and porters on the trains in the east, in the city of Montreal, for example, were not allowed that deduction.

Mr. ABBOTT: I find that hard to understand, because the railway brotherhoods, after the ruling was made either last year or the year before, sent out a circular. I have a copy of it.

Mr. KNOWLES: So have I.

Mr. ABBOTT: That circular went to all their employees, and I believe my colleague will confirm me when I say that the income tax inspectors have recognized that ruling since that time.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is no doubt but it was supposed to apply to 1947.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think it applies only to 1947.

Mr. McLURE: Will the minister tell me how this provision takes care of commercial ambassadors or, as they are sometimes called, commercial travellers. They operate on a commission basis in most cases, and in some cases on the basis of salary plus commission, paying their own expenses.

Mr. ABBOTT: If the commercial traveller is exclusively on a commission basis he gets his expenses anyway, and has always got them. He is entitled to deduct his expenses. In the case of the ordinary commercial traveller who is an employee, it frequently happens that the employer pays his expenses. He goes away on a trip and keeps track of his expenses and turns them in to his employer, and when he returns, those expenses are paid. They are an expense of the employer, and not income of the employee. This relates to the independent operator, the fellow who is not engaged as an employee by anybody but operates pretty much as an independent agent on a commission basis. He is entitled, and quite properly so, to deduct his expenses. The ordinary commercial traveller who works for X company is entitled to turn in his expense account to his employer, who pays the account, and that is not part of his taxable income.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I do not suppose the minister wants this to apply to members of the House of Commons. They are in the running trade, however, because the member is required to be "absent from his home," especially those from the maritime provinces, for long periods. The language of this resolution refers to the man whose duties "require him to be absent from his home regularly, in which case expenses for board and lodging may be deducted". I wish to warn the minister that he may be involved in a legal contest in the supreme court, and therefore I should not like to see him pass this legislation too hastily.

Mr. ABBOTT: We members of parliament are engaged in all kinds of running.

Mr. KNOWLES: Many people run but do not get here.

Resolution agreed to.

5. That the 15 per cent income tax on non-resident persons be extended to apply to patronage dividends paid on or after May 19, 1948.

Mr. BURTON: Approximately how many people will be affected by this provision, and what is the estimated amount of revenue involved?

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot say; but I should think it would be small, because most members of co-operatives are residents of Canada, and consequently the patronage dividends they receive would be income in Canada. It was felt, however, that there might well be members of co-operatives who would be in receipt of patronage dividends while living outside Canada, and since patronage dividends are income in the hands of residents of Canada, it seemed appropriate that non-residents who receive them should pay the regular non-resident tax, which is at present fifteen per cent on income received from Canada. I have no information as to what the amount would be. I should think, from general knowledge, it would be pretty small. It appeared to be the logical move. Since recipients of patronage dividends in Canada include such dividends in their income for tax purposes, it seemed only proper that non-resident recipients of similar dividends should pay the regular non-resident tax, which is fifteen per cent. The recipient can take credit for it in his income tax return in the country in which he resides.

Mr. BURTON: I thank the minister for the statement he has made, but I am curious to know what brought this matter to the attention of his advisers. What caused them to deem it necessary to bring this in? Surely there must have been some reason that prompted the minister's advisers to suggest it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have inquired about it, and I do not know that there was any special reason that brought it to the attention of my tax advisers. But, as members of the committee know, these tax questions are under constant consideration, particularly by officers of the finance department, whose special job it is to be considering representations with respect to tax matters, and legislation in connection therewith. It was suggested to me that it was appropriate that this type of income should be subject to the non-resident tax, patronage dividends being subject to taxation. This is a comparatively new departure. It is only in the last two or three years that we have had this provision in the act. That is the only explanation I can offer. We have always taxed dividends going abroad, and the purpose of this is simply to make sure that the technical provisions of the act shall cover patronage dividends as well as dividends paid by ordinary stock companies.

[Mr. Burton.]

Mr. BURTON: Once again I thank the minister, but I may say to him that I would feel much happier if he could assure me that the action taken a year or so ago in taxing patronage dividends was not simply the thin edge of the wedge. Can he assure me that there will not be a gradual extension of this line of taxation?

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, no. It was not the thin edge of the wedge. I do not think there has been any serious suggestion that patronage dividends should not be considered as income. Those of us who are interested in the co-operative movement have recognized that patronage dividends received by the owners of a co-operative are income and subject to taxation. That has not been questioned. There has been serious difference of opinion as to whether some other things should be subject to taxation, but there has been no question that patronage dividends are properly income and, as such, taxable in the hands of the people who receive them. All we propose is that the non-resident who receives dividends of this kind should pay the same non-resident rate of taxation that any other non-resident pays in respect of income received from Canada. That is all the amendment does.

Mr. BURTON: I have no desire to protect the non-resident, but I was interested to know what brought this on.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is nothing else behind it.

Resolution agreed to.

(b) By repealing subsection one of section four and substituting the following:

"4. The governor in council may, by order, from time to time:

(a) Extend the benefit of the British preferential tariff, in whole or in part, to any British colony or any protectorate or territory under British trusteeship not named in paragraph (a) of section three, and from and after the date specified in such order the British preferential tariff shall apply to goods the growth, produce or manufacture of such colony, protectorate or territory, subject to the provisions of this act;

(b) Withdraw the benefit of the British preferential tariff, in whole or in part, from any British country or colony or any protectorate or territory under British trusteeship, which has received the said benefit, and from and after the date specified in such order the most-favoured-nation tariff or the general tariff, as mentioned in the said order, shall apply to goods the growth, produce or manufacture of any such British country, subject to the provisions of this act;

(c) Extend to any British country the benefit of rates of customs duties more favourable than those of the British preferential tariff, and from and after the date specified in such order the rates of duties so ordered shall apply to goods the growth, produce or manufacture of such British country, subject to the provisions of this act;

(d) Withdraw from any British country to which they have been extended rates of customs duties more favourable than those of the British preferential tariff, and from and after the date specified in such order the British preferential tariff, the most-favoured-nation tariff or the general tariff, as directed in the said order, shall apply to goods the growth, produce or manufacture of such British country, subject to the provisions of this act;

(e) Extend the benefit of the most-favoured-nation tariff, in whole or in part, to any British or foreign country goods, the growth, produce or manufacture of which have previously been subject to the rates of customs duties set forth in the general tariff, and from and after the date specified in such order the rates of duty set forth in the most-favoured-nation tariff, so far as they are mentioned in the said order, shall apply to goods the growth, produce or manufacture of such British or foreign country, when imported into Canada direct from a country entitled to the benefits of the most-favoured-nation tariff, subject to the provisions of this act;

(f) Withdraw the benefit of the most-favoured-nation tariff, in whole or in part, from any country to which it has been extended, and from and after the date specified in such order the rates of customs duties set forth in the general tariff shall apply to goods the growth, produce or manufacture of such country, subject to the provisions of this act;

(g) Every order passed under the authority of this section shall be published in the Canada Gazette."

(c) By repealing section six and substituting the following:

[Mr. Abbott.]

"6. (1) In the case of goods exported to Canada of a class or kind made or produced in Canada, if the export or actual selling price to an importer in Canada is less than the fair market value or the value for duty of the goods as determined under the provisions of the Customs Act, there shall, in addition to the duties otherwise established, be levied, collected and paid on such goods, on their importation into Canada, a special or dumping duty, equal to the difference between the said selling price of the goods for export and the said value for duty thereof; and such special or dumping duty shall be levied, collected and paid on such goods although not otherwise dutiable.

(2) The special duty imposed by the preceding subsection shall in no case exceed fifty per cent ad valorem and the following goods shall be exempt from such duty:

(i) Goods of a class subject to duty under the Excise Act;

(ii) Goods which though of a class or kind made or produced in Canada, are not offered for sale to the ordinary agencies of wholesale or retail distribution or are not offered to all purchasers on equal terms under like conditions, having regard to the custom and usage of trade;

(iii) Goods or classes of goods declared exempt by any order or regulation made by the governor in council.

(3) Duties and taxes imposed in the country of export shall be disregarded in estimating the value for the purpose of the said duty.

(4) 'Export price' or 'selling price' in this section means the exporter's price for the goods, exclusive of all charges thereon after their shipment from the place whence exported direct to Canada.

(5) If at any time it appears to the satisfaction of the minister that the payment of the special duty by this section provided for is being evaded by the shipment of goods on consignment without sale prior to such shipment, the minister may in any case or class of cases authorize such action as is deemed necessary to collect on such goods or any of them the same special duty as if the goods had been sold to an importer in Canada prior to their shipment to Canada.

(6) If at any time it appears to the satisfaction of the minister that any person owning or controlling or interested in a business in Canada and also in any other country, or any person carrying on a business in any other country and owning or controlling or interested in a business operating in Canada, and by reason thereof is enabled to import goods for further manufacture or assembling or for resale, and while complying with the legal requirements on importation disposes of such imported goods, whether in the form as imported or as further processed, assembled or manufactured, at prices below the duty paid value thereof as entered at customs plus or including all charges upon the goods after shipment from the place whence exported direct to Canada, including sales, distribution and advertising costs, and plus, if any, the cost of processing, assembling or further manufacturing in Canada, the minister may declare that goods of such class or kind were and are on importation subject to an additional special or dumping duty not exceeding fifty per cent, and authorize such action as is deemed necessary for the collection thereof.

(7) If the full amount of any special duty of customs as herein provided has not been paid on goods imported, the customs entry thereof shall be amended and the deficiency paid upon the demand of the collector.

(8) The minister may make such regulations as are deemed necessary for carrying out the provisions of this section and for its enforcement.

(9) For the purpose of this act goods shall not be deemed to be of a class or kind made or produced in Canada unless so made or produced in substantial quantities; and the governor in council may provide that such quantities, to be substantial, shall be sufficient to supply a certain percentage of the normal Canadian consumption and may fix such percentages."

(d) By repealing section eighteen.

2. Resolved, that schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking thereout tariff items 15, 65a, 82(b), 82(c), 180d, 186, 199g, 208i, 211b, 216d, 232e, 269, 271, 274, 275, 296b, 296e, 326c, 328, 349b, 359, 364, 386(d), 386(p), 392a, 403(a), 410a, 410h, 410m, 410n, 410o, 410o(ii), 410q, 410w, 410y, 412, 413, 427c, 427f, 431c, 431d, 431g, 437, 438b, 438c, 438d, 438e, 439c, 442d, 445m, 445n, 445o, 476, 539, 587, 587b, 657, 682a, 692 and 693(iii), the several enumerations of goods respectively and the several rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite each of the said items, and by inserting the following items, enumerations and rates of duty in said schedule A:

4. Resolved, that any enactment founded upon the foregoing resolutions to amend the Customs tariff or schedules thereto shall be deemed to have come into force on the nineteenth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and forty-eight, and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the foregoing resolutions imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that date, and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

Mr. ABBOTT: Before we come to the detailed consideration of these resolutions, there is a brief statement that I should like to make on one aspect of them. When I introduced the resolution at the time of my budget address I announced that it was proposed to suspend temporarily the British preferential duties on cotton and rayon piece goods in order to enable Canadian consumers to obtain larger quantities of these essential materials at reasonable prices. As I stated then, we have received assurances from the United Kingdom that the reduction in landed prices made possible by any removal of duties would be passed on to Canadian buyers and that the United Kingdom government would take all possible steps to see that the target which has been set for shipment to Canada of 80,000,000 yards of cotton piece goods in 1948 will be met.

I explained also that, in acordance with our commitments in the Geneva trade agreement, under which preferential margins may not be widened, the proposal to suspend the British preferential rates on cotton and rayon piece goods includes a reduction in the most-favoured-nation rates on these items by the same amount until July 1, 1949. However, in the case of scheduled countries imports are limited by quota under the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act.

It is expected that the proposed temporary suspension of duties will have a generally beneficial effect in helping to make available larger quantities of important supplies needed by our consumers. It is proposed that the suspension should remain in effect until July 1, 1949, when the whole matter could be reviewed in the light of the results achieved.

It has been thought desirable, however, that there should be some provision whereby this matter may be reviewed from time to time before that date. In the light of the widespread dislocations which exist in international trade and the many uncertainties which prevail, particularly with regard to the effects of the consequent reduction in the most-favoured-nation rates made necessary by the Geneva agreement, it is felt that the governor in council should have the authority to withdraw the suspension in part or in whole if, by any chance, the assurances given are not lived up to, or if it is found that the reduced duties are in fact operating in a manner detrimental to Canada. As far as we can see now, we do not expect that any difficulties will arise which would make it advisable to use this authority, but I think hon. members will agree that it is prudent to make provision for unforeseen developments in the unsettled circumstances of today. For that reason I would ask my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, to move an appropriate amendment to the resolutions which I tabled on the night of the budget address.

Mr. HACKETT: I take it that the temporary suspension in no way affects Canada's status or Canada's right to maintain the status quo ante. By suspending these duties Canada is not yielding up her right to reimpose them, by reason of this temporary action?

Mr. ABBOTT: No. That is quite correct. In fact, as a result of the amendment which I will ask my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, to move, we shall not ask that the statutory rates as contained in the tariff be changed. The Geneva rates are in effect, as hon. members of the committee know, by order in council. They have been given provisional effect and they will remain in effect for the time being until the house decides whether or not the Geneva agreements will be approved. But there will be no change in the customs tariff so far as the rates in schedule A are concerned. The effect of the proposal which I am making is that the duties on cotton and rayon goods be suspended until July 1, 1949. Since, under the Geneva agreements, we are bound not to widen the preferences which exist in favour of the United Kingdom, this means that the same treatment must be extended to the most-favoured-nation countries, which include, as hon. members of the committee know, France, Belgium and most of the western European countries.

The only significant proposal that I am making in the proposed amendment is that, in view of the unsettled conditions and the possibility that assurances which we have received would not be lived up to—

Mr. KNOWLES: From whom?

Mr. ABBOTT: —and the fact that we have to extend these tariff suspensions beyond the United Kingdom to these other countries, the government should reserve the right, in the event of some unforeseen development occurring, to cancel this suspension. I do not anticipate for a moment that this will be necessary, but it seems only prudent to reserve the power if some unforeseen development should occur which would be detrimental to the interest of Canada, and that we should have the right to do that. Hon. members will recall that these duties were suspended during the war by the War Exchange Conservation Act of 1940. In effect we shall be continuing the same practice here; it is a suspension, not a removal. I did not suggest in my budget address that this should be a permanent thing, because we must see what we do about the Geneva treaties. What I have proposed—and, of course, what I am still proposing—is that these duties should be suspended for a little more than a year from now. But when we are committed under the Geneva agreements, which have been given provisional application, to extend that treatment to a great many other countries as well, it seems to me that it is prudent to reserve some discretion empowering the governor in council to suspend the suspension, if I may put it in that way, with respect to some or all of these tariff items, should unforeseen circumstances arise.

Mr. HACKETT: I should like to ask two questions. The first is this. If our markets were flooded from some source of supply which is not on our horizon now, or if serious unemployment should result, a remedy would be at hand?

Mr. ABBOTT: A remedy would be available. Frankly, I do not anticipate any such contingency, because the situation with respect to textiles, as most hon. members know, is that in most lines they are in exceedingly short supply. There is nothing in the information I have been able to get from any of my expert advisers on this matter to indicate that any such condition as my hon. friend suggests would arise. But the world is in an unsettled state; this special suspension is being extended to a great many countries besides the United Kingdom; and I think it is the part of wisdom to retain this power. I should say, as I have said already, that I do not contemplate that there will be any necessity to exercise it; I can see nothing on the horizon which would make it likely that we should. But I think it is the part of wisdom to do that.

Mr. HACKETT: The second question I wish to ask is this. Is the power to terminate the law by order in council to be incorporated in the act, or is it to be dependent on the continuation of controls and the general law under which they are perpetuated?

Mr. ABBOTT: It will be incorporated temporarily in the act. The amendment, which I will ask my colleague to move, restricts the suspension of duties, as I indicated in my budget speech, to July 1, 1949, and provides that the governor in council be empowered at any time to withdraw in whole or in part the suspension in duty provided for; I am quoting from the proposed amendment, in paragraphs (a) and (b). That is the safeguarding clause to which I am referring. It will be incorporated in the customs tariff.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister made a fairly plausible argument for the proposed amendment, particularly when he used such words as "prudent"; but I confess that with me it is only plausible. Frankly I do not like it. The minister said a moment ago that there was some similarity between what he is asking for now and what happened during the war. There is a similarity, but it is in reverse. During the war the government, by virtue of the wide powers it had under the War Measures Act, took off certain duties. The minister is now asking for peacetime, order in council power to put on certain duties.

Mr. ABBOTT: We are seeking the power to suspend them, with the right to reimpose them at any time at the discretion of the governor in council.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am trying to get away from the use of double negatives and talk in terms of what actually happens. I do not think it is completely comparable. Also, I do not like the continued extension of the delegation of authority to the government in this way. It seems to me that we are getting to the place where we make laws in this parliament, but we make only the laws that the government brings in, and then we put loopholes in them to give the government a chance to change those laws in between sessions. I did not expect this legislation to come up, so that I have not case histories in front of me. But most hon. members know we have had a great deal of manipulation of tariff policies in this country by both parties that have been in power down during the years. I can think of many an editorial which the Winnipeg Free Press has run on this subject, and in which it has pointed out that, whereas parliament has passed certain tariff rates, by administrative methods the effective rates have been changed.

We have, in addition to that way of changing the will of parliament, another way, namely this, the provision that by order in council this tariff which is now being removed for a period of thirteen or fourteen months can be—

Mr. ABBOTT: Suspended.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, suspended, but so far as the effect during the fourteen months is concerned; it is off, just off. Just ask the hon. member for Beauce, and he will tell you it is off. I am glad to see the hon. member for Winnipeg South in his seat, because I am sure that as a Liberal he will welcome this removal of tariffs on certain British goods, if only for a period of fourteen months. And I do not think he will feel very happy about the government now taking by order in council, for reasons which may seem good to them, the power to put those tariffs back on before that time is up. I shall not take further time to argue the matter now, but it does seem to me to be a little extreme and a little strange to have still another move like this from a Liberal government.

If the Liberals believe in freer trade policies and start to move in that direction, then why back up? Why leave the back door and several windows open as a means of getting out? I would much rather that parliament would endorse the proposal the government made that these duties be off from now until July 1, 1949, and that we make it definite for that period of time, with only the one over-riding exception that always holds, namely, that parliament could change it. The house will be meeting in the meantime, possibly this fall. At any rate the government can call parliament together at any time, and I feel that the supremacy of parliament in the matter should be maintained.

Mr. ABBOTT: May I say one word in reply to the hon. member. I wish to point out, as I did in my budget speech, that the purpose of this suspension of duties is to assure a supply in Canada which is needed, at a reasonable price. Before agreeing to recommend it to parliament, I received assurances from the board of trade of Great Britain that they thought they could assure us that advantage would not be taken of the reduction in duties by British manufacturers, and added on to the price. I have no doubt, of course, that those assurances will be lived up to. Nevertheless the action was taken with the assurance that certain things would be done.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is also good Liberalism.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is understood that the Canadian consumer would get the benefit, and that we would get the supply.

There are other countries which benefit from this suspension, but from whom it was not possible to get similar assurances. I think it is only reasonably prudent to retain the power to remove this concession if it does not produce the results which we expect and believe it will produce. That is the reason for this suggested amendment. I do not think it will be necessary to do this.

Mr. HACKETT: I should like to make it quite clear that the questions which I put to the minister, and which he has been good enough to answer, are not to be interpreted as indicating in any way any change in my unalterable opposition to government by order in council. I say the tariff should not be subject to alteration by order in council. I merely wish to make my position clear in the matter, even though I have asked the minister for some explanation concerning the amendment which he is about to introduce.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the resolution carry?

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, I understand you have not yet put the amendment.

Mr. McCANN: I move the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment is to resolution 3. I shall read it. It is as follows:

That resolution 3 of May 18 be amended by substituting therefor the following:

"Resolved that

(a) The British preferential tariff rates of duty on the goods described in the tariff items listed in the schedule appended hereto be suspended until July 1, 1949;

(b) The most-favoured-nation rates of duty on goods referred to above be suspended, and in place thereof the duty on each item until July 1, 1949, be the amount of the present duty reduced by an amount equal to the amount of the British preferential tariff;

(c) That the governor in council be empowered at any time to withdraw, in whole or in part, the suspensions in duty provided for in paragraphs (a) and (b).

Then follows the schedule. Does the resolution carry?

Mr. KNOWLES: The only part that implements the suggestion just made by the minister with respect to giving power to the governor in council is paragraph (c)?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. KNOWLES: Of what the Chairman has just read?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think there are some others who wish to speak about this. Are there any copies available?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not too complicated. If the hon. member will turn to page 4094 of Hansard for May 18, he will find that subsection 3 contains the resolution which is now amended. It is really not so complicated. The substantial effect of the amendment is, as I have indicated, that the duties on the tariff items enumerated in the resolution with respect to rayons and cotton goods, are suspended until July 1, 1949. There is a provision that the governor in council may be empowered to withdraw in whole or in part the suspensions of duty for which provision is made in the resolution. I can assure my hon. friend that is all the amendment accomplishes. The resolution is long, with an enumeration of tariff items, and a technical description of the things covered. That is all there is to it.

I have explained to the committee the reasons why I am suggesting that this amendment be put forward.

Mr. GILLIS: The minister is recommending definitely that the tariff be removed up to July 1, 1949?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. GILLIS: The governor in council, then, has no authority to make any changes in that schedule?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. GILLIS: Until July 1, 1949?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, but it may remove this suspension—and I should like, if possible, to get away from the double negative. If unforeseen conditions arise such as I have indicated, the governor in council may withdraw this special privilege which is extended to a very considerable number of countries if, to put it bluntly, they do not live up to what we fully expect they will honour and live up to.

Mr. HACKETT: You may by order in council put an end to the law?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. The normal tariff would then come into effect again.

Mr. GILLIS: In other words, if the amendment carries and if the governor in council so desires, next week or next month it may change the whole thing?

Mr. ABBOTT: It can; it would revert to the regular tariff.

Mr. GILLIS: Next week or next month?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not like that. Surely this House of Commons can see at least a year ahead. This house will again be in session—

Mr. ABBOTT: It is better than some of the rest of us, then.

Mr. GILLIS: It will be in session in 1949. The policy being pursued now is a Liberal policy. In other words, you are living up to the Atlantic charter, and the provision in it for free access to raw materials of the world—some of the beautiful slogans on which we fought the war.

Surely we are in a position in the House of Commons to say we are going to legislate that far ahead with respect to a restricted number of items as between ourselves and the United Kingdom.

Mr. ABBOTT: But I have a sort of constitutional objection to removing the tariff on an item and then allowing the fellow in the other country just to take that into his price. That is one of the main reasons why we should reserve this right. If other countries do not fulfil the assurance they have given us, then we would have the right to withdraw the special concession we have extended to them. That is all this is.

Mr. GILLIS: I still cannot see that. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out, it is a continuation of government by order in council. Parliament should be supreme in matters of this kind, and I do not think the matter is serious enough, as far as the schedule under discussion is concerned. As far as I am concerned, as a member of this house I do not intend to delegate in peacetime the authority of the House of Commons to someone behind the scenes. I am going to be quite frank and say that when the minister and his advisers drafted this budget I believe they received some fairly decent Liberal advice, but I am afraid—I hope this is not true—that considerable pressure has been exerted upon the minister to leave in this escape clause. I think the amendment is actually an escape clause designed to protect manufacturers of this country who are afraid—

Mr. ABBOTT: There has not been any pressure at all.

Mr. GILLIS: —that they may not be in a position to compete with those who believe in free enterprise and unrestricted trade and competition and all the other things that are supposed to enter into our economy. I consider this matter serious enough for this House of Commons to refuse the amendment. I have confidence enough in the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce and their advisers to think they will be able to do business with the countries affected by this tariff change without delegating any authority to anyone outside the House of Commons to change the law tomorrow if he so desires.

I am prepared to have it run until the House of Commons meets again, say in June, 1949. If in the interim there is any difficulty I do not think it would be so serious as to affect the country to an extent where we should be prepared to abrogate the rights of the House of Commons. There is a principle at stake. That principle is the right of this house to retain in peacetime the power to pass laws and have them remain effective until such time as the house may convene again.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is nothing new about this, since the same sort of thing exists all through the tariff schedule. I am not an expert on tariffs, but I have before me tariff item 62, which reads:

> Rice, uncleaned, unhulled or paddy . . . The governor in council, when satisfied that Australia can supply Canadian requirements, may, by order in council, direct that there be substituted for tariff item 62 in schedule A of the customs tariff, and the enumeration of goods and the rates of duties of customs set opposite the said item in schedule A the following . . .

As I say, this is not a new departure. As I have said before, I think, under existing circumstances, this is a wise provision to insert.

Mr. GILLIS: Let us try it for a year and discuss it the next time we meet.

Mr. HACKETT: I feel that the legislation as it appears before the amendment is ill-advised, because of the effect it may have upon employment in those centres where large numbers are engaged in the textile industry. Much as I regret it, I feel that this house is constantly belittling itself when, without any reason at all, it yields up to the governor in council its hard-won supremacy in matters of legislation.

Just a few days ago we saw fifty pages torn from the merchant shipping act, when many articles having to do with the life, safety and well-being of crews and people on ships as well as the ships themselves could be suspended by order in council. This was done to enable a servant of a department to determine that something like an emergency existed and then suspend the law.

We are a highly industrialized country, dependent to a greater extent upon foreign markets than practically any other country. We must sell at home and abroad, or we cannot continue to exist. We have increased our capital equipment and our industrial plant. We must find markets, and the best market is always the home market.

An hon. MEMBER: Is where you find it.

Mr. HACKETT: I am not going to debate that point with the hon. gentleman, because I think he will admit that the best market is the home market. If this legislation is denying occupation to our own people, then it is short-sighted. If we are to introduce into our fiscal and trade policy the same uncertainty that exists in other realms of public affairs; if we are to create in that realm the chaos which exists elsewhere I fear that we are in for a sad and sorry time.

We should know for at least one year what our tariff legislation is to be. I submit that, surrounded as the minister is with competent officers and men of some experience, he should be able to see at least twelve months ahead or until the house meets again. Laws which are vital to our economic existence and to our trading position should have some stability and not be altered until reasons are given in open debate.

We are spending time in committees devising ways for the introduction of democratic government as it obtains here. Yet we have become disrespectful of the very elements of democratic government; we delegate to some gentleman in the Department of Finance the power and the right to determine for you, for me and for the people whom we represent what shall be the fiscal policy of this country. I believe that is wrong and we shall rue the day we have openly and without necessity accepted that principle.

Mr. KNOWLES: The case has been stated so excellently by the hon. member for Stanstead that little more needs to be said. But I feel that we should register, in the best way we can, a protest against this request of the minister for this power by order in council. A moment ago the minister cited an example from the tariff schedule he has before him. Even though I was not able to follow it as closely as I might have, I understood that it did prescribe certain conditions under which the governor in council would have the authority to make a change. That is not the case in connection with the amendment now before the committee. I have now been able to get a copy of it, and I find that clause (c) of the proposed amendment moved by the Minister of National Revenue reads as follows:

(c) The governor in council be empowered at any time to withdraw in whole or in part suspensions in duty provided for in paragraphs (a) and (b).

I submit, along the lines already argued so well by the hon. member for Stanstead and others who have taken part, that this parliament should not give that power to the government at this time. I therefore move, seconded by my colleague the hon. member for Cape Breton South, the following sub-amendment:

That clause (c) of the proposed amendment be deleted.

In other words, I do not try to disturb any other of the changes made by the amendment or in the schedule attached thereto which the minister has proposed. I only ask that this special order in council power be not granted by the house to the government.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am very glad my hon. friend has moved that sub-amendment, because I want to make it perfectly clear that the amendment is not one on which the government lays any particular stress, and I give it to the committee for what it is worth. I think it is in the interests of this country that the government should retain this discretionary power under these exceptional circumstances; but let me say this, that if the committee feels that we should give this unrestricted suspension of duties until July 1, 1949, I am not going to stand up strongly in opposition. I give it as my considered opinion, after having given the matter a good deal of consideration, that it is the part of prudence to retain that discretionary power, but I am going to lay the responsibility for voting for or against it squarely on the members of the house. I personally shall vote against my hon. friend's amendment, but if the committee sees fit to adopt it, that is all right with me.

Mr. FULTON: The situation is this. The minister, in introducing this change, is not sure how it will work out, and he wants the power given to him to change it at a moment's notice if it works out badly. That is an instance of the risks which this government is willing to run with the economy of the country. Here we have a tariff change introduced by the government, and now they ask power by the amendment to undo the tariff change at a moment's notice if it should turn out that it works against the interests of Canada. If they have not examined the whole situation so carefully that they can say to us that this tariff change is bound to work in the best interests of Canada, the tariff change should not have been introduced and should not have the support of the house. It convinces me of something I have suspected for some time, that this whole change is ill-conceived and not designed to work in the best interests of Canada's economy. I think we should oppose the change and the amendment, and I propose to do so.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is all right with me. As I explained this proposal, it is for the purpose of endeavouring to ensure a supply of cotton and rayon textiles to Canadian consumers at reasonable prices, and we had the assurance from the main source of supply that advantage would not be taken of this tariff concession to boost prices. I have no doubt that this assurance will be carried out. But on second thought I consider it wise to have a safeguard in case the assurance could not be carried out, or in case concessions given to other countries did not work out. But if the committee feels that this concession should be continued until July 1, 1949, without any such safeguard, that is all right with me. It is no government issue so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I support the minister's attitude in this matter. We are living in a world of bewildering complexity; no one can foresee what the situation will be one month ahead. Surely members of the house realize that. I find myself at a loss to understand the attitude taken by the two speakers of the C.C.F. and of the Progressive Conservative party. So far as leaving power in the hands of the minister is concerned, we have to leave power in the hands of ministers in regard to every aspect of our government, and we can hold them responsible if they misuse that power. Consequently I am going to vote against the sub-amendment of the C.C.F. I think it is just plain foolishness.

There is one more aspect. We are dabbling around with a whole lot of experiments in non-discrimination and a whole lot of other things involved in the Geneva trade treaties. No one has seen those treaties in operation. How can we foretell how they will work out? Certainly it is the part of merest prudence to give the minister power to do whatever seems fit to him under the circumstances.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I should like to make one or two observations, following what the hon. member for Stanstead had to say. His anxiety and that of a good many members of this house is to get parliament back as quickly as possible into the position where parliament is supreme. I think we are all agreed on that. During the last four or five years of necessity we had to have many things done by order in council and we had to depend on the ministers' deputies for their advice in matters of great concern. I should like to make this observation now, that we have been very fortunate in the calibre of the men who have served the different departments of government, and particularly the Department of Finance and especially those charged with this work. I pay tribute to these men. Most of them are still advising the ministers.

What bothers me now is the statement made a couple of moments ago by the minister, who said he "thought" this was necessary. I wrote the word down. If he thinks it is necessary because he has been advised by a capable civil servant who knows all the ramifications of each individual item and knows what is for the general advantage of Canada, why not have the intestinal fortitude to stick to it? We have had a welter of orders in council under the War Measures Act and the transitional powers act; and if, after all that, it is necessary to give the minister this power I think the committee ought to be broad-minded enough to grant him that power until such time as the economy not only of Canada but of the whole universe irons itself out.

My private enterprise friend the hon. member for Cape Breton South rose in his place and, with his tongue in his cheek, championed the cause of free enterprise. I say to him that when he was talking a moment ago he probably had in his mind the same idea that is in the minds of all the rest of us, and that is, in the final analysis, are we to be able to keep the employees of the textile organizations working steadily right through the piece, not only till July 1, 1949, but from there on? In common with him there are not only hon. members anxious about that, but the personnel behind the Minister of Finance, whether they say so or not, when they deal with these items are thinking of its effect on the employment of men and women in industry. They do not say so, and we do not say so often enough, but they are thinking, will it make more employment, will it make more production for Canada or will it not? From that angle they very often give their judgment.

I would suggest to the minister that when they are thinking about how they are to frame orders in council or frame advice to the minister, one of the first things in the back of their minds—at least I hope it is one of the first things in the back of their minds—is, will it give more employment, or will it maintain the present employment level in Canada? That is what they think about, or at any rate that is what they ought to think about. I charge them now with that responsibility. I am hoping, when we consider this, that we can perhaps see the end of the rainbow where parliament will again be supreme. It is almost there now. We will help you, Mr. Chairman, to put it through. But in these troubled world affairs which we are now trying to unscramble, let us be a little bit patient. Ninety per cent of the unscrambling of orders in council has been completed. We are now at the tail end of it. I ask the minister to accept some of the advice of those who served us so well during wartime. Accept their advice here and there, and depend upon them. I am of the opinion, sir, that if we do that we shall come out on the right side of the ledger.

In closing, I would say this to the minister, if I can get him away from his other conversation, from the Hollywood sort of atmosphere that envelops him now and again, to the realities of his responsibility as Minister of Finance. When his advisers advise him on such and so I remind him that he is one of the senior ministers of the crown in Canada. Mr. Chairman, I was addressing myself particularly to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am sorry; I was interrupted.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I know he hears, whether he listens or not. When he acts, he acts because his responsible advisers have recommended action. His responsibility to parliament is not only to think but to act and to stick to that, so that Canada itself will say: Well, we have a strong government which means what it says.

Mr. ABBOTT: We have that.

The CHAIRMAN: There is a resolution before the committee on the customs tariff. An amendment was moved by the Minister of National Revenue, and a sub-amendment by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Sub-amendment (Mr. Knowles) negatived; yeas, 21; nays, 59.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the amendment carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: On division.

Amendment agreed to on division.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the resolution carry?

Mr. KNOWLES: That is resolution 3? We still have resolutions 1 and 2 to deal with.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN: Does resolution 3 as amended carry?

Mr. FLEMING: There are some questions I wish to ask with regard to the resolutions as a whole. In the first place these resolutions purport to contain the exact text of the amendments that are proposed to be introduced into the customs tariff. I have been in the house for only four sessions, but this is the first time I have seen resolutions purporting to give the exact text of the proposed legislation. Before we proceed with the resolution, I would ask the minister to give assurance that if the committee does approve the resolution there will be no suggestion, when we come to the bill containing legislation in exactly the same form, that we do not enjoy the usual freedom in connection with the review of the bill.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will gladly give that assurance. Although I have been in the house for eight years, in that period there have not been any extensive changes in the customs tariff, and I have not had a great deal of experience myself with tariff matters. There will be a schedule to the bill amending the customs tariff, which will have to be considered in the committee item by item. I give my hon. friend the assurance that there will be full opportunity on the bill, if it is deemed necessary to do so, to discuss the matter item by item. The general principle, as I indicated in my budget address, of the changes here is, with the exception of the textile items where the tariff is suspended, to make certain downward revisions, chiefly in connection with matters of a technical nature, productive goods and the like. I outlined in general terms in my budget speech the nature of the tariff changes. By reason of the amendment which has just been passed, there will not be incorporated into the customs tariff schedules the Geneva rates with respect to any of the items. These will be dealt with in due course when the agreements, which are now before the committee or before the house itself, are approved.

Mr. FLEMING: One other point. It has to do with the proposed sections dealing with the power to suspend the dumping duties. I refer to the proposed repeal of section 6 and the substitution of a new section. We have had some discussion tonight about the powers proposed to be given to the government under legislation of this kind. I think the committee ought to realize, in passing the resolution, that it proposes to give the minister the power to suspend certain duties of a special dumping nature. The committee ought also to be aware that the classes of goods with respect to which this power is to be conferred on the minister are not defined in the section. The committee would like to have from the minister a further statement concerning the classes of goods to which this section is proposed to be applied.

When the minister was introducing his budget he made the following statement, as reported at pages 4070 and 4071 of Hansard:

> Finally, among the resolutions pertaining to tariff and customs matters, I am including a proposal which would enable the governor in council to relieve certain goods or classes of goods from special dumping duty. Under this proposal such relief could be granted in cases where the governor in council determines that the importation of the goods is necessary to meet essential requirements in Canada or could be used to advantage in Canada without causing hardship to Canadian producers. In view of continuing scarcities, it is clearly desirable that it would be possible to grant relief from dumping duty in such circumstances.

That is quite a definition the minister has given there, and before the committee approves the section, which will have the effect of giving the minister power to suspend duties with respect to undefined classes of goods, or goods the definition of which is to be made by the minister, there ought to be a clear statement from him as to the classes of goods to which it is proposed that this section shall apply.

Mr. ABBOTT: The provision to which my hon. friend is referring will in some respects give a bit more flexibility to the rigid dumping duty provisions now contained in the Customs Tariff Act. At the present time the act provides that if goods are sold in the country of origin at a price below that at which they are sold in the exporting country, then the dumping duty automatically applies to the goods imported into the other country.

There are certain cases in which the domestic price of goods may be somewhat higher than the export price, and the proposed amendment will authorize the administration, in effect, to exempt from dumping duty certain goods, under conditions that may be imposed:

> The special duty imposed by the preceding subsection shall in no case exceed 50 per cent ad valorem and the following goods shall be exempt from such duty.

The goods are:

> (i) Goods of a class subject to duty under the Excise Act;
> (ii) Goods which though of a class or kind made or produced in Canada, are not offered for sale to the ordinary agencies of wholesale or retail distribution or are not offered to all purchasers on equal terms under like conditions, having regard to the custom and usage of trade;

(iii) Goods or classes of goods declared exempt by any order or regulation made by the governor in council.

That is to be amended to provide that, for the purpose of this section, goods may be deemed to be of a class or kind not made or produced in Canada where similar goods of Canadian production are not offered for sale to the ordinary agencies of wholesale or retail distribution or are not offered to all purchasers on equal terms under like conditions, having regard to the custom and usage of trade.

Mr. FLEMING: I do not think the minister has touched the point I was raising. I appreciate the terms attaching to the power to which he has referred, but I am concerned about the type of goods to which this is to apply. Under this section the minister is to have power to select the goods; they are not enumerated in any statutory enactment. Under this section it is left to the minister to select the goods and to suspend the effect of the dumping duty as applied to such goods. We still have not had from the minister a statement as to the kind of goods to which it is proposed that this section shall apply.

Mr. ABBOTT: The purpose of it is to give the governor in council power to exempt from the dumping duty in cases where the imposition of such duty would in effect impose a prohibitory tariff preventing the importation of goods which are needed in Canada and which, on their importation, will not injure any Canadian goods of a similar nature. I am told that an example of this under existing conditions might be certain types of British motorcars which are not manufactured in Canada and in respect of which the strict application of the dumping duty might require the imposition of a stiff duty on the landing of such cars in Canada, which under existing conditions are needed in the country and for which there is a ready market.

Mr. FLEMING: I take it that this section has not been introduced without there having been some demand for it in certain quarters. Surely there must be other examples than the one the minister has cited, namely British motor cars. The committee is entitled to know what classes of goods the minister has in mind when he asks us to give effect to a provision of this kind. There must be more to it than the one case of British motorcars.

Mr. ABBOTT: As my hon. friend knows, while we are making every effort to increase imports of goods into Canada from what might be generally described as soft-currency countries, the effect of our rigid anti-dumping law is to discourage some of these imports which would be brought in without injury to Canadian trade and which, as a matter of fact, would help the Canadian consumer. That is because the domestic selling price of some commodities in other countries is deliberately placed at a high figure, for taxation or other reasons, in order to discourage consumption in those countries and to encourage exports. It was felt desirable that there should be some degree of flexibility in the dumping provisions of our tariff, and that is the purpose of the proposed amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: I was first going to ask if resolution 3 as amended carries.

Resolution 3 as amended agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall resolution 1 carry?

Resolution 1 agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall resolution 2 carry?

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to ask some questions, and they are really for information, with regard to two items in the schedule to resolution 2. The items to which I direct the minister's attention are 410a and 445o. I understood from the minister's speech that any changes being proposed in the tariff were downward. I notice that in many cases there have been reductions in tariff rates, column by column. But I notice that in the case of item 410a, as it is set up in the booklet I have in front of me, the general tariff at the present time is 12½ per cent and the new general tariff is to be 35 per cent.

Mr. ABBOTT: The rates are 12½ per cent, 35 per cent, 35 per cent, 30 per cent, and 37½ per cent.

Mr. KNOWLES: I see. That goes down on the next page. Would the minister explain that, because it looks to me, if you have a collection of rates such as the minister has just read out—12½ per cent, 35 per cent, 35 per cent, 30 per cent and 37½ per cent—and you drop all those rates and put in their place an over-all rate of 35 per cent, you may in fact have provided for an increase.

Mr. ABBOTT: The explanation of that is this. As of course my hon. friend knows, the general tariff is of really no consequence now. Nearly all countries are under the most-favoured-nation tariff, and incidentally that type of material dealt with in item 410a—loading machines and so on—would come from most-favoured-nation countries. I do not think there is any general tariff country from which those articles could come. If there were,

I would think it would tend to force such countries to enter into a most-favoured-nation agreement with us. The effective tariff rates are the British preferential tariff and the most-favoured-nation tariff. There are few countries that are still under the general tariff rates. Technically it may be that the tariff rate of 35 per cent, which is one of the rates now under the general tariff, would apply; but the effective reduction is to place those things on the free list.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am glad to know that. At least it carries out the intention of the minister's tariff changes. What bothered me was, as I say, that there was at least the appearance of an increase.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is right there.

Mr. KNOWLES: Here was a case where, with respect to loading machines, and so on, there was a 12½ per cent rate and now there is to be a 35 per cent rate; that looked to me like a reduction in reverse.

Mr. ABBOTT: All that stuff comes from most-favoured-nation countries or British preferential tariff countries.

Mr. KNOWLES: I understand. The other item to which I wished to direct attention was 445o, paragraph (iii). There I noticed that all three of the rates were simply listed as "various". Now it is free, free, and 30 per cent. This is with regard to materials and parts not including motors, for use by manufacturers of apparatus using radio tubes, or parts therefor, in the manufacture, in their own factory, of the goods enumerated in tariff items 445o (i) and 445o (ii). In connection with the general tariff, previously the rate was listed as various. Now it is listed as 30 per cent. That is the only case like it in the whole schedule. Can the minister assure us that there is not an increase when it goes from "various" to 30 per cent?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, I am told there is not. Here again the applicable rates are really the British preferential and the most-favoured-nation rates. Probably a typical case of the various rates, as I am informed by the officials in front of me, would be the ones in 445o (ii), which are 35 per cent, 30 per cent, 30 per cent, 35 per cent and 30 per cent. The 30 per cent would be the lowest of those rates. But here again in this item, the general tariff rates have really no practical application because these items are not coming to us from general tariff countries.

Mr. KNOWLES: So we can be assured that all the changes, where changes are made, are downward.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told by my tariff experts that that is the case.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister turn to item 410a (i), which deals with loading machines; shaker trough, belt trough, and so on. The general tariff at one time was 35 per cent. When did that general tariff cease to be effective?

Mr. ABBOTT: When we made the first trade agreement with the United States in 1935, effective January 1, 1936.

Mr. HACKETT: That was in 1935. And it was reduced to what figure?

Mr. ABBOTT: At that date the United States was transferred from the general tariff to the most-favoured-nation tariff, and the rate then became 10 per cent. Before that, it had been 12½ per cent.

Mr. HACKETT: Under the present arrangement the tariff of 10 per cent disappears?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. HACKETT: Then all of the items that are listed in—what is this, the third item?

Mr. ABBOTT: Item 410a?

Mr. HACKETT: I was thinking of the items beginning with tariff item 15 and going on to the bottom of page 25, item 848; they have been affected by the recent change so that they all become free?

Mr. ABBOTT: They do not all become free, no. There are varying rates which are shown on the schedule here. There are some moderate reductions in tariff in some cases. The columns in Hansard of May 18 show the proposed rates of duty and the rates in effect prior to the rates proposed by the present budget. There are varying rates there. My hon. friend can pick them out. In some cases they are free and in other cases there are reductions. For instance, as to item 431d, which is, engineers', surveyors', and draftsmen's precision instruments and apparatus, the previous rates were free under the British preferential tariff, 10 per cent with some at 9 per cent under the most-favoured-nation tariff and 10 per cent under the general tariff. That item is still free from British preferential countries, and 9 per cent under the most-favoured-nations tariff, and 10 per cent under the general tariff.

Mr. HACKETT: Yes. But in most items there has been a substantial reduction in effect where the United States is concerned?

Mr. ABBOTT: Substantial in some cases; in other cases, not. For instance, let us take item 410q, pumps and vacuum pumps. The reduction in the case of the United States is from 17½ per cent to 15 per cent, a reduction of 2½ per cent. It varies through the schedule.

Mr. HACKETT: Yes; then there are other items—

Mr. ABBOTT: There are some items where there is no change. In connection with diamond drills, for instance, there is no change. It is still 10 per cent. There is a big reduction in wheel chairs.

Mr. HACKETT: The chairs are for the ill and the paraplegics, and everyone is grateful to the minister for having granted relief to a body of unfortunate men and women. On the whole, however, I understand that these reductions apply particularly to the United States, which has been the chief external supplier of articles appearing in the schedule.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. Most of them are production articles—articles such as mining equipment, which enter into the cost of production and which, by and large, are not produced in this country. I believe for many years we have been following the principle of either exempting that class of articles from duty entirely, or putting them in a reasonably low class of duty. For instance, in respect of item 410a (i), which covers loading machines, we know that kind of machinery is used in mining. It was formerly restricted for use exclusively at the face of the mine. That restriction is being deleted, because under the former item the same equipment was in many instances dutiable at a higher rate when it was used a short distance away from the actual mine face. I cite that as an example of an adjustment.

Mr. HACKETT: I had understood that a great deal of the plant development which has been going on in Canada since the war was to enable Canada to produce for herself many of these items, some of which appear in the schedule, and which hitherto she has been forced to import from the United States. The result of this reduction in tariff will be serious competition to Canada, and will expose to great danger our own labour market.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have been informed that in by far the greater majority of the articles in respect of which tariffs are reduced or eliminated, those articles are of a class or kind not made in Canada.

Mr. FLEMING: I have one question concerning item 445o at page 22 of the resolutions. It is a complicated provision. In the first place, as I read it there would seem to be no change in sub-item (i). It is printed here only because of the changes in sub-items (ii) and (iii). Is that not correct?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told there is no change in wording or in rates of duty. It is a continuation of the former item 445o which provided for duty-free entry of certain named parts used in the manufacture of radio apparatus, and it is to conform to the wording incorporated in our trade agreement.

Mr. FLEMING: There will be no change in the tariff on radio dials?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. HACKETT: What is illipe butter? It is not margarine, is it?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, it is not margarine. Illipe butter is used mainly as a substitute for cocoa butter in the manufacture of chocolates and chocolate coatings for the biscuit trade. The addition of illipe butter provides a fat that has a somewhat higher melting point than cocoa butter and which tends to prevent the bloom on the chocolate or coating.

Imports during the next twelve months are estimated to range from 1,000 to 2,000 tons. Illipe butter is selling today at from 83 to 84 cents a pound, c.i.f. without duty, whereas the present price of cocoa butter ranges from $1.10 to $1.20 a pound.

Illipe butter is made from the illipe nut, which is found in the Netherlands East Indies, Borneo and Malaya. These nuts are processed in Holland. The illipe is a genus of a tall evergreen East-Indian tree of the family Sapotaceae.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister look at item 181b, which deals with paper in single sheets. I note the general tariff is 35 per cent. What is the reduction?

Mr. ABBOTT: The rate prior to the proposals in the budget under the most-favoured-nations tariff was 25 per cent, and it is reduced to 7½ per cent.

Mr. HACKETT: Are we not very much interested in the manufacture of paper? Is this some particular type of paper?

Mr. ABBOTT: I understand that this is paper which is not made in Canada. I am told the new item provides for a new type of stencil paper, now widely used in duplicating machines. The paper described in this item was provided for under order in council P.C. 6868 of September 1, 1943. The order was under the War Measures Act and lapsed on March 31, 1947. In 1946 the imports were valued at $44,950. There are no exports and no Canadian production.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): With respect to item 192g, roofing felt, I note that the tariff has been changed from 22½ per cent to 7½ per cent, under the most-favoured-nations column. I have had representations from two mills in my county, and I have sent a letter to the minister about it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have had similar representations.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Would the minister give consideration to this matter and tell my people that there is a chance that the tariff will be reconsidered. There are nine mills in Canada interested in roofing felt. There is Philip Carey Company Limited of Lennoxville, the Viceroy Manufacturing Company at London, Ontario, and the Barrett Company Limited at Joliette. In my county there are the Bishop Asphalt Papers Limited, and J. Ford and Company Limited.

These mills are complaining of the change in tariff and say that it will force them probably to close their doors. Since there are over 700 workers interested in those two mills, and since there is a third company, Building Products Limited, interested in this, I suggest that the minister should reconsider the matter, and not place these gentlemen in a position where they would be obliged to decrease their production. They say the market is not yet fully satisfied; but if the tariff stays in the suggested state, production from the United States will kill their market, and they will have to close their doors.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have received my hon. friend's letter and representations from the concerns to which he has referred. The information I have at the present time is that the supply situation in Canada is such that the tariff should be reduced, and that importations are required. However I am considering the matter, and if some change is desirable I shall be prepared to recommend it. I do not think at the present time, however, the mills to which my hon. friend refers will suffer any injurious consequences.

I have found that people who are affected by tariff reductions usually do fear that there may be some adverse consequences. However, the situation at the present time with respect to roofing felt is this, that I am informed that other roofing manufacturers find it difficult to obtain roofing felt from the Canadian manufacturers. That is an essential and vital building material. The information I have at the moment is that the proposed reduction in tariff is justified, but I am looking into the matter.

Mr. HACKETT: Has the minister any definite information that there is a shortage of this commodity?

Mr. ABBOTT: There is still tariff protection. I am advised that there is a shortage of roofing felt.

Mr. HACKETT: The protection is reduced at 7½ per cent?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is reduced from 22½ per cent to 7½ per cent; by 15 per cent. It is only the manufacturer who can import. The complaints we have received are that some independent manufacturers of roofing materials who do not manufacture their own felt are finding it difficult to get felt from Canadian roofing manufacturers. It is for that reason that the tariff is being reduced at the present time, in order to ensure supply at a reasonable cost.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): The information I received from Bishop Asphalt Papers Limited is as follows:

> It is quite possible that one or two of the other felt producing companies would have surplus tonnage. Toronto Asphalt Roofing Manufacturing Company is a subsidiary of U.S. Gypsum Company, one of the largest roofing and allied manufacturing organizations in the States with several felt plants and who, I believe, will shortly have in production an additional new plant of large capacity. My information is that the felt situation in the States has eased considerably in recent months so that the U.S. Gypsum might be desirous of shipping excess tonnage into Canada.

That is what they are afraid of. They are not afraid of the free entry of roofing felt from England, but they are afraid that there will be some kind of dumping from the United States. They have three grades, and the United States people can play up grade three as well as grades one or two. They can try to make people believe that grade three is as good as the other two grades. That is the way they work. These important manufacturers are afraid of that and they are asking most vehemently that the minister take this matter under consideration.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am looking into the whole question. As the committee will appreciate, roofing felt is not used by the general public; it is used only by manufacturers of roofing. The change in tariff is not on roofing but on roofing felt, the raw material which goes into the process. It is the manufacturers of roofing and also of roofing felts who are apprehensive about the reduction in duty. The other manufacturers who manufacture roofing but who have to buy their felt as a raw material are finding difficulty in getting it from the people who manufacture both roofing and roofing felt. These representations have commended themselves to my tariff advisers. In order to enable the roofing manufacturers to get their raw materials at a somewhat lower cost, this reduction in duty is proposed. I have received representations in addition to those made by the hon. member for Portneuf; I have received representations from other manufacturers of roofing felt and roofing here in Canada which I am now studying. If I come to the conclusion that some modification is justified it will be made when the bill is brought in.

Mr. MacNICOL: I understand that we are permitted to jump from one item to another and I should like to ask a question with reference to 445o. Back in February or March or April the radio manufacturers carried on correspondence with Mr. Callaghan who, I presume, was in Geneva at the time. One of the items under discussion at that time was that referred to in line 15 of item 445o, which reads:

High frequency iron cores with or without inserts moulded therein.

Was a satisfactory agreement made between the makers of those goods and the department?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told that the manufacturers of these cores need the metal powders which come under (iii) of item 445o. These may be imported free to be used in the manufacture of these cores.

Mr. MacNICOL: Were they not asking for a concession in connection with the metal powders to manufacture these articles?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is what is being given by the proposed amendment; metal powders for the manufacture of these cores are being allowed in free.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): How long will these rates of duty remain in force?

Mr. ABBOTT: Until changed by parliament.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): They will have to be changed by parliament?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct, with the exception of the suspension of the textile items. Those are not under the list we are now considering.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Will any of these items be affected by the Geneva treaty?

Mr. ABBOTT: Some of these items are included in the trade treaty.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. HACKETT: In the result are not these changes final; as long as we are bound by the treaty, we shall never be able to put the duties back where they were?

Mr. ABBOTT: That would apply only to the ones mentioned in the trade treaty. There are a few in here that are mentioned in the trade treaty.

Mr. HACKETT: The majority of them are mentioned.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told not.

Mr. HACKETT: In that regard this list is distinct from the textile list to which the minister referred earlier in the evening?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister says these can be changed at some future time by parliament, but if they are under the Geneva trade treaty they will not be changed.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is nothing here relating to the Geneva treaty. What I mean to say is that these tariff schedules are not implementing the Geneva treaty in any way.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): But many of these items are in the Geneva treaty as well?

Mr. ABBOTT: Only the ones which are bound, and there are only one or two here.

Mr. HACKETT: On those which are bound we cannot put up the duty? We cannot do that as long as we are bound by the treaty.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would point out that any item here which is lower than the item in the trade treaty can be brought back to the trade agreement rate.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There are many items here where the margin under the British preferential is reduced. I should like to know if the British government were advised in the cases where margins are reduced?

Mr. ABBOTT: We can bring any rate back to what it was in the trade agreements, whether it is a preferential rate or anything else.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): We still have the preferential rates with Great Britain. Are we allowed under the existing treaties to narrow the margin between the preferential duty and the other rates?

Mr. ABBOTT: We have to extend the same reduction to most-favoured-nation countries in order not to widen the margin of preference, but if we wish to reverse that action and bring the rates back to what they were before this reduction, we can do so.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The rates under tariff item 410a, for instance, were British preferential, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 10 per cent, and general tariff, 12½ per cent. The new rates are British preferential, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, free, and general tariff, 35 per cent. Actually what we have done under that item is to wipe out the British preference altogether. I do not know whether we can get any of these machines from Great Britain.

Take item 410q. The old rates were British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 17½ per cent, and general tariff, 20 per cent. The new rates are British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; most-favoured-nation tariff, 15 per cent, and general tariff, 20 per cent. I have been wondering why the British preference has been wiped out on many of these items.

Mr. ABBOTT: We have to import these goods from the United States, and it is to lower the cost to the Canadian importer. Of course it is open to us at any time to restore the duties if we want to.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The British preference has been wiped out on a good many items. Will it follow that the rates will have to remain the same when the Geneva treaties go through?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): We can go back under the Geneva treaties?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told that is correct.

Mr. TIMMINS: In item 192g, roofing felt, the British preference has been reduced from 15 per cent to free. Is that a bound item?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, it is not. We do not get any roofing felt from the United Kingdom.

Mr. TIMMINS: But we have made the British preference free. It is not connected in any way with Geneva?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. TIMMINS: I see in another item that the British preference has been dropped from 15 to 5 per cent, and that was bound. Would we not be bound for all time to come, having dropped the British preferential tariff under a bound item?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told that we can restore it to the rate under the Geneva treaty, whatever that may be.

Mr. TIMMINS: You mean that if the 5 per cent was less than Geneva we could go up to Geneva? Would the minister tell us why in 192g the British preference was dropped from 15 per cent to free?

Mr. ABBOTT: That was in order to maintain the margin of preference which existed prior to the change. We dropped the most-favoured-nation tariff from 22½ to 7½ per cent, a reduction of 15 per cent, and the British preferential tariff was reduced by 15 per cent.

Mr. TIMMINS: Why did we drop the most-favoured-nation rate?

Mr. ABBOTT: Because we wanted to import roofing felt from the United States. We are not getting it from the United Kingdom anyway. It is to reduce the cost to the Canadian consumer.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

RECONSTRUCTION AND SUPPLY

396. Administration and investigations of the dominion coal board, $82,608.

Item stands.

NATIONAL REVENUE

293. General administration, $1,329,134.

Item stands.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, we were not informed last night, were we, that there were new departments to go into supply today?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No, but there are still three other departments. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is at hand, and I wanted to get his department in. I will keep the undertaking that, during the first days of every week, we shall move to go into supply, so that if there is any grievance it can be discussed, even though no item will be called. There are three more departments to be put in.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister's undertaking is that during the first days of the remaining weeks of the session there will be a motion to go into supply, even though no further departments have to be opened?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): That is right.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Special—

30. Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage (does not include the costs of survey and engineering work on the Medicine Hat irrigation and Red Deer diversion projects in Alberta and the South Saskatchewan river project in Saskatchewan, which costs are to be made available from the item of $1,000,000, No. 409, Department of Reconstruction and Supply), $3,000,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I believe the hon. member for Selkirk wanted to say something on this item. Could we let it stand and go on with something else?

Mr. GARDINER: I had hoped that we could have this all cleared up.

Item stands.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Special—

31. St. Mary river dam project, $2,200,000.

Mr. HARKNESS: Will the minister outline to us how far this St. Mary river dam construction has proceeded. I notice that the estimate this year is up $700,000 over last year. I know that last year they were putting in foundations, tunnels and things along that line. How far have they got on with the work? What is this estimate to be used for? What proportion of the construction has been completed?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): There are two tunnels to be constructed in connection with the St. Mary dam to get the water around the construction. One of these tunnels has been completed, and they are about ready to start on the second.

Mr. MacNICOL: On which side of the river?

Mr. GARDINER: I think it is on the southeast side. I am not just sure of the direction there.

Mr. MacNICOL: On the left bank?

Mr. GARDINER: The only one which has been started, the one which was started last year.

Mr. MacNICOL: The left bank.

Mr. GARDINER: No, on the right bank coming down stream.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is the left bank, as you are coming down stream on the left hand side?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: That would be the left bank.

Mr. GARDINER: That one is completed. There is some difficulty about the matter, which probably I should explain. It will be recalled that at the time the tenders were called for the two tunnels, there was some discussion in the house with regard to these tenders. I said at the time that we had some doubts with regard to the possibility of the bidder completing the work at the price which had been asked. That question was taken up with him by the consulting engineer, Mr. Ferguson. As a result of the discussions, he took the very strong stand that it could be completed on the basis of the tender. It has developed that it cannot be. As a matter of fact, the amount that it would have to be increased by in order to carry it out on that basis would be a price which would be higher than the second bidder put in. We have some doubts as to whether we should allow that.

We have had some discussion with the contractor, and this being the first contract which has been let for this kind of work, we had some hesitation in making an adjustment on the contract which would put the price up higher than the second bidder had bid. Discussions have led to the thought that probably it might be better to have the firm, which has done the first tunnel, discontinue that work and make other arrangements for the other tunnelling. The reason is this. There is a possibility that if we permitted the adjustment to be made after the discussions which had taken place, it was thought that bidders on new contracts might have the idea that the way to get contracts was to bid them down low and get an adjustment. It may cost us more to finish it by making some other arrangement, but we thought that in the first work we have started along this line it might be better to do that. I am not saying that it will be done in that way, but it probably will be done in that way. By making some adjustments it may cost more to get this particular job done but we think it will probably be better than to try and make adjustments now in the light of the discussions that took place.

I should like to say in regard to that, that there has been no dissatisfaction at all with the work which has been done other than that the contractor has not been able to do it as rapidly as we had hoped for. The first tunnelling is done. If any adjustment is made, it will be made with the complete understanding between ourselves and the contractor who has been on the job, and it will not put him in any bad light so far as any future contracts are concerned, if he bids on any works. I thought probably I should say that to the committee at this time in order to explain anything that might be done in connection with it in the future.

The other contract is let to a contractor named Wells, who contracted for the building of the dam. He is on the ground, and has all of his machinery there. He has been doing some work for the past summer. He is ready to go right ahead with his work as soon as we can have the tunnels completed.

Mr. HARKNESS: Does that mean that no work will be gone ahead with excepting the tunnels until the tunnels are finished?

Mr. GARDINER: I doubt very much whether any work can be done until the tunnels are through, because the water has to be taken past the dam site. At the present time, for example, if these tunnels were not in, and any construction had been done, the amount of water that came down this stream the past spring would have taken out any work that had been there. It is almost impossible to do much work without the tunnels.

Mr. HARKNESS: This vote is almost entirely for the other tunnel, then?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Of course no work can be done on the dam until the tunnels are completed. The object of a tunnel is to provide a conveyance for the water to pass through, so that the contractor will have a dry cross-section of the river in which to start pouring his concrete or make the foundation for the dam. It is important that all the water be diverted first. With regard to the tunnel that is built there, has the contractor the proper kind of machinery for drilling a tunnel through the kind of material that he has to go through?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; one is all completed, and the cementing of the tunnel is completed. I was there last year. It was very nearly completed then. It is completed now. They did the final work at the end of the month of May. The other contractors who are in the vicinity have the equipment to do that work if it is necessary to select another contractor.

Mr. MacNICOL: One tunnel has been thoroughly concreted?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, it is completed entirely.

Mr. MacNICOL: It has to be concreted to permit the rapid flow of the water. What is the volume capacity of each tunnel? How many cubic feet per second can it carry? Perhaps the minister could give the volume of the two tunnels together.

Mr. GARDINER: I might as well read the whole description of the construction there. It will not take long and it will give all the information regarding it.

St. Mary-Milk river development.

The first stage in this development has been started and a dam on the St. Mary's river is being constructed some 40 miles southwest of Lethbridge and 4 miles northwest of Spring Coulee. The dam will be half a mile long, a quarter of a mile thick at the base and 186 feet high above the river bed. A tunnel through a hill at the south end is necessary to divert water during construction of the dam. The tunnel will be 20 feet in diameter and 2,100 feet long. Another tunnel will be built, to carry water to the canal for irrigation purposes. This tunnel will be 17 feet in diameter and 2,600 feet long and will discharge water through control gates at the rate of 3,200 cubic feet per second. The contract for the main dam has been let in an amount of $2,081,700 and also the contract for the diversion and irrigation tunnels in an amount of $798,916 and construction is continuing in accordance with the report of the St. Mary's and Milk rivers water development committee dated February 16, 1942. The reservoir created will be 17 miles long, 6 miles wide and 176 feet deep. Its storage capacity will be some 320,000 acre feet. The dam and connecting canal should be constructed by 1949. The present stage of development when completed will improve the water situation on about 120,000 acres of land now under irrigation around Lethbridge, and will also supply water for another 95,000 acres. The St. Mary-Milk river project when the Belly river and Waterton river contributions are included will irrigate some 465,000 acres of land. The total construction cost of the whole development is estimated at $15,178,439. The program proposed provides for a 14-year period of construction in a series of stages.

I should say that these are the estimates which were made a few years ago at the time the contract was let, so that the costs will be somewhat higher than the costs given here. It will be noted that the tunnel which is to take the water past the dam is already finished, and therefore it will be possible to proceed with the construction of the dam. The other is the tunnel which is to take the water down past the dam for irrigation purposes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the minister right? I understood that there would be two tunnels, one on each side of the river, to carry off the flow of water.

Mr. GARDINER: I was under that impression too; but this is the engineer's description, and, according to it, there will be a tunnel on one side for the purpose of carrying the water off, the other being for the purpose of carrying water down for irrigation.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did the minister say the tunnel was twenty-two feet in diameter?

Mr. GARDINER: The first is twenty feet and the second seventeen.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the area of the face?

Mr. GARDINER: Of the dam?

Mr. MacNICOL: Not the dam, but the tunnel. How many square feet?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not that here. I do not know whether my mathematics is good enough to figure it in a few minutes. It is all the water the river has in it in any event.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the maximum flow about 1,400 cubic feet per second?

Mr. GARDINER: I think so.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. MacNICOL: Is that the maximum flow or the average?

Mr. GARDINER: I cannot tell the hon. member. It is all the water there is in the river in any event.

Mr. MacNICOL: I would not imagine that a twenty-foot tunnel would take away a flow of 1,400 cubic feet per second.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, I cannot argue that with the hon. member. The engineer has decided how big it is to be, and it is big enough to take all the water in the river.

Mr. MacNICOL: I hope so, because once they start the dam, they first have to put down a coffer dam which will have to be high enough so that they can continue to work and allow the water to flow off the side where they are building the dam. If one tunnel is all they are figuring on, there is no reason why they cannot proceed with the main construction of the dam.

Mr. GARDINER: I would think so. That is the intention.

Mr. MacNICOL: I understood that there was some doubt about the same contractors proceeding with the other tunnels.

Mr. GARDINER: That will not slow up the construction.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is, the irrigation construction?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Special—

30. Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage (does not include the costs of survey and engineering work on the Medicine Hat irrigation and Red Deer diversion projects in Alberta and the South Saskatchewan river project in Saskatchewan, which costs are to be made available from the item of $1,000,000, No. 409, Department of Reconstruction and Supply), $3,000,000.

Mr. BRYCE: I may be a little out of order at this time, but I shall be only a couple of minutes. I have received a great many letters from my constituents with reference to floods, and I have heard hon. members in the house complaining about flood conditions around Dauphin and other places. We have also read about these conditions as reported in the newspapers, and about an announcement regarding a survey. Many people in Manitoba believe that a survey should be made for the purpose of trying to do away with these floods. In conversation with the minister before, I have been assured that, unless the river is navigable, the problem is up to the province. Am I correct?

Mr. GARDINER: In so far as building dikes for controlling a stream, and that kind of thing, is concerned; but in so far as putting in a construction such as we discussed the other night in connection with the Assiniboine, namely, putting in a dam to prevent waters coming down from the headwaters, we put that in under P.F.R.A.

Mr. BRYCE: Would that come under the survey that is to take place?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. Everything on that river comes under the survey.

Mr. BRYCE: How would it affect the north of my constituency? I am going to send over to the minister photographs of the town of St. Martin, where there are eighteen inches of water in the main street. That happened two years in succession.

Mr. GARDINER: That would be the Red river?

Mr. BRYCE: No. That is away in the north, running into lake St. Martin. They have done considerable drainage up there. A correspondent says, in a letter to me, that appeals to the provincial governments result in nothing definite, and that the farmers all agree that what is needed is a proper survey of the district and money spent in the right place. They think a survey would be a step in the right direction.

Mr. GARDINER: I take it this is along one of the lakes.

Mr. BRYCE: Yes. It is alongside lake St. Martin.

Mr. GARDINER: The surveys such as that are made by P.F.R.A. We made such surveys in the vicinity of Dauphin, for instance.

Mr. BRYCE: This is across lake Manitoba.

Mr. GARDINER: We have made surveys even outside P.F.R.A. areas, when we were requested to do so. But in so far as construction work itself is concerned, that would be a matter for the province. Nevertheless, we have made our engineers available to make surveys.

Mr. BRYCE: The correct procedure would be to get these people to apply to the provincial government to come to you.

Mr. GARDINER: Have them ask for the survey. We could usually make available engineers to do this.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 30 carried. Item 32.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, would you mind reverting to item 31 for a moment?

Mr. GARDINER: Can we not carry item 30?

Mr. MacNICOL: You say, "Carried, carried," Mr. Chairman, but I have a question to ask.

Mr. GARDINER: This is item 30. Let us get item 30 out of the way first.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am satisfied to let item 30 pass.

Mr. GARDINER: It has not been passed yet.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I want to say something on item 30, while we are on the subject of floods. I want to continue what I started a few days ago when I gave way to another hon. gentleman. This is in connection with a matter with which the minister is familiar. It has to do with the construction of certain projects in the Dauphin area. I think we should get cleared up once and for all just how far the minister's department is prepared to go in assisting in a financial way toward the construction of projects which will prevent flooding. I should like to refer the minister to his own words on April 23, when, speaking in another connection, he said this in relation to the Dauphin situation, as reported at page 3291 of Hansard:

> It is much more important that we get busy, as soon as possible, with some understanding as between ourselves and the province, and then between the province and the municipality, to have that job done and done in a way that will avoid that flooding. Then the people in that district will not need assistance under this act . . .

And so on. I took that to mean that the federal government intended to take some part in helping to construct control dams or drainage facilities so that flooding may not occur again.

I should also like to refer the minister to his letter of April 27 of this year to myself, in which he said this:

> I think the point has been reached where some definite plan ought to be proposed by the provincial government to deal with the situation in which they and the municipalities are prepared to join with the federal on a three-way basis. This would put us in a position to consider whether we can assist to the extent required.

I took that to mean that the federal government was prepared to enter into an arrangement with the municipalities concerned and the province on a three-way basis.

Mr. GARDINER: That is under another item. I wish the hon. member would let us pass this item and get to the one in which he is interested. That is the item on the other page of the estimates. If we can get rid of this item, I should like to do so. We have been three days talking about everything under item 30. The hon. member is not on that item at all. The item he wants is a special vote over on the other page.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: What item is that, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. GARDINER: Item No. 39.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: No. That is clearing and settlement of new lands.

Mr. GARDINER: Item 39 is the vote under which it comes.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Item 39, the clearing and settlement of new lands? That seems a strange place for it; but if the minister says so, I will take his word for it.

Mr. KNOWLES: The governor in council has to approve it, and that gives you a great deal of latitude.

Mr. GARDINER: I will answer the question when we get to that item.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN: Is item 30 carried?

Item agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 32.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was going to ask a question on item 31.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 31 was carried, but I understand that the hon. member for Davenport would like to ask a question in connection with it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I shall be only a moment. In the details of services, on page 108, of the estimates, pertaining to item 31, I find the following:

Acquisition of land and/or construction of buildings, works and structures, $1,998,500.

Did those buildings not come from the air field?

Mr. GARDINER: That is a term which is used in connection with every item, as the hon. member will notice if he turns back to the items as they appear. That terminology is used with regard to other items.

Mr. MacNICOL: What land did we have to buy there?

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

Mr. GARDINER: Land that is flooded and belongs to some individual.

Mr. MacNICOL: On one side of the river it belongs to the Blood Indians, does it not?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, on one side is the Indian reserve. We bought it. We had to buy it.

Mr. MacNICOL: As long as the Blood Indians received the same rate per acre as did the whites on the right side of the river did, I will not find any fault with regard to that. The buildings were brought down from some other place, were they not? I saw those buildings before they were removed.

Mr. GARDINER: There are no buildings of any account there that we have or that we are going to build, but that term is used to cover everything. The buildings may be worth only $1,000. I do not know what they would be.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is a great deal more than that. The buildings belong to the government. They were at the airfield—

Mr. GARDINER: There are a few of them. I do not know just what they are.

Mr. MacNICOL: —near Lethbridge.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. There were two buildings brought from somewhere near Lethbridge.

Mr. MacNICOL: It looked to me like quite a number of buildings.

Mr. GARDINER: There were many buildings put up by the construction company. A whole village was built by the construction company; that was the Wells Construction Company. They built a school. That was to accommodate the people who were working on the job. All that has to be covered.

Mr. MacNICOL: All right.

Special—

32. Prairie Farm Assistance Act, $500,000.

Mr. MILLER: There are two or three questions which I wish to ask under this item.

Mr. GARDINER: Might I ask the permission of the committee to go on for fifteen minutes or so after eleven o'clock, to see if we can pass some of these items and clear them up? It is just about eleven o'clock, but I should like to clear up some of these items.

Mr. MILLER: I wish to ask a couple of questions.

Mr. BENTLEY: On the point of sitting after eleven o'clock, may I ask if there is any good reason why we should do so, Mr. Chairman? If so, what is it?

Mr. GARDINER: There is a good reason; or at least there is this reason, although it may not be a good one. I am going away in the morning. That, however, does not make it impossible to carry on, as someone said the other night. But I am afraid that there will be no one here who will be able to give some of the answers that hon. members will want. If they wish to get along without those answers, that is all right with me.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is the minister not coming back?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): It is not yet eleven o'clock. I would suggest that the hon. member for Portage la Prairie be allowed to proceed with his questions.

Mr. MILLER: I will not ask more than about four or five questions anyway.

Mr. BENTLEY: Just a minute. Are we to sit after eleven o'clock? If unanimous consent is necessary for that, it is not given.

Mr. MILLER: It is not eleven o'clock yet. I can ask my questions before eleven o'clock, if the hon. member will allow me to do so.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. It will be necessary to ask for unanimous consent before eleven o'clock.

Mr. KNOWLES: You are too late now.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the unanimous will of the committee that the committee should continue to sit for fifteen minutes after eleven o'clock?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BENTLEY: No.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): It is within one minute of eleven o'clock.

Mr. GARDINER: I would remind the hon. member for Swift Current that one of his own group the other night asked to have us go on beyond the time for adjournment. I have no particular desire in the matter. I am quite prepared to sit, if it is the desire of the committee to sit; if not, it will not make any difference.

Mr. KNOWLES: There are no by-elections on tonight.

Mr. GARDINER: Somebody else will handle the matter later on.

Mr. MILLER: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask my questions.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I wish to clarify the situation.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): With all due respect, Mr. Chairman, may I point this out? The minister has been kind enough to say that he finds it necessary to absent himself tomorrow. It is just a few minutes that is being asked for. Perhaps a few questions could go on the record.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the committee give unanimous consent to sitting for fifteen minutes after eleven o'clock?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. BENTLEY: No; because we cannot finish.

The CHAIRMAN: There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. GARDINER: We do not need to finish. Why not allow the hon. member to ask those two questions?

Mr. BENTLEY: I want to ask some, too.

Mr. GARDINER: We will let you.

Mr. BENTLEY: It will take until twelve o'clock.

Mr. GARDINER: We will let you ask your questions in any event. I understand that one or two members have waited here for two or three days in order to ask one or two questions. It will take only two or three minutes to answer them. I think the members of the committee are quite prepared to sit in order to allow them to ask those questions and have them answered.

The CHAIRMAN: It is the unanimous decision of the committee then, that it should continue to sit for ten minutes.

Mr. MILLER: I will get my questions in. In the first place, would the minister clarify two or three points for me in connection with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act? I should like him to put on record the answer to this question: Does flooding damage qualify under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, provided that other conditions are satisfied.

Second, if flooding is such as to prevent any seeding can benefits be claimed under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Third, in the event of no wheat being harvested in an area, what yardstick is used in order to compute the benefits?

Fourth, in connection with river lots which can be included under the act, through the amendment made this year, how can river lots which have not been included in the present order in council be brought under the act by order in council in order to participate in any benefits through flood damage this year?

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member wrote me asking these questions. I am sorry that the reply has not yet reached him, although I wrote him today.

The answer to the first group of questions having to do with the method by which an area establishes itself to receive payment under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is, I think, as follows:

In the first place, if all other conditions are met, payments can be made on account of the flooding; and payments have been made in quite a number of townships.

On the second point, as to whether payments can be made in an area where no wheat has been harvested, and with respect to the question concerning the yardstick in such case, may I say that if grain of any kind has been seeded, there would be no question at all about the matter. If wheat is not harvested and oats and barley are harvested, or any other grain crop, then the other grain crop is substituted for wheat; and there is an established relationship so far as bushels per acre are concerned. But if there has been anything seeded and nothing at all is harvested, then it is self-evident that there has not been a four-bushel crop. Of course that would be a complete crop failure which would warrant a payment of $2.50 an acre.

The suggestion, that there may be an area where, because of flood conditions, nothing is seeded at all, leads me to say that it is difficult to conceive of there being an area of a whole township where nothing is seeded. There are probably ten acres or a thousand acres seeded somewhere. If there were no crops seeded at all, there would not be any doubt; and I do not think there would be any doubt, either, if there were not any crops, and if conditions were such that the crops could not be seeded. For example, a farmer could be paid if he did not seed any ground at all, provided that he summer-fallowed and then cultivated the land. Those provisions are all made in the regulations and in the law.

Then, in connection with river lots, it will be recalled that earlier in the session we put through legislation which made it possible for us by order in council to indicate what the units are to be. As soon as that has been established, it will apply. It applies retroactively for the present crop year; that is, the year we have just gone through.

Mr. MILLER: The order in council which has been passed includes only some of the river lots in the parishes of Baie St. Paul and St. Francois Xavier, whereas other lots at the present time are under water. If these, that are not specifically named in the order in council, qualified, they could be entitled to claim benefits this year?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; I understand the legislation as it now stands gives us authority to pass any number of orders in council necessary to cover all the river lots. Those which are covered in the order the hon. member has are those which were affected in 1947. Any that are affected in 1948 will be covered by another order in council.

Mr. MILLER: For instance, at St. Francois Xavier there are possibly 25,000 acres which may not be seeded and which might not be in shape for cultivation. It cannot be stated definitely yet, but that is possible. Would they be able to claim benefits? There might not be an acre either seeded or summer-fallowed.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, there is sufficient leeway under the act to make provision for making payments where no crop is harvested. The condition of flooding brings that about. We can take care of that.

Mr. MILLER: Even though it is not seeded or summer-fallowed?

Mr. GARDINER: That is right; it is not necessary to seed.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: In reply to a question asked some time ago in connection with overpayments made under the wheat acreage reduction arrangements, which were later charged against payments being continued under prairie farm assistance, the minister answered that it was contrary to the policy of the government as visualized under the act, and that it has been discontinued. I asked under what authority it was done, and the answer I received was vague. However I am not so much concerned about that at the present time as I am about whether in cases where deductions were made, and apparently contrary to government policy, refunds will be made. I have been receiving inquiries about the matter.

Mr. GARDINER: We have not had any objections respecting any of those collected. I presume that the individuals from whom they were collected were quite satisfied that they had to pay the other debt, anyway, and they allowed it to pass. The reason I say it is contrary to policy is that we have put into the act a section which states that people cannot attach these moneys payable under the act. The reason is that these moneys are to carry people through the winter, into another season. It was not intended that any implement company, or anybody else, should attach these moneys. And I do not think that we as a government should attach sums which we do not allow anyone else to attach. So we have taken the position that this should not have been done. Some official did it, and payments were made. So far as I know, no one has made application to have the money refunded. It would simply mean that they would have to pay the debt again, and apparently they have allowed it to go by in that way.

Mr. BURTON: Owing to the lateness of the hour, I do not wish to go into any long controversy respecting the pros and cons of the matter I wish to raise. Yet at the same time I cannot let this opportunity pass without once again reminding the minister, and urging him, that consideration must be given to making the necessary changes in the act so as to permit payment to farmers who have suffered from loss of crop, so that compensation can be made without their being included in such a large area. While it is true that we possibly cannot get it down to an individual basis, for which some people are asking, at least I think the minister and his officials should give serious consideration to the matter, and if it is not possible this year, then possibly in another year we may be able to extend the provisions so that farmers suffering loss of crop will be compensated.

It is unnecessary for me to give the whole argument again, but it does seem so unjust when we collect from the farmers on the percentage of the grain that they delivered in the years they had crops, and then when they lose a crop they cannot get compensation just because they happen to be on the other side of the township line from those who do receive compensation. I make this appeal once again and at the same time register a protest at this being allowed to go on.

Mr. GARDINER: I think I said earlier in the session that the municipal association had suggested that I call a conference this summer to discuss the possibility of making an arrangement among the municipalities, the provincial government and this government to take care of these smaller areas. I wrote back and said that, in view of the fact that they had representations to make, I would prefer their calling the conference. I have had a letter back from them saying that they had no objection to doing that. I expect that they will be calling a conference and that we shall be considering this matter before the next session.

Mr. BURTON: During the years this act has been in effect, a good many farmers have gone without compensation who were morally if not legally entitled to it. I hope the minister will not try to keep too close to the line as to who should call the conference. Let us get together and have this thing done.

Mr. GARDINER: We shall have it.

Mr. BENTLEY: I hope the committee will appreciate my co-operative spirit in not vetoing the extension of the sitting. I have two things I should like to bring up. The first has to do with the amendment which was made to the act last year by Bill No. 261, by which the definition of farmer was changed to read:

> "farmer" means a person who as owner or tenant operates a farm in the spring wheat area or who as a member of a co-operative farm association is engaged in farming in the spring wheat area.

During the sittings of the committee we understood that prairie farm assistance payments would be made to members of co-operative farms. I have two examples I wish to give tonight to show that the spirit of the act is not being carried out. I do not know whether this is legal, because I am not a lawyer, but I want to point out what has happened in two cases.

The first co-operative farm comprises 524 acres and it has six members. They made application for payment; it was considered proper that payment should be made, but it was done in this way. The 524 acres were divided by six, the number of people in the co-operative. Two of those members are not operating any land other than their share in the co-operative farm. The four who were operating other land received one-sixth of the payment based on the 524 acres, but the two who were not operating any outside land received nothing. In my opinion that is not what was intended when the act was amended.

The other co-operative farm is smaller, comprising only 175 acres and having four people as members. One of them is not a farmer outside of his operations in the co-operative. The same type of division was made, the number of acres being divided by the number of shareholders. The three who were operating other farms received prairie farm assistance payments of one-quarter, but the other fellow got nothing. I think this is an entirely wrong situation and I did not want to let it pass without bringing it to the attention of the minister.

Mr. GARDINER: What are the names of those co-operatives?

Mr. BENTLEY: The Turner co-operative farm and the McIntosh co-operative farm.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that the position is the same in both cases. There is a group of people farming co-operatively, and some of them have an interest in pasture land which has been seeded. Some of them are not bona fide farmers. The group that are farmers have received payment, but those who are not have not received anything. The principle is the same as that of a station agent who owns a farm, not a co-operative, but who does not live on it or work it. That man would not be paid whether he is in a co-operative or not. I understand that the farmers who have farm land have claimed on part of that pasture land because it has been seeded. That has been added to their other farm in order to get the acreage. They have been paid the same as anyone else would be. It is impossible under the act to pay anyone who is not actually a farmer.

Mr. BENTLEY: Am I to understand that the two in the Turner farm and the one in the McIntosh farm are engaged in other remunerative occupations?

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that one is a domestic servant. I cannot tell the hon. member what the others are doing, but they are not bona fide farmers or they would be paid.

Mr. McLURE: On a point of order. Is it eleven o'clock? Are we going to sit until twelve o'clock or until what time?

The CHAIRMAN: I understand that the hon. member is about through, and perhaps he might be allowed to complete his remarks.

Mr. BENTLEY: I would point out to the hon. member for Queens that I withdrew my objection to unanimous consent being given, so that a member of his own group, the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, could complete what he wanted to say.

The other matter I wanted to bring up is whether a man who knows he is going to have a crop failure should be permitted to engage in some other occupation. If a man in a dried-out area takes a job as an elevator agent where the elevator will be open for only three months, is he considered to be earning other money?

Mr. GARDINER: The act stipulated that a person must be a bona fide farmer from May 1 until November 1. Whenever a person loses a crop he can go and take a job under the interpretation of the act, but he must be back on his farm before May 1 of the next year in order to collect the payment. He is paid in the spring of the year when he comes back to the farm to take up his operations for the next year. If he never comes back to the farm to take up his operations he is not paid, because the intention of the act is to make it possible for a man to live on a farm through the winter and to put in another crop. If he does not go back he is not paid; if he goes back he is paid. Where a man is operating an elevator during part of the season he has always been paid, but if a man operates the elevator all the year round and is paid every month, he does not get paid.

Mr. BENTLEY: Is that carried out in every case?

Mr. GARDINER: If we get the facts.

Mr. QUELCH: I want to ask a question arising out of the minister's reply to the hon. member for Portage la Prairie. Did I understand him to say that the act is wide enough to allow payment of the bonus on land that is flooded, even though it was not seeded? I ask that question, because the bonus is paid on the basis of cultivated land, and cultivated land is defined as land that is seeded to crop or in summer fallow. Is the government going to define all flooded land as summer fallow?

Mr. GARDINER: We have paid the bonus in the district my hon. friend comes from on land that could not be summer-fallowed because they said it was too dry for summer-fallow.

Mr. QUELCH: But that land was seeded.

Mr. GARDINER: It was neither summer-fallowed nor seeded, but we paid the bonus because the land was too dry to do summer-fallowing. I think it would be just as justifiable to pay the bonus because the land was too wet.

Mr. QUELCH: It is the first time I have ever heard of the bonus being paid on land that was not cultivated or seeded. They have always insisted that a man should at least run a drill over the thistles or at least burn the thistles off and scratch the ground.

Mr. McCUAIG: There is an increase of $200,000 in this item. Is that because of administration or payment of the bonus?

Mr. GARDINER: We had to get a supplementary estimate last year. As my hon. friend will know, coming from almost the centre of the district, we had one of the largest drought areas there last year that we ever had, and the sum of money we had in the estimates for taking care of areas similar to those we had the year before was not sufficient, so that more money was required.

Mr. McCUAIG: The minister has just said that I come from the centre of that drought district. I should like to make one more appeal to the minister to reduce the number of sections to fewer than nine, or, if possible, to pay the bonus on an individual basis. The argument used in the house before for making it nine sections was that the land was sub-marginal land, but, coming from that district, I know that all the sub-marginal land has been eliminated in the last thirty-five years and now it is good land. A further argument was made about sandy land, but there is very little sandy land in the west. Any land that has not had a crop did not get a crop because it did not get the rain, which will fall on some sections and miss others. This crop failure bonus takes the place of direct relief, and any time that a man needed direct relief in the township he was not barred because he lived in a section that did not get a crop. He was given relief because he needed it. This year the crop bonus came along to take care of crop failures; but just because a man is outside the township and has a row of sections in the north end, say, of another township, or on either side, he is debarred from getting the bonus. I would appeal to the minister to take into consideration that there is no possibility of these men getting any relief at all. They are denied relief by the municipality and by the provincial government, and there is no set-up to take care of them whatsoever.

Mr. GARDINER: That is the question to be discussed at the conference.

Mr. McCUAIG: I hope it will be, but in the meantime these men are counting on assistance and they do not get it. The intention of the act was to take care of land which has had a crop failure. Why should we pass laws that deny them this right? They paid in the levy of one cent a bushel, and now they are out. I know the minister is a practical farmer but probably he has not seen the cases of actual hardship caused by present conditions. At the present time every section is inspected, and the inspection department is efficient. I would again appeal to the minister to pay the bonus on an individual basis.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, now that it is eleven o'clock, may I ask the government what will be the business for tomorrow?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Tomorrow we shall proceed with the following bills: second reading of Bill No. 228, to amend the Excise Act, 1934; second reading of Bill No. 229, to amend the Customs Act; second reading of Bill No. 327, to amend the Canada Evidence Act; second reading of Bill No. 329, to amend the Judges Act, 1946; second reading of Bill No. 326, respecting the dominion bureau of statistics. I understand that these are very small and non-contentious bills. Then we shall go into supply and consider the estimates of the Post Office Department, Trade and Commerce, and Secretary of State.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage (does not include the costs of survey and engineering work on the Medicine Hat irrigation and Red Deer diversion projects in Alberta and the South Saskatchewan river project in Saskatchewan, which costs are to be made available from the item of $1,000,000, No. 409, Department of Reconstruction and Supply), $3,000,000.

31. St. Mary river dam project, $2,200,000.

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

SEED RELIEF, SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. McCUAIG:

1. What was the total cost of federal seed and relief in Saskatchewan, 1914-1923 inclusive?
2. What are the main districts in Saskatchewan against which this relief is outstanding?
3. How many of such original recipients still own the land in Saskatchewan against which this relief was filed?
4. How much principal (a) has been repaid; (b) has been cancelled; (c) is outstanding at this date?
5. How much interest (a) has been repaid; (b) has been cancelled; (c) is outstanding at this date?
6. When were the last official notices to pay up sent to the recipients of this seed and relief?
7. What is the cost to the federal treasury of keeping open this account for seed relief since 1945?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. Total amount advanced in the years 1914-1923 inclusive, $10,132,640.43.

2. Information not available by districts.

3. We do not have record of the registered owners of the encumbered properties in this department. To find out how many of the original debtors still own the land, it would be necessary to enquire from the registrars of the various land registration districts of Saskatchewan.

4. As at March 31, 1948—(a) $8,417,887.08; (b) $283,750.07; (c) $1,431,003.28.

5. As at March 31, 1948—(a) $1,432,900.20; (b) $484,985.94; (c) $1,652,009.45.

6. The practice of sending annual statements of seed grain indebtedness was discontinued in 1930 due to the depression and has not been resumed.

7. The cost of seed grain collections since 1945 is estimated as follows:

1945-46	$7,000
1946-47	7,000
1947-48	8,000
Total	$22,000

About half the work in seed grain collections concerns Saskatchewan and the estimated expense for Saskatchewan would be one-half the above total, or $11,000 since 1945.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the government taken any steps requesting Britain and the other dominions to hold an empire conference in London, on trade, defence and migration within the empire?
2. If so, what has been the result?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

OIL, POTASH AND URANIUM—SURVEYS IN THE PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Are any surveys to be undertaken during the present summer under the direction of the department of mines and natural resources in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta for the purpose of locating oil, potash and uranium?
2. If so, how many parties will be sent out?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1 and 2. The following geological parties will be sent out in the field: Alberta, five; Saskatchewan, two; Manitoba, five.

These parties will be engaged in general geological mapping in areas favourable to the search for oil and other minerals.

The potash in Saskatchewan occurs at depths of 3,500 to 7,000 feet and can be located only by exploratory drilling. An officer of the department keeps posted on the situation.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CHICOUTIMI, QUEBEC, TELEGRAPH LINES

Mr. GAGNON:

1. Have any telegraph lines formerly owned by the government or the Canadian National Railways, in the county of Chicoutimi, been sold or transferred to Jules Brillant, or someone else?
2. If so, for what amount?
3. What was the cost of construction of the said lines?
4. Why did the government dispose of such lines?

ESKIMOS

Mr. BENIDICKSON:

1. What was done last year to improve the health of Eskimos in Canada?
2. What is the Eskimo population of Canada?
3. Is it increasing?

FLOOD CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—MESSAGE OF SYMPATHY FROM GREAT BRITAIN—FRASER RIVER RELIEF AND REHABILITATION COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I received this morning the following telegram from the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Right Hon. C. R. Attlee:

On behalf of my colleagues and myself I should like to express to you the deep regret with which we have heard of serious floods in British Columbia and our sympathy with those who have been rendered homeless.

In reply to that message I sent the follow- acknowledgment:

I thank you warmly for the expression of sympathy from your colleagues and yourself for those rendered homeless by the disastrous floods in British Columbia. Immediately on its receipt I communicated your message to the Premier of British Columbia. The sympathy of the United Kingdom government will be deeply appreciated by all the people of Canada, and especially by those of the stricken area.

Referring to the flood conditions in the Fraser valley, I have this morning been in further communication with the premier of the province, Mr. Byron Johnson, concerning the floods in the Fraser valley, and I should like to make a statement to the house with reference to where the matter stands as between our two governments at the present time.

It is clear that the damage has already reached such proportions that federal assistance will be necessary, not only for relief, but also for rehabilitating and restoring the devastated areas. To help in allaying anxiety in the minds of thousands of Canadians who are homeless and who have lost so much in this terrible disaster, I have, with the approval of my colleagues, informed the premier that the federal government is prepared to assist the province financially, not only in meeting the expenditures required for immediate relief, but also in meeting the cost of rehabilitation and restoration. The two governments are continuing to co-ordinate, in the most effective manner, the services of provincial and federal departments, and are in consultation on the extent of the financial needs, their equitable apportionment, and the supervision of expenditures.

[Mr. Gagnon.]

I might say our government has in mind, and I have suggested to the premier of British Columbia, the appointment of a representative of our government at Victoria and the appointment by the government of British Columbia of a representative of their government, the two to become members of a commission that might be called the Fraser valley relief and rehabilitation commission, to have general supervision over the entire situation, and be able to deal with questions as they may arise from hour to hour, as well as from day to day.

I am not in a position as yet to say who will be named; I think, however, it is well that hon. members and the people of British Columbia should know that the two governments have felt that what I have mentioned would be the most effective manner of having the two governments work together in connection with matters which have already arisen or may develop from now on.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thought hon. members might be interested to learn something of the exact situation in the Fraser valley as reported to me by the area commander.

The report would indicate that along the Fraser river delta the general situation has deteriorated slightly in one or two sectors, but on the whole the situation is reasonably favourable.

To the north along the Fraser river, Lillooet was reported to be isolated, and in the interior the threat along the Columbia river continued with flooding in the low-lying sections in the Trail area.

All personnel are extremely tired, as they have been working hard for very long hours; but morale and discipline are excellent. The control organization is functioning well, with excellent liaison at all levels.

Ten officers and two hundred other ranks of the Princess Patricia Canadian light infantry are being flown in from Calgary as reinforcements, one hundred today, with the remainder tomorrow. This personnel will be deployed in the Chilliwack area on the south bank, on arrival.

There was little change in the over-all army manpower figures, with a total of 1,482 actively participating, as follows: Active force 590; reserve force 892. Large numbers of civilian personnel continue to assist, with approximately 1,000 being employed under army sector commanders. Fifty-eight set battery situation now appears to be satisfactory. Additional quantities of D8 twisted cable are being dispatched today via air.

The disaster wireless net is working well. A small amount of commercial traffic is now being carried by army circuits between Calgary and Victoria. A line system is being laid along the dikes to improve communications. Four radio cars are now operating, working into the B.C. Telephone Company net.

The area commander in a signal has this to say:

Sector commanders are working very hard and their organization and planning is first-class. Most civilians are co-operating very well and appear to be glad that there is a unified control. We have our troubles, of course, but that is to be understood. Brigadier Murphy is in charge of the manpower and material section and Brigadier Rockingham is in charge of the liaison section. Both these sections I set up yesterday and both are functioning well.

"The navy is here," as Mr. Churchill would say, and is doing a magnificent job. I am filled with admiration for the way in which the air force is meeting every demand. My relations with the respective commanders are most amicable.

COMBINES ACT

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION ON COMMISSIONER'S REPORT ON OPTICAL GOODS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Justice? Can he say what action the federal government intends to take, either by itself or in conjunction with the attorneys general of the provinces, in respect to the disclosures contained in Mr. McGregor's report on optical goods?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): The report is being studied with a view to determining whether a prosecution is proper in the circumstances or not. The report has been sent by the commissioner to the attorneys general of the provinces, and if the usual course is followed, and I assume it will be, the attorney general of the province or provinces in which most of the activities took place will be asked whether he intends to prosecute or would prefer that the dominion assume responsibility for the prosecution. The dominion government will decide upon its course in the light of the reply that it gets.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If I may ask a supplementary question, what is the justification for the minister publishing a report such as this, which condemns before the bar of public opinion companies and individuals who may subsequently be found to be not guilty, as were those similarly condemned, namely the dental corporations, in an action taken recently by the department?

Mr. ILSLEY: The principle of publication of the reports of the commissioner has always been contained in the Combines Investigation Act, and the course now being followed is the course which has always been followed in the past. It is open to argument whether the report should be secret. That point has been debated in the house in previous years, as many years ago, I think, as thirty or forty, and it has been decided that the public is entitled to know what the commissioner has ascertained. The commissioner is expected to be careful, and I think is careful, not to make his report into a brief for the prosecution. He is expected to publish the facts and his conclusions on the facts. I doubt whether the results of the prosecutions that have taken place indicate that anybody has been greatly prejudiced by the publication of his report.

EGGS

WESTERN CANADIAN MOTOR TRUCK EXPRESS TARIFFS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, immediately following the issuance of March 30, 1948, of Order No. 70425 of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada, Canadian National and Canadian Pacific express services increased to 75 cents the minima provided in motor truck competitive express tariffs in western Canada.

The government has received numerous representations in respect of the shipment of eggs which were formerly carried at a minimum of 35 cents. Upon directing this matter to the attention of the railways, it was ascertained that the railways have likewise received many representations and that the question of adjustment of this minimum was under active investigation. I am pleased to be able to announce that as a result of their studies, the railways have come to the conclusion that a downward revision in the minimum applicable to eggs is warranted and that the western Canadian motor truck competitive express tariffs will be revised to provide a minimum for eggs of 50 cents in place of the minimum of 75 cents at present in use.

Tariff revisions effecting this change are to be forwarded to the transport board in the next few days and will become effective on or about the 9th instant.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

P.E.I. LABOUR ACT—INQUIRY AS TO DISALLOWANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): May I be permitted to direct a question to the Minister of Justice? Has he any statement to make in regard to representations made to him for the disallowance of Bill No. 31, known as the P.E.I. Labour Act?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): Yesterday afternoon a delegation consisting of representatives of the major labour organizations in Canada, the trades and labour congress, the Canadian congress of labour and the railway brotherhoods, presented to myself and certain of my colleagues a petition for disallowance of the legislation in question. They were assured that their petition would be given careful consideration.

WELLAND SHIP CANAL

STATEMENT AS TO TRAFFIC REGULATIONS AFFECTING TOURISTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) inquired why tourists are not being allowed to approach the Welland ship canal at close range, and more particularly the flight locks at Thorold, which are considered the centre of attraction along the canal. He stated that he had received many complaints. So have we in the Department of Transport. The officers of the department have given serious consideration to the question of relaxing the canal regulations at this time. Their advice is against it, and in view of the circumstances I feel that I should concur in their view. The position therefore is that tourists for the time being at least, will not be allowed to approach the Welland ship canal at close range.

FOREST FIRES

ONTARIO—INQUIRY AS TO DOMINION GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RODNEY ADAMSON (York West): I would like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence, of which unfortunately I have not been able to give him notice. Has any request been made to the government for help through the use of troops or the air force or other personnel to combat the very serious forest fires now raging in Ontario north of Sault Ste. Marie?

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): No such request has been made.

[Mr. Gillis.]

WHEAT BOARD

QUESTION AS TO REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT TO AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Last week I asked the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce if the annual report of the wheat board would be referred to the agriculture committee of the house this year as usual. He said that the minister would reply when he returned. Has the minister any information in the matter?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have not had a chance to consult the chairman of the committee, but there is no objection to referring the report to the committee. If it is the wish of the committee that the report be considered I shall be glad to refer it, accordingly.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

REFERENCE TO BY-ELECTION IN YALE, B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): I have a question to direct to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that our attention has been directed to British Columbia, I wonder whether they do not think that our two parties should rise and sing, "Yale, Yale, the gang's all here!"

Mr. KNOWLES: Very good.

EXCISE ACT AMENDMENT

ASSESSMENT OF DUTY ON MALT RECEIVED INTO BREWERIES

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 228, to amend the Excise Act, 1934.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Sections 1 to 23 inclusive agreed to.

On section 24—Regulations.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the minister whether this bill, which we are putting through rather speedily, involves anything other than administrative changes?

Mr. McCANN: There are no changes other than administrative ones.

Mr. HACKETT: Do the regulations which the governor in council is enabled to pass under section 180 include punitive regulations such as incarceration and fine?

Mr. McCANN: No.

Mr. KNOWLES: Why not?

Section agreed to.

On section 25—Failure to comply with requirements of act and regulations.

Mr. FULTON: The penalties under this section have been increased five times. A new requirement is apparently being laid down with which it may take brewers some time to familiarize themselves. Why is it necessary to increase the penalty five times at the same time as this new requirement is introduced?

Mr. McCANN: The reason is that the onus is now on the brewer. There is an additional penalty in that his licence is subject to cancellation.

Mr. FULTON: The onus is now placed on him. He has a new requirement to meet, and yet if he makes a slip, whether he does it inadvertently or deliberately—we will say that it is inadvertent in respect of the new requirement—he is subject to a penalty five times as great as it was before. Why is it necessary to increase the penalty? Has there been evasion, or has the department just got nasty-minded and decided we should have a heavier penalty?

Mr. McCANN: I am told the reason is that the malt is now in the hands of the brewer, and for that reason there is a greater responsibility. Because of that the penalty is higher.

Mr. HACKETT: Is the explanation that the malt was previously in the custody of the department under an excise officer, and it has now been transferred to the brewer, in consequence of which he is liable to greater penalties because if he does not carry out the regulations it constitutes a breach of trust? Is that the answer?

Mr. McCANN: Formerly the brewer secured his malt from the malt house. The duty was paid at the malt house, so that now there is a greater responsibility upon him.

Mr. HACKETT: The malt house being under departmental regulations and officers of the government.

Mr. McCANN: Yes, that is correct—under excise officers. When it is transferred, a greater responsibility rests upon him, and of course if there is an infraction the penalty is greater.

Mr. MERRITT: The minister used a strange remark in answer to the question of the hon. member for Kamloops. He said, "I am told" the penalty has been increased.

Mr. McCANN: I was told by the officers.

Mr. MERRITT: Am I to understand then that the minister did not exercise his own mind in the decision whether this penalty should be increased or not?

Mr. McCANN: I exercised my own mind, certainly, but one cannot carry in his head all the reasons for the actions which have been taken, and I do not think there is any harm in having one's memory refreshed by the officers. That is why they are here.

Mr. MERRITT: As I understand it, the malt used to be in the malt house under part IV which is being repealed. The minister says the penalty should be increased because now there is additional responsibility upon the brewer. What was the penalty upon the malt house under part IV? Was it $5,000 or $1,000?

Mr. McCANN: The penalties are set out in sections 208, 209, 210, and as far down as 214 of the Excise Act. For example, section 234 of the Excise Act provides:

> Every person who, without having a licence under this act, then in force, makes any malt or steeps any grain or leguminous seeds for the purpose of malting, is guilty of an indictable offence, and shall, for the first offence, incur a penalty of one hundred dollars, and for each subsequent offence a penalty of two hundred dollars.

Then section 235 makes this provision:

> Every person who becomes liable to a penalty provided for in the last preceding section, shall, in addition thereto, forfeit and pay for the use of His Majesty double the amount of excise duty and licence duty which should have been paid by him under this act.

There are other sections dealing with illegal possession of apparatus, fraudulently putting grain into a cistern, removing malt before account is taken, selling malt unlawfully manufactured—all with the penalties set out.

Mr. MERRITT: It seems strange to me that although the duties of the maltster are now put upon the brewer, all the penalties to which the maltster was subject were in the sum of $100 or $200, and never more than $200. They were all set out seriatim so that for one offence there was never a fine of more than $200. Now we have this one increased from $1,000 to $5,000, and yet the responsibility being assumed was assessed at only $100 before.

Mr. McCANN: Something has to be known of the background of this change. Perhaps

I should have made a statement at the outset to clarify the whole situation. This whole bill is designed as an economy measure. For many years malt has been subject to duty at the point of production—that is, at the malt house. It is proposed now to assess the duty as the malt is received at the brewery. It has been estimated that our present control costs in the neighbourhood of $153,000 a year. It involves not only the cost of maintaining continuous supervision over eight malt houses at present under licence, but the larger item of supervising the operations of forty bonded manufacturers who supply malt syrup to 294 industrial users. By these amendments, that is being done away with and we are putting the tax on the malt when it gets to the breweries. The answer to the hon. member's remarks is that there must be additional penalties for infraction because of the fact that, whereas before it was all supervised, now only that part that goes to the breweries will be supervised. One can easily see that quantities could be bought by brewers through other channels of trade and that they would not be subject to the tax.

Mr. FULTON: This presumably will save a considerable number of personnel as well.

Mr. McCANN: Yes.

Mr. LENNARD: Will there not be excise officers in the breweries?

Mr. McCANN: Yes.

Mr. LENNARD: Are they there at the present time?

Mr. McCANN: Yes, but they were in many other places where they will not have to be now.

Section agreed to.

Sections 26 to 29 inclusive agreed to.

On section 30—Malt.

Mr. WRIGHT: How many pounds of malt can be obtained from a bushel of barley?

Mr. McCANN: The standard is 75 pounds of malt from 100 pounds of cereal.

Section agreed to.

Sections 31 and 32 agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. McCANN: Before you leave the chair, Mr. Chairman, I should like to introduce one amendment which will take into account the resolution which was passed yesterday with respect to the Excise Act. That resolution read:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Act to repeal, effective on and after May 19, 1948, the excise duty on spirits used in the production of vinegar.

The amendment which I will ask my colleague to move will obviate the necessity of opening up the Excise Act again to incorporate in the statute the resolution proposed.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I move that:

1. Paragraph (c) of the second proviso to the first paragraph of section one of the schedule to the Excise Act, 1934 is repealed.

2. The third proviso to the first paragraph of section one of the schedule to the Excise Act, 1934 is amended by adding thereto the following paragraph:

"(ii) that spirits used solely in the manufacture of vinegar by a manufacturer of vinegar licensed under this act shall be subject to no duty of excise."

Mr. KNOWLES: The purpose is simply to give statutory effect to the resolution respecting vinegar, which we passed the other day when in committee of ways and means?

Mr. McCANN: That is right.

Mr. FULTON: Is it moved as an amendment to Bill No. 228?

Mr. McCANN: As an addition to the bill.

Mr. FULTON: To add the two clauses read?

Mr. McCANN: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

PROVISION TO GIVE EFFECT TO UNDERTAKINGS IN GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 229, to amend the Customs Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—"Deputy Minister."

Mr. HACKETT: I think it would help if the minister made a statement as to the reasons for the amendments proposed in the bill.

Mr. McCANN: This bill is designed to give effect to undertakings under the general agreement on tariffs and trade adopted at the conclusion of the second session of the preparatory committee of the united nations conference on trade and employment, especially article VII of the said agreement. Article VII defines principles for the determination of stabilized customs valuations which the signatory countries undertake to accord to importations of goods from each other. The bill revises such sections of the existing law as are repugnant to the agreement, and also removes certain sections which, by reason of changes in conditions, have become obsolete.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Valuation for duty here determined.

Mr. McLURE: What goods are imported into Canada carrying ad valorem duty? I should also like to know who appraises for ad valorem duty. Are special men called in having regard to the quality or quantity of goods imported?

Mr. McCANN: The officials have not yet arrived, Mr. Chairman, but they will be here in a moment. I cannot offhand give the goods on which there is an ad valorem duty. Appraising is done by the officials of the department who are specially qualified in the particular line of articles of which they make appraisals. For instance, those who are appraising textiles are men who have had experience in that particular line of work and who know the values of textiles. Those who are making an appraisal of machinery, steel, and the like, have had particular training and have become trained in values in those lines.

Mr. McLURE: The minister does not know offhand any articles that are coming in under an ad valorem duty? He cannot name any of them?

Mr. LENNARD: I might say that the statement just made by the minister is reassuring. Not so many years ago a retired hardware merchant was the expert on textiles.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 2 stand?

Mr. McCANN: There is no further question there.

An hon. MEMBER: Stand.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 2 carry?

An hon. MEMBER: On division.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried on division. Section 3.

An hon. MEMBER: On division.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The minister said that the officers were on the way here, and that when they arrive an answer can be given to the question which the hon. member is asking. He is asking for the answer to a simple question. Surely the section can be allowed to stand.

The CHAIRMAN: When I asked if section 2 was carried, some hon. members said "carried".

Mr. LENNARD: And some said "stand".

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Stand.

The CHAIRMAN: Stand.

Mr. McCANN: Section 2 was carried.

Mr. HACKETT: I am a little bit confused, Mr. Chairman. Has this any relation to the Geneva agreement? If it has, we have not yet discussed the Geneva agreement. In that event, although we are anxious to get on with the business, we should probably await the disposal which the house makes of that other piece of legislation.

Mr. McCANN: I have indicated that the sole purpose of the amendment is to determine a method of standardization of values. It defines principles for the determination of stabilized customs valuations which the signatory countries undertake to accord to importations of goods from each other.

Mr. FULTON: While I realize that this was announced last night as the order of business, I do not think all of us realized exactly what the import of it was. Under this bill we are giving effect to the Geneva trade agreements, particularly to part VII. The banking and commerce committee only two days ago completed its study of the agreements, and they have not yet been before the house for approval. Therefore what we are actually doing here is giving effect to some general provisions which the house has not yet approved. Does the minister not feel that a more logical way of proceeding would be to wait until the Geneva agreements themselves are disposed of by the house, either approved or rejected, and, if they are approved, to introduce a separate bill to give effect to their provisions?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think that is what is intended to be done with regard to matters that are of substance in the Geneva agreements. But incidental to the main provisions of the Geneva agreement there were undertakings by the various countries to standardize their practices with respect to the application of customs duties. My information is that Canadian exporters to the markets of the United States have been much more concerned about the practices of appraisal than about the rates of duty. These practices could be dealt with here by the governor in council and by administrative action in the United States. It was a part of the protocol that they would be provisionally applied as from January 1, 1948, and they are being applied provisionally as from January 1, 1948. Our information is that there was much less complaint about our customs practices than about the customs practices of some of the countries to which we were exporting. It was felt that when the Customs Act was being amended it would be a good thing to put these things into the act and to endeavour to have continued the practices that have been in effect since January 1, 1948.

Mr. HACKETT: What would Canada's position be if approval were not given by the house to the Geneva agreements? Are the practices to which the minister has referred something which of themselves are beneficial even though we do not adhere to all the clauses of the Geneva agreements? Are they something which of themselves are beneficial to the administration of our customs laws?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is so, Mr. Chairman. Quite independently of the changes in tariff rates agreed to at the Geneva conference, it would be beneficial to trade to have these customs practices in the form provided by the amending legislation. According to my information that creates a greater certainty and enables a prospective exporter or importer to get in advance a more definite idea of what he is going to have to pay than if the practices remained as they were before. Probably my hon. friend has had representations from Canadian exporters as to the difficulties they have run into because of the manner in which the United States tariff was being applied in practice by the customs officials. So it was felt desirable to take out of our statute anything they might look upon as a pretext for maintaining those practices in their administration.

Mr. FULTON: Then, so we may have it on the record, may I ask the minister whether the Americans have yet changed their practices to conform, or have they given us the assurance that they will do it when we do?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: My information is that from January 1, 1948, they have changed their practice, and that they now have a practice which conforms with this new language.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just on the point of the procedure we are following, may I ask a question based upon a government notice of motion standing on the order paper in the name of the Minister of Finance? The wording of that notice asks for the approval of certain tariff treatment, "so that there may be introduced a bill to give effect thereto". Do I understand that this is not the bill referred to in that resolution?

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. McCANN: Certainly not.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, this is not that bill. We would think it desirable to have this even if we did not secure approval of the substantial portions of the Geneva agreements. This would be desirable even if we did not have the Geneva agreements, provided we got what we are getting at the present time.

Mr. HACKETT: Some reciprocal treatment?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, reciprocal treatment; and we are getting it at the present time.

Mr. KNOWLES: And it is also quite clear that the changes proposed in the bill now before us are entirely of an administrative character?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: And deal only with the practice and ways of doing things, not with rates?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Not with rates. The matter of rates will not be brought before the house until the house has given approval to the Geneva agreements.

Mr. CHURCH: In one of the briefs I have received concerning this general agreement on tariffs and trade under UNO I notice one comment I should like to refer to. I am afraid action may be taken by the customs officials under the regulations referred to in section 2 and other sections to eliminate preferential trade. The brief to which I refer was lengthy; I imagine the minister himself received a copy. I should like to find out what is going to be the result in that connection, because some of these people say it means the end of preferential treatment in relation to the general tariffs agreed to under UNO. Is that so under this bill, or is it not? The brief says it is.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The question of the effect of the Geneva agreements on preferences is not dealt with by this bill. First there will have to be approval by the house of the general agreement, and then the introduction of subsequent legislation. That is not affected by this bill.

Section 2 agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Valuation of imports prejudicially or injuriously affecting Canadian producers.

Mr. MERRITT: I notice that the words "not entitled to entry under the British preferential tariff or any lower tariff" are now being taken out of subsection 1 of section 43. Why are those words being removed?

Mr. McCANN: The note I have says that continuation of the permissive authority for fixation of values for duty already contained in section 43 is intended to provide authority, for use if necessary, if as the result of unforeseen developments a product is being imported in such increased quantities and under such conditions as to cause or threaten serious injury to domestic producers of like or directly competitive products. This immediate, available authority is necessary to prevent serious injury to an industry which could result, pending remedial tariff action by parliament. The general agreement on tariff and trade provides for suspension of all obligations in these circumstances, and a similar difficult situation might arise in respect to imports from non-signatory countries, warranting other corrective measures. The right to appeal to the tariff board is also continued.

Mr. MERRITT: I understand the purport of section 43, of course, but I am asking why the power given the governor in council is being extended beyond what it was in the old section. As I read the old section the governor in council had no power to exercise this discretion with respect to goods entitled to entry under the British preferential tariff or any lower tariff. When the act was originally passed there must have been some reason for excluding articles entitled to entry under the British preferential tariff. What has happened to make the considerations which led to this exception no longer applicable?

Mr. McCANN: As it was passed originally the act did not contain that clause. It was added in 1932, and the section is being put in its present form so that there will be no discrimination.

Mr. HACKETT: It was put in when we got the benefit of reciprocity in Canada. We got the benefit of their market, and this was put in at that time.

Mr. MERRITT: Then am I to understand that in the Ottawa agreements it was provided that we would not exercise this right with respect to the British preferential tariff?

Mr. McCANN: That is right.

Mr. MERRITT: And we are no longer bound by that agreement?

Mr. McCANN: That is right. My hon. friend is correct in his interpretation.

Mr. MERRITT: Then I understand that the countries of the commonwealth have no contractual right to call upon us to maintain the words in this section. Is that correct?

Mr. McCANN: That is correct. They are signatories to the general agreement.

Mr. MERRITT: The mere fact that they are signatories to the general agreement surely would not affect this particular section. As I understand it, and the minister may correct me if I am wrong, in 1932 we agreed, as part of the British preferential tariff system, not to exercise this right in respect of goods entitled to entry under the British preferential tariff. Now we are changing that agreement. Is this change being made with the consent of the parties with whom we contracted in respect of this particular point? I am not referring to any general consent inferred from the signature of a general agreement; is there a specific consent with respect to this section?

Mr. McCANN: My officials tell me that we are no longer bound by the Ottawa agreements in this respect, and that the idea is to make this non-discriminatory.

Mr. HACKETT: I should like to draw section 5 to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. This section seems to make a substantial change in the legislation with regard to the British preference. It would appear to be enacting agreements arrived at in Geneva, which as yet have not received the approval of the house. If my question is not too involved I should be happy to have an answer.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member's question is not at all involved, but I do not know the answer to it. I have not considered this section, nor have I compared it with the original or with the agreement. I do know this much—and this matter has been given consideration—that a provision is being or will be made to avoid applying automatically anti-dumping duties to merchandise sold to Canada by the United Kingdom at prices inferior to their own domestic prices. Because that is not really the kind of dumping against which anti-dumping legislation was aimed.

It is a direct policy of the United Kingdom now to make some commodities difficult for their own people to obtain, and therefore at the same time make them available for export, so as to provide dollars. Under the anti-dumping legislation they could not have carried that out with respect to Canada. It was felt that it was desirable to have these commodities come to Canada. Therefore the provision has been or is being made to suspend those anti-dumping clauses, unless by doing so it is shown that a Canadian industry would be injured, and would come within the terms of section 43. I am not in a position to say if it is in part an implementation of that policy which has prompted the striking out of these words.

Mr. HACKETT: Those immediately surrounding me were anxious to help the minister so long as he was dealing with departmental practices which were to be improved. But I fear that this section raises a substantial question of policy which will be debated when the Geneva agreements are before the house. No one knows what may be the outcome of that debate. Certainly with regard to section 5 of the bill, which deals with section 43 of the act, it would seem premature to take any action until the Geneva agreements have been considered by the house.

I suggest that the minister postpone consideration of the bill until the Geneva agreements have been disposed of. I believe members of the committee wish to get along with that part which is not controversial. But certainly the contents of section 5 raise serious doubts in the minds of some, and before disposing of it we need more information than is available at the present time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There must be some reason why the minister asks for the deletion in section 43 (1) of the words "not entitled to entry under the British preferential tariff or any lower tariff." It would appear from a reading of the section that regardless of what decision might subsequently be made in connection with the British preference, parliament would now be determining in advance of a decision on that question the matter of the abrogation of the British preference. In other words the governor in council on the report of the minister will be empowered to do something which cannot be done now in respect of goods not entitled to entry under the British preferential tariff or any other tariff. What actually will take place will be this: there will be no necessity at all in the future to bring up the matter of the British preference or its continuance. The house will already have decided, by the deletion of these words, that the governor in council upon the recommendation of the minister will be able to do anything he desires to do under this section, regardless of what the decision of the house might be later on. In other words the governor in council on the recommendation of the minister will be empowered by the house to legislate the country out of the receipt of goods at present coming in under the British preference. This simply means that parliament would now decide finally to give to the minister certain powers to remove the application so far as the British preference is concerned, regardless of what parliament may subsequently do.

I suggest that this section be allowed to stand until a decision on the broader question has been made.

Mr. McCANN: If the hon. member will look at section 10 he will see it states that the act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council.

Mr. HACKETT: That does not help.

Mr. McCANN: That date would not be until the Geneva agreement has been considered.

Mr. HACKETT: I suggest that the remainder of the bill should stand for the present. There may be no objection to it, but if we have to go on at the present time we will be doing so in the dark. Apparently the minister is not in a position to give all the information required; and after the Geneva agreement has been disposed of there may be no objection to the bill at all. I hope the minister will be able to accept this suggestion.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister can have no real objection to accepting it, because if, as he says, he intends not to have this portion of the act proclaimed until the question of the British preference has been determined, there is no urgency about it. The government evidently does not intend to have the proclamation made at this time; therefore there is no necessity for action at this time.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If it were agreeable to have it stand, without fixing any time for which it should stand, I think the minister will be able to satisfy my hon. friends opposite; it would not need to stand until after the other question is disposed of. If it were to stand generally at this time, perhaps that would be satisfactory to my hon. friends, without its being implied that it is to stand until after something else has been done.

Mr. PROBE: Perhaps we might allow only those clauses to stand which appear to be of a contentious nature. The next one, for instance, is not in that category.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is much merit in what is being said as to the necessity of our knowing the meaning of what is proposed.

I think the government should have power with respect to such a proposal as is embodied in section 5, because something such as is envisaged by this section might begin at any time—in the matter of fruits, for example —making it necessary for the government to have the power—

Mr. HACKETT: It has that power now.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Perhaps I might be allowed to finish what I have to say; I have listened to what other hon. members have had to say. Perhaps the minister can assure us that we can use the power to keep goods out under this section.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the clause stands, the former clause 43 remains in force and gives the governor in council all the powers that are required, without interfering with the goods entitled to preferential tariff or to lower tariff. So there would be nothing inconvenient to administration in allowing the clause to stand. My only suggestion was that instead of making it a condition that it should stand until something else is done, it should stand generally. Perhaps the chairman would report progress and ask leave to sit again, and the minister may be able to satisfy hon. gentlemen that they are not being deprived of any opportunity to discuss preferences. In that event it would not be necessary to wait until the other discussion has taken place; just let the clause stand generally until it is thought proper to bring it up again.

Mr. KNOWLES: Before the clause stands, may I ask one question? I understood from what the minister said a moment ago, when he was referring to the export policy of the United Kingdom government, that this government was anxious to facilitate, or at least not to stand in the way of, the desire of the United Kingdom government to limit the domestic use of certain goods in order to make them available for export. I expected therefore to see in the wording of this clause some implementation of that idea which the minister expressed. But as I read it, unless I am utterly confused, it has the very opposite effect; because it would seem to put imports from the United Kingdom in the same category as imports from any other country, and make it possible for the governor in council to place on imports from the United Kingdom, a different value from that placed upon them by the United Kingdom, and would have the effect of prohibiting those imports. In view of the representations that have been made to the government particularly by the textile manufacturers, and in view of the startling change made last night in the other act, I confess that the wording of this clause gives me some concern.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have tried to make it clear that I was not asserting that this was implementing the policy in question.

Mr. KNOWLES: It looks the very opposite.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: These matters of customs legislation and schedules are complicated, and for my own satisfaction I should like to have an expert explain to me just where this fits into the picture. I was not saying that it did constitute a part of the picture. I should like to have an expert explain to me that it is not doing what my hon. friends fear it is doing, and therefore I think it is advisable that the clause should stand. I would not like hon. gentlemen opposite to feel that they have been taken by surprise and deprived of an opportunity which they stipulated for quite early in the session, to discuss preferences. If we can satisfy my hon. friends that this does not have the effect they fear, we can go on with it, but if it did have that effect it should stand until the discussion has been had. I am not in a position myself to satisfy them this afternoon that it does not have the effect they fear.

Section stands.

On section 6—Goods exported to Canada through another country.

Mr. McLURE: Reverting back with your permission, Mr. Chairman, to clause 2, I asked what goods are imported into Canada which carry an ad valorem duty and how they are appraised. Are there any free zones in Canada for the importing of goods which carry an ad valorem duty, similar to the zones established in the United States, where in the larger centres they have what are called bonded free zones for dutiable goods? The goods are sold and appraised after they are sold.

Mr. McCANN: We have no free ports.

Mr. McLURE: What goods imported into Canada carry an ad valorem duty?

Mr. McCANN: Most of our customs duties are ad valorem duties, based upon the value of the article. For instance, a 25 per cent ad valorem duty means 25 per cent on the value of the article at the time of entry.

Mr. McLURE: I think very few of our imports carry ad valorem duties.

Mr. MacNICOL: There are a number of free ports. Perhaps the minister had in mind Canada alone.

Mr. PROBE: I want to refer to section 48, subsection 1, of the Customs Act, in which the following appears:

If, upon any entry or in connection with any entry, it appears to any dominion customs appraiser that any goods have been erroneously classified or appraised or allowed entry at an erroneous rate or valuation by any appraiser or collector acting as such, or that any of the foregoing provisions of this act respecting the classification or value at which goods shall be entered for duty have not been complied with, such appraiser may make a fresh appraisal or valuation, and may direct an amended entry and payment of additional duty on such goods, or a refund of a part of the duty paid, as the case requires, subject to review by the deputy minister.

I have read the section as it is proposed to be amended. In line 30 on page 5 of the bill appear as new language the words "rate or valuation". It is in connection with that that I want to ask the minister a number of questions, if I may. Was it the custom previously that an appraisal of valuation could be subjected to an amended appraisal or an amended customs entry, but once the rate of duty which was charged was fixed, that was the duty? Will the minister make a comment on that? The word "rate" was introduced in this bill for a purpose.

Mr. McCANN: It is the duty of the appraiser to determine both the rate and the valuation.

Mr. PROBE: Prior to this bill coming before parliament he had a right to put in an amended entry, and it had to be accepted by the importer with respect to valuation.

Mr. McCANN: That is right.

Mr. PROBE: Assume that he had understated the rate because of any one of the reasons an appraiser may give, on whom was the onus with respect to the error for the rate that was charged at the time customs duty was paid? Who accepted the financial liability?

Mr. McCANN: It is pretty well defined in this section of the act which says:

The true amount of customs duties payable to His Majesty with respect to any goods imported into Canada or exported therefrom shall, from and after the time when such duties should have been paid or accounted for, constitute a debt due and payable to His Majesty, jointly and severally, from the owner of the goods at the time of the importation or exportation thereof, and from the importer or exporter thereof, as the case may be; and such debt may, at any time, be recovered with full costs of suit, in any court of competent jurisdiction, and any goods afterwards imported or exported by said owner shall be subject to a lien for such debt and may be withheld from delivery by customs until such debt is paid.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. PROBE: The words "erroneous rate" appear in line 30 of the amendment. The word "rate" has been added, but the classification—

Mr. McCANN: That refers to the classification. The goods may come under one tariff item, and then in the light of new information with reference to the type, they are put under another classification which carries a different rate of duty. It was erroneous to place the item under the first classification.

Mr. PROBE: I wrote to the minister about a specific case some weeks ago. An importer received some Christmas goods last November from a British firm. A certain rate of customs duty was assessed him, which he paid. A week later he received an amended customs entry. Undoubtedly there was a slip-up somewhere in the department, or it would not have happened this way. Apparently the appraiser had overlooked an excise tax item of 30 per cent. He had collected other taxes, but there was one item which he did not collect. In this particular case, since they were Christmas goods, the customs broker had accepted the appraisal and had billed the retailer for the amount of the appraised tax. The goods were sold, or in process of being sold, with the mark-up corresponding to the supposed cost, yet a week later the importer received an amended entry which had the effect of causing him to dig down into his pocket to pay for an error of the department. I think the department would accept it as an error. I have the original document and the amended document here. The original document does not say "subject to amendment", because there would be no need to amend it later. There is no argument about the value. That was agreed upon, but the rate of duty was found to be incorrect, so the tariff number remains constant. It is tariff item No. 23, and the goods remained in that category, but someone made on error. The customs officials have warned this man that he must pay the duty on the rate fixed by this amended entry. It would seem to me that there should be some way in which an error of that kind should not reflect back on the importer.

These goods had not appeared in Canada for years. They were Christmas candies, imported from Great Britain. I can understand the retailer, the customs broker and the customs officials all being a bit rusty on rates, but why should this man be penalized now, after he has sold the goods? It would seem to me that he should have some recourse. Is there recourse in such a case?

Mr. McCANN: The practice is that all entries are subject to a recheck. In the particular case of which the hon. member speaks there may have been an error of judgment on the part of the official who classified the items that were imported under a certain tariff item.

Mr. PROBE: No error of classification was found, but the rate of duty was amended.

Mr. McCANN: On a recheck it was found that they were in a different classification, which may have been subject either to a higher or a lower rate. There would be no objection by my hon. friend's friend had it been at a lower rate. Because the goods are classified into a class which has a higher rate, there is objection.

Mr. PROBE: There is no error in classification. Tariff item 23 was recognized to be the proper tariff item, but the rate was amended later and I say it creates an injustice to this importer.

Mr. McCANN: Was this candy?

Mr. PROBE: Yes.

Mr. McCANN: Well, it was the application of the excise tax of thirty per cent. Probably that was omitted.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to ask a question on the basis of this section, which I will read:

> Goods bona fide exported to Canada from any country but passing in transit through another shall, upon such terms and conditions as to shipment, documentation, warehousing, transshipment or the like as the governor in council may prescribe . . .

A moment ago someone said something about free ports and the minister said there were none. There are none in Canada, but there are in other countries.

Mr. McCANN: I was talking about Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: My question has to do with goods coming through free ports. Suppose a shipper ships goods through the free port of New York—New Orleans is another, and so I believe is San Francisco—with instructions that when the goods arrive at the free port some American content shall be added; what is the position in regard to duty? That is one of the purposes of a free port, to enable such additions to be made.

The minister knows that for some years the board of trade of the city of Quebec has been pioneering for the establishment of Quebec as a free port. Personally I think it is a good thing. The intention was that European exporters shipping to South America or to the United States might wish to add a Canadian content and the goods would pass through the free port of Quebec, if we had one, where the addition would be made, and then proceed to their destination in some other country.

Does this clause provide that the goods must come direct from any foreign country to Canada, or may the goods pass through a free port in some other country, where a content is added, and then come on to Canada? How would the matter of customs be adjusted in that case?

Mr. McCANN: Goods exported from some countries to Canada direct are, for duty purposes, of the value that obtains in the country from which they are exported. If they come through the port of New York from France, in transit to Canada from New York, the value for duty purposes is the value in the country from which they were transshipped.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is not the point I am making. Goods shipped from France could be shipped through New York, a free port, and on arrival there they do not pay duty to the United States; but on instructions from France, or perhaps from Canadians importing the goods, some American material may be added to the goods to improve them. How would the duty be arrived at in that case?

Mr. McCANN: In that case the value for duty purposes would be the value in New York.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is, the value of the French content plus the American content.

Mr. McCANN: Yes.

Mr. ISNOR: I am interested in section 6, because I see a danger in it and I am wondering why the change was made in connection with the shipment of goods through other than Canadian ports. This matter is, I believe, of particular interest to members who come from the Atlantic coast as well as to those from the west coast. I will not debate the merits of free zones, but I fear that there may be a danger so far as our Canadian ports are concerned, with this section as it is at present worded. May I read it again:

> Goods bona fide exported to Canada from any country but passing in transit through another shall, upon such terms and conditions as to shipment, documentation, warehousing, transhipment or the like as the governor in council may prescribe . . .

There is a great bulk of goods shipped from the far east, wools from Australia and New Zealand, and spices, coffee and rubber from the East Indies. In Saint John and Halifax we have enjoyed a large share of that business, and people on the western coast have had a good deal of business from the far east. Under the section as I read it, these goods could be shipped and landed in United States ports so that all transportation and handling charges would go to the working gangs, stevedores, longshoremen and so on in that country, and then the goods would be shipped by rail to central Canada. It may be argued that there is a saving in transportation charges, but what we should consider is the effect that such transactions will have on our ports, both east and west. The minister should give some reason why the change was made; otherwise I fear there will be criticism of this section as it stands.

Mr. HAZEN: I support the senior hon. member for Halifax in what he has said. This clause should be carefully looked into. My recollection is that, under the British preference, in order to get the advantage of the preferential rates that existed previously—they still apply to some extent—it was necessary to ship the goods through British or Canadian ports. There seems to be a change now in that principle. If you allow goods to come in through foreign ports you will provide work for foreign longshoremen rather than for our own workers and our own home ports, and this is bound to put our own port workers and our own ports at a great disadvantage.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I support the representations made by the senior hon. member for Halifax and the hon. member for St. John-Albert. For a good many years now, goods shipped into Canada under the British preferential treaty have enjoyed those rates only if they were shipped direct through Canadian ports. If under this bill there is any question about that provision being interfered with or being jeopardized in any way, I would certainly oppose this section. I do not know whether this question was discussed when the resolution went through, but in section 3 of the resolutions we dealt with last night we find reference to many goods such as woven fabrics and cloths and so on, which are allowed to be imported free of duty for a period of thirteen months. Is it obligatory that such goods shall be imported direct into Canada if they are to be duty free? That matter was dealt with last evening, and it is important to our Canadian ports that the advantage which is being provided for in the importation of such goods shall be applicable only if the goods are imported direct.

Mr. McCANN: They must come in direct in order to get the British preference. If they are duty free they still have to come direct.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): This is not only the British preference but is under the Geneva treaty, as was pointed out last evening. This provision also applies to the United States and to all countries that signed the Geneva treaty. I want to have assurance from the minister that such importations from Great Britain will be required, in order to avail themselves of the reductions in duty, and of the duty-free provision, to go directly through Canadian ports.

Mr. HACKETT: The British preference was restricted to goods which were manufactured in Britain. There was a great deal of trouble about some goods that came from Britain and that had not been manufactured there, as I recall it. Would it not be better if this clause also stood?

Mr. McCANN: Why?

Mr. HACKETT: All right. Probably the minister can answer the question.

Mr. McCANN: I think he can. I think the information the hon. member for Cumberland wants is contained in this. This is part of the Geneva agreement:

> Each contracting party shall accord to products which have been in transit through the territory of any other contracting party treatment no less favourable than that which would have been accorded to such products had they been transported from their place of origin to their destination without going through the territory of such other contracting party. Any contracting party shall, however, be free to maintain its requirements of direct consignment existing on the date of this agreement, in respect of any goods in regard to which such direct consignment is a requisite condition of eligibility for entry of the goods at preferential rates of duty or has relation to the contracting party's prescribed method of valuation for duty purposes.

Mr. HAZEN: May I ask what the number of that article is?

Mr. McCANN: It is clause 6 of article V.

Mr. HACKETT: Of what?

Mr. HAZEN: The Geneva agreement.

Mr. HACKETT: What clause?

Mr. McCANN: Article V, clause 6.

Mr. HACKETT: Of what?

Mr. McCANN: Of the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

Mr. ISNOR: In reply to the hon. member for Cumberland, the minister quoted from the Geneva agreement. We are not considering the Geneva agreement at the present time. That is still in committee. What we want to know is the reason the change was made in the wording of section 6 of the present bill permitting goods to be shipped other than direct to Canadian ports and to enjoy the benefits which otherwise would accrue to us because of the employment which would be the outcome of handling the goods at Canadian ports, along with the train haul to central Canada.

Mr. McCANN: This has to do entirely with valuation for duty purposes, and with nothing more. It has nothing to do with rates.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I cannot hear the minister.

Mr. ISNOR: What the minister says is the very point. It is quite all right to say what has been said, as I understood it. I may be stupid, I admit—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. ISNOR: —but I cannot see the reason for putting those words in there, if it is only for valuation purposes.

Mr. HAZEN: I might point out that according to the explanatory note, as the section formerly read it was discretionary with the governor in council as to whether or not the same rates of duty would be imposed. From that I should judge that the governor in council, if he saw fit to do so, had the right to provide that there be a lower rate of duty if the goods were shipped through Canadian ports. The explanatory note goes on to say:

It is thought to be in accord with the spirit of the agreement to make the principle statutory . . .

Once you make it statutory, the discretion is gone. As this section formerly read, the governor in council had discretionary power. Now it is proposed to take that power away to make this statutory, and to put our ports at a disadvantage in some cases.

Mr. FULTON: To supplement what the hon. member for St. John-Albert has just said, I wish to say that once again this seems to be acting before we have approved the Geneva agreement, as though taking it for granted that we would approve it. I am wondering whether this is not another section which, on this ground, should be allowed to stand until after the house has either approved or rejected the Geneva agreement itself.

Mr. McCANN: This actually has nothing to do with the Geneva agreement. I referred to it because the hon. member for Cumberland had referred to the Geneva agreement.

Mr. FULTON: May I direct the minister's attention to the fact—and it was also referred to by the hon. member for St. John-Albert—that in the explanatory notes the reason given for amending this section is that it would be in accordance with the spirit of the agreement, meaning the Geneva agreement, to make the principle statutory. That is why it is being amended.

Mr. HAZEN: How can the minister say it has nothing to do with it?

Mr. HACKETT: I think we would make more progress if we allowed this section to stand along with section 5.

The CHAIRMAN: Does section 6 stand?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Section stands.

On section 7—Invoice to show fair market value.

Mr. MacNICOL: This section reads:

Every invoice delivered pursuant to this act or any regulation shall exhibit, in the currency of the country of export, the fair market value of the goods to which it relates . . .

I was just wondering by what method the value for duty purposes would be arrived at of goods I referred to a few moments ago as arriving at New York, a free port, and, while there in that free port, having United States content added before shipment on to Canada.

Mr. McCANN: I think that is given here:

Where the fair market value of any goods is not ascertainable under subsection one, the value for duty of such goods shall be the nearest ascertainable equivalent of such value.

Mr. MacNICOL: If and when the time comes that Quebec city obtains a free port that it has so diligently advocated—

Mr. ISNOR: Or any other section of Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes. I referred to Quebec city because they have been diligently advocating a free port.

Mr. ISNOR: We have been doing that for years.

Mr. MacNICOL: Suppose some Canadian importer imports goods from any other country outside Canada, but wants certain United States content added, and the exporter ships to a free port. The exporter ships it to the free port of Quebec, we will say, and the United States goods which are to be added to that foreign material are also shipped there, where the adjustment takes place as desired. How would the price for duty purposes be arrived at under those circumstances?

Mr. McCANN: That would depend entirely upon the quantities of each. An article is imported from a foreign country and comes to the port of Quebec, where United States content is added. In order to get at the value of the new article, it would be necessary to take into consideration the quantity going into that new article from each of the countries. The value for duty purposes would depend entirely on the value of those quantities.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS—WIFE OR HUSBAND WITNESS FOR PROSECUTION

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 327 to amend the Canada Evidence Act.

He said: This amendment was requested by the province of Ontario and provides that the husband or wife is a competent and compellable witness for the prosecution against the other spouse in offences against the Juvenile Delinquents Act. I do not know how lengthy a speech the house expects from me on the bill at this stage, but I am prepared to answer questions as to the principles upon which the amendment is based. I answered some questions put to me by a senate committee, where the matter was gone into fairly fully.

The general rule is, of course, that a spouse is not a competent and compellable witness against the other spouse. The principle underlying this rule is to be found in certain cases. An important case is one decided in 1788, that of Rex v. The Inhabitants of Cliviger, 100 English Reports, 143. This was a prosecution for bigamy. The common law rule is stated in the judgment on page 144 as follows:

> Here the evidence of the wife went to charge her husband with bigamy. The broad rule is laid down in Buller's Nisi Prius, 286, where it is said that husbands and wives cannot be witnesses for each other, because their interests are absolutely the same; nor against each other, because it is contrary to the legal policy of marriage . . . So in Coke's Littleton, 6b, it is said to have been resolved by judges that a wife cannot be produced against her husband, for it might be the cause of implacable discord and dissension between them and the means of great inconvenience.

Then at page 146 the following pasage is found:

> The ground of her incompetency arises from a principle of public policy, which does not permit husbands and wives to give evidence that may tend to criminate each other . . . but the true and best ground of objection is not that of interest, but is founded on the political inconvenience of causing dissension in families between husbands and wives.

I have a number of other citations, I do not think it is necessary to read, unless I am asked for them in committee. I want to point out, however, that many exceptions to this rule are already provided in the criminal code. The first group of exceptions relate to offences against morality and includes corrupting children. That is section 215 (2). A second group is disorderly conduct or vagrancy, sections 238 and 239. A third group is failure to provide necessaries for wife and children, sections 242 and 244. Abandoning children is another in this group; it is section 245. Another group is offences against conjugal rights, section 354; also abduction, sections 313 to 316. Finally there is the offence of theft as between husband and wife.

Generally it may be said that the exceptions are cases where one spouse is wronged by the other who is the accused, or where the offence is one which threatens the sanctity and security of the family. The common law rule was no doubt intended to preserve and secure the family, but this would not be accomplished by protecting a spouse accused of an offence which tends to destroy the family. It would appear that when the Juvenile Delinquents Act was passed there was an oversight in not amending the Canada Evidence Act to except the newly created offences which were very similar in character to some already excepted from the rule.

Offences against the Juvenile Delinquents Act are these: aiding, causing, abetting, conniving, promoting or contributing to delinquency, or neglecting to do that which would tend to prevent delinquency. In addition, there is the offence of inducing a child to leave a detention home, et cetera, which is section 34. Delinquency means, in effect, violation of the law or viciousness or doing any act resulting in liability to be committed to a reformatory.

That rule is laid down in section 2 (g) of the Juvenile Delinquents Act. So, having in mind the fact that this amendment has been requested by an important attorney general's department, and that the exception seems to be in line with the exceptions already contained in the criminal code, it was decided to bring this bill forward.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, the minister has set out the law on the subject and, personally, having regard to the necessity of enforcing the law, with a view to assuring the protection of children from delinquency, I feel there should be no reason why this particular amendment should not be accepted by the house.

I believe one of the major matters for consideration of parliament at this time is that of juvenile delinquency, and particularly delinquency arising from the commission of sex crimes, which are becoming so general. If in discussing this matter I might be permitted to refer to that subject, I should be pleased indeed; because, after all, it is interlocked with the question of delinquency.

I do not know—although I shall ask the minister in committee—whether consideration has been given to making some provision to cover the case of sex perverts who contribute in such a degree to delinquency. I realize the difficulty under our constitution whereby penal institutions such as penitentiaries are within the jurisdiction of the federal authority, while other institutions such as jails and hospitals come under provincial authority. I believe, however, that we in parliament should meet this problem. It is one which in considerably increasing measure affects the moral welfare of the children of this country.

Heretofore, in offences contributing to delinquency the usual method has been simply to punish by imprisonment. But imprisonment does not meet the problem. I have had the experience of meeting some of those who have committed these offences against young children. These accused have not been feeble-minded; indeed in some instances they have had more than normal intelligence. They commit these offences from which the children against whom they are committed can never fully recover.

The accused are sent to penal institutions; but the imprisonment, coupled with other punishments such as whipping, does not meet the problem. Sterilization has been tried. A brain operation known as pre-frontal lobotomy has been tried, and endocrine gland treatment has been tried. None of these has been successful. One method that has been used has been to send these individuals to institutions where psychopathic treatment can be given. I had occasion recently to see some of the work being done in Minnesota. The states of Minnesota and Massachusetts have endeavoured to meet the problem by having these offenders placed in mental institutions from which they cannot be discharged until such time as they are certificated as being free from any further tendency in this direction.

In New York state a thorough investigation of the subject has been made, and it has been found, according to statistics which I have here, that only nine per cent of these offenders are recidivists. In other words, if psychopathic or psychiatric treatment is given them they can be restored to citizenship which ordinarily they would be denied. They are also rendered thereby no longer dangerous while at large, provided that the treatment is continued over a reasonable length of time.

I suggest that in this connection something should be done with a view to bringing the provinces to a realization of the necessity of action being taken. To send these people to penitentiaries so that they come out at the end of their terms, during which time they have been removed from society, means that they are still subject to the impulse after having served those terms, an impulse which they will tell you is uncontrollable. But if they are placed in an institution where they receive mental treatment and where they are under the charge of those who have given study to the subject, the general run of statistics on the subject—and the matter has been studied only recently—show that only one in eleven repeats.

In order to prevent the recurrence of these offences, I say the minister would be making a worthwhile contribution if some amendment could be brought in whereby, with the consent of the provinces, those who commit such offences would be subject to being sent to provincial hospital institutions or to reform institutions where they might receive treatment which might once more render them good citizens, reform them and at the same time protect society.

I realize the difficulties in the problem. As I said a moment ago, I have spoken to some of these men. Two of them I now have in mind were well educated, with mentalities far above the average. Indeed their intelligence quotient was high. After having committed the offence, they have an abiding sense of guilt and regret.

Sending them to penitentiaries has not been the cure. Sterilization and the performing of the operations I mentioned a while ago have been unsuccessful. Mental treatment has proven successful. They should be placed in institutions where they could receive such treatment, and should be kept there until such time as they are no longer a danger to society. If that were done an advance would be made toward the solution of a problem which today is a matter of concern to many of our people.

I believe the suggested amendment to the Canada Evidence Act is necessary. I have seen justice denied because the wife was, while competent, not compellable. However I take the opportunity when discussing this amendment to ask the minister what he has in mind, and also to ascertain from him whether or not, through co-operation with the provinces, provincial curative institutions could be made available to those who commit crimes against morality and thereby contribute to juvenile delinquency.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Wife or husband competent and compellable witness for prosecution.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, when the amendments to the criminal code are introduced I will make a statement on the subject of criminal sexual psychopaths. It may not meet my hon. friend's suggestion, but at any rate it will be an attempt to deal with the subject.

Mr. FULTON: Mr. Chairman, I did not like to raise this point with the Speaker in the chair, but I would ask the minister to consider it as well, if he will. Sections 33 and 34 of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, to which the amendments will make the Canada Evidence Act apply, provide in part that:

33. (1) Any person, whether the parent or guardian of the child or not, who, knowingly or wilfully,

(b) does any act producing, promoting, or contributing to a child's being a juvenile delinquent or likely to make any child a juvenile delinquent.

—shall be liable to certain penalties on conviction. It is proposed to extend the Canada Evidence Act and to make the husband or wife a competent and compellable witness. The question I wish to ask has to do with the Juvenile Delinquents Act. I have been furnished with a sample of so-called crime comics which, under the guise of "Crime does not pay" appeal to children to read them. They portray crimes of sexual and other violence in picture form. I do not want to develop this point at length, because it is not strictly relevant to the Canada Evidence Act, but I do suggest this. It is difficult to deal with these publications under any form of censorship, although something might be done. I am told that the circulation of these crime comics, even in Kamloops, reaches 15,000 a month. Perhaps proceedings could be had under the criminal code to put a stop to this tendency. It is doing an act producing or contributing to a child's becoming a juvenile delinquent. I am not going to elaborate my idea at the moment, because I have certain questions on the order paper the replies to which I should like to get before I go into the matter, but I would appreciate it if the minister would let me know what he feels about the subject.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman asks me to indicate what I feel about that subject. It is a most difficult thing to say what is fit for publication and what is not. We receive a continual stream of resolutions asking us to ban salacious magazines and other publications, and there is the same complaint about these comics, which it is alleged lead children to crime. But it would appear that it is covered now by the Juvenile Delinquents Act, which provides a penalty for any person doing or contributing to a child's becoming a juvenile delinquent. The trouble, of course, would be to get a conviction. The possibility depends largely on the state of public opinion in the community. It is not possible to define with any exactitude decency or a publication that leads to crime. What about an adventure story or a story in which there is any crime at all? It is such an intangible thing. If my hon. friend feels that the publication of certain crime comics contributes to juvenile delinquency I should think he could have a charge laid and see whether he could get a conviction. I do not think any further definition in the law would be practicable. We certainly could not make a list of the publications that lead to crime. I think the law is sufficient already. It is a matter of getting convictions, having in mind the state of public opinion in the various communities.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I hope that hon. members will not continue this discussion. As the hon. member for Kamloops himself said, it is not relevant to the clause before us.

Mr. FULTON: I said, not strictly relevant.

Mr. KNOWLES: With respect to the amendment before us, I understood the minister to say that it was requested by the attorney general of Ontario. Did any other province make a similar request, and, failing that, has there been any expression of opinion from the other provinces one way or the other?

Mr. ILSLEY: No other request and no comments.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I have a suggestion to make to the minister when dealing with the compellability of the spouse. I wonder if it would not be advisable to amend the act to make it apply only to a spouse who was married at the time the offence was committed. As it is now, some of them get married after the event and so avoid punishment for the crime committed. I think my suggestion is worthy of consideration. Courts have been tricked on more than one occasion by the party getting married after the event.

JUDGES ACT

DISCONTINUANCE OF SPECIAL SALARY FOR DIVORCE COURT JUDGE IN NOVA SCOTIA

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 329, to amend the Judges Act, 1946.

He said: Mr. Speaker, some hon. gentlemen may wish a little explanation of this bill. I explained it briefly when it was introduced. At this year's session of the legislature of Ontario they amended their pre-confederation statute relating to their courts for divorce and matrimonial causes, so that the jurisdiction in matters of divorce would not necessarily be confined to one judge, as has always been the case, but would be possessed by such of the judges of the supreme court as are from time to time appointed by the governor general to be judges of the court for divorce and matrimonial causes. At the request of the province of Nova Scotia all the judges have been invested with divorce jurisdiction, instead of one only. The consequence of the change is that there should be no special remuneration to the divorce judge, and this bill deletes the clause in the Judges Act which provides for $500 a year remuneration for the divorce court judge. This bill is introduced with the consent of the government of Nova Scotia.

Mr. BRYCE: It is not discrimination against Nova Scotia?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Repeal.

Mr. CHURCH: The principle of this bill is that it confers on the supreme court judges of Nova Scotia the power to deal with divorce. That is the only object of the bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: The bill does not convey any jurisdiction at all; it merely removes the extra pay of one judge.

STATISTICS ACT

DOMINION BUREAU OF STATISTICS

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 326, respecting the dominion bureau of statistics.

Mr. KNOWLES: May we have a statement?

Mr. McILRAITH: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to revoke the present Statistics Act and to replace it by a statute which will describe the present functions of the bureau, and the statutory authority under which it operates. The Statistics Act, setting up the bureau of statistics as the central statistical organization of Canada, was enacted originally in 1918. Minor amendments were made in 1919 and again in 1921. The bureau itself has grown considerably. It now has some 1,200 employees. It issues some 434 regular publications besides some special ones. In addition, it deals with special requests amounting to some 500 a month at the present time. There are about 400 separate mailing and subscription lists. As an example of that, I might mention that the "Canadian Statistical Review" has some 3,000 subscribers, and this number is increasing. The "Wheat Review" has some 2,000 subscribers. The "Canada Year Book" and the "Canada Handbook" are known to all hon. members. They have a very high reputation throughout the world. They are indicative of the work that the bureau is doing. It sells some 11,000 year books and 60,000 "Canada Handbooks" annually.

Incidentally, although "Canada 1948" was published only a month and a half ago, about half of the 60,000 copies have already been sold. The 1947 year book which was issued last January is now practically out of print. I mention these two examples as evidence of the demand for these publications.

Since 1918 the bureau has won a very high reputation, both nationally and internationally, for its work, and the work envisaged in the 1918 act has, in a very large measure, been implemented. The bureau now includes in its operations all the important statistical fields which are of general interest. The principle of centralization as opposed to departmental collection of statistics and tabulation has been established, and a scheme of co-ordinating departmental administrative statistics with the general statistical scheme of the bureau is in operation. There is also an important measure of co-operation and co-ordination of effort between the provinces and the dominion in many statistical fields.

During the past thirty years there has been an enormous increase in the number and complexity of the economic and social problems with which governments, business, and private individuals have had to deal, and a greatly increased amount of statistical information has been required in order to deal with these problems. The need for statistics has grown steadily, not only on a national but on an international scale.

However, notwithstanding what I have said about the bureau of statistics, the act in its present form is defective in this way. First, it does not mention specifically many of the economic and social fields on which statistical information is now being obtained. Second, it does not contain statutory authority for new collection techniques, such as the technique known as sampling.

The bill is drafted to provide statutory authority for the things now being done, and for the collection of some statistics which are now being collected by consent. It is done in the light of the thirty years' experience since the original act. It furnishes adequate statutory authority for statistical work which is now being done, rather than envisaging any material change in the coverage. In other words, it is bringing the present act up to date rather than setting out on any new field.

Hon. members will notice, when we come to deal with the bill itself, that many of the sections of the act are unchanged. A great many of the sections are unchanged or changed only with respect to verbal changes or slight additions in wording for clarification or accuracy. Perhaps it would be better to leave reference to the various sections of the act and the changes in it until they are called in the committee; we can then deal with those points.

The point I wish to make now is that the scheme of this new bill, which is replacing the present act, is rather to provide specific statutory authority for what is now being done and to bring up to date the definition of the authority of the bureau in those fields in which it operates only with the consent of the persons from whom it collects statistics.

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, the bureau of statistics renders a valuable service to this country. Despite the fact that the parliamentary assistant said just now that all statistical fields of general interest are covered by it, I do not quite agree with that statement. The service rendered is by no means complete, and I believe its efficiency can be improved.

I rise to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe)—who, I regret, is not in his place while the bill is being introduced—and the government, to have it improved by instructing the bureau of statistics to keep records of interprovincial trade.

Statistics on interprovincial trade should be kept by the bureau. At the present time such records are not available. If I ask the bureau of statistics for figures showing the trade between any one province and any other, for example between New Brunswick and British Columbia, or between Alberta and Ontario, or between Saskatchewan and any other province, the information is not available, for records are not kept.

It is important, I submit, that such records be kept if we are to have a true picture of interprovincial business. It is impossible to study intelligently, and to arrive at sound conclusions on, many of the problems which parliament has to deal with, or to obtain the evidence which is required by committees and commissions that are set up from time to time by the government, when records are not kept with regard to interprovincial trade. This information should be readily available.

The request I make, that records and statistics of interprovincial trade be kept, is not original with me, nor is it a new one. It was one of the important recommendations that were made by the commission known as the Duncan commission—

Mr. ISNOR: The royal commission on maritime claims.

Mr. HAZEN: The royal commission on maritime claims, known as the Duncan commission, which was set up in 1926. This commission consisted of Sir Andrew Rae Duncan, as chairman, the Hon. W. B. Wallace, county court judge of Nova Scotia, and Doctor Cyrus Macmillan, who not long ago sat in this house. The secretary of the commission was Mr. F. MacLure Sclanders, F.R.G.S.

When that commission investigated maritime claims it made a report in which there were a number of recommendations, one of which, recommendation No. 39, under the head of "Statistics", asked that statistics on interprovincial trade be kept. I propose to read a portion of that section:

> We have had brought before us the lack of any comprehensive measurement of the trade of the maritime provinces with other provinces and with foreign markets. We were ourselves disappointed not to be able to pursue investigations on trade matters along lines which such statistics would have enabled us to do. We found on inquiry at the dominion bureau of statistics that consideration had been given some time ago to this very subject but, mainly through lack of organization in the statistics relating to certain phases of transportation, it was not possible to proceed with the plans that had been formulated.

This is the recommendation.

> We strongly urge that these difficulties should be overcome, as they can be, and that on this phase of internal trade a system of statistics should be made regularly available from as early a date as possible.

I would urge the minister that he give consideration to this recommendation and that, in the interest of this country, in the interest of the various provinces, both on the Atlantic coast and on the Pacific, and in between, records be kept of our interprovincial trade.

A few years ago Mr. Sclanders, who, as I have said, was secretary of the commission, discussed the report with me, and during the course of our conversation he told me that some time before he had met Sir Andrew Rae Duncan—that is to say, some years after the report had been made—and Sir Andrew had told him that he considered this particular recommendation one of the most important in the report.

The recommendation has not been implemented, and I would ask the minister to take steps to have it carried out.

Section 32 of the bill, under the heading "General Statistics", provides that the bureau shall collect, compile, analyse, abstract and publish statistics in relation to all or any of certain matters that are set out, the list starting with population and going on to embrace various subjects. I suggest that there be another clause (n) reading, "Interprovincial trade".

Possibly under the present clause (m) the governor in council has the right to instruct the bureau of statistics to take steps to make these records of interprovincial trade. I suggest that it would be in the interests of the country if such records were kept and if we included in section 32 of the bill another clause reading "Interprovincial trade," or words to that effect.

I would appreciate some support in this matter, because I believe that if statistics on trade between the different provinces were kept it would be of great assistance to us in dealing with the many problems we have to face.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with both previous speakers in saying how valuable is the work of the dominion bureau of statistics. I have listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen), and I think he has made a good case for the request he has presented to the house.

With regard to the work of the bureau in general, I was glad that the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. McIlraith) took the time to give us a summary of the work that is being done. I was also glad that he indicated the popularity of the useful and valuable publications which the bureau is putting out.

There are, of course, people who sometimes get the notion that the collecting of facts and figures is a waste of money; but I doubt if those people realize the effect that the having of facts and figures has had upon the development of government policy and the improving of social conditions. Hardly a day goes by in this house that members do not quote—and particularly members from the opposition side of the house—figures from the dominion bureau of statistics to try to show the government changes in policy or improvements in legislation that they feel are necessary. I am also reminded of the fact that the international labour organization has done a job along this line which has been of great value in helping to improve labour and social standards throughout the world. In other words, this is quite definitely another case where knowledge of the facts is useful. Our dominion bureau of statistics has done a good job.

I am glad to see the government introducing an act to bring the statutory provisions up to date, so that there will be proper provision for the practices and the work that the bureau is already carrying on. I am glad that they have found the ways and means, without overstepping the statute, to make progress and to do the job they have done for the country thus far.

There is just one point about which I should like to say a few words at this time. It relates to figures which the dominion bureau of statistics put out and about which Canadians know the most, namely, their figures in relation to the cost of living. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, this is not a pretext for me to launch out into a speech on the rising cost of living; I intend to stick to the subject of statistics. But it seems to me that it would be advisable now for the bureau to do two things. First of all, I suggest that the norm or the base for arriving at the cost of living index needs to be revised.

As we all know, the present cost of living index is based on what was regarded as a norm or average back in the period 1935 to 1939. But even that norm or average had to be arrived at in a rather arbitrary manner. As I recall it, it was done by taking some 1,400 or 1,500 Canadian families. Those families happened to have incomes varying from $600 up to about $2,800 a year. Taking those actual families scattered from one end of Canada to the other, the bureau found that they had an average income of $1,453.80. Then the bureau simply found out what those 1,400 odd families were actually spending their money on at that time—what they were actually spending that $1,453.80 on, for purposes of living.

Obviously that can hardly be regarded as a norm or standard for comparison in this post-war period. I suggest that there were at least two things wrong with that figure which was taken for 100 back at that time. On the one hand, that figure of $1,453.80 represented an amount per year which was higher than the average wage level at the time. It is also to be pointed out that even that amount at that time—not to mention its gross inadequacy today—would not buy what the Department of National Health and Welfare would regard as an adequate standard of living. There have been changes since then, and our ideas as to what is a normal standard of living have changed. In order to get something that is correct statistically, I suggest that the bureau should now devise a new basis for measuring the cost of living index.

The other suggestion I should like to make is this. I feel that the bureau should find a way in which to give the cost of living index not only in percentages but also—in fact preferably—in dollars and cents. Averages are deceptive and percentages are deceptive; but people understand dollars and cents. I quote as a good example the Labour Gazette, which publishes wage statistics from time to time. When those statistics are given, they are given in both ways, both in percentages, in terms of an index figure, and in actual dollars and cents. I think that information as to the cost of living furnished by the bureau to our people in terms of dollars and cents would be much more useful than it is at the present time merely in terms of a rather unreal index figure. I realize that if it were in dollars and cents, which would make it a little bit more understandable to our people, it might at times be more useful or more embarrassing, depending upon from which side of the house the figures are used. But that really does not matter. The purpose of getting statistics is to be able to use the knowledge we have about life in this country in order to improve it in every possible way.

One speaks as a layman when he talks about these things and realizes that the scientific people who are engaged in this business may have comments to make one way or the other. But I am sure it would improve the usefulness of the information the bureau give us about the cost of living if they were to do these two things: first of all, bring it up to date in terms of 1948 standards, or, shall I say, 1948 ideals as to our standard of living; and, second, find some way of giving the country a cost of living index not only in terms of percentages, but also in terms of dollars and cents. I just wished to make those suggestions, but at the same time I desired to join with others in saying that we are indeed grateful for the work that is done and the service that is rendered to this country by the dominion bureau of statistics.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): I wish to deal with the general principle of this bill, Mr. Speaker; but first I want to join with those who have already paid tribute to the valuable work being done by the officials of the dominion bureau of statistics. As a businessman, more than once I have felt a little bit sore and vexed to think I had to fill out certain forms, particularly during the busy war period. But the more often I filled out those forms, and in turn received information from the bureau, the greater was my appreciation of the real value of my figures to them and of their figures to me. It was enlightening to me to be able to follow the trend of business in other sections of the country, to make a comparison of my business with those in other centres, and to follow the general trend of the various lines. I believe we should be very grateful that as head of this department we have a man with the ability of Mr. Marshall.

I am not going to deal with any particular sections; but, as I understand it, the general principle of this bill is to provide for the gathering of information which will be helpful to all parts of the country; the organizing of a system of co-ordinated social and economic statistics pertaining to the whole of Canada and to each of the provinces therof, and so on. That is the general principle. You can break it down into figures giving information with respect to certain things, such as the cost of living, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles); figures relating to trends, as well as the census and other duties enumerated and outlined in section 32. I am dealing with the information the bureau will give us to indicate the economic condition of one section of the country in comparison with that of the others.

Just to explain my position, generally we look upon Canada as divided into five sections. You could take the maritime provinces as one section, Quebec as the next, then Ontario, then the three prairie provinces and finally British Columbia. If you were to analyse those five sections I believe you would find a great centralization, not only of population but of industry, in the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec. If you look back to confederation and study the reason for the maritimes joining, remembering that it was for the purpose of developing trade in the maritime provinces and of assisting the other provinces, you will find that, instead of assisting us, it has not only pushed the population into the central portion of our country but developed that portion far beyond what may have been thought possible by those residing in Ontario and Quebec at that ime. To a very great extent our wealth is centred in those provinces. Look at the population. Of the 11,506,655 people in Canada, some 33 per cent are in Ontario and 29 per cent in Quebec, or a total of 62 per cent of our population in those two provinces. Then, if we look at the income we find that the income of those provinces far exceeds that of any other section of Canada. The per capita income in Ontario is $647, as compared with $385 in the maritimes. The income of the maritimes represents only seven per cent of our per capita wealth, as compared with 41 per cent in Ontario and 25 per cent in Quebec, or a total of 66 per cent in these two provinces.

I mention these figures to bring home a point I am going to raise later. I believe the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is worthy of the attention of the parliamentary assistant; not that I think it is as workable as the present method, but at least it deserves serious thought. And because of the hon. gentleman's suggestion, I am going to offer one of my own with respect to greater consideration for the maritimes and other parts of Canada, other than Quebec and Ontario.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Hazen) and his reference to the report of the royal commission on maritime claims, which consisted of Sir Andrew Rae Duncan, the late Hon. W. B. Wallace and Professor Cyrus Macmillan. On more than one occasion I have quoted paragraph 39 of that report, but, since the hon. member for Saint John-Albert has placed it on record today, I do not propose to read it again. With that paragraph in mind, however, I wrote Mr. Marshall on May 31, hoping he might be able to advise me that steps had been taken to gather data along the lines suggested by Sir Andrew. Unfortunately he did not think that was feasible, or at least no definite action has been taken with respect to compiling that information. I think that is rather unfortunate, though at the same time I wish to say I quite appreciate the difficulties the bureau would encounter in gathering that information.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ISNOR: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was discussing the general principle underlying Bill No. 326, respecting the dominion bureau of statistics. I would refer first to the reference made by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Hazen) to the recommendations of Sir Andrew Duncan as they are set forth in the report of the royal commission on maritime claims at page 44, paragraph 39. Sir Andrew emphasized the lack of certain statistics relating to trade between the provinces, and strongly urged that these difficulties should be overcome, so that on this phase of internal trade statistics could be made regularly available at as early a day as possible.

I support that thought and I urge that the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and of his parliamentary assistant be directed to that recommendation, so that they might embody a section in the bill or, if that is not feasible, so that they might suggest to the bureau of statistics that an effort be made to compile that information. I believe it would be a real help to us in interprovincial trade relations, one which does not exist at the present time.

I have pointed out the great centralization of trade in Ontario and Quebec. While I am prepared to give credit to those provinces for the splendid manner in which they have built up their trade, I say it is not a healthy sign from a dominion-wide standpoint. And it is with that in mind that I make the suggestion which I am now about to make, and which I had intended to discuss when I took part in this debate. What I am about to discuss is centred around the same spirit as I believe existed in the United States when that country dealt with the Geneva trade agreements. Acting in a generous manner, they did not think only of themselves, but rather of the good they could do to the weaker and smaller nations throughout the world. And I believe they had particular reference to Canada, too. We gain by the Geneva agreements, and the world at large will enjoy more friendly relationships, from the standpoint of trade. I believe it will do much good throughout the world in future years, apart altogether from the financial benefits.

I suggest to the minister that if that same spirit were shown by the two large industrial provinces in Canada, Ontario and Quebec, conditions throughout the country would be better. In my view a survey could be made by the Department of Trade and Commerce. I am not suggesting that a royal commission be appointed; rather I am suggesting that a survey be made which would help develop trade not only in those two central provinces, but throughout the dominion as a whole, and that it would be to our advantage as a nation to do so. Because of the terms upon which the maritime provinces and other parts of Canada entered confederation; because of the benefits we expected from confederation, and because of the grounds upon which the dominion has granted special aids to the provinces, I am suggesting that the minister should authorize an investigation as to the possibilities of similar trade arrangements among the various provinces, and particularly the development of trade between the industrial centres of Ontario and Quebec and the other sections of Canada, with a view to selling goods—this is the important part of my suggestion, and I am sticking closely to the principle of the bill—manufactured in Ontario and Quebec to the people in other provinces at the same laid-down cost as those goods are supplied to buyers in the two central provinces.

If we had such a survey I believe it would be shown that goods could be sold to all sections of Canada at the same laid-down price. It would not be a great trade hindrance, so far as the further development of industrial centres in Ontario and Quebec is concerned. On the contrary, it would create additional possibilities and perhaps give other sections of Canada which are not so fortunate as the two large industrial provinces a greater opportunity to enjoy to a certain extent the prosperity to which all people in Canada are entitled.

I could go on and say that Canada is a wonderful country, and make other statements of that kind, but possibly I would be called to order if I did.

Before taking my seat, I should like to make reference to the publications of the bureau of statistics. I believe they have done an exceptionally fine job in their latest publication, which deals with the maritime provinces in their relation to the national economy of Canada. This issue just reached my desk within the last few days, and I have not had an opportunity to do more than to give it casual perusal. It contains information, however, which is of real value to every Canadian who is interested in the welfare of his country. I believe it should be made available to every library in Canada and should be used as a book of reference by every member of parliament who is anxious to see, not a limited picture, but rather the whole picture of Canada.

This afternoon the "Canadian Statistical Review" for April reached my desk. That, too, is a valuable publication. With sufficient information of this kind, I believe we could develop the budget I have in mind, that of placing the facts before the whole country so as to create a greater interest in sections outside Ontario and Quebec.

Perhaps I have said all I require to say at this time. In closing, I should like to make one further reference to the maritime provinces. Out of a total population in Canada of about 11,500,000, we find that in the maritime provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island there are only 1,100,000. We occupy only a small place, perhaps, in the eyes of certain sections of Canada. But we are still part of this dominion. As such we should be entitled to enjoy the prosperity which is so evident in the two central industrial provinces. Within a radius of a hundred miles of Toronto we find a third of the population of the dominion. This density of population makes that area an important one, and gives it an advantage which those of us in the far-flung sections do not enjoy.

Although we are a small part of the dominion, we have sent men to fill every important position Canada has to offer. In the past we have sent important men to the House of Commons; men like Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Robert Borden, Viscount Bennett, W. S. Fielding, Edgar Rhodes, and J. L. Ralston who passed away recently. In addition to all these is our present Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley). There are many other names I could add to the list, but I do not think it is necessary to do so.

I am reminded of a question which was asked of an outstanding Halifax citizen when visiting New York about a week ago. The New Yorker said, "Tell me about this institution of yours, Dalhousie University. Is it a large place?" The reply was, "It is not as large as many of your educational institutions, but it does occupy an important place in the life of Canada, and it stood out particularly during the war years." He went on to say that Canada's war effort had centred around five or six key positions: the finance department, because it was necessary to have money to carry on the war; the department of munitions; the research council; the three branches of the defence department, army, navy and air force; and then he made this significant statement: "In the finance department we had Colonel Ralston, then we had the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, as Minister of Finance during the war period, both of them connected with Dalhousie University. In the Department of Munitions and Supply we had another man closely connected with Dalhousie University, one who had taken a very important part in its life, the Right Hon. C. D. Howe. At the head of the research council we had Doctor C. J. Mackenzie. At the head of the army we first had the late Norman Rogers; then we had Colonel Ralston, and at the head of the navy we had the Hon. Angus Macdonald. In other words, five out of these six key positions were held by men closely connected with Dalhousie University, and five out of the six were maritimers, so that we played an important part in the war effort in Canada."

We are now asking the rest of Canada, particularly the two large central provinces of Ontario and Quebec, to allow some little part of their prosperity to overflow and spread out toward the other sections of Canada. I say it would be a good thing for the bureau of statistics to prepare a report showing a way in which goods could be landed in the extreme eastern and western parts of Canada and sold at the same prices at which they are sold in central Canada.

Mr. HAROLD W. TIMMINS (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary assistant, when introducing this bill respecting the dominion bureau of statistics, said that the bureau and the bill itself were intended to cover all the important statistical fields of government. It is apparent, from the magnitude of the bill and the amendments before us, that we are dealing with a growing branch of government. We listened with interest to the statistics given us this afternoon by the parliamentary assistant as to the number of people employed in the bureau and with respect to its various activities, and with all that we agree. But it seems to me that one field of statistics has been sadly neglected, and that is the field of revenue and taxation. I do not believe that we have adequate statistics in respect to revenue and taxation, and I say that for this reason. Last year, I had a question on the order paper with respect to income tax payments. I shall not read the question, but the answer I got from the Department of National Revenue was:

> The accounting records of the taxation division are not maintained in such a manner as to readily facilitate an answer to this question. However, steps are being taken to obtain such information.

I followed my question up with another shortly afterwards, asking:

> How many married women in the Ottawa taxation area paid income tax in 1945 in respect to salaries alone (as contrasted from those who paid income tax on investments), and what was the aggregate of the income tax so paid?

The answer I received was:

> Statistics have not been assembled in a form to answer this question definitely either for the Ottawa district or the country as a whole but, as indicated in a reply to a previous question, arrangements have been made to gather such statistics in the future. However, as a partial reply, the department estimates that there were approximately 110,000 married female taxpayers in all Canada in the year 1946. Their salary or wage income is estimated at $148,000,000 and the tax payable on this income in 1946 is estimated at $18,500,000.

A number of us were concerned at that time to see that the income tax exemptions enjoyed by married women in industry and the professions during the war should be continued, because otherwise they would go out of nursing, teaching and the stenographic field. When I came to delve into the matter I found that there was no branch of the bureau concerned with taxation statistics in the Department of National Revenue. It was admitted that the records were not up to date. I found one young man in the department who had been given the task of assembling these statistics. I do not know whether his staff has since been augmented, but the point I am making is that there is no statistical branch in the Department of National Revenue.

Section 32 of the bill enumerates a long list of subjects upon which the bureau shall collect, compile, analyse, abstract and publish statistics, but there is no mention of taxation statistics, unless that would be included under paragraph (i), which deals with public and private finance, and I do not suppose that taxation statistics would come under that. Taxation is apparently going to be with us for a long while, and those of us on the back benches who have to deal with questions of taxation with respect to the public who sent us here would like to have something better than the answer I got to my question on the order paper, when we ask for taxation statistics. It is something upon which all the members of the house should be given prompt and accurate information.

I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that the answer I got last year was at the very best an estimate. It was in a sense an attempt at an approximation. It was an attempt to arrive at an estimate by means of probabilities, and that is not good enough. I ask the parliamentary assistant now whether it is intended that a branch of the bureau of statistics shall be set up in the Department of National Revenue. If not, will he see that the statistical branch which is in that department, and which is just in its infancy, is taken out and put under the bureau of statistics, so that from now on we may have full and accurate statistics in regard to taxation matters? With respect to income taxes, and all the other taxes that we have to bear, we should have accurate and firsthand knowledge of the taxes that beset the people, so that we can properly analyse the material which is placed before us by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and by the Department of National Revenue from time to time. I wonder whether the parliamentary assistant can give us some help with regard to this matter at this time.

Mr. McILRAITH: In committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would suggest to the hon. member that he wait until the parliamentary assistant replies, or until we reach the committee stage.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, the bill is a lengthy one and, as you have just suggested, we might reserve our questions until the bill is dealt with in committee.

I am going to make a few general observations. First, I wish to say that I agree with the senior hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor), who suggested that accurate records should be kept with respect to interprovincial trade. That is something which is not now available. If records were kept they would be revealing. We would find that in this country interprovincial trade is pretty nearly a one-way street. I am not going to go into it any farther than that. Perhaps the central provinces, about which my hon. friend was talking and suggesting that they might allow some of the crumbs from the rich man's table to be diverted to the poor, may have very good reasons for not wanting the actual picture of interprovincial trade to be printed in a form that would be easily understood by most of the people of Canada.

I again agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who suggested that the cost of living index, as compiled by the government, is something that is very misleading, and certainly does not reflect the cost of living as it fluctuates from time to time in Canada. In addition to having the thing revised and brought up to date, I suggest that the cost of living index should be compiled on a regional basis, because the cost of living in some parts of the country, in comparison with other parts, is away out of line. I know that in the part of the country from which I come we have the highest cost of living in Canada. That is understandable when one takes into consideration the matter of freight rates, and so forth. The cost of living index should be compiled on a regional basis, instead of a certain number of cities in Canada and a certain number of items being taken and an arbitrary figure being set which certainly does not reflect the actual cost of living as it obtains in different sections of the country.

[Mr. Timmins.]

I, too, want to compliment the dominion bureau of statistics on the recent survey of the maritime provinces. I have gone through this survey and marked it pretty well. I have read every word of it. It certainly sets out the disabilities of the maritimes, but the sad part of statistics is that all they do is to set out the disabilities. They recommend nothing. The bureau of statistics has done an excellent job over the years. It has compiled many reports similar to this one, but unfortunately they go to the archives to gather dust, and nothing is ever done about them. This last one on the maritimes is very revealing. It shows the inequality that exists in the distribution of the national income as between the maritimes and the rest of Canada. I am going to read an editorial from the Halifax Herald, which compliments the bureau of statistics on the compilation of this last survey of the maritimes in relation to the national income of Canada. This short editorial compliments those who drafted the report, and tells the story better than I could do it. I am going to conclude with this. The editorial reads:

> The bureau of statistics has shown, in a study, that Nova Scotia and the other maritime provinces are less prosperous than the rest of Canada. But the cold figures of the study can never emphasize the gravity of the situation so strikingly as the news that 200 children in Halifax lack shoes.

That is the meat of the matter. We compile statistics and show the inequalities which exist as between province and province—we have been doing that for at least thirty years—yet nothing has ever been done to try to remedy the situation or cure the disabilities that the cold, hard statistics set out. The fact of the matter is that the trend is in reverse. The answer is not statistics. So far as the maritimes are concerned, we have all kinds of statistical proof as to what is needed. The problem in the maritimes is financial; it is an economic problem. Right at the present time small industries in Nova Scotia are not able to secure capital to expand their plants, despite the fact that the statistical report proves that a lot of subsidiary industry is needed in that end of the country. This survey shows it clearly.

Recently I met in this city people who required a few thousand dollars to expand plants that are already in operation, and they could not get the money. The banks will not give it to them. They have no redress from the Industrial Development bank, which I thought was designed to create small industry, complementary to the major set-ups. The reverse is true. The bank now functions for the purpose of supplying funds for plant expansion, but in that end of the country you cannot get capital, despite all of the statistics, and the most recent ones are the most glaring that I have ever seen.

If we want to do something about what the survey sets out I suggest to the maritime members that we must do something with the chartered banks. In the economy we have now we want risk capital. The government's policy, as announced in the house by several ministers, is that where private enterprise does not measure up, the government will step in.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GILLIS: I expected that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member—

Mr. GILLIS: I am merely following the lead of the senior hon. member for Halifax.

Mr. SPEAKER: We are considering Bill No. 326, respecting the dominion bureau of statistics.

Mr. GILLIS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I will stick right to that. I thought I was still in Canada. The hon. senior member for Halifax was in New York for a while; I am still in Canada. We are setting up an act to expand, increase and further develop the matter of collecting statistics in Canada. I am in agreement with it. It is a very necessary department. I am talking about one of the most recent publications put out by the bureau of statistics on the maritime provinces and their relation to the national economy of Canada, issued in 1948.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I have been pretty generous with him already, and I was generous with the hon. senior member for Halifax. Hon. members must realize that they have to confine their remarks to the principle of the bill which is before the house. The bill before the house has nothing to do with the maritime provinces. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. GILLIS: No, Mr. Speaker. The bill before the house cannot be discussed in all its ramifications until it gets into committee. What I am doing is what others have done before me. I am discussing the principle of gathering statistics, and I am suggesting that there is not much use in gathering them unless we are prepared to do something about them after we have them. I am talking now about reports that have been issued to us, since the opening of the house, by the very bureau which it is proposed to expand, and if we are not going to do something about the statistics that they gather, I suggest once more that there is no use in getting them.

What are we gathering statistics for? What I am discussing now is the principle of the bill we are considering: that is, the purpose for which we are to gather statistics. Is it worth the money, the time and the effort necessary on the part of the Canadian people, who in the final analysis have to pay for it, to set up a department, with a minister, to extend the efforts that are now made, carrying them into other fields, when we have documentary evidence gathered by this department indicating the disabilities in one section of the country in relation to the economy of Canada as a whole, if it is not the intention of the government to make use of those statistics once they are gathered? If that is not the intention, then, as far as I am concerned, the thing should be folded up. If, however, we are to do something about the matter, I think this is the time, when we are considering the expansion of this particular branch of the service, to make reference to reports already available to members of the house setting out the disabilities that affect a large section of the population of the country, and to inquire of the government as to what plans they have for removing the disabilities now indicated by the bureau of statistics.

I think it is one of the best branches of the service, and sometimes I am amazed at the information one can get from it. Its members sometimes seem to me to be miracle men. I would refer the house to this latest report which they have handed out on the maritimes. My hon. friend the senior member for Halifax said he had not read it.

Mr. ISNOR: I said I had given it only a casual reading, owing to the fact that it reached me only a few days ago. The hon. member must have sat up all night for the last three or four nights reading it.

Mr. GILLIS: I got it a month ago, after I heard it was out. I wrote to the bureau and they sent it to me. I read it from cover to cover and marked it.

Mr. ISNOR: I said I received my copy only two or three days ago.

Mr. GILLIS: You are rather slack. The document is so important to the people of the maritime provinces that I should have thought the hon. member, being a supporter of the government, would have had it a long time ago. In fact, others had it long before I received it.

If you had not allowed the senior hon. member for Halifax to roam around in the United States, Mr. Speaker, I would have stayed closer to the terms of the bill. However we shall have more to say about it in committee.

In conclusion, may I say this, for the benefit of my hon. friends over there who believe in the system of free enterprise. The cure for the maritime problem is not statistics, under their system, with risk capital. You cannot get it in that way. If we were over there we would step in and do the job ourselves. The statistics are available.

Mr. ISNOR: You come along and put up a real proposition and you will get the necessary money.

Mr. C. T. RICHARD (Gloucester): I am in accord with what has been said by previous speakers with reference to the advisability of having a scheme whereby we may receive proper data on interprovincial trade. I would not go so far as to say I would support an amendment, because I believe that in order to obtain the data it is essential that we give several complex systems a complete study before proceeding hastily to amend the act. I believe, however, the department would be wise in making a study of a scheme whereby such data might be obtained.

I do not believe that anyone can study certain economic phases of our industrial life in Canada without having such data. You cannot, for instance, study freight rates intelligently without knowing what goods move from one province to another. You cannot study the impact or the consequences of certain economic policies without knowing what is the flow of trade between provinces. You cannot study tariff policies without knowing what is the trade between provinces, and no businessman, who thinks about the import or export business, would think of conducting his affairs without knowing what are the exports and imports of other countries. I believe it is just as essential for our businessmen to have data on our interprovincial trade as it is for us to have data on the business of other countries.

For that reason I believe we should proceed as speedily as possible to obtain such data. I have several times got in touch with the different departmental officials and have been told that I may get the total national statistics, but that they cannot be broken down into provincial figures.

[Mr. Gillis.]

As to statistics proving a cure for the ills of the maritimes, I may say we have been fed up with figures. We want more than that. I believe, however, that we should study not only the maritimes but other places, other parts of the country that are sympathizing with the maritimes, and this cannot be done unless we know just how trade is moving between the provinces.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the bill. I wish to express my appreciation of the work done by the officials and the employees of the bureau of statistics. I think it is a work that is not fully appreciated by a large number of the Canadian people because of their lack of knowledge and understanding of its importance and extent. These officials and employees carry on, as it were, behind the scenes, without fanfare or publicity, and I am pleased to see that this bill provides for the development and extension of what I consider to be one of the most important services of government.

I wish also to express my support of some suggestions put forward this afternoon by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I will not repeat them, but I thought they were sound, and the government should give them every consideration. I also wish to commend the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) and the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Richard) on their observations concerning interprovincial trade statistics, which are most necessary. I trust that the government will give that point consideration.

During the recent sittings of the veterans affairs committee many members of that committee were, I know, much impressed with the factual way in which evidence on the cost of living was presented. The people who are gathering statistics and correctly analysing them and interpreting them according to certain principles require long and special training, and that type of person is not generally recognized because there is no publicity, nothing spectacular about the work. In my opinion a great number of the improvements which we hope to bring about in the way of social reforms, economic organization, the development of our natural resources, transportation and so on will be brought about as a result of the basing of our conclusions upon figures and statistics provided by the bureau of statistics; that is, on facts.

One other suggestion I might make as to the collection of statistics. It would be interesting for the western and the maritime provinces to have statistics regarding the flow of profits from the flanks of Canada to Toronto and Montreal, and information concerning insurance companies which collect moneys from east and west and re-lend them to the maritimes and the western provinces for capital investment in housing, the development of farms, and business, and as a result pyramid interest receipts. The truer picture we get of the Canadian economy because of an accurate knowledge of the facts, the better are we able to judge any situation.

I am greatly impressed by the fact—and this has been the case for a long time prior to this bill coming before the house—that the Canadian people as a whole are exceedingly under-informed about the functions of the bureau of statistics and the information that can be obtained. While technically I believe it is correct to say anyone can obtain that information, I am quite sure that generally throughout the country the great majority of the people are not aware of the mine of information obtainable from the bureau of statistics. I believe the government should carry on some publicity campaign in that respect.

This evening we have had mentioned a report which, as I understand it, deals purely with the maritimes and which quotes figures in connection with a certain situation there. From that report people are able to draw conclusions and on it are able to base opinions for improving the situation which the figures in that report indicate. I think the government should do something to see that representative organizations throughout this country are well informed on the activities of the bureau of statistics and on the information which can be obtained from that source. I would suggest that adult organizations throughout this country should be seriously concerned in playing their part to bring this information to the attention of a greater number of Canadians. The strength of democracy rests on understanding and knowledge of facts. The more we have of those attributes throughout this country the stronger will our democracy be.

I think also that more information in this connection could be brought to the attention of the school children. I have been the chairman of a school board for some years, and have been dissatisfied at the condition which existed, and the same condition exists today to some extent. It seems that those who prepare the textbooks and arithmetic courses are inclined to be over-academic and to be divorced from the practical stream of events, or shall I say, from the facts of life.

Let us take as an example our books on arithmetic or mathematics. Very often they are designed to have the pupils solve certain questions on certain subjects which are not related to the daily life of those children or their parents or to the economic activities in the district in which they live. I believe that something should be done to remedy that situation. The bureau of statistics could provide a great fund of information for the development of sound practical textbooks on arithmetic and mathematics in this country, so that the boys and girls going through our schools, in learning the processes of arithmetic and mathematics, would also come to understand the economic arrangements in our country, the situation as it exists with regard to production, population and so on. In my opinion this is a great field for the findings of the bureau of statistics to be used and introduced more fully into our educational system.

The national film board could well develop a series of pictures outlining the functions of government. While in our schools, cursory teaching is given on the British North America Act, the dominion parliament, the provincial legislatures and so on, there is little information on the function of government as it is related to the departments of government. I believe that the more we can get our older people and our children to understand how the government functions in this country—for instance, to understand what the Department of National Health and Welfare is, and its functions, what the bureau of statistics stands for and what it is—the sounder will be our democracy. I believe that the more we are able to create among the people a fuller understanding of the functions of government, the better will they be able to form judgments and sound opinions concerning any situation.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I again suggest, and bring to the attention of hon. members as a whole, that I have thought for a long time that the records, figures and findings of the bureau of statistics would make an excellent basis for the publication of books on arithmetic and mathematics more closely allied to the life which our children will have to live when they reach adult age.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Sections 1 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

On section 14—Remuneration.

Mr. MacNICOL: I notice that a number of the clauses start out by saying that the minister shall do so and so. Is the Secretary of State the present minister?

Mr. KNOWLES: No; the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. McILRAITH: "Minister" is defined in section 2 (d) of the act, which reads:

"Minister" means the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is no intention that this department shall have a minister of its own?

Mr. McILRAITH: No.

Section agreed to.

Sections 15 to 31 inclusive agreed to.

On section 32—General statistics.

Mr. KNOWLES: Perhaps section 32 might be a good one at which the chairman might stop a moment for breath and also to ask the parliamentary assistant if he would comment on some of the suggestions that have been made. This is the section that sets out the various kinds of subjects concerning which statistics can be gathered under authority of this act. Tonight we have had suggestions from the maritime members about statistics on interprovincial trade; I made some suggestions about the cost of living index; and the hon. member for Kootenay West has also made some suggestions. Does the parliamentary assistant wish to comment on them?

Mr. McILRAITH: Perhaps I should take advantage of this opportunity to say, first, that I appreciate the remarks made by hon. gentlemen on all sides of the house with reference to the work of the bureau generally. It is well to know that the competent work being done by the bureau is appreciated so generally.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The Minister of Agriculture does not agree with the parliamentary assistant, because he says he has better figures than has the bureau.

Mr. McILRAITH: I should still like to express my appreciation to hon. members, in any event.

Perhaps if I deal in order with some of the points raised on second reading, it would be the best way of dealing with the section.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The parliamentary assistant does not have to make a speech.

Mr. McILRAITH: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raised some interesting points with respect to the cost of living index. The statutory authority for what he suggests exists in the act; I think there is no question as to that. But it is pointed out that he would desire to have the information given on a dollar basis as well as on a percentage basis. That raises some problems, because it is hard to know just what is meant. If you get it down to a dollar basis, are you to take the average dollar basis or the dollar basis in each area of the country? It comes to this, that about the only accurate way would be to take your average on a percentage basis. However, one point the hon. member made was of particular interest. That was with respect to what he called the norm or base from which it is operated, and the need for revision. I am happy to be able to tell him that this problem is being worked on right now.

Mr. KNOWLES: Good.

Mr. McILRAITH: That does not mean, of course, that there may be an immediate change in the system of putting out those statistics, because the information will have to be collected from the various sources right across the country to get a proper base, and it may take some time; but that is under way.

Then there was another interesting suggestion by the hon. member for Kootenay West. Perhaps it is not possible to be specific, but I think everyone will agree it is highly desirable that more widespread use should be made of the information and publications available. There is one problem in connection with the publications generally; that is, that great numbers of inquiries are received as to the possibility of having statistics provided on subjects other than those at present covered. The difficulty is always to know when to say no, because it would be easy to run into an expensive piece of work without serving any useful purpose. So it requires some judgment to strike a happy medium, where the use of the statistics prepared may be consistent with the cost. However, with the general remarks of the hon. member about making the information available in the schools, and the schools using it and basing their textbooks upon the information, and so on, I think all hon. members will agree.

Another point emphasized by hon. members on all sides of the house had to do with the question of interprovincial trade. That point comes specifically under section 32; and of course most of the discussion was based on a paragraph contained in the report of the royal commission on maritime claims, the so-called Duncan report. Since that time, there has been a great development in the field of internal trade statistics. For instance, in 1931 the first census of retail, wholesale and service establishments was taken. The bureau now issues monthly and annual data pertaining to some of these establishments.

However, in the field of interprovincial trade, as opposed to internal trade generally, there are some serious difficulties, and I should like to take a moment specifically to point out some of them to hon. members. First, there is the development of motor transport in the transportation of goods. Statistics concerning this type of traffic would have to be included, but with the present practices of the motor transport industry many of the firms do not keep records in sufficient detail to be of use in interprovincial trade statistics. That is one difficulty. Another is that the detail now shown in the monthly traffic reports of railways would have to be considerably increased. Another is that, even if it were practicable to obtain all the data that would be essential, the cost would be high. It is estimated that it would take between $300,000 and $400,000 a year. This relates only to the work of the bureau, and does not have anything to do with the added costs to the transportation and other firms supplying the data.

There is a further difficulty. Even if the complete figures on interprovincial trade were available, it would be difficult to determine their significance. Supposing province A should be shown as the source of a volume of goods for province B. Province A might have imported many of the materials used from the United States, or from some other province, so that, before the interprovincial statistics could be made up, the proper significance of that factor would have to be determined. It means that in reality province A would be only in part the source of the goods for province B; and after an attempt to unravel that complexity as between the provinces and the foreign trade, it is almost impossible to see just how the information could be obtained.

There is a further difficulty, that would cast some doubt on the real value of statistics on interprovincial trade. That is, the commodity trade by itself is only one aspect of interprovincial trade. There are the invisible items such as, for instance, the movement of tourists. How could one get the data on the movement of tourists and travelers from one province to another?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It would be comparative, would it not? There would be no difficulty. You would get balances.

Mr. McILRAITH: It is an easy matter when the tourists come from another country, because they are checked at customs and immigration ports as they enter and leave, so that you have a base. But it is a little difficult to see just how you could check them as between provinces.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): If you go to British Columbia you have to register when you enter the province.

Mr. McILRAITH: There is another difficulty, namely the question of supplying services. It would be difficult to get an actual breakdown of the cost of supplying services between the provinces; and by that I mean insurance, the use of harbours, and other personal services as well as even professional services.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I hope you do not think I am opposed. It would not do me any good, anyway.

Mr. McILRAITH: In any event, that illustrates the difficulty of getting a proper and complete set of interprovincial trade statistics that would really be useful.

In connection with the suggestion of the hon. member for Saint John-Albert about an amendment to section 32, it is noted that the wording of that section puts an absolute obligation on the bureau to collect and compile the statistics enumerated. My suggestion would be that there is a general clause under section 32(m) authorizing the bureau to collect, compile, and so on, statistics on any other matters prescribed by the minister or by the governor in council. I should like to examine into it, to see if there are statistics other than those we are now getting which we can collect and which would be useful on this subject of interprovincial trade, but which could be handled under paragraph (m). Otherwise I would think the suggestion of the hon. member for Saint John-Albert is in too rigid language. It might be heading us into something that would mean a tremendous increase in staff and a tremendous burden which might be out of all proportion to its value.

Mr. TIMMINS: Could the parliamentary assistant answer the question I asked with respect to revenue and taxation under the Department of National Revenue? I need not develop it further at the moment.

Mr. McILRAITH: I am sorry I overlooked the point raised by the hon. member for Parkdale. His point had to do with, as he expressed it, statistic of taxation and revenue. Actually there is authority for collecting statistics under section 32 (i), "public and private finance".

With respect to the particular matter he raised, there is now in the Department of National Revenue a statistics section which I believe is being developed at this time. It is interesting to note that the type of information for which the hon. member asked was statistics on the subject of a new tax arising out of the tremendous increase in taxation during the war. I think the point he raises about having better statistics in respect of the collection of national revenue is already being covered by the statistics branch of the Department of National Revenue, which branch is now in operation.

Mr. TIMMINS: The question I really asked of the parliamentary assistant was this. He has said that a statistical section is being developed in the Department of National Revenue. I say to him I agree with that. I think it is just now in its infancy, and probably arises out of the lack of help during the war. The department has as much as told me that it really does not have any statistics at all.

What I am suggesting to the parliamentary assistant is this. Is this not the time when those statistics should be developed under the dominion bureau rather than by having a duplication in the Department of National Revenue?

Mr. McILRAITH: That raises two or three points which should be considered. First of all, there is the matter of the secrecy of the income tax form. The way it works out in actual practice is that the bureau of statistics works with them in the matter of general statistics—that is, methods of setting up, and the like—but does not do the detailed work of putting the statistics together.

The hon. member is quite right when he makes reference to the matter of staff during the war, and the development since. I think that is about as complete an answer as anything I could have said.

Mr. ISNOR: In view of the fact that I raised this question of interprovincial trade figures, I should like to thank the parliamentary assistant for covering it so fully. I feel, however, that when he says there is some question as to the value of these figures, even though they could procure them, his statement is debatable. No doubt he may hold that opinion, but others have a different thought on the matter.

I say if we had figures such as I have suggested in regard to freight rates, such figures would have had a definite bearing in our case at the time the maritime provinces appeared before the board of transport commissioners. As the bureau does in respect of merchants, I feel it might do in this instance. The bureau sends out forms upon which it asks the merchants to report each month. If the same thought were followed out and a similar form sent to the railways asking that they report as to the tonnage originating in the various provinces this would serve a useful purpose and, I believe, could be done without difficulty. Something could be worked out which would give information of real value, if we had to represent our case on freight rates. If it were made to apply to railways, the same could be done in connection with trucking companies on the highway. This would be a valuable help, and could be useful to us in preparing a case in the future.

Mr. McILRAITH: Perhaps I should make it clear to the hon. senior member for Halifax that I was not casting any doubt on the value of the statistics, if we could get all the information that should go into the subject of interprovincial trade. What I was questioning was the significance such statistics would have if they were not complete in all respects. It is that rather technical problem which I intended to raise. I did not intend to cast any doubt on the value of the statistics, if we could get a complete picture and cover all the factors which enter into the making of a complete statistical picture of interprovincial trade.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to add a few remarks to the suggestion of compiling statistics respecting interprovincial trade. Such information would be most interesting. The bureau of statistics is an able body, and if it could find any way of getting that information it would be useful and interesting. The difficulties, however, I believe are almost insurmountable.

I have in mind manufacturers of heavy goods. Not only are the goods heavy, but they are invoiced at large sums of money. Some of those companies may have only ten or fifteen accounts in the whole of Canada. They deal through large wholesale houses in the large centres of the dominion—Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver and perhaps some other centres. I know of one big firm with which I was closely associated which had only seven accounts in all Canada. The people to whom they shipped trainloads of material, in turn shipped it throughout Canada. So that the large manufacturing institution in Toronto might ship ten carloads of boilers or radiators to a jobber in Montreal who, in turn, might ship it to the maritime provinces or back to eastern Ontario, northern Ontario or Manitoba.

It looks to me like a difficult procedure, if the bureau would hope to have any accurate information on the subject. If it were available, however, it would be interesting to have. I do not believe it would disclose what my hon. friend to my left has suggested, that interprovincial trade is a one-way street; not by any means. We want to develop it, so that when a carload of one class of goods is shipped to the east a carload of another class will be shipped back. That is real trade; and if the bureau of statistics can produce any information along those lines it would be both interesting and helpful.

Mr. PROBE: Section 32(h) indicates that educational statistics are the responsibility of the bureau. From time to time some of us have had occasion to ask for and to use statistics prepared by the bureau with respect to education. What I have to say must not be construed as a criticism of the bureau, because I am pleased to concur in the compliments which have been paid to their efficiency in obtaining information for members of the house. However, some of us have had some difficulty in securing statistics of an educational nature dealing with enrolments, and the like, because certain provinces are definitely excluded from the figures we are given.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has seen fit to delete section 19(1)(e), which dealt with the municipal, educational, charitable, penal and other institutions, would the parliamentary assistant explain why the educational statistics presented by the bureau are deficient to the extent that whole provinces are excluded from the statistical picture?

Mr. McILRAITH: I was of the impression that we get statistics from each of the provinces. I think the difficulty is rather with the breakdown or the completeness of the information. I must say frankly that I am not too familiar with the point raised by the hon. member, but I think the situation is that we get general educational statistics from all the provinces but not details on all aspects from one or two of the provinces.

Mr. PROBE: In connection with enrolment in primary and secondary schools, I recall that just a few weeks ago I received the most recent figures available; they were for the year 1944, and the figures for the secondary schools were omitted from the picture. That was true of some other details the nature of which I have forgotten, but that has been the case every time. I have secured such statistics from the bureau. In other words, the picture that I require and that other members would require under similar circumstances is not a complete picture. Is it a fact that all statistics relating to enrolment, expenditures and so on, with respect to education, are obtained from all the provinces?

Mr. McILRAITH: Yes, it is a fact that we get all these statistics from all the provinces. I am not familiar with the details of the point raised, but I will look into it. Some of the provinces are a bit slower than one might wish in supplying the information required, but there is not much that one can do about the matter.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Does the parliamentary assistant to the minister think the basis of dollar value is of any use without an accompanying table of the quantities of the things produced? What I have in mind is this. We find that the dollar value of our trade in a certain commodity is so much. It may be that we are manufacturing only fifty per cent of what we used to manufacture; yet the dollar value remains the same. I want to get the opinion of the statistics department as to what use dollar value is without accompanying production figures of the article being dealt with.

Mr. McILRAITH: I think the answer to that is this. With some items there is no measuring value other than the dollar value. But when you are dealing with commodities there is no doubt at all that, in addition to the dollar value, the unit value—the quantities, bushels or pounds or whatever it may be—is necessary. But there is this difficulty, that certain statistics which are very useful include items that cannot be measured in other than dollar value.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Agreed, but the point I am trying to make, and I want you to agree with me, is this. Trade figures given in dollar value only for years like 1946, 1947 and 1948, are practically meaningless having regard to the production of commodities in the country or imported into the country. In other words, they can have no meaning unless we have one column showing the dollar value, and another column showing the production figures. Is that not an accurate statement?

Mr. McILRAITH: That places me in rather an embarrassing position. The trade statistics to which the hon. member refers may include items other than commodities, such as the tourist trade, which cannot be measured in other than dollar value. But if the statistics dealt only with commodities my hon. friend's criticism would be fair. For most of the major products comparative quantities can be obtained, and it is just a matter of using the two sets of figures.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): My whole point is that they should be shown side by side. As to tourist dollars, we say that the United States dollar is on a par with ours, and we welcome tourists from the United States who come here and spend United States dollars to help balance our exchange. But, as everyone who knows anything about the matter knows, what the United States tourist is doing is buying our dollars in the United States at ninety or eighty-eight cents or something like that, and when we keep on bragging about how these tourists are helping our dollar situation it is just a lot of nonsense, is it not? Anyone who is half smart buys our dollar in New York at eighty-eight cents and spends it in Canada and gets a dollar's worth, and that is not helping our dollar situation at all.

Mr. McILRAITH: I cannot admit that the United States tourist may buy some of our dollars at a reduced rate, but it is not fair to say that is the way the whole operation goes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): If he were smart, he would do it in that way.

I want to ask another question. We have in Canada a three-pronged program for righting our United States exchange position, and one of those prongs is the 25 per cent excise tax. I want to know through the parliamentary assistant, and the very bright gentlemen who sit quite close to him, whether the bureau of statistics are able to give me one very simple statement of fact, and that is the amount of United States dollars which the 25 per cent excise tax has saved in so far as Canada is concerned. I have asked a real question about statistics. I should like the parliamentary assistant to answer it.

Mr. McILRAITH: Perhaps I should answer that question first and then I want to revert to another one. The bureau of statistics does not have that information. That information, if available, would be available in the Department of Finance.

Reverting to the earlier point raised by the hon. member with respect to tourist dollars, we have the records of the number of tourists as well as the number of dollars. Therefore, if you will read the two sets of figures together you can develop any argument or point you want to make arising out of the question asked me. It would be well to bear in mind that we have the quantitative statistics as well as the dollar statistics.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): No; I have been away celebrating a great political victory for my side, and therefore I am a little behind. The parliamentary assistant says he has the record of the number of tourists.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary West).]

That is obvious. One can get that from the customs department. The parliamentary assistant's next statement was that the information I sought, if it were available anywhere, was in the Department of Finance.

Mr. McILRAITH: With respect to the excise tax.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): If you have a department dealing with taxation and internal revenue you can get access to the Department of Agriculture and to any of those numerous departments controlled by the Department of Trade and Commerce. Is the parliamentary assistant suggesting to me that the bureau of statistics cannot get from the Department of Finance a very simple answer to the question I asked? If not, of what use is the bureau of statistics? I am very proud of it. I would like its records to be accepted in courts of law, and without proof, but now that I learn it cannot get the information from the Department of Finance I have completely changed my mind in the last minute and a half. If the bureau of statistics is to be of any use at all, surely it must have access to all these places. Is the parliamentary assistant suggesting that the Department of Finance has an iron curtain raised against the bureau of statistics?

Mr. McILRAITH: No.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is what it means if I understood him correctly.

Mr. McILRAITH: No; I was suggesting that the hon. member go to them; they have it. That was my point.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): With great respect, perhaps the parliamentary assistant had better answer a little more fully.

Mr. McILRAITH: With deference, and with very great respect for the hon. member, I will answer a little more fully. The point I was making was that if the statistical information on excise tax is available—I do not know whether or not it is—it would be available in the Department of Finance and in the public accounts. I do not see any reason why the bureau of statistics should duplicate it and make the information available. That was my point.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Here is my point. I have asked the question. On the 17th day of last November we had an excise tax imposed.

Mr. KNOWLES: By radio.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): By radio. I like the radio, but that is neither here nor there. We got rid of the constitutional problem long ago. We were right, but the government succeeded; but that does not matter. The point I have is this. That happened on the 17th day of November. We are now at the third day of June. Has not the statistical department this information? Have the Department of Finance refused it? I do not think they have. If they do not have it, why do they not have it? That is a worthwhile statistic, because everybody is paying that tax today.

We have a bureau of statistics. The word "bureau" is a much better word than "department". Bureaucratic does not apply to the bureau of statistics. May I make that very plain? Why do we not have the information? Surely a statistical department must have immediate and quick access to all other departments of government. If the parliamentary assistant's answer is that he does not know, and with all the information available he cannot answer me, that, at least, would be a straight answer; but please do not say that the Department of Finance has it and the bureau of statistics cannot get it out of that department. That is what he has said up to now.

Mr. McILRAITH: No; I was very careful, Mr. Chairman, not to say that.

Mr. KNOWLES: I want to thank the parliamentary assistant for the comments he made some time ago on my suggestions with regard to the cost of living index. I was indeed pleased to note his favourable reply to the effect that the bureau is at present working on a new base or norm for this important index.

However I should like to say a few additional words with reference to my other suggestion, namely, that an attempt be made to give the public an index in terms of dollars and cents. I was glad to note his statement that the statutory authority for the bureau to do this is already provided, so that what I am really doing is making a suggestion through him to the officials of the bureau.

The parliamentary assistant said this would be difficult. I believe he said that one would have to find some average, and that the dollar and cents figure which would be given would therefore in a sense be unreal. I agree that all averages are unreal except for one fictional person, the so-called famous average man, and they are also deceptive. But I point out that that is even more true of the index figure the way it is now given. My contention is that if this could be translated into dollars and cents it would be much more readily understood by the people of the country.

At the present moment I believe the cost of living index stands at 152. What that means is that today it costs 152 per cent of what it cost during the period from 1935 to 1939 to buy a certain arbitrary quantity of goods and services. That arbitrary quantity was the amount that could be bought for $1,453.80, broken down as follows:

Food	$443.00
Shelter	269.50
Fuel and light	90.50
Clothing	165.80
Home furnishings	125.70
Miscellaneous (health, personal care, transportation, recreation, life insurance)	319.40
Other items	39.90

These were the items included in the index, and the quantities that could be purchased by these amounts were considered as the norm in the period 1935 to 1939. The total added up to $1,453.80. When we say today the cost of living index stands at 152 it simply means that to go into the market and buy the same quantity of goods that was bought for that figure in the previous period would now cost 152 per cent of that figure, or $2,209.77.

Let me bring both of these figures down to monthly and weekly figures. They would mean, in other words, that what it cost $121 a month to buy in 1935-39 now costs $183.92 a month; or again that what it cost $27.96 a week to buy in 1936 to 1939 now costs $42.49 a week. I have given the figures for the three periods, the year, the month and the week. Let me now stick with the figure for the week. What this all adds up to, as I see it, is this. When the dominion bureau of statistics tells us that the cost of living index is 152 it is simply saying that it cost $27.96 a week to buy a certain quantity of food and services in 1935 to 1939 for a certain group of Canadian families, and it now costs $42.49.

If the bureau were to say that the cost of living stands at $42.49 there would, of course, still be something unreal about that, in that it would be only the experience of the average man, who does not exist, and it would be only in terms of that arbitrary allotment or assortment of goods and services chosen by the bureau in 1935-39. That is true, but at least I contend it would give a better idea to the Canadian people as to where the cost of living really stands. My hope is that, when the bureau works out a new base or norm, it will arrive at that base or norm after consulting experts in the field of nutrition and health, and that it will tell us what the figure is for a decent, respectable Canadian living standard and give us that in dollars and cents. And then from here on, let us be told what the cost of that decent Canadian living standard amounts to in dollars and cents and whether it goes up or comes down.

I am not a statistician and I may be getting beyond my depth. I admit that candidly, but it seems to me that this is common sense and that if we could move in this direction the cost of living figure would be more understandable to the Canadian people generally and it would be more useful to all of us in trying to arrive at policies whereby something could be done about the cost of living and the standard of living of our people.

However, for the moment I wish to thank the parliamentary assistant for the assurance that the bureau is working on the matter.

Mr. McLURE: All our maritime men have spoken on this bill that is before us, and I thought I might join in the discussion either to support what they have said or to agree in part or to disagree as the case might be. The hon. senior member for Halifax stated, with reference to the population of the maritimes, that it was 1,100,000. Well, our province of Prince Edward Island is part of the 100,000 and not of the 1,000,000.

The bureau of statistics is one of the great things in this country, either from the provincial point of view or from the point of view of the country as a whole. The gathering of statistics is important, and if they were analysed properly the result would be to extricate governments from many of the difficulties they get into. All we have to do is to look at the transportation question which we discussed some time ago and the increase that was involved.

In section 32 there is little reference to transportation and different systems of transportation, the long haul of freight and the short haul. No government or commission, if these statistics had been available to it, would have come to the conclusion that there should be a universal increase in freights all over the country.

While we may be gathering statistics, we are not having them analysed for the benefit of the people. This is exemplified in connection with the long haul of freight. The government may have had the statistics, and no doubt the Canadian National Railways had them for the last month with reference to the freight on the long haul originating in Prince Edward Island. During the month of April, which is the only one for which I have been able to get statistics, 2,600 cars of freight inward and outward were moving on the long haul. Of these, more than 1,800 were outward and 760 were inward, all going to the benefit of the long haul freight rate. If we in our province had had those statistics, with a proper analysis of them, I do not believe that we would have been subjected to a twenty-one per cent increase in our freight rates.

In this section, 32, there is very little with regard to the collecting of statistics on transportation, which, after all, is the most important factor in the economic welfare of any province.

I am glad that the hon. senior member for Halifax has become a convert to the stamp freight idea, about which I have spoken three or four times. I notice he is now in favour of the idea that goods originating in Ontario and in Montreal should be sold at the same rate to the retailer, no matter where the retailer lives. I am glad, as I say, that he has been converted.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

309. Departmental administration, $1,096,287.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to call the attention of the minister for four or five minutes to certain matters in connection with which I have had a good deal of correspondence with him. There is a large surplus in the department at the present time, and I am asking for better working conditions and hours of labour for some of the rank and file of the post office. In our city we have recently taken over one of the buildings used during the war, situated at the foot of Bay street, where the army had its storehouse, and the navy and other branches were accommodated. I refer to the mail order department. The surpluses for the past six years have been: 1941, $1,683,000. That was a war year. In 1942 it was $4,492,000; in 1943, $4,126,000; in 1944, $12,585,000; in 1945, $11,442,000; in 1946, $10,905,913; in 1947, last year, $8,773,574. So far so good. I notice that our city has a postal revenue of over $15 million; I think it is about $15,250,000. I believe that Montreal has a revenue of only about $10,100,000. I have the figures here. In that connection I may say there are far more substations in Montreal than there are in Toronto, although the revenue is nearly $5 million less. I think the time has come when some of these profits should be used to reduce the postal rates.

The post office is a magnificent public utility. It has the endorsement of all the people of our city and, I think, of practically all the people in the whole country. It is a well-conducted public utility. I believe the time has come when there should be some additional reduction in the postal rates which were largely raised shortly before the war and during the war when so many of our men and women were in the forces. The time has now come for better working conditions. I should think in the city we should have a one-cent drop letter rate, and for the rest of the country a three-cent rate. If that were done, it would mean that there would be some reduction of the surplus.

I think the time has come when, in our city and throughout Canada, the minister should own, occupy and manage his own public building. I do not think it is fair to have the Department of Public Works over the present minister, who has a vast experience in business as a lawyer. I think it would be far better if control were transferred from the Department of Public Works to the Post Office Department. I would make that suggestion.

The other suggestion I wish to make is that we should have a more progressive public utility. It is progressive. Valuable services are being given at low cost, and some improvements are being made, I will admit, in labouring conditions, with regard to holidays at week ends and at Christmas time and matters like that. But I think the time has come when the post office should branch out and assume some of the functions performed by the British post office, because our post office has not improved greatly in functions up to 1948.

I do not wish to delay the minister in getting his estimates through, but I hope there will be some reform along the lines I have suggested. The minister should have full jurisdiction over the ownership of the building, repairs and all that kind of thing. A number of old buildings have been used, and they might be put to other uses. Some public buildings and post offices are built where the revenues received are not commensurate with their size. For example, in some of the cities and towns large public buildings are being built where one about half the size would be commensurate with the business done. I believe that should be a good principle to follow, because the cost of building today is almost prohibitive. It is now about three times what it used to be. I believe it would be far better if a cheaper form of building were provided, with more windows and all that kind of thing. A more modern structure could be built. I think the revenue should be considered. If a public building is to be built in town A, B, or C, consideration should be given to what the revenue of that public building will be in town A, B, or C. There should be some relationship between the size of the building and the use to which it is to be put, its functions, and how many departments are using it. I think the time has come when we should have some reduction in rates which apply to the post office department of our city, and not have the surplus used outside for other purposes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I just wish to add a little to what has been said by the hon. member for Broadview and to ask a few questions. Is the minister able to give the committee the approximate number of postmen employed throughout the whole country, and the approximate number in the principal cities such as Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, and Vancouver?

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): In connection with what the previous speaker said, in Toronto there are large stores like Eaton's and Simpson's, which use the mails extensively. This in large part accounts for the increase in revenue or for the larger amount of postage stamps sold in Toronto as compared with Montreal.

As to the postal stations, there are more in Montreal; but Montreal is more extensive in area than Toronto, and is divided by the mountain, by rivers, the canal and so forth; therefore a few more postal stations are needed, although the revenue is not as large as it is in Toronto.

As to the transfer of the building of post offices to the Postmaster General, I have no objection at all as long as I am Postmaster General. If I changed my position, I might not be in favour of the change. But up to this time it has been decided that the Department of Public Works is the department which is to take care of the construction of the buildings for every department.

As to what the hon. gentleman just asked me, I must say that altogether we have about 41,000 employees, including the rural mail contractors. We have over 25,000 employees who are civil servants. At headquarters in Ottawa we have 1,088 employees. At staff post offices we have 13,593, and in district offices, 522. In the railway mail services there are 1,191. Revenue postmasters, including sub and seasonal offices, 11,826. The mail service takes 12,910. That makes a total of 41,130. The number of employees in large offices is as follows:

Toronto	2,978
Montreal	2,866
Winnipeg	770
Vancouver	966
Ottawa	662

Mr. MacNICOL: The last time these estimates were dealt with I brought up the question of more comfortable quarters in the average branch post offices in Toronto. I am aware that some, such as the West Toronto post office, are splendid, and the department deserves praise for putting up a fine branch like that. But there are other offices with quite a number of postmen, perhaps forty, more or less, much of whose work is done down in the basement of the building they happen to be in, which probably was formerly a store. In the summer those quarters are not very comfortable; it gets very hot down there.

I should like to see the department try to bring about a uniform standard of comfort for the postmen throughout the city. That may be hard to do, but I hope some way will be found of doing it. We have a wonderful civil service in Canada, and of the whole service no part does a better job than the ordinary postman. No part of the service works harder than they do, though I am not finding fault with the other departments in that regard. The difference is that the postman is out in all sorts of weather, hot or raining or snowing, usually carrying a heavy load. So when he returns to his station he is entitled to a comfortable place to rest a while before starting for home. Very few of the branch post offices have such a convenience. They may have benches to sit on, but there is not much in the way of comfort or any amenities. I should like to see that situation improved.

On the last occasion I believe I brought up the question of the remuneration of the postmen, and I understand that has been attended to, that they are now getting better remuneration. But I understand that the foreman in the office; I forget what he is called—

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The supervisor.

Mr. MacNICOL: —the man who allocates and supervises the beats, and so on, who has a responsible job, was not advanced on the last occasion. Has he been advanced since then?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, everyone has been advanced to the same extent as the other employees.

[Mr. Bertrand (Laurier).]

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to learn that; I know the minister is doing the best job he can. I think that pretty well covers the questions I wanted to ask. Personally I am proud of the whole postal service, particularly of the fine type of men employed, practically all of whom are returned soldiers. It is seldom one hears of any malfeasance or theft or robbery, though they handle precious and valuable mail. To my mind the ordinary postman represents one class of civil servants who deserve unstinted credit.

Mr. TUSTIN: I was pleased to hear the minister say a few moments ago that he had no objection to building post offices as long as he was Postmaster General. For quite some time I have been putting off a request, but possibly this is the proper time to make it to him and, through him, to the Minister of Public Works. In my constituency a post office was built many years ago.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That is in Picton, is it?

Mr. TUSTIN: Yes, in the town of Picton.

Mr. MacNICOL: A beautiful town.

Mr. TUSTIN: One of the finest in Canada. This post office was built a good many years ago. Now, with the increased revenue the space has become too small for the increased work that has to be done. It is not only the work in connection with the town itself; there are ten rural mail routes running out of that post office. I would request the minister to make a survey, and if he can see his way clear to do so I would urge him to recommend to the Department of Public Works that a new post office be built in the town of Picton. If that is impossible I would suggest that at least the present building be considerably modernized.

While I am on my feet I should like to bring another matter to the attention of the Postmaster General. I refer to the employees in the post offices both in Picton and in Napanee, which town also I have the honour to represent. Those post offices are in a category which I believe includes very few others. The only member of the staff coming under the civil service is the postmaster himself. The remainder of the staff are placed there on a patronage basis, or some other basis. I am not complaining about that at all, but I say to the Postmaster General that these young men, most of whom are veterans, are not receiving wages that are nearly adequate for the work they have to do. As a matter of fact, in view of the present cost of living I do not know how they keep a home together and live.

I think that is something which should be considered at an early day. I am aware that some small consideration has been given them; but in my opinion if one man in a post office is under the civil service and eligible for superannuation and other benefits, all employees in that post office should be treated in the same way. I would urge the minister to consider seeing to it that all the employees in these post offices are brought within the civil service and given the same rights as are employed by those in other offices.

Mr. LENNARD: First I should like to thank the department, through the minister, for instituting a postal delivery service in the fine little town of Dundas several months ago. In connection with the philatelic division, or whatever it is called, I should like to say a word on the issue of the Princess Elizabeth stamps. I have a letter which I have preserved for this purpose, and I quote from it:

> Just a note to say many thanks for the first day cover of the Princess Elizabeth stamp that I have received from you in Ottawa. I did get a couple of other covers but yours is the only one that is hand stamped—

I may say it was hand stamped here in the House of Commons.

> —which makes it more attractive. Ottawa ran all the covers through a cancelling machine with a worn slug in it and really made a mess of all the stamps.

I merely draw this to the attention of the department in a kindly way, as the Minister of Labour would say, so that when they send out first covers on another occasion and have them stamped in Ottawa they might bear this in mind and not have some old slug doing the job.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I received a letter from the hon. gentleman in this connection, and we have advised our employees to see that this does not happen again.

Mr. MENARY: Some of the post offices in the rural districts of my riding are being closed, where there may be a mail route which will serve the people. Just last week representations were made to me in connection with another post office, which is some twelve miles out. These people do not want to lose their post office, because on the rural routes they have to wait outside if they want to get a postal note. We have a great deal of snow in our part of the country, and it is very cold waiting around for the mailman. I saw the department this week about this matter, and they told me nothing would be done, but I wonder if it could not be reconsidered. This post office is about twelve miles from my home town and about twenty miles from the next town in the other direction. They would like very much to keep their post offices.

Then, I should like to join with the previous speaker in asking that these returned men employed by the Post Office Department be put under the civil service. If a returned boy works for the post office and is receiving only $1,200, $1,500 or something like that, he should be under the civil service. The postmaster is under the new system, but I should like to see the clerks in post offices placed in the same position as postmasters.

Mr. BRYCE: I wish to make my annual plea to the Postmaster General for better post office buildings in the constituency of Selkirk. We have one or two good post offices there, but many of the buildings are not satisfactory. I am pleased to see the genial Minister of Public Works in his seat, because I am sure the Postmaster General will be telling me to see him.

I have had many representations from towns in my constituency which are growing by leaps and bounds. When one sees a post office in an old broken down building it gives the whole department a bad name. I do not want to get in wrong with any other ministers, but I believe the post office is one of the best departments we have, so far as giving service to the community is concerned. To do a proper job they should have good buildings—and I would ask the Minister of Public Works to listen to what I am saying.

We have the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in many of our districts in the west. They have to have barracks and offices. It would be worth while to see one government building housing the post office and the mounted police. I do not know whether the minister has been to the town of Arborg, but if he has he will know it is a growing town. They have built a hospital for themselves, but the post office is a disgrace to the community.

What I have suggested is something which should be done. We should have better post offices for people to work in, buildings which would be a credit to the towns and the department. I have mentioned only one town; I could give the names of a dozen of them.

Mr. FULTON: I have three or four matters I should like to take up with the Postmaster General. The first is the question raised by the announcement made in the press, and I believe also in the house, to the effect that rural postmasters, or postmasters of small offices, were to be made civil servants. So far as I know, the necessary legislation has not gone through the house. Is it intended to introduce a bill this year, or is that to be done by order in council?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): According to the rules, that is done by the Postmaster General himself. An explanation as to why it is done in that way would take some time, but I would point out that it has always been within the jurisdiction of the Postmaster General.

It is true, as the hon. member says, that a greater amount of post office revenue and a greater number of postmasters are being brought under the civil service, with fair salaries. In the meantime, in respect of post offices with revenue of over $3,000, we are now taking care of rentals ourselves to ensure that we have better places in which to install our post offices. Also, if help is required we see that the salaries of the helpers are fixed by and paid for by the department. The postmaster will have a fixed salary. Postmasters in post offices with revenue of more than $3,000 will, we hope, be eligible for superannuation, if they are not too old. In this way they become permanent employees.

We are working on this matter. A beginning has been made and we hope to be able to continue. It will be remembered, of course, that there are over 12,000 post offices in Canada, and it will take considerable time before we can establish this procedure at every point.

Mr. FULTON: I thank the Postmaster General for his answer. Is it correct to say that the proposal to make postmasters civil servants applies only to those offices with revenues at the present time over $3,000 a year?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That is right. We cannot do it for very small post offices with revenues of only $300 or $400 a year.

Mr. FULTON: Was there a separate proposal, or is it part of the same proposal, to allow rural postmasters to contribute to and to come under the superannuation scheme?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It is just an experiment. We hope to do something for those who receive over $3,000. But of course we have to submit our plan first to treasury board.

Mr. FULTON: I was consulted some time ago with respect to a proposal concerning which I did not know the details and upon which, for that reason, I could not give advice. The person who consulted me said he understood if he had been there a certain number of years, made a request and made certain contributions, he might come under the superannuation scheme, even though he would not be classed as a civil servant. Is that a separate scheme, or was he misinformed?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): No specific decision has yet been made on that point. We know what we would like to do, but no specific decision has been made. I should not like to say anything until it has been decided upon by the proper officers.

Mr. FULTON: May we expect in the near future to have a complete statement from the Postmaster General covering both schemes?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I think I shall be able to give it next session.

Mr. FULTON: Not before then?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We hope this session is not going to last very long.

Mr. FULTON: I should like to ask the minister some specific questions with regard to the mail service in my own riding. I do so because I have had correspondence with him. While I appreciate the points he has made in his replies, I have not obtained the results I had hoped to obtain. Perhaps he could outline the general provisions governing.

I should like first to refer to the mail service to and from Blue River, British Columbia. This is a divisional point on the Canadian National Railways half way between Kamloops, British Columbia, and Edmonton, Alberta. They have a growing amount of correspondence with Edmonton, and yet they find that the mail between Blue River and Edmonton must go south to Kamloops, be transferred to the Canadian Pacific, go east to Calgary, be transferred at Calgary, and go north to Edmonton. This is a matter of some 650 miles, instead of going north from Blue River to Edmonton, a matter of about 300 miles. The answer given by the Postmaster General is that there are no mail clerks on the Canadian National Railways train.

Then they find that the same situation applies between Blue River and Vancouver. The mail to Vancouver goes to Kamloops by the Canadian National, the only railway serving that district; then it is transferred at Kamloops to the Canadian Pacific, and transhipped to Vancouver.

In both cases I have had instances cited to me of mail taking about five days to reach Vancouver or Edmonton by these roundabout routes, whereas the train itself requires only fourteen hours to Vancouver and ten hours or less to Edmonton. The answer I have from the Post Office Department is that it is cheaper to do it in that way; that is, to tranship it to the Canadian Pacific rather than send it direct on the Canadian National. I cannot understand how it would not be more expensive to tranship it, recheck the letters from the bags, and send them from one railway to another. The money they save by not having a mail clerk on the Canadian National would be more than the $3,000 which they say they are saving now by having a mail clerk on the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We are still in correspondence about this problem, and we have not got an answer to our last inquiries, because of flood conditions in that part of the country. To be frank, I would not be able to give all the particulars here, because we have so many of these problems and cannot learn the details by heart but must have the files before us. I will take note of what the hon. gentleman has asked and will take the liberty of writing him and explaining at full length.

Mr. FULTON: I am glad to hear the minister say that, because, from the correspondence we had, I was under the impression that the minister's last decision was final and that a change could not be made. I take it that the matter is still under consideration?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes.

Mr. FULTON: I am grateful for that assurance.

Mr. WINTERS: So that the minister will not think there is no support on this side of the house for the point raised by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox, and reiterated by others, I feel that the assistant postmasters particularly should be made eligible for civil service benefits. I have had considerable correspondence about this matter; I must say that the minister has been most receptive, and I wish to thank him for his attitude. The present status of my correspondence is that, unless the revenue at a post office is $30,000 or more, the assistant postmaster will not be eligible to qualify for civil service status; and, even where the revenue is in excess of $30,000, he cannot qualify at present, although I understand that something to that end is being undertaken. I think $30,000 is too high a figure. If an assistant postmaster is necessary he should be given the privilege of qualifying for the same civil service benefits as the postmaster. The assistant postmaster in offices of the size under discussion receives a relatively small salary and is not entitled to pension or superannuation benefits of any kind. I should like to see the minister go as far as the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox urged, and embrace all the employees, but at the moment I am appealing for consideration for the assistant postmaster. I ask the minister if he will not consider this matter further with a view to going below the $30,000 line he has apparently drawn, so that where an assistant postmaster is necessary he may be allowed to qualify for civil service status.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes.

Mr. JAQUES: I have a copy of a letter from the board of trade of Leduc in my riding concerning the post office at Leduc. They say:

Dear Sir:

The Leduc board of trade after a thorough discussion as to the needs of a larger and better post office for the town of Leduc instructed me to write you about this matter. I realize, of course, that you are fully cognizant of the situation in our town and it would avail little my dwelling upon the needs.

However, to draw this matter to your attention for your further investigation I might mention that Leduc is a growing town due to the discoveries of oil in its vicinity. The population is growing rapidly and the old post office, which is a corner of the E & S store, has been hardly large enough in the past to accommodate Leduc and its large rural mail deliveries, let alone taking care of its booming requirements.

I earnestly appeal to you that you may take into your immediate plans the urgent needs of Leduc for better and larger postal facilities.

Thanking you for your valuable time, I am,

Yours truly,

R. MacLaren,
Secretary-treasurer.

I can say from my own knowledge that this post office is entirely inadequate for the postal needs of the people of Leduc and the surrounding country. It is true that, owing to oil developments, the town is crowded and a great many new people have come into it. Most certainly they are in need of larger and better postal facilities. I understand that the minister has received a copy of this letter. Can he hold out any hope that he will take action in regard to the post office at Leduc?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I can quite understand that in a place like Leduc, because of the development that is going on there, the need for postal service is increasing rapidly. For six or seven years we have not been building any post offices because of the war and post-war conditions, but we hope to be able to catch up very soon with the time lost. I know about the situation in Leduc, and we hope to be able to do something there, if not this year, at least next year.

Mr. CARDIFF: From time to time I have had requests for extensions of rural mail routes in my riding. I go to the Post Office Department with these representations and receive a courteous hearing, but nothing is done about the matter. I am very glad to learn tonight that the Post Office Department is in such a healthy financial condition, because it means that one of two things must be done; either the service must be extended, or the cost of the service must be reduced. Would the minister state whether there is any intention of extending rural routes, short spurs and that sort of thing, at this time?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): A question asked about one particular place is pretty difficult to answer without our having the files before us; but I can state, as a matter of principle, that we are going to extend the rural routes in different places where they should be extended, according to the regulations of the Post Office Department. For some time we have not been making extensions, and when I recently announced the all-up service by plane, I stated at the same time that we would be ready to establish and extend more rural routes.

Mr. LENNARD: I want to make an appeal to the Postmaster General which has been made before, namely, that he consider reducing the postage on overseas relief parcels. I have been under the impression during the past several sessions that the major portion of that charge was for conveyance of the parcels overseas. In a recent letter from the department I was instructed that twenty-five per cent of the nominal $2.50 was charged on a regular overseas relief parcel for ocean conveyance; the rest is for transportation in Canada. I feel that the Canadian postal department could very well consider reducing that amount. If only twenty-five per cent is being used for overseas transportation then the remainder, seventy-five per cent, of the $2.50, could very well be reduced. Like one other hon. member who spoke a few moments ago, I am speaking for myself on this matter. I send parcels overseas and I want some relief. This is a matter that the Postmaster General should seriously consider, and reduce the postage on the overseas relief parcels.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wonder whether the minister would make some further comment about letter carriers and other post office employees. I have been interested in listening to the remarks about service in rural areas, but I should like to direct his attention for a moment to the conditions of those who work in urban areas. The minister may recall that I had some correspondence with him on behalf of employees in Winnipeg who are concerned about the inadequacy of the pay increases which they received recently, and are also concerned about the classifications of letter carriers, porters, sorters and so on.

In addition, I have before me a letter which happens to be addressed to the leader of this group. It comes from one of the associations in Vancouver, expressing the same concern principally about the salary increases that were given recently when other civil service increases were announced. This letter points out, as employees of the Post Office Department in Winnipeg have pointed out to me, that in some cases these increases, long awaited, long anticipated, amounted to only $3 a month. The suggestion is that letter carriers, for example, surely should be getting for the service that they perform more than the $1,800, which is the amount that some of them receive now; it should be $2,400.

I would appreciate it if the Postmaster General would comment on this whole question of wage conditions and classification of urban post office employees. If it means that representations have to be made to the civil service commission I hope the minister will tell us that he is making these representations just as forcefully as we make them to him.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I desire to answer the hon. gentleman's question about the letter carriers. The increase which has been given to all the employees is exactly the same, $660 a year since 1939. The reason why letter carriers have not received in the last increase as much as the postal clerks, for example, is that at a certain time a high cost of living bonus was given. The amount of high cost of living bonus which was given was larger for the lower paid employees than for the higher paid. Later on, these bonuses were merged with the salaries, and the differential that existed in 1939 between the postal clerks and the letter carriers was not the same as it was before. There is a certain differential between the postal clerks and the letter carriers which has always existed. When we gave the last increase to the employees we took into consideration the fact that at a certain time between 1939 and today the letter carriers had received, through a high cost of living bonus, more than postal clerks, and this was readjusted. The letter carriers have contended that the increase was not large enough; but the letters which were received were not complete, because we were accused of giving an increase of only $36 to the letter carriers, while others received, let us say, about $120, if I am not mistaken. But if we took into account all the increases since 1939 it would amount to the same, $660 for everyone of them. We put the facts as they should have been put, and the letter carriers have had to admit that it was just. The letter carriers who were in the maximum bracket received only $36, because they had received a larger bonus than the postal clerks, but the readjustment at the end was $660 for every employee.

By the way I may say it is $180 more for the employees of the post office than for the employees of other departments.

Mr. KNOWLES: Can the Postmaster General give the present schedule of the letter carriers, minimum, intermediate and maximum rates?

Mr. CHURCH: Someone took the floor from me before I had concluded what I had to say. I thought the minister was going to reply to part of what I had to say. I wish to point out to him that the revenues of our city are over $15,000,000. I want to find out what the government is going to do about giving us better facilities in the Post Office Department, a great public utility. Compare your post office, that great utility, in terminal A with the following public utilities: the Bell Telephone Company, the Consumers Gas Company, the Hydro Electric, Eaton's, Simpson's and all these other places where they have modern buildings. We have made no progress since confederation. At the head of Toronto street, on Adelaide street there is an old post office, one of the first buildings erected after confederation in that part of the city. I would not call it a post office. I should like to find out what the plan is for the Toronto district, because with a $15,000,000 revenue you are spending hardly any of it there. What is the program for Toronto? We have terminals A, B, C, D, and all down through the alphabet in the city. I wish to know what they are going to do. They said that they would have at the back of the Toronto post office on Lombard street, Church street, Adelaide street and Victoria street a big public square and dominion building. It cannot be done now. I do not expect that. I do expect to have some place where they can sell postage stamps. The staff are magnificent. They work under poor labour conditions. The minister has done a great deal to improve it. I have said that. He has given holidays, improved labour conditions, and has done things like that.

Another matter I wish to mention is the difficulty of getting postage stamps. With that large revenue, I see no reason why the practice followed in the United States, where they sell postage stamps in the railway trains, could not be followed here. You get off the train coming from Toronto to Ottawa and you cannot buy a stamp at any station. During the time that the troops were demobilized in Halifax and were taken across the country, they had a great deal of difficulty. The civilian population should not have to put up with that in times like these. You cannot buy a postage stamp on the train; you cannot buy one in any railway station in Canada.

Another thing I should like to mention is the airmail service. The average letter dropped in the mailbox goes almost as quickly as an airmail letter out of Ottawa and other places. With regard to the staff in the post office, are the returned men getting the preference in these positions? Will these men get their old positions now that they have come back? In both the first and the second world war the Post Office Department contributed a larger number of men to the service than other public utilities and corporations. These men have to make out application forms, and the wages are not what they should be. It is true they have been increased, but the men have to go to 465 Bay street, where the civil service commission has a finger in the pie, and by the time the soldier gets through running around he is tired of trying to find someone who will give him some information.

One important question I wish to bring once more to the attention of the minister is the fate of the man who happens to steal thirty cents or fifty cents from the post office. The penalty is altogether too severe. We got it reduced from a three-year term after a ten-year fight here. It used to be three years, without any discretion on the part of the magistrate. For a petty offence the employee would be sent to prison and his wife and family would suffer in consequence. I fail to see why these women and their children should suffer when the breadwinner is sent away for three years, now a year in some cases by amendments to the criminal code. I suggest that proper arrangements should be made with the provinces to take care of the prisoner in some better provincial jail, and of the sufferers, the wife and family of any man who is convicted on such a charge.

Moreover, is it British justice to maintain a spy decoy system whereby someone keeps a watch on a man and slips a decoy into his pocket? Is that a Christian principle for our Post Office Department to adopt? I say no, emphatically. It should have been abolished long ago, and I regret to see indications of this sort of thing in our police courts. Such evidence should be ruled out.

We want a more up-to-date act. We are not back in 1867. We want a British North America Act not for the dead but for the living. The Post Office Act was, until about three years ago, almost an exact copy of that of 1868. I do not think it is at all just to sentence a man to one year imprisonment now for a minor offence and have his wife and children thrown upon the municipality. I repeat, there should be some reform in this direction, and a satisfactory arrangement should be made with the provinces as to a proper place for detention.

There are many other matters that I should like to touch upon, but I have not the time tonight to deal with them. Among these I might mention money order transactions, the line-up at the post office, the length of time it takes to get service, the Canadian parcel post and so forth. Then there is the question of the post office savings bank. That used to be an important function and, with the penny bank being abolished, I hope this particular service will be improved. I would also point out the delay in collecting airmail from the boxes. In some of the post offices there are special receptacles for airmail letters. I hope there will be an improvement in the mail boxes. There is also the question of inspection service. As far as that is concerned, the sooner we abolish the notorious system, which is worthy of Hitler, of trying to induce someone to steal a letter and then penalizing him, the better.

There is also the equipment supply branch to be considered. I suggest that we need a house-cleaning in the city of Toronto, whose contribution, as I have pointed out before, amounts to $15,000,000.

Lastly, I would urge upon the minister that everything possible be done to improve the conditions in the Post Office Department in so far as they affect the returned man. He does not get his job back from the post office, notwithstanding that a law was passed, which was enforced by the deputy minister of labour, calling upon large corporations to give returned soldiers the identical jobs they had before they joined up, or some other occupation suitable to them. That has not been carried out so far as the Post Office Department is concerned. Promotions should also be looked into for the returned men. I do not think the civil service commission knows much about it. The Post Office Department is one public utility which the Canadian people support and everyone likes to see the postman making his rounds. The children like to see him. I trust, therefore, that improvements will be made in the various directions I have suggested.

Mr. LENNARD: The Postmaster General was about to give me a partial answer to my question regarding overseas parcels when some energetic member jumped up and prevented it. Can he give the answer now?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): First, in regard to the postal clerk, the maximum is $2,400, and in the case of the letter carrier the maximum is $2,160. The letter carrier's salary of $2,124 was increased by $36 only, but this $36 makes up what the postal clerk received before.

As to parcel gifts, I might take as an example a parcel of fifteen pounds. The handling at the office of origin costs ten cents; the handling at the exchange office, five cents; land transportation in Canada, sixty cents; Atlantic sea transport, ninety cents; British cost, fifty-one cents. We may receive a parcel of that size in Vancouver and we put it on the sea transport for eighty cents. It costs ninety cents on the vessel and fifty-one cents for delivery of the parcel in Britain, where distances are never as long as they are here. We have to prepay all this, because we have to account to Britain for the fifty-one cents. Of course we have to pay the ship ninety cents.

This question came up quite often during the war and it has arisen ever since, but when we compare what we are receiving with what Britain receives, I do not think we can reduce our receipts for this service in comparison with what Britain receives for the service rendered there. It would be really another gift we would be making in addition to the gifts our citizens are sending to their friends in England, because it amounts to only a small part of our total receipts. For one pound we receive 5, 3, 5, plus 8, or 21 cents; 8 cents of the 21 cents is for transport on the ship, and Britain takes 17 cents per pound parcel. Altogether it is 38 cents. What we charge is only 21 cents, and to reduce that would be simply to make a gift, since we are charging just what it costs us without making half a cent profit.

Mr. LENNARD: The Postmaster General mentioned a fifteen-pound parcel. I understand that the weight of gift parcels is twenty pounds.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I took the figure "15" because that appears on the table I have.

Mr. LENNARD: Were those figures which the minister gave for a twenty-pound parcel?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I have not the twenty-pound parcel figures here. My tabulation stops at fifteen.

Mr. LENNARD: What prompted my bringing up this matter tonight was the letter I had from the Postmaster General's office, signed by the Postmaster General himself, in which I was informed, as I stated previously, that twenty-five per cent additional of the postage is paid for the conveyance of the parcel across the Atlantic. I thought that was a small percentage of the whole, and I felt we should probably reduce it to some extent to give relief to the people who were sending parcels to relatives overseas. If the figures the Postmaster General gave me a few minutes ago are on a twenty-pound parcel, they add up—and I have added them up roughly—to $2.16, which is not $2.50.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The $2.16 applied to the fifteen pounds, and we charge only $2 for that.

Mr. BURTON: I have a question or two I should like to ask, and this is about the only item I can see under which I can properly ask them. Who was responsible for imposing that nuisance tax on the people who make use of post office savings accounts? Some months ago they found themselves confronted with this nuisance tax when they make a withdrawal. I should like to know who was responsible for imposing that tax and what was the reason for it. In withdrawing money from the post office savings account, it is not a matter of issuing cheques on a bank account; because one must appear in person, make his application and withdraw the money there at the post office. He has not the privilege of issuing a cheque against the account, as can be done with a savings account or any other account with a bank. From what I can see, this is only a nuisance, and I should like to know the reason why it was imposed on the people.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The savings account branch we have in the postal service is not meant to be a bank in the usual sense in which we use the bank here in Canada. If you withdraw money from that by cheque, you pay three cents or six cents, according to the amount of your withdrawal, as you would on any other bank account.

Mr. JOHNSTON: What is the rate?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The rate is three cents, the same as at any other bank. It is three cents on anything up to $100 and six cents on anything over $100.

Mr. JOHNSTON: When was that impost put on, or has it always been there?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I am informed that this was put on a few months ago. But it is the amount that is being charged by any other bank in Canada for the withdrawal of money by cheque.

Mr. BURTON: I believe it is more than a few months ago. It must be at least half a year, if not more. But what the minister says is only a partial answer to the questions I asked. In the first place, his answer shows that it is only a nuisance tax. The revenue that it brings in does not amount to anything. As to comparing withdrawing money from the post office with withdrawing money from any other institution that you have money in, you are not in the same position with the post office savings account, because with any other bank account you can issue cheques against it. I have no objection to placing my stamp on any of those cheques. But when the individual must appear in person before the wicket, make out an application for a $50 or $100 withdrawal, and then is subject to this nuisance tax, he must fish around to find three cents to pay that little tax. It is not that it brings in any revenue; and it only results in a nuisance for the post office employees when they are making out the application for withdrawal and in their accounting with regard to the moneys handled in the branch.

Mr. TIMMINS: My plea is for the old fellows in the post office. During the war, as we know, when the soldiers were overseas the older men were brought into the post office and were told that their jobs were simply temporary, that they would have to make way for the returned men when they came back. When the returned men came back, according to my experience, they were given back their jobs, which is only proper and fair. But the old chaps, most of whom were experienced clerks in the urban centres, were kept on for a time. Then, after a while their employment came down to, we will say, four days a week. Latterly they have been getting probably three days a week. Then they have been cut down to four or five hours a day in the city. These men held the fort for us pretty well during the war days. They are mostly men over sixty years of age. They cannot find employment anywhere else. They are doing a good job in the post office. They are efficient.

My plea to the Postmaster General is that he direct the postmasters in the urban centres such as Toronto to do what they can to keep these men in employment. The post office is doing fairly well financially. We do not want the post office ever to make so much money that we shall have to take money away from it and use it for some other purpose. I would ask the minister that he direct the postmaster in Toronto, where we have a great many of these men—and they have been efficient clerks during the war and since—to give them something more in the way of employment.

One more thing. In Toronto we have a most disgraceful main post office. It is really just a barracks. This does not come exactly in the department of the minister. He does not construct the buildings; nevertheless, he does make recommendations. Our post office may be in the wrong place. At any rate, I worked there as a boy, when I was going to university, and that is a long while ago. It was pretty much a derelict building even in those days. I am hoping that the minister will not wait until some more Liberal members come from the city of Toronto before he gives us a new post office, because that may be a long time.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We never have those ideas in the department.

Mr. TIMMINS: No, I know the postmaster has not. But then, of course, he is only one in the cabinet. He cannot have it all his own way. I hope that this year, now that we have expanding revenues, he will tell the cabinet members, the men on the executive council, that we should like to have a new post office in Toronto, and that we should like it to be number one on the list.

Mr. BENTLEY: I wish to bring up a matter to which I think the minister should give serious attention. Last Christmas at Maple Creek a person was engaged to assist in the Christmas rush. The postmistress there was convicted in a Saskatchewan court of paying less than the minimum wage under the laws of Saskatchewan. The matter was finally brought to the Supreme Court of Canada, and the federal government counsel argued that both employer and employee were in the postal service of Canada, under the jurisdiction of parliament, and that therefore the provincial legislation did not apply to them.

I do not intend to quarrel with the actions of the courts; it is their business to discover what the law is and to apply it. I presume the Supreme Court of Canada was correct in its finding; and the point is that if it was correct something is radically wrong with the administration of any government department that refuses to pay an employee $18.50 a week in this day and age.

The laws of Saskatchewan were made for the benefit of the people of that province by the government duly elected; and if the federal government is not prepared to permit these people to come under the wage laws of that province, then the federal government should see to it that they are paid proper wages, in line with the minimum wages of that or any other province having minimum wage legislation. That amount is certainly not exorbitant.

As I say, I am not trying to blame the postmistress. It was up to her to get the job done, and she was not going to spend any more money than was permissible. But when the court finds that both she and the temporary employees come under the Post Office department—and that is the finding—then the federal department and the administration are responsible for seeing to it that their employees get at least the minimum wage for the work they do.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): As I explained a few moments ago, we have changed the rules. In the revenue post offices today we pay the postmasters fixed salaries, which will entitle them to superannuation, and so forth. The postmaster formerly paid these employees himself, out of his revenue, and at times we found that he was not very generous with them. Since April 1, however, we have changed that procedure, and that was one reason we did so, in order to see to it that the employees are paid reasonable salaries. We also see that the post office is located according to our specifications, so that these postmasters will not gyp us, if that word may be used, in regard to the location. We are going to see that the smaller post offices are located in better quarters.

Mr. McLURE: There are several things I wish to speak about, but I shall leave them until we come to the various items. I notice the vote this year is $71,479,919, which shows a little increase over last year. I hope it will not be reduced in any way until the rural mail carriers are allowed a living wage. This committee is asked this year to vote $59,537,883, in connection with which we are given the details. In addition, the Postmaster General requires a blank cheque for $11,942,036, in connection with which we have not been given a single detail, with the exception of the two words "temporary assistance". That is a tremendous item, which is growing every year.

I believe this committee should have a breakdown, in order to see what that nearly $12,000,000 is for. It is voted from one year to the other, but we never seem to get anywhere in finding out how the money has been spent.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The amount is high enough, indeed; but if the hon. gentleman would take into consideration the fact that during the Christmas season, in Toronto, for example, we have to obtain over seven thousand temporary employees, and in Montreal around six thousand temporary employees, he would see the reason for it. In every city we require temporary employees at that time of year, some of whom may work for a month and others for shorter periods. To have all those names appear in the estimates would enlarge the book considerably; but all those expenditures are audited. It covers employees who may work for two or four or five days, while others may work for a week or more. If the hon. gentleman emphasized the point I might be able to bring in a list of these employees, but it would be a difficult return to prepare. I do not think that expenditure can be treated in any other way.

Mr. McLURE: That is a satisfactory answer. Never before have we been given any idea of the extent of this temporary employment. Now the Postmaster General has given us some idea, which is quite satisfactory to me.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): In all the city offices we require over 25,000 temporary employees.

Mrs. STRUM: How do you determine the yearly income of postmasters in small villages? Some of them, I understand from some of my constituents who work in these places, must be there all day because of the hours, and they cannot undertake other work. They tell me they can hardly live. Is there any way of putting a floor under the income of these people, or how do you determine what their living will be?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We have small offices where the revenue is below $100 a year. In those offices the postmaster has the privilege of doing something else. He is generally a restaurant keeper or a storekeeper, and he keeps the post office in his store. But even if a postmaster has a revenue of only $12 or $13 or $15 we pay him a minimum of $120. A postmaster in a very small village who also keeps a store, in which the post office occupies a small booth, receives at least $120, though the revenue may be only $25 a year.

Mrs. STRUM: I am thinking of the man in a place where there are three other stores, who has not the capital to open a store of his own, where there is not room for another grocery store, but who must keep his post office open all day, six days a week. Is there any way of determining what he will live on? How can he go out and work as a carpenter if he has to stay in the post office?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): He must not take a job as postmaster unless that is to be simply a by-product, if I may call it, of what he is going to earn. It must be a man or woman who can keep a little post office in the house or in the store. If he is a carpenter he had better not also be the postmaster.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. FULTON: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We shall go into supply of the Post Office Department, hoping that we may make a little more progress; and then trade and commerce, reconstruction and supply, justice, Secretary of State and public works.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 4, 1948

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPROVAL OF REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION RESPECTING REVISIONS IN CLASSIFICATIONS

The house resumed, from May 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gibson (Secretary of State):

That the report from the civil service commission respecting revisions in classifications of officials of the House of Commons, laid on the table on Thursday, 29th April, 1948, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

DEBATES BRANCH—APPOINTMENT OF MISS M. E. BLACK

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the report of the civil service commission relating to the appointment of Miss M. E. Black to the position of permanent clerk in the debates branch of the House of Commons, laid on the table of the house on March 11, 1948, be now approved.

In the report from the civil service commission it is stated:

Miss Black as a sessional employee is receiving $7 per day, or $2,555 per annum. A competition was held to fill the position of principal clerk and Miss Black was the successful candidate. In order that she may not have to suffer a reduction in compensation, it is recommended, under section 59 of the Civil Service Act, that position HC-C-88 be exempt from section 13 of the act in order that Miss Black may be appointed at $2,640 per annum, effective from the date of her appointment, such exemption to apply to the appointment of Miss Black only.

Motion agreed to.

MORNING SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Wednesday, June 9, 1948, until the end of the present session, the house shall meet at eleven o'clock in the morning of each sitting day, and that in addition to the usual intermission at six o'clock p.m., there shall also be an intermission every day from one to three o'clock p.m.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX ACT

REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to revise and consolidate the law respecting the levying of income tax and the administration thereof.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL BATTLEFIELDS

QUEBEC—PAYMENT TO COMMISSION OF $1,000,000 OVER PERIOD OF TEN YEARS

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend an Act respecting the national battlefields at Quebec, to authorize payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of the sum of $1,000,000 over a period of ten years from the first of April, 1948, to the commission for the purposes and subject to the provisions of the Act and to authorize the commission to acquire and hold a certain parcel and tract of land therein described.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

FRASER VALLEY RELIEF AND REHABILITATION COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I informed the house in connection with the Fraser valley floods that it was the intention of the government to appoint a commission to have supervision over the entire situation, which commission would have on it a representative of the government of British Columbia and a representative of the federal government. I am happy to say that the federal government has been fortunate enough to obtain the services of Major General B. M. Hoffmeister as our representative. Hon. members will recall that General Hoffmeister was the officer appointed to command the Pacific forces at the time of the Japanese war. General Hoffmeister will be on loan from the H. R. MacMillan Company, of which he is the vice-president.

I am also happy to announce that Hon. Eric Hamber, former lieutenant governor of British Columbia, has agreed to act on the commission as the representative of the government of British Columbia. These two gentlemen will work together as representatives of our respective governments, and will have the opportunity of communicating directly with the ministers of both governments.

The federal representative on the commission will report to the Minister of Finance, but he will also have direct access to all departments of the federal government. The exact duties of the commission will be outlined more definitely later on.

In connection with the services of the navy, army and air force, General Hoffmeister will be available for consultations with Colonel Snow, commander of the Vancouver area of the Canadian Army, who, under direction from the Minister of National Defence, and with the authority of the provincial government, has been acting as co-ordinator of the agencies fighting the flood. Colonel Snow will remain the military officer in charge, responsible in the ordinary way to the military authorities and to the Minister of National Defence.

Just before coming into the house I received a telegram from Building Products Limited of Montreal, which company apparently has noticed that a commission was being established. This telegram is addressed to the Fraser valley relief and rehabilitation commission. That is the name that was suggested for the commission. It is sent in care of myself and is as follows:

> If material required will be happy to donate five carloads of our roofing and siding products to Fraser Valley relief. All freight charges paid by us to destination.
> Building Products Ltd.

I should like to express the thanks of the government to Building Products Limited. Their patriotic example is one which, in all probability, will be followed by many other industrial concerns in our country, and if so, such action will be deeply appreciated.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

SUBSIDY ON BUTTER TO BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): May I say a word on a related subject? I was informed the day before yesterday that washouts caused by the recent heavy floods had cut off the rail shipments of butter to British Columbia from the prairie provinces, the usual source of butter supplies for that province. Available stocks of butter in British Columbia, we were informed, were inadequate to meet the requirements of hospitals and many other high-rating claimants. It was suggested that the ceiling should be raised to provide for the added cost of flying in the necessary supplies, but that seemed to be inadvisable, and in order to meet this emergency the wartime prices and trade board have been authorized to pay a subsidy up to six cents a pound, or the difference between the cost of air and rail transport, whichever is the lesser, on butter moved by air transport from Lethbridge, Calgary or Edmonton to the isolated areas of British Columbia. This will enable the British Columbia consumers to continue to obtain butter supplies at prices within the price ceiling regulations.

Mr. FULTON: Mr. Speaker, with reference to the announcement just made by the Prime Minister, and speaking as a member from British Columbia, I know I am correct when I say that all the residents of that province feel that no finer appointment could have been made than that of Major General Hoffmeister. I know that British Columbia will welcome that appointment.

In view of the report as to the extent of the damage amounting to over $30 million, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he can elaborate on the statement made yesterday with regard to the extension of financial assistance, and particularly whether he will indicate the basis on which the federal government proposes to extend that assistance —whether on a dollar for dollar basis, or more, or less.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I thank my hon. friend for what he has just said in reference to the appointment of General Hoffmeister. The house I know will feel the same way with respect to the appointment of the former lieutenant governor, Hon. Eric Hamber, who is the nominee of the government of British Columbia. One of the purposes in the appointment of the commission was to afford opportunity of conferring between the representatives of both governments on all matters of importance in relation to flood conditions, in order that the governments might be advised confidentially, before final decisions were reached, as to amounts of payments and the like. I should be glad to give my hon. friend the information he has just asked for, if I had the facts upon which to base it. The government has felt that it would be preferable to have the whole situation surveyed by these gentlemen in the first instance.

May I say that both the government of British Columbia and our government are in entire agreement about the wisdom of appointment of the commission and its personnel.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the statement which the Prime Minister made yesterday and the statement he has made today, may I say that the term "Fraser river relief and rehabilitation commission" has been used several times. Will the Prime Minister give the house an assurance that the financial aid to be given to the province will be used to assist flood victims in all parts of the province and not in the Fraser river area alone?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I have said, one of the purposes of the appointment of the commission is to provide for a survey of the situation. Before the government reaches a decision as to the extent to which relief should be given, we should await the word we may receive from those who are in a position to advise in the matter.

Mr. PEARKES: Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Finance? In view of his statement as to the steps being taken to relieve the butter shortage in Vancouver, are any steps being taken to meet the grave danger of a milk shortage in Vancouver and other coast towns owing to the destruction of herds in the Fraser valley, which is normally the source of supply of milk for that area?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not had any representations with respect to that matter. I think my hon. friend will appreciate that it would be difficult to fly adequate supplies of fresh milk to meet the situation.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance with reference to butter? When the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) left here and went to the distressed area, did he take his margarine with him or did he leave it in someone's keeping?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have no information on that question, Mr. Speaker.

INCOME TAX

FARMERS—NET WORTH STATEMENT—INCOME TAX GUIDE AND ACCOUNT BOOK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. O. BREITHAUPT (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Since confusion and misunderstanding have arisen in the minds of certain farmers with respect to the 1947 income tax forms and the Farmers' Income Tax Guide, will the minister please clarify the department's requirements with regard to use of these forms and guides.

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member I would first draw his attention to my statement of March 19, which appears in Hansard, page 2400, on the subject of the farmers' income tax form, and which deals particularly with the net worth statement appearing on this form. At that time I announced that the department had decided that farmers who report taxable income based on cash actually received and cash expenses actually paid out during the calendar year will not be required to fill out the net worth statement on the new 1947 prairie farmers' or farmers' income tax return. Farmers who report income on an accrual basis for tax purposes will be required to submit a statement of assets and liabilities as heretofore, or to complete the appropriate parts of the net worth statement.

It will be appreciated that under the terms of the Income War Tax Act where the department cannot obtain sufficient information by any other means it may require a further statement which in many instances may actually be "the net worth statement". This would apply, of course, to any year for which sufficient information is not available.

With respect to the farmers' income tax guide and account book which has been provided free to all farmers in Canada, I would like to point out that this book has two main purposes. The first one is to provide the Canadian farmer with a sample book for the purpose of recording his farm income and expenses in such a way as to facilitate the accurate completion of his income tax returns. The second is to answer general and specific questions which the department has found to be most common in its dealings with farmers.

I should add that the farmer is not obliged to use this accounting book. It has been provided free for his convenience and assistance. A farmer may keep, if he prefers, any other form of record which he finds more convenient.

The fact that the demand for these guides has resulted in over 700,000 copies being placed in the hands of Canadian farmers would indicate that they will be put to widespread use.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of National Revenue. There is grave doubt about the situation as to farmers' income tax. My question is this: Suppose a farmer in his return for 1948 income fails to give the net worth statement, will he in 1949, if he changes his opinion, be denied the right then to go on the accrual basis in the determination of his income tax?

Mr. McCANN: I think not. I think he would be permitted to make the change from the cash basis to the accrual basis at that time.

Mr. MILLER: May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Revenue? If the farmers take advantage of the permission that is now given not to fill in the form at the top of page 5, will it make any difference to or interfere with the farmer's right to claim to have his income spread over three years in case some years are good and some bad, as he has now under the act?

Mr. McCANN: I will take note of the question and give an answer tomorrow.

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East): I should like to direct a further question to the Minister of National Revenue arising out of the question asked by the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Breithaupt), and other questions of the same purport. Is it the intention eventually to have all farmers fill out the net worth statement? I do not mean this year or next year, but eventually.

Mr. McCANN: That is a matter of policy which has not yet been determined.

FARM PRODUCTS

REPORT AS TO REMOVAL OF EMBARGO ON LIVESTOCK AND FEED GRAINS TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has his attention been drawn to a report in the Financial Post, dated June 5, wherein there is forecast the removal of the embargo on livestock and feed grains to the United States? If so, is the report correct?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not always read the Financial Post. I did not happen to see the article referred to, but I have heard about it. I dare say the policy of the government will be announced in due course.

Mr. BURTON: Will the minister read the report and inform us later?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot inform the hon. gentleman in advance of an announcement by the government.

IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

KEROSENE-OPERATED REFRIGERATORS FOR MINING AND LUMBER CAMPS AND ISOLATED FARMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): I desire, Mr. Speaker, to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the indignation being expressed by some lumber and mining operators concerning their inability to purchase kerosene refrigerators, and in view of the fact that in some instances in British Columbia men are leaving camps not serviced with refrigeration to work in camps serviced with refrigeration, would the government give consideration to permitting the importation of kerosene refrigerators for purchase only for use in mining and lumber camps and isolated farms not serviced with electrical energy?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): My hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of the question, and I have been able to look into the situation. I find that the emergency import control division is prepared to consider applications on an individual basis of essentiality in accordance with the hardship provisions of the order, and in fact a number of applications have been approved where supported by certificate from provincial health authorities indicating that it would be injurious to the health of workers if such equipment were not available. There have been a number of applications by companies and others representing that their camp was in an isolated area where electricity was not available and where supplies of provisions can be brought in only once a week, there being in such places 100 persons or more. These applications have been looked into and it has been found that, for example, what was asked for was an 8-foot refrigerator. Obviously it would be physically impossible to store perishables for 100 persons in a refrigerator of that size, and therefore the conclusion arrived at in a number of these cases was that the application was perhaps more for the benefit of senior hired help than for the mass of the employees.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF RADIO COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister, in the absence of the appropriate minister. In view of the fact that the house has decided today to sit from eleven o'clock in the morning, beginning shortly, is the Prime Minister in a position to advise whether, having regard to recent changes in policy by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the radio committee will be set up during the rest of the present session?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend an answer offhand, but I shall hope to be prepared to give an answer on Monday.

NEWFOUNDLAND

REFERENDUM ON FUTURE FORM OF GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The house may be interested in having the latest word in regard to the referendum taken in Newfoundland a day or two ago on the future form of government in that colony. Only nine out of twenty-five districts have complete returns. While incomplete the latest returns for the whole, up to 12.30 today's Newfoundland time, indicate the vote: for responsible government, 65,991; for confederation, 60,147; for commission government, 20,805. Apparently no form of government will have a majority, and another referendum will therefore have to be held, probably some weeks hence, to decide between the two forms, responsible government or confederation.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

309. Departmental administration, $1,096,287.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There are one or two matters, Mr. Chairman, which I should like to bring to the attention of the minister with a view to securing some information from him. The first has to do with representations that have been made to me by postmasters in revenue offices.

For these men and women there are no such things as minimum salaries or hours of employment, holidays or promotion. They render a great service to the people of the country as a whole; they receive their payment on a commission basis, and since they are not classified as civil servants, they receive no pension. According to representations made to me, during the war they worked for a number of government departments without any remuneration, giving assistance in reporting enemy aliens, national registration, the foreign exchange control board, and generally making themselves useful in connection with various activities furthering the war effort. Having regard to the increase in the cost of living, and the surplus enjoyed by the post office department, what consideration has the government given to providing for a 25 per cent increase in rates as requested by these postmasters? Also, what if anything, is being done toward the establishment of a pension plan for them?

Under the present deputy postmaster general, in common with hon. members in all parts of this house I have observed an attitude that I desire to commend. When matters are brought to the attention of the deputy postmaster general, he has been most diligent in his endeavour to remove any cause of inconvenience. I think it only fair to say that; for after all, many of these officials are doing responsible, effective and efficient work. Too often we take for granted what they are doing, and fail to pass on to them and to those who work with them the commendation of the constituents whom we represent in parliament.

What consideration, if any, has been given during the year to the reduction of the postage rate from four cents to three cents, which was indicated last year as a possibility? The matter is one that I think deserves the consideration of the minister, and I feel that the committee should have an explanation with regard to it.

I want to join with the hon. member for Wentworth in the representations he made last evening on a matter to which he has made frequent reference. He asked that something be done to relieve the people from the present high postage rates on parcels sent to Britain to help the people over there. I know of two or three persons in my own constituency who during the last year have sent parcels, to the limit now allowed, to the parents of young men who served in the armed forces of this country and whose acquaintance they made during the war. The minister has had this matter brought to his attention on previous occasions. I know he would have the support of Canadians everywhere were he to make provision to remove, as far as possible, the postage rates on parcels being sent to Great Britain by patriotic Canadians with a view to assisting the people over there to get additional nutritional value in their diet.

On previous occasions I have heard the arguments used in answer to this request. But if the minister could see the letters that one receives from men and women in the lower-income brackets who regard it as a patriotic duty to assist their kinsmen overseas, and who are prevented from being as generous as they otherwise would be because of the high transportation charges, some favourable consideration would be given to the matter. I ask the minister what he proposes to do about it. I know he will say that he realizes the conditions that exist, but that there are administrative difficulties in the way. I say to him: remove those difficulties; give Canadians an opportunity to help their relatives and friends in Great Britain. When they are voluntarily sending parcels to assist people in another part of this commonwealth, it is difficult for them to understand why they must pay a postage rate which is as high or almost as high as the value of the things they are sending. The same argument, of course, applies to patriotic organizations who prepare bundles to assist destitute families in England and who find themselves penalized to a degree that seems scarcely justifiable.

I would like the minister to tell the committee also what is being done about the representations made by the rural mail couriers wherein they point out the unfairness of the present tender system, and urge that the present contract system by tender be discontinued and replaced by a contract system comparable with other similar postal services, under which a definite price would be determined for each individual route, subject to revaluation when made necessary by changes in mileage, number of boxes, and the like.

I shall not go into all the representations which have been made in that connection. The bonus system was merely a temporary arrangement to meet individual cases, though in some of those cases—and I have the records before me—there was an unusual spread as between various applicants operating similar routes. I do not know what would be the justification, but when one finds two routes approximately the same in length, with the bonus in one case greater than in the other, one wonders on what basis it was done.

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): Because the conditions were very different.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That may be true, but physical conditions are not always the reason for the difference in these payments.

Mr. PROBE: Political conditions.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Certainly some of them seem hard to justify; they would indicate one basis for certain individuals and areas, and another for others. The minister says conditions are different. That explanation may cover the situation generally, but it is something which at the moment I would prefer not to discuss in too great detail. I do think the bonus system, being merely temporary, should be supplanted in accordance with the suggestions made by the rural mail couriers' association, whose representations are couched in reasonable and temperate language, and with a full realization not only of their position but also of their responsibility as servants of this country.

Finally I have one further question. In the appointments to fill vacancies, is the veterans' preference actually being carried out? I should like to know the number of appointments made during the past year, vacancies and replacements, and the number of men and women appointed who have the veteran qualification.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Last evening we discussed the question of revenue postmasters to a certain extent, but I am glad the hon. gentleman has raised the question again because I want to make a more complete statement. We have been using an antiquated method of paying the postmasters, and in our view it is very unfair in many instances.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What method is the minister referring to?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Payments based on revenue. When I came into the department—I do not say I was responsible for correcting this situation—there were revenue postmasters in what had become large centres of population, and as a result they were receiving much more than they should, though of course there were very few of those. There were some also who should have received more than they were getting. The method of paying postmasters according to the postage sold was not the best, because in certain post offices a great deal of work has to be done in addition to selling stamps. A post office may be a distribution centre for rural mail, or may distribute mail to other post offices, and in that case the work is much heavier. So we decided to change that system, and have been doing so since April 1. Of course it involves a great deal of work, and we cannot change it all at the same time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the change?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We are putting them on straight salary according to the importance of their office. We are also taking it upon ourselves to see that their employees, if they need employees, are properly paid. We do not now leave this to the discretion of the postmaster, because sometimes they may pay a little less than they should, and we want the employees to be properly paid. There was a case in Saskatchewan in which an employee of a revenue post office was not receiving the minimum wage under provincial law. That employee, though working in the post office, was not directly employed by us. Such cases will not occur in future.

We have also received representations from many quarters asking us to extend the right of superannuation to these employees. We could not do that when they were paid according to the revenue received from the sale of postage, but now we have submitted to treasury board a plan under which those employees will be brought under superannuation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the plan?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): They will contribute a certain amount, as other civil service employees do, and those within a certain age will pay what is necessary in order to entitle them to superannuation under the act so that they may retire at the age of sixty-five and have something on which to live, like other civil service employees. In some cases postmasters have been in office for a long time and are quite old. They may be unable to do anything else, and too old properly to serve the public. In such cases it is very disagreeable to have to tell them they must give up their job to somebody else, without being able to offer them any superannuation. That is one reason for changing the method of payment.

The hon. gentleman spoke about the salaries we are paying. The salary varies, of course, according to the work done in the individual offices. I might add that this superannuation can apply only to postmasters whose offices have a revenue of at least $3,000, and in the case of such offices the salary, as determined at the moment, is to be $1,920.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many post offices are in that position?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): There are 1,385 with a revenue of above $3,000. As yet we have not fixed a figure for post offices with a revenue of less than $3,000. We are studying the matter now, and it takes time to arrive at a definite conclusion.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What are the alternative plans the minister is considering in reference to post offices with an income of less than $3,000?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): There are some small post offices where the revenue is not $100, and it would be difficult to provide superannuation for a postmistress in charge of such a small office. We are working to see to what extent we can do this, but we cannot say exactly what we are going to do.

The hon. gentleman asked me about the three-cent and four-cent rates of postage. In both cases there is a one cent tax. That is not charged by the Post Office Department, although the department benefits from any surplus. That tax could not be eliminated except by action of the government. Expenses have increased considerably. Salaries to our employees have been increased by $660, and we are paying more to the rural mail contractors, railway clerks, and so on. We could hardly recommend to the Minister of Finance that we return to the three cents and two cents postage when costs are what they are.

In the United States immediately after the war considerable pressure was put on the government to return to the pre-war postage rates of three cents and two cents, the same as we had before the war. The airmail rate was reduced from eight cents to five cents, and they reduced other rates. The result was disastrous. At the end of the year they had a deficit of $442 million, and the President sent a message to congress asking them to try to find some way to make up this deficit. If we reduced our rates in Canada it would mean a loss of revenue of between $11 million and $14 million in first-class letter rates. We are trying to improve service by providing all-up mail service on July 1 as an experiment. Through this service we shall be able to deliver mail in Canada just as quickly as though we were a small country only 150 or 200 miles long. It will be an experiment, but I am quite sure it will work. We have to admit that we are experimenting. We would not be able to recommend elimination of the one-cent tax.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is the revenue from that one-cent tax shown under the heading of taxation, or does it go into the revenues of the Post Office Department?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It all goes in the same pot. We return all our revenue to the consolidated revenue fund, and it is counted in any surplus there may be. It might be diverted to national revenue, but it all goes into the consolidated revenue fund and then we draw on that fund according to what is voted here.

Reference was made to the high postage rates on gift parcels to Great Britain. According to our figures, only five per cent of the British people are receiving gift parcels. We are not making any money out of these parcels, as we charge only for our out-of-pocket expenses. The largest parcel that can be sent is twenty pounds, but small parcels of five pounds or so are sent quite often. The cost on these parcels is high. The total postage is 85 cents, but we have to pay 38 cents for sea transportation and 27 cents to the British post office for handling and delivering there, which leaves us 20 cents as payment for transporting a parcel, say from the west to Halifax.

If the present rates were reduced it would mean that we would be paying a subsidy or making a donation to individuals instead of to the people as a whole.

As I say, only about five per cent of the British people receive gift parcels because they have friends or relatives here. We have the greatest sympathy for the people in England. I have friends there to whom I send parcels once in a while. I may say that my deputy minister is going to Britain in a few weeks to discuss certain matters, and this question of parcels will be one of them. It may be that the reduction could be made on the other side instead of here, and that would help the people who are sending parcels.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has any request been made of the United Kingdom government that they forgo the charges they make for transmitting these parcels in Britain?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, the United Kingdom authorities have been asked to do that.

Mr. MILLER: How do these rates compare with those charged on parcels for the troops during the war?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): During the war we did not have to pay the steamship companies anything for the distribution of these parcels, because it was done by the army.

Mr. MILLER: The rate was quite low, was it not?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It was twelve cents a pound, and on a twenty-pound parcel the rate was ten cents cheaper than our present rate.

As to the tender system, the hon. member for Lake Centre indicated that it might be dangerous to leave the fixing of the rates to the department alone. Tenders have always been called for. Of course there will always be certain persons who are willing to accept a lower price because they are in a position to do it. Perhaps they are carrying merchandise as well as the mail, or carrying passengers. Some of them run taxis. If we attempted to fix a standard price there would have to be as many standard prices fixed as there are railway freight rates, because the routes vary greatly as to number of boxes, difficulties of the road, and so forth. One contractor might be getting on in years and be glad to carry the mail to earn a little money. Another man might be the father of a large family and would require more remuneration. I am quite certain that if we fixed a rate the department itself would be the loser and very few people would gain by it.

During the war, because the cost of living was going up, we had to grant bonuses and supplements, but supplements were granted only on the merits of each individual case, where it was absolutely necessary to increase the amount. When we compare the number of cases in which supplements were granted with the number of cases in which it was necessary to ask for tenders because, for example, of the death of the contractor, we find that the proportion was 36 per cent in the one case and 39 per cent in the other. The tenders were about three per cent higher.

I could not say offhand just how many veterans we employed last year, but we make it a rule in the department to give the veterans the preference, and we go a long way to help the veteran. Many temporaries were taken on during the war and served in the department for five or six years; some were replaced as the veterans came back, but there are temporaries still in the service. I could get the figures my hon. friend asked for.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I wish the minister would.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I shall do that with pleasure.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Brandon): I was unable to be present during all the discussion on postal matters, and perhaps the point I have in mind has already been dealt with. I wanted to bring to the attention of the Postmaster General one class of employees in the postal service who I think are worthy of the best possible consideration; I refer to the railway mail clerks. They have the hardest of hard work. Their hours are about the worst of any group in the civil service. The work is often exceedingly dangerous. It is wearing on the nerves, as we all know, and often these employees come to the verge of a complete breakdown. They have day runs, night runs—all kinds of runs except home runs; because their home life is completely broken into. Their facilities for getting meals are most inadequate. They have in their custody registered mail, and that tends to worry them. If something has not been done already for this class of employees, I trust that it will be done. I should also have mentioned that their work is done in a rush, because they have to be ready with the mail at each trainstop; they are on edge all the time. I would like to see these conditions recognized financially and otherwise by the department.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The railway post office employees are the highest paid class in the department, and whenever these positions become vacant, employees in other branches are glad to take them, because it is considered as a promotion.

Mr. PROBE: I would like to have a statemen from the Postmaster General as to what his department has done in cutting down the rather top-heavy subsidy that has been paid for some time by the Post Office Department with respect to newspapers and periodicals in the second-class mailing group, where there is a mailing rate of one and a half cents a pound. This matter was taken up by me last year. At that time I had the support of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I am hoping that the minister will be able to make a statement indicating that some change has been made in the policy.

I want to remind the minister that last year I asked him a question as to how we stood financially with respect to the handling of newspapers and periodicals by the Post Office Department. In reply to my question he said that the loss in handling was estimated at $7,287,400 per annum. Even the Postmaster General must admit that a subsidy of that kind to people who I think could get along quite well without it makes quite a dent in the otherwise excellent service which his department can provide. Newspapers, which are the biggest recipients of the subsidy involved in the charge made for second-class mail matter—including newspapers, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says, which consistently decry subsidies for what I would call humanitarian purposes—are permitted to sell advertising up to fifty per cent of their total space and still remain within the second-class field. I think some change should be made in that regard. They definitely receive large revenues on the sale of these advertisements. On top of that they receive a subsidy which in effect amounts to approximately one-tenth of the minister's estimated revenues for the year just ended, 1947-48. That is quite a big contribution from the rest of the Canadian citizens to this one service which is handling and distributing second-class mail matter. The department, by efficient management, did have, according to the budget report and the estimates that are before us, in spite of this big concession, a revenue of approximately $8,010,000 in 1947-48. By requiring the newspapers to pay the exact cost of providing these services, the department could have had a revenue for the past year of some $15,300,000 net, as I calculate it. I do not think the minister will quarrel with the way in which I have built up the figures to indicate that, had they paid their own way for all these services, the net revenue to the Post Office Department would have been over $15,000,000 instead of the present estimated one of $8,000,000. We would have almost doubled our net revenue had a different policy been implemented by the Post Office Department with respect to the charges on newspapers and periodicals. Had that been done perhaps the Postmaster General could have subsidized these relief parcels which have been mentioned by quite a number of hon. members in the house, food parcels for overseas, or he could have given a 25 per cent increase in pay to post office employees all across Canada instead of the timid increases which were mentioned last night by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

As a matter of fact I believe the minister has received representations almost annually from organized groups of letter carriers to the effect that second-class mail matter be handled by the corporations which send them out through postal channels. I hold in my hand a resolution from the federated association of letter carriers, the final paragraph of which reads as follows:

> Be it resolved that the delivery of individual magazines, periodicals, newspapers, catalogues, et cetera, by letter carriers be discontinued, and that said magazines, newspapers, periodicals, catalogues, et cetera be delivered en masse to news depots or duly authorized agents appointed by the publishers of said magazines, newspapers, periodicals, catalogues, et cetera.

I appreciate the reason why the letter carriers take that stand. In my own city, when one gets off the pavement in the early spring of the year and on that South Saskatchewan gumbo, a pretty husky man or woman could get stuck with the load that these people carry when they go out on their routes. It seems to me that it is time the minister seriously contemplated a complete revision either of the rates or of the service in connection with second-class mail matter. I would appreciate a word or two with respect to that general subject.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Brandon): I listened attentively, but I must admit I did not hear the observation of the minister a while ago. I should like to know what he said. Sitting here I could not get it at all.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): It is not very often that I have the opportunity of supporting suggestions made by the hon. member for Regina City, but this subject has been a kind of pet interest of mine. I would be much interested, in a matter of this kind, to hear the views of the Progressive Conservative party. This is a matter of great concern. It is a tangible way in which we might save a little of the taxpayers' money. If a change were made here we might cut some of the expenditures of government. Surely there should be some way in which we could rectify the situation.

I understand that we have to carry newspapers. I am all for the broadcasting of proper information to the public. I think everyone would be willing to carry, out of our revenues, a necessary service of this kind, but there should be some limit to it. Newspapers published in Montreal or Toronto, for instance, are carried all the way out to Vancouver. As a matter of fact my pet peeve against these papers has been that they carry very little actual news or factual material, and we could get along very well without them. In fact the publishers in Vancouver complain bitterly that Little Orphan Annie arrives out there via the Toronto Star Weekly or the Montreal Standard on Tuesday, three or four days ahead of the time that cartoon appears in their papers, and I do not think that is a fair practice. It is not fair to a good newspaper like the Vancouver Sun or the Vancouver Province, which rarely gets down to this part of the country except in the parliamentary reading room. This is just one more instance of all the people subsidizing the manufacturers of news in Ontario and Quebec.

I would ask the minister to give some explanation as to why there is not some limit in this matter. I hate to have the thought in my mind that there is some kind of intangible or subtle blackmail, as it were, perhaps unconscious, on the part of the newspapers. But the fact remains that neither the Liberal government nor the Conservative government when in power—and I doubt whether the C.C.F. would change this, although it would be interesting to hear what the attitude of the hon. member for Regina City is—has done anything about the matter. It has always seemed to me that there was something that somebody was afraid to do anything about. I would be interested to hear the minister's explanation.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): First, in answer to the hon. member for Brandon, I said that railway clerks in the post office were the highest paid employees in the department, and whenever a vacancy occurs there are always many other employees who wish to get into that branch. If they are successful they consider themselves promoted. I will not say why they like to travel, but I suppose they have good reasons.

As regards the deficit on newspapers and periodicals, which this year is $7,500,000, I admit it is a large amount, but the rates are fixed by parliament and are not under the jurisdiction of the Postmaster General. I admit that they are not reasonable, but they were created through the years when the newspapers were not of their present bulk of 30, 40 or 50 pages.

Mr. NICHOLSON: When was the act first passed?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I do not remember offhand.

Mr. KNOWLES: None of us were here.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): In 1932, I am informed. Today the newspapers are heavy. We gave them the privilege of paying one cent and something—

Mr. PROBE: One cent and a half per pound.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That is right, for the full poundage of the newspaper, provided they did not publish more than 50 per cent of advertising. I maintain that in the department we are very fair, because, although the law provides that it shall be 50 per cent, it is sometimes difficult to determine a just pro rata, and we start to count at 54 per cent instead of 50 per cent.

I understand that when this arrangement was established it was a good thing for the people receiving newspapers, but today there is a change. For one thing, the radio provides people in the country with a good deal of news, and the different political parties have since begun to broadcast and are teaching many things to certain provinces—

Mr. KNOWLES: Hear, hear.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): —with results, I must admit, in certain cases. There is also the privilege of sending free the speeches that are made in this house, which is taken advantage of to a large extent. As I say, I admit that the deficit of $7,500,000 on newspapers is too high.

Mr. PROBE: That is right.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We are looking into the question. As a matter of fact, a newspaper representative came to us and made a certain offer which I will not disclose now since we are studying it at the moment. The deficit attributable to the dailies is only $1,500,000, the other $6 million being created by other publications and magazines. In Canada we are in a rather peculiar position. We receive many more American magazines than we ourselves deliver to the United States, and this of course accounts for a certain part of the deficit.

Mr. PROBE: You had better start saving foreign exchange.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): There are international regulations and they cannot be changed by one party for a particular reason without reference to the bulk of the regulations. Some years ago, before my time, we succeeded in getting American publishers to ship to Toronto their publications for Canadian distribution. Those that are to be distributed in Canada are mailed here, so that at least we have a certain revenue in that direction, whereas if they were mailed in New York or some other city in the United States we would lose a larger amount than we do.

The question is a delicate one. Of course people must realize that if the newspapers pay $1,500,000 more the cost of newspapers will be advanced, and instead of two cents it will be five cents for most newspapers. That is coming anyhow.

Mr. KNOWLES: They are all five cents now.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The question is being studied along with many other matters in the department, and I may say that we are quite studious.

Mr. DICKEY: Can the minister tell the committee whether or not a design has yet been selected for the commemorative stamp to be issued on the occasion of the Halifax bicentenary in 1949, and also what the denomination of that stamp will be?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): A design is being studied by different artists, but one has not yet been definitely chosen. The stamp will be a four-cent stamp.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I understand that the United States intend to issue a special stamp in August to commemorate the centenary of peace with Canada. Does the minister, as Postmaster General, intend to reciprocate the decision made by the United States and have a similar type of stamp issued by Canada?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Mr. Chairman, any question about philately is always a delicate one. Indeed, there are many more philatelists in the world than I ever dreamed of before I became Postmaster General.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: They bring in a lot of profit, too.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes; but in the long run, if we granted all their requests, our stamps would be depreciated from the philatelists' point of view. Our stamps have a high value in the world of philately, for the reason that we do not make too many issues. We wait until there is a very good reason.

The stamp commemorating the Niagara bridge, which has been referred to as being associated with the centenary of peace, is not exact from the historical point of view, because peace was signed between Canada and the United States in 1815, whereas the bridge was opened to the public 100 years ago. There has been pressure to have a stamp commemorating the opening of the bridge. This is a private bridge, and it would be helping a private organization in its publicity. I was not Postmater General at the time, but a few years ago the city of Vancouver celebrated its centenary. Many people are of the opinion that we should have issued a stamp on that occasion, and I would suggest that to issue a stamp commemorating the centenary of the erection of this bridge, in view of the fact that we did not issue one to mark the foundation of Vancouver, would not be fair. Of course the United States issue many more stamps than we do, but their stamps have not the same value from the philatelic point of view.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does this all add up to the fact that, after so many words, the Postmaster General does not intend to issue such a stamp?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I must say it was a diplomatic way of saying no.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to ask the Postmaster General what are the regulations and the practice with respect to stamp meters. Some letters are put out metered without anything else on the letter but the stamp itself. But sometimes there are little slogans or designs that go along with the meter. I have in my hand an interesting one that was given to me a little while ago. It was put out on meter number 140,287. The letter was mailed at Montreal on March 30, 1948. The amount of postage paid was four cents. The slogan that is printed as part of the cancellation stamp reads as follows: "Free enterprise means good living. Keep it alive."

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): There should be more of that.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was fairly sure that that slogan would receive endorsement in most parts of this house, but the enthusiasm shown by my hon. friend simply supports my contention that it is a political slogan.

Mr. TIMMINS: The hon. member just made it up.

Mr. KNOWLES: I did not make it up at all. It is stamped on the letter by the post office metering machine.

Mr. TIMMINS: The hon. member is making it a slogan, though.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is stamped on the letter.

Mr. TIMMINS: Why does the hon. member not adopt it?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is it the policy of the Post Office Department to put out slogans from time to time? If so, I should like to offer some suggestions. For instance, next week, how about "Humanity first"; or "Make this your Canada"; or "Production for use and not for profit"? Or maybe my friends to my right have some slogans to suggest.

Mr. LENNARD: They will speak for themselves.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yesterday the hon. member for Calgary West gave an interesting one: "Yale, Yale, the gang's all here!"

This may be amusing, Mr. Chairman, but it is also serious. I should like to know just where the line is drawn in the matter of the slogans that go with these meters. Is the slogan put into the meter which a firm may rent from the post office, or may a firm rent one of these meters and put in any slogan it wishes? If the latter, I still think that either some line should be drawn or we down at Woodsworth House should be allowed to rent a meter and put in any slogan we wish to use.

Mr. JACKMAN: Where is Woodsworth House?

Mr. KNOWLES: Woodsworth House is the C.C.F. national office at 301 Metcalfe street, here in Ottawa.

Mr. FULTON: That is where they sing the Red Flag.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. KNOWLES: Not at all. When a slogan is put out in this way, it gives the people who receive it the impression that there is something official about it. I should be glad to have the Postmaster General's comments on this matter.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): May I have the envelope to which the hon. member referred?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes; I shall be glad to send it over to the Postmaster General.

Mr. ISNOR: Perhaps when the Postmaster General is answering the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre he will also explain why the post office favour the use of postal meters. It is because of the time saved to the employees, and also the splendid service given by free enterprise and those who are willing to buy these meters at a fairly substantial amount, paying $100 in advance. Instead of going in and buying a few stamps at a time and taking up the time of the vendor, they buy $100 worth at a time, get a receipt, and their register is shown at that amount. They continue to use it day after day until they use up that amount; then they go back for a further large amount, and their money is deposited with the Post Office Department. I think it is a splendid method of saving time both for the employer and for the Post Office Department. With regard to slogans, I may say that I use one of these machines and I have a slogan. I advertise that great Atlantic port, Halifax. The stamp is marked, "Halifax", and underneath it "That great Atlantic port". I also speak of a fine brand of clothes and carry a slogan about them, but I have a slogan too which helps Halifax.

An hon. MEMBER: Isnor's "Fit-U clothes".

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We allow corporations to rent or buy meters, and our duty is to see that we are not defrauded of our revenue in any way. We see to that. Some of the corporations like to have a motto like this one, "Free enterprise means good living; keep it alive." Others would like some other one. As long as those mottoes are not indecent or insulting, and so on, we have no objection.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): If they insult your intelligence, is that all right?

Mr. KNOWLES: Question.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Intelligence is so different in different people that I can see why, for instance, a son-in-law does not agree with his mother-in-law. But I must tell the hon. gentlemen that we also have slogans which are asked for at different times. We are scribblers to a certain extent in the department. Now that this has come up, I must admit that this week a certain political party in Quebec asked to have this slogan put on their letters: "Vote Liberal."

Mr. MacNICOL: Right on the envelope?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Much to my disappointment I had to say no; I refused to allow it.

Mr. MILLER: You might insult their intelligence.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes. Of course, these meters serve a useful purpose. They save a great deal of money to people who send out a large number of letters, having regard to the amount of labour involved. Stamps do not have to be put on the letters. If even the Progressive Conservative party want to use a meter and put on something which is decent, and which is according to their orthodox thinking—if it can be called orthodox—we have no objection to it.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just in order to have the regulation clear, do I understand that when the Post Office Department rents a meter—and incidentally I support the statement made by the senior member for Halifax that this is a good idea—to organizations or corporations, they must submit a proposed slogan to the department in all cases, or are they free to put in anything they wish?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): They are free to put in whatever they want to, but if it so happens that we do not want it, it would be too bad for the organization that is submitting something which we cannot permit.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Does the department have to pass on these slogans before they are accepted or put into the machine?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): No. But if something indecent were to come out, we would intervene.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am not quite clear on this. I understood the Postmaster General to say that he turned down a request from his own province to vote Liberal.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It was for a slug.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Was it because that was an indecent statement to go on the letter that the request was turned down?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): It was too political; that is all.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I think we should have this matter clarified. I understood the minister to suggest that if the Progressive Conservative party wanted a slogan, it would be quite in order, but that he had to turn down a similar request from his own party in Quebec. I think the idea of boosting Halifax or Vancouver or Edmonton is quite worthy—

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We allow those things.

Mr. NICHOLSON: And I think they are quite worthy.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): But when an election is taking place in a province or in Canada it would be improper for the Postmaster General to permit anything which would refer to one party as against another.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Elections are being fought, or are about to be fought, and it seems to me hardly the thing to have business firms and other organizations carry on political activity by putting in a plug for free enterprise, or trying to discredit views they do not support, at the same time creating the impression that this is the official party of the government of Canada, which at the moment happens to be a Liberal government. In a few years we may have a C.C.F. government, and it would be hardly cricket for any political party in power to sanction the use of slogans on these meters in support of one political party and in an attempt to discredit others. So I think this policy should be reviewed by the Postmaster General.

Mr. MILLER: I have just one question, which may have been cleared up, on the matter of this reduced rate on air mail. Suppose an airmail letter is sent to my own city of Portage la Prairie, for instance, where the planes do not land. That letter would be taken to Winnipeg and sent by train to Portage la Prairie. Would the same rate apply?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes.

Mr. MILLER: Even though it was not taken all the way by air mail?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The public need not worry about that. We will send the mail by plane at the same price wherever we can gain time.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I should like to ask one or two questions; I have looked through Hansard and have not seen them dealt with, though I have been out of the chamber for some time today. I am not clear as to what post offices are to come under the civil service. I am very much interested in that question. I have objected strenuously, as have many of my constituents, to men who were operating quite successful companies and receiving fair remuneration also acting as postmasters, spending a great deal of time away from the post office and letting their wives or some other employees do the work for a very small remuneration. So I should like the minister to tell us exactly what type of post office is coming under the civil service.

Then the Department of Labour informs me that employees of a rural postmaster come within the terms of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I should like to ask what the Post Office Department does to see that rural postmasters comply with dominion laws.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Post offices with revenue of $3,000 and up will now come under the civil service, and these postmasters are asked to spend all their time at that job. It has not been decided as yet whether post offices with revenue of less than $3,000 will come under the civil service. As to the unemployment insurance, this is a matter which must be looked after by the contractor.

Mr. HERRIDGE: The Postmaster General did not quite get my question. I was referring to employees of rural postmasters working in post offices.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The arrangement is similar.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The Canadian National Railways, operating about sixty per cent of the railway mileage in Canada and employing about sixty per cent of the railway personnel, has never been able to get its full share of the post office business. Could the Postmaster General report what percentage of the amount paid out last year went to the Canadian National and what percentage to the Canadian Pacific, and could he also tell us what prospect the Canadian National has of getting its sixty per cent share as soon as possible?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We do not distribute the postal bags according to the miles served by the two railways. We send the mail by whichever railway is more convenient. I am not sure, but it may happen that the Canadian Pacific passes through an older section of the country, and must receive a little more. I do not know exactly; I have never calculated who gets the larger share.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The Canadian National provides equally good service between Winnipeg and Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver, and Montreal and Vancouver; and if the Canadian Pacific is getting more than its fair share of the revenue I should imagine it would be easy to divert some of that mail in order to ensure that each company gets its fair share.

Mr. LENNARD: They never arrive on time.

Mr. NICHOLSON: My hon. friend had better not say that in any part of Canada served by the Canadian National, because they are very proud of the service they receive.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Some officials of the Canadian National have complained in this connection. We have asked them to come and look at the figures, and if they were ill treated we would see what could be done.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Has the minister the percentages paid the two companies?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): They are paid according to the work done, and the work is given to whichever company serves the greatest population.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If the minister would just give us the percentage of the revenue going to each company we could see the position.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Last year the Canadian Pacific were paid $4,177,000, and the Canadian National, $3,756,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I do not think that is satisfactory. In view of the fact that the Canadian National has more mileage and more employees, there really is no justification—

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That is not the point. The point is whether they serve as large a population.

Mr. NICHOLSON: They both serve Toronto, Vancouver, Montreal and the larger centres, so that I think the time has come when our publicly owned railway should get at least fifty per cent of the amount the Post Office Department pays the railway companies in Canada.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We have asked the officials of the Canadian National to discuss this matter with us, but so far they have not come. We want to serve the people in the best way possible. We do not care whether it is done by the Canadian National or by the Canadian Pacific. As a member of parliament, I can appreciate that the more we can give the Canadian National, the more it will benefit that railway, which badly needs additional revenue. It goes according to the number of bags collected on the way and the number sent from one city to another.

We cannot discuss the matter very well here, because we have asked those interested to discuss it with us and so far they have not done so.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have brought up this point year after year. If the officials of the Canadian National have not come this year I am sure it is not because they have not been concerned about getting some adjustment. When those officials have been before committees of this parliament they have told us they have not been satisfied with the percentage of the revenue they have been getting and that they have been negotiating for a larger percentage. As a taxpayer in Canada, the Postmaster General is concerned about the financial position of his own railway; and I think it is not unreasonable to ask that the Canadian National, our own railway, should get at least fifty per cent of the revenue. I am not asking that we should discontinue mail service to Canadian Pacific points; but the Canadian National has good trains between Toronto and Winnipeg, Winnipeg and Vancouver, Montreal and Vancouver, and so on, and there is no reason why we could not give the Canadian National more money.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The hon. gentleman is making a point on a question which is very difficult, involving a great deal of study, and which I cannot answer at the moment. We did the reasonable thing; we asked the officials of the Canadian National to discuss this matter with us, and we are waiting for them.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I want to ask the minister a further question about this tax that has been put on the people who use the post office savings department. I should like to ask why the department thought it necessary to impose this tax. This service has been given for a great number of years, and people have been permitted to withdraw money from the postal savings bank without this tax being imposed. Now all of a sudden the Post Office Department decides that it should tax at the same rate as the chartered bank. Why was it deemed necessary? Was it to increase revenue? If so, how much increased revenue has been obtained?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The savings bank is not a paying proposition, because we lose money in the sense that we give service free. The bank is intended to be exclusively a savings bank, and it is used by many people in far-off places or by foreigners who have confidence in the Canadian government, whatever it may be, and deposit their money there. However, it has been found that certain people are using their post office savings accounts as checking accounts. We think it reasonable that they should pay the same tax that is imposed on anyone who goes to a bank and draws a cheque.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Was it done to obtain increased revenue or to discourage people from using their accounts?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It was done to discourage people from using this bank as an ordinary commercial bank instead of as a savings bank.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I can see the force of the minister's argument if this tax were imposed only on people who are travelling and use the post office savings bank as a convenience, but I do not think his argument is valid when applied to people in remote places where there is no bank. He is penalizing those who live in outlying districts in order to discourage people from using this bank. It seems to me that in doing this the Post Office Department is forcing people to use the chartered banks. The post office savings bank should be for the convenience of people, particularly those in outlying districts who have not access to chartered banks. I think the revenue the minister will get will be negligible, while the service that could be rendered is considerable. We have got along all these years without imposing this tax, and I do not think we should start to do it when the post office revenue is up so high. It certainly cannot be for revenue, and the only conclusion one can come to is that this is being done to discourage the people from using this service. If that is true, then the proper thing to do would be to close up the service entirely. Goodness knows, we have enough taxes nowadays without having any new ones.

Mr. FULTON: I was speaking the other day about changes in mail services where the railroad provides service only three times a week, but I have another matter I should like to bring up now. This concerns a community which is served partly by bus and partly by rail. The patrons have requested that the mail be carried every day by bus because there is a daily service. I wrote to the minister on behalf of the people of Williams Lake on December 8. I had a reply on December 15 saying that careful inquiry would be made into the matter, but I have heard nothing since that time. From conversation with officials of the department, I understand that the whole question of carrying mail by bus is being investigated. Is the minister in a position to say anything about it today?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): All I can say is that we are studying this question. We hope that we shall be able to render better service in certain places by using bus lines.

Mr. FULTON: Is the inquiry progressing? I have been waiting since the middle of December for a reply.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yesterday afternoon the hon. member for Kamloops brought up the question of salacious and pornographic magazines, and books and other material of that kind. What is the attitude of the department toward the transmission in the mail of material such as that? By whom is the decision made, denying the use of mails to such things as shock one's sense of decency or which may have the direct result of contributing to the delinquency of juveniles?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Any material from another country is supposed to be censored by the customs department. I know this, because when I was an attorney I had to come and discuss certain points with the officials here concerning exactly what the hon. member for Lake Centre has brought up. If it is domestic we rely, and rightly so, upon the attorneys general of the different provinces. There is a tendency to impose upon the Postmaster General the duties of the Attorney General of Canada, something that I do not like myself. The attorney general is the one to say what is criminal or what should be prohibited. Under the postal regulations we have the right to stop immoral books whenever we find them.

Recently I received protests in connection with the importation of a book which has been sold in large numbers in the United States. I understand that 200,000 copies have been sold at $7 or $8 each. This book is supposed to be immoral because it relates to sex.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is a best seller in the United States.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I am going to read this book myself, and then I am going to ask somebody else to read it so that I shall not be the only one to pass an opinion on it. We try to do everything possible to stop the distribution of immoral material.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am interested in the fact that the minister is going to look over this book and that he is justifying his doing so on the ground that it is in the interests of Canadian morals.

An hon. MEMBER: His are incorruptible.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then, after he reads it he is going to call in somebody else to read it, so that his will not be the only opinion. I should like to ascertain the degree of exclusion of immoral books or magazines from the mails during the past year. The minister has mentioned that he acts only at the request of the attorneys general of the different provinces.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I would say it is the duty of the attorney general of the province to see to that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The right to use the mails to transmit money for lottery tickets to another country and to receive tickets from that country has been denied by the Post Office Department. Was that decision made by the Postmaster General in his department, or was it made at the request of the attorneys general of the several provinces? It is difficult, I realize, for anyone to set up as a censor and determine what is good and what is proper. The minister says he has that power, but apparently he relies on the customs department to bar objectionable books and magazines from entering Canada. Of publications produced in Canada, have any during the past year been barred from the mails?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): No. So far as lottery tickets are concerned, there is a section in the Post Office Act dealing with them, and it is easy to determine whether it is an illegal lottery. But it is more difficult to say whether a book is immoral.

Mr. FULTON: I brought this matter up yesterday when the amendment to the Canada Evidence Act was going through. It does seem to me that one of the means by which the circulation of these so-called crime comics in Canada might be stopped would be through denying them the use of the mails. I confess I had not actually looked at one of these crime comics until samples were sent to me by the parent-teachers' association of my own city. Under the guise of some slogan such as "Crime does not pay", they appeal to children, who read them and see in every picture the portrayal of some crime of violence or sexual offence, or something of that kind. The attorney general of the province cannot deny the use of the mails to these magazines, but I think the Postmaster General can. If he would look at one of these books I am sure that he would have no hesitation in saying that is contributes to juvenile delinquency and is therefore an offence under the Juvenile Delinquents Act, and that he can use his power to deny such books the use of the mails. The ones I have seen are printed mostly in Toronto. They are not all brought in from the United States. When the embargo went on I think the printing of these magazines in Canada increased greatly. I would appreciate it if the Postmaster General would answer why he does not use his power to deny the use of the mails to these magazines in order to remove this threat to Canadian youth.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Many of these publications go in bundles to the different stores where they are sold. If the Postmaster General had to assume the duties of censor, we should need a lot more employees. Then, in addition, mail matter is secret. We are not supposed to open a sealed envelope. I will look at the publication and refer it to the Minister of Justice, because I doubt my capacity to judge for all the people of Canada. Different people have different standards of what is moral and immoral.

Mr. FULTON: I will send over samples to the Postmaster General. He will see that they are given second-class mail privileges by his department.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to carry this matter a little further. The minister has decided, in the interest of the country as a whole, to read this book on the sex life of the male. After he determines that in his opinion it should be denied the use of the mails, what course will he follow? What has he in mind? He must have some objective in mind, because he has told us that the only reason he is going to read it is to find out whether it would be disturbing to the morals of our country. If he should determine that it is, what course does the minister intend to follow?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The only thing I would be allowed to do would be to refer it to some of my colleagues who could stop the entry of this book into Canada, or cancel its present privileges. It would be very difficult for the Postmaster General to do that. It is a matter for the attorneys general of the different provinces. It is a question which needs to be studied, I admit. Doctor Bates of Toronto drew my attention to the book that has been mentioned.

Mr. MacNICOL: He is head of the health league.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, and he asked me to do something about it. I shall have to get the book and look at it or ask somebody to look at it for me.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: You should not delegate that task.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): When I was crown prosecutor I had a storekeeper arrested and we confiscated quite a lot of books he had for sale which in my opinion were immoral. I put in the box a witness who had read these books and he declared them immoral, but much to my surprise two ministers of religion came along the next day and swore that the books were not immoral. I had not read the books myself because I had not time; but the judge, who was a man of sound common sense, said, "I shall read them and decide for myself whether they are immoral". He read them and declared that they were immoral. The books were confiscated and the accused was found guilty.

Mr. HAZEN: I understand that from time to time post office employees are brought to Ottawa from different parts of Canada for the purpose of receiving instruction. Would the minister tell us what the length is of the course of instruction and how many post office employees are brought here for the purpose of receiving instruction? I think the idea is a very good one, and I would like to have more light on it.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): At different times we bring to Ottawa good employees who have been earmarked not only for increases but for promotion, so that they may learn more about the operations of the post office throughout Canada. They stay here for a certain time and then go back to their own districts. The purpose is to give them a broad general knowledge of the operations of the department. We have five classes with ten in each class.

Mr. HAZEN: Has that been going on for some time?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): No; about two years ago we started it.

Mr. HAZEN: With regard to the postage meters that we were discussing, does the department rent them or sell them to different firms? Can the minister tell us who manufactures these machines, and what they cost the government?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The firms which manufacture them are authorized to sell them to the different people, but we control the operation. The manufacturing firm makes arrangements with the different corporations that are using them, after they have been accepted by the department.

Mr. HAZEN: The department does not sell or rent the machines?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): No.

Mr. HAZEN: The department approves them.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We see that they do not defraud the treasury. We have been using some ourselves in the different departments. At the present time we are making an experiment to see what the franking privilege is costing the Post Office Department, and we are doing that by installing meters.

Mr. HAZEN: Has the minister found out what it is costing the department?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I could give these figures to the hon. gentleman. We have rented a few.

Mr. FULTON: To revert to the matter which was discussed a moment ago, under what section of the Post Office Act does the minister find the power to deny certain individuals the use of the mail?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Section 7 of the Post Office Act, chapter 161.

Mr. FULTON: Has the minister the relevant portion in front of him?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes.

Mr. FULTON: May we have it?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

The Postmaster General may, subject to the provisions of this act, make regulations declaring what shall and what shall not be deemed to be mailable matter for the purpose of this act.

These are the words under which these publications fall. When we declare it is not mailable matter it is refused.

Mr. JACKMAN: How many permanent and temporary employees are in the service of the Post Office Department?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): As of March 31, 1948, the number of employees under the civil service were 11,134 permanent and 4,182 temporaries. These are in staff offices. The number of employees and contractors amounted to 41,130. At headquarters there were 1,000 employees; in staff post offices 13,593; in district offices, 522; railway mail service, 1,191; revenue postmasters, 11,826; mail services, 12,910.

Mr. JACKMAN: Of the 41,130 employees who are not in staff offices, how many are permanent and how many are on the temporary list?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I did not catch the question.

Mr. JACKMAN: I want to find out how many employees in the service of the department are on the permanent list and how many on the temporary list.

[Mr. Bertrand (Laurier).]

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): In regard to the staff post offices there are 13,593. I gave that figure a few seconds ago. There are 11,826 revenue postmasters. There are no permanent or temporary employees. They are postmasters. We do not consider that they are either temporary or permanent. The same thing applies to the mail services. These are rural mail and so forth.

Mr. JACKMAN: Perhaps I could confine my question to the mail porters and the letter carriers. These are the two classes in which I am particularly interested.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): As of March 31, 1948, 3,225 letter carriers were permanent and 1,208 were temporary. There were 899 permanent mail porters and 549 temporaries.

Mr. JACKMAN: Can the minister give the committee the number of qualified temporary employees who have been let out in order to make way for veterans who have applied for positions and who have the preference?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It would take a long time to give these figures to the hon. gentleman, and I could not give them here. I would have to go through the files. There are temporary employees who have been on the staff for a few years. We have extended their time in order to give them a chance to pass another examination, because some of them were not successful in the first examination. I may say that whenever there was a qualified veteran for the position the temporary employee had to go.

Mr. JACKMAN: I was wondering how many employees had been taken on in that way.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Does the hon. gentleman want the figures for any particular year, say 1945, for example?

Mr. JACKMAN: The year 1947 would be satisfactory. Take some year since we passed the veterans preference act.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I shall have a report made on that.

Mr. McLURE: Are clerks grades 2, 3 or 4 paid the same salary whether they are working in Toronto, Montreal, Saint John or Charlottetown?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The answer is yes.

Mr. McLURE: They are all paid the same salary?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes.

Item agreed to.

312. Railway mail service, $15,446,980.

Mr. McLURE: A good deal has been said with reference to this. When the minister was before the committee with his bonus bill I made some remarks, and I am not going to make any extended remarks at this time, except to say that this discrimination with regard to rural mail contracts still continues. For instance, a month ago I placed on Hansard some of the discriminations with reference to contracts.

Dealing only with the rural mail contracts in my own constituency, I cite the man who has a 16-mile mail route. He gets $1,000, and at the same time the mail courier, driving over a 26-mile mail route, both of them being very much alike, except that the 26-mile route is a little more hilly, receives only $902.50. In other words, he is penalized to the extent of $97.50 for having to drive ten miles further.

I could give parallel cases, but I will mention just one more. In my constituency there is a mail courier who drives a 17-mile route and receives $1,200, while another man not far away, driving a 28-mile route, gets $1,100. In other words, the man who is going the longer distance by thirteen miles is penalized $100 for driving the extra mileage.

That is one thing against the tender system. A few days ago in my own constituency a man who had been driving on a mail contract for fifteen years, having given excellent service, and having received $625, decided that he should get a little more. He took the matter up with the office, urging that he should receive $150 more, but the office called for tenders. When this man saw that there were other people tendering for the contract, he thought he would also put in a tender for $600, seeing that he had the equipment. Somebody else comes in with a tender which is $5 or perhaps $1 less and takes the contract from this man who has given fifteen or sixteen years of service. At the end of another year this man who has tendered at a little less than $600 can get a bonus of $125. This system of tendering is one that should be done away with. I would appeal again to the minister, as I have done before, to have a committee of this house set up to study rural mail problems, so that justice will be done these people. At present they are labouring under an injustice.

Item agreed to.

313. Audit of revenue, money order, postal note and savings bank business; issue of postage stamps and postal notes, $2,105,284.

Mr. JACKMAN: Does the department do its own auditing or does the auditor general come in and do it? Is there just a final check up?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This is the actual auditing of the different post offices by our employees.

Mr. JACKMAN: Has the auditor general any supervision?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes. The auditor general has the right to come in and audit any of our branches or any of the post offices. This is done at different times in certain places.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

314. Departmental administration, $272,600.

Mr. MERRITT: Surely the minister will be making a statement with regard to the European recovery program and its effect on Canada.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): There is nothing in these estimates having to do with the European recovery program.

Mr. MERRITT: There may be nothing in the estimates directly related to that; but on departmental administration, under the estimates of trade and commerce, with the situation as it is in respect of Canadian trade, I should think the committee would expect a statement from the minister on that subject. He has just been to Washington, and it would be amazing if he had not come here prepared to make a statement on Canada's participation and generally regarding the subject.

Mr. HOWE: I think the facts regarding the European recovery program are well known to hon. members. An appropriation has been made by congress to cover the first fifteen months' requirements. The amount is now being reconsidered. At the moment, I believe, something over $5 billion is the amount of the appropriation for the first fifteen months of the five-year program. Of that, provision is made for off-shore expenditures, perhaps up to an amount of $1,800 million. According to a press statement made within the last two days, Mr. Bissell, Mr. Hoffman's assistant, stated that, from that fund set aside for off-shore purchases, purchasing from Canada was proceeding very well for the reason that Canadian prices are satisfactory to those administering the European recovery program.

Funds allocated to the United Kingdom are at present being used to pay for wheat and meat products and certain other products that are being shipped from Canada. The program provides that trade will flow through the normal channels. It is not the intention of ERP administration that government buying shall be a feature of ERP, unless government buying of the particular commodity was the practice before ERP came into being.

Funds are being allocated to sixteen recipient countries, and anyone wishing to sell goods to those countries under ERP must approach the countries through the usual channels and have his articles included in the requisition from the country concerned.

The Department of Trade and Commerce has obtained the services of Mr. Sidney Pierce who was formerly our ambassador to Mexico, to head up our ERP organization abroad. He has just returned from Washington and will leave within the next few days for Paris, which is the headquarters of the overseas ERP organization.

I have had conversations with those administering ERP; with all senior officials. Mr. Pierce has recently returned from further conferences with them. We both believe that Canada's position in the program is well established. I do not know that there is anything further that I can add. If there are any questions I shall be glad to answer them.

Mr. JACKMAN: Does the minister mean that the United States has allocated a certain amount of the $5 billion to each of these sixteen receiving countries in Europe and that selling has to be done directly by the supplying countries to those individual recipient countries? Once an order is received by a Canadian supplier, must it be authorized by ERP? Will he explain the procedure? What is the type of products that Canada will be able to supply, not from the standpoint of our ability to produce but from the standpoint of the products being authorized? Will it be raw material products or processed or partly processed products, such as canned goods, that will be sold to the receiving country or to the ERP board?

Mr. HOWE: This list of availabilities that Canada has submitted to the ERP administration was submitted some two or three months ago. A revised list was submitted within the last few days. I have not that list at hand, but I shall be glad to have it here this evening and give any information from it that the hon. member may wish to have. It must be thoroughly understood that the letter "R" in the ERP program stands for "Recovery" and not "Relief". We must all be careful not to regard ERP as a dumping ground for unwanted surpluses. That has been made clear by the administration, and I should like to make it clear in this house. The purchases that will be made will be purchases that the recipient countries require for the recovery program. Machinery will be given high priority. Food, of course, is more in the nature of relief than recovery, but is necessary to recovery in some cases. My present information is that all the food that Canada can produce—that is, staple foods such as wheat, which is the most concentrated, high-protein food in existence—will be required. Fish is more a borderline case. I cannot state definitely about that, although it is quite in order for those interested in selling fish to attempt to sell it to the recipient countries. If they can succeed in having it included on the list, there is a fair possibility that it may be approved. But the general situation is that those who have been selling abroad should continue to sell abroad. If they succeed in getting their material on the requisitions from a particular country, then those requisitions will be "vetted" by the ERP administration. If the list is approved, then the material qualifies for sale under ERP.

Mr. JACKMAN: Does ERP itself place the order?

Mr. HOWE: No. ERP places no order.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. If hon. members will look at page 68 of the main estimates, they will find that the item of departmental administration covers an expenditure of $272,600,000. Then, if they will turn to page 251, they will see a vote for foreign trade services. I believe that the discussions which are taking place now might come under that item, and not under departmental administration as outlined in this item of $272,600,000.

Mr. BURTON: Since this is the first time that the minister has appeared before the committee in connection with presenting these estimates, I think we might be allowed a little bit of general discussion. Like the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, I was surprised that the minister did not come before the committee prepared—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. The chair is always in the hands of the committee in dealing with matters of this kind. On the other hand, I think the chair should try to give direction to the members in order to expedite the business of the committee. If it is the wish of the committee to deal with the matter that has now been brought up, it is quite all right. But I just point out the fact to which I have referred, so that members can decide now whether they want to go on with that discussion or not.

Mr. MacNICOL: In the past it has been the custom to allow on the first item, departmental administration, discussion on almost any item pertaining to the department.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The estimates are divided into the two parts, as I have tried to point out. If the hon. member will look at page 251, he will find that the expenditure under foreign trade services does not come under the $272,600,000 for departmental administration. However I do not intend to press the point. I will leave it to the committee to decide what they wish to do.

Mr. BURTON: I quite realize that it is necessary for you, Mr. Chairman, in your position, to give direction to the committee; and I shall be quite happy to abide by your decision. But as has been said by the hon. member for Davenport, it is the custom on the first item to have the general discussion. It was along those lines that I had intended to say a few words.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Then it is agreeable to the committee to discuss this foreign trade matter under departmental administration. Is that the idea?

Mr. KNOWLES: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that if you were to decide that, since foreign trade is mentioned separately, it cannot be discussed under departmental administration, it would be consistent for you to pick out other things such as standards division, wheat and grain division, or Canada Grain Act, and apply the same rule. It may be that some day the house will decide to follow that practice. But certainly that has not been the case during the years that most of us know about. It seems to me that it would be a fairly drastic change to make without some consideration by the committee and the house in general. I think the committee would prefer to follow the practice of permitting general discussion on the first item in the department. I think that, by adopting that procedure, in the long run time will be saved.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Then, if that is the unanimous wish of the committee, we shall continue along that line.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. BURTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. May I continue by saying that, since this is the first time the minister has appeared before the committee with his estimates for this department, it was surprising to some of us that he did not come prepared to give a fairly comprehensive statement as to the work carried on by this department and as to what is anticipated in the immediate future. However, since the minister has not seen fit to do that, we shall probably have to grope around in the dark and gather up the loose ends, so to speak.

Before I endeavour to make my little contribution, may I assure the minister that I am glad to see that he finds time to take care of this department. I hope he will not take it amiss when I say that when I heard of his appointment as minister in charge of this department, the first thought that struck me was that the minister is much more suited and much better trained to be a builder than to be a trader. However, some of us may be wrong in that respect. It is to be hoped that the energetic leadership that he can give to this department will prove that the fears of myself, and of other hon. members who think as I do, were unwarranted.

I have had an opportunity on several occasions, particularly last summer, to view some of his work; and, now that he is Minister of Trade and Commerce, I hope he will make an effort to see that full use is made of his work in other lines and other years. I have particular reference to the fact that the minister and his department can be of considerable assistance to those of us who would like to see more trade into and out of Hudson bay, making use of the Hudson bay port and the Hudson bay route. That is the first point of which I should like the minister to make a special note. In the past the minister devoted a great deal of time and energy to the development of that port; I hope he will now help us prove that the Hudson bay route and port are a feasible undertaking. For my part I do not think we should be satisfied with exporting just a few million bushels of wheat by that means this summer. I believe our objective should be at least 25,000,000 bushels.

That is only one small bit of the whole trade picture. This nation is endeavouring to get back to a peacetime footing, but we have found that our old conception of trade has been largely upset. In the first place, we find trade being carried on under entirely different circumstances, on account of the fact that so many commodities are in short supply, with the result that we have a seller's market. So we must adjust ourselves to meet these conditions.

On the other hand, we should also remember that in the final analysis the best market for Canadians is the home market. We must not overlook the fact that the first demand on the production of this nation should be the provision of a full, rich life for our own people. Let no one think I am saying I do not believe we should go the limit, even to the extent of denying ourselves if necessary, in helping to provide foodstuffs and other commodities for people in lands less fortunate than ours. Nevertheless we should so organize our trade within our own country that our own people will reap the benefit of the wonderful productivity of this country. Here again the minister and his department can give a great deal of leadership.

I hope we shall never again see British Columbia apples going to waste, while at the same time the children on the prairies are not able to obtain apples, and similar conditions in other parts of the country. I hope we may never again see the textile warehouses piled high, and at the same time, as was the case in the not too distant past, the people of this country lacking sufficient and proper clothing. So I say trade should be carried on for the benefit of our own people; then, in branching out into international trade, we should be in a position to trade our surplus goods for commodities we cannot economically produce in our own country, so that our people may be able to round out a full and satisfying life.

In that connection I think it is of considerable significance that at the present time we should have in progress in our own country an international trade fair or exhibition. While the public as a whole are not invited to attend, I believe this fair gives us an idea of what may happen in future. At such a gathering of nations each is able to show the others its commodities, and we can start trading with one another, thus disposing of our surplus products in exchange for commodities we require. I believe in this I am expressing the opinion of hon. members who have had an opportunity to visit the trade fair and learn at least something of what is going on there.

Then I think I should mention that today our trade is not on the same basis as in the years gone by. We find that instead of trading being carried on in a haphazard manner, with buyers and sellers running around at loose ends, with people bidding against each other to run prices down or bidding against each other to run prices up, more and more the principal importing countries are buying through import boards or government agencies in order to meet their requirements. So I think we must realize that the old days of laissez-faire are gone, and we must adjust ourselves to new circumstances and a new order. I would say that Canada is in a very favourable position; and if the Department of Trade and Commerce bears in mind the points I have mentioned I believe it can be of great assistance to the people of this country.

I do not intend to deal with any specific items, Mr. Chairman, though I may do so later on. In conclusion, however, once more I would appeal to the minister to help us make this a banner year for the Hudson bay route.

Mr. MERRITT: I see it is now ten minutes to six, Mr. Chairman. I was surprised that the minister did not make a statement about the European recovery program. I do not mean the statement he made a moment ago, but a prepared statement giving the committee considerable detail.

But that was not the only thing I thought the minister would come before the committee prepared to deal with this afternoon. During the past year, various things have happened in connection with our external trade which have made the subject one of compelling interest to all the Canadian people. I have in mind such things as the minister's statement last November, at the time the restrictions were put on, that Canada should make the building up of United States dollar exports a national objective. I have in mind, when Bill No. 3 was being discussed, the references that were made to a positive dollar program, which, of course, was built up on the income of United States dollars from the various means which were not disclosed but which the minister attempted to leave the house to believe he had in mind. I have mentioned the European recovery program.

I saw recently that the Canadian exporters' association, in a brief presented to the government, expressed alarm that the empire markets upon which they had relied in the past were drying up. All these things require a statement of government policy on the matter of external trade. Will the minister be kind enough, when the committee resumes his estimates at nine o'clock, to give a comprehensive statement as to the prospects of trade in the coming year, what he has accomplished in respect to expanding exports to the United States, what he hopes to do and what can be done to protect the empire markets about which the exporters' association is so much alarmed?

I cannot help reiterating my great disappointment that no statement was ready for us when the minister started his estimates, which are probably as important as any that will come before the committee. I hope the minister will try to do that tonight. In the meantime I should like to ask a few questions with respect to the statement he made on ERP. I think the minister said that funds had been allocated to the countries but that purchases were to be through normal channels and not through government agencies as a general rule. Then he spoke about statements of availability and requisitions.

Am I correct in understanding that the United States is going to make United States dollars available to the purchasing countries and that they can be spent in any way, provided that the ERP organization approves the bulk requisition for that kind of article, or does each individual transaction have to be put through the ERP organization? As the hon. member for Rosedale has suggested, perhaps the minister might trace an individual transaction through the whole process, so that we can understand how the mechanism works.

Mr. HOWE: As I stated, trade practices are being followed. For example, we have been making bulk sales to the United Kingdom of foodstuffs. The ERP organization has approved those contracts. We shall continue to ship under those contracts to recipients of ERP funds.

Mr. MERRITT: Will the payment be made at Washington or London?

Mr. HOWE: London. The ERP does not buy or sell or pay; it just makes funds available to recipient countries for use in buying articles on an approved list of commodities. The list must be in detail. For example, if a country requires leather, it decides where it wants to buy that leather. The transaction is put up to the ERP organization, presumably in Paris. If it wishes to buy leather from Canada or from a specific firm in Canada, that is specified. The ERP organization approves or does not approve the transaction. If it is approved, the purchaser will qualify for payment from ERP funds.

Mr. JACKMAN: How do we specify for United States funds?

Mr. HOWE: Everything we sell is for United States funds or Canadian funds unless we make some other arrangement.

Mr. JACKMAN: If the contract were made through London, if we were selling to Great Britain, or through Paris, if we were selling to France, and we were following the normal course of trade we could not insist upon United States dollars. How do we make sure that we get United States dollars on these ERP shipments?

Mr. HOWE: The transaction may be made in sterling. The Bank of Canada has clearing arrangements with the Bank of England. If it is made in convertible currency the transfer can be made. It would have to be a purchase authorized by the Bank of England. If it is authorized, clearance is through the bank. Our sales to the United Kingdom of wheat and food and most other commodities are in Canadian dollars.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is difficult to understand exactly what does happen. Taking leather, the example the minister gave us, let us say that France needs so much sole leather and will get it in Canada with ERP approval. The Canadian tanner would ship to France against a draft in dollars or United States dollars or francs. That is what would happen when you are trying to maintain ordinary trade channels. I do not quite understand how we get the United States dollars which we are after and which are being provided for this purpose. Would the shipment be segregated from all other shipments going to France, so that we could get United States dollars?

Mr. HOWE: Does my hon. friend know anyone who sells to France for anything except United States or Canadian dollars?

Mr. JACKMAN: We do not want Canadian dollars.

Mr. HOWE: We are pleased to get them. They are just the same as United States dollars for our purposes. I will take my hon. friend aside some day and explain it to him.

Mr. MERRITT: Will the minister make a statement at nine o'clock?

Mr. HOWE: What statement? I have just made a statement. I shall be glad to answer any question my hon. friend asks on ERP or on my statement. Has he any objection to the statement I made?

Mr. MERRITT: Yes, I have.

Mr. HOWE: I thought it was preferable to speak without a document. Now my hon. friend insists upon a document.

Mr. MERRITT: Of course I do not insist on the minister reading from a document, but I suggest to him that the statement he made on ERP, being a statement without proper preparation, apparently just from what he carries in his head, was not as clear to the committee as it would have been had he attempted to forecast the questions he was going to be asked. There were four specific things that I mentioned. I suggest to the minister that his estimates will go through more quickly if he tries to give us a comprehensive picture and does not attempt to have his estimates go through by our jumping up and asking detailed questions and trying to work out the whole picture. I think it would be in the interests of the committee and of the minister himself if he were to present a comprehensive picture.

Mr. HOWE: This is my thirteenth session in the House of Commons, and I have never noticed that a minister who made a long statement on the opening of his estimates got through any faster for that reason.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

(Translation):

Mr. PAUL EDMOND GAGNON (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, according to the Canada Year Book, between 1867—the date of Confederation—and 1900, there were less than 20 divorces a year in Canada. Then in 1903 there were 23; in 1909, 51 and, in 1913, 60; less than one per 1,000 marriages.

One of the consequences—and not the least disastrous at that—of World War I was an increased rate of divorces, due mostly to living conditions in that troubled period, softer laws and easier legal proceedings.

Divorces in Canada numbered 114 in 1918, 608 in 1926, 700 in 1931, 1,570 in 1936 and 2,369 in 1940.

In 1945, last year for which statistics are available, the divorce figures are as follows: Nova Scotia, 158; New Brunswick, 171; Ontario, 1,940; Manitoba, 405; Saskatchewan, 282; Alberta, 575; British Columbia, 1,366; Quebec, 177; Prince Edward Island, 2. This adds up to a total of 5,076 divorces.

In the province of Quebec, where there are no divorce courts, the percentage for 1945 is 3·5 per thousand marriages, compared with 26·9 in British Columbia and 38·2 in Ontario.

In 1947, in the latter province alone, 3,936 divorces, an all-time high, were granted by the supreme court. In 1946, there had been 3,500.

Divorces are increasing at an alarming rate in Canada.

The family, which is the basis of society, is being disintegrated with frightening unconsciousness. Divorce is a sure sign that moral standards are on the down grade, that civilization is on the way to disaster and will inevitably be destroyed.

When people have not enough character, religious conviction, courage, abnegation, honesty, charity and honour to respect the most sacred of all contracts, how can we hope that they will respect the laws to which they are subject and all other contracts by which they are bound?

There are many reasons for divorce, although adultery is the only one mentioned. However, in my opinion one of the principal causes of misunderstanding and separation is marriage between people of different faiths.

Following an investigation in the matter, Bishop Page, of the United States Episcopal Church, found a few years ago that only one per cent of those seeking divorces were of the same faith.

If it is true that we must increase the police force in a country where people have no respect for religion, I believe we can also say that where the Christian spirit of a people is low, divorces are bound to increase.

Last year, the Ottawa Journal pointed out that parliamentary jurisdiction in the matter of divorce was little short of scandalous. It doubted very much "if in the whole democratic world, there was a more grotesque parliamentary fact than this."

It is sad, not to say revolting, that people's representatives should sanction and condone by their votes decisions based on sham evidence, obvious perjury and summary proceedings trumped up by experts in the matter.

Marriage being a divinely instituted sacrament, men, be they senators, have no power to put asunder "what God hath joined together."

It is false to claim that the privilege, if you wish to call it that, of seeking divorce is a right, just as it is ludicrous to print on reports of those proceedings that in divorcing Mrs. So-and-so from Mr. So-and-so, parliament is passing an act "for the relief" of Mrs. So-and-so.

In 1886, Mr. Joseph Frémont, LL.D., quondam professor at Laval University, pointed out the danger of this procedure in his survey entitled "Divorce and Separation.":

> We are fast heading towards recognition of divorce as the generally accepted rule in the country. . . Besides, is it not recognition of the divorce principle to allow it by means of private bills? The privilege of private bills has served to introduce in society all doctrines and theories later sanctioned by law.
> In brief, as stated by Mr. Henri Bourassa in an address, the constitution of 1867 has established divorce, as well as marriage as a principle of national organic law. The federal parliament has maintained or established ordinary divorce jurisdictions in seven provinces and set up a parliamentary divorce court for the whole country. Justice Belleau rightfully said: "Divorce has been thrust upon us by parliament." Technically since 1867, in current practice since 1888. "Parliament has full authority to break up our homes. Unfortunately it cannot salvage the remains."

Children, those innocent victims, are the ones to suffer; thus do children have to pay the price for their parents' selfishness and mistakes. Driven to the gutter by the judges, they will later appear at the bar of the assize court or within the confines of penitentiaries. The greatness, the future and the very life of the nation are at stake. The country is being deprived of the life blood of generations essential to its growth and expansion. Because its vital forces are being exhausted at the source, the country is impoverished. The plague of divorce is more dangerous than communism and all subversive doctrines combined. To defend and to cultivate the Canadian soil, men and soldiers are needed. Where shall we find them if we destroy the family, the source of life from which new harvests should forever spring?

Let us stem the wave of heathenism that is sweeping over the world, curb the ills bred by divorce and restore the Christian social order. Let parliament, once for all, leave off being a party to these crimes and unruliness and, at long last, decide to disallow every request for divorce brought to its attention. In voting against these bills, I feel that I am doing my duty and contributing to Canada's moral well-being.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, may I add a word to support what has been said by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon) regarding the bills before us.

I do not intend to make a long speech. In addition to the statistics given us by the hon. member there are two reasons why the thought of divorce is increasingly prevalent among the people. First obscene literature, second, the movies.

Under the Quebec law, children may not enter movie houses until they are sixteen. I am happy to say that I supported that act of the legislative assembly of Quebec, under the Taschereau administration, as member for the county I now represent in this House of Commons.

Pictures showing a husband philandering with the maid or a wife with her chauffeur, scenes we witness nearly every day in the American films, are bound to corrupt our young people.

The province of Quebec is often criticized because of this act, which is believed to infringe upon the freedom of the individual. However, it does nothing of the sort, but merely curtails the liberty of those who cannot exercise it wisely, that is, of all young people under sixteen years of age.

I therefore subscribe to the hon. member's remarks, and I suggest that authorities do everything in their power to prevent young people in other provinces taking advantage of those laws which allow youths of all ages to go to the movies. Salacious and obscene literature should be banned more particularly, along with anything that may tend to make our young people consider divorce as a very normal thing and suggest to them the well-known saying: "How can it be so bad, when everybody is doing it?"

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

(Text):

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a word or two in connection with these divorce bills. I have previously expressed my view that something should be done to find another way of handling the matter than putting these cases through parliament as hundreds of individual bills.

It is my own view that one solution would be to provide, in respect of Canadians who do not have the opportunity to sue for divorce in their own province, that jurisdiction in this matter be given to the Exchequer Court of Canada. However, the government has not seen fit to act on that suggestion, and I do not intend to speak on that point at this time.

I did rise rather to make a suggestion which I think would meet with the wishes of all members of this house and which would save considerable time and money. Perhaps some means might be found of carrying it out.

I have before me the divorce bills and the minutes and proceedings and evidence which have come to my desk this session.

An hon. MEMBER: It makes nice reading.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have not read it. I read one or two a few years ago and I find that they are all the same; if you read one, you have read them all. However, this year I have saved them all, and I may say I have not collected any copies that have gone to other members to make the pile any higher than it actually is.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mine go into the waste-paper basket.

Mr. KNOWLES: So will mine when I have made the point I am now making. Here is this pile of bills, minutes of proceedings, and evidence, eleven inches high. There are 245 members and 96 senators, when they are all there—a total of 341. Multiply 341 by eleven inches and it comes to 312 feet. In other words, we have had printed for us in this session a pile of this material, which is almost of the pornographic kind mentioned, this afternoon, 312 feet high. That is higher than the peace tower. The peace tower itself is only 291 feet high, and here we have an accumulation of this printed matter 312 feet high, almost up to the flag itself.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that no members would miss anything and it would not have any effect on the proceedings and the bills that go through parliament if some means were found whereby we could obviate the printing of such huge quantities of these bills, minutes of proceedings and evidence taken before the senate committee. Surely one or two copies in some office, for reference if necessary, would be sufficient.

I hope my suggestion will be taken into consideration by Mr. Speaker, or by the officials of the house, and that some way will be found to save all this paper and printing. On other occasions we have been told that the printing bureau has so much printing to do for parliament that some important matters have to be delayed. Perhaps my suggestion would not solve the problem in its entirety, but it would be a help, and I offer it in the hope that it will be considered.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I do not see what we can do with these bills except to pass them. This is the ninety-ninth day of the session and we should be getting on with the business of parliament. These bills originate in the other place. The fee over there is $200, and there is a fee of $500 for private bills that come before this house. I repeat, there is nothing that we can do, as far as I can see, but to pass these bills. The government has no policy in relation to them. They are private bills, and the parties affected have paid their fees.

I may say, sir, that I am a member of a church that has made an extensive inquiry into the question of divorce. An important investigation into this question was presided over by the Archbishop of York, and attended by the Right Rev. Bishop Wand of London. They have submitted a report to the Lambeth conference in England, which meets on the first of July for six weeks. The report widens somewhat, for the first time in 300 years, the grounds of divorce. The Church of Scotland is looking into the question of divorce and so are other churches in the old land. The whole question is under consideration by these bodies.

In view of these facts, surely we can pass these bills now, and perhaps next year some method can be proposed in parliament by which the problem of divorce can be handled, so far as legislation here is concerned. I see no purpose to be served by holding up these bills now on this the ninety-ninth day of the session. There is no other course open to us than to pass them.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house that these bills be read the second time?

Mr. GAGNON: On division.

Motion agreed to and bills read the second time.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Mr. Croll moves, seconded by Mr. Golding, that these divorce bills be referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL INSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 151, to incorporate the National Insurance Company—Mr. Rinfret—Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. RINFRET: In connection with this bill I will ask the hon. member for Rimouski to move an amendment to section 1, provided that I have the general approval of the committee. Unless I have that approval, I shall have to outline the procedure I intend to follow. That will be, before third reading is given, to ask the house to recommit the bill for restudy or reconsideration of section 1. With the general approval of the committee, I will now ask the hon. member for Rimouski to move the amendment.

Mr. BELZILE moved:

That Bill No. 151, an act to incorporate the National Insurance Company, be amended by adding in the title and at line 13 of section 1 between the words "National" and "Insurance" the words "Fire and Casualty"; and at line 14 of section 1, between the words "Assurances" and "hereinafter" the words "Incendie et Risques divers," the name of the company to read "The National Fire and Casualty Insurance Company," and in French, "La Nationale Compagnie d'Assurances Incendie et Risques divers."

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The hon. member is moving to recommit the bill, is he?

Mr. RINFRET: It will not be necessary if I have the general approval of the committee. We will reconsider section 1.

An hon. MEMBER: You have it. Let us get on.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. member for Rimouski took exception to the name of this company as it appeared originally in the bill.

Mr. BELZILE: No, I did not.

Mr. HAZEN: I should have said it was the hon. member for Bonaventure.

Mr. RINFRET: I understand from the hon. member for Bonaventure that the new title will be satisfactory to his company.

Mr. HAZEN: I rose to ask if it was satisfactory to him.

Mr. ARSENAULT: It will be absolutely satisfactory.

CANADIAN CO-OPERATIVE PROCESSORS LIMITED

The house in committee on Bill No. 212, to incorporate Canadian Co-operative Processors Limited—Mr. Maybank—Mr. Golding in the chair.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The last time the committee was dealing with this bill, I believe we were considering section 4. Shall section 4 carry?

Sections 4 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On section 9—Annual return.

Mr. CHURCH: I find that this is largely a provincial bill. I do not see why they come to this parliament, because I cannot see that by any stretch of the imagination it is anything but a provincial bill. It relates largely to agriculture, which is a matter under concurrent jurisdiction. Some of the health officers have been opposing the use of horse meat and all that kind of thing. I fail to see where there has been any demand from the province of Ontario for it, inasmuch as I believe that some of the head health officers of the cities have opposed what is suggested. I suppose, after all the horses are eaten, as a friend of mine said the other night, there will be no horses left for the Woodbine races.

PENITENTIARY ACT

INSPECTION OF PENAL INSTITUTIONS BY GRAND JURY AND MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved the second reading of Bill No. 206, to amend the Penitentiary Act, 1939.

He said: There are just three clauses to this bill, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to get the opinion of the responsible minister on it. The first section of the bill provides that a grand jury, members of parliament and others may inspect these institutions. The object of this section is to give jurisdiction to the grand jury and members of parliament to examine into complaints made, and to make presentments without expense to the country. These institutions are managed by the crown, and it is the intention of the bill to afford the people some reliable and definite knowledge of the conditions prevailing in them. The practice recommended here is intended to serve the public interest, and is in no way to be deemed a criticism of the existing system of inspection. On the contrary, the object of the bill is to assist in satisfactory administration. It is a well known fact that these institutions are inspected only by crown officers, and it was one of the cardinal principles of Magna Carta that the people themselves should take a large share in the administration of these penal institutions. Rightly or wrongly, they are now managed by crown officers and no one knows what is going on in them. I believe that in the public interest this situation should not be permitted to continue. Just in passing, let me say that, in the provincial realm, in one of the asylums under provincial authority two sane people were found; and that should not be. There are no visitors to these places.

The second section of the bill gives permission, as has been recommended by some judges, for inmates of these institutions to visit a dying relative. It is felt that this would be a good change. This section is intended to meet cases which occasionally arise when urgent requests are received from relatives of prisoners for permission to visit dying parents or dependents. A recent case of this kind received wide sympathy.

The last section is designed to ascertain what has been happening in regard to real law reform in this country. We are miles behind the old land in this regard. There people are allowed time in which to pay their fines. They have broadened the summary offenders act, and as a result half the prisons in England have been closed. We shall never make any headway in this regard unless all the provinces get together. We are living in an age of conferences, however, and that should be possible. This section deals with offenders under the age of nineteen, who should not be admitted to these institutions. The provinces should provide places for them. If that were done I believe we would have some real law reform.

I should think more hon. members would take an interest in these matters, in view of the money we spend in the upkeep of these institutions. However, it seems we have very little time to devote to this problem, which is one of the most important we have to consider at the present time. If no other hon. members wish to speak, probably the minister will have a word to say.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): I should like to express my appreciation of the interest taken by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Church) in penitentiary matters and in the proper treatment of those convicted of offences. He has made this proposal in the house on other occasions. To some extent the matter was discussed last year, and at that time I started to express the opinions of the Department of Justice, and my own opinions, on the merits of the bill introduced at that time, which is being introduced again this year by the hon. gentleman.

This bill contains three sections, to which I shall have to refer to some extent in what I have to say tonight, though ordinarily one does not refer to particular sections in dealing with a bill on second reading. The first of the three sections of the bill provides for the inspection of penitentiaries by grand juries. Last year I tried to point out that this provision would have very limited application, for the reason that in many of the provinces of Canada there are no grand juries. Indeed there are only two counties in Canada where grand juries would be eligible under the bill to inspect federal institutions. One is the county of Westmorland, New Brunswick, where Dorchester penitentiary is situated; the other is the county of Frontenac, Ontario, where two penitentiaries are located, one at Kingston and one at Collin's Bay. There are no grand juries in the province of Quebec or in the western provinces, where the other penitentiaries are situated.

There does not seem to be any good reason why this parliament should endow the grand juries of these two counties in Canada with this inspectional function. It must be borne in mind that grand jurors have no particular or special training in inspectional work. They have no particular knowledge of criminology or anything of the kind. For this reason, among others, one of my predecessors in the justice department, Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, opposed a similar bill introduced by my hon. friend in 1930. In my remarks on this bill last year I started to quote what Mr. Lapointe said at that time. I was interrupted because the time devoted to public bills had expired, and I was unable to finish the quotation. I should like to finish it now, because Mr. Lapointe stated why this proposal should not be accepted, in very much better language than I could improvise at the moment. He said:

> May I point out that such an inspection of a penitentiary as is proposed by this bill would occupy the activities of a grand jury working ten hours a day for several months? May I also mention the fact that the grand juries are composed of excellent men indeed, but they are men with no especial experience in criminology or the handling of criminals, or the management or care of such institutions. Moreover, grand juries are selected and appointed by provincial governments and they have therefore no authority whatever in dominion government institutions. Penitentiary officials are not permitted to inspect provincial institutions, nor is it considered desirable that this should be so, notwithstanding the fact that there are confined in mental disease hospitals of the various provinces a number of inmates of penitentiaries, the care and maintenance of whom are paid by the penitentiaries branch. There is already in the penitentiary law all that is required in the matter of inspection. Penitentiaries are inspected in detail by the superintendent, three inspectors, the auditor, the parole officer, the chief penitentiary engineer and the structural engineer. Such inspections are made continuously throughout the year. In addition to that, the following persons are entitled to visit and inspect a penitentiary during business hours: the Governor General of Canada, although I admit that he does not avail himself of that opportunity; the lieutenant-governor of any province of Canada; any member of the king's privy council of Canada, any member of any executive council of any of the provinces, any member of parliament of Canada and any judge of any court of record in Canada or in any of the provinces; and such inspection is invited.
> May I say in that regard that the condition and the management of our penitentiaries have been favourably commented upon, indeed have been commended by visitors from other countries connected with various organizations, the judiciary or the police forces, and that our penitentiaries compare favourably with such institutions in any other country in the world?

The citation I have just read is to be found on page 277 of Hansard of March 4, 1930. Since that time, there have been developments of a beneficial nature in penitentiary administration. Since last year, when the act appointing the commissioner and two deputy commissioners was proclaimed there has been considerable improvement in the penitentiary system, and I think what Mr. Lapointe said in 1930 about the administration and the inspection of a penitentiary would have even more force at the present time. The bill came up later in the session of 1930, and Mr. Lapointe is reported on page 365 of Hansard of March 6, 1930, as follows:

Parliament in the exercise of its powers has established a system of inspection of penitentiaries which is to be found in the sections of the Penitentiary Act that I mentioned the other night. Some if not all the provinces in the exercise of their powers have authorized grand jurors to inspect provincial prisons. Parliament has done what it considered wise in its field, and the provinces have similarly provided a system which they consider advisable in their own field. It would be just as illogical for a province to pass a bill authorizing inspection of provincial institutions by inspectors of penitentiaries as for parliament to adopt this bill. If parliament is of opinion that the present system of inspection which it has authorized is not sufficient or should be improved, its duty is to amend its existing provision so as to provide a better system of inspection under its own direction and control, but from a constitutional point of view it would be a very bad precedent if parliament were to surrender its control of the inspection of these federal institutions and to entrust that control to a body of men appointed by the provinces for provincial purposes. That is with regard to clause 1 of this bill.

I am sorry that I have to take up the bill clause by clause, but it is necessary to do that because it is not possible to sum up the principle of the bill as a whole without referring to the individual sections. Section 2 of the bill reads:

Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this act or any other statute or regulation, the Minister of Justice or Solicitor General or a judge of the supreme or county court of a province, in special, urgent and important cases, may, on such terms as are defined in each case, permit a prisoner, under escort, to pay a brief or temporary visit to a dying parent, wife, child or other near dependent.

The power to grant a temporary ticket of leave in appropriate cases is already within the right of the Solicitor General. It is suggested that the extension of such power to supreme and county court judges who have no facilities for obtaining full knowledge of all the circumstances of the prisoner might result in serious administrative difficulties. The section does not define the conditions under which such permission might be granted or by whom the expenses involved would be paid. It would be impossible to make penitentiary officers available for such duty without disrupting the normal administration of the institutions. The proposal would also be open to representations as to illness and relationships which would be most difficult to verify. Those objections to the proposal were recognized when the matter was being discussed by Mr. Lapointe on the occasion to which I have referred, and this is what Mr. Lapointe said:

The officers of the penitentiary branch, men who have the experience, who have been in control of penitentiaries for many years, are strongly opposed to any such provision. They submit that it would be a very dangerous procedure to adopt, and one that would undoubtedly be abused if introduced. Exaggerated claims as to the degree of illness of relatives or other near dependents would continually be made and would be used as a means of securing the inmate's return for some other cause. Illness of fake relatives or fake near dependents would be a common occurrence if such a bill should become law. Many foreigners, particularly orientals, I am informed, incarcerated in Canadian penitentiaries, claim so many parents, wives, children or other near dependents that should the bill become operative it would call for a considerable expenditure of money and keep the guards busy delivering them to the homes of parents, wives, children or other near dependents. In one case alone within the past year nine orientals presented themselves at a Canadian penitentiary, all claiming to be close relatives to the one incarcerated.

Mr. Stevens: They are all cousins.

Mr. Lapointe: Probably. The necessity for strict enforcement of the law in all its aspects in connection with the criminal is more apparent today than at any previous time in the history of Canada, because there is an unprecedented increase in the number of convictions for serious crimes and consequently a tremendous increase in prison population. I admit there are some cases which may evoke sympathy, but this provision would lead to such dangers and serious abuses that I do not think it would be desirable to bring about the change suggested. There was a case—and probably it is the one my hon. friend mentioned in his explanatory note—that came to my attention some time ago. The man made and pressed an application for permission of this kind which I could not grant, but what I did was to refer the matter to the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) who is in charge of the administration of the Ticket of Leave Act in order to see whether that convict could not be released under ticket of leave if circumstances would permit his release so that he might visit his parent who was sick. But unfortunately that was a bad case, one in which it was impossible to grant a release. That man had a very bad criminal record and could not be released under the circumstances and under the practice as it exists. This clause also, I submit, should not be adopted by parliament and the law relating to incarceration should remain as it is.

I have no knowledge of the facts or the circumstances referred to by Mr. Lapointe in that passage; but the conclusion that he comes to with regard to the general principle of delegating this power of release of convicts under those circumstances to supreme and county court judges is one with which I agree. The position that he took with reference to that proposal was, I believe, a sound one, and I am afraid that I shall be unable to accept the proposals of the hon. gentleman in that regard.

There is still another section of the bill, which reads as follows:

No person under nineteen years of age on his or her last birthday shall be admitted to or be confined in any penitentiary or other penal institution under the control or administration of the parliament of Canada, notwithstanding any law, usage or custom to the contrary and the provisions of any statute applicable to an offender under sixteen years of age shall apply to such person.

The manner in which that was met by Mr. Lapointe when he was minister of justice, was as follows. It may very well be that the conditions which he described are not quite applicable to the present day, but at any rate I am sure that his statement will be of interest to the house. He said this at page 366 of Hansard, of March 6, 1930:

My hon. friend said the other day that he is pleased that we are going to have preferred institutions for young convicts. As a matter of fact, this is now being worked out. The properties have been secured and the building will be erected during the course of the next fiscal year, and when that is done all the young convicts will be segregated and will have no contact with the old, hardened criminals. While this is being worked out, I do not think that this bill should be passed. My hon. friend does not indicate where these young offenders should be placed. If he suggests that they should be sent to the provincial jails, I do not think that there is anything to commend that course. As a matter of fact, evidence has been taken quite recently by the big brother and child welfare representatives as to conditions in the various jails, and it would appear from their report that they certainly would not support such a change. There is not the close supervision in the provincial institutions that exists in the penitentiaries, and there are in the provincial jails old, hardened criminals who have spent their life in jail and who are associating with the juvenile offenders with a good deal less supervision than in the penitentiaries to prevent them from placing their imprint upon all those with whom they come in contact. These old criminals have more opportunities in the jails than they have in the penitentiaries to exert an evil influence on the young delinquents. This change, therefore, would certainly not be desirable while the new system of preferred institutions is being erected.

There was some further discussion of this particular provision, all of which will be found in the report of the debate in Hansard of March 6, 1930, and the debate was adjourned, I believe, after this discussion took place.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

The report that I have from the officers of the penitentiaries on this proposal of my hon. friend is not favourable to its adoption. The objection taken by them is that the section, indeed the bill, does not state what disposition is to be made of persons under the age mentioned, that is the age of nineteen, who have been convicted of serious crime and have been sentenced to two years or more. The bill also proposes that the provisions of the Juvenile Delinquents Act shall apply to such persons. The suggestion of the penitentiary officials is that it is better to leave to the discretion of the sentencing judge or magistrate the decision as to where the youthful offender should be sent, since the facilities available for their incarceration vary in the different provinces.

I think that is probably all I should say with regard to the bill before the house. It serves the useful purpose of bringing forward the whole question of penal reform, in which there is a very great interest in this country, and when the penitentiary estimates are reached I shall be expected, of course, to say something about what has been done during the past year and what our plans are with regard to the future. It would appear that the particular objectives sought to be attained by the enactment of this bill are likely to be better attained in another way, by the adoption of other machinery.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must inform the house that if the hon. member for Broadview speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate what the minister has said about the bill, and I also appreciate the fact that he has done a great deal for law reform since he has been minister. I think he will leave behind him in the house the record of an unselfish life unsparingly devoted to the welfare and happiness of his fellow countrymen.

There have been a good many complaints about these institutions. The report made by Mr. Justice Archambault and his colleagues referred to the lack of inspection of the penitentiaries, and all that kind of thing. Certain gentlemen have been appointed, and they are very good men, military men and otherwise, but they have had no practical experience in this particular work. You cannot learn the police business in a day. A chief of police cannot learn his business in a day. These new officials learn it only by experience, and that is one of the things found wanting in these institutions.

Consider the vast sum of money that is spent on the penitentiaries; yet nobody ever goes into them to inspect them. Members of parliament, senators, lieutenants governor and others are appointed as visitors, but not one of them ever enters the doors of these institutions. That should not be. I should like to see the minister, before he leaves the house, arrange for some better system of inspection and appoint businessmen or others to visit these institutions, as was recommended in the report of Mr. Justice Archambault. Since it is now nine o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock we were considering item 440, departmental administration.

440. Departmental administration, $272,600.

Mr. MERRITT: Is the minister now prepared to make the statement for which I asked?

Mr. HOWE: I made a statement on ERP to the best of my ability, and if my hon. friend would like further information and would ask questions I shall be glad to answer them. But I cannot see that the length of a statement adds anything to the information it contains.

Mr. MERRITT: The minister will remember that just before we rose at six o'clock I indicated several subjects upon which I thought the committee would like to hear the minister. I thought I specified them quite clearly. Apparently the minister does not wish to make a statement. I can only say that it is another example of the disgraceful flouting of this house that the minister embarks upon so often.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I do not think the hon. member should use that kind of language to another hon. member. I hope he will withdraw it.

Mr. MERRITT: Mr. Chairman, I am unaware of the particular language to which you refer as being unparliamentary. I can only say, in other words, that perhaps the minister does not pay the respect to this house that it deserves. Perhaps that expresses my view in language which would be acceptable to you, sir.

I am particularly interested in the minister's refusal to make a statement, because I just heard the Minister of Justice say that when we came to his estimates on another matter he would be expected to make a statement as to what he had achieved and what he proposed to do in the future with regard to that subject. I commend the attitude of the Minister of Justice to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, because I think it is more in keeping with the duty of the right hon. gentleman to the House of Commons. I want to ask the minister why he will take the trouble to make quite an extensive statement to the Rotary club in Montreal, which he did on May 11 last, but refuses the same privilege to this house. I wonder what the Rotary club has that we have not.

Mr. HOWE: I happen to have the speech to the Rotary club before me. I shall be glad to make it; it will take only forty minutes. I think I gave all the information contained in it in about ten minutes. I thought that this house would consider its time more important than that. This house is not a luncheon club. I think my hon. friend is apt to confuse himself with the House of Commons. He has made a statement about my flouting the house. All I have refused to do is to make a speech every time he asks me to do so. If he will ask me to make a statement on any subject whatever relating to these estimates I shall be glad to do so; but ask the questions one at a time. I can make only one statement on one subject at a time. Perhaps he had better reconsider his position. I have not heard any universal demand from the committee for me to make speeches.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I never knew the minister to refuse; he takes every opportunity, and some of the speeches are bad.

Mr. MERRITT: I asked the minister to make a statement on what he had achieved and what he expected to achieve in respect of Canada's trade during this year. I specified four particular heads of subjects upon which I thought the committee would like to hear him. As I understand it, the minister now tells me that he does not propose to do so. I do not want to hear him read his forty-minute speech to the Montreal Rotary club, because I have it here.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): They did not like it either.

Mr. MERRITT: I shall read to him one or two little extracts from his own speech and ask him whether he will elaborate them a little further in connection with ERP.

Mr. ABBOTT: Dispense.

Mr. MERRITT: The minister told us before six o'clock that the off-shore purchases allowed for by ERP were approximately $1,800 million.

Do I understand that to be for a period of one year or for five years? Perhaps the minister can answer that.

Mr. HOWE: The budget of $5,300 million was for fifteen months, and the off-shore purchases mentioned were also for fifteen months.

Mr. MERRITT: Can the minister say by how much that estimate has been reduced by the recent action in Washington, or is likely to be reduced?

Mr. HOWE: The house of representatives has made a cut. As my hon. friend knows, the senate must take parallel action, and if there is a difference between the two houses there must be a compromise. At the moment the appropriation stands as $5,300 million for fifteen months.

Mr. MERRITT: Can the minister give the committee any idea of how much he expects to get of ERP funds in the year 1948 or for the fifteen months' period?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend asks, "How much do we expect to get?" We expect to be contributors to ERP, not get from ERP. I think my hon. friend had better amend his language and be a little sensible. He is talking about the recovery program.

Mr. MERRITT: The minister knows what I want. I do not imagine that his language is any purer than mine. Perhaps the minister will make an estimate of the total expenditures of ERP funds which may be made in Canada during the fifteen months' period. When he answers me, perhaps he will not be personal about it.

Mr. HOWE: We sell goods to ERP countries, which number some sixteen. We do not know whether we shall get any ERP dollars or some other dollars. Payments are not segregated. All we know is that we are paid in dollars. We know that the United Kingdom makes purchases in the United States in excess of the allocations to it from ERP funds. We think that is probably true of other countries. In addition to ERP funds, there are dollar earnings of those countries. We cannot segregate the money that is paid out of ERP funds—the money paid from dollar earnings and the money paid from reserves. It is all paid on the same purchases.

Mr. MERRITT: I am most surprised to hear the minister say he cannot make any estimate of the amount.

Mr. HOWE: I did not say that.

Mr. MERRITT: That is what I asked the minister to give the committee. If the minister did not say that, perhaps he will give the figure.

[Mr. Merritt.]

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend asked me how many dollars we expected to get from ERP funds. I pointed out to him that we do not know whether the dollars we get come from ERP or from dollar earnings of the countries or from gold reserves, from gold production, and we are not particularly interested. If he wants to know the amount of our sales to ERP countries I may be able to give him that. Does he wish to know that?

Mr. MERRITT: That may be very interesting; but I asked the minister to make an estimate of how much he expected to get. He told me—

Mr. HOWE: I am not given to guessing.

Mr. MERRITT: I understand that he will not or cannot make that estimate. Is that correct?

Mr. HOWE: No. I said I could not because I do not know whether the funds will be ERP funds or other funds. I do not think anyone cares except my hon. friend.

Mr. MERRITT: I am most surprised to hear the minister say that he cannot make such an estimate. I would have thought it would be one of the first things he would want to know in connection with this program. He told the Rotary club in Montreal, as I understand it, that but for the European recovery program off-shore purchases our exports would have declined inevitably, and that now we may hope, not that shipments will be greatly increased, but that they will be maintained at least at the level of 1947. Did not the minister have some sum in his mind that he might expect of ERP funds when he made that statement in Montreal?

Mr. HOWE: Last year's total exports were $2,750 million, and I expect that this year's export will be somewhat in excess of that amount. They are running considerably in excess of it at the moment. I am sorry that my hon. friend cannot grasp my meaning, that exports are exports and that they are paid for in dollars. No one cares, except my hon. friend, whether they are ERP dollars or some other dollars.

Mr. MERRITT: Despite what the minister says, I imagine there are quite a few people who care considerably. I have here a figure which suggests that our favourable balance of trade with Great Britain and continental Europe last year was $885 million, and I understand that it is not the intention of the government to supply any further export credits. Can we take it, then, that in the minister's opinion, between ERP dollars and gold and other sources of United States exchange we shall get from Europe $885 million in United States currency and gold this year? Is that his opinion?

Mr. HOWE: Last year we exported to the United Kingdom alone—I do not know where my hon. friend gets his figure—$751,200,000, and as I say, we expect to ship considerably more than that this year.

Mr. MERRITT: One more question. The minister mentioned a table of availability of ERP materials. Would he put it on Hansard?

Mr. HOWE: I would not care to do that. It is confidential. However, I can give a rough idea of the items on it. I certainly would not put it on Hansard.

Mr. MERRITT: Can the minister give that rough idea?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. It is understood that I am not tabling this document if I read from it. Is that understood or not?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend did not say so. I will enumerate some of the items: bread; grains; coarse grains; fats and oils; oil cake and meal; meat; fish; cheese; canned milk; dried milk; eggs; dried fruits; pulse; fresh fruits; other foods; tobacco; nitrogen; agricultural machinery; coal mining equipment; timber; iron and steel; trucks; freight cars; steel manufacturing equipment, timber equipment, electrical equipment; aluminum; copper; hides, skins and leather; lead; newsprint; vehicles; woollens and worsted; zinc; machinery, n.e.s.; livestock; purebred livestock; seeds; seed potatoes; hay; footwear; leather footwear; rubber; pulp; miscellaneous automotive parts; asbestos; aircraft and parts; general manufactured products; rubber-sole slabs; rubber sundries; nickel. That gives a general idea.

Mr. HAZEN: What kind of machinery?

Mr. HOWE: All kinds.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to refer to these estimates and to point out certain matters in connection with the Department of Trade and Commerce. In my opinion, this is the most important department of the public service today. The policies adopted by this government have had the effect of throwing clean overboard the old and well tried trade policies that have proved such a sucess in the prairies and throughout the country generally. I would invite the attention of hon. members to the international trade exhibition which is now in progress at the exhibition grounds in the city of Toronto. That exhibition will give them a very good idea of what has been accomplished in the past, and what under proper policies can still be achieved in the future by the Department of Trade and Commerce, for the promotion of the trade of this dominion, the fifth trading nation of the world. Hon. members have only to visit that exhibition to see the results of the old policies in connection with trade and commerce which we had in Canada before the new ideas were put into effect. These new trade ideas that we have today do not work for the benefit of Canada.

As I have said, the department whose estimates are now before the committee is one of the most important in the Canadian public service, but its possibilities do not seem to be fully recognized. We are sending ambassadors and consuls general and other dignitaries of that kind all over the seven seas, but they do not accomplish what the trained officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce can. There is no department that means more to the Canadian businessman than this department, which has been efficiently operated, as the trade exhibition shows. When we turn to Geneva, however, and examine all the pacts which are now written into the estimates at pages 68 and 69, exports and imports, we find that the whole situation has been changed, so much so that the Canadian businessman does not know where he stands, with all the forms that have to be filled out.

This department has done splendid work, and its representatives throughout the world are the men who bring business to this country and who build up Canada from coast to coast. They find trade for us. They find outlets for our products of sea, soil, forest and mine, and altogether they have done a magnificent job in the past.

I hope that you, Mr. Chairman, and other members as well will go and see that trade exhibition. It is on for another week, and a great many people are going to Toronto, to Sunnybrook, on the twelfth instant. I urge all hon. members to go and get a bird's-eye view of what trade means to this country and what the Department of Trade and Commerce can do to further that trade.

There are within the sterling area many countries that can contribute to the building up of Canadian trade, and the fact is that in the past we have always depended upon the sterling area and the mother country in particular. She has been a steady customer for all our farm products, wheat, grain and flour, and for manufactured goods of all kinds. We have had a steady market there and she has undoubtedly been our best customer. It is not a market that is here today and gone tomorrow. Unfortunately, however, it has been largely interfered with by what has been done at Geneva.

I might refer to industrial development and one or two other matters coming within the industrial division, because some new divisions have been added. We have the exports and imports division. When the government comes to a stock-taking in the next twelve months it will find what the present policies have meant to this country. The government has by Geneva, turned down our best customers. One of the ministers has gone to Ontario, and he predicts that the government will throw overboard the finest customer we have ever had for our cattle overseas, and allow our cattle to go to the United States. The district represented by the hon. members for Davenport, Spadina, Trinity and Parkdale, and all the area north of Queen street, were built up by the great agricultural industry of Massey's and the cattle business to Britain as well. But now, as I say, our best customer has been thrown overboard.

Let hon. members visit the exhibition to which I have referred and they will see with their own eyes what the sterling area has meant in the past to this country, and can compare the results of the past with what we are likely to have in the years to come.

I am a firm believer in the old two-party system. One of my hon. friends the other day was referring to the song "Hail, hail, the gang's all here", but there was no reply as to his Yale cry from the government. I can say that in my experience I have found that west of the great lakes—I have visited that part of the dominion two or three times—the best policy has been found to be this: Depend upon your best customer always. Further, I would suggest that west of the great lakes our two old parties should end the union governments in Manitoba and in British Columbia and return to the old two-party system, Conservatives and Liberals, because, if they do not, the only alternative is to elect my hon. friends to the left, the C.C.F., as Yale showed the other day. The two old parties have served this country well, and governments under both parties have conducted a Department of Trade and Commerce that has been a credit to the Dominion of Canada. Trade has advanced by leaps and bounds. When you compare the value of this department to the country with that of some of the other departments in which there is duplication such as the Department of External Affairs and others, it will be found that the work is being done by this department which gets the cream of the business and means something to the trade and commerce of the country. What I think we want in this House of Commons is more of the politics of principle and progress and less of the politics of peanuts and party. I believe that motto could be applied to many departments, especially the Department of Trade and Commerce, when we find that, after the progress and success this country has had, we are to toss it to the four winds of heaven and introduce a new trade system.

I shall now go on to refer to some other matters. The first is the bureau of statistics. I should like to see this department now expand. Let us have some proper survey made of the accidents that happen. Today you cannot tell how many people have been killed on the highways. The situation is better with regard to level crossings, but you cannot tell the loss by fire. I would point to the large number of fires occurring in Ontario, and to the fact that you cannot tell what has been the loss of lives in houses that are burnt down. There is no way of telling that. I hope the bureau of statistics will bring that matter of deaths and those injured for all Canada up to date, and get us an up-to-date report, so that every year we shall have a statement along that line. They have done a great deal of good work in this connection. The returns are not made to them by the provinces, but I think the bureau might expand the work to the extent I have suggested.

In connection with the Canada Grain Act, I am sorry to see what is going on in the department and in the country. We have tossed away our best customer. Our markets were overseas and not north and south. It is an east and west industry and always has been. The markets have always been the markets of the world, Britain, France and her allies. That was a steady market and it has been thrown overboard.

In connection with the tourist business, I may say this is a presidential year, and I doubt if we shall have fulfilled the rosy picture in this travel bureau which is forecast. I venture to say that if we had every year an exhibition such as the one I referred to a moment ago, we might get some trade. But with provincial elections on, the high cost of living, the cost of travel and the lack of hotels, apart from one or two of the big conventions I fail to see where we are to get all these millions of dollars in tourist trade we hope for during this year.

Another matter I should like to refer to is the standards division, administration, and electricity and gas inspection services. I think the time has come when that should be done voluntarily by the government. At the present time we need a national policy for cheap light and power. Canada has a potential of forty-six million horsepower, of which only one-sixth or one-seventh is developed at the present time. Some of it is only seasonal. I believe that what we need at the present time is some national policy or measure to deal with the situation in the maritimes, the Northwest Territories, and all Canada. We need a vast national policy with regard to cheap light and power. I was surprised the last time I was in British Columbia some years ago, to find that the richest province of all in water power did not have a cheap light and power program. I believe the government would be well advised to carry out this electricity and gas inspection itself and charge it up to some other branch of the department.

I do not know that I can say anything further. I compliment the minister who is a hard-working one. His predecessor was also a most excellent minister. The trade exhibition of both ministers is one of the finest things I think this country has ever seen. I wish the minister every success in his work, but I am fearful of what will happen in the days that are to come when today we toss, via Geneva, our trade policies overboard and lose our best customers.

Mr. TIMMINS: The minister a short time ago gave us a glimpse of what was called his program of availability. He did not table the whole schedule of figures, but it is a strange thing that although we do not get those things in the House of Commons, the press seems to get them. I have in my hand here a clipping of May 14 last which reads as follows:

> The Washington blueprint is contemplating an expenditure of approximately one billion dollars in Canada by the participating countries, but in the fifty-three categories are some items where Canada's share has been placed actually above estimated capacity to produce and others in which this country has been left out entirely or cut in on quantities less than she might have expected.

I do not pretend to hold the minister to those figures or to those fifty-three categories that are mentioned there. But as this has found its way into the press, I think the minister ought to tell us something more about the amount of money that is likely to be used with respect to this program. I should like to read just for a moment from the speech which the Minister of Finance made on November 17 last in which he said:

> The United States government has now recommended to congress that it should authorize the use of funds voted for aid to Europe in making purchases outside the United States. In the expectation that this policy will be implemented, we are ascertaining what supplies can be made available from Canada for this purpose. A program of this kind would resemble in many respects the Hyde Park agreement that proved to be so effective and constructive during the war.

As a matter of fact, in my district of Parkdale, apparently representatives of the Department of Trade and Commerce are calling on industry and are saying, "What have you available? What can you do?" I shall not mention the name of the officer, but I am reading from a letter which I should be glad to show the minister. One paragraph reads as follows:

> We had a recent visit from Mr. Blank—
> I will not give his name.
> —of the Department of Trade and Commerce who inquired as to our production capacity providing Canada gets orders from the ERP. We appreciated his interest in getting a share of this business for us.

I think the minister ought to take us into his confidence, since this is a Canadian plan —this is our share in ERP—so that we might know what is being done by the Department of Trade and Commerce in this regard and what we may expect. A good number of the commodities in the list which the minister spoke about were in the category of food. On reading excerpts from the speech the minister made in Montreal on May 11 last, I find he made it clear that Canadian industry and Canadian producers were to have to suffer certain sacrifices. I should like the minister to tell us, if he would, what those sacrifices are to be. He is reported as follows:

> The Reconstruction Minister said, however, that the recovery program for Europe meant that Canada would be able to carry on export trade at about the same volume as before, avoid a "radical reorientation of industry, and maintain higher levels of investment and income than would otherwise be possible."

He mentioned that there were to be sacrifices by the producers and the consumers in this country before the benefits of the plan would be felt. I gather that in respect to manufactured goods we were to lose some of our markets, and that it would not be possible for us to keep those markets which we had built up over the last three years by reason of what they called our own little Marshall plan of credits. That seems to be perfectly so.

As we know, Canada and Newfoundland are the only two members of the British commonwealth who do not belong to the sterling area; and by reason of that fact we find it difficult to sell our goods in the sterling area. I know the minister has before him particulars showing how our trade with the sterling area is falling down at the present time, and how we are losing those markets. For instance, my information is that, because of a world shortage of United States dollars, many currencies are no longer convertible, and a European balance of payments with the western hemisphere is unobtainable. The consequent threat to Canadian prosperity shows ominously in the decline of British imports from this hemisphere from 49 per cent in 1946 to a prospective 34 per cent this year. This figure was 31 per cent in 1938.

I know the minister has received representations from manufacturing concerns and exporters in Canada who have shown that their exports to sterling area countries have fallen off 90 per cent, 95 per cent and in some cases 100 per cent. These industries are asking the minister and his department to carry out the fullest possible investigation in respect of all possible reciprocal trading arrangements with the sterling area countries. Surplus goods are waiting in Canada to be moved to the sterling area, and it is a question of setting up the machinery for the exchange of such goods.

In that respect, and having regard also to the Marshall plan, this afternoon I believe the minister told us that Mr. Pierce, the Canadian representative, was in Paris. We would like to know what sort of blueprint Mr. Pierce has with respect to the movement of these goods and commodities from Canada to Europe. After all, we know the Department of Trade and Commerce considers the United Kingdom and western Europe our natural market. For the time being we have lost that market, and it is necessary that something be done to restore it. Having regard to the fact that we are dependent upon the minister and his department to lead us in this—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Paper chase.

Mr. TIMMINS: Yes, this paper chase, if you choose to call it that. Certainly when you make sacrifices you want to know what they are. So I should like the minister to explain the plan of which the Minister of Finance spoke in such glowing terms on March 17 last. I have some other questions I should like to ask, but for the moment I think I shall stop there. When we first heard about ERP it was the bonanza that would solve our export problems. Then we heard that it would enable us to hold our own, and that we would be lucky if we got what we did in 1947. Now we are told that it will be a case of making sacrifices. We can make the sacrifices; but industry, the exporters and the general public would like to know what those sacrifices are. I believe the minister is in a position to tell us.

Mr. HOWE: I am very much interested to hear that we have lost all our trade with the sterling countries. I have before me the figures of our exports to the United Kingdom for the first three months of this year as compared with the first three months of last year. In January, 1947, we shipped $50,500,000 worth of goods. In January, 1948, we shipped $64,900,000 worth. In February, 1947, we shipped $44,900,000 worth of goods; in February of this year, $51,700,000 worth. In March, 1947, we shipped $47,600,000 worth of goods, in March, 1948, $59,200,000 worth. Or if my hon. friend would like a comparison as between the shipments for the first three months of this year and the shipments pre-war I can tell him that the average exports from Canada to the United Kingdom in the years 1935 to 1939 for the month of January were $25,500,000. This year they were $64,900,000, or two and a half times as great.

Mr. TIMMINS: But, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HOWE: Let me get this on Hansard; you brought up the subject. For February the average from 1935 to 1939 was $23,600,000; for February of 1948, it was $51,700,000. The average during those years for March was $26,400,000, as against $59,200,000 this year. For anyone to rise in his place and say our trade with the sterling countries is gone, is just ridiculous.

Mr. TIMMINS: I did not say that. I said we were losing our trade.

Mr. HOWE: There is no evidence of that.

Mr. TIMMINS: I will correct myself in this respect. I was not talking about the United Kingdom alone. I was talking about the other nations in the sterling area as well. The figures that have been given me—and they must be in the hands of the minister and his department—indicate that the sterling area countries have had to put on import controls, as we know; and since Great Britain is the banker for the sterling area countries, they are restricting trade with other parts of the world, including Canada, so that little by little our trade with those countries other than the United Kingdom is dropping. If I am wrong in that the minister may correct me, but those who prepared these figures think otherwise. I believe representations have been made or are to be made to the minister to the effect that these people wish him to do something in that regard; otherwise trade with these dependencies and dominions which form part of the British empire will drop to a point where it will not be funny for Canadian business.

Mr. MERRITT: Might I ask the minister if it is not correct that the figures he gave for January, February and March of this year include considerable purchases by the United Kingdom under Canadian export credits which it is government policy not to extend from now on?

Mr. HOWE: Included are credits of $15,000,000 a month, or $45,000,000 in all, which is not a large sum in proportion. The point is that our exports are not dropping. The credits ended in the middle of April, but since that time there has been no reduction in exports.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Why not separate it and tell us what it is?

Mr. HOWE: Separate what from what?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You have so many millions, and you have credits of $15,000,000 a month; then you have this great increase. What did it? What did we sell that we did not sell before, or what did we sell more of than we sold before? The thing is simple; you have all your information there.

Mr. HOWE: In these three months we sold goods to the value of $175·8 million, of which $45,000,000 was credits. The rest was paid for.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What were the goods? Where is the increase?

Mr. HOWE: You want the list?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): No, just roughly. Let us quit fooling about it.

Mr. HOWE: The largest items are foodstuffs. The biggest is wheat; the next is meat; the next is cheese, and the next is eggs.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The Minister of Agriculture told us he put on the pressure to get England to take these things, and that is what you are talking about.

Mr. HOWE: Nevertheless we are not talking about how we sold it, but about what we sold.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then your figures do not mean anything.

Mr. HOWE: Then there is lumber, and aluminum and other base metals, a large item; agricultural machinery, which is a very large item, and various special types of machinery.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I should like to ask another question, which follows the first question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. We are told that under ERP the United States will spend 5·3 billion in the first fifteen months of the operation of the plan. Here is the simple figure that I want. What proportion, irrespective of whether it is ERP dollars or any other kind—they are United States dollars that are going to buy—will we get in United States dollars, irrespective of source?

Mr. HOWE: I think it would be most difficult to say what portion of the $5,300 million; I am sure I cannot say.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Cannot the minister give us some rough idea of what we shall gain in United States dollars in the fifteen months' operation of the Marshall plan? That is all I want to know.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member means how much better off we shall be in United States dollars than we were when we started?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Yes.

Mr. HOWE: Regardless of whether it is the Marshall plan or anything else?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): No, under the Marshall plan. I would like to segregate it. The Minister of Finance does the guessing on the rest of it with his three-pronged fork.

Mr. ABBOTT: I can answer my hon. friend's question if he would like an answer.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I would love it. It would be the first straight answer I have got from the Minister of Finance for quite a while.

Mr. ABBOTT: The only effect which I presume the so-called Marshall plan will have on Canada is that it will help our customers to pay for some of the things they want to buy from us. We have no means of knowing how much of the purchases they make for us is paid for out of Marshall plan dollars.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Why have you not?

Mr. ABBOTT: Because they are not paying by dollars.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You said you could answer me if I wanted an answer.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have given an answer.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I know that last Monday was Monday and that next Saturday will be Saturday; to say that would answer me as well as you have, because you did not even address yourself to my question. Surely you must have some idea. We heard from you how this Marshall plan was being looked forward to, to help our United States dollar situation. Now we have the Marshall plan; we have $5,300 million which is to be spent in fifteen months. You anticipated something if they passed it. We have it now. What was it you anticipated?

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I can answer it. My hon. friend somehow has the impression—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Are there any more of you who would like to join in this picture? I was taken away from the minister by the Minister of Finance and I am glad to be back again on your tender mercies.

Mr. HOWE: Some hon. gentlemen opposite have the idea that the Marshall plan is for the relief of Canada. The Marshall plan was designed for the rehabilitation of Europe.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Let us admit that neither one of us is that dumb.

Mr. HOWE: You are asking what we are to get out of the Marshall plan.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What we shall receive for the goods we sell. Does that make it plain to you?

Mr. HOWE: No. We sell goods to Europe and we get paid for them in dollars; we sell goods to France and we get paid for them in dollars; we sell goods to Italy and we get paid for them in dollars. The presumption is that if those countries had no ERP aid we would not sell as many goods that we would get paid for in United States dollars. Perhaps my hon. friends can relate that to ERP dollars, but my department has no information as to what proportion of what we sell to those countries will be paid for in ERP dollars.

When one stops to reason that England gets so many ERP dollars to spend anywhere she likes, in Canada, in the United States or in any other dollar country, he can appreciate my difficulty in telling my hon. friend how many ERP dollars will be among the dollars Britain pays to Canada.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): There would be an excess over what we are getting now. We know how much gold England has—

Mr. ABBOTT: No, we do not.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): —and we know how much gold other countries have. The Marshall plan will help us in our United States dollar position. I agree with you that it is nothing but rehabilitation, but we are perhaps selfish about the matter and will benefit by it in our United States dollar picture. What is the benefit we shall receive? You said you would answer and the Minister of Finance took his crack at the pussy and told me nothing. I would be delighted if the minister would help me and give me some idea. In those fifteen months will it be $200 million, $300 million or what? To me it is a matter of simple arithmetic. Consider that these various countries will be buying; you know this is new money, new United States dollars which will help those countries to the extent of $5,300 million; by whatever route you take, how much of that will get back to this country in those fifteen months? Perhaps it cannot be answered.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course it cannot.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It certainly has not been as yet. The Minister of Finance shakes his head and says it cannot be answered. Perhaps it needs a shake of the head by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to make it unanimous.

Mr. ABBOTT: The supporting of the United States dollar situation and balances of payment are, of course, my particular concern. Perhaps I shall not be stating the obvious if I give my hon. friend some indication of how these balances of payment are met. Hon. members appreciate that countries have to settle their balances with us. In the case of the United Kingdom, they maintain balances with the Bank of Canada. Those balances are credited with the proceeds of the sales of British goods and services in this country. They are credited with transfers which are made by the British government from sources that are unknown to us. In settlement of those balances, a cheque is in effect drawn on their balance with the Bank of Canada.

Canada has no means of knowing what ERP dollars, if any, that the British receive are transferred to Canada, but we do know as a general rule that if the United Kingdom or any other European country is furnished with a loan or if they receive United States dollars in some other form they will be available for the import of Canadian goods. It is not within our control to determine what dollars are used for what purpose. We know, speaking generally, that if they receive United States dollars they will be available to pay their bills with, but that is all we do know. Nobody can give my hon. friend any more information.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): We know this simple thing, that $5,300 million extra United States dollars are to be spent—mark that word "extra"—to help in the rehabilitation of the devastated countries of Europe. We know that, so we can go that far together.

Mr. ABBOTT: We read that in the newspapers.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That extra money, those extra United States dollars, will come back related in some way to purchases made in this country, purchases of goods which the ERP will supply to those devastated countries. If you say "yes" to this, I am through. Is it the minister's statement, knowing those simple facts, that he has no idea of what proportion of that extra money, that new money, will come to the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have none whatever; my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, may have, but I have none whatever.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): How do these off-shore purchases work? Is a billion and a half of this $5,300 million handed to the European countries in cash, and then are they told that they can spend that for what and where they please, apart from purchases in the United States? Is that true?

Mr. HOWE: No. Certain allocations of dollars are made to certain countries. Those dollars are earmarked for special uses. The recipient country submits a list of purchases that it would like to make, what it would like to buy and where it would like to buy it. Those lists are either approved or not approved by the ERP administration. If they are approved and if on a list there are dollars earmarked for purchases in Canada, those purchases qualify for ERP funds and can be charged against ERP funds allocated to that country.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Are those lists prepared and approved now, or are they still in the formative stage?

Mr. HOWE: They are prepared from time to time. I understand that a quarter of a year is the unit for which lists are submitted. The lists are being made up now for the second quarter and are being studied. No doubt in due course they will be approved, after which purchases will be made.

Mr. MERRITT: Will the minister try to tell us as much as he can about this, instead of having us go at it by these prying questions? For instance, I think the Minister of Finance said there was no way of knowing how much money would come to Canada, and yet in his Montreal speech the Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

> In short, we will be enabled, through the funds under the Economic Cooperation Act, to carry on our export trade in roughly the same volume and nature as before—avoiding a radical reorientation of our productive system—and to maintain higher levels of investment and income than would otherwise be possible.

When the minister makes that statement in a public speech I take it that he had something to go on. I may be able to help him. We financed $499 million of our export trade last year by Canadian export credits. That was the figure given in the budget speech of the Minister of Finance. May we understand that approximately that sum, $500 million, will be available from this source, and if it is not available from this source, from what other source of United States dollars will it be available? How much has already been spent under ERP requisitions in Canada? I submit to the minister that if he would tell us all he can we would get along much faster and I think we would be all greatly benefited by the information.

Mr. HOWE: I am sorry but I can only give the amount of exports from this country. We have lent this year about $52,500,000. Everything else has been paid for in dollars. I cannot tell the hon. member about ERP dollars, because I do not know and the Minister of Finance does not know, and I doubt whether anybody in Ottawa knows. I assure my hon. friend that the answer is not obtainable.

Mr. MERRITT: I would have thought it was the duty of the minister to make a forecast.

Mr. BRYCE: I thought I did not know anything about ERP, and I listened hoping to find out something; but, after listening to this debate, I am satisfied that I know as much about it as anybody else.

I think the Department of Trade and Commerce never gets the credit that is coming to it. I have travelled quite a bit in my life and in any city you visit abroad you will find a representative of the trade and commerce department. We can send any old defeated politician to be an ambassador, but you cannot send anybody who does not know his business to represent the trade and commerce of this country. I have had an opportunity of attending meetings of the united nations in three successive years, and I found that even our external affairs people needed the representatives of the Department of Trade and Commerce to guide them before they could make agreements. The importance of this department is not sufficiently recognized. Looking over these estimates, you find that they are mainly for salaries for people who are rendering service to the different communities in which they reside and to the trade of this dominion.

I have one complaint. Our goods are not advertised enough in other countries. I was over in the old country in 1938 and 1945. We can send lots of Nova Scotia and British Columbia apples to Great Britain, and they are well liked there but they are not sufficiently advertised. We must do some good advertising. I took up with the previous minister of trade and commerce the question of advertising our bacon, but I found that that cannot be done under the regulations. But just as soon as possible I hope that the department will put on a real advertising campaign in other countries. Everybody would benefit from it from the top right down to the bottom, or from the bottom right up to the top, whichever way you like to take it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What about the middle?

Mr. BRYCE: You pass that going up or down.

I support what the hon. member for Humboldt said and urge that the minister help to make our Manitoba seaport at Churchill boom this fall. With modern equipment we shall be able to have a longer season there. I have been in touch with captains who sail that route and they say it is much easier coming in by the Hudson bay route than coming up the St. Lawrence river, because you can set your ship on three or four courses to the port of Churchill, whereas you have to change your course several times coming up the St. Lawrence river.

Might I, with your permission, Mr. Chairman, say something about grain? Would the minister make an announcement about what is coming to the farmers? I think it was a mistake on the part of the government to throw grain on the open market on October 22 of last year. I have received many letters from farmers wanting to know what adjustment they will get, and I have also grain companies wanting to know what will happen to them. The small grain companies which buy in small quantities, just a few carloads or a few thousand bushels, which they have to turn over immediately, will never be able to pay what the large companies can, which have huge elevators and huge storage facilities. These larger companies will be able to pay a much greater return to the farmer than the little company, with less capital, which has to have a quick turnover.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What about the wheat pools?

Mr. BRYCE: They are the big companies; they will pay, and some of the other grain companies will pay.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): They have not paid yet.

Mr. BRYCE: I do not think any of them have paid yet.

[Mr. Bryce.]

Mr. HARKNESS: Several independent companies have paid.

Mr. BRYCE: You make your speech when the time comes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We just wanted to help you.

Mr. BRYCE: You are not helping me, or you would not be sitting there. I would ask the minister to make a statement and tell us what the policy of the government is with respect to this matter. I think you fellows made an awful mistake when you threw the grain on the open market. The people did not want that.

An hon. MEMBER: They know that now.

Mr. BRYCE: Yes. Prosperity goes to a man's head and he forgets conditions in the 1930's. The farmer will never have prosperity until he has stable prices for his products, based on the cost of production and taking into consideration the prices he has to pay for what he has to buy. I hope the minister will make an announcement, so that I can reply to the people in the constituency of Selkirk and the grain companies that are writing to me to know what the government intends to do in the matter.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I still think it would be wise for the committee to stick to the item before us. Item 458 has to do with the Canada Grain Act, and so forth. If we were discussing that item the minister would have the proper officials before him.

Mr. BRYCE: I asked your permission before I started, Mr. Chairman.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I still think we would make more progress if we deal with the items as we come to them.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend was very courteous in asking his question; and, since he said nice things about the department, I think I should answer his question regarding the port of Churchill. I saw Mr. Dalgleish, one of the operators of the line of steamers which has been serving that port since the elevator was built. He told me that he had more inbound freight for Canada this year than ever before. I spoke to the board of grain commissioners. They are filling the elevators there. The principal question will be the lateness of the crop. This year's crop promises to be a late one. As my hon. friend knows, we have practically no carryover; we have no store of wheat to move to the port until the new crop of wheat arrives. Therefore it may be a poor year in wheat, simply because there is no wheat to ship; but we do expect a good year of inbound cargo.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the elevator empty now?

Mr. HOWE: It is being filled now. The grain is moving to Churchill. The elevator was emptied. I think the elevator was filled at the opening, but I am not sure of that.

Mr. MacNICOL: It may be filled, waiting for ships.

Mr. HOWE: Yes; grain is moving in there now.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It has never been filled in its history.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Filled?

Mr. HOWE: Certainly, filled almost every winter.

As far as the payments on coarse grains are concerned, we have been waiting for the private grain firms to settle. Some of them have settled. I believe the pools have not settled, and some private firms have not settled. We feel that for the government to do anything before the private settlements are made would be to disturb the situation, but we do hope that something can be done shortly.

Mr. BRYCE: Is there any prospect of a pooling system, so that everybody will be paid alike?

Mr. HOWE: No, that is quite impossible. If there is a payment, it will be a flat over-all payment.

Mr. BRYCE: It would be the fairest way.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Before this item passes, I should like to support some of the requests made by the hon. member for Humboldt and by the hon. member for Selkirk, and made earlier in the session by the hon. member for Churchill, and by other hon. members, regarding the greater use of the port of Churchill. I make special reference to the utilization of the port in transporting grain at a cheap rate to the maritime provinces. That suggestion has been put forward at different times. The Minister of Agriculture has approved it, and I believe the hon member for Davenport has as well. It is requested that the grain should be shipped from the west through the port of Churchill and Hudson bay by water in order that we in the maritime provinces may obtain feed grains that we have required for so many years, at a cheaper rate because of cheap water transportation. Grain elevators should be built at points in the maritime provinces such as Pugwash, which has a splendid port; in Prince Edward Island, on the south shore of Nova Scotia and on the bay of Fundy, also on the New Brunswick side, in order that the people of the maritimes might get the benefit of necessary cheap feed grain. I hope that, under the marshland project which has been approved, and which will take some years to become fully effective, we shall be able to produce a larger proportion of feed grains than we have ever done before. Over a long period of years it has been necessary to transport feed grains to our provinces from the west. The Minister of Agriculture has definitely approved the use of the port of Churchill and the Hudson bay route, in order that grain might be transported to the maritime provinces.

I have never been enthusiastic about the soundness of the large expenditures which have been made in building the Hudson bay railroad and developing the Hudson bay port, but perhaps I am not the one to judge. However, expenditures of $50,000,000, $80,000,000 or $100,000,000 have been made. The results of those expenditures are there for the benefit of all Canada. Hon. members of the committee will agree that the people of the maritime provinces are as much entitled to the benefit of the use of this port as any other part of Canada, if not more so. It has been said in this house many times past in my hearing that grain has been exported from Canada by the cheap water export rate to European countries, and could be brought back to Nova Scotia cheaper than the freight rates on grains sent directly into the maritime provinces from the west. During the last few years we have had the benefit of a subsidized freight rate. We are very grateful for that, but I should like to ask the minister to give special attention to the practicability and desirability of using this route and these facilities to which I have referred, and to build elevators for storage, so that users of feed grain in the maritime provinces may get advantage of these facilities.

Mr. QUELCH: What are the conditions that a nation has to meet in order to get aid under ERP? I ask that question, because statements have appeared in the press from time to time that certain limitations have been placed upon the industrial output of some of the nations getting help. For instance, it was said that certain limitations have been placed upon the shipbuilding industries of England, and similar statements have been made about other nations. If that is true, of course it would have a direct bearing upon our trade with these nations. I should like to know whether or not the minister has that information.

Mr. HOWE: The countries receiving ERP assistance are the countries of Europe outside the iron curtain. I can assure my hon. friend that the purpose of ERP is to stimulate production. I would be shocked to learn that any limitation on production is imposed by the program.

Mr. HARKNESS: I should like to bring to the attention of the committee some facts in connection with asbestos, and to ask the minister some questions concerning the matter. There are two companies, one in Calgary and the other in Vancouver, engaged in the manufacture of building materials from asbestos and cement. These companies make fireproof wall board, shingles, siding, corrugated roofing, coloured tile, sheathing, pipe, eaves-troughing, and a considerable number of other building materials, using as the chief material asbestos fibre and cement. The difficulty at the present time is that these companies cannot get the supply of asbestos fibre. They are depending for that on the two large asbestos producing companies in Canada. As I understand the situation, these companies have never actually refused to ship asbestos and so forth to these two companies. They just put them off, with the result that these building construction materials plants are forced to run very much below capacity, and at times to close down altogether. That is the situation of those companies manufacturing building materials which are in such short supply, which supply the minister has informed the house on numerous occasions he is trying to increase. The fact these companies cannot get the asbestos fibre which they need seems to me absolutely inexplicable.

I have here a copy of a publication put out by authority of the minister—in fact, one has to pay ten cents for it—which gives the figures in regard to asbestos production and exports from the country, and in 1947 production was 661,815 tons, and exports, 636,000 odd tons. In any event, exports were 96·24 per cent. These exports were made up of crude asbestos, 953 tons only; milled fibres—and it is milled fibres which these companies making these building materials require—223,693 tons; waste and refuse, shorts and so forth, of which they can use some 412,000 tons.

In spite of the fact that Canada is a very large producer of asbestos, the way the thing is running at the present time 96¼ per cent of all asbestos produced is shipped out of the country; and our own plants, particularly in western Canada, where we need building materials badly, and where we need industries, are unable to get a sufficient supply to maintain production.

The situation is the more peculiar, I think, in the fact that these large asbestos producers ship this material to a large extent to the United States. It is there manufacured into the very building materials these two companies make, and these materials are shipped back to Canada and sold with a consequent considerable loss of United States exchange, which we are trying so hard to conserve at the present time.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the situation as far as these two companies are concerned, and as far, also, as the general running of the asbestos business goes. I understand, further, that the companies to which this asbestos is shipped, where it is made into wallboard, are affiliates or subsidiaries of big producing companies in Canada. Furthermore, at least one of these companies is now in the process of building a plant of its own in Montreal to make these building materials, and these two small companies in the west are a little suspicious that they are being denied a supply of asbestos so that they will not build up too big a business and be too hard to compete with when the time comes for the big companies to get their own plant in operation in Montreal. That is as it may be; I do not know. At any rate, this situation exists and it could be cured; it could be eased very readily, I believe, by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I have been writing to the minister on the matter for the last two months. On April 12 I wrote him a letter pointing out how he could readily cure the situation, but nothing has been done about it. I have had a considerable number of letters which have produced no results. They have not got me anywhere, and it is for that reason that I raise the matter now.

This situation could be prevented, and these companies could be assured of a sufficient supply of asbestos fibre to meet requirements, simply by the minister writing a letter to the companies concerned. That would cure the whole situation—just a simple letter. Apart from that, if it did not produce results, all that would be necessary would be to refuse these companies export permits. Everything that is exported from the country at the present time requires an export permit; and if these different asbestos producers will not supply our own local companies with the asbestos they need, which is a very small amount—it would not amount to one-half or one-quarter of one per cent of what is shipped out of the country—if they are not willing, on the basis of a request from the minister, to supply these companies, then I am quite sure the thing could be fixed up simply by refusing them an export permit, so that the small amount of asbestos could be supplied to our Canadian users first.

The situation that exists is absolutely ridiculous. I cannot comprehend how it has continued, and I would ask the minister to explain to me why nothing has been done to correct it. I also ask him to take steps along the lines I have suggested, or otherwise to ensure that these companies making building supplies get a sufficient supply of asbestos fibre to keep them going.

Mr. HOWE: I cannot imagine what branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce would be expected to intervene in the case mentioned. My hon. friend is, I assume, an advocate of free enterprise. Why, therefore, he wants the government to step in and control asbestos for the benefit of a plant in Calgary, which surely is able to trade with another private enterprise firm, is beyond my comprehension. He is quite mistaken when he says that export permits are required for asbestos. Products in ample supply are not subject to export control and never have been. Only materials in short supply are subject to such control.

My hon. friend says that the asbestos plants in Canada have associated plants in the United States. That is not true in the case of the largest producer of asbestos and, as far as I know, that company is willing to sell to any purchaser who is willing to pay the current price of the product. I suggest that my hon. friend may explain to his friends that, since they are operating in a free enterprise country, business should be able to look after itself.

Mr. HARKNESS: I have one or two simple answers to that. This is a supposedly free enterprise country; but under the present government it is far from free in enterprise, for practically everything in the country is controlled. I am not asking the minister to control this thing. All I ask is that he write a letter. I think that would be enough—

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend has a stenographer and a pen. Why does he not write a letter?

Mr. HARKNESS: It is no good my writing a letter. I have no control over the trade and industry of the country as the minister has, and a word from me means nothing. A word from him would mean a lot to these people. He knows that as well as I do. All I ask is that, first of all, he write a letter requesting them to supply these firms in the west. I am quite sure that is all that would be required. If asbestos does not require an export permit, it is one of the few things, as far as I know, that do not. The minister says it is in ample supply. It is not in ample supply, or these companies could get it. They are willing to pay more than the market price for it, but the big supplying companies will not give it, or they have failed to give it so far.

The minister evades altogether one of the most important features of this matter, and that is increasing the supply of building materials in the country. He evades altogether the point with respect to the loss of United States dollars. He tries to circumvent it by saying: You are a free enterprise party; why don't you write a letter to the man yourself? That answer is ridiculous, and I am surprised that the minister makes it. It is a disgrace that this situation continues, and the minister will take no action to correct it. Instead, he tries to make anyone bringing up the question appear ridiculous.

Mr. MacNICOL: It was I who suggested to you, Mr. Chairman, that the committee be allowed wide latitude, and you kindly agreed. I think hon. members have availed themselves of it and brought out a good deal of information. Many of us will not be here on Monday, and there were one or two items—

An hon. MEMBER: Where are you going?

Mr. MacNICOL: There are eighty-two members who should be here from Ontario who will not be here. We have to go home to vote. If, Mr. Chairman, you think now, and the committee is agreeable, that the first item be called—

Mr. HARKNESS: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister would give me a better answer than he has given as far as asbestos is concerned. So far he has given me no answer at all. I wonder if he will not give some reasonable answer on the matter. Surely I am entitled to an answer which is reasonable.

Mr. HOWE: I wish my hon. friend would explain to me what branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce exercises the function that he has asked me to exercise. Under what authority would I do it?

Mr. HARKNESS: I just asked the minister if his department does not issue export permits.

Mr. HOWE: We do on certain commodities.

Mr. HARKNESS: Then the remedy is simple. It is right in the minister's hands. There is no difficulty about it as far as I can see.

Mr. HOWE: Is my hon. friend suggesting that we place asbestos under export control, when we are using less than five per cent of our own production?

Mr. HARKNESS: I am suggesting that the minister should request these firms to meet domestic requirements before they export all the asbestos from the country. They are exporting 96¼ per cent, I think it is, or they did last year, 1947. Surely they could afford to export only 95 per cent and supply Canadian requirements. I just cannot see where there would be any great hardship on the minister if he were asked to put a little pressure on those companies with a view to getting them to supply Canadian requirements first. That is all that is needed. If that fails I would suggest that he put on export control and look after the matter in that way.

Mr. TIMMINS: The hon. member for Calgary West was asking for some information with respect to the values of the exports of Canadian goods to the devastated nations of Europe that might be expected under ERP. The minister has not given us any answers, but some figures have been given in the press. I should like the minister, if he would, to do us the honour of commenting on those figures. This was what was said in the daily press of May 14 last:

> In the case of base metals and timber the Washington blueprint has given Canada a substantial share of the European requirement. There is some doubt whether this country will actually be able to supply the $157 million in timber. The United States allotment is $96 million. This country will also be expected to supply the largest bulk of the aluminum and newsprint.

I am simply referring to the fact that it is said here that the requirements which will be expected of Canada in respect of timber will be $157 million. A little further on, the article goes on to say:

> Total allotment for fish in the Washington plan is $40 million, of which Canada is to supply only $12 million.

I wish to ask the minister whether those figures are definite, or if they are near the mark. If they are the estimates that have been in the plan, will he please give us some idea of what actually may be expected to come out of this plan?

I notice that the minister—and I referred to this a while ago—said in his speech at Montreal that this plan would involve some sacrifices here in Canada. The comment in the press is this:

> There will be an attempt encouraged by Washington to obtain more and more exchange of goods between soft currency countries.

[Mr. Harkness.]

> The United Kingdom has already gone quite a step in this direction and as her productive capacity increases she is likely more and more to shut out Canadian markets in Europe for manufactured goods. This applies, too, to some basic food products.

If that is the sacrifice the minister is talking about, I wish he would give us some idea of what he means is the burden which would be placed upon us here and which we are expected to take our part in bearing.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I can illustrate by using lumber as an example. We sell all the lumber we can produce. We have been doing that; we are doing it, and we expect to continue to do it. We get paid for that in dollars. Is it important where it goes?

Mr. TIMMINS: It is important, I suppose, if all our lumber is taken. That is the point I am trying to get at. Are we making sacrifices by giving what we really can not afford to give? If we give our full supply, of course we are doing ourselves a great injustice.

Mr. HOWE: No. We have a certain export quota for lumber. It is something like sixty or sixty-five per cent of our total output. That is all sold for dollars. We sell all the aluminum that we can produce and we sell it for dollars. I have mentioned fish as a difficult item. As I said in Montreal, and my hon. friend has quoted me, one of the rules of ERP is that soft currency countries must buy all they can from other soft currency countries. These soft currency countries produce a great deal of fish. We have been selling our fish as food and have been selling it mostly in Europe. It may be difficult to sell that fish in the future. In other words, the fish people may have to make sacrifices beyond what they have had to make in the past. I am thinking of an item like fountain pens, and I do not know why I choose them. We have been selling fountain pens to Europe and to soft currency countries and charging up the price against the loan. I doubt very much if fountain pens would qualify under ERP, although I am not sure. Suppose they did not.

An hon. MEMBER: What about manufactured goods?

Mr. HOWE: That would be a sacrifice for the fountain pen manufacturers. It is articles of that type to which I was referring. The point I am making is that we believe the general level of our exports will stay above that of last year, and payment will be made in dollars.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. HARKNESS: No. I still have not had an answer from the minister saying what he is prepared to do on the asbestos matter. As far as I am concerned, there is no use in his trying to laugh it off or to do anything else along that line. I want an answer that is definite either one way or the other; I want him to say either that he will or that he will not do anything. If he will not do anything, let him say so. If he is prepared to do anything, I should like to hear what it is.

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend wants me to use my influence, I suppose as a politician or a public man or something—

Mr. HARKNESS: As Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. HOWE: —to do something for somebody in his constituency which I have no right to do under any powers entrusted to me, I do not chose to do it.

Mr. HARKNESS: I said that there were two companies here, one in Calgary and one in Vancouver, which are making building supplies. I thought the minister was interested in getting an increase in building supplies. That is what I am interested in. I am not interested in his using his influence on behalf of one of my constituents. As a matter of fact, the people in this concern, as far as I know, are not my constituents.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): No; they are mine.

Mr. HARKNESS: Yes. I do not think they are in my constituency at all. Answers along that line are indicative of the fact that the minister is apparently not prepared to do the things which I think it is his duty to do as Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. HARKNESS: No, no. Do not start calling "carried." As a matter of fact, I am prepared to talk here all night and all day tomorrow on this thing, until I get some satisfaction.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HARKNESS: Hon. members can call "carried" as much as they like, but this is a serious matter. It is a matter which affects the employment of a considerable number of people in both those cities, who work in these plants. It is a matter which affects the number of buildings which can be put up and completed in those two cities and areas. If the minister has any real interest in that sort of thing, I should think he would take the necessary means to see to it that the small amount of asbestos fibre which they require is retained in this country. I have suggested to him two things that he might do. He is apparently not prepared to do either of them. I really cannot understand the minister's attitude in the matter. To me he appears to be obstinate with regard to this matter and attempts to turn off any responsibility by answers which are not serious. That is what it amounts to.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I have learned that I have a new constituent, Mr. Chairman. I am going to put it in this way. We have items that are in short supply, such as nails, though I am not going to try to take the place of the hon. member for Peterborough West. We do exercise controls, some of them obvious and others not so obvious. May I ask, is there any import restriction or duty on asbestos fibre?

Mr. HOWE: Not at all; it is duty free. Canada is the principal supplier.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then, where may asbestos fibre be purchased other than from these plants in this part of the country? It cannot be purchased anywhere else in Canada and, as far as I know, it cannot be purchased in quantity in the United States. The minister turns this back; and a lot of the boys applauded his very clever reply when he said: You belong to a free enterprise party; why don't you write them a letter? We do belong to a free enterprise party; but we have always said that when monopoly raises its ugly head, as it has here, we will take care of it. That is what we are suggesting to the minister, who also says he belongs to a free enterprise party. He has it in his power to handle this situation, but all he is doing in his replies to those people who are trying to start a business, to provide some employment and to furnish some necessary materials, is passing them off with a smart answer and giving them no help whatever; while in this same Canada—and if we are to make it a Canada we have to trade within our own country as much as we can—we have the asbestos fibre. Out there we have the plants, but the minister will not do a single thing to help them. Nor is he even sympathetic toward these people in the difficulty in which they find themselves. That is the simple position of the Minister of Trade and Commerce right now in this House of Commons.

Mr. HOWE: Well, let us examine this situation a little further.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Yes, I think we had better.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is suggesting that we have several producers of asbestos in this country who have combined to prevent a plant in Calgary from getting asbestos.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I did not say that.

Mr. HOWE: That is my hon. friend's statement. Well, we have Mr. F. A. McGregor as head of the combines investigation branch—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I did not say that and I ask the minister to withdraw that statement.

Mr. HOWE: You said they just did not choose to sell asbestos to this plant. My hon. friend said they were trying to put the plant out of business so their United States associates could supply the finished product.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I never said that either.

Mr. HOWE: Then your colleague from Calgary East said it.

Mr. HARKNESS: No, I did not. I said these firms have never absolutely refused to sell asbestos to these people. They just keep giving them the run-around by shipping them asbestos in dribs and drabs every now and then, and never enough to meet their requirements.

Mr. HOWE: Did my hon. friend not make the statement that a combine is raising its ugly head?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): No; I said a monopoly was raising its ugly head; and I repeat it.

Mr. HOWE: It is the same thing, if you are speaking of several firms.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Not while I am on my feet, surely.

The CHAIRMAN: I thought the hon. member had resumed his seat.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I had not, but I shall.

Mr. MERRITT: I should like to ask the minister to make another speech now on one of the other matters I asked him about before six o'clock. At the time the import restrictions and excise taxes were put on, or while they were being debated in the house, much was said by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance about the constructive side of the program for the conservation of United States dollars. I might just start the minister off by a reference to his statement that if Canadians made the building up of United States dollar exports a national objective we should be able to balance our trade in a matter of months. I think the committee would be interested to hear a statement by the minister as to what progress has been made with the constructive side of the dollar conservation program, how far he has gone with it and what mechanisms he has used to further this drive toward this national objective, also what he proposes to do in future to make it a reality so that the restrictive side may be abandoned.

Mr. HOWE: Well, Mr. Chairman, the constructive side is showing itself in the trade figures. I could give my hon. friend details, but, without doing that, I can say the exports to dollar countries are stepping up each month in spectacular fashion, while imports from dollar countries are dropping each month in comparison with the same month last year. Exports are being stimulated by a formula worked out particularly for plants using United States content. We are limiting the United States dollars that may be spent to a fraction of what was spent last year, but allow the plant to earn additional United States dollars to pay for imports by increasing exports. The result of that program has been quite spectacular, particularly in certain industries. Several industries have arranged to manufacture and ship into the United States market in a manner never contemplated before the program was put into effect. The over-all net result is that without counting loans, I believe we are about $150 million better off in our United States dollar balance than we were when the program was announced, which I think is the best proof that can be offered that the constructive side is operating.

Mr. MERRITT: The minister mentions $150 million without including the loan. Will he say how much of that was the import of capital and how much was earned through increased export trade?

Mr. HOWE: Obviously I have not the details on the balance of payments. The investment figures would be included in the amount I gave, but I doubt very much if the investments count very much one way or the other. They were moving against us for a time; probably they about balance now. We are over $100 million better off in our trade with the United States than we were at this time last year.

Mr. MERRITT: As I understand it, the minister has given us only one mechanism he has employed, namely, by giving firms which can export an additional quota of United States dollars so that they can buy goods to remanufacture. Does that represent the total government influence on the positive side of this program? Is the minister not following any other policy to stimulate those exports? For instance, it is suggested in the Financial Post of recent date that the government has in mind a much wider reciprocal trade deal with the United States. The particular passage I have before me goes so far as to say: "The next step unofficially announced as government policy is to negotiate a much wider reciprocal trade deal with the United States directly." I should have thought there would be something more than relief from one of the restrictions as the positive side of this policy. I would ask the minister to comment on what I have said, and to say what is proposed for the future, if he has anything in mind.

Mr. HOWE: Duties are adjusted from time to time. There have been reductions on base metals going into the United States. Nothing in the nature of a reciprocal deal has been worked out, but we are stimulating trade where we can, and stimulating exports where we can. I mentioned aluminum. A very large contract was made by the Aluminum Company of Canada to supply aluminum for the United States. Our nickel companies have large contracts with the United States. Both nickel companies are expanding their production in an endeavour to meet contracts that have been made in the United States within recent months. The point is that we are stimulating exports wherever we can and by whatever means. Our program for curtailing imports is working fairly well, and a combination of the two is producing United States dollars and is tending to pull us out of our balance of payment difficulty with the United States.

Mr. MERRITT: I understand that the minister could attempt to stimulate exports by exhorting the Canadian businessman to try to channel his trade that way—

Mr. HOWE: We have not attempted to channel trade. Our efforts have been directed to obtaining more exports.

Mr. MERRITT: To the United States.

Mr. HOWE: To anywhere; it is all the same.

Mr. MERRITT: The minister might appeal to the Canadian businessman, and I would approve that, to try to find sources of raw materials in Canada which had previously been imported; but I have not heard the minister say anything about any concrete government policy that he has adopted as part of a positive program. I remember when he was stimulating building materials he had the idea of double depreciation to those who increased the size of their plants producing bathtubs and things like that. Is the government taking any steps, by way of fiscal policy, if you like to call it that, to induce Canadian manufacturers to develop Canadian sources of supply or to set up new industries to supply wants which previously were supplied by other countries? Is there no thought of some definite government policy which would be of assistance in getting additional exports, or is it simply a matter of calling the seriousness of the situation to the attention of Canadian businessmen and hoping that they will, as they probably will, do a good job? Has the minister the details of any specific things the government has done?

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend will examine the act under which we work he will notice that we have the power to say whether a man can have his source of supply in this country or whether he may import his raw materials or semi-finished parts. We are using that power actively. A man must show good reason why he should import before he is given an import permit. If it is possible to get what he wants in Canada he is required to do so. Naturally the demand for new products is causing new plants to open. There has been a great expansion of parts manufacturing in the country, and expansion is still continuing. Firms which are large importers are constantly looking for new sources of supply.

Mr. MERRITT: It really comes down to this. The minister is using his restrictive program to try to stimulate a productive program.

Mr. HOWE: Certainly.

Mr. MERRITT: That is the extent to which there is a positive program?

Mr. HOWE: I wish my hon. friend would not put words into my mouth.

Mr. MERRITT: I was just asking the minister.

Mr. HOWE: I have given several examples of what we are doing. We are finding new markets; we are inducing shippers to find new markets and we are aiding them in every way. The point I make is that it is working. I think that is disappointing to my hon. friend, because it was freely predicted that the program would not work. But it is working;

we hope it will continue to work, and we believe that we shall be out of the restrictive phase in a foreseeable time.

Mr. MERRITT: A matter of months.

Mr. HOWE: There have not been so many months. When my hon. friend says there is only one way, I tell him that we are acting in many ways.

Mr. MERRITT: Of course the minister is quite wrong in stating that I would be disappointed if he were not successful. As a matter of fact, I would be most delighted if he were successful. I will say to him that from the beginning of the session in December we on this side were sceptical as to whether there was a positive side to the government's program to conserve United States dollars. We heard vague references made in speeches of the Minister of Finance and of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the constructive side of the program, but we have never seen it in concrete form. I was giving the minister an opportunity to let the committee know what the concrete form of this constructive policy is.

I have asked the minister these questions, but he could have avoided any questions from me by making a statement on the matter. I think I was pretty close to giving a fair summary of the whole constructive policy in the conservation of United States dollars when I said that it sounded to me like being simply the use of import restriction measures to try to stimulate production in other ways. I think we see tonight that the government have no constructive policy for the building up of our United States exchange reserve and that our suspicions right from the beginning of the session that it was just a figure of speech are borne out.

Mr. TIMMINS: Let me deal with the same subject in another way. In January, 1947, the Department of Trade and Commerce put out a booklet on foreign trade, a copy of which I hold in my hand. That received a fine reception from industrialists and manufacturers and exporters throughout Canada. I sent out quite a number of them to industries in my district and received some nice replies. However I think I should pass on to the minister one reply that I received.

They said there were a lot of pictures of commissioners, a lot of pictures of commodities and pictures of other parts of the world, but they wanted to know if it should not go a great deal farther. They wanted to know whether these commissioners in the various parts of the world should not be doing more to see that their products were being sold in the countries in which they were located. That presents the other side of this control business.

As the minister said a while ago, one principle of ERP is that soft currency countries should trade among themselves; in other words, they should pull themselves up by their own boot-straps, that they should go into production themselves. We in Canada, not having our full share of United States dollars, should as much as possible trade with those countries and trade would thereby be stimulated. However we cannot get into a number of the sterling area countries which are dependencies and dominions of the United Kingdom, because they have import controls similar to our own.

The suggestion has been made by industrialists that our trade commissioners in sterling area countries should busy themselves to expedite the negotiation of reciprocal trade arrangements. The minister has stated that the principle of ERP is to expand trade among countries which cannot otherwise help themselves; and I should like to know what, if anything, has been or can be done by Canada to work out reciprocal trade conventions with those countries which have shut their doors to our products.

Mr. HOWE: I do not know what my hon. friend understands by reciprocal trade agreements. We are a party to multilateral trade agreements worked out at Geneva.

Mr. TIMMINS: Geneva does not shut us out from bartering, as I understand it.

Mr. HOWE: Canada barters frequently. Canadian firms barter with firms abroad.

Mr. TIMMINS: I suggest that the Department of Trade and Commerce, who are in this thing up to their neck, ought, through their trade commissioners, to perform greater service, because whatever stimulus can be given to our trade will help us to get away from controls all the faster.

Mr. MERRITT: I did not get an answer to my question about the statement in the Financial Post to the effect that it is now officially government policy to negotiate much wider reciprocal trade deals with the United States directly. Is that or is it not government policy at the present time?

Mr. HOWE: We hope to do it in time, yes. I am simply pointing out that there is nothing to announce at the moment.

Mr. MERRITT: I would ask the minister a question with regard to the recent action of the United States congress in refusing to extend their reciprocal trade agreements act for a period of three years and the rather restrictive way in which they dealt with the President's powers to reduce tariffs. I have a press clipping here from Washington—

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, what has this to do with the Department of Trade and Commerce? Surely we have no control over the action of the United States congress.

Mr. MERRITT: This is an important matter of trade.

Mr. HOWE: We know about it, but what can we do about it?

Mr. MERRITT: If the minister will allow me to ask my question, which is pertinent, he may understand. This clipping, after enumerating the changes made in the act, goes on to say that if the Republican party is returned to power in the forthcoming election—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. That has nothing to do with this item at all.

Mr. MERRITT: Mr. Chairman—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. It is entirely out of order to read the quotation on an item of this kind.

Mr. MERRITT: With great respect to you, Mr. Chairman, you have not heard my point. It is necessary for me to read the quotation—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: My hon. friend knows it is not in order to read articles commenting on anything taking place in this house.

Mr. MERRITT: Mr. Chairman, this article does not refer to anything taking place in this house.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: If it has nothing to do with what is taking place in this house the hon. member should not read it. It is out of order.

Mr. MERRITT: I must say you have got me there, Mr. Chairman. But this press clipping does not refer to anything that is taking place in the house.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I would remind the hon. member that I have sat in this house for a number of years, and I heard the then prime minister back in 1935 insist that no article or newspaper item could be read affecting the 245 members of the house, and the then Speaker ruled such quotations out of order. How can we make any progress in dealing with this item by referring to something taking place in congress or reading an article dealing with the action of congress? I submit that we have had quite a long discussion on this item of departmental administration, and I am going to ask the committee if they want to carry the item. If one or two members insist that it should not be carried, the other members of the committee have the right to say whether it shall be carried or not.

Mr. MERRITT: That sounds to me, with great respect, Mr. Chairman, like a closure rule.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. It is much worse for one member to insist on holding up an item and getting into an argument that is not pertinent than it is for me to submit to the whole committee whether it wants this item carried or not. Surely my hon. friend can see that that is the democratic way of dealing with the business of the house.

Mr. MILLER: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, surely you cannot insist on a vote being taken when the members have not exhausted their desire to speak on this question.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I can assure my hon. friend that that has been done. When one member insists that an item be not passed the Chairman can submit the question to the committee as a whole whether the item should carry.

Mr. MERRITT: Mr. Chairman—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I am answering the hon. member for Portage la Prairie and pointing out that that is the situation.

Mr. HARKNESS: Mr. Chairman, not only one member but several members, four or five members right here, and I do not know how many elsewhere, want to discuss this item further.

Mr. MERRITT: I am afraid I shall have to be the judge of whether I am unduly taking up the time of the committee. I made it perfectly plain when these estimates first came before the committee that if the minister would do what we expected him to do, and what has been done by many ministers in introducing their estimates, that is, make a general over-all statement, we would not have to go through this tooth-pulling business to extract information, and I am quite satisfied to take my own responsibility as to whether I am unduly delaying the committee.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair and before the minister announces the order of business for Monday, may I repeat what I said a few moments ago that on Monday eighty-two members of this house will be or should be back home voting, and since I and a number of others would like to say a word or two about some of the items in Reconstruction estimates, may I ask the minister not to call that department on Monday?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): On Monday we shall take up the budget bills, the second readings of Bills Nos. 330, 331, 332 and 333, and then go into supply and take up justice, Secretary of State, and transport.

Mr. CHURCH: What about holding over justice?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I have tried my best to meet the wishes of the opposition to have justice taken up on Monday. If they cannot agree among themselves, I cannot do any better.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO DEFAMATORY LIBEL, CULPABLE HOMICIDE, ETC.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 337, to amend the criminal code.

Mr. KNOWLES: Explain.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, this bill contains forty-six sections, some of them merely correcting errors, some of them improving language, it is hoped, and some of them making relatively unimportant changes in procedure. There are, however, at least half a dozen sections of considerable importance. One is the section providing that the rules relating to place of trial of a defamatory libel published in a newspaper are to be made applicable to the place of trial of a conspiracy to publish a defamatory libel. Another provision is to the effect that the term "culpable homicide", instead of including as at present only murder and manslaughter, is to include a third offence to be known as "infanticide".

Another provision is that there shall be a minimum penalty of one year's imprisonment for stealing from the mails. Then there are amendments to prevent the fraudulent manipulation of transactions on stock exchanges, and otherwise to facilitate the curbing of security frauds.

Part XVI of the code is completely withdrawn and changed in important respects. The changes are so important that it would not be prudent to bring the new part XVI into force on the passing of the act, and therefore it is proposed that it come into force on the first day of October, 1949. The reasons for that postponement will appear when the bill is discussed.

Provision is made for a jury trial continuing by consent of both the crown and the accused, even though one or two jurors, through illness or other causes, are unable to continue to act.

Provision is made for indeterminate sentences of not less than two years upon the trial of persons charged with certain sex offences, if these persons are found to be criminal sexual psychopaths.

These, I think, are the most important amendments. Perhaps there are other amendments which will strike some hon. members as having considerable importance, and which can be discussed at a later stage.

I should like to say also that no attempt has been made to amend the gambling sections, although we have had strong representations, particularly from the attorney general's department of the province of Ontario, in favour of so doing. It would be idle for me to deny that the gambling sections need amending, but the only province that has made definite and comprehensive proposals for amendment is Ontario. In a matter of this importance it was finally decided that the suggestions of the attorney general's department of the province of Ontario, together with the modifications of these suggestions suggested by the Department of Justice, should be laid before the commissioners on the uniformity of legislation, criminal side, next August for their consideration so that the views of all the departments of the attorneys general in Canada might be obtained before amendments are introduced. It is realized that this delay will be a disappointment to the department of the attorney general of Ontario, but, on the whole, it seemed to be the wisest course to take in the circumstances.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—DAMAGE TO TRANS-CONTINENTAL RAILWAY LINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I sent him notice of it on Friday last. Can he make a statement as to the probable extent of the damage to the trans-continental railway lines through British Columbia, and when it is expected that rail communication will be re-established with the Pacific coast?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am able to make a statement concerning the two railways, the present condition of their lines, and the extent of damage to each.

The management of the Canadian National Railways inform me that on the line to Vancouver communication has been re-established as far west as Boston Bar. The expectation is that emergency restoration on the line as far west as Hope will be completed by June 10. Intermediate communication is being established at Hope in the expectation that emergency restoration from Hope to Chilliwack will be completed by June 8. Thus, by the combination of forces working concurrently west from Boston Bar and west and east from Hope, it is expected that communication as far west as Chilliwack will be completed by June 10. The line beyond Chilliwack to Port Mann is still inundated, and it is quite impossible to forecast the extent of damage in this section and the probable date of restoration of the line.

On the Prince Rupert line, Canadian National communication will be re-established as far as Tatlow, which is six miles east of Smithers, by tomorrow. With restoration of damage at Tatlow by about June 10, the line will be open as far west as Kitwanga, which is seventy-three miles west of Smithers. Concurrently, working crews from Prince Rupert have reached Salvus, sixty-five miles to the east. The condition of the section from Kitwanga to Salvus is still indeterminate, especially because of conditions immediately west of Kitwanga which appear to be serious. More definite predictions as to the reopening of the line through to Prince Rupert will depend on more detailed inspection and the more authentic information as to conditions between Kitwanga and Salvus. It is not possible at this time to estimate the cost of restoration work, but we know it will be heavy and will probably involve several millions of dollars.

I am advised by the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway that they are hopeful of having, and expect to have, a complete line to Vancouver by June 15, with a complete restoration of service shortly thereafter. The line from Calgary to Hope is expected to be open any time now, and if the highway from Hope to Vancouver is opened to traffic, it would then be possible to transfer passengers and their baggage from railway to buses at that point, thus providing a combination rail-highway service from Calgary to Vancouver early this week. The company at this time, without having received full engineering estimates with respect to certain parts of their line which are still badly inundated, estimate that the cost of rehabilitation of their lines in the British Columbia region will amount to slightly less than $1,000,000.

In conversation with the Canadian National this morning I was advised that their line is open as far as Kamloops from which point traffic is detoured to the Canadian Pacific line as far as Hope. Passengers, mail and express are then moved by highway from Hope to Vancouver. Yesterday the Canadian National transferred to highway services nine carloads of emergency food and supplies for Vancouver destination.

Both railways are endeavouring to ascertain that the Great Northern is in a position to handle Vancouver traffic before issuing instructions to reroute all of this traffic over the Great Northern.

Just before I came into the house I spoke to officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway, who report that 50 carloads of freight, including foodstuffs, have already been rerouted via the Great Northern to Vancouver. It is expected it will take seven days to reach its destination.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 332, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Mutch in the chair.

On section 1—"Minister".

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Not having had anything to say on the budget, because I was absent when the matter was before the house, I wish to ascertain the minister's views on one question to which I shall refer now.

A major source of criticism on the part of the people at all times has to do with payment of taxes, and at the present time their complaints are certainly not unjustified. I realize, as the minister said in his budget speech, that the larger proportion of government expenditures consists of uncontrollable items. Social security items amount to 16·25 per cent of the total budget; veterans' pensions, 14·85 per cent; national defence, 8·87 per cent; interest and carrying charges on the national debt, 21·21 per cent. I feel that the time has come for the assumption by parliament of responsibility for the careful examination of expenditures. The suggestion has been made before, but in general terms. As I see the expansion of government expenditures from year to year, it occurs to me that the policy of the government is to spend and spend, and to tax and tax. Parliament has not taken a strong stand against over-expenditures; the result is the present situation.

If you look at Hansard over the last twenty-five years, Mr. Chairman, you will find that immediately before and after the first world war there was on the part of the House of Commons a definite desire to reduce expenditures and definite activity in the challenging of items that might be reduced; whereas in recent years parliament in the last two or three weeks of the session has passed innumerable items running into millions and tens of millions, without any examination whatsoever on the part of the house.

Throughout the country there is strong resentment against parliament because of its failure to reduce expenditures recommended by the government; for unless there is reduction in expenditure there will not be reduction in taxation. A number of years ago Sir George Foster, one of the most outstanding parliamentarians of his time—and his viewpoint was subsequently reinforced by an independent research investigation—suggested that there be set up a special house committee on estimates. Today we find ourselves in the position of making general attacks on every expenditure. Regardless of economic experimentation by theorists who advise the government, parliament accepts their suggestions and does little toward endeavouring to reduce expenditures. Two years ago Mr. Watson Sellar, the auditor general, asked for the setting up of special committees to comb the estimates—and I direct attention to the word "comb"—before they are submitted to the house as a whole. I ask the minister if such a committee would not be helpful. The other day he told us that the treasury board discharges that responsibility. Indeed, if I remember aright what he said, he actually told the treasury board that only they would in the end determine the extent of expenditures and the economies that could be effected.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, I did not tell treasury board that. I told the various departmental officials coming in with their estimates.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes. That statement, made the other day, impressed me, indicating as it does that the House of Commons is not discharging its responsibilities. Here we have a statement by the Minister of Finance, after a year's experience in office, that the heads of departments alone act as a deterrent against over-expenditure, and that upon them alone it depends.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not upon them; treasury board is the only one that really scrutinizes the items.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am not playing with words. I am stating in substance what the minister has placed before the house. I ask him whether consideration has been given to Mr. Sellar's suggestion and if so, why it has not been carried beyond consideration. Why should members of this house not be divided into committees, as suggested by Mr. Sellar, to the end that expenditures shall be reduced where they ought to be reduced. Unless something is done, there will be no improvement. If the heads of departments, as a result of the failure of the House of Commons to challenge the estimates, are unable to resist the demands made upon them, they are given an incentive to increase expenditures; they realize that the house as a whole will not challenge their recommendations to treasury board, which recommendations are passed on to the house.

On a previous occasion, when mention was made of a suggestion not the same as this, the minister passed it off in a manner which, while it could not be described as flippant, did not do justice to the seriousness of the problem. To continue to tax and tax—with the load that today rests on the person in the low-income brackets, caught as he is between the rising cost of living, about which little or nothing has been done by the government, and an income little increased since the end of the war—is a policy against which resentment is generally felt. We in this house should do our part to be of assistance to the minister in reducing unnecessary expenditures and preventing administrative officials from joining in what finally becomes an orgy of over-expenditure unless departmental officials and others feel that their estimates will be challenged by the house as a whole.

This is not a new suggestion. It was made as far back as 1910, when expenditures totalled about $100,000,000. Today, with expenditures amounting to many times that total, the necessity of some such action is even more apparent. In reading Hansard for those days, as no doubt the minister has, one is particularly struck by the fact that then, and indeed until about 1925 or 1926, the House of Commons as a whole in committee seemed to be seized of its responsibility toward the people to pare down if possible and challenge where necessary over-expenditure or over-generous expenditure.

Is the minister prepared to consider the setting up of committees along the lines suggested by Mr. Sellar? If he is, parliament would not have to sit as long, and the house would be discharging its major responsibility, that of acting as watch dog of the treasury. The advantage would pass to the taxpayers in the reduction of controllable expenditures.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not want to interrupt my hon. friend, because I know he was not able to be here during the main budget discussion. It is customary to permit general remarks on the first section of a bill, but I think the ordinary rule is that they should relate to the bill in question rather than to broad topics. However, I did not interrupt my hon. friend because I realized that in the circumstances it was desirable for him to make his remarks; but I hope the practice will not be followed by other hon. members, and that my failure to raise any protest will not be treated as acquiescence in a complete revival of the budget discussions.

I should like to reply briefly to one point raised by the hon. member, in connection with the committees he mentioned. I have done so before, I think on an earlier occasion this session. I believe the view I expressed was that the creation of functional committees of the kind is foreign to our parliamentary system. Whether or not that is true, my personal view is that the job of scrutinizing the detailed estimates is one which should not be delegated to a small committee of the house. Traditionally this House of Commons has considered it to be its right to discuss each item of the estimates. As I said before, my own experience has been that discussion does not always relate directly to the item of expenditure which is under consideration, but frequently to general matters having to do with the department. I may be wrong, of course, but I question very much whether the adoption of the system which has been suggested by Mr. Sellar, high though my respect is for that very capable official, would result in any reduction in expenditure. After four or five years of close association with the Department of Finance I have come to the reluctant conclusion that the only real check on expenditures lies with the Minister of Finance first, and the treasury board second. I hope I am wrong in that, but I do not think I am. Human nature being what it is, I believe the general tendency on the part of members of parliament and a great many others is to be generous with the public money. They know the Minister of Finance has to be tough in these things, and that treasury board has to look pretty carefully at the larger expenditures; and in my not too lengthy experience here I have not heard many suggestions for a reduction in expenditure.

I do not believe the formation of such committees would really produce the result I know we would all desire, the elimination of unnecessary expenditures. I am afraid that is a responsibility which must be assumed primarily by the government, with parliament discharging its traditional responsibility by looking at the items of expenditure and deciding whether or not it wants to approve them.

I point out, too, as I have done before, that the estimates are brought down early in the session, with itemized details showing exactly how it is proposed that the public money be spent. These are before the house for months. It is true that in some respects the formality of passing some of the expenditures item by item is left until late in the session, but that does not mean every member of the House of Commons has not ample opportunity to give careful scrutiny to all proposed expenditures.

I am completely out of order in discussing this matter here, I am afraid; but since my hon. friend brought it up, and since it is a very important question, I felt that I should be permitted to answer his statement.

Mr. HACKETT: I should like to add just a few words at this point concerning a matter on which I have said something on two or three previous occasions. The day will come when spending on the basis on which it is now proceeding will come to an end. I do not think there is any doubt about that. At present we are indulging in the experiment of management, and for the time being we are producing that which enables us to spend accordingly; but some day soon a re-establishment of real values will take place. When that day comes, reductions in taxation will have to be made; and I am asking the minister, as I did the other night, to set up a committee or to cause his officials to study the matter with a view to bringing about reductions without great and irreparable loss. When taxes are imposed on commodities, they are collected and received by the government. When taxes are taken off, however, the purchaser or consumer will not pay them, even though they may have been paid by the manufacturer or importer. I suggest to the minister that it is the part of prudence and justice to examine carefully the procedure which should be followed when war taxes are abandoned, as they must be, in order that their abandonment may not cause grave and unnecessary harm to the people who paid them in the first place and who must recoup themselves or be greatly injured. I would therefore ask the minister to have the question examined by his departmental officials and, if possible, to provide an opportunity to members to assist the government in the study of a measure which is bound to have such far-reaching consequences.

Mr. ABBOTT: May I again point out that there is little use in setting up a committee of the house to revise the rules if we are not prepared to stick as closely as possible to the rules we already have. I submit it is completely out of order to discuss topics relating to general taxation when we have before us section 1 of a bill to amend the Excise Tax Act. I would ask hon. members to co-operate in this regard and to stick to the section. We have had a pretty full discussion on general topics.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mutch): When the minister rose I was on the point of saying that this discussion has been of a general nature, and that a general debate on the budget is not in my view permissible in respect of this specific bill. I have desired not to be hasty, but the statement I have made indicates no temerity on my part. Shall section 1 carry?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No. With all due respect, we are discussing taxation. This bill has to do with amendments to a taxing act known as the Excise Tax Act. When the minister talks about getting along, may I point out to him that this year he has got along so fast that a record has been established. I believe that in the last twenty-five years no finance minister has had his budget resolutions considered as quickly as they were this year, having regard to the resentment felt by the people of Canada against high taxation.

Mr. ABBOTT: Order. Can we not abide by the rules of the house?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Since when has a minister been able to say that to condemn a government for high taxation, when a discussion of excise tax amendments is in progress, is against the rules of the house?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not mind how much time we take, and I was endeavouring to be courteous. However I must insist upon strict enforcement of the rules. The rules with respect to consideration of a bill in committee are quite clear. Discussion must be relevant to the clause before the committee—not the whole bill, but the particular clause. By a sort of tradition, general discussion has been allowed on section 1. But that is only through tolerance; it has no support in the rules; indeed it is an infraction of them. I do not wish to raise any disturbance, but when my hon. friend asks me to be patient I would answer that I have listened without interruption; and I think, you, sir, should enforce the rules.

Mr. HACKETT: Let us not get into a discussion about how we are going to proceed. We are anxious to get on with the work, and the best way to get on with it is to proceed in the manner to which we have become accustomed. Discussion of the general terms of a bill has always been allowed on the first section. If the minister would smile, perhaps we would get on faster.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mutch): The rule respecting speeches in committee is clear. Throughout this session a serious attempt has been made by the committee of the whole to get back to something more closely resembling the rules than the practice which prevailed during the difficult war years, when general discussion was permitted to a greater extent. As hon. members are aware, I do not ordinarily preside over the committee, and for that reason I hesitated at the beginning to rise or to interrupt, or to have my first words a reference to the rules. The rule, however, is specific in this matter, and if I am required to do so I shall have to rule to enforce it.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Chairman, I am usually pretty fair in these matters. In my earlier remarks I appealed to the committee to stick as closely as possible to the rules. I would ask hon. members not to renew the budget debate. It would be completely out of order. We have set up a committee to revise the rules of the house. We have a clear cut rule already established, the infringement of which is one of the greatest time-wasters in the carrying on of business of the house.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That committee is getting on about as fast as we are.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Tax on matches.

Mr. PROBE: The revision of the excise tax structure on matches brings up the question whether matches are bearing an undue proportion of the revenue load the government derives from various sources. Matches are not a luxury item in most homes. Those of us who smoke might be considered as contributing an extra quota because of the number of matches we burn when smoking our pipes.

Mr. McCANN: Try smoking tobacco.

Mr. PROBE: The fact is that it is a necessary commodity and should not be subject to so high a tax. Will the minister tell the committee what revenue was derived in the past year from the excise tax on matches, and what is the administrative set-up by which the tax is collected? Most match packages do not bear a revenue stamp which is affixed, but have a stamp printed on them. There must be some process of checking up.

Mr. ABBOTT: The revenue in the last year from the match tax was $3,499,661. The tax is collected on domestically produced matches by means of an imprint on the container. This is placed on by a machine, to which is attached a tabulator which keeps count of how many times the printing operation is repeated. On imported matches an adhesive stamp is attached to the box. I suggest therefore that the process of collecting the tax accurately is an efficient one.

Mr. LOW: Does the minister mean to say that we import matches?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that we do at the present time, but in the past we have imported them from Sweden. On these, stamps were affixed.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—When tax not payable.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): This is an instance in which a tax is being reduced. Will this saving be passed along to the consumer, or is it something the provincial governments will absorb in their liquor stores, with prices kept the same?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told that in fact this is a tax which has not been collected. It has been remitted. This section is to make the law conform to what has been happening for some time.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Certificate before distribution of assets.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What does this section, as revised, mean?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told it is more in the nature of a drafting change. As my hon. friend will see from the explanatory note, part XV of the act is to be repealed, and it was considered that the section should be brought up to date and other parts brought under its provisions.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What are the other parts?

Mr. ABBOTT: They thought it advisable to provide that parts could be added to or taken from this act without having to change this section each time such a change was made. It is more in the nature of a drafting change than a change in substance.

On section 7—Prosecutions.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The same applies here?

Mr. ABBOTT: The same applies here.

Section agreed to.

Sections 8 and 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Tariff board to settle doubts and differences.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister explain the meaning of the second subsection and state whether or not there is an appeal from the declaration of the tariff board?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am informed that that question has never been raised departmentally and I am afraid I am not in position to answer it offhand. One of the principal purposes of amending section 10 is to remove the word "war". The new act is to be known as the Excise Tax Act instead of the Excise War Tax Act. In section 115 the reference to the board of customs is deleted, because it was replaced a good many years ago by the tariff board.

Mr. HACKETT: I have become accustomed to seeing orders in council take on the power and effect of statutes, but it has never before come to my attention that an independent irresponsible body named as the tariff board is named has the power to enact legislation which is the law of the land to the same extent as if a bill had been brought into the house, debated, read three times, passed and sent to the senate and finally given the royal assent. Of course I may not be fully informed, but this is a startling provision because it says that a declaration by the tariff board under this section shall have the same force and effect as if it had been sanctioned by statute. I am aware that a declaration by the board of customs had a somewhat similar effect, but the board of customs was a slightly different organization, and I believe there was always an appeal from that board.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course whatever remedies there are would lie here. The board of customs was replaced years ago by the tariff board. As my hon. friend will see on looking at the section, it relates largely to an interpretation of descriptions in the tariff schedule. The tariff board may declare what amount of tax is payable thereon, or that the article is exempt from tax under this act. Before the creation of the tariff board apparently that was the function of the board of customs, which consisted of officials in the government service. For many years past—since 1933 at any rate—the responsibility for performing these functions has been vested in the tariff board. I am informed that this is simply to bring the law into conformity with what has been the practice during those years.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I should like to know how this will work out in a practical way. As I understand it, when there is doubt or dispute with respect to the amount of duty to be paid on any article reference is made to the tariff board, which may in its uncontrolled discretion make a declaration as to the result, when—and I quote from the section:

—there is no previous decision upon the question by any competent tribunal binding throughout Canada.

I do not know what that means. It cannot mean any of our courts except the Supreme Court of Canada. I should like the minister to explain that.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps we could let this section stand. I have asked the commissioner of tariffs to come down.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Suppose I bring an article into Canada and I am told by the customs officers at the boundary that the duty is $100. I do not think it should be that, so I come within the section because there is disagreement as to the amount of the duty. The only way I can get the article into Canada is to pay the $100 on the barrelhead. I take it that I then go to the tariff board and say, "I have paid $100; I think the amount of duty should be only $50, and I want you to decide." I hope I am right as to the matter of procedure so far as I have gone. Is there any provision in the act which, granted that I succeed and the tariff board says the duty should be $50—

Mr. ABBOTT: This relates to excise tax, not customs duties.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Let us say excise then; the case would still be the same. Is there any provision in the act for the return to me of the $50 which I have overpaid?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told that there is.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): There should be a specific provision. I want to avoid the difficulty the ordinary man would have in dealing with the crown through his inability to bring an action to get his money back. Would the minister mind pointing out the section?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is section 105. Would the hon. member like me to read it?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is it a long section?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes; it has seven subsections. Section 2 relates to refunds of taxes, and reads as follows:

> A refund of taxes paid under Part X, XI,, XII, or XIII of this act may be granted to a manufacturer, producer, wholesaler, jobber or other dealer on goods sold to His Majesty in right of any province of Canada if the said goods are purchased by His Majesty for any purpose other than . . .

Then it gives the purposes. Section 4 reads:

> A refund or deduction of the amount of the consumption or sales tax may be granted . . .

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): These are all refunds.

Mr. ABBOTT: I had not read the section before. The section reads:

> A deduction from, or refund of, any of the taxes imposed by this act may be granted:
> (a) where an overpayment has been made by the taxpayer.

Just as a matter of historical information, may I say I am told that subsection 2, which we are now discussing, has been in the act since 1917. It was put in in 1917 and the only change here is that the tariff board was substituted in 1933, as the hon. member for Stanstead will recall, for the board of customs. The tariff board is now the tribunal to decide whether refunds may be made.

Mr. HACKETT: I began my question by asking whether there was an appeal. I understood that there was not. I am going to ask the minister to bear with me just a moment while we consider section 115, which reads as follows:

> Where any difference arises or where any doubt exists as to whether any or what rate of tax is payable on any article under this act and there is no previous decision upon the question by any competent tribunal binding throughout Canada, the tariff board constituted by the Tariff Board Act may declare what amount of tax is payable thereon or that the article is exempt from tax under this act.

Then follows the section which says that the declaration of the tariff board has the same effect as a statute. What happens when there is a dispute as to whether or not there is a previous decision? My hon. friend, who has spent long years before the courts, knows that sometimes lawyers cannot agree whether a case is pertinent or not, whether it applies or not. Even courts have been known to disagree as to whether or not they are bound by a certain decision. Who is to be the arbiter in these cases? Is the tariff board to determine once and for all, and beyond all possibility of appeal, that a case does not apply, when others, possibly entitled to an opinion equally respectable, feel that it does?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is an interesting question. I have never considered it before, and the senior official of the Department of National Revenue, who is sitting in front of me, tells me it has not come up. My opinion, for what it is worth, would be that the question whether or not there has been a decision by a competent tribunal is a question of fact; and if the tariff board, or any other body, purported to declare that there had not been when in fact there had been, then clearly there would be an appeal from that finding, I would think. But I am talking at odds. It is a question of fact as to whether there has been a decision.

Mr. HACKETT: I think it is a question of law. Would the minister not go so far as to say that it is a mixed question of law and of fact?

Mr. ABBOTT: That may well be.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I want to know who this competent body is. I asked that a moment ago. Who is the competent body that is going to set this precedent?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I cannot answer that question at the moment. The exchequer court is the body which in general deals with all appeals on matters of the kind. As I say, this section has been in the statute for thirty odd years. Perhaps the question should have been raised before. It was enacted by a government of which my hon. friend was a supporter. The tariff board was substituted for the board of customs in 1933 when my hon. friend's party was in power. There is no change in the law. The same body has the power to declare that it shall have the same force and effect as if it had been sanctioned by statute—that has been in the law for a long time—instead of a board of officials. It is now the tariff board. As to the question whether there is an appeal from that tribunal, I would have to give it consideration. I am afraid I cannot answer it at the moment. It is an interesting question, and frankly it has caught me by surprise.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister says that this provision has been in the statute for a long time. It is illustrative of the removal by administrative bodies of the right of the individual to recourse to the courts in order to protect his rights. The tendency in that direction has been accelerated during the last few years. Up to 1923 there were three or four statutes which denied the individual the right of recourse to the courts. Since then they have been increased in number, to an extent not known in any other of the British dominions. As a matter of fact it was the denial of the right of the individual to recourse to the courts that caused Mr. Justice Angers of the exchequer court to make a protest against the infringement by the executive on the rights of the judiciary.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is not an action of the executive.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, but it is the type of legislation to which Mr. Justice Angers made reference in these words:

> There are, in my judgment, far too many encroachments from ministers, deputy ministers and functionaries in the judicial as well as the legislative field.

In the last few years statute after statute has been enacted which has placed the average citizen in such a position that he may be ordered, directed or pushed around by administrative officials, while at the same time he is denied the right to appeal to a higher authority to protect him from the actions of officialdom. As a matter of fact, the whole essence of the right of appeal is that the intemperate or arbitrary action of the crown, or its officials, shall be reviewed by the courts. This section in its present form simply means that whether a tax applies or not, whether under the law it can properly be applied, when the tariff board makes its declaration the matter is final, and regardless of the law, that declaration shall have the same force and effect as if sanctioned by statute. That is going a long way. It may have been on the statute book for years.

Mr. ABBOTT: Put on by a Conservative government.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, put on by a mixture—and by the way, sir, this is the first time I have heard my hon. friend endeavour to get out of his responsibility by saying that what we have before us represents in part a statute passed by a Conservative government. Regardless of who put it on, or when, the present government, relying on one or two statutes passed prior to 1922, has accelerated the tendency in that direction. The result is that our statutes are replete with the type of legislation which denies to the individual the right of appeal to the courts that he may obtain the king's justice, that right being withheld regardless of unfairness or of the injustice that is done.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I should have pointed out that the taxpayer has the option of appealing to the tariff board or to the courts. He can take his choice. I had always understood that the tariff board was a semi-judicial body. If the taxpayer is dissatisfied with the ruling of the departmental officials he can appeal, I am told, to the courts or to the tariff board.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But the alternative is not provided by section 115. "Where any difference arises"—that would be as between the crown and the individual—"or where any doubt exists as to whether any tax is payable on any article under this act," then the tariff board may make its declaration. It not only exercises discretion in determining the rate of tax, which is administrative, but it also has the right to make a judicial declaration as to whether any tax is payable. That section provides two things: first, an administrative right, namely, the determination of the rate of tax payable where dispute takes place—and I can understand such an administrative board so determining; but it also has the judicial power of determining, regardless of the law, whether any tax is payable. In that case the decision is final, regardless of whether parliament ever intended that the item in question should be subject to tax.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, may I say a word with respect to the issue that has been raised between the Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Lake Centre as to the origin of this piece of legislation. I do so by quoting one sentence from the Regina Leader-Post of Tuesday, June 1, 1948, just a few days ago:

"I have been searching for a long time," said Mr. Embury, "for a difference in the policies of the Liberal and Progressive Conservative parties. I must confess that so far I have found none."

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I appreciate the help from my hon. friend. Let me tell him this, that his government in Saskatchewan has accelerated the tendency shown by the present federal government, and over and over again denies an individual in that province the right to appeal to the courts against unfairness and injustice perpetrated by administrative officials.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is Tucker's line in Saskatchewan. You are all the same.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mutch): Order. I should like to hear what the hon. member is saying.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am glad my hon. friend brought that up.

Mr. LOW: Good help.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That does not apply, may I say to the leader of the Social Credit party in Alberta. In Saskatchewan, though, the socialists have taken advantage of the trend in this direction to deny the courts the right to decide the rights of the individual against the supremacy of the state—

Mr. LOW: That is right.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: —to such an extent that an individual in that province may have a determination made against him by a body composed of party friends, and that individual, regardless of injustice done to him, is denied, under statute, any appeal to the courts of the land.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I want to get on with my ideas about this section. I was hoping that it would not become political, but apparently the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) insists on that. If we wanted to be smart we could say equally that we know of no difference between them and another party in this country, but I will not say that.

Mr. KNOWLES: This is one of your own men saying it, your own candidate in Regina.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I know him very well and I knew his father before him, and if you had the brains that young fellow has you would go somewhere too.

Mr. PROBE: Where?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I don't want to say where, because it would be unparliamentary.

Mr. KNOWLES: You're much better when you are funny.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): All right; let us get on with this. I am inclined to think the minister may have been wrong with respect to the advice he got as to the alternative procedure, but if he is right about that, then consider the anomaly that can be created. Assume that you go to the courts and they decide one way. The provincial court decides one way—

Mr. ABBOTT: It would have to be the exchequer court.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Well, the exchequer court. Then you go to the tariff board, and you could easily get opposite decisions on the same matter. This act says that the tariff board's decision has the force of a statute. However, that does not matter much. The point I first raised was this. With respect to the return of money, would the minister have someone go through the section with a view to providing that where overpayment has been made it will be refunded forthwith, or something of the kind? If I am right, it might be worthwhile adding such a provision before third reading.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will have that looked into. I am told that under section 105, which I mentioned, refunds are made every day where taxes are paid in error. Section 115, which is not taken advantage of too often, relates to disputes as to interpretation of the statute in some cases, or the question whether taxes are really payable. I am assured that the taxpayer has the option of going to the exchequer court if he wishes to do so and fighting it there. He used to go to the old board of customs.

Mr. HACKETT: If the minister is sure there is appeal—

Mr. ABBOTT: I am assured by the officer in front of me, who has been in the Department of National Revenue for many years and has charge of this division, that that is and has been the practice. The taxpayer, if dissatisfied with the decision of the department, has the option of appealing to the exchequer court or of going to the tariff board. It used to be the board of customs. The main difference between the board of customs and the tariff board is that the board of customs was a purely administrative body composed of officials, whereas the tariff board is a semi-judicial body. I did not expect this discussion. The section has been in the act for thirty years, and has caused no real dissatisfaction, otherwise we would have heard about it long since; and the purpose of the amendment was to make the wording of the law conform to what was the fact.

Mr. HACKETT: The minister recalls that the counterpart of this section in the Income Tax Act was taken before the courts and it went to the privy council. I am speaking of the Pioneer Laundry case, where the department was acting as court of appeal on an appeal from itself. The minister is familiar with the finding there.

Mr. ABBOTT: I know that case very well. That was an exercise of discretion.

Mr. HACKETT: By the same person who had rendered the judgment.

Mr. BEAUDOIN: With reference to section 12, can the hon. minister tell me if, to his knowledge, certain provinces have levied the taxes which are given up by the federal government through the repeal of Part XV and XVI of the act?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, some provinces have done so.

On section 14—Schedule III repealed and new.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would ask my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, to move an amendment to insert the word "glucose" in this schedule. Glucose is used in the same way as sugar is used, and it seems appropriate to exempt that as well when used in jams or bakery products. It is used extensively in bakery products, which are being exempted from sales tax.

Mr. McCANN moved:

That schedule III of this act be amended by inserting in the second line thereof after the word "yolks" the word "glucose."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. PEARKES: It is with regret that I notice that the act of last year still carries discrimination against a certain type of farm produce. I refer to the last section of the last paragraph on page 5, in which "farm produce sold by the individual farmer of his own production" is free from sales tax, with the exception of "flowers, flowering plants or bulbs" when the sales of such articles exceed $500 per annum. I submit that in certain parts of the country, particularly the district which I represent, flowers, flowering plants and bulbs are regarded as farm produce. The farmers are growing those plants and bulbs out of doors and shipping them to the markets of eastern Canada. To give some idea as to the extent of those shipments, at Easter time this year 72,000 dozen daffodils were shipped out in one week from the Saanich peninsula to eastern Canada. These articles are definitely farm produce. They are produced by literally hundreds of small farmers who grow either the blooms or the bulbs. These people feel that they are heavily discriminated against when these articles are regarded as the only farm produce which should be made subject to sales tax.

I know that during the war these things were regarded as a luxury. We have heard a great deal about other kinds of farm produce being luxuries, such as asparagus, tomatoes, and so forth. I contend that these flowers and bulbs which bring pleasure to thousands of invalids and decorate the churches of eastern Canada at their festivals, should no longer be put in a class by themselves. The amount involved is not large, but the tax causes a great deal of inconvenience to the co-operatives and bulb growers' associations in trying to sort out the produce that comes from the bigger and smaller farmers. I would ask for the total removal of this tax; but if a tax is necessary, could the amount of exemption be raised from say $500 to $1,000 a year? It would help a great many of these smaller farmers who grow flowers and bulbs out of doors. Will the minister give consideration to that?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. We considered again this year, Mr. Chairman, whether any change should be made in this sales tax exemption. Sales tax has been imposed on cut flowers and bulbs for a great many years. The exemption of $500 is in to take care of the small individual grower. Representations were made by the professional growers that it should be made still smaller—that it should be cut down to $100.

Mr. PEARKES: Those representations were made by the hothouse growers.

Mr. ABBOTT: By the growers, yes. They said that a great many veterans were getting into this business, not in a large way but in a fairly substantial way, and that the competition was keen from the ordinary farmer. They wanted it reduced. We decided against making any change. As the committee knows, the principal and virtually the only change in sales tax this year is in regard to staple foodstuffs. I shall be glad to take into consideration the representations made by my hon. friend; and when a general revision of the sales tax schedules is being considered, I can assure him it will receive consideration.

Mr. ISNOR: I was on my feet when section 13 passed; perhaps the committee would be good enough to revert to that section. It deals with the 16-millimetre projector. The 35-millimetre parts are exempt as I understand it.

Mr. ABBOTT: Parts for the 16-millimetre projector are exempt, not for the 35-millimetre.

Mr. ISNOR: It is only the 35-millimetre which is exempt?

Mr. ABBOTT: No. I am told not. The 35-millimetre projectors are taxable, I am informed.

Mr. ISNOR: What is the position with regard to the 8-millimetre projector, the one that amateurs use? For educational purposes I believe it is of real value to us, in Nova Scotia. The use of the 8-millimetre projector in Ontario gives the people in this part of the country an opportunity to see the beauties of the maritime provinces. I have particularly in mind the 8-millimetre projector, the item that is exempted.

Mr. ABBOTT: No. The only exemption is on the 16-millimetre. I am advised that the reason was that the 8-millimetre projector is the amateurs' type. Broadly speaking, the 35-millimetre is the commercial type of projector. The 16-millimetre projector is the one that is used in churches, schools, and the like. It is for that reason that exemption was proposed for the 16-millimetre projector. It is a complete exemption. It does not involve only 16-millimetre projectors used in churches and schools although our information is that they are the major users of this type of projector.

Mr. ISNOR: I do not wish to pursue the matter further, because I did not get an opportunity to speak on the item when it was before the committee. But I feel that a great many more 8-millimetre projectors are used than 16-millimetre projectors. I would ask the minister to look into the matter.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will look into it for next year.

Mr. McLURE: In schedule III, section 14, at line ten, under "fruit, fresh, canned", and so on, tomatoes are included?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

[Mr. Abbott.]

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mutch): We had not come to the consideration of the schedules. We are on section 14.

Mr. McLURE: The hon. member for Nanaimo was speaking on the schedule.

Mr. ABBOTT: Canned tomatoes would come under vegetables.

Mr. McLURE: That is what I should like to know, whether you consider a tomato a fruit or vegetable.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that I have any strong views on the matter. I am fond of them. In any case, both fruits and vegetables are exempted here.

Mr. McLURE: As long as you have it in one way or the other, it is all right.

Mr. ABBOTT: We have.

Mr. McLURE: Of course a tomato is a fruit, not a vegetable.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. McLURE: Those who have studied botany will find that anything produced from a flower or a flowering plant, such as a tomato, is a fruit.

Mr. ABBOTT: A potato too?

Mr. McLURE: A potato is not a fruit.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 15 agreed to.

On section 16—Schedule VI repealed and new.

Mr. PROBE: I want to state briefly my regret that the minister has not enlarged the exemptions under this section. We were talking about 16 millimetre projectors for use in schools, and that is the one point in the whole budget on which some of us should pay tribute to the minister for his generosity. I take this opportunity of thanking him for having listened to the representations made by some hon. members in that regard. In the schedule coming under section 16 there is a slight relief, in that the exemption is extended to cover certain types of watches used by railway men, watches designed for use by the blind—that is, Braille watches; alarm clocks selling for not more than $10, and plated tableware. These exemptions are now effective; but before this section passes I must say I feel the minister has somewhat gone back on the intention expressed when the legislation was passed during the war, placing a tax upon the business of the small independent jeweler, on whom I think it falls more heavily than any other class.

As has been pointed out by other hon. members, there has been a falling off in the business of these people which I think might have been avoided by a reconsideration of the items which should come under this 25 per cent tax. If the minister had considered exempting all articles sold for less than $5 or $10 in these jewelry stores he would have made it much easier for them to carry on, and there would have been much less cause for complaint.

There is the other point in this connection. His department has not evolved a foolproof scheme of collecting the tax. It is collected at the retail level, and there is opportunity for manipulation or evasion on the part of some dealers who may not be as scrupulous as most of them are.

I just want to put on record a final plea or complaint which I think represents the stand taken by most of these small independent merchants. This letter comes from one of them in my own city. I do not intend to mention his name, but he states:

> I was disappointed at the government not removing the 25 per cent tax on jewelry, silver hollow-ware, glassware, and many other lines in a jewelry store while they let many other luxury lines go tax free, such as oil paintings, expensive rugs, yachts, and many other lines.
> The jewelers of Canada realized that this original law was one of discrimination as a war measure, which was what we were told it was put on for, but, now that the war has been over for a few years we think that it should be removed. I hope you will do all you can to assist in its removal.

While I suppose it is too late for the minister to change his mind in that respect for this year, I want to tell him emphatically that he is making it very difficult for dealers in the smaller jewelry items. I have no quarrel with the 25 per cent tax on expensive items, but it is these $5 and $10 items that for these small people represent the difference between making a living and possibly going out of business. I want to repeat my protest in that regard.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall take my hon. friend's representations into consideration.

Section agreed to.

On section 17—Coming into force.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What is the reason for this date, May 19?

Mr. ABBOTT: This is the customary budget provision, that the new rates of tax or exemptions are effective the day after the announcement of the budget.

Section agreed to.

On schedule 1.

Mr. McLURE: I should like to refer to one item I am afraid I neglected when we were going through the sections; that is, internal combustion engines, traction engines and so on. Does this include engines for the boats of fishermen, or are they already exempt from taxation? It is a very important matter at the present time.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told they are exempt under another section. The only change in the law here is with respect to a certain type of engine used in agricultural machinery, such as tillers, where the engine and the body and seat of the machine are all together. The exemption to which my hon. friend refers comes under the heading of marine and fisheries, and it reads:

> Boats bona fide purchased by fishermen for use in the fisheries, and articles and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture, equipment or repair of such boats.

That includes the engines.

Mr. McLURE: But these are not specified on page 7, which just mentions "boats purchased by fishermen for use in the fisheries". To clear up the point I think engines should be mentioned, so that they will know this includes the gas engines in the boats.

Mr. ABBOTT: It has been interpreted in that way for years, and I am told the tax is never collected on those engines. Both the boat and the engine in it are exempt from tax, and have been for years.

Mr. ISNOR: If the minister would be good enough to turn to page 7, I should like to ask a question with reference to rope. Does this apply to all rope and twine used by fishermen?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told all that is involved here is a broadening of language in order to enable dealers to buy it exempt from sales tax. Heretofore it had to be bought direct by the fishermen, and that introduced complications.

Mr. ISNOR: I want to ask another question on that, because I am anxious that the fishermen should clearly appreciate how they stand. From now on there will be no need for fishermen to make application for refunds or drawbacks, as in the past?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. ISNOR: Even if the fisherman buys direct instead of through a dealer, he will be entitled to the same treatment?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

DOMINION SUCCESSION DUTY ACT

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 331, to amend the Dominion Succession Duty Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—"Aggregate net value".

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Has any study been made with the provinces in connection with these changes? This is a field in which the provinces have functioned for a long time, namely the field of taxation by way of succession duties. Has there been any communication with the seven provinces which are a party to the agreement, where it is said that the field has been rented by the dominion government?

Mr. ABBOTT: There have been no such communications.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Does the minister not think there might have been?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know what purpose would have been served by that. It is a relief in taxation, and I cannot conceive of any province objecting to it. The thought never occurred to me. It is true, of course, that in the matter of succession duties the element of surprise does not make much difference. However I did not think of communicating with the provinces.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Everyone seems to use the word "rental" with approval. It is stated that the provinces have rented certain taxation fields to the dominion government. It strikes me that if I had been a party to an agreement in which I had rented something to someone else I would be interested in any changes made.

Mr. ABBOTT: We have also rented the fields of personal and corporation taxes, if one cares to look at it in that way. I do not suppose the provinces would feel that we should have consulted them in the event of our deciding to reduce personal and corporation taxes. It never occurred to me that we could not reduce or increase, without consultation. We have taken over the field for the time being, temporarily, and I assumed that we had freedom of action in that field.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): If I rented you a field you would have no right to tear down my fences.

Mr. HACKETT: I take it from the minister's answer that the vexed question of jurisdiction, as to whether or not the dominion has power to determine what is or is not a succession, has not been discussed with the provinces?

Mr. ABBOTT: There is nothing new in that respect. The dominion has been in the succession duties field since 1941. There has been no change in that respect. The only substantial effect of the proposed amendment this year is to relieve certain taxpayers or those who would otherwise be taxpayers, from the necessity of paying succession duties. No other change is made in the act.

Mr. HACKETT: The debate on this fundamental question has not been pursued during the year?

Mr. ABBOTT: Not so far as I am aware.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Situs of shares.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have an amendment which I shall ask my colleague to move.

Mr. McCANN: I move:

That clause 2 of bill 331 be amended by adding the following proviso to subsection 2 of section 6 set out therein:

"Provided that this subsection does not apply in respect of shares that were the property of a deceased person in the capital stock of a corporation whose business operations are of an industrial, mining, commercial, public utility or public service nature and are, except for management and the designing, purchasing and transportation of goods, carried on entirely in the country of domicile of the said deceased, either directly or through ownership of shares in, or through control of, subsidiary or affiliated corporations."

Mr. ABBOTT: May I explain this by saying that the amendment is to cover what are known as 4-K companies which, although incorporated in Canada, have most of their property and assets outside Canada. As an example I would mention Brazilian Traction. There is no doubt it is desirable that it should encourage the holding of shares by residents of Brazil. But it is felt that there might be resentment in Brazil if Canada were to impose succession duties with respect to the shares of a company whose entire assets, virtually, are situated in Brazil. It seemed desirable, therefore, to make this provision. The reasons which I have given for putting this rule in are to provide that shares of Canadian incorporated companies owned by non-residents shall be taxable in Canada and the tax will be paid to the country of source. We have conventions with the United Kingdom and the United States which conform to this rule, there is reciprocal provision whereby credit can be taken for taxes paid here.

On section 3—Exemption.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Upon what basis was the amount of $50,000 arrived at? Then, would the minister tell us the proportion of estates which have come before the department in the last two years wherein the amount devolving has been less than $50,000 as compared with those between $5,000 and $50,000, and those over $50,000?

Mr. ABBOTT: Answering the last question first, I am told that, in number, about 90 per cent of the estates fall within this category.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Have you the exact figure?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not the exact figure, but it is about 90 per cent. These are the figures given me upon which I prepared my budget proposals. I must take primary responsibility for the selection of this amount. The decision has to be taken at some point. It seemed to me that, in these days, with the somewhat diminishing value of the dollar, a $50,000 estate could still be considered as a pretty small estate, particularly if the widow or the beneficiary has to live on the income. However, that is a matter of opinion.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I was not quarreling with the decision.

Mr. ABBOTT: I appreciate that. I would answer frankly that the figure of $50,000 was one I suggested. I discussed the matter with my officials, at which time different amounts were mentioned. This, however, seemed to me the satisfactory one. As I said in my budget speech, it does constitute a great administrative saving. It means that we are out of 90 per cent of the estates, and at a comparatively small loss in revenue. The total revenue from succession duties last year was about $32 million. My officials estimate that the loss of revenue from the proposed exemption will be about $5 million, or a little less than a sixth.

Mr. KNOWLES: Although 90 per cent of the estates covered are between $5,000 and $50,000; the bulk, in terms of taxable income, must be above $50,000.

Mr. ABBOTT: And in taxable rates; the rates go up rapidly as the amount goes up.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the minister place on Hansard the different groupings as between $5,000 and $10,000, $10,000 and $25,000, and $25,000 to $50,000?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I have that information right here. It is published in the taxation statistics, and it is broken down as to provinces. That is not given yet for the current year. It was published in September, 1947, and the information comes out each year.

Mr. KNOWLES: But is for the taxation year, 1946?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right. The similar statistical publication for the current year is now in process of preparation, and will be ready in August or September.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I would ask for the information for the current year.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to refer to the second part of section 3, which refers to charitable bequests. Why was that change made?

Mr. ABBOTT: I believe it was last year I received a delegation from the various Protestant churches at first, headed by my old friend, Mr. Hamilton Cassels. It was urged that in Quebec and Ontario, where succession duties are still imposed, there had always been complete exemption for charitable bequests, and that this constituted discrimination on the part of the dominion in allowing an exemption for only 50 per cent. I had similar representations from the Roman Catholic church, from heads of universities and others, and I came to the conclusion that the revenue implications were not great. I think I mentioned that it amounted to only $300,000 or $400,000 a year. It seemed to me that our law should conform to the existing provincial law.

Mr. HAZEN: Is there any definition of the word "charitable"?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, there is not. This has been pretty well established as a result of a long line of cases, principally English cases, going back a good many years. It is pretty well known now what is charitable. I know there has been some discussion in connection with income tax matters as to whether such things as community halls and so on would come within the definition. It is some time since I have looked up the cases, but I understand it has been pretty well established by jurisprudence as to what is covered by a charitable bequest.

Mr. HAZEN: The legal definition is quite broad and includes a great deal. I think it would include a society for the promulgation of a particular political doctrine or principle, such as socialism or Conservatism—

Mr. KNOWLES: That last one is charity.

Mr. HAZEN: —combined with moral or moral improvement. That is going pretty far.

Mr. ABBOTT: I agree if that is the case, but I do not think it is the case.

Mr. HAZEN: I understand that a gift to increase the efficiency of the army would be regarded as charitable at law, or a gift providing for the improvement of agriculture; any gift of that kind might be charitable at law and come within the legal definition. It seems to me that the government might be losing revenue it should have if it regards gifts of that kind as charitable and has no restrictive definition.

Mr. ABBOTT: Those are some interesting cases put forward by my hon. friend. I am afraid that no attempt has ever been made in any statute to define what is a charitable bequest or a charitable gift. I think this is one of the cases that could best be left to the courts. I am sure the hon. member for Lake Centre will agree with that.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the same definition of "charitable" apply in this case as applies to the ordinary annual income tax return?

Mr. ABBOTT: Exactly the same.

Mr. KNOWLES: A very interesting suggestion has been made by the hon. member for St. John-Albert.

Mr. ISNOR: I should like the minister to advise me with respect to the interpretation of "institution", such as applying to a school for the blind.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would say that it would clearly come under it.

Mr. ISNOR: If that is the case in this particular act, would it also apply as far as the sales tax is concerned? A recent inquiry was made by the Halifax school for the blind, which is one of only three schools of its kind in Canada, as to whether or not it could be exempted from the payment of sales tax in connection with food and supplies for its pupils. No favourable decision has as yet been given. I am hoping that in the light of the statement made today by the minister, his officials will in future be able to exempt this school from the payment of sales tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: The Excise Tax Act is the statute under which the sales tax is imposed. Exemption from sales tax depends upon the type of institution to which the material is supplied. If it is an institution approved by the Department of National Health and Welfare it would be entitled to sales tax exemption on materials purchased.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 333, to amend the customs tariff.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Duties of customs schedule A.

Mr. HAZEN: I have not had an opportunity to read this bill and I do not know what it contains. However, if I am in order I should like to ask the minister a question. I understand that a certain automobile of British manufacture is sold in the United States for $1,300, whereas the same car sells in this country for $1,800. How is that difference in price explained? Why do we have to pay so much more for that car in Canada than they do in the United States?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not familiar with the particular case to which the hon. member for St. John-Albert has referred. There is a provision in this bill in connection with the rigid requirements of the dumpting duty clauses which enables the relaxation of those clauses where no industry in Canada will be hurt and where the article to be admitted is needed in the Canadian economy. It may be selling in the country of origin for a higher price than the export price to Canada. It may be that the case to which the hon. member has referred is the result of the mandatory provisions of the dumping sections in our customs tariff as they now stand. I could not answer the question offhand, but I will most certainly look into it.

Mr. BRACKEN: Since this bill has just been distributed, is there any particular reason for bringing it forward this afternoon? The hon. member who has just spoken said he had not read the bill, and I think that is true of all hon. members. If there is some particular reason for proceeding with it I shall not object.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no particular reason, and if the committee would prefer I would be glad to hold it over. I would point out that the full content of the bill was printed in the resolution. The reason it was not distributed a bit earlier was the complication in the printing bureau. The schedules are long. With one exception, the amendment I proposed the other night, they are exactly the same schedules as were printed in Hansard on May 18, and printed again in the ways and means resolutions. I am sure that the full text of the bill has been available to hon. members for a couple of weeks. I should like to get ahead with it because we have a heavy schedule of work ahead of us. If I thought there was any possibility of hon. members being taken by surprise I would not insist on it for a moment. If the committee prefers I will still put it over, but I think we can usefully proceed this afternoon, because, as I say, all the material in it has been before us for some little time.

Mr. HACKETT: I have not had an opportunity of looking at the bill. Is this not the bill concerning which discussion of the resolution was deferred because it purported to change the British preference? On that result it may be well that we should discuss first the Geneva agreements.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, that is another bill which was put forward the other day in my absence, and my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, agreed that it should be allowed to stand. This bill merely implements the budget resolutions with respect to the tariff changes. It is not the bill to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. HACKETT: What I am anxious to know is this. If we pass this bill, are we not putting an end to the British preference?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, that is not the case. As a matter of fact, one effect of the amendment which I proposed the other night, when the resolution stage was being considered, maintained the existing tariff rates in regard to this bill, and not the tariff changes proposed under the Geneva agreements. In this bill there is no giving effect to any of the Geneva rates, none whatever.

Mr. HACKETT: No other changes?

Mr. ABBOTT: The only changes we are proposing here are permanent tariff changes, in so far as any tariff change is permanent.

Mr. HACKETT: I recall that at the time of the Ottawa agreements an arrangement was made whereby the preference should work both ways. Canada was given a preference in the British market; and, as a consideration for that, the preference that Britain had in our market passed out of the jurisdiction of the governor in council and became a matter of rigid law which could not be changed except by parliament. I notice in this bill that there are several references to the British preference. It would be unfortunate if, after passing this bill we found out that we had done something which we did not wish to do. I suggest to the minister that he defer consideration of this bill.

Mr. ABBOTT: May I say a word? I am assured by the commissioner of tariffs, who is sitting in front of me, that there is no such change as that suggested by my hon. friend. The Customs Act, which was before the house the other day, is the act which was deferred. This is the Customs Tariff Act. The changes here are simply changes in rates. It is true that there is one other change. We are using the description "most favoured nation" for "intermediate" because, in fact, that is what it has been called for a number of years. That is the only change. There is no implementation of the Geneva agreements as a result of these amendments to the customs tariff.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister look at section 2, which substitutes a new section 4, paragraph (b) of which reads as follows:

Withdraw the benefit of the British preferential tariff, in whole or in part . . .

And so on. I dislike speaking without more opportunity for verifying the accuracy of my recollection, but it is my memory that by the agreements of 1932 we are unable to do exactly what we are purporting to do by this new section 4, paragraph (b). For the reason I suggest to the minister that he afford the committee an opportunity of acquainting itself with the bill.

Mr. ABBOTT: To clear up that point, may I say that the new section 4 is a repetition of section 4 as it now stands in the customs tariff, but where the words "intermediate tariff" appear in the section we are substituting the words "most favoured nation". That is done throughout the section. It seems simpler to do it in that way than to repeal the section and re-enact it. We could have put in the rather complicated amending technique and say , "By substituting the words 'most favoured nation' for 'intermediate' ". I give my hon. friend the assurance that that is the only change of substance, if it can be called a change of substance, in the existing section.

Mr. KNOWLES: I share the concern of the hon. member for Stanstead with respect to the point we came up against the other day in dealing with Bill No. 229. If I thought this bill was asking us to brush off that problem I would support him in asking that consideration of Bill No. 333 be delayed, but I am satisfied that such is not the case. Bill No. 229 has still to come up, and we on this side would like it to wait until the discussion on the Geneva agreements is out of the way. But this bill—Bill No. 333—is clearly just the statutory implementation of the provisions of the budget resolutions with respect to the customs tariff.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is at least one section in this bill with which I do not agree; there may be more, but at least it does not take me by surprise. We were given all this information in the course of the discussion on the budget resolutions preceding the customs tariff. I think we would be well advised to go ahead and deal with it today.

Mr. HAZEN: Does this bill reduce the tariff on a good many items?

Mr. ABBOTT: Quite a number of items, which I outlined in my budget speech, mostly production items.

Mr. HAZEN: Under the Geneva agreements, if we reduce these tariffs we can never put them back again as long as the agreements are in force.

Mr. ABBOTT: We can put them back up to the rates fixed under the Geneva agreements. I think I answered that the other night. We could not put them above the Geneva agreements. If in some cases here, I cannot answer offhand, we have reduced the rates below those stipulated in the Geneva agreements we can put the rates back up to the levels established under the Geneva agreement rates, assuming we approved them, but we could not go above them.

Mr. HAZEN: Have we reduced some below the rates agreed upon by the Geneva agreements?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told that there are a few incidental ones. It was possible to get them down, but they are not very many.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Does this mean that if, in fact, the Geneva agreements are not eventually approved we would have taken an action which would limit our future action in respect of them? That is what I took from what the minister said. I took it that we would have limited ourselves.

Mr. ABBOTT: The action we have taken here does not affect us one way or the other, whether we approve or disapprove the Geneva agreements. If there happened to be tariff changes below the rates stipulated in the Geneva agreements, and we confirmed the Geneva agreements, we could not put them back up again higher than the tariff rates in the Geneva agreements. If the Geneva agreements are not confirmed, our tariff position is exactly the same as it was before the negotiations of the Geneva agreements. We could change our rates up and down as we saw fit.

Mr. HACKETT: I understand that, and I do not wish to restate my position. It does seem to me strange that we should take an attitude on these articles in the tariff before we consider the Geneva agreements. My hon. friend has said that he would have brought forth these reductions in tariff even if there had been no Geneva agreements and that by this legislation he is merely implementing the terms of his budget speech. It is common ground and we should all like to make as much progress as possible, with due respect to the importance of the matters with which we are dealing. But does the minister consider it imperative to proceed with the consideration of this bill before dealing with the Geneva agreements? There is bound to be debate on them; it is just possible that the government, as a result of that debate, might come to a different view with regard to some of the items which are in the bill under discussion. Would it not be wise to discuss and dispose of the Geneva agreements before dealing with this bill?

Mr. ABBOTT: The tariff changes here are pretty minor as compared with the proposed changes in the Geneva agreements. There are some changes here which could not wait until the Geneva agreements were disposed of. We are not deprived of our freedom of action, and if it is desirable in the interests of Canada to change the tariff rates under the Geneva agreements we can deal with them. For instance, the rate on mining machinery, face-loading machines, belt trough conveyers and so on is fixed at ten per cent, and after considering tariff matters we concluded that it would be desirable to make that free.

Mr. BROOKS: If you reduce the rates under this bill, are you compelled later on, under the Geneva agreements, if they are approved, to raise them again?

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend was not in his place when I answered that question, which was asked by the hon. member for St. John-Albert. I repeat, we have complete freedom of action. Certain types of mining machinery which, under the agreement, carry ten per cent we are putting on the free list. If the time comes when we do not want to continue that, and the mining industry is loaded up, we can go back to the ten per cent rate.

Mr. BROOKS: There is no compulsion?

Mr. ABBOTT: No. Our freedom is complete. The proposed changes I am making here are desirable, no matter what happens to the Geneva agreements, and for that reason I submit we should proceed with them.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 330, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I shall have quite a few words to say on this motion, as the minister no doubt expects. Neither the budget nor this bill provides relief, except in one point which I shall mention, in respect of the taxation of co-operatives or the co-operative set-up.

I point out to the house that a submission was made to the government on behalf of the co-operative congress of Canada in March of this year. I wish to quote from that submission or brief for the benefit of the house and so that I may have it on the record. It is a long brief and I will not quote extensively from it, but there are several paragraphs which in my opinion are worthy of being incorporated in the record. I quote:

> This submission is made jointly on behalf of the co-operative union of Canada and le conseil canadien de la co-operation, and at the specific and unanimous request of the Canadian co-operative congress which was held in Saskatoon on March 9, 10 and 11, 1948.
> The congress which is the annual meeting of the co-operative union of Canada, was attended by representation from all provinces. Official representatives of le conseil canadien de la co-opération, the French-language national association of co-operatives, were in attendance and gave approval to the resolutions passed by congress.
> It also should be emphasized once again that the organizations we represent are neutral as to party politics, racial divisions and religious denominations. Because of this fundamental principle, common to both organizations, they are, working together, an effective and increasing influence in promoting national unity in Canada.

That should never be forgotten. Two other sections, in my opinion, should be mentioned at this time. In the submission they point out that co-operatives have been a useful and stabilizing influence during these years of rising living costs, and in that connection they state:

> The past year has been one of rising costs of living. The one and one-half million people whom we represent, grouped in more than 4,500 co-operatives, have been working hard in their co-operatives attempting to maintain fair prices, and in particular they have been effecting savings for consumers of low and moderate income groups. It is submitted that they have also been a check on monopolistic practices and have been of general economic benefit to the country as a whole.

Further on, following the same line, they say:

> Two dangers which are very real today are avoided or at least minimized—on the one hand, private profit monopoly, and on the other, excessive state control.

With these sentiments I agree most heartily, and I wish to go on now to quote from the actual resolution. The resolution consists of ten paragraphs with which I shall deal in turn. Before doing so, however, I should like to put the preamble on record:

> Whereas the Minister of Finance stated in the House of Commons in 1947 that if the amendment to the Income War Tax Act did not work out equitably to co-operatives, consideration would be given to amending the act;
> And whereas the co-operative movement is satisfied that the present act is impractical and inequitable;
>
> Therefore be it resolved: That this congress urge upon the government of the Dominion of Canada to implement the following amendments to the Income War Tax Act and to the proposed revision thereof known as Bill 454. That is to say:

And I start with the first paragraph:

> (1) That the 3 per cent provision be removed.

On other occasions I have spoken of this particular provision in the co-operative field of taxation and pointed out that it was unfair and worked a hardship on the co-operatives themselves.

I want to quote again some statistics that are embodied in the brief presented by the cooperative union, and I am reading from page 5 of their brief:

A year ago we submitted that certain provisions of the present Income War Tax Act were serious hindrances to co-operative enterprises and we dealt at some length with the three per cent feature of the act. It will be recalled that this provides for a minimum income tax on an amount equal to three per cent of capital employed subject to certain deductions. Co-operatives regard this provision as inequitable and it has been the cause of widespread and sustained criticism. It has been suggested to us on various occasions when we asked for the repeal of the three per cent provision that it should be given a fair trial and that we should then report on our experience. We can report that the dissatisfaction has increased and the impracticability of this and other features of the present legislation has been demonstrated. Statistics have been compiled. These support the contention made a year ago that the three per cent provision discriminated against small co-operatives.

To prove that contention, they have given a table of findings after very careful consideration, and I will quote that table. The table is headed and is well set out. The brief goes on as follows:

Records of 224 co-operatives in the province of Quebec were studied. Of these, 173 showed a net saving. Analysis proved that when minimum taxable income was computed in accordance with the three per cent provision, its ratio to net savings increased as net savings decreased; in other words it bore more heavily on small co-operatives, as shown in the following table:

Net savings	Average Total Sales	Average Net Savings	Min. taxable income (3 per cent Clause)	per cent of min. tax. income to net savings
	$	$	$	per-cent
Down to $10,000 or over (10)	480,040.60	28,062.92	562.51	2·00
$10,000 to $7,500 (12)	243,132.13	8,719.77	651.92	7·48
7,500 to 5,000 (19)	224,077.94	6,025.78	490.31	8·14
5,000 to 2,500 (43)	149,679.07	3,625.95	333.17	9·19
2,500 to –0– (89)	79,845.86	1,020.34	164.77	16·15
General average (173)	147,502.63	4,314.99	304.37	7·05

That bears out the statement which this brief presents when they said, as I quoted before, that they have given it a fair trial and find it has caused wide-spread and sustained criticism.

In dealing with that particular section I want to point out, as I have stated many times in this house, that the provision to tax co-operatives on three per cent of the capital employed is arbitrary and unjust. In fact it is a deliberate move to prevent any attempt on the part of people to establish non-profit businesses. I think it was the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) who the other day accused the minister of not having intestinal fortitude. I do not make that accusation against him. I think he has plenty of it, with a capital "G". However I think it is his judgment that is at fault. I think it is a lack of wisdom or a lack of wise advice that is causing him to take this unfair action with regard to co-operative associations.

I just want to analyse for a minute or two, if I may, the sources of capital employed in a co-operative association. It is money invested voluntarily by the members in one of three ways. It may be (a) share capital or membership fee; it may be (b) loan capital supplied by the member; or it may be (c) money borrowed from any other money-lender to carry on the business. With respect to (a) and (b) there is no justification for any government to make a law enforcing a free people to declare a profit on money invested by themselves for the purpose of doing business with themselves. If the investors wish to declare a profit to themselves, that is their affair; and, conversely if they do not, that is also their affair. But this government has arbitrarily forced them to declare a profit. It has done so solely for the purpose, in my opinion, of pacifying its big business friends, the income taxpayers' association and their members.

I want to point this out. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) of this government and the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), who are not here today, who profess affection for the co-operatives on every occasion on which they can give lip service to them, have failed to intercede on behalf of the co-operatives, even though they claim to espouse their cause. There can be nothing but condemnation for them, this government and the Liberal party if this is not changed. I want to say to my hon. friends over to my right, the Progressive Conservatives, I sincerely hope that the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) will be able and willing to persuade his party to oppose this type of law. I hope that some of the Liberal members for Quebec will oppose it when they realize that their French-speaking organization in Quebec has also joined with the other co-operatives in the country in the presentation of this brief.

With regard to money borrowed from other sources—that is, the money which is not provided by the members themselves—it is borrowed on the open market. The price to be paid for it in the form of interest is agreed upon at the time the transaction is made. Therefore it should have no place in the statutes of this country as providing a basis for taxation. The co-operatives pay all the other taxation levied. They pay all their property and service taxes, licence fees and everything else in the localities and provinces in which they are located; but to say deliberately they are profit-making institutions when the people who put their money into them say they are not profit-making institutions, that their profits are distributed among themselves as they save money in the operation of their business; and to pass a law saying they cannot do that in this country, is, in my opinion, a direct negation of democratic procedure and free enterprise.

The next resolution reads:

That co-operatives of the type described in section 4(p) of the Income War Tax Act (section 64 of Bill 454) irrespective of the date of their incorporation, in computing taxable income be permitted to deduct from undistributed surplus limited contingency reserves which are required to be set aside by provincial law; not exceeding 10 per cent of the net earnings in one fiscal year.

That seems to me a reasonable request. The co-operative laws in our province, at least, require certain reserves to be set up for the protection of the membership. It is purely to ensure that the equity and interests of the membership are at all times protected. They do not ask for large reserves. All they ask in this resolution is that up to ten per cent of their earnings may be set aside as non-taxable; and they agree that if the amount of the reserve they desire to set up is larger than the minister feels necessary, any other reserves may be taxed. So I think the request contained in this resolution is reasonable.

Then resolution No. 3:

That the definition of "payment" be extended to include the application of patronage dividends on account of loans or shares or other obligations pursuant to by-law where such amounts are authorized to be applied by the by-law.

It should not be necessary to ask for this. Many members of co-operative associations do not have large sums of money at their disposal. They wish to join the association and partake of what they believe will be the benefits. So they make a commitment; they buy a share, or so many shares, and commit themselves to lend so much capital for the operation of the business. But they cannot pay it all in cash, so they say the balance may be deducted from any patronage dividends payable to them in future as a result of the business they do with their own association. If the by-laws permit this, we consider it only fair that the minister should allow these payments to be made, and that this amount of money should not be taxable in the hands of the co-operative. If the goods bought which created the patronage, however, were used for productive purposes, that would become income in the hands of the individual when he received it.

Resolution No. 4 states:

That in view of the impossibility of estimating taxable income until after the deduction of patronage dividends, co-operatives be not required to pay income tax on the instalment basis.

The instalment payment of taxes may have been a good provision for some. The minister knows, however, or should know—and if he does not I am going to tell him as often as opportunity presents itself, until I am convinced that he does know—that patronage dividends are not declared until the annual meeting. The fiscal year must be completed. Stocktaking must be carried out. There must be an audit of the business. The reports of the stocktaker, the manager and the auditor must come before the board of directors, who, on the basis of those reports, prepare their annual reports to the shareholders. The annual meeting may be called at any time within three months after the end of the fiscal year, depending on when these reports are ready. Of course the directors may recommend certain patronage dividends, but they cannot say those will be paid until the annual meeting has received the reports, analysed them and agreed to or altered the recommendations of the directors. So it is absolutely impossible for the manager of a co-operative association to make an instalment payment on patronage dividends in the middle of the year with any degree of accuracy. Therefore I believe this provision should be included in this bill, or in any other bill the minister may bring in, preferably right away, to get it over with.

Resolution No. 5 reads:

That the term of exemption of new co-operatives be extended from three to five years.

That is not an unreasonable request. It is something the minister should be more than willing to grant. Before the war, three years was a reasonable length of time. All the best people were not employed; you could find competent people, or get those who could be rapidly trained. Material for building and goods for stocking the shelves were not in short supply, as they are now. As a result, a co-operative could establish itself fairly well in a three-year period. Certainly today, however, it requires at least five years; so I believe the minister should bring in the necessary amendment to give them five years free of tax in order to get themselves established.

Then resolution No. 6:

That new co-operatives, in order to have the benefit of said section 4(p) (section 64 of Bill 454) be permitted to have up to 10 per cent of its membership persons other than individuals.

We appreciate the concession the minister has made in this respect in the bill now before us. We are very glad of that, because many local groups such as the board of a community hospital, a school board, a municipal council, or other little organizations, may wish to avail themselves as units of the benefits of co-operative enterprises operating in their areas.

Resolution No. 7 states:

That religious and educational institutions be specifically included in the list of corporations which may be members of a tax exempt co-operative credit society.

This is extremely important. Many churches in our province, of various denominations, give a great deal of time and study to the operation of credit unions and societies. Having certain financial obligations of their own, they not only set an example by helping to form these associations but wish to patronize them as units. I do not think the minister should have difficulty in finding it in his heart and in his mind to embody this resolution in the income tax laws.

Then resolution No. 8 reads:

That associations incorporated or registered under provincial co-operative legislation, or incorporated as a co-operative under dominion authority for the purposes of providing medical and hospital services, telephone services, distribution of electric power, be exempt from income taxes.

Resolution No. 9 is very similar:

That associations organized under provincial statute for providing co-operative housing be exempt from income tax.

Everyone knows we need an extension of hospital services. Only a few days ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) gave an indication of what the federal government was prepared to do in connection with this and other social services, in co-operation with the provinces. Telephone service is necessary in this country now. The way business is done today, the way affairs are carried on, a telephone is no longer a luxury. The supply of electric power is expanding as rapidly as material, power sources and labour can be found. The demand is there. Many local associations like to do these things on a co-operative basis.

The same is true of housing. My goodness, we have had so much discussion of housing in this chamber that no one can be unaware of the great need for it. Many people believe, as they have a right to believe, whether or not others agree with them, that a co-operative housing enterprise can do certain things better than they are being done by other agencies in this country. And if we call this a free country, with the right of free association, free enterprise and everything else, there should be no hesitation on the part of the government in granting this request.

The last resolution, No. 10, states:

That the section dealing with credit unions be clarified to permit societies not incorporated or organized under provincial co-operative statute, but which are registered thereunder or subject thereto, to be members of co-operative credit societies without endangering the tax-free position of the latter.

That is a simple request. There may be an agricultural society registered in a locality, but not incorporated under any act of incorporation. There may be several small local bodies which have local community interests they are trying to promote and develop for the good of the community in which they operate. They may wish to make use of credit unions and credit societies. Yet at the present time they may not become members as units of that credit union or credit society because they endanger the tax structure of the society of which they propose to become members.

I have spoken as briefly as I could, but I do not want it to be felt that, because I have been brief, I am not sincere in what I have said. I have been as emphatic as I could be. If we do not get some relief we shall have to continue this fight both in and out of the house until we get it. Everything asked for in this resolution is justifiable. It hurts no one in Canada, although it may hurt the feelings of those people who think they have the God-given right to run this country entirely by means of profit-making enterprises. If some of us feel that we want to get together and operate our affairs without making profit for anyone, but that we wish to pay decent wages to our personnel, no man in this country should come along and say.

You are going to be a profit-making institution first, and a patronage dividend co-operative distribution institution afterwards. So far as we can see, what we ask for is nothing but fair, if we believe in our democratic, social and economic institutions. I should like to see the minister accept these amendments at the present time, and bring every one of them forward.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take only a few moments of the time of the house to place before the minister a certain problem arising in the Leduc area of Alberta, and in other areas where drilling for oil is taking place.

As the minister is aware, under the Income War Tax Act anyone receiving a royalty from the drilling of oil has been subject to high income tax, whereas those who sell their lands to oil companies for lump sums are not taxed because they are considered to have accumulated capital gain in the process. This definitely works against those who have sold their land on a royalty basis.

Representations have been made to me to place this matter before the minister so that relief may be granted to those farmers who may have been ill-advised in selling their land on a royalty basis. In considering this problem it may be well to keep in mind that farmers who may receive royalties for one or two years may not receive any more at the end of that time. If their present income is taxed away from them they will not be able to provide for their families in the future. I would suggest that the minister fix a certain sum for each child—perhaps $25,000, or something of that kind—at which point a tax could be applied. This would bring the procedure more in line with present-day conditions in connection with people who sell their lands to oil companies for lump sums.

I did not know under what section of the bill this matter could be discussed properly, but I was anxious that the minister give the matter serious attention. I would direct the minister's attention particularly to sections 3 and 32 of the act. I am sure if this matter is given consideration many people around Leduc and Lloydminster would be most grateful.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal briefly with what has been said by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley). He, along with other members of the house, received the resolutions passed by the Canadian Co-operative Union of Canada, and he has read them into the record in detail. Then followed the arguments as advanced by the union in respect of the various recommendations.

The hon. member was scarcely correct in his explanation of the method followed. If he was, then I would say it was the same practice as carried on by every incorporated company doing business. The same thing applies to the individual under the system of private enterprise, which he has condemned. It is because of my keen interest in private enterprise that I propose to answer the hon. member briefly. I would begin by asking him if, in a country such as Canada, he feels satisfied that we should give extra benefits to any particular class doing business. He states that profit-sharing dividends could not possibly be sent out other than at the close of year's business, and gives as his reason that it is impossible to estimate profits.

They must be in business for profit, the same as are people who operate on the system of free enterprise.

Mr. BENTLEY: I never used the word "profit". I referred to the surplus amount.

Mr. ISNOR: That is the same thing. Where do you get your reserve? You get it from the profits you make during the year.

Mr. BENTLEY: We call them savings, because they are our own.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member may call them what he likes. That is immaterial. Every hon. member realizes that when you set up reserves from a co-operative, or anything else, they must come from the year's business operations. You are setting aside that surplus, if you wish to call it that—I call it a profit—and you wish to transfer it into a reserve. Then, the hon. member says to the government, "You must not charge income tax on that surplus"—or, as I say, on the profits. In my view that is a clear case of discrimination.

In addition, the hon. member says that a co-operative should not be obliged to do what every taxpayer in business is asked to do, namely, forward an estimate of his profits for the ensuing year. He does that in advance, and makes his payment in advance. Because of that estimated profit, the companies declare quarterly or half-yearly dividends, and pay these amounts out in advance. If at the end of the year they are unable to pay the stipulated amount, the situation is corrected; in the same way the co-operatives would have to do it, if they followed that procedure.

I say what applies to one person doing business under our system should apply to all.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They are not in the same class at all.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member for Lethbridge is an exceptionally fine talker. I am sure he will listen to me with the same attention I always exercise when he speaks with respect to these matters. I am making the point that if one group of people doing business are obliged to pay income tax out of profits or surplus, then all should do so. There should be fair competition. The group represented by the hon. member for Swift Current is always advocating freedom to carry on business, and I am asking for the same freedom with respect to all business and the manner in which we should pay our taxes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to have the hon. member's opinion on this. Supposing he had an income of $2,000 upon which he would have to pay income tax. Then, supposing he wished to buy $500 worth of goods, but by particularly good management he was able to obtain them for only $400, thereby saving $100. Would he favour paying additional income tax on the $100 along with the tax on his $2,000 income?

Mr. ISNOR: As well as I could follow the hon. member in his remarks I would say that if a businessman or a co-operative under free enterprise invested $4,000, $5,000, or $6,000 in stock and made a profit, after operating expenses were deducted, the remainder should be subject to income tax.

Mr. BENTLEY: The hon. member did not catch the question. He does not understand anything about it, so he cannot answer.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member for Swift Current states that I did not get the question. I said I could not follow the hon. member's rambling remarks.

Mr. BENTLEY: The question was concise, it was not rambling.

Mr. ISNOR: I have given a concrete case. It is quite possible that the hon. member for Swift Current cannot follow the clear example I have given.

Mr. BENTLEY: I can follow it quite clearly. I hope the hon. member sends a copy of his speech to Walter Tucker and Jimmy Gardiner.

Mr. ABBOTT: I hope you send a copy of yours to Tommy Douglas.

Mr. BENTLEY: I will.

Mr. ISNOR: I am always glad to send out my speeches, because I have been complimented on the fact that they contain common sense.

[Mr. Isnor.]

Mr. KNOWLES: This is a matter of dollars and cents.

Mr. ISNOR: Let me say for the benefit of the hon. member for Swift Current that there are a number of co-operatives or credit unions in Nova Scotia and they are headed by exceptionally able men. The fact of the matter is that the gentleman who signed the brief sent to the hon. member was Professor A. B. MacDonald, who recently came from Nova Scotia, as the hon. member probably knows. Professor MacDonald was head of the movement in that particular part of Canada. As I say, he is an able man and he understands this, but that does not prevent me from expressing what I consider to be an honest opinion in regard to discrimination between the two systems, the one advocated by the hon. member for Swift Current and the other by myself.

He has stated that free enterprise does not pay decent salaries because the men in it want to make millionaires of themselves and so on. He said that in his usual flippant manner, but I want to say that I believe the average retailer operating under free enterprise pays as good salaries, if not better—I am inclined to think they are better—than those paid under any other system.

I have often made the statement that my employees cannot be coaxed away from me because I pay the highest salaries in my particular line of business. I do not think remarks about those salaries enter into this picture at all. It is a matter of operating expenses which are deducted from the gross profits. That gives you the net profit at the end of the year, and the government expects that out of that net profit you pay a fair share of the cost of keeping up this country. I think that is a fair statement in regard to the position.

The hon. member contends that all should not be taxed alike. He says that if a certain group gather themselves together and form an association they should be exempt from all taxes, not just for the first three years as at present but for another two years. He says that they should have five years in which to establish themselves in business without having to pay taxes. But in the meantime their competitors are paying toward the upkeep of our country. That is the position, and I leave it to the hon. member to satisfy himself as to whether that is a fair stand to take.

I think I have dealt with paragraph 4. Under that provision the merchant must make a quarterly report, and then he must make a complete return at the end of his fiscal year and pay his income tax on that return.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ISNOR: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was replying briefly to the remarks made by the hon. member for Swift Current in his representations for certain changes with regard to co-operative taxation. I had dealt with various suggestions advanced by the hon. member, and I propose now to touch on the recommendation that the term of exemption be extended from three years to five years. I wish to say that the government went exceptionally far in its original bill in permitting the extension for a period of three years, quite apart from the further extension of five years.

May I briefly illustrate what I consider the unfair position in carrying on a business in Canada at the present time. Mr. A may be doing business under what we term the free enterprise system as we have it at the present time. He buys $100,000 worth of stock and marks it up 25 per cent, which gives him a gross profit of $25,000. From that is deducted his operating expenses of $15,000, which gives him a net profit of $10,000. On the basis of our taxation today he pays into the exchequer 30 per cent, or $3,000, permitting him either to invest in his business or to set aside the balance of $7,000. That is the situation of one merchant, Mr. A.

Mr. B, who is just down the street in the same community, is operating under a co-operative scheme. He is just starting out, or the co-operatives may have come along and said, We will buy your business and put you in as manager. Under that arrangement he buys $100,000 worth of stock and marks its up 25 per cent and makes his $25,000. His operating expenses will be the same as those of the other merchant, giving him the same net profit as the other merchant. Under the present government co-operative taxation scheme he is permitted to put that whole reserve of $10,000 aside. That goes on for two, three, four or five years, and the only charge against it is the three per cent on the increased capital.

To be fair to both men, my contention is that they should enjoy exactly the same system of taxation. My whole case is built on that. Instead of giving the new co-operative store the advantage of three years' exemption, I say it should be put on the same footing as the merchant who operates his own store. Instead of that, the hon. member for Swift Current asks for a further extension from three years to five years. Naturally, on general principles, I am opposed to any such further extension.

In closing, I wish to repeat what I said before. I have no objections to co-operatives forming themselves into groups to purchase for the benefit of their members. If they can effect a saving for their members, that is fine; but I do say that they should carry on business in the same way as the ordinary merchant and not create unfair competition.

May I enlarge on the reserves? In a short time they would have sufficient funds in their reserves to put in a new attractive store front, rearrange their lighting and make a very much more attractive store than the other merchant. If that were done it would be only natural for customers, whether members of the co-operative union in that particular group, or non-members, whom they are permitted to serve, to patronize them, and they will increase their business to such an extent that finally they will drive the other man out of business, although he may be giving just as good service, but because of the increased benefits which co-operatives have they would be in a very much favoured position.

I say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that is my objection to any extension of the exemption from three to five years.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Briefly I want to support the arguments presented by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley) and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), and to reply for a moment or two to the senior hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) who, I know, has presented sincerely his argument from his point of view. His argument and his point of view are conditioned by traditional business practice and by his failure to appreciate the social dynamic of the co-operative movement in this country which is moving toward that new social order so widely advertised by his party during the last election.

In my constituency I have one of the largest co-operative developments, based on population, of any in Canada. We have consumer co-operatives, service co-operatives and producer co-operatives. Consumer co-operatives, Mr. Speaker, are simply groups of people, a mutual association of people, who have joined together in order to purchase goods at cost. After the services are provided for, the profit that the hon. member refers to which is not a profit; but simply an overcharge, is returned to members in the form of patronage dividends. These people are shareholders. The owners and the customers are almost identical. They are not in business to make a profit. They are simply a mutual association of people organized to purchase goods at cost.

With regard to service co-operatives, in my constituency we have a number of co-operatives that have been organized to provide transportation services, to which thousands of men belong. Fewer than ten years ago these men were paying for transportation to work in the plants of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company nearly twice as much as they pay today. They decided to join together to reduce costs. They are mutual associations of working people, joined together to provide transportation at cost, and therefore any patronage dividends which may be obtained at the end of the year is simply a return of an overcharge retained till then in order to make for the sound operation of the business.

With respect to the producer co-operatives, exactly the same situation applies. Groups of fruit growers joined together for the better marketing of their products, not with the idea of making a profit, but for the more efficient marketing of the things that they have to sell. In their case what is actually termed a dividend, is the balance due on previous underpayments. That is the main point. A co-operative is not formed for profit. It is a mutual association for the advantage of those concerned, who are actually doing business with themselves.

Then there is the other aspect of the question. Not only is there an advantage to individuals in savings and service costs, such as in transportation, and more efficient marketing in producer co-operatives, but there are tremendous social services that are rendered by co-operatives in Canada. In my own constituency the co-operative movement has been of great service to the district as a whole. It has done a great deal to improve the morale of the working people in that district.

This association, this working together with a common objective, not with the idea of profit or gain from the ordinary business angle, but with the idea of co-operating for the common good, which characterizes these consumer service co-operatives and producer co-operatives is rendering a great service to the community at large. This is true not only in the economic field but in the field of education as well. All true co-operatives live up to the principles of the association and set aside a certain amount of reserves for educational purposes. I maintain, therefore, that, apart from the opposition economic argument, which I fully appreciate, as presented by the senior hon. member for Halifax, the social desirability of co-operatives justifies the government, even from the free-enterprise point of view, in removing this three per cent tax on reserves, and thereby giving the co-operatives every opportunity to function, not as strictly business organizations but as mutual associations operating to the advantage of the community as a whole.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): I wish to ask the minister a few questions—

Mr. ABBOTT: Do that in committee. This is second reading.

Mr. HACKETT: I beg your pardon. I thought we were in committee. I wish to make it clear that I am opposed to income taxes at this very high rate. I think it is detrimental in many ways and unfair.

During the war, men were giving up their lives; people generally gave up their comfort and possessions, and it behooved those who were not in the fighting line to make every sacrifice to ensure victory. The war is over, and while we still labour under a heavy burden of taxation, it is not well that that burden should be continued at the present rates.

The minister has found it convenient to produce a table which gives the impression that the income tax in this country, in the lower brackets at any rate, is less burdensome than it is in the United States. The question which I wished to ask the minister was whether or not there are any states in the union which have a higher income tax than the state of New York. I have not his facilities for obtaining information, but I am informed that no state has a higher income tax than the state of New York and that many states have a much lower income tax than that state. Even so, even though the income tax of the state of New York which he has added to the federal tax to arrive at an American total were the average income tax of all the states of the union, I doubt very much whether the comparison would be complete and entirely reliable.

We have a range of taxation, a spread of taxation which is not equalled in the United States. We have taxed almost every commodity which it is possible to tax, and I doubt very much whether the United States shows an equally broad range of taxation.

The effect of taxation is far-reaching indeed. In some cases it stifles initiative. It tends to reduce the energy and interest of the individual and it also tends to practices which possibly are legal but not commendable.

I have a pronounced feeling that the continuation of high taxation after the end of the war is but a phase of a malady which afflicts the present administration. They have administered the affairs of everybody so successfully, if one listens to their own account of their administration, that they feel it is almost their duty to continue to devote their paternal inclinations to the welfare of the Canadian public at large.

They cannot give back to the people the administration of their own affairs, because they do not consider that the people are quite capable of administering their own affairs. I have noticed that the minister stated at one point in his speech, as reported at page 4056 of Hansard, that it is the policy of the government to revert to free enterprise as soon as possible. The words to which I refer are these:

> The policy of the government has been to return to a free system and to moderate the inevitable increases in prices at this time by whatever fiscal and other methods are possible under such a system. Neither this government nor this parliament has either the political mandate or the constitutional power to maintain indefinitely in peace time a strait-jacket of controls over prices, production and distribution. Our whole economy has been organized to operate on a price basis by private incentives and private initiatives, not by centralized direction.

Each year the minister, whether it is the hon. gentleman who now holds that high office or his predecessor, has made statements of this kind. But, as the late Al Smith used to say, what does the record show? The record shows that we are still in a strait-jacket. In the month of December, 1945, we enacted legislation which continued controls; and I include taxation as among the most burdensome of controls. It takes taxation to manipulate, operate and feed controls. We passed an act which made it possible to continue the controls in operation. A little later, in 1946, we passed another act called the transitional powers act. Then, in 1947, we passed another act or continuation of the act. Again in 1948, we passed another act. When I say "we", I mean parliament. The House of Commons and the Senate passed those acts. We are still a long way from a free economy and free enterprise. What is the result? The result is high taxes.

We all remember very well—at least I do—that at the first session there was a good deal of boasting done because we had emerged from the war with relatively low prices; that is, it was said they were low compared with those that applied at the end of the first great war. I do not think the government can say much today about the success of its attempt in this field. Prices are higher than they have ever been and there is little indication that they will recede. This is a result of the managed economy; and again, managed economy depends for its life and vitality upon high taxation. The government has tried about everything. The rental of houses in which we live is under control; the money which we need to travel is under control; and the things we wish to purchase are under control; the ambit of our activity is restricted and restrained by what I will call, without any disrespect, this mania of the government to manage the affairs of the individual. Everything has been tried but the old-fashioned remedy of letting people mind their own business and affairs. If the government, in its search for some way out of the difficult general situation in which we find ourselves—and we are short of dollars; we are short of commodities; we are short of freedom—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I must call his attention to the fact that we are on the second reading of a bill entitled "An Act to amend the Income War Tax Act." I believe that he should confine his remarks to the principle of the bill which is before the house.

Mr. HACKETT: Thank you for your suggestion, Mr. Speaker. I was merely seeking, in the broad field which I was covering, to show how universal is the malady which attaches to the practice, a shining example of which is the burdensome income tax which is now under discussion.

I had hoped that the government would reduce the income tax for the people in the lower brackets and for the people in the higher brackets. The people in the higher brackets are not suffering because they have not enough to eat, enough with which to clothe themselves or because they are not able to house themselves; but the general business of the country is suffering through the restrictions that are put upon the normal activities of normal people by burdensome and almost punitive taxation. I had hoped that, in this third budget which has been introduced after the war, some relief would be afforded to all those who suffer under all these taxes, and especially under the income tax act.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Taxes in the country, Mr. Speaker, are dismaying our people. In moving around among the people in the city of Ottawa—and I refer to ordinary people like streetcar conductors and other men with about the same standard of living—I find that they are completely dismayed at the situation which confronts them by reason not only of the income taxes which are being levied but also by the property taxes and the sales taxes levied on foods and other things which they must have. Therefore they feel that they are threatened with being crushed under the burden of taxation. May I tell the minister that I realize, as I believe he does, that he is getting the stage all set for communism when he gets the people in despair; and he has the people throughout this country in despair.

Mr. HANSELL: Preparing for revolt.

Mr. BLACKMORE: He is absolutely driving the people till they simply do not see how they will make ends meet at all. As has been said many times in this house, present prices are completely disheartening, and many kinds of goods are of poor quality. They do not last. Only this morning I was thinking of the matter of shoes. When I was a small boy if my parents were willing to forgo high-class attractiveness in shoes and buy what we might call stogies, they could get a pair of shoes that would stand up for a good many months rough wear on the part of a youngster. You cannot get shoes like that now. You get what apparently are stogies, and in about a month you find your child has gone through a lot of paper and his feet are on the ground. That is a serious matter which must be kept in mind.

Incomes generally are too low. That has been stated a good many times; but in this chamber we must keep constantly before us, and the minister in particular must keep before him, what must be the point of view of the average mind, the average industrial worker, or white-collar worker, as he contemplates the economic situation. We are railing against communism, as though we had an idea that merely railing against a thing would do away with it. Meanwhile we are adopting exactly the policies which must have influenced the people of Czechoslovakia, for example, when they permitted the iron curtain to descend upon them. Those people found themselves confronted with a situation which confounded them, and they said, "Nothing could be any worse than this. Let us give communism a try".

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): They tried the socialists first, did they not?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I suppose they did. Certainly they tried something. With the lack of information prevailing throughout the dominion today, people are just as likely to try communism as anything else, because, after all, they just do not know enough about economics to be able to tell one ism from another.

In addition, there is a great deal of worry about the coming of a depression. I find that the ordinary person with a little money invested or a little property is almost paralysed with anxiety. He asks, "Why is it we must have these depressions? What is the matter with the people in charge? They wring their hands and shrug their silly shoulders and act as though depressions were a sort of act of God and they had nothing in the world to do with them. Well, what is the good of a government if it cannot control depressions? What is a government for if it is not to control depressions, and what is it doing to try to control depressions?" These are the questions that are in the minds of ordinary men.

All these things, Mr. Speaker, have an important bearing upon the measure now before us, which proposes to levy such a heavy rate of income tax on those in the low-income brackets. May I earnestly submit to the minister that there simply must be a change. We just cannot go on as we have been going on. Other conditions are changing. There must be a change in our way of doing things. If the minister can find out what that change should be and propose it, we will listen to his proposal. If he cannot find a suitable change, then I submit that he should be listening to us. And if he does not have a change there will be either communism or chaos; the result will be the same in either case.

In my judgment a change in our financial system will remove the bottleneck which is obstructing a solution of our problem. I have served on committees at various times during the last few years. I am deeply impressed with the feeling of impotence and utter helplessness that seems to prevail among the members of committees. It is as though they were trying to make headway against a hurricane or a giant flood or something of that sort.

Our present financial system provides abundantly for the creation of money to lend for production. Our financial system refuses to create money to spend for distribution. I point out to the minister that in my judgment this is the fundamental fallacy in our financial system today.

Let me repeat that, not only for the benefit of the minister but also for the benefit of the men who are advising the minister. I sometimes get the impression that the minister has so many problems confronting him that he is unable to give these matters the thought and study he would like to give them, and that as a result he has to depend upon the men who are advising him. Then we must talk to the men advising the minister, and they are the ones to whom I am talking now; not only to the minister but, through him, to the men behind him all the way down from the deputy minister to those members of the finance department who are in the galleries here tonight. I am warning them that if they do not make this country's financial system work, they will be to blame. They just cannot tinker around with the sort of financial system we have had during the last century and a half. We are in a world of change. It is their business to find out the kind of change that is necessary in our financial system to meet changed conditions, and to make recommendations to the minister in accordance with their findings.

May I point out again that our financial system readily creates money to create debt, but that it refuses to create money to retire debt. The result is that debt is accumulating throughout the country in every direction; not only nationally, provincially and municipally, but on the part of corporations and other organizations. This kind of thing obviously must not be permitted to go on. Surely our generation has not been brought into being to be crushed by debt! Surely the mere fact that we have had to go through a number of wars ought not to condemn us forever to debt or to taxation that will destroy us in order to pay off that debt. We should be able to pay off debt with goods; and if this country can produce enough goods it should be able to pay off its debts. I give that to the members of the finance department who are advising the minister. If you have not a system under which the production of goods and services in Canada will pay off Canada's debt, then you have a financial system that needs serious revamping.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The hon. gentleman should address the Chair.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Very good; I am addressing Mr. Speaker. In my judgment our financial system must be geared to create money adequately to distribute goods and services, as well as to produce them. It must be geared to produce money adequately, gradually to liquidate our debt in a sound way, not by taxing the people into complete despair but by changing the goods-producing power of the people into money. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), I move this amendment:

> That this bill be not now read a second time but that this house do resolve that the federal government should consider the advisability of setting up a royal commission on banking and currency to ascertain to what extent it might be practicable to finance the affairs of Canada by means other than taxation or debt.

I have no desire to detain the house unduly, but I wish to lay down simply and straightforwardly to the house and the minister nine reasons why I believe it is appropriate that we should propose this amendment, that the house should vote for it and that the government should act upon it.

In the first place, the soundness of the principle of creating money debt-free is recognized by the best informed economic thinkers in the world today.

May I, as one illustration, cite the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, chairman of the Midland Bank in Britain, in a speech he delivered on January 30, 1936, to be found in an article in the London Times of that date, at page 23. In that article he states:

> Additional currency however can now be furnished by the authorities, if they choose to exercise their powers, without reference to the Central Bank's holding of gold. Thus the 19th century which brought into general use a means of payment hitherto scarcely known outside London, brought also the machinery whereby it could be subjected to intelligent control.

That statement, coming from a responsible man like Reginald McKenna, constitutes a challenge to every man who has anything to do with the financial affairs of the Dominion of Canada or any other state in the world, and it constitutes a challenge to members of this House of Commons.

May I submit, following that quotation, that our age must adopt this new means of payment, or perish. It must adopt also the machinery for controlling that new means of payment.

There are other outstanding men whose opinions must be respected. I have in mind, for instance Doctor William A. Shaw. We do not hear a great deal in Canada about Dr. Shaw, and since he made the remarks I am going to quote, perhaps it is easy to understand why.

One thing which I find quite astonishing is that the governments of Canada and the United States, and of various other members of the commonwealth, seem deliberately to ignore the great vital modern truths concerning money. Let us see who Doctor Shaw is. He is editor of "The Calendar of Treasury Records" at His Majesty's public records office; author of the "History of Currency"; author of "English Monetary Writers"; author of "Currency, Credit and The Exchanges during the Great War", published in 1926; "The Coming Reaction: by Legislator"; "Theory and Principles of Central Banking", published in 1930.

I would submit that if a man was able to write as many books as that without falling from grace entirely, and still have a reputation, it might be worthwhile to give some attention to what he has said.

We have also Vincent Cartwright Vickers writing in "Economic Tribulation", which I cited and quoted from on May 24, as recorded at page 4336 of Hansard. Then there is Professor Paul H. Douglas, Professor of Economics of the University of Chicago, from whose work entitled "Controlling Depressions", published in 1935, I quoted on that same date, and it is recorded on the same page of Hansard.

State money has been used successfully, as I argued on May 24, and do not propose to re-argue at this time. The Guernsey island undoubtedly used state money, with success, as I developed on May 24, and as reported at page 4337 of Hansard. Canada, in world war I used the state money principle successfully. Around 1917 she printed $26 million and spent it without increasing the debt or taxation, or the interest load of her people.

How is it we have done nothing of that kind during the recent war? The principle worked well at the time of the first world war. Those who wish to look into the matter and get authority on it will be able to find it in the proceedings of the royal commission of 1933 on banking and currency for Canada. They will find the transaction reported particularly at page 22, paragraph 47. They will find some very interesting material concerning money in that document immediately preceding paragraph 47.

The Bradbury's in England were a form of state money. Doctor William A. Shaw has directed his attention to a discussion of the Bradbury's in several of his books, particularly in "The Theory and Principles of Central Banking", published in 1930, and "Currency, Credit and the Exchanges", published in 1926. Here are some of the things Doctor William A. Shaw says about the Bradbury's; but before quoting that, may I say the Bradbury was nothing but a treasury note. It was printed by His Majesty's treasury, just as the Minister of Finance of Canada might print a $5 bill. The Bradbury's went into circulation in Great Britain and replaced the specie money there, thus enabling Britain to finance a terrific effort to win a war.

Why should people disregard the discovery made in those Bradbury's? This, I repeat, is what Doctor Shaw says at page 72 of the "Theory and Principles of Central Banking":

> By some process of evolution as yet unexplained Great Britain during the years 1915 and 1916, discovered the true principles of state issue of paper money, and benefited unspeakably by it all through the great war. But so little did she understand what she had done that after 13 years of the practice of an automatic self-regulating issue of full price state paper money she surrendered the right once more to a monopoly bank in 1928. A fresh conception of finance and a different type of currency doctrine must emerge before the evil of this retrograde step can be removed.

And at page 75 he says:

> Similarly with regard to the treasury note issue, whilst it was in existence. There was no reason why the individual joint-stock banks should not have gone directly to the inland revenue office for the purchase of supplies of such notes as they required, or for the surrendering of such notes as they no longer required. It would have been quite easy for the separate banks to keep each a separate account at the inland revenue offices for the purpose, and if this had been done the automatic nature of the treasury note issue would have been much more widely understood. It was only as a matter of convenience and economy of working that the treasury decided that the inland revenue should have only one account, namely with the Bank of England, and that the Bank of England should act as the wholesale house for the sale of currency to the retail banks, and for the repurchase of currency from them of such currency as they wished to surrender. So long as the treasury note was in existence, the Bank of England was not an issuer of that currency, any more than it was an issuer of gold coins when our currency consisted of gold. It was only a distributor of the one as of the other. But when the treasury note was suppressed by the amalgamation operation of 1928 the Bank of England became once more the issuer as well as the distributor of the paper money of the nation, and the two quite separate functions of issuing and distributing currency became once again confused.

I realize that hon. members will find it somewhat difficult to follow those passages, but they have a profound meaning right now for us in this parliament and for our government. May I go on?

We create money to lend for the production of goods and services. How freely we create that money may be learned by reference to a book in our own library called "The Canadian Banking System" by James Holladay. I refer hon. members to chapter 10, page 140. I do not quote that, because hon. members may turn to the book themselves.

What we are told there is that the Canadian banking system can take one dollar of gold and on that one dollar of gold create four $1 bills. The chartered banks can take the four $1 bills and create $20 of credit expansion for each $1 bill. This means that on the basis of $1 in gold we can create $84 of currency and credit in the Dominion of Canada. This house passed that law giving that power to the banks and showing that we have no concern at all, no fear at all of the danger of creating too much money so long as the money is created to lend for production.

Why should we be in such mortal terror—we and the members of the finance department—of creating some money to spend for consumption, for distributing goods? Why should we consider it completely sound to create money to lend; yet consider it completely unsound to create money with which to distribute? We must create money to spend for distributing goods.

Every proposal that we increase wage rates in Canada fills the Minister of Finance, every member of the finance department and practically every leading individual in Canada with concern. Their thought is that the minute we raise wages, we increase prices. So we try to keep wages down. The result is that we keep wages so low that it is impossible for the people to buy the share of our goods which they ought to be able to buy and which we know they ought to be able to buy, right from the Minister of Finance down. We know it is absolutely absurd to have people working in this Dominion of Canada, in coal mines, steel factories and other important basic industries for a wage of $2,500 a year and less when we are able to produce goods to permit them to buy $3,500 worth a year if we only knew how to give them the wages with which to buy. But we do not know how to give them those wages, because we now pay increases in wages through the industry which thereby increases the cost of production and the prices of things go up.

I was able to see through that when I was sixteen years old. There must be something really wrong with the mentality of the members of the finance department if they cannot see it at the age of maturity which they have reached.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): They have never grown up.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I suggest to the minister that he should send out a questionnaire to the members of his department, and if he finds that they do not have the capacity to see through that situation and understand how serious it is, and find a real remedy for it, that he hire two or three first-rate economists, not from the London school of economics, to try to show them how to face realities realistically.

Mr. ABBOTT: From the Social Credit party.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is exactly right; the minister is learning. I tell the minister here and now that I challenge him personally to debate the fundamental principles of social credit any time he wants to do so in this house or anywhere else in Canada. I will defy him to disprove a single fundamental principle of social credit. He just cannot do it.

Mr. ABBOTT: Too hard to understand.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is right. The minister had better hire somebody who can teach him and not be stupid enough to imagine that, because he does not understand it, it cannot be understood.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would suggest that the hon. member address himself to the Chair, and I do not think he should use the word "stupid" when referring to any other hon. member.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I will withdraw the word "stupid" with apologies.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not necessary at all.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad the minister acknowledges it.

I go on with the second main reason why this amendment which I have moved is worthy of the most careful consideration of members of the house. The second main reason is that the principle which determines the amount of money that can be safely issued and employed is now pretty accurately understood. That principle is: the amount of money that can be safely issued is the amount necessary to effect the exchanges which require to be effected in the state. May I quote eminent authorities to support that statement? This is a new principle, having been discovered within the last twenty years. It is laid down definitely in William A. Shaw's work, "Currency, Credit and the Exchanges," published in 1926, which I quote from page 66 as follows:

> The episode of the British treasury note experiment transcends in importance any other event in the economic experience of the modern world.

I pause there while the solemnity of those words sinks in:

> On the practical side it has emancipated us from the grip of an imperfect gold currency system and of a costly and cruel bank rate system. In comparison with such an achievement the erection of the federal reserve system in the United States is halting and imperfect. But the treasury note episode has not merely this practical value. It has an equally significant import in the domain of theory. By its means we have evolved the true theory of money, and in the light of this theory our currency and banking legislation need no longer be the process of blindfold groping and experimenting which it has been in the past.
> This theory of money rests upon one basic principle, viz., that goods purchase goods. In this axiom the word "goods" is used for brevity's sake as comprehending all economic goods or services which, as possessing economic value, possess thereby exchange value.

These words will repay going over about three times a day for a month or two until their importance sinks right into the thinking of the people of Canada, particularly those in authority in these troubled times.

Again on page 71 of that book he uses the following words:

> By such a chain of reasoning I think it will be clear that a community's purchasing power is the totality of its exchangeable goods, and that in the case of a paper currency the community's currency is simply a function and not a value or an addition to total values.

Once more I do not stop to discuss the meaning of that passage. I turn it over to the men charged with responsibility who are in the Department of Finance of the Dominion of Canada and in the departments of finance of other nations. They are now trembling at the prospect of depression on one side and at the prospect of war on the other, and have no constructive suggestion whatsoever to deal with either one of the two problems. Yet they cavalierly try to laugh off any suggestion of change in the monetary system with some such unbecoming remark as the minister made a moment ago about its being too deep for him to understand. Well, if babes and sucklings like me can understand it, surely the minister ought to be able to understand it and those high-class professionals he has in the Department of Finance.

The third reason supporting my amendment is: Gold backing has been proved utterly unnecessary in our day. That is shown in the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna's statement which I read a moment ago. It is shown in the statement which I have read from Doctor William A. Shaw concerning the Bradbury experiment. It is established by Canada's world war II experience. May I pause a minute? The minister can tell me whether I am wrong and the members of his department can tell me. Was not every dollar of gold in Canada taken from behind the Canadian financial structure during the war and placed behind the foreign exchange equalization fund? In other words, did not the Dominion of Canada run its whole financial structure all through the perilous time of the war without a single dollar of gold behind its financial structure as far as the domestic economy was concerned? And if they did it in the war, will they tell me why they cannot do it in peace? These questions have to be answered. They must be asked by responsible men and they must be answered by responsible men. There is only one answer, and that is in favour of the proposals of social credit, state money.

Now, Canada's Bank Act, according to a quotation to which I referred from "The Canadian Banking System" by James Holladay, shows the unimportance of gold. When a nation can take one dollar of gold and expand $84 of currency and credit for use in the nation, gold has become an extremely insignificant matter as far as domestic affairs are concerned in that nation. Then again, the suspension of the gold redemption clause by order in council on April 10, 1933, which made it illegal to have gold in the possession of the ordinary individual, proved that there was no gold backing necessary for Canadian money; that its value did not depend on gold backing. We will find an account of that suspension in the Report of the Royal Commission on Banking and Currency in Canada, 1933, at page 22.

Again, it has been and will be argued that the introduction of state money will cause inflation. I do not propose to go into details concerning that matter, because I went into details in my speech on May 24; but let me point out to the minister, as the fourth reason supporting my proposal, that today the nature and the cause and the means of the prevention of inflation are now well understood. This last war finished giving us the information on that matter, and showed beyond a doubt that inflation does not depend on money so much as it does on goods. What I said concerning that matter will be found in the 1948 Hansard at pages 4332 and 4333.

The fifth reason is that successful price control is an established fact. This was demonstrated clearly during world war II in Britain, in the United States and in Canada. It has been said several times that, whereas price control was possible during war, it is impossible during peace, but it has never been proved. Will anyone pretend to me that if the United States, Canada and Great Britain together had decided to use the measures of control of prices which they used during the war, they could not have succeeded in peacetime, especially if they had liberated and stimulated the productive capacities in these nations? I will grant that the necessities of sending very great quantities of food and other goods to western Europe have had a considerable effect, but we could have overcome the ill effects of that sacrifice of goods had we only had wisdom enough to stimulate the productive capacities of this nation, of the United States and of other nations, instead of discouraging our farmers until they disposed of their milk cows, their swine, their beef cattle and their sheep. Whose fault was it that they disposed of all these animals? It was the fault of the governments of Canada and the United States. Surely measures could have been taken to avoid that loss of production which we have had. I say that successful price control is an established fact.

A sixth reason in supporting my proposal is: Devices are now understood for withdrawing surplus money, redundant credit, as Social Crediters call it, from circulation when it is no longer needed in the economy. Two devices are sufficient; one is the taxation device, which is used rather too much today; the other is the just price mechanism as proposed by social credit, into which I shall not go at the present time. Let it be understood that the device is known and understood. It will not be advocated by the London school of economics. That unfortunate organization was never designed to cause men to face facts. It was designed to turn men socialists in the world and prepare the way for communism; to think in terms of scarcity and restriction everywhere instead of abundance and freedom.

Since the six statements I have laid down as reasons are true, we must agree that, as a seventh reason, there can be therefore no conceivable excuse for disregarding longer the systematic scientific use of national money, created by the state and employed by the state.

The eighth reason is: There is a grave reason why we need to be developing national money on the American continent, in Canada and the United States particularly, at the present moment. The need for national money is greater than it has ever been before, for two main reasons. In Canada and the United States we are faced with a problem which thus far our governments have never even attempted to solve, namely the problem of internal distribution. See what the situation was in the United States. I wish we had more detailed facts concerning Canada's situation.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Beaudoin): Order. May I remind the hon. member that his time has expired. Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house to continue?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members. In 1940, according to Chester Bowles in a very fine, illuminating book called "Tomorrow Without Fear", which hon. members will find in the House of Commons library, the lower one-third of the United States people received only nine per cent of the total national income of $76 billion: see page 68. In 1940 the second third of United States people received only 24 per cent of the national income: see page 69. In 1940 the top third received the balance of 67 per cent of the national income: see page 71.

Socialists will say, "Well, let us just swat that upper standard and take the money from those people and distribute it among the people in the lower income bracket". But immediately they will be faced with the problem that the moment they remove the motivation for production, they will encounter production difficulties; they had better face that. There is no use in the C.C.F. indulging in mere fancies until the C.C.F. get into power in Canada and then find themselves faced with grim realities which will cause them to go back on all the promises which they have held out to the people.

The income in the lowest third in the United States, in 1940, was only $527 per family: see page 68. The income of the middle third was $1,311: see page 69. The income of the top third was $3,722: see page 71.

The obvious fact therefore is that the United States had not learned how to distribute goods within their own country. If they knew how to use debt-free money judiciously and to put it into the hands of purchasers in the lower income brackets, giving those people sufficient money to allow them to secure the standard of living to which United States citizens were entitled, they would be able to solve their internal distribution problem.

We have a serious distribution problem internationally; as soon as I have mentioned the details in that connection, I shall close. The fundamental problem which confronts the world at the present time, as every hon. member from the Minister of Finance outward knows, is a shortage of United States dollars. It is thought that we shall be able to solve the difficulty of the shortage of United States dollars by entering into some such agreement as the Geneva trade treaty. Let us not delude ourselves.

There was a shortage of United States dollars during the twenties and that shortage had to be made up by United States foreign lending. Billions a year were lent by the United States to the nations of Europe to enable them to buy United States goods until the people of the United States discovered that it was not a sound method. That is the clearest kind of evidence that there was a shortage of United States dollars during the twenties.

We shall never get the world on a sound economic basis internationally until men learn how to overcome the United States dollar difficulty. If the United States were using the debt-free money system, national money, it is conceivable that she could render available to the nations of the world the United States dollars which she herself needs to make available to them, and Canada could do something similar. If we do not have that system, then there is no use in trying to get the other nations of the world into a position where they can buy our goods, because they will only go into debt, and we shall tax our people and borrow them into debt to buy the goods to lend or give to other people, which unquestionably is an unsound proposal. I will say no more at present concerning this matter.

Let me emphasize in closing, however, that these two great fundamental problems which confront our generation—internal distribution and international distribution—simply defy solution on any other basis than on the basis of state money debt-free.

The ninth and final reason is the urgent need of distributing food among less fortunate peoples. We hear a great deal now about the need of increasing the production of foodstuffs. Sir John Boyd Orr and others speak in anxious tones and terms about that need. I ask hon. members this question. Even if we did increase food production tremendously in Canada, producing twice as much as we require, would that guarantee that the needy people of India, Siam, Java, Malay, China and Japan would get that food? If the United States increased their production of food, under the present system, with orthodox ways of looking at things, it would be impossible for the producers of the food to get it into the hands of the needy, because the needy would not have anything with which to pay for it.

We have to face this fact. While Sir John Boyd Orr and other gentlemen talk about converting us to the idea of increasing the production of food, let us be at work discovering means of distributing the food after it is produced. I submit that no proposal has come to my attention anywhere which will solve that problem except the proposal of state money debt-free.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, for these nine reasons I do not hesitate for a moment to propose the amendment which I brought forward at the beginning of my remarks, that we set up a royal commission to examine into the possibility of financing the affairs of Canada by means other than taxation and debt.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, as the seconder of the motion moved by my colleague the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), I have no doubt I shall be expected to say something. At the outset, I should like to assure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that it is not with any intention of holding up the passage of the bill that I speak. I do not often intrude upon the house. As a matter of fact, I think I have held my peace perhaps a little too much this year. I believe, however, there is something of great importance which I should bring to the attention of hon. members in connection with the principle of income tax.

The bill that is now before us is designed to render the collection of income tax much more efficient on the part of the department, but it holds out no hope whatever of any easement of the burden of taxation. I merely wanted to mention to the minister, for whom, as I have said time and again, I have the highest regard, a number of things which he and his colleagues are doing to the people of Canada and to Canada generally through the taxation policies they are following, more particularly now the income tax.

I realize, of course, that the minister is in a tough spot, a very tough spot. Under present circumstances he has to exact taxes in order to finance Canada. Evidently he and his colleague the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) think they must raise more taxes than they at present need in the government so as to reduce inflationary pressure from more money in the pockets of the consumers than there are goods to buy. The process is like the cat trying to catch its tail. The thing goes round and round and up and up. High taxation inevitably slows up production; slowing up of production inevitably increases prices, and increasing prices inevitably depress the value of wages and salaries earned by the people, so that they have a terrible time trying to catch up, just as the cat has in trying to catch its tail.

Perhaps the ministers do not agree with that; perhaps they do. If not, I suggest that they go among the people or send out reliable experts among them to make a survey of the opinions of farmers, big and little, businessmen large and small, fishermen, workers of all kinds. I will guarantee that the ministers will find that all producers agree that the present level of taxation is about the most effective deterrent to maximum production that could be devised. I have talked to these people and I know that is their opinion.

Perhaps my opinion does not matter, but there are opinions that do matter, and I wish to quote briefly one or two little things mentioned by James F. Lincoln in his book, just recently published, "Lincoln's Incentive System". If some hon. members have not read it I would highly commend it to them.

James F. Lincoln is the president and owner of one of the greatest electrical welding machinery manufacturing concerns in the world, if not the greatest. He ought to know something about incentive and something about taxation, and the picture he presents is very similar to the picture that any good businessman or industrialist in the country would present. On page 39 he makes this statement:

> The attitude of our government has been largely the regimentation of its people in all matters in which it took action. It has also more recently by taxation, which is steeply punitive to effort and ability, not only removed the incentive to develop but made the penalty so great that no one would dare develop to his limit.

I have constantly claimed in this house that the government had not begun to explore the possibilities for increased production. This extract which I have read from "Lincoln's Incentive System" bears out that contention. He said, and I will read it again:

It has also more recently by taxation, which is steeply punitive to effort and ability, not only removed the incentive to develop but made the penalty so great that no one would dare develop to his limit.

Then again on page 71 Lincoln said this:

There must be a new approach to this matter of taxation. We must see it in its true relationship. Taxes are the greatest of all reducers of purchasing power. As a matter of fact, at this time taxes are largely the reason for much of the misunderstanding on wages between the industrial worker and his employer. The worker sees his standard of living going down. His only reaction is that his employer is not paying him enough since he cannot live as he did before. He is working as hard but he is not enjoying the same kind of living.

Those are words that ought to sober a person in a consideration of this whole situation. Again on page 73 Lincoln says:

In a free competitive system, government will have one function and one only, namely, to guarantee the freedom of the individual from foreign and internal aggression. That is the primary reason for the formation of government. If it were not for this need, governments as we know them would not exist. The greatest problem that all peoples have had from the beginning of recorded history is to hold government to its primary function.

And continuing, he said:

History shows that the greatest threat to mankind's freedom has been government. It has always been man's most dangerous foe. People do not usually lose their freedom to a foreign aggressor but to their own government. Confiscatory taxes are always the tool used.

Those things ought to be given most earnest consideration when we think in terms of taxation, particularly of income taxes and the hidden taxes. That is the reasoned opinion of one authority in the United States where the weight of taxation is not as great as it is in Canada, in spite of some opinions that have been expressed to the contrary. My own experience in talking with people in all pursuits of life verifies what I have already said, namely, that high taxation levels definitely discourage production and unduly stretch out the time of danger of inflation.

On other occasions, Mr. Speaker, I have tried to indicate what I have found, by talking amongst the people, is the inevitable result of the continuation of high levels of income tax and others. I could enumerate a good many evils of high taxation such as we have in Canada. Amongst them would be such things as the discouragement of production, which I have already mentioned, and the elimination of private enterprise. Private enterprises simply cannot continue to operate if the product of their own labour is consistently and constantly taken over by government, leaving them with no reserves to meet exigencies as they arise. That is one of the great reasons that socialism is growing, because the state becomes powerful and leaves the individuals weak. I could speak of economic slavery, of the impoverishment of the people and a good many other results of high taxation if I had the time. However I have not the time in which to deal with them now.

I want to repeat what I have said on other occasions by way of emphasizing another evil which is rarely considered as a result of heavy taxation. I refer to the softening of the moral fibre of the people as the growing power of taxation in the hands of a state transforms a social government, as it was in the beginning years ago, into an anti-social state. Those things should be thought over carefully.

In my opinion here are the steps by which that transformation takes place. In the first place, as more and more of the individual's production is taken by the state in the form of taxes, the less he has for his own enjoyment and the greater effort he must make to maintain himself or to better his circumstances. The government for many years have operated on a steadily-increasing tax scale. This has resulted mainly from the fact that they have persisted in following what my colleague the hon. member for Lethbridge so well described to the house tonight as an outworn and thoroughly discredited policy of finance. As long as we persist in following such a policy, then taxation taken as a percentage of the gross national income will continue to go up.

I can remember the day in my own life when taxes in Canada represented less than seven per cent of the total national income. Today they represent somewhere between twenty-five and thirty per cent of it. The tendency is always upward. If the amount of taxes that we were taking from the people continued to rise, and at the same time our gross national production continued to rise in as great proportion or greater, I would not be so much worried about the weight of the burden of taxation. But when the proportion of national production that is taken by taxation by our government continues to increase, then I become concerned.

The second step is this. As ever-increasing proportions of the production of a person's own efforts are taken from him in taxes, the more the dignity of the individual disintegrates under the hammering of want and the fear of want. Anybody knows that is only sound reasoning, because so many of our people are forced through heavy taxation to live on the borderline of poverty or below it, not able to accumulate any reserve to meet the crises in their lives. On the other hand, the power of the state in the process, grows greater in proportion to the wealth it absorbs through the power of taxation. As it grows in power, history has shown that it has become less concerned about the individual welfare of the human resources that it governs.

In the third place, as economic power is transferred by taxation from the individual to the state, the individual often is pressed by circumstances such as illness in the family, crop failure or some other tragic circumstance, into bargaining for some of what was properly his by right of production. In the bargaining process, when he goes to the government for help he is often forced to surrender what has been considered for many years his inalienable rights, and he has to bargain with these for a hand-out from the government, because his independence is gone. The hand-out might be in the form of relief—I have seen it happen—it might be in the form of unemployment insurance; it might be a place on the public payroll or a subsidy of one kind or another. Whatever it might be, Mr. Speaker, the uneven bargain demonstrates that the non-productive state has gained economic strength and great political power through the taxing authority, while the productive individuals in the state have become merely supplicants with caps in hand, and with no spirit left. All too often that is the net result. Everywhere moral disintegration has inevitably followed upon the heels of continued high taxation. I think we saw the ultimate of this disintegration of the individual in Germany, in Russia, in Italy, in Japan, where the power of taxing made a shambles of all the property rights of the people. For further evidence we might go back in history and take a look at what happened just before the fall of the mighty Roman empire sixteen hundred years ago.

The power to tax is the power to destroy human dignity. Unless that power is used wisely and with restraint, it will destroy the moral fibre of the people. We have been witnessing that very process in this country for some time now. Never before in our history has the government of Canada been so nearly an all-powerful state. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this represents the government; an all-powerful state. Never before has such a large portion of the wealth produced by individual Canadians been confiscated by the state. What seems to me ominous about the whole matter is that there is a growing public acceptance of the doctrine that has been preached into our people, that high state taxation is an instrument for social good. I suppose we have the Marxists and socialists, or at any rate those who call themselves such, to thank for that.

I said a moment ago that the most pressing reason why the present government thinks it has to continue this high rate of income tax is that it has created a bad situation for itself by its persistence in following a thoroughly discredited financial policy. I am prepared, as my colleague the hon. member for Lethbridge demonstrated he is prepared, to debate that proposal in detail, namely, that the government of Canada has persisted in following a thoroughly discredited financial policy in this country. I do not think anyone here would wish me to go into the matter tonight, but I plead with the minister as a fair-minded man, and with his colleagues: come out in debate at an early date and show us, if you can, where we are at fault. I do not want to go on year after year advocating and propagating a philosophy or policy that is not right. If we are attempting to propagate a fallacy, let us know about it. We can only know about it if some of the wise men of this country come out and attempt to show us that we are wrong. I am prepared to debate this whole policy. I shall put the ministers right on their own ground by saying the greatest difficulty we face in Canada today arises from the fact that they persist in using, year after year, a thoroughly discredited financial policy; and in giving the Canadian people government, year after year, under it.

If the minister wishes us to support that statement with evidence we are prepared to do so. All we ask is that he come out and meet us; that he and his colleagues come to grips with this situation at the earliest possible moment. Let us settle it once and for all. Take a look backward to the 1930's. The financial policy in effect then was essentially the same policy as we are attempting to follow today. What did it cause? Trade stagnation; unemployment; bread lines; unhappiness; trade war, and general economic paralysis, not only here but in every country that attempted to follow the same policy. Is it reasonable to suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the same system which gave us all those things in the thirties can possibly give us prosperity, peace, business stability and widespread happiness now that the war is over? It is high time we began to ask ourselves these questions and to seek the answers.

I wonder if we can forget the huge debts and the heavy taxes, of a confiscatory nature, that Canadians have to pay under our debt system of finance. And I ask another question: Where is the freedom of the people? I would say a financial system or policy that is worth a hoot ought to guarantee the freedom of the people; but there can be no freedom when the people are forced to come to the government with their caps in their hands, and then to bargain away their freedoms and liberties for a handout, as I have seen them do. Every country in the world that has continued its worship of the debt dollar has been forced to impose very heavy income taxes, such as those being provided in the bill now before us. That has been because of the fundamental and crippling fault in the policy and system itself.

The financial structure we have today has failed for many years to distribute to the people the goods they can produce. My colleague, the hon. member for Lethbridge, mentioned Chester Bowles, a man of some authority, held in high regard to certain circles, and I should like to emphasize one thing Chester Bowles said. He spoke of the income of the lowest third of the people in the United States; and I quote him only because there is no similar work in Canada. We need one, and in times past I have advocated that we have something of the kind of survey done by Mr. Bowles, but it has not been done. According to Chester Bowles, the income of the lowest third of the people in the United States in 1940, which in the aggregate was nine per cent of the total, was an average of $527. That was in 1940, a war year. Can anyone say that the financial policy being followed by the government of the United States, which is essentially the policy followed by the government of Canada, was doing a good job of distribution in getting to the lowest third of the people in that country an average of only $527 a year? That would not give them protective foods such as citrus fruits, milk, eggs, butter and meat. Even the middle third of the people, according to the charts on page 69 of this book, had an average income of only $1,311. How could they possibly live and give their children anything like a decent opportunity for education, cultural growth and moral standing with an income of that kind? The average income in the top third was $3,722. That is getting more like it.

I mention these matters merely because here we have evidence that the financial policies being followed both in Canada and in the United States have failed. Therefore it seems most pressing that we effect a change. When I say it is time to effect a change I should like for a moment to examine two or three statements made in this remarkable little document which was mentioned by the hon. member for Lethbridge, and which, as a matter of fact, I read on his recommendation in the first place. It is called "The United States in the World Economy," and is written by eminent authorities in the department of commerce of the United States. It is issued under the name of Jesse H. Jones, secretary of commerce and O. P. Hopkins, of the bureau of foreign and domestic commerce; and was written by Hal B. Lary, with a foreword by Wayne Taylor, under-secretary of commerce.

As I read this book all the way through, I found time after time these men emphasizing one important point, and I wish to refer to just one or two places where this particular point is emphasized. At page VI of the introduction to the book, these men have this to say:

> The functioning of the American economy as a whole presents some of the most baffling problems. On the solution of these problems, through maintenance of a high and reasonably stable level of economic activity in the United States, the interests of this country and of other countries are most clearly and indisputably united.

Then again at page 200 in a final word, they have this to say:

> Whatever may be the other requirements, stability in international economic relations generally and in foreign exchange rates in particular cannot be assured solely or chiefly through technical financial arrangements—

Such as Bretton Woods, and the like.

> —but must be firmly based on a vigorously and regularly functioning domestic economy.

That is about the fifteenth time I have noticed the same emphatic statement throughout this work. What does it mean? It means simply this; it is a warning by these men who issued the work in 1944 that there could be no hope whatever for a world peace, and for that ideal condition of world trade, unless and until the United States itself began to bring order into its own internal economy and make it work smoothly. The same can be said of Canada also.

And, Mr. Speaker, other experts such as Beardsley Ruml, Professor C. E. Ayres and others have pointed out that the only way in which the internal American economy can be made to work smoothly is to see to it that the financial system is changed, that the financial policy is altered so that the full production of the United States can be distributed in their own land to all of the people.

I was interested in an editorial which appeared not long ago—as a matter of fact, on May 5—in the Montreal Star, criticizing my colleague the hon. member for Lethbridge. The editorial is headed "Discredited Critic". I wish to refer to only one thing the Montreal Star did say. It said:

> We shouldn't like our American friends to think that when John Blackmore gets up in the House of Commons and criticizes the United States he speaks for any substantial body of Canadian opinion. He doesn't. Mr. Blackmore is one of the small Social Credit group whose ideas revolve around a thoroughly discredited theory of funny money.

That represents the expression of a mischievous editorial writer who likes to stick his nose into other people's business and make categorical statements with little possibility of ever having to be called to account. He is one of the type of petrified pip-squeaks—if that is a parliamentary expression—who know nothing whatever about economics, but who are so inflated with the idea that they are qualified to mould public opinion on any subject whatever, that they rush in at every opportunity to make the world think they know something.

This fellow was no exception. I do not know why this editorial writer did light into my hon. friend the member for Lethbridge, but I am sure it was not because anything the hon. member for Lethbridge had said was disproved; because all the hon. member for Lethbridge said on this particular occasion he quoted from authorities in the United States—and from this book, "The United States in the World Economy."

But the Montreal Star comes along and says that the hon. member is a thoroughly discredited critic, and that it does not want people in the United States to think that what the hon. member has said represents a large body of Canadian thought.

I just wish to say this to the editorial writer of the Montreal Star, that I should like to have him produce the evidence that Social Credit is thoroughly discredited. I will be prepared to have him conduct in his own paper a thorough discussion of social credit principles. I will guarantee, Mr. Speaker, that he will demonstrate he has never read them and does not know anything about them. And I shall answer him here from the floor of the House of Commons, or in his own paper.

I am reminded of one of the proverbs that says this: "Who condemns ignorance is twice accursed." That often is the condition of mind exhibited by these so-called authorities who sit in armchairs in newspaper offices and attempt to mould public opinion.

Whoever did discredit the social credit philosophy? I would like to find him. I would like him to trot out his stuff. And if he has not discredited it, then I would like him to keep quiet. But for my own peace of mind I would like to see one real, honest effort made; one that gets down to details and comes to grips with the true facts; one which takes consideration of scientific argument, logic and reason, in an effort to show to the world that social credit principles are discredited. But until that does happen no editorial writer has a right to claim that this philosophy which we advocate is in any way discredited. I say to this editorial writer that, by making sweeping categorical statements in ignorance, he is thoroughly discredited.

In closing, let me say to the minister that I have a full appreciation of what he is up against. As long as he is operating under the present financial policy he cannot do very much more than he is doing. I know that. I know, too, that he is a bright boy; and I know, further, that if he would take just a little while and examine the amazing array of evidence we have already placed upon the record here, I am satisfied he would soon come to a conclusion. Then, if he would step into the House of Commons and give us his honest decision, his honest opinion as a result of having examined those things and of having weighed them carefully, I would be a very happy man.

If I am found wrong, I will be the first to admit to the Minister of Finance that I was wrong. But I must be shown; and until I am shown, I shall continue to advocate the policy in which I believe. I favour the amendment moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Lethbridge, because I feel sure a careful, honest investigation by a royal commission will reveal that there is a better way of financing our government than by continued debt and high taxation.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I addressed the house at some length on the resolution stage of the bill; therefore I have only one or two observations I wish to make at this time.

In the first place, I wish to recall to the mind of the minister that when previously I spoke on the resolution I suggested to him that there were certain reductions and reliefs which he might give. I pointed out that I did believe that budgeting for a certain amount of surplus was sound budgeting, because I believe in the repayment of debt. I suggested, however, that the amount which he contemplated was an unnecessarily large amount; I pointed out that in the year just past his actuality had exceeded his estimate by about $460 million; and while I did not suggest there would be any such overrun this time, I did suggest that I thought it was extremely likely that he had budgeted very conservative, and, further, that the surplus of nearly $500 million which the minister estimated for the forthcoming year was unnecessarily high.

I do not propose to traverse that ground again, but I merely wish to point out one thing. The minister indicated that there were two reasons for this surplus: one the repayment of debt and the other perhaps exceptional defence measures. I do not accept the second one as a proper reason, but I do accept the first, subject, as I said, to the proper amount.

But I wish to make one point. We are now budgeting for a surplus of some $500 million. I think I am correct in saying that the hands of the minister and of the government are not tied in any way, shape or form as to what they shall do with it. I think that was the reason why, when the budget speech was completed, there was apparent unanimity in this house that it indicated clearly one thing, namely, that there would be no election before there was another session of parliament.

We all know why that was. Everyone felt that this was a means of keeping a bonanza, so to speak, available for the electors and to be disclosed to them before the next election. I do not think it can be said that our electors will suppose that this is an act of benevolence on the part of the government, nor will they believe that this is the government's money. Of course they will not believe anything of the kind; nevertheless there is an advantage psychologically in a government being in a position to suggest or to bring forward large taxation reductions and other popular measures just before an election.

Therefore I suggest that it is improper that this large surplus should be left lying about loose, so to speak, when there is no tie-in in any way as to how it is to be used. If the minister refuses to accept my proposals that there should be substantial reductions in taxation at the present time, first, through an increase of the exemptions in the lower income brackets and, second, by way of tax assistance to smaller companies, then there should be some definite and binding indication as to where this money will be spent, so that the government shall not have a fund of $500 million which can be used for what we shall call election purposes.

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, the Income War Tax Act has been amended nineteen times since 1927, and if this bill passes it will be the twentieth amendment of the act. That makes for cumbersome legislation, and a revision is badly needed. Three years ago the then Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) said in his budget speech that a revision of the act was overdue. Last year we were presented with Bill No. 454, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

When that bill was up for first reading, I think it was July 12, 1947, the minister said that it was not intended to proceed with the bill at that session, that it was being introduced for study and suggestions. He said that the main part of the act was cluttered up—I think those were his words—with provisions dealing with exceptional cases which had been gathered together.

He went on to say that, under the law, the minister had discretion in forty-three cases, but in the bill presented last year there were to be only two cases where the minister would have discretion. An income tax appeal board was to be set up to deal with matters in dispute, and that board would be a court of record. He intimated that the bill would come before us this year and said that it would be dated back to January 1, 1948.

For some reason or another that bill has not come before us. I notice in the bill now before us, as well as in Bill No. 454 presented to us last year, there is no mention of increased penalties to be imposed upon those people who are not able to pay their taxes on time, nor is there any provision about people who have reached the age of sixty-five years. I think we should have some explanation from the minister.

Mr. ABBOTT: That bill will be introduced tomorrow. The resolution has been on the order paper for two or three days.

Mr. HAZEN: That is why I rose.

Mr. ABBOTT: I announced in my budget speech that a tremendous amount of work has been done on the bill. We have had representations from all the associations. The bill is ready and, as a matter of fact, I was hoping to introduce it tomorrow at the latest.

Mr. BLACKMORE: With the unanimous consent of the house I would be glad to withdraw my amendment in order to save the time that would be needed to take a vote.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Blackmore) withdrawn.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Mutch in the chair.

On section 1—Co-operatives.

Mr. HACKETT: Can the minister state if the income tax of the state of New York, which he added to the federal tax in order to compare the United States income tax with the Canadian income tax, is the highest of all state taxes? If not, what states have higher income taxes than the state of New York, and what states have lower income taxes?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not have the information with me, but I will bring it down when the other bill is brought in. The official who was in charge of that is not with me this evening. My understanding is that it is a fair average of the state income taxes in the United States. That is my information. I am relying on that.

Mr. HACKETT: I thought the matter was of such grave importance, and the assertion was made with such care and precision, that it would be well to find out how many states in the union have a higher income tax than New York, and how many states have a lower income tax than New York.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be very glad to get that information. I am introducing, I hope tomorrow, the Income Tax Act which we were discussing a moment ago with the hon. member for St. John-Albert, and I shall have that information available and perhaps give it then rather than hold up the committee this evening. I shall have to get the information and give it to the committee when we have the big bill before us, if that meets with my hon. friend's wishes.

Mr. HACKETT: I do not want to delay the bill, but I am going to suggest to the minister that he pick out some clauses which will stand and on which I can get the information. If that is agreeable, we can go on with it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I had rather hoped that we would be able to conclude consideration of these clauses this evening. If we cannot, of course we cannot; but I shall certainly get the information for my hon. friend and put it on Hansard, I hope within the next day or two, which I take it is what he wants. He is seeking information. He has no other purpose in his questioning.

Mr. HACKETT: I do not say that I am actually seeking for information alone. I am under the impression that we have an income tax that is higher than the income tax in the United States. I wish to investigate that question rather closely, because I am one of those who feel that the country at large is suffering from an over-burden of taxation, and if it develops that our income taxation is higher than the income taxation in the United States it would be an added reason for a reduction.

I would call to the attention of the minister that a great point was made of the fact that our taxation was lower than the taxation in the United States.

Mr. ABBOTT: Only in certain brackets.

Mr. HACKETT: I concede that. I do not want to take in more territory than is necessary, but it was a great source of astonishment to me, and when I am astonished I like to find out whether my feeling is based on fact or whether it is just an impression that I had built up out of inadequate information. It would be a matter of great interest to the public at large to know whether income taxation in this country is lower than it is in the United States.

I am going to make this suggestion to the minister. I suggest that he let the section stand; that he do his utmost to get the information tonight, and if we get to the end of the bill and the information is not here I might wait until tomorrow.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps we might continue to deal with this bill section by section, and when we get toward the end of it we shall see how we are getting along. I have given my assurance to my hon. friend and to the committee that I will get the information just as promptly as I can. I think I should be able to have it by tomorrow. I will give it to the house; if not on this bill, on the main income tax bill for which I have a resolution on the order paper. I will give it just as fully as I can get it.

Mr. HACKETT: I wish to make it quite clear that the information will come down in such form as can be readily used in debate.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. The main income tax bill will have to go through the regular stages, resolution, first reading, second reading and so on. I hope it may go to the banking and commerce committee, and then come back here for consideration in committee. The information which I shall give my hon. friend will be available for debate in the house.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Exemption for taxpayer of age sixty-five.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I want to raise a point which will be very familiar to everyone in the committee. Here again we run into our old friend the question of regulation by order in council which appears in subsection 2. I wish the minister would tell us something about the regulations and the way in which this has been managed up to now. Is there a well recognized procedure, or is the thing just dealt with more or less by guess and by God when each point arises?

Mr. ABBOTT: The language here has always been:

Such amount as the governor in council may, by regulation, allow . . .

It used to be by discretion. The amendment proposed here is to cover the case of taxes on income imposed by municipalities.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I appreciate that.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend appreciates the reason why this amendment is being made. Our agreement is that we will extend it not only to taxes imposed by provinces but also to such taxes imposed by municipalities. As I understand it, the regulations have recently been published. Work has been proceeding on them for some time, and it is part of the practice which is being followed in the new Income Tax Act, of doing certain things which require some flexibility by regulation rather than by ministerial discretion. The regulations are made and published in the Canada Gazette. They are available to the general public and, of course, being regulations they may be amended from time to time. Broadly speaking, that is the reason for the use of regulations as distinct from ministerial discretion. When we come to the main Income Tax Act my hon. friend will see the number of cases where we provide that certain things may be done by regulation. In almost all these cases some relief is being given to the taxpayer.

I may say that one of the suggestions we have had from the accountants' association and others is that we may have to return to this much maligned system of discretion. We are trying out now the rather more formal method of regulation passed by order in council and published; but I have quite a lot of reservations myself, that in the effective administration of the Income Tax Act we may at some time have to return to some of these discretions. However I want that to be proved by the process of trial and error, and to show that all discretions are not as bad as they have been painted. That is the reasoning here.

Mr. HACKETT: I want to say to the minister that, while I intend to keep my powder dry, I have not believed that all discretions were irretrievably and hopelessly bad. Somebody somewhere sometime has to make a decision, and with all deference to other systems and to other officials in other countries, such limited experience as I have had in at least two other countries has made me not too prone to criticize my own. For my own satisfaction I should like the minister to tell me just what the difference is between leaving the discretion with the minister, which meant the commissioner, or deputy minister, or the executive head, and the governor in council, because, after all, the governor in council, the cabinet, will not go into these questions. They are going to deal with them very much as a matter of course, and it seems to me that we are getting back to the discretion of the departmental head. I am not terribly disturbed by that, but I am asking the minister if there is any difference between Tweedledum and Tweedledee. That is, between the decision of the governor in council and of the minister.

Mr. ABBOTT: The difference is this, that the ministerial discretion was exercised as discretion in individual cases, and it might, perhaps it did, vary from case to case. Where it is provided, as in this section, that a regulation is to be adopted by the governor in council, there must be formal government action, an order in council passed approving the regulation, and the regulation is published and is available to everyone. That is the difference and I think it is a very real one. In some cases it may prove to be cumbersome. In some cases there might be ministerial discretion which could be exercised as pure discretion and vary from case to case. These have been pretty well eliminated from the new act. That is what I find some difficulty in.

Mr. HACKETT: Suppose the governor in council passed a regulation—I will not attempt to define the type of case—wherein the minister should have complete discretion. Where would we land then?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know whether the power to delegate would exist there. It would be a delegation to someone else of powers specifically conferred by the statute on the governor in council, and offhand I would question whether such delegation could be exercised. I think it would have to be spelled out in the regulation. The particular one here relates to taxes which the provinces may continue to levy, although they entered into an agreement with the dominion.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Can the minister tell me what provinces now impose income tax on logging and mining companies?

Mr. ABBOTT: Ontario and Quebec. I am informed that they have such taxes. British Columbia has a tax, and while I do not know what it is, I am told that it used to be an alternative to income tax and is a tax on gross output. My hon. friend is probably familiar with that.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): It must be a royalty.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not personally familiar with the tax. I am relying on information given me.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Do Ontario and Quebec impose a special tax on mining and logging companies apart from royalties?

Mr. ABBOTT: Mining only. In the case of logging companies, I suppose the taxes are in the nature of stumpage dues and are probably not income tax. Those taxes are in lieu of royalties.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): They must be royalties. I do not think they are income taxes in the seven provinces.

Mr. ABBOTT: Probably not. In the case of mining companies in three provinces they are.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): But that is a royalty per ton, I should think.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I want to come back to the question of regulations. As I understand it, the minister says regulations are in existence and have been published in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told they were completed within the last month or so on this particular section.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Am I correct in thinking that those regulations, as they have been described by the minister, really become by incorporation a part of the statute law for the moment?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a fair statement, yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Then should we not know what they are? Are we not in effect approving this when we pass this section? Is it not just as if it were virtually a part of this section?

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ABBOTT: This section has been in existence for some time, and in passing a provision of this kind parliament authorizes the governor in council to adopt regulations. The only amendment here is to extend the purview of the section to cover municipal cases. We are not putting in any new principle. The regulations have to be made public and parliament can get them in the Canada Gazette, or individual members can read them. It is not, however, customary to debate regulations in parliament. I shall be glad to provide them. All regulations of this kind are made public and this is not a new departure in this act. It is a fairly common practice, and has been for years, for parliament to authorize the governor in council to make regulations on certain specified subjects.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Like the hon. member for Stanstead, I will not take a fanatical position with regard to the regulations. It does seem to me, however, that you might have a situation where, when a section of this kind is passed and the operation has to be worked out, you might need to give a considerable amount of discretion at the outset for operation by regulation; nevertheless you may reach the time when you have worked out a technique and do not need to go on in that way. I should like to know what the regulations are, to see whether that time has arrived, or whether it is perfectly clear that the regulations are still needed for operation. I do not wish to be sticky and to hold the thing up. Perhaps this might be left and dealt with later. I do not mean for the bill to stand, but—

Mr. ABBOTT: I understand that in the case of this particular type of income the definition is complex. Under the old system it would read like this: "Such amount as the minister in his discretion may allow in respect of taxes on income for the year from mining or logging operations." That would have been the old system, because those are taxes which, if the provinces see fit to do so, they can continue to impose, although in some cases they turned over their taxation rights to the dominion. It is obvious that there must be some protection there for the dominion treasury. It is a concession that is being given. We would not have to allow this as a deduction if we did not want to do so, and nearly all these things are concessions to some taxpayer. The technique, for what it is worth, of regulation rather than ministerial discretion has been adopted, and in the larger act which will be before the house and the committee shortly, as those who examined Bill 454 last year will see, there are many cases in which provision is made for the adoption of regulations by the governor in council to cover what was previously handled by straight ministerial discretion.

Mr. HACKETT: I suggest to the minister that he has made a statement which may prove troublesome to him. I do not think the minister wished to say that it is a matter of concession, it should not be. It is a matter of equity, of justice, of balanced treatment between all concerned. I know the minister is capable of stating his own case.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will not quarrel with my hon. friend about language, but it is permitting deductions from what would otherwise be income. It is allowing the taxpayer to deduct, from gross income at any rate, certain items which would otherwise not be allowed as deductions.

Mr. HACKETT: But it is not because the minister likes the taxpayer, or because of this or that accident. It is to do fundamental justice.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course. I do not quarrel for a moment with my hon. friend on that. He is absolutely right.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): There is something else about which I am not clear. Is the reason why this cannot be stated definitely, the fact that the department is dealing with a situation which may change by reason of changes made by other jurisdictions?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is because these taxes can be as varied as the colours of the leaves in the fall.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Perhaps the minister would explain that.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures to impose any sort of tax they like on matters within their jurisdiction. We allow a deduction from future income tax for taxes on income for the year from mining or logging operations. One does not allow deduction of provincial income taxes on other types of operation, as my hon. friend knows. It is only in these special types of businesses. Ordinary provincial income taxes are not and never have been deductible from income for the purpose of dominion income taxes. That is the position. It is pointed out to me that in mining operations it is necessary to distinguish between milling profits, which is a form of industrial operation, and mining profits derived from getting mineral from the earth.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is the minister saying then that if I wish to go into this business or to set myself up in business, I am absolutely at large with regard to taxation? Is the minister saying that I do not know what my provincial tax will be or what my federal tax will be? Or have I misunderstood the minister? Is that what he said?

Mr. ABBOTT: No. If my hon. friend is in the logging business or the mining business, he knows exactly what his provincial taxation will be. But in order to determine how much of those provincial taxes, if any, he can deduct from his income in computing his federal income tax liability, he must look at the federal regulations. In the case of mining those may and do set out the rules to determine what portion of the profits are derived from milling operations in the case of a mine and what are derived from the mining operations. As my hon. friend knows, the reasons for allowing this deduction in the case of mining or logging operations are that those are the development of national resources within the provinces. They are the only two types of operations where income tax imposed by the province is deducted from income tax before federal taxes are computed. In no other type of business is that allowed.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I think the difficulty is that you call a royalty an income tax. It does not strike me that the wording is quite correct. It appears to me to be a kind of checkrein that the federal government has on our provincial governments.

Mr. ABBOTT: Royalties have always been deductible.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I think this must be a royalty. I cannot understand how we can pay a provincial income tax. What is the machinery to collect that? I know we used to have it, but actually I do not see any machinery for collecting it.

Mr. ABBOTT: Ontario collects one, and has for years. It collects a tax on mining profits.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): It does not single them out specifically, does it? These two businesses are not singled out specifically?

Mr. ABBOTT: Under their mining tax act, I am told they do.

Mr. HACKETT: At the risk of trying the patience of the minister, I intend to ask him to take a concrete example in either mining or lumbering, whichever industry he feels better able to deal with, because to some of us it is not quite clear what is the basis of the difficulty which makes the discretion so indispensable in these two cases.

Mr. ABBOTT: The regulations set out a formula as to what constitutes mining profits as distinguished from milling profits. Some concerns operate mines and do not do any milling at all but ship all the ore to another smelter in order to have the minerals refined. Other mines combine the operations. Some formula must be determined for establishing what portion of the total profits of that second type of mine is true mining profits and what portion is profits derived from the operations of a smelter. I am told that is a fairly technical and complicated job. I know that discussions have been going on for some time with the department of mines and resources of the various provinces, particularly I think with—

Mr. HACKETT: Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia.

Mr. ABBOTT: —Ontario and British Columbia, to work out that formula. It is to put that in a formula that it is considered necessary to have this power of determining it by regulation. I think it is reasonable. It could have been by discretion. As I said before, it could be that the minister should allow as a deduction only such portion of the profits as he in his discretion might determine. But following the regulation principle which we are incorporating in the big act, and which I have discussed before, it was put in in this case as well. I think it applies particularly to mining companies, because I do not know that at the moment there is any specific income tax imposed upon logging operations. But it is perfectly open to any province to do so if it wants to, since in our offers to the provinces we have specifically said that income tax with respect to mining and logging operations may be deducted from income for purposes of computing dominion tax. I repeat what I said before, that it is only with respect to these two types of businesses that that special provision applies.

Mr. HACKETT: I can understand that there may be an arbitrary determination that mining and lumbering shall be subject to a tax, but until I have further information I have difficulty in distinguishing any ground for particular treatment of mining, let us say, as compared with wheat growing, other than the aspect of depletion. I am not dealing with depletion at the moment, because that is dealt with in a particular way and according to arbitrary regulations which are applied. A mine brings up its ore, and the rough ore goes through a preliminary refinement which permits the unrefined metal to be shipped to the smelter. There is the mining operation; there is the preliminary milling operation. The smelting is done elsewhere. If it is lead, it is done in Belgium or in one of the remote states of the union. We have no lead smelter in Canada at the present time. How does that differ from the growing of wheat, leaving aside the matter of depletion? The wheat is grown on the land. It is a natural resource. It is mined. Later it is milled and refined. What is there in those two operations that is so entirely different as to make it necessary to enact particular rules in the one case, whereas general rules apply to the other?

Mr. ABBOTT: There may be some similarity. One can grow another crop of wheat or crop after crop of wheat, but one cannot grow another crop of ore. Once the mine is exhausted, there is no more mine.

Mr. HACKETT: Another crop of timber can be grown.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is true that another timber crop can be grown if one follows a suitable reforestation policy, but it is a long-term matter. As my hon. friend knows, depletion is allowed in connection with timber limits and it is not allowed in connection with wheat fields. There is the general principle. It is probably not relevant to this discussion, but in the dominion-provincial discussions this provision was asked for by all the provinces, particularly by Quebec and Ontario where there are large mineral and lumber resources. It seems fair that in the case of taxes imposed with respect to these great natural resources of minerals and timber it should be allowed; and I think one province, Ontario, has urged that the royalty tax in these matters is an unfair and unsatisfactory method of collecting revenue from these resources. Ontario has urged that it should be in the nature of an income tax, and that a mine should not pay anything unless it was making a profit out of its operation. There is a good deal to be said for that point of view. A royalty is paid whether or not the mine is a profitable operation, whereas a form of income tax, because it is a tax on income, is payable only if the mine makes a profit. That was urged quite strongly, and that view has been recognized in permitting a deduction of what is an income tax from the dominion tax, in the case of these two types of natural resources.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I thought I understood this at one stage, but I have slipped back; and I am going to put part of the blame on the minister, rightly or wrongly.

Mr. ABBOTT: These are complicated and technical matters. I do not wonder that my hon. friend is confused.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I may not understand it now, but I want to understand it; and I want to recall to the minister two things he said. At one time I asked if the need for this rather flexible arrangement resulted from the fact that he had to deal with unknown and perhaps unpredictable tax situations in other jurisdictions, and I think the minister said yes. Then I asked whether that meant anyone going into a business of this kind is at large with regard, first of all, to the provincial tax and, then, the dominion tax; and, as I understood him, the minister said, "Oh, no. Everybody knows what the provincial taxes are."

Mr. ABBOTT: If they do not they can find out.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): But if that last statement stands, if I have stated it correctly, I am still in the difficulty mentioned by the hon. member for Stanstead, in failing to understand, why, if you know the conditions, if there is no unknown as far as your imposition of the tax or your relief from the tax is concerned, it has to be left discretionary. I am still perplexed about that, as to why you cannot state now what it is.

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, the provincial authorities may impose a tax on mining companies. They do that under the mining tax acts. They may do that instead of royalties, they impose what is in the nature of an income tax. As I understand it, that is a tax on all the income of the mining company including refining profits as well as mining profits. So the dominion government, in allowing a deduction from its own tax in this case, confirms by regulation a formula which we recognize for the purpose of determining the allocation as between mining profits and refining profits. The section must be made general because, if a province does not have such a law now, it may have one after the next session of the legislature. So we must have an enabling law here which will apply to all provinces; and that is what we have. I have not heard that there is any difficulty in working this out in practice. I am told it is workable, and I believe it to be. The regulations I have been referring to have been worked out as a result of discussions with the mining departments of the different provinces, particularly Ontario, and I am told they are now in very satisfactory shape. I cannot say that from personal knowledge; I am only going by hearsay.

Mr. HACKETT: I am not complaining of any dissatisfaction; I am trying to ascertain where the necessity arose from an understanding between the provinces and the dominion.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am told there was a great deal of discussion in working out the formula. That took quite a little time. There was a great deal of discussion with the officials of the provincial governments in working out a formula, and it may vary a bit, I am told, according to the different types of mining operations. But that is now completed, and I am informed that a reasonably satisfactory formula has been worked out and incorporated in these regulations, which were formally adopted about a month or so ago. One of the practical advantages of the regulation method is that if, in practice, defects are found in this formula, or if they find bugs in it, to use the colloquial phrase, it can be quickly changed.

Mr. HACKETT: There is one other aspect of the income tax act which applies to natural resources, about which I should like to ask the minister. I believe that in the United States the royalties accruing from owners' shares of oil stocks are free from taxation, and that here they are not. I understand that the minister's predecessor had some opportunity of discussing this matter, and I should like such enlightenment on the point as the minister may be able to give.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not that information available just at the moment. I did not know that in the United States the entire amount of royalties received was free from tax.

Mr. HACKETT: Only that portion which the owner gets.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is referring to what are sometimes known as head royalties?

Mr. HACKETT: Yes, that portion which remains with the owner of the service.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am surprised to hear that they are free of taxation, but certainly I shall look into the matter and see what the situation is.

Mr. KNOWLES: Before this section carries, I should like to repeat our opposition to what the government has done under the provisions of paragraph (cc). As we have said previously, we wholly agree with the idea that assistance should be given to Canadians in advanced years. But we feel that if the government is going to give such assistance to the tune of an extra $5,000,000 a year it should have been done in some other way than by this provision. As the minister knows, this gives assistance to those who have sufficient income to be required to pay taxes, and the more taxes they pay, the greater will be their benefit. We feel that, instead, this $5,000,000 should have been given to those on old age pension. An alternative suggestion of considerable merit was made a few days ago in the editorial columns of the Ottawa Citizen, namely, that if the government wants to help people help themselves to a more comfortable old age, some of this money might well have been spent in lowering the rates of government annuities.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I want to ask one question on a matter which is of general interest in connection with the determination of income and the investigations that are carried on in arriving at that income. To what extent are safety deposit boxes searched without court orders? That is a matter on which there is considerable interest throughout the country, and I should like a statement from the minister. This is the first opportunity I have had to bring the matter to his attention in order to ascertain whether or not secret investigations do in fact take place without court orders and without notice to the taxpayers.

Mr. ABBOTT: Officials in front of me say they know of no case in which a safety deposit box has been investigated without a court order. I certainly know of none. Of course it is not in my department; it is in the Department of National Revenue. I have officials of that department in front of me, but they do not know of it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have a point to mention in connection with the determination of income. It concerns farmers' income. I would bring to the attention of the committee a situation which is quite general in Saskatchewan where the Minister of Agriculture on April 2, addressing a Liberal caucus——rapped political informers in income tax hounding.

I shall now read from a letter from a constituent which, if he wishes, I can send to the minister. The letter reveals a situation unfair to farmers. It states:

> I made out my income tax forms. I totalled the whole crop that was threshed on the farm, including wheat, oats and barley; valued it at the market value, and stated the amount in the income column.

[Mr. Knowles.]

In other words, this man gave a complete and full statement. The letter continues:

> Then I deducted all seed and feed which was fed and seeded on the farm, and showed that amount over in the expense column. Now I am told that I cannot be allowed because I actually did not buy the feed and seed.

Now, sir, that mistake has been made by numbers of farmers. The ruling of the department is that, because a farmer made a mistake such as that, there is no remedy. After all, we cannot expect farmers to be bookkeepers. I do not know many lawyers who can fill out their income tax returns with any degree of certainty. We have to go to the accountants to find out how to make out those returns.

Mr. BURTON: And you have to check their figures.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I never got that far, because I never got my return back in sufficient time before I had to file it.

But here are farmers in Saskatchewan and elsewhere in western Canada who, because of their mistake in entering all their production, are being told that, having made that mistake, they have no recourse, and they must pay the full amount of the income tax. I point this out because it is the general condition. It is a complaint I have received from at least half a dozen farmers; and it is one which indicates a position under which officials rely too strongly upon the letter of the law, rather than upon the spirit of the law. I believe something should be done by the minister to tell officials that conduct of that kind can have but one result, and that is the building of a feeling of oppression among the farmers affected. I hope the minister will do something about it. If a farmer is honest in making his return, and over-states his income by placing the total amount of his crop in the income column, then by reason of that mistake in bookkeeping he should not be denied the right to have his assessment made on a proper basis.

Mr. ABBOTT: My colleague the Minister of National Revenue is not in his seat at the moment, but I shall see that my hon. friend's remarks are called to his attention.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Deduction by employee for expenses while travelling on employer's business.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I ask that we go back to section 2? I should like to ask a question in respect of subsection 3. What is the meaning of the introduction of the reference to an employee as a full-time servant in a self-contained domestic establishment.

Mr. ABBOTT: The effect of the provision is that only one claim for exemption can be made in respect of the same dependent.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I read that, but it does not seem to explain anything.

Mr. ABBOTT: If a man who comes within this category is supporting a child in his residence he can claim marital status and a deduction for the child as a dependent, if he employs a full-time servant or housekeeper. If he does not employ a full-time servant or housekeeper he can claim only marital status. He cannot get the full benefit of the marital status and also a deduction for a dependent child unless he is employing someone to take care of the house and look after the child.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre makes a suggestion to me privately concerning the effect of that section, but I shall not put it on record. It does seem to me that it is not very clear.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not new. It was in there before. It was there for years and was omitted last year.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It was not very sensible to omit it last year.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think it would be most inequitable to omit it.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): In other words, you force a man who has lost his wife to incur additional expense because he no longer has a wife. That seems to me a most extraordinary suggestion.

Mr. HERRIDGE: This provides that a married man who can afford to have a housekeeper the year round will have an exemption. I have a case in mind of a man whose wife was ill for six months. He employed a nurse to care for her, but because she was employed for only six months he was not allowed any exemption. On the other hand, had he employed the housekeeper for a year he could have had the exemption. Surely that is not logical.

Mr. ABBOTT: Let us take the case of a widower with one child. He has a home. He is entitled to claim marital status because he is maintaining a self-contained establishment, and he has someone depending upon him in that establishment. That gives him an exemption of $1,500. He can also claim an additional $300, or whatever the amount is, if he maintains someone there to look after the child. If he is not maintaining someone to look after the child, then he cannot claim for the child as a dependent.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I still think the result of it is that you are giving to the man who is much better off an exemption which you will not give to the man who is much worse off. Is that not the plain fact?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): No.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mutch): Shall section 3 carry?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): No; just a minute. We were still to get an answer to a question on clause 2.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mutch): We carried clause 2 and then by consent a question was asked. I again asked if clause 2 should carry, and it was carried.

Mr. ABBOTT: This has been the law for a long time. I must confess that I think it is equitable. It is not a question whether a person is better off or worse off; it is a question of what exemption one should get for a certain status. That was the law for a long time.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I take a hand in this? If you had not this section it would mean that a married man with one child would get an exemption of $1,500, plus the exemption for the child, and—

Mr. ABBOTT: This does not apply to a married man.

Mr. KNOWLES: But what I have said would apply anyway. A married man with a wife and one child gets an exemption of $1,500 plus $300 for the child. Without this new section, a widower maintaining an establishment and having one child, but not having a wife, would also get an exemption of $1,500 for maintaining the establishment, plus $300 for the child. In that sense you would be giving the widower with one child the same exemption that you give to a man with a wife and one child.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. KNOWLES: This is an attempt to straighten it out?

Mr. ABBOTT: If he has someone who cares for the child as a wife would, then he gets exactly the same exemption.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have known of cases like that of a widower with a child who employs a housekeeper. He feels that he should get the same exemption as a married man with one child, and this would do it.

Section agreed to.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Conditional exemption.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think in fairness I should make a brief explanation with respect to this section, and I hope I can get it through before eleven o'clock. Subsections 5 and 6 of section 9 are repealed. As I explained, and as is stated in the explanatory note to the bill, the present averaging provisions in the Income War Tax Act will be replaced by new provisions in the Income Tax Act which will shortly be considered by the house. However, in asking the house to repeal the present measures I should make a statement at the same time outlining the new provisions and explaining how they will differ from the present ones.

First of all, I might explain the reasons for making the change. They are twofold. The change is an attempt to meet the requests of farmers and farm organizations that the averaging should cover a period longer than the present three-year provision. The second purpose is to remove some of the complexities involved in fitting a moving average into a system which at the same time allows the carry backward and forward of losses.

It is proposed that the present three-year moving average be replaced by a five-year averaging on what might be called a "block system". Under the so-called "block system", a farmer may average income for a five-year period and follow it subsequently with a second five-year period, and so on. The averaging periods do not overlap under the block system as they do under the moving average introduced two years ago.

Under the proposed system, the farmer will continue to use the one-year carry back and three-year carry foward of losses. He will then be permitted to average on a five-year basis the incomes as they stand after adjustment for losses.

One of the objections to a period as long as five years was that a farmer would have to wait for this period before securing any benefits from it. It is proposed, therefore, that a farmer may at his option average at the end of four years in the first instance. Thus, the first period for which averaging may be adopted will be 1946, 1947, 1948 and 1949. In the meantime the farmer will be able to take full advantage of the carry backward and forward of losses.

I believe the new system outlined retains all the benefits which could properly have been obtained under the moving average. In addition, and I regard this as perhaps the greatest advantage of the new system, the new system will be simple to understand and use. I am afraid that the present law providing for a moving average to operate in conjunction with the carry forward and backward of losses might have been too complex for successful operation.

I make that explanation now, because the new bill will contain a provision for the five-year average, and I felt that I should not repeal the existing sections in the present act without making that explanation.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Would that apply also to fishermen?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Tax on non-residents in respect of patronage dividends or premiums paid to non-resident on redemption of shares.

Mr. BENTLEY: I want to see if I can get to the bottom of the fairy tale which begins in the middle of page 4 of the bill at line 18. I do not know who wrote this, but it was not Shakespeare. I have been trying to understand this ever since the bill came to me in the mail. Does it mean that patronage dividends apply to the entire balances of shares or capital and that they shall be considered as income in the hands of the member at the time of such application and shall not be taxable again when redeemed? Is that what it means? I want to see if I have interpreted aright this terrible collection and conglomeration of words. If anyone wanted to bring about confusion he has certainly done an excellent job.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is an amendment to sections 9B and 9C and relates to non-residents. This section will have no application to recipients of patronage dividends in Canada. It is being inserted in the non-resident taxing section which, as I explained at the resolution stage, is to impose a fifteen per cent tax on non-resident recipients of patronage dividends. Non-resident recipients of patronage dividends which take the form of an issue of certificate and not cash will be taxed at the time they get the certificate, but not when the certificate is redeemed.

Mr. BENTLEY: The minister's explanation would apply to the new subsection 14.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Sections 7 to 16 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Tomorrow we shall take up the third reading of Bill No. 333, to amend the Customs Tariff. Then the two resolutions standing in the name of the Minister of Finance, being Nos. 16 and 17 on the order paper of today. We shall then move to go into supply, but we perhaps shall not continue in supply because we would like to take up the two resolutions in the name of the Minister of Mines and Resources, being Nos. 10 and 11 on the order paper of today.

Mr. KNOWLES: Before the house adjourns, may I take just a few seconds to do what I think hon. members would like to have done, namely, express a word of thanks to the Canadian Press for the splendid service they have given us tonight in making known the returns of today's election.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, on a question of privilege. We of the house are grateful to the Canadian Press for the service they have given us tonight. The returns that they have sent in every few minutes have pleased some of us more than they have pleased others, but at any rate it has given us a very interesting evening.

I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, Mr. Speaker, but I find that last Monday evening when the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) made a certain interjection in something I was saying I replied in this short sentence with reference to the returns of June 7, "That may be the end of Drew."

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Don't you ever think that!

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Before we adjourn, I should like to say that when these resolutions are carried we shall take up supply, and I believe it will be Justice, Secretary of State and Transport.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 8, 1948

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

LA SALLE CADETS INSPECTION—RIGHT OF MEMBERS TO ACCESS BY CENTRAL WALK

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege that concerns every member of the house.

Last summer, while this house was in session, the La Salle cadets paraded on the lawns in front of these parliament buildings. Later, during the evening, several members of parliament—if I am correctly informed, members representing all the major parties—entered the front gate and attempted to proceed to the House of Commons by the main walk, and were stopped from doing so by a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. They explained to him that they were members of parliament. That made no difference. An order had been issued that everyone must come to the House of Commons around by the east block. Therefore these members had to proceed to the House of Commons via the east block.

I wish at this time, Mr. Speaker, to protest strongly against the placing of members of this house in such a position that they must approach the building after the fashion of the butcher boy delivering a pound of sausage by the tradesmen's entrance.

Last Friday evening the La Salle cadets were parading again on the lawns in front of the House of Commons. I had occasion to approach the house by the central walk, and, when about half way between the front gate and the House of Commons, I was informed that the La Salle cadets were being paraded and reviewed, and that they were being reviewed by a special visitor from Rome, Italy, Brother Athanase Emile. Knowing of the record of the La Salle cadets, and being interested in this distinguished clerical visitor, I stopped about half way between the front gate and the House of Commons and watched the cadets being inspected by the visitor, followed by Colonel Purves of national defence headquarters, a member of the Canadian armoured corps. I saw these cadets very smartly give the general salute to the distinguished clerical visitor.

At that time a staff sergeant of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police approached me and informed me that the grounds for that period were reserved for the La Salle cadets, the officers of the Department of National Defence on the grounds, and the distinguished visitor, and that I would have to move.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am one of those to whom on such occasions the scroll of British history swiftly unfolds itself before mine eyes, and I am quickly moved by such events. Therefore I informed the staff sergeant that I was a member of parliament and as such I did not intend to budge, come what may. At this point the staff sergeant was most courteous, I might say almost embarrassed. He explained to me the reason for the grounds being reserved. I protested and said that this was a violation of the rights of members of the House of Commons, and no explanation from him could alter my determination to stand my ground, since I considered this order an indignity upon members of the House of Commons.

In view of the fact that the zephyrs of indignity can soon become the winds of intolerance, and the winds of intolerance the hurricane of tyranny, I wish to protest most vigorously against this transgression of the freedom of members within the precincts of the House of Commons, and against this indignity to members of parliament, to the representatives of the people, and thus indirectly to the Canadian people as a whole.

VACANCY

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance, for the Minister of Agriculture) moved the first reading of Bill No. 335 (from the senate) to amend the criminal code (race meetings).

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ISRAEL

INQUIRY WITH REGARD TO RECOGNITION BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent). Has the government come to a decision regarding Canada's recognition of the new state of Israel?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The matter is still under consideration.

TRANSPORT BOARD

JUDGE OF EXCHEQUER COURT TO BE CHIEF COMMISSIONER

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On May 26, I gave this house a statement of the legislation which remained to be dealt with during the present session. At that time I indicated that amendments to the Judges Act and to the Railway Act relating to the board of transport commissioners would be introduced.

The proposed legislation has reference to government plans for a reconstitution of the board of transport commissioners in view of substantially increased responsibilities which it is expected that board will have to assume over the coming years. I am now in a position to give further details regarding the proposed legislation.

A single bill will be introduced to amend the Railway Act, the Exchequer Court Act and the

[Mr. Speaker.]

Judges Act, 1946. This bill will provide that a judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada shall hold the office of chief commissioner of the board of transport commissioners. Such judge, however, while acting as chief commissioner, will devote his full time to the work of the board.

The bill will also provide, with a consequential amendment in the Judges Act of 1946, that in the light of the foregoing change the exchequer court will be increased by one, to consist thereafter of the president and four judges, instead of the president and three judges as at present.

The bill will not in any way change the term of appointment to the post of chief commissioner from a ten-year period. When a judge of the exchequer court has served for this term as chief commissioner he will, unless his term of office is extended, return to the exchequer court; his successor will then be appointed from that body.

Colonel J. A. Cross, C.M.G., D.S.O., K.C., whose term of office expires in February, 1950, having been advised of the intention of the government to reconstitute the board as indicated and of the heavy additional duties and responsibilities which the board will be expected to perform over the coming years, has informed me that, in the circumstances, taking into consideration the fact that he is not far from completing his term of office as chairman, it would be in the best interests of all concerned for the government to make immediate arrangements for a new appointment to the post of chief commissioner and has accordingly tendered his resignation as chief commissioner of the board, to take effect at the pleasure of the government.

The government shares the view expressed by Colonel Cross, and intends to accept his resignation, as soon as the bill I have referred to is enacted. I am pleased to be able to announce that the Hon. Maynard Brown Archibald, a member of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, has agreed, when the necessary legislation has been passed, to accept the appointment of chief commissioner of the board of transport commissioners. Mr. Justice Archibald will then be first appointed to the Exchequer Court of Canada and immediately thereafter be named as chief commissioner of the board.

I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to extend to Colonel Cross the thanks of the government for the valuable services performed by him during the years he has been holding the very responsible position of chief commissioner of the board of transport commissioners. A former attorney general of the province of Saskatchewan,

Colonel Cross brought with him to Ottawa years of experience at the bar which have been of great service to him in his capacity of chief commissioner, and which, in turn, have enabled him to perform many years of devoted public service to Canada.

S. S. "ABEGWEIT"

INQUIRY AS TO STRUCTURAL CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. MacNAUGHT (Prince): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has any decision been made concerning the planking of the railway car deck of Q.S.M.V. Abegweit to permit trucks to drive on and off that deck under their own power?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Yes, a decision has been arrived at. For some time consideration has been given to the planking of the lower deck of the Abegweit. After weighing all the arguments for and against, the government has decided that a steel floor over the entire deck should be laid at the earliest possible opportunity. At the present time the Abegweit is in dry dock in Montreal, and should be ready to proceed to Northumberland strait on the tenth of this month. Before the necessary steel becomes available and is installed, a period of seven or eight weeks would elapse, which is far too long a time to immobilize a vessel costing upwards of $7,000,000. Furthermore, the Abegweit will be needed shortly to take care of the tourist traffic to Prince Edward Island.

As an alternative, it has been decided to cover half the lower deck with wooden planks specially treated with fire-resistant paint. Instructions were given to make a start on this work yesterday, and I am advised that to complete this job will require twelve days at the most. The Abegweit would, therefore, be ready to proceed to Borden at the latest on the twentieth of this month, in sufficient time to take care of the heavy summer traffic.

WHEAT

INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF PRICE OF EASTERN SOFT WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. CHARLTON (Brant): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is he prepared to make a statement as to the price of eastern soft wheat for the coming crop year?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): It is difficult to make a statement for the reason that it is not customary to announce a change in price in advance of making the change. However, I will make a statement before many weeks go by.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 333, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Before the motion for third reading is put, Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a brief amendment. It relates to a provision that was introduced into this legislation last Wednesday evening, June 2. Prior to that time the only announcement that had been made with respect to the suspension of certain British preferential tariffs from May 19, 1949 to June 30, 1949, was to the effect that these tariffs would definitely be off for that period of time. However, last Wednesday evening the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), in what I felt to be only a plausible defence of his action, announced that the government had decided to introduce a proviso. That proviso took the form of an amendment to the resolution which was before the house, and it is now in the bill before us. The proviso suggested by the government would give to the governor in council the power to suspend any of those suspensions during the period in question. If I may get away from the use of the double negative which is inevitable in discussing this matter, it amounts to this. Tariffs on certain British goods are now off, and will be off until June 30, 1949. But this new clause, which has been put in, gives the government power by order in council to put any or all of those tariffs, which have thus been taken off, back on during that period.

I have two strenuous objections to this clause. In the first place, we of this group regarded the action of the government in taking off these tariffs as good, as the proverbial step in the right direction. Now that this step has been taken we do not like the idea of a few doors and windows being left open for some of these tariffs to be reimposed. I am sure those on the government side, such as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) and the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch), who voted with us when we tried to strike this clause out of the legislation during the resolution stage, will share our view that the removal of certain tariffs on British goods was a step in the right direction and should stand.

But in addition to my own support of the proposal to remove these tariffs, I strongly object to the government asking parliament to give it yet another power to take action by order in council. I know the government has multitudinous powers by order in council now. I know the very bill which is before us has in other respects powers given to the government to make changes by order in council. But that does not justify giving yet another such power.

I was most interested in the support given my suggestion the other night by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) and others of the group to my right. They took the view that whatever their stand was on the tariff question, they simply could not support this further addition to the order in council powers of the present government; and I was impressed by the way in which a number of my hon. friends to the right took that stand and stood up to be counted with us when the vote was taken in committee.

In fact it would seem that the issue is quite clear. It is not only the issue of the tariff question itself; there is this overriding issue of the request of the government for this additional power to take action by order in council. The other evening when I moved a subamendment to strike out this power, at the resolution stage, I noted that the Minister of Finance said he welcomed the subamendment and was quite prepared to leave it to the house to make a decision. I wondered whether the members of his own party caught the full import of his statement that he would leave it to the house. I thought he was making it clear that the government was not going to stand or fall by his proposal; that in effect it was a free vote, and I thought that many Liberals would vote in a liberal manner when the vote was called. Today, when I move the same amendment at this third reading stage, I hope a free vote will be offered, and that the government will permit the house to decide on this important question.

The reasons given by the minister the other evening for introducing this order in council power related to what he described as uncertain conditions in the world and particularly in world trade at the present time. As I say, that defence struck me as only plausible; for we have all been conscious of the fact that there are in Canada certain interests which did not welcome the removal of these British preferential tariffs for even the short period of thirteen and a half months. We are conscious of the fact that strong recommendations have been made to the government to reimpose all or at least some of these tariffs immediately. Frankly, I do not think the government should leave itself open to the temptation to yield to those representations, by having in this legislation the power by order in council to put any or all these tariffs on once more.

There is the situation, Mr. Speaker. It is not necessary for me to take any more of the time of the house in presenting it. I hope the Minister of Finance will again say that it is up to the house to decide. I hope my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party, led by the hon. member for Stanstead, the hon. member for Nanaimo and others who voted for us the other evening, will succeed in persuading others of their number today to vote with us against this wide order in council power. I hope the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and the hon. member for Winnipeg South will be joined today by other Liberals who will vote against this open door and these open windows which would make possible the reimposition of tariffs on British goods during the period of time between now and June 30, 1949.

To bring the matter to a head, Mr. Speaker, I have pleasure in moving, seconded by my colleague the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis):

> That Bill No. 333 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole house for the purpose of amending section 4 thereof by deleting subsection (c), namely lines 26, 27 and 28 on page 7 of the bill.

If I may read those three lines, they are as follows:

> (c) The governor in council may at any time withdraw, in whole or in part, the suspensions in duty provided for in paragraphs (a) and (b).

The effect of my amendment would be to delete that subparagraph from the bill.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to make one point before this amendment is voted upon. We are now well into the middle of June. It will be at least the end of June, I presume, before we leave here, and in the ordinary course of events we shall be back in a little more than six months. There will be only a short period during which parliament will not be in session. I cannot believe that for the sake of this short period it is necessary to contravene a principle which has been so stoutly maintained here in the past.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I have just a word in reply to what has been said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

This amendment, of course, is the amendment the hon. member moved when we were in committee. Since he has stated his reasons for supporting the amendment, however, I think I should state why the proposed section is contained in the bill.

As I informed the house when the budget resolutions were brought down, suspension of the tariffs on cotton and rayon goods was primarily for the purpose of giving some price relief to the Canadian consumer and assuring adequate supplies of needed textiles. Before taking that action I received assurances from the representatives of the British government, the board of trade, that, in the event of the duty being removed, advantage would not be taken of that by British exporters, to add the amount of the duty to the price. I can see no particular reason for giving the British exporter the benefit of the removal of such duties. I have no doubt that the assurances which I received will be lived up to, but I do not want to give away all my ammunition until I am sure that they have been. The removal of the duty is not to benefit anyone outside this country; it is to benefit people inside the country.

The second point I wish to make is this. Because of the provisional application of the Geneva agreements, we are obliged to extend this removal or suspension of duties to a very large number of other countries—most-favoured-nation countries—which include the majority of the trading countries of the world. I have not received any such assurance from those countries, and it is pretty difficult for me to say what conditions might develop there.

For these reasons it seems prudent to take power, as is done in the bill, to withdraw this suspension if conditions do not work out as we believe they will. As I said when the bill was in committee stage, I do not consider this is a great or vital issue on which the government need stand or fall. All hon. members are free to vote on it as they wish. Personally I shall vote against the amendment, as I did when it was proposed in committee, for the reasons which I have mentioned. I believe it is prudent good business to maintain this reserve.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, before the question is put there is a statement the minister has just made which I think should be clarified. He said that owing to the provisional application of Geneva agreements the government was bound, or felt itself bound, to extend to all other countries the tariff treatment given to Great Britain under this bill.

Mr. ABBOTT: The most-favoured-nation countries.

Mr. FULTON: To the most-favoured-nation countries, and to the seventeen countries which have signed the provisional agreement. My understanding is that although we have provisionally applied the tariff changes agreed to at Geneva, we have not yet applied the agreement. We have not yet agreed to it, and therefore we are not bound, if we make further tariff changes now in favour of certain countries, to apply those changes to all other countries.

With respect I say to the minister that he is slightly confused. I do not think his argument applies to this tariff adjustment. It seems to me the only country with which we have to deal in this respect is Great Britain. If he has had the assurance from that country which he says he had, then surely we can take their word at its face value and believe that they will not take advantage of this adjustment by changing their prices to undersell us. I do not think the minister has advanced any good reason why the amendment should not be accepted.

Mr ABBOTT: We are not in committee, and I know I closed the debate when I spoke—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. KNOWLES: It was my amendment, not yours.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The rules were spoken about yesterday.

Mr. ABBOTT: May I be allowed to reply? —because the hon. member is completely wrong. He is completely wrong when he says this does not apply to the most-favoured-nation countries.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister spoke about rules yesterday.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will abide by the rules, if you will.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to say in support of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It seems to me there is a contradiction in the statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). He said that he has had assurances from exporters in Great Britain that they would not take advantage of this tariff concession so as to raise prices. He went on to say that he had no doubt that that assurance would be lived up to. The minister then introduced a provision to meet a situation which he has no doubt will not arise. It seems to me that that is not very complimentary to the people who gave him the assurance.

Mr. ABBOTT: They might not be able to do anything about it.

Mr. MacINNIS: But there is another factor which enters into the matter. Our customs tariff provides protection for certain industries. It is not an unknown thing for these industries to take advantage of the tariff to raise their prices. Is there any provision in the customs tariff act whereby, should a protected industry use the tariff to enhance prices, the government by order in council may withdraw the protection? Surely if it is to operate in this narrow application, it should operate in the wider field, where there is so much opportunity for abusing the protection given.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think there is a section like that in the customs tariff.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister has made a weak case for this departure from the normal procedure.

INCOME TAX ACT

REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to revise and consolidate the law respecting the levying of income tax and the administration thereof.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Chairman, this is the formal resolution to precede the introduction of what was known last year as Bill No. 454, to revise and consolidate the income tax law. I would hope that the resolution might be adopted with, shall I say, a minimum of discussion in order that the bill may be introduced and distributed to members.

It is a technical and complicated and very lengthy bill. A great many changes have been made since the original bill was introduced last year, following representations received from groups throughout the country, boards of trade, the bar association, the chartered accountants association, and so on, and also as a result of further study by our own staffs. It would be my intention, as I indicated a short time ago, to refer the bill to the banking and commerce committee for detailed study after it receives second reading. I think the bill could be more effectively dealt with there, where taxation experts and the draftsmen could appear and explain the various provisions. A tremendous amount of work has been done on the bill since it was introduced almost a year ago, and I believe it represents a forward step in the revision and consolidation of our income tax law.

Mr. BRACKEN: Is there any change in tax rates or exemptions, or are the changes with respect to administration only?

Mr. ABBOTT: There are no such changes as my hon. friend mentions. Appropriate amendments were made to the Income War Tax Act, which was passed yesterday, with respect to any changes of policy included in the bill. There is nothing in the bill which changes tax rates or exemptions or anything of the sort. It is simply a revision and consolidation, with certain policy changes with respect to administrative detail rather than income tax rates.

As I indicated in my budget speech, the bill will not be given retroactive effect but will become effective from the first of January next, that is for the next calendar year. As the committee will appreciate, that will afford opportunity for further changes at the next session of parliament should others be found necessary between now and then.

Mr. HOMUTH: This bill is lengthy and will require a great deal of consideration. If the minister hopes to get it through the house this session, I suggest that the banking and commerce committee sit as often as possible.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am in the hands of this committee, but if it could be arranged, I would like to have the banking and commerce committee take up the bill early next week and work on it steadily. Many sections will not be controversial, and will simply interest lawyers. The heart of the bill is contained in fifteen or twenty sections, which will require particular attention. They deal with such things as the rules for depreciation and valuation of inventories. They are very important from the point of view of the amount of tax collected, and will require careful consideration by the committee.

The provisions of the bill have already received much study by such representative bodies as boards of trade, the chartered accountants association, the bar association, and others with specialized knowledge. I think the committee will find that the officials who have worked long and hard on the bill will be in a position to explain it thoroughly before the committee. I would hope that we could get it through this year, and I think we should make every effort to do so.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I have one comment to make. Ever since parliament assembled in the autumn of 1945 we have had this bill dangled before our eyes, and the Minister of Finance the first time said he hoped to introduce it the next year. We all know what the task has been. There is no use crying over spilt milk, but it is most unfortunate that it comes down almost within a fortnight of the time we are told the house will adjourn. I appreciate the work that has been done, the fact that various competent people have been consulted with regard to the bill, and that there will be a great deal of expert evidence available. Nevertheless the responsibility will rest with this house, and I feel that to ask the house, in the short time available, to do the job that should be done, is to propose what is almost impossible. It is in the highest degree unfortunate that it was not brought before us many weeks ago.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I want to ask the minister one question, the purpose of which is to help me in something that I should do by telegram. Are there any changes with respect to depletion in coal mines? I ask that question because certain people in the coal mining industry in Alberta are anxious to appear before the committee. This is Tuesday, and I should like to let them know whether they should come or just stay at home.

Mr. ABBOTT: The language of the bill with respect to coal mines is, I believe, as it was. Representations have been made by the coal mining industry of Alberta particularly with reference to the ten cents per ton depletion allowance which they have been allowed for a period of years. There is no intention of changing that, and the bill has not that effect. Whether the people to whom my hon. friend refers should come or not I cannot say, but I do not think it will be the intention of the banking and commerce committee to hear evidence on the bill. I am afraid that if that were so we would have no hope of getting it through this year. There has been full opportunity for making representations, and I do not think that would be necessary. There is no intention of making any change, nor will there be any change in the method of allowing depletion as it has prevailed, going back as far as 1917, so far as coal mines are concerned.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then there is no occasion for them to come?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not think really that there is any.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): In the bill as presented last year there was a change, because it was limited to certain initial costs which really did not mean anything.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend will see when he looks at the bill that the language of that section has been changed.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then I can telegraph them not to come.

Mr. ABBOTT: You had better wait until you see the bill, but I think you will find the language of the bill satisfactory.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Thanks for the information.

Mr. FULTON: In view of what the minister has said, that it is not expected that further evidence will be heard before the banking and commerce committee, may I ask whether he can make any comment on the extent to which representations by the Co-operative Union of Canada have been accepted in the bill in its present form?

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no change in the bill in its present form so far as matters of policy are concerned. As I said in answer to the leader of the opposition, the job of this bill is not primarily to change existing tax policy. It is to consolidate, simplify and improve the arrangement of the bill rather than to make a wholesale revision of the taxing provisions. Any change that is to be made with respect to taxation of co-operatives or any other enterprise in this country should be made here in the house as a matter of budget presentation and not in a revision of a bill of this kind. I would not undertake to do that.

Mr. GILLIS: The minister says he is in a great hurry to get this bill before the banking and commerce committee, and he would like to have it put through the house at this session if possible. On the other hand he tells us that the committee will have no power to make any changes whatever in the bill. The bill is merely going to the committee so as to give experts an opportunity of explaining it to the lawyers and those who may be administering it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not say they would not have power to make changes in the bill.

Mr. GILLIS: I understood the minister to say that a few moments ago.

Mr. ABBOTT: No committee of this house can change taxation provisions, but it may change administrative provisions.

Mr. GILLIS: And that does not change anything. The taxes remain the same. The co-operatives are still taxed, and the depletion allowance for coal mines is not changed. Nothing is changed, but the mechanics are simplified for those who will administer the bill. It must be a pretty complicated bill. My object in rising is simply to make this point. If we are not going to change anything in the banking and commerce committee, so far as policy is concerned, why waste time sending it to the committee? Why should we not go to work on it right here where we may make changes, and after we have studied the basic laws contained in the bill, then, if it is desired to send it to another committee to have the mechanics clarified, that can be done. Would that not be the quicker way of doing it?

Mr. ABBOTT: I had thought of that. There are two alternatives—to have it considered in committee of the whole or to refer it to the banking and commerce committee. The banking and commerce committee can make any amendments that we can make in committee of the whole. There is no difference so far as amendments are concerned. The banking and commerce committee would be free to recommend amendments just as the committee here can; but my main purpose in sending it to the banking and commerce committee was to enable interested members to get explanations of the various sections direct from the tax officials of my department and officers of the ministry of justice, rather than having the information relayed through me in the house. It seemed to me to be the more efficient way of dealing with this rather technical bill—because it is technical. Any income tax statute, I do not care in what country, where there is a system of progressive income tax, is bound to be complicated, and the reason it is complicated is that you try to allow for deductions and exemptions and all that sort of thing so that the tax will be in relation to ability to pay. You could make a very simple income tax law if you did not have exemptions and deductions for medical expenses, depletion, depreciation and all these other things, which are intended to make the law more equitable. That is why it is complicated. I speak whereof I know because I have had occasion in the practice of my profession to look these acts over, and I really think that the work of considering this consolidation and revision, which was intended to be primarily a simplifying job, to make it more easily understood and applied by the general public, could be better undertaken in the banking and commerce committee than in the house. I have no objection, but I really think that it would be better if we sent it to the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not going to argue the point with the minister. He has not convinced me that it would not be more expeditious to deal with it in committee here, the only place where we can change the basic set-up. However, I wish to ask him a question in connection with the depletion allowance for coal mines. I have had something to do with that. Large corporations across the country get hold of leases—the Hudson's Bay company in the west, Dosco in the east, Canadian Collieries in British Columbia—and they have large coal deposits which they do not operate. They sublease the coal to a small operator who then invests the capital and carries on the operation, but the large concern, which has nothing to do with the development, is allowed that ten-cent depletion on each ton of coal. I have made representations to the finance department during the war and at other times on that very point. We are trying to have that situation changed so that the actual operator should get this allowance, not the lessor or the man who leases or subleases that section of his mining set-up to a smaller operator. It is completely unfair and unjust that the lessor should get the depletion allowance; it should go to the one who is actually carrying on the operation. Has the minister given any thought to the matter? He was not in that department at the time. The present Minister of Justice was then Minister of Finance. But we did not get anywhere with the suggestion. It should be given some thought.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not too familiar with the manner in which depletion is handled. I know that for a great many years a certain allowance has been paid out for depletion of coal mines. It now falls primarily within the jurisdiction of the Department of National Revenue, although policy matters of course would be settled in the Department of Finance. No doubt I shall be more familiar with it before the bill gets through the committee.

Mr. JACKMAN: I think we are all glad to see some codification of the Income Tax Act of 1917 and subsequent amendments. Would any serious inconvenience or embarrassment be caused to the country or the taxpayers generally if we left this bill over until the next session of parliament? We are about to have three sittings a day, starting this Wednesday. The estimates are going through, and some of us would like to pay a little attention to them on behalf of our constituents. Other committees are still sitting, including the prices committee, the personnel of which includes members who would be interested in this bill, and they cannot be in two places at the same time. I believe we could go into the bill much more thoroughly and get a much better idea of its complicated technical provisions if the minister would put it over until the next session, unless there are strong and pertinent reasons why we should deal with it now.

We have had the bill in its original form before us for some time—sufficient time, I might say. But briefs have been received by the government from a great many associations, and some of their ideas have been incorporated in the bill which shortly we are to see for the first time. If that revised bill had been brought down a month or so ago, we might have been able to do some ground work on the revisions. But the government has not seen fit to do that. I think we should enter more than a mild protest against the government's listening to representations of those who are not representatives of the people at all, accepting their suggestions where they proved to be acceptable, incorporating them in the measure and then flashing the bill on the house in the last two weeks of the session. I think that is unfair. The bill should be given a hoist until the next session.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not pressing it. I think it is desirable that we get this bill on the statute book. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has chided me for delay. The hon. member for Rosedale has just said that we ought to have brought this bill down a month earlier. I want to remind the committee that there are only twenty-four hours in a day; that applies to me and perhaps even more so to the members of my staff. Work has been going on in connection with this bill day after day and month after month. I myself have had meeting after meeting, interlarded between budget meetings, to go over the provisions of the bill. I can assure my hon. friend, who has never practised law but who, I know, is trained in law, that it is a long and tedious business. It was not possible to bring this bill in earlier. I am not suggesting at all that we should force the bill through at this session, but I think it is possible to put it through. Just about as many calls are made on my time as on the time of most members of the house, but I intend to try to devote a good deal of time to attendance at meetings of the banking and commerce committee when the bill is under consideration.

If it proves unwise or undesirable to try to pass the bill this session, of course, as I say, we will not force it through. But I think we ought to make a start. If we do not make a start on these things, we never finish them. The bill has already been put over for a year. I brought it in last session so that its main provisions could be studied during the year. Study has been given to the bill, and I think it is in fairly good shape now. I should like to see it considered in detail by the banking and commerce committee. I should like to see it made effective as of January 1, 1949. People will know what the law is to be from that time on. If it is not possible to do that, well and good. But I think we ought to buckle down and try to get it through.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I agree with the minister in one thing, namely, that this bill should go to the banking and commerce committee. That seems to me to be the most sensible idea. I agree wholly with most of what the hon. member for Rosedale said, with this exception. I cannot quite follow him when he suggests that the bill be held over. However, I most fully agree with him on what is happening now. I realize how busy the minister has been. I know he has not been idling. Nevertheless the fact is that we are almost in the dying days of the session, and this bill, which has been foreshadowed for three years, and which last year was brought forward with the idea that this year we would have plenty of time to consider it, is brought down at this moment. What does that mean? I do not want to press the point, but if this bill goes through, it really means that we have just rubber-stamped it.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course not. I will answer that now.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That is not as it should be. What really happens is that the minister's officials—and I have great respect for them—are going to give us a synopsis of what other people have said, and we shall have to take it. I know they are competent; nevertheless we shall have to take all this at second hand. The minister says the committee cannot take evidence. I suppose if consideration of the bill is to be completed within the next three weeks, it is almost physically impossible that much evidence should be heard. As has already been pointed out, with all the multitudinous duties that press in on us in these last few weeks, it is almost physically impossible to give it the necessary time. It is like crying over spilt milk, but it is just another case of the house being an automatic rubber stamp for the will of the government; and that is not wise.

Mr. ABBOTT: I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that there is no rubber-stamping about this at all. There is nothing really new in this bill. It has been primarily a drafting job by experts. I do not want to offend any hon. member of the committee, but let me say that only a relatively small number of members here, by training or experience, are competent to give this bill analysis. That is the truth. The ones who are competent to give it that critical analysis might go over the hundred odd sections, of which perhaps fifteen or twenty are really vital, and do it in a relatively short time. But the hard job in connection with this bill has been to weigh the various arguments.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That is what we should do.

Mr. ABBOTT: We should, yes. But a great deal of it is so specialized that, with deference to every member of the committee, the consideration which they can give, let us say, to the specialized clauses relating to depreciation and depletion may be questionable. Some can be helpful, of course; others are not at all interested. There is no particularly new principle in the bill. It is primarily a rearrangement, a redrafting and a simplification. It seems to me that the most valuable assistance we can get on that phase of it in the banking and commerce committee will be from the trained lawyers, because it is their business to try to draft laws and interpret them. This is a statute. We have tried to simplify it. We have tried to eliminate the discretions and so forth. But we are not enacting a new income tax law. Broadly speaking there are no great new principles being established. That is something that must be done in the House of Commons as a result of budget proposals. This is like consolidating the statutes. If we cannot do the job in committee, all right; but I think we can.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am one of the members to whom the Minister of Finance referred as not qualified to give expert and understandable study to this bill.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Me, too.

Mr. MacINNIS: However, the more I heard him explain that, the more disturbed I was about the desirability of the bill going through at this time. He rather suggested that the most valuable contribution to the discussion of this bill must come from lawyers. But lawyers are usually hired to protect the people who are to be taxed; and evidently the minister feels—that having been his profession before he became full-time Minister of Finance—we should be satisfied now if the lawyers who are protecting the big income tax payers approve the bill.

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, no; I did not say that. Don't make a political speech.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is the inference which I must draw from what the minister said.

Mr. ABBOTT: I tried to make the revision of this bill an extremely non-party matter. It is not a question of protecting anybody.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is definitely a non-party question as far as I am concerned.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is as far as I am concerned; and I spent long hours trying to draw up a decent bill.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not objecting to that. I am talking about the minister's explanation of the bill. If he had not made that explanation, probably I should not be saying anything at all. I may not be able to appraise the technicalities of the bill, but I am able to appraise fairly quickly what a man says, and to understand what he is talking about.

There is another point. It is said that we could put this bill through the house in a very short time. When the hon. member for Rosedale spoke a minute ago I learned for the first time that we were to begin morning sittings tomorrow. Well, we can put anything through if we have not time to examine it. We could take any number of bills and put them through the house in the same way that you put wheat through a thresher. But that is not the purpose of bringing legislation before the house. You do not bring legislation before the house in order only that it may go through the formal procedure which makes it law. The purpose of bringing a bill before the house is to have it examined here, to satisfy the various interests concerned that it is proper legislation.

I am not so sure that this is the proper time to bring a bill of this kind before us. It cannot, at one and the same time, be an intricate bill and a simple bill. From the minister's explanation it is so intricate that we have not the ability to understand it; and because it is so intricate that we cannot understand it, it is so simple that we should let it go through the house with no examination at all.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am sorry if I conveyed the impression that it was so intricate we could not understand or appreciate it. I did not intend to suggest that. Anyone who has read the bill will realize that it is a long, technical measure. Actually the bill has been available to every hon. member of the house for almost a year. While it is true that substantial amendments have been made, the broad arrangement and the great majority of the sections are completely unchanged. Anyone who is interested in the bill, whether he is a lawyer or a businessman, a school teacher, or anyone else, has had something like a year to give it detailed and careful study. As I said last year when I introduced the bill, I did so for the purpose of enabling members of parliament and others who were interested to give it study. That is what we have done.

Let me make this second point. I am not attempting to force this or any other bill through the house; but I say we will never get it through the house until we start to consider it. If we embark upon this long discussion at the resolution stage, before having seen the amended version of the bill I introduced a year ago, it seems to me we might as well give up any attempt to get one of these revisions or consolidations of the income tax law through the house. That is all I am asking—that I be allowed to introduce this bill. Members of the house can look at it, read it over, study every section, and be prepared to discuss it either in the banking and commerce committee, if they are members of that committee, or here in committee of the whole. The committee may rest assured that I am not trying to jam this bill through. It is not needed this year, but I believe it is a forward step in improving our legislation. That is all.

Mr. SHAW: In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, this is one measure that should not be forced through the house quickly because time is limited. Apart from the actual tax rates themselves, probably there is nothing which affects the people of Canada more directly than the administration of the Income Tax Act.

The minister indicated that we have had this measure before us for about a year, and implied that we have had ample opportunity to consider it. Later he asserted that, based upon representations made to the government, a great many changes have been made, which of course in effect would nullify his previous assertion that we have had ample opportunity to consider the bill. Moreover, it is one thing to take a bill and study it, and another thing to take a bill when we have an opportunity of asking exactly what certain clauses, phrases and sections mean.

The minister has said that the bill is to go to the banking and commerce committee. I am happy to learn this. If my memory serves me correctly, the minister indicated some months ago, or perhaps it was some weeks ago, that it was not his intention to have this bill referred to a committee of the house. I was disappointed when that announcement was made; therefore I welcome his suggestion that it should go to a committee.

The minister also indicated that it was not desirable to accept representations from organizations and bodies throughout the country which might wish to appear before that committee. That, of course, depends upon the opportunity which those organizations have been given to make their representations; and I understood the minister to say that they have been given ample opportunity to make their submissions.

One thing I think is particularly significant with respect to any income tax law—that is, the actual administration. No doubt the law officers of the crown and other experts will appear before the banking and commerce committee; but will that committee have an opportunity to examine those actually charged with the responsibility of administration? I think a great deal of dissatisfaction has arisen among Canadians during the last number of years because of the indefiniteness of the act, and because of the fact that so many discretions have been exercised under it that actually we have had almost identical cases dealt with in different ways in different parts of the country. The minister has said that one purpose of the proposed legislation is to remove many of these discretions. Personally I think it high time this was done, because, as I said a moment ago, we have had a great variety of interpretations and much variation in dealing with almost similar cases in different parts of Canada. In fact it comes to my mind at the moment that in two almost identical cases affecting farmers, one in the Calgary district office and the other in the Edmonton district office, completely opposite interpretations were placed upon the act, and entirely different decisions given.

I appreciate the fact that there may be a great deal of difficulty in drafting an act which would remove all or nearly all those objections, but I do feel that it is desirable to have an act more definite than the legislation under which the people of this country have been labouring for so long. I am more particularly concerned about uniformity of interpretation and application throughout the length and breadth of this country. In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, my question is this. Will this committee—of which, incidentally, I am not a member—have an opportunity to call before it those actually engaged in the work of administering the act?

Mr. ABBOTT: Unquestionably I would hope that the deputy minister of taxation would be among those who would appear before the committee and explain in detail the administrative sections proposed, as well as the method of administering the act. That is one reason for having the bill considered by the committee on banking and commerce rather than the committee of the whole house.

Mr. FULTON: Perhaps the minister would answer another question along somewhat similar lines. It has to do with calling other interested bodies before the committee to give evidence. The strongest argument in favour of that suggestion is the one advanced by the minister himself as to the desirability of getting the bill through as quickly as possible. He used that argument against calling other bodies before the committee. The minister himself states—and his point has a great deal of merit—that this is the type of bill that the average person has difficulty in understanding or discussing with intelligence. The chief advantage of referring it to the committee on banking and commerce would be to have a full explanation from the experts who will be in charge of administration of the measure. That is important. But the very fact that the members who will constitute the banking and commerce committee are not experts seems to indicate that they should have the benefit of hearing such opposing views as may exist, views in opposition to this, that or the other provision of the bill. If we are to hear from the officials of the department, surely we would wish to hear the views of any who are opposed to the bill. It would not be proper for departmental officials to appear before the committee and say that they believe this is a bad bill.

I know there are some organizations which would wish to have certain provisions modified. And because members of the committee on banking and commerce are to hear the arguments put forward by experts from the department, if the bill is to be considered fairly, we should be allowed to ask other interested organizations throughout the country to appear before the committee and, through their experts, submit their views as to changes or new provisions they might wish to incorporate in the act. This might involve some further time, but the very importance of the bill indicates that we should take the time to hear the evidence of those who may be opposed or who may wish to suggest amendments. I would ask the minister to give us the assurance that that opportunity will be accorded to the committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course that would be a matter for the committee on banking and commerce to consider. The committee will be master of its own procedure.

Mr. FULTON: But a recommendation from the minister would carry weight.

Mr. ABBOTT: I should think it would be impracticable to hear very much evidence at this time. It will be remembered that within the last year many briefs have been filed by a large number of groups. The subject has been well canvassed. If the committee feels that further evidenced should be heard from outside sources, that will be done. But I cannot tell my hon. friend now whether the committee would be prepared to do that, or whether I as a member of the committee—and I do not know whether I am or not; I think I am—would be prepared to make that recommendation. In any event the committee will have to make the decision.

The resolution asks for leave to introduce a bill. All I am asking at this stage is that the committee allow me to present the bill so that they may see what they have to study. I hope that hon. members have already given the bill a great deal of study. Apparently some have not, but I am hoping they will get to work now and study the bill. Then they can decide whether further evidence should be called.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I support the minister and join with him in his appeal that the bill be advanced as quickly as possible. I understand it is complicated, and, if we are to carry our full responsibilities, hon. members should study it from every point of view and secure evidence which may be available.

For years this taxation legislation has been complicated. We have been told that an effort has been made by the officials to simplify it, but I have not yet seen evidence of very much simplification. I believe the bill should be advanced another stage, and that it should be passed. Even if it is not perfect, we can attempt to perfect it in another year. Any change, particularly after the measure has been studied by the officials and by qualified bodies responsible for its administration, will be an improvement over what we now have. Therefore I join with the minister in appealing to the committee of the whole to have the measure advanced so that it may be dealt with and passed at this session. Even though it may not be perfect, we should deal with it.

Mr. HAZEN: I support the hon. member for Cumberland in what he has just said. I trust that in the preparation of the bill great care has been taken to prevent any taxpayer from avoiding payment of all the taxes he should pay. The ingenuity of some accountants is amazing. It is extraordinary to find, if one employs the proper accountant, how very well one can get along when it comes to the payment of income tax. It is nothing short of wonderful how some people can avoid the payment of income tax and still remain within the law. I would mention as an illustration the case of two young men who, we will say, go into the garage business. After they have been in business for a little while they obtain an exclusive agency for some make of motorcar. They sell a great many cars, with the result that they make a good profit and a good net income. In consequence they have to pay a high tax to the government. That is not quite satisfactory to them, and an expert accountant comes along and says, "You should incorporate, and become a joint stock company." They proceed to form a joint stock company and become incorporated. Then they proceed to sell their exclusive franchise to that joint stock company. In payment they accept a certain number of debentures. When they make their profit the next year, instead of declaring the net profit they have made they pay off so many of the debentures they hold, with the result that they get out of paying the tax they should pay.

That is only one example. Some of these experts seem to find it easy to get around the law. It is not fair, and it does not do justice to the government or to those who are anxious to pay their full amount of taxation. It seems to me it would be of great assistance to us in going over this bill if we could have before us some of those expert accountants who are so ingenious in getting around the law; but I doubt very much whether that would be possible.

I believe we should go ahead with the bill, do the best we can with it, and if we find it imperfect, it can be amended in future sessions.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 338, respecting income taxes.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the said bill be read a second time?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know whether the house would agree to give it second reading and have it referred to the committee, or whether it should stand over.

Mr. JACKMAN: Banking and commerce committee.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would move the second reading now by unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

NATIONAL BATTLEFIELDS

QUEBEC—PAYMENT TO COMMISSION OF $1,000,000 OVER PERIOD OF TEN YEARS

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend an act respecting the national battlefields at Quebec, to authorize payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of the sum of $1,000,000 over a period of ten years from the first of April, 1948, to the commission for the purposes and subject to the provisions of the act and to authorize the commission to acquire and hold a certain parcel and tract of land therein described.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. BELZILE: Mr. Chairman, the resolution before the committee has two distinct objects or purposes. The first one, as mentioned in the resolution, is to authorize the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of the sum of $1,000,000 over a period of ten years from April 1, 1948, to the national battlefields commission at Quebec. The second object is to authorize the commission to acquire and hold certain a parcel and tract of land therein described.

In 1908, by an act of this parliament, the national battlefields commission was constituted for the purpose of preserving the historical battlefields at Quebec and to help in the celebration of the founding of Quebec. The commission was empowered to receive and expend moneys whether appropriated by parliament or contributed by other bodies or individuals. Under the act of 1908 the parliament contributed $300,000, while public subscriptions amounted to $468,821. Section 8 of the act of 1908 reads:

The Minister of Finance is authorized to pay to the commission, out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, for the purposes authorized by this act, the sum of three hundred thousand dollars.

Section 16 referred to the tercentenary of the founding of Quebec and authorized the commission to arrange for and carry out a worthy and fitting celebration and to spend, subject to the approval of the governor in council, such portion of the fund of $300,000 as might be necessary. The total expenses of the celebration amounted to $324,511.41; and, after receipts from the sale of tickets to the public and so on were considered, there was left a balance of $14,527.51. The memory of Champlain and Quebec City was fittingly celebrated. There is the monument of Champlain on Dufferin terrace; there are streets named after him and even a market place.

It was thought fitting that the national battlefields of the Plains of Abraham and Ste. Foy should be preserved and reclaimed from the public neglect which has existed for such a long time. Everybody knows that the battles of the Plains of Abraham and Ste. Foy were the turning point in the history of Canada. At the battle of the Plains of Abraham two mighty warriors, Wolfe and Montcalm, gave their lives. At Ste. Foy the last stand of the French army was made under the guidance of Chevalier de Levis.

It was thought fitting that these battlefields, upon which was decided the fate of a continent, should be preserved. As I said a while ago, the amount subscribed by the public was some $468,000, and this, together with the surplus of $14,000 which was left after the expenses of the celebration had been paid, was sufficient to meet expenditures up to 1912. During that time money was spent to acquire property and land, and a total of some 155 acres was acquired. Later on, new expropriations were made or more land was bought, and now there is a continuous piece of property of some 232 acres held in the name of the commission.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does that include both battlefields?

Mr. BELZILE: They are both joined together in a piece of land in the shape of the letter "L".

Mr. MacNICOL: That is west of Quebec?

Mr. BELZILE: That is northwest of the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does it include anything east of Quebec out as far as Montmorency falls?

Mr. BELZILE: Nothing along the Montmorency river; it does not go that far. In 1912 some construction work was started. Up to and including 1927 the amounts required by the commission were voted annually by parliament. In 1928 section 8 of the act of 1908 was repealed, and in substitution therefor the Minister of Finance was authorized to pay to the commission $75,000, a year, for a period not exceeding ten years. In 1938 these annual payments were extended for a further period of ten years, which expired on March 31, 1948.

Section 10 of the act of 1908 provides:

No land or immovable property shall be purchased or acquired by the commission except with the previous authority of parliament.

It is deemed expedient, because of the building of a road by the municipality of Sillery alongside the park, to acquire a piece of property of approximately 135,000 square feet. The old Champlain road bounded the park along the north shore of the St. Lawrence. The road has a bad curve which it has been decided to straighten out. The commission will acquire the piece of land between the old road and the new Champlain road. No expense is involved in this transaction, except the payment of legal fees in connection with deeds and other documents. I have more detailed information which I can give in committee on the bill.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Can the parliamentary assistant inform the committee what appropriations are made for the battlefields in the maritime provinces, at Beausejour, Louisbourg and Ste. Anns.

Mr. BELZILE: The historic sites come under the jurisdiction of an entirely different body. The national battlefields commission was set up especially to take care of the national battlefields at Quebec City, and its functions do not extend to any other part of Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, I do not see any objection to supporting the resolution. I think it is most important that such an historic place as the Plains of Abraham and the site of the battle of Ste. Foy be properly preserved. I never go to Quebec City without going out Grande Allée to look over the battleground. It was a remarkable achievement for Wolfe's army to ascend the heights from the St. Lawrence river to the Plains of Abraham during the night and be ready to engage next morning in a conflict which had such momentous results. I think the battlefields commission is doing an excellent job in looking after these sites. It is well laid out; the roads are well taken care of, and every effort is made to beautify the surroundings, which, of course, is what the nation should do.

When the hon. member was speaking to the resolution I asked if any area east of Quebec City was included in the plans, and I understood him to say no. I think the whole of that land where the Montmorency river flows into the St. Lawrence, at which point severe fighting took place between Montcalm and Wolfe and where Wolfe made his first strong attempt to take the city, should be preserved for posterity. I went there, but I do not remember whether the land had been laid out and beautified. Part of the island of Orleans also figured prominently in the fighting, and I should like to know if there is some program for preserving the works established on the island of Orleans, where many of Wolfe's troops were stationed. The same would apply to Point Levis, from where Wolfe made his last ascent up the river. I think it is to the credit of any country that it should preserve and take care of its historic sites, and undoubtedly the Plains of Abraham and the site of the battle of Ste. Foy constitute one of the most historic sites in Canada.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I take it that this bill is for the purpose of continuing the procedure which was commenced by statute in 1908 and which the parliamentary assistant has described. I agree with the hon. member for Davenport that we do well to commemorate the occasions and preserve the sites of the national battlefields, and particularly this one in which both great races can take pride, and which the parliamentary assistant has described so well. I take it that questions of relative expenditure can be gone into when we have the bill before us?

Mr. BELZILE: Yes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Belzile thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 339, respecting the national battlefields at Quebec.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

ELECTRIC POWER PLANTS—PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF POWER COMMISSION

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to facilitate the construction and operation of electric power plants in the Northwest Territories and the supplying of power thereby generated to mining and other interests. The bill provides for the establishment of a power commission as the authority to carry out the construction and operation of the projects referred to in the bill. Provision is made for advances of moneys from the consolidated revenue fund to the commission to enable it, if and when required, to carry out its undertakings with provision also for the remuneration to be paid the commissioners.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister explain?

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the minister give some outline of what is proposed, after which I wish to say a word or two.

Mr. MacKINNON: The resolution is self-explanatory. As the members of the house will recall, items were included in the estimates for 1946-47 and 1947-48 for the Snare river power development in the Yellowknife district in the Northwest Territories.

It is expected that the first unit will be completed by the fall of this year, and it is therefore, necessary to provide for an organization to take over the management of the project. The bill to be introduced will authorize the establishment of a power commission for this purpose, to be called the "Northwest Territories Power Commission."

Powers are to be given to the commission to operate the project and to sell electrical power, and as well to construct and operate other electrical power developments in the territories as and when needed. A full explanation accompanies the bill, and therefore I do not think it is necessary for me to say more at this stage.

Mr. MacNICOL: When the vote was passing through the house last year for the commencement of the Snare river project I supported it because I knew that the whole area around the Yellowknife required power.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario).]

The minister has not told us the capacity of the first unit or how many units will be established on the Snare river.

Mr. MacKINNON: I will give that information on second reading.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is some information that I wish to get.

Mr. MacKINNON: I would rather do it at that time.

Mr. CHURCH: The resolution provides for a national policy for electric power only so far as the Northwest Territories are concerned. It does not include the existing provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, but only the territories that have no provincial status.

Mr. MacKINNON: That is correct.

Mr. CHURCH: They are under the control of the federal authorities. The policy involved is one of bonus, subvention and subsidy to certain districts, while other districts are not taken care of. Perhaps this is due to the technical consideration that these districts constitute a territory and not a province. I submit that the government should lay down a general national policy for the development of electric power throughout Canada. This is one of the richest countries in the world, with an abundance of natural resources for cheap light and power, and as I have contended for many years past, it should be the policy of this government to undertake something along the lines of this resolution on a national scale. If there are any districts that are not able to pay for the service rendered, the federal authority should step in and give some assistance. If these districts are hard up, if they have no funds, the government might broaden out its present policy into a national one, so that those who are financially unable to get supplies of power may have the joy and the blessing, not only on farms and mines but in all the villages, of this wonderful gift of cheap light and power with which Canada is so richly endowed.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I support the views expressed by the hon. member for Broadview. I think it is high time we did have a national set-up for the development of power, and when the bill is brought in I shall have more to say on this subject. Will this proposed project be self-liquidating? In other words, will it be necessary for the government to take money out of the consolidated revenue fund to defray the cost of construction if it is found that the project will not pay for itself?

Mr. MacKINNON: The project is based upon the principle of self-liquidation.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. MacKinnon thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 340, respecting the supplying of electrical power in the Northwest Territories.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

YUKON ACT

AMENDMENTS RELATING TO THE GOVERNMENT OF YUKON TERRITORY

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Yukon Act to re-establish the positions of commissioner and of administrator of the Yukon territory, to increase the indemnity of members of the Yukon council and provide for their travelling and living expenses, and for other purposes relating to the government of the Yukon territory.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. MacKINNON: The purpose of the bill to be is to make a number of amendments to the Yukon Act. One is to re-establish the positions of commissioner and administrator. The duties originally attached to these positions had been assigned some years ago to other officers in the territory. Another amendment is to grant authority to the Yukon council to increase their indemnities from the present rate of $400 to a maximum of $1,000. A number of other and minor amendments are being made, which I need not mention at this time. On second reading I shall be prepared to give full details.

Mr. CHURCH: How many men will be on the commission?

Mr. MacKINNON: Not exceeding three.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The proposed resolution is quite necessary and, as explained by the minister, it will, I am sure, have the support of the house. I should like to know from him, when the bill is before us, why the names "commissioner" and "administrator" were ever dropped. They were included in the original Yukon Act; but someone in the department, for some reason, if there was a reason, known only to himself, dropped the word "commissioner" and substituted the silly word "comptroller". That word having been used for many years, they then changed it to "controller" and now they are going back to "commissioner". Can the minister give us the history of that?

Mr. MacKINNON: I am not familiar with the reasons, but evidently it has been considered advisable to go back to the former system of naming the officers.

In answer to the hon. member for Davenport, I may tell him that the bill proposes, although I would rather not go into details, the appointment of a commission of one and not exceeding three.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. MacKinnon thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 341, to amend the Yukon Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

VETERANS AFFAIRS ADMINISTRATION—PENSIONS FOR WARTIME DISABILITIES

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I rise to voice a grievance and to request redress. The subject of my grievance is certain forgotten victims among Canadian veterans of world wars I and II. As cases in point, I propose to refer to veteran Sholto B. McClellan, No. 77732, now living at 361 Osborne road, North Vancouver, British Columbia, of world war I, and veteran Frank W. Connorton, V52017 (R.C.N.V.R.), now living in Vancouver, British Columbia.

Evidence strongly indicates that each of these veterans is the victim of a serious miscarriage of justice in the matter of pension for wartime disability. My limited experience fills me with anxiety that each of these two men is a representative of a class of victim veterans, the numbers of which are more than disturbing for all Canadians. May I give some particulars about McClellan? In a letter dated May 31, 1948, he writes as follows:

What we are complaining about is that our records have been mishandled, or, in real truth, falsified, to make it look as if we were not entitled to pensions.

My evidence clearly shows that the charges are true.

Concerning McClellan, Walter H. Kirchner, secretary of the Canadian combat veterans' association, in a letter dated April 5, 1948, had this to say:

What has taken place in respect to the McClellan case (since the commissioners under P.C. 4980 made their findings) is what will take place within the claims of all those I represent—as their legal adviser—until such time as the actual, recorded evidence given before the inquiry by my witnesses receives scrutiny by a properly-qualified judicial body familiar with the implications of the military pensions legislation statutes of Canada.

And again I quote from the same document:

My witnesses were those I produced to back up the charges of definite infringements of the military pension statutes or what is termed "maladministration" illustrated in bureaucratic violation of the statutes, by the use of improper or false reports read into the records—and the rights of ex-service men and women and their dependents so outlawed.

McClellan contends that he was given only a 50 per cent pension for a 100 per cent multiple war disability condition. He says that, as a disability pensioner, he took up fruit ranching and invested $5,000 in a ranch under the soldier settlement board, and was evicted from the ranch on account of temporary arrears during the depression period, when such arrears could have been waived under the provisions of the Soldier Settlement Act owing to McClellan's disabilities. Subsequently he sought damages in the exchequer court for wrongful eviction and recovery of his $5,000 equity, but without result.

Again, at seventy-two years of age—and it must be remembered that we are speaking of a man who went and risked his life for Canada in world war I—in order to keep a roof over his head and that of his wife, he is forced to wash dishes in an hotel. He received an injury to his leg while working, but the workmen's compensation board of British Columbia refuse to honour the claim as they state that, while the injury prevents McClellan from carrying on his employment, the injury would be only a superficial one to a young or middle-aged man; but the arthritic condition and allied disabilities arising from war service, coupled with McClellan's age, make the outcome of this injury a responsibility of the Canadian pension commission.

This helps us to see how some of these splendid men are getting what is popularly called "the run-around".

Again, unless McClellan is given his proper pension assessment of 100 per cent instead of the present 50 per cent, he will be compelled to sell the equity they have in their home and endeavour to make both ends meet by living on the proceeds, because he is definitely out of the labour market, as his private physician's report makes clear.

May I turn now from the McClellan case and consider briefly matters pertaining to Frank W. Connorton, who is just a boy. This man enlisted on January 5, 1943. He was well, strong, sound in body and mind and full of hope for a future of abundant living. He was discharged on March 18, 1946, as medically unfit, broken in mind and body, with no hope for a future of any kind or degree of abundant living. After months of striving for justice, he became the subject of a Canadian pension ruling signed at Ottawa, May 10, 1947. In this ruling appear the following words:

The commission rules:

"Prespondylolisthesis—pre-enlistment condition, aggravated three-fifths during service in Canada. Effective June 1, 1946, as the aggravation did not arise out of nor was it directly connected with military service."

After months more of struggle, he was again the victim, receiving in a letter dated January 29, 1948, the following message:

I have to inform you that the reports of the examination recently held on you show that your pensionable disability from prespondylolisthesis is 18 per cent in extent.

That letter, dated January 29, 1948, is signed by W. E. Dexter, secretary of the Canadian pension commission.

This means, Mr. Speaker, that this young man receives no more than $20 a month, if I interpret it aright, to recompense him for practically total wreckage in war service to Canada. How did it come about that such a gruesome state of affairs developed in Canada as is illustrated in the case of this young man?

Reviewing Connorton's case, I find myself impelled to ask the minister to find the answer for me to four main pertinent questions. First, did this man's condition partly result from an appendix operation in June, 1943? In this operation, I might say, the man was given a local anaesthetic through a needle thrust into the spine. But the man administering the anaesthetic was apparently practising on Connorton; he had to make eight attempts before he was able to get the needle into the right place in the spine, the whole process being accompanied by excruciating pain and what later developed to be permanent injury to the young man.

The second question: Did his tragic final condition partly result from his effort to do work for which surgical bungling had unfitted him?

Third: Did his condition result in any considerable measure from a spinal fusion operation on November 15, 1945, apparently unsuccessful, and subsequent mismanagement on the part of government officials in the army?

Fourth: Was his misfortune partly the result of a second unsuccessful spinal fusion operation on or about September 18, 1946?

I become more suspicious and inquisitive in regard to this case when I review again Frank W. Connorton's history of hospitalization. As given to me it is as follows:

1. Local spinal anaesthetic given the latter part of June, 1943, when the needle was driven eight times into the spine by a Doctor Palmer, followed by an appendix operation.

2. Hospitalized for gland trouble in the spring of 1944.

3. Given a one-man medical board by Doctor Whitelaw, July, 1944. X-rays taken of his back; then the report coming back—and I draw the attention of hon. members of the committee particularly to this finding, which has an important bearing on the finding of the commission on May 10, 1947—"Nothing wrong with the spine". Then he was classified by this board as A-1.

4. He was examined by Doctor Mackenzie at the Givenchy barracks, August, 1944, who reported also, "Nothing wrong with the spine".

5. He was admitted to Shaughnessy hospital, Vancouver, B.C., August, 1944, with a condition diagnosed as bronchitis and laryngitis. This condition diagnosed by Doctor Harold and an operation for tonsilitis performed by Doctor Jackson.

6. Examined by Doctor Ross Robertson, neurosurgeon, on complaints of Connorton regarding the condition of his spine. This physician told the man he had an unmatured spine. He was given a first spinal fusion on November 15, 1945, by this surgeon.

7. On April 2, 1946, he was boarded by the neurosurgeons Boucher, Naden, Starr, Thompson and Black, on complaints of the man that he was still suffering from pain in his back.

8. He was turned over by the neurosurgeons to the departmental psychiatrist, Doctor Stanley, who stated in his board: "Nothing wrong with the man except in his imagination".

9. X-rays taken of the man's spine at the Nanaimo hospital about the middle of September, 1946, on complaints of the man that his back was bothering him.

10. He was examined by Doctor Frank Lehman, neurosurgeon, Shaughnessy hospital, about the middle of September, 1946.

11. He was boarded by the neurosurgeons Boucher, Naden, Starr, Thompson and Chipsuik. Exploratory operation of opening up the spine followed and discovered bone-graft fusion did not take. The second spinal fusion operation followed.

I think almost every member of the committee must be astonished by the history of this man's hospitalization. Note particularly that on July 4 Doctor Whitelaw declared there was nothing wrong with the spine, and that in August, 1944, Doctor Mackenzie also declared there was nothing wrong with the spine. Let us bear in mind that the commission found that the man suffered from pre-enlistment disability; yet these two doctors declared there was nothing wrong with the spine in 1944! This ought to be enough to show that there should be some effort at consistency among those employed by the Department of Veterans Affairs. Then Doctor Ross Robertson found an unmatured spine, right after these other two doctors had declared there was nothing wrong with the spine! Then a spinal fusion operation took place, a major operation which, I understand, is most painful and most dangerous. Then Doctor Stanley, psychiatrist, declared there was nothing wrong with the man except in his imagination.

I wonder how many of these pestilential psychiatrists we have in the employ of the Department of Veterans Affairs. In a general, sweeping way I would stop here to advise the veterans affairs department to clear out these people as one would clear vermin out of a house. I do not think we have any use for psychiatrists to deal with our soldiers in this dominion; and I do not care who the psychiatrists are. If what they do is indicated by what was done in this case I believe everyone will agree that I have not spoken immoderately. Here is a man who, in the face of a spinal fusion operation, declares that the soldier has nothing wrong with his back except in his imagination! Hon. members will recall that there was an exploratory operation opening the spine, which disclosed that the bone-graft fusion had not taken; and this immediately followed the declaration of our psychiatrist that the only thing wrong with the man's spine was in his mind! If we should have another war, and if any of us should have a boy going to that war, I think we should offer a silent prayer that he will never fall into the hands of a psychiatrist.

Then, on May 10, 1947, after all this, the pension commission found there was nothing to indicate that his condition was caused by military service! Probably there was a play on "military service" as a pair of weasel words, so that what the commission said was technically accurate but in spirit monstrously wrong. If this man's ills did not result from service in His Majesty's forces, I do not know how in the world one would proceed to prove that fact. While all this is going on, the boy called Connorton, who might be your boy or mine, Mr. Speaker, a lad in whom our whole faith and hope are reposed, is wrecked. One of God's noble youth in Canada is destroyed.

The question we ask—and I speak for all members of the house—is this: What is to be done about this boy? This house, with one voice, asks the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg) to tell us what is to be done about this boy? He was taken away from home—healthy, gloriously strong, able to do heavy work. I have evidence in abundance to prove that. He was taken into the army, and was turned out of it a wreck. And it was at that time it was declared that his disability was the result of pre-enlistment deficiency. He was turned out, thrown on the scrap heap, with a miserable $20 a month—not enough to provide him with a room.

What is to be done with the others in his class? This boy is not the only one. Where one has suffered, there are plenty of others. Who is going out to find them in all their various theatres of suffering? Who is going to do something to see that their injustices are remedied?

The suffering of each of these two boys, these two servicemen Connorton and McClellan, is extreme now. The veteran Connorton, for example, has a disablement from spinal fusion, an exceedingly serious and painful malady.

I received today this letter dated June 8, 1948, which deals with spinal fusion cases:

John Blackmore, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons, Ottawa

Dear Mr. Blackmore:

re Spinal Fusion cases

In my conversation during the 1947 parliamentary session with Brig. Gen. W. P. Warner, M.D., director general of the treatment services of the D.V.A., in discussing the plight of the spinal-fusion cases, he admitted that "once a man received a spinal fusion," as he expressed himself, "God Almighty could not cure him"; or, in other words, restore the man to a physical condition where he could again render able-bodied service in industry or the professions, such as civil engineering, where men are subject to physical strains.

General Warner further stated that while he considered the treatment services of the department "the finest in the dominion" yet, as he expressed himself, "the spinalfusion cases were the great nightmare of the treatment services."

If you will refer to General Warner's report, incorporated in the findings of the public inquiry, held under P.C. 4980, and embodied in the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the select committee on veterans affairs, April 15, 1948, it will be observed he is quite frank in acknowledging the gravity of the situation confronting men who have received one, two or more spinal fusions with resultant near-total disability.

Yours sincerely,

Walter H. Kirchner, Secretary,
Canadian Combat Veterans' Assn.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Here is this boy expected to make his own living, turned out roughly and provided with $20 a month, which is not enough to supply him with his medical needs. What is to be done about him? Is there any ear in the Dominion of Canada; are there any ears in the House of Commons, which will attune themselves to his pleading voice, and resolve that something shall be done to make right this monstrous wrong?

I would ask the minister to prepare at an early day detailed answers to the questions I have asked, and to give them to the house either before or when his estimates come up for discussion. I would ask the minister to have the most exacting investigation made of the various decisions which have been made, bearing upon each of these two cases, and to explain to the house fully at an early day the justification for the decisions of May 10, 1947, and January 29, 1948, in respect of the Connorton case and the corresponding decisions in the McClellan case.

I would ask the minister, further, to tell the house at an early day what he proposes to do (1) to remedy the injustices in each of these two cases; (2) to seek out and remedy the injustices in each of the cases in that class of injustices of which Connorton and McClellan are examples and (3) to safeguard other cases throughout this land against similar injustices.

May I assure the minister I intend to follow these cases through, in the hope of my being of some assistance to the minister in his efforts to detect and to remedy certain abuses in the administration of veterans affairs which have left many results deeply regrettable to all Canadians.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) has read into the record a serious indictment with regard to the administration of veterans affairs. He has put some pretty specific evidence on the record in respect of these two cases.

It is unfortunate that the minister is not now in the house, because I believe the grievances the hon. member has aired require some answers from the minister.

Mr. GOLDING: The minister is not in the house. The answers can be made when the estimates are being considered, and when the officials are here.

Mr. GILLIS: It is all right to have it done on the estimates; but the fact of the matter is that the hon. member for Lethbridge has put on the record detailed evidence with regard to two cases. This goes out to the public, and I suggest that some answer should be made now. There are always two sides to every question. I do not know anything about the merits or demerits of the two cases discussed; but in the interests of the department as a whole, and of the minister, I suggest that some answer should be made now, so that hon. members may have a reasonable picture of what the problem is in respect of these two men.

After listening to what the hon. member for Lethbridge has said, I would say there has been a callous disregard for suffering and for the things to which these veterans were entitled. Dealing with the department from time to time and with the pension commission, I have found them fair and reasonable, working within the limits of the legislation under which they operate. I should like to hear an answer now, or at least some assurance from the minister that he will give a detailed statement respecting these two cases when his estimates are under consideration. There is now on the record a full statement of the other side of the picture, and I should like to have some clarification of it.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg) is in the committee on veterans affairs.

We never thought that these two particular cases would be brought up today. I shall call the attention of the minister to these cases, so that he may answer them.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

68. Departmental administration, $997,990.

Item stands.

LEGISLATION

151. General administration, $283,433.

Mr. KNOWLES: How many departments will this leave?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): There will be one department left, but I undertook that every week we would make a formal motion to go into supply, so that hon. members could bring up any grievance they might have.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

428. Departmental administration, $141,048.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the minister say what expansion there has been this year in his department?

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): In numbers?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): That would be difficult, because the department includes many branches such as the printing bureau, the patent office, the translations bureau and others. I could give them for each branch as we go along.

Item agreed to.

429. Citizenship registration branch, $165,105.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to know the number of applications that have been made for citizenship certificates by native-born Canadians since the new act came into effect. When the act was first established there were, in different parts of the country, ceremonies which had a profound effect upon the attitude of our citizens who had come from other lands. There were public functions, and an endeavour was made to educate our people in the meaning of citizenship, not only from the point of view of its benefits and rights but also as to its responsibilities. Much was made of the fact that many Canadians would desire to have certificates in order to show that they were in fact citizens of this country, without regard to hyphenate considerations. That was most commendable. I think the citizenship act has had a most salutary effect upon our people as a whole.

However, I feel that the department, since the act came into effect, has not been as enthusiastic about it as it was at the time it originally became law. I should like to have from the minister the number of native-born Canadians who have applied for citizenship certificates in the years 1947 and 1948 to date. Second, I should like to know the number of those who were naturalized as Canadian citizens prior to the act coming into effect, who have since asked for and secured citizenship certificates.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I have the figures for the previous year, but for the year 1947-48 natural-born Canadians who were entitled to certificates in proof of citizenship applied to a total number of 11,972. That is the number actually issued in the past year. Those who had previously been naturalized under the Naturalization Act applied for certificates in proof of citizenship to the number of 2,102.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is the minister satisfied with the degree to which applications have been made, particularly by naturalized citizens? What has been done to encourage applications for these certificates?

Could the minister advise the committee as to the extent to which the enthusiasm that existed in January, 1947, in his department, has waned in the intervening months?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I would not say that it has waned in the slightest degree. A person who has a naturalization certificate has no need of a certificate in proof of citizenship. If he turns in his naturalization certificate, we issue the other certificate if he wishes it, but his naturalization certificate is of equal value. Some people may ask, what is the value of having a certificate in proof of citizenship? If you are travelling abroad it is of value as proof of citizenship, and it can be of use when returning to this country.

There has been a great increase in the number applying for citizenship in this country. During the last year we issued 25,691 certificates. This is about ninety certificates for each working day, which is quite a creditable performance considering the investigation that is required. These certificates are not sold like postage stamps, because the application must be carefully examined. I feel that the citizenship registration office is doing a good work and has been most efficient during the past year.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not want to delay the passage of the minister's estimates, but last year I happened to be absent temporarily from the house when they were up and when I wanted to ask a couple of questions. One has to do with the patent office and the other with regard to the citizenship registration branch. Many young people find it quite difficult, under the Patent Act as amended, to secure a patent for their useful invention, owing to the cost of the patent and their not having cash to pay for it. A great many young people have to go to the United States for those very good reasons because they find it less difficult to secure a patent and sell their patent there, and Canada thus loses their talent.

Second, how is the citizenship registration plan working out? A great many people have the idea, and it is generally understood in the old country, that we are no longer British subjects but Canadian citizens only. I remember when the Athenia was sunk in the early days of the last war. There were 130 Canadians on board, and someone suggested that they were British subjects, which meant a lot on the seas. I think the minister should state that Canadian citizens are still British subjects. Remember civis romanus sum and what it meant, as being a British subject did on the seven seas.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The act still provides that a Canadian citizen is a British subject. It is true that an act has been introduced at Westminster, framed somewhat along the lines of our own citizenship act, which provides that residents of the United Kingdom and the colonies will be known as citizens of the United Kingdom and colonies. The fact remains that in Canada we are not only Canadian citizens but also British subjects.

The hon. member asked how the citizenship program is working out. We have had the greatest co-operation from judges across the country. There was a time when applicants for naturalization were called before a court, answered a few perfunctory questions, the application was approved, and the certificate issued. There was little formality about the proceedings. Now throughout the country we have formalities which are designed to impress the new Canadians when they receive their citizenship certificates. The judges have taken great interest in this work, and have received the co-operation of service clubs and particularly from the Daughters of the Empire, who come to these ceremonies and assist in making the new Canadians feel they are welcome in this country. I have attended a large number of these ceremonies, and consider that they help to give the new Canadian a realization of the importance of the step he is taking and make him realize that he is assuming obligations as well as the privileges of citizenship.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was born in Canada, as were my parents, and I have not taken out any citizenship papers for the reason that I could not see why I, born a Canadian, needed to take out citizenship papers. But if I wanted to go to England and then to the continent of Europe, after I obtain my passport as a Canadian born in this country, do I have to take out any more papers than I did before?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): No; the passport is sufficient.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I want to clear up a misunderstanding created as a result of a question regarding citizenship that I asked in this house on May 19. I asked a question as to one Dimitri Dontzow, now a resident of Montreal. My question was to the effect, where was he during the first world war; was he now engaged in work for the government, and had he taken any steps toward securing Canadian citizenship? The answer given was that he entered Canada on January 7, 1948, and was granted non-immigrant status. The manner in which my question was drafted was designed to prevent any harm or hurt from being done to that man. I was totally unaware of the fact that a controversy was going on among some groups as to whether he should be entitled to remain in Canada and become a citizen. I have always followed the course of not doing anything to injure any person through the protection granted to me by my parliamentary privilege, and I feel that, in asking that question, I have done some harm to that man. While I have not undertaken to say this, I want to say that, so far as I am concerned, this man would make a good Canadian citizen, that he was and has been a consistent enemy of communism in the Ukraine, where he operated since the war, and that those who today in this country are endeavouring to secure his deportation are doing so because they resent the work he did on behalf of democracy during the war and following. I think it is only fair, sir, to mention that, because a lot has been said on this question, indicating, as it might, that I was endeavouring to do harm to a man who, according to information I have gained, not only from members of his organization but from independent Canadians of undoubtedly first-rate reputation, would in my opinion make a good prospective citizen and is a man who ought to be given honourable sanctuary in Canada.

May I ask the minister whether the British government has communicated with him as Secretary of State with a view to ascertaining whether or not a new form of citizenship should be established to be known as commonwealth citizenship rather than as British or empire citizenship?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The British government does not communicate with my department; it communicates through the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I believe there have been some communications discussing the form of title that should be applied to a subject of the British commonwealth, but I do not know what reply, if any, the Department of External Affairs might have sent.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the minister obtain that information?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes, I shall be glad to do so.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROVISIONS RESPECTING PISTOLS, MOTOR CARS, LEVEL CROSSINGS AND PAYMENT OF FINES

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved the second reading of Bill No. 207, to amend the criminal code (pistols, motor vehicles, level crossings and the payment of fines).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the house for more than a few minutes in discussing this bill. I would point out, however, that this is the 101st day of the session, and I think we should have devoted an hour to the discussion of the questions involved in the bill. The loss of life in Canada is simply appalling. We find that in one instance eighteen persons are killed in the space of a week end, and in every newspaper that one picks up its pages are figuratively coloured red with the blood of men, women and children who have been ruthlessly slaughtered by motor vehicles.

This bill does not conflict with the bill which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) introduced on Monday, since it deals with different subject matters in every section. The bill now before the house is No. 207, copies of which are on the table.

I shall not speak for more than twelve minutes, and in that time I wish to refer to three or four important principles that are involved in the bill. In 1935 there was a learned discussion in this house, lasting the whole of one day and the day following, and I might say that a committee consisting of both houses of parliament was appointed in England to investigate this entire subject.

Coming to this particular bill, I think the object at which it aims is quite clear. On almost every highway in Canada there has been slaughter of innocent people, men, women and children, and that is true right across the country; yet little or nothing is done about it.

Speaking in this house on March 9, 1937, I stated that if any devastating disease were to take the toll the motorcar is taking by night and by day, science and medicine would know no rest until they had found a cure. The death toll by the motorcar constitutes Canada's greatest scandal. The slaughter goes on all over the country, and the economic losses are appalling. The worst thing about it is, I think, the indifference of the public.

In that discussion a great many other matters were referred to. On that occasion I quoted the observations of Chief Justice Rose at the winter assizes in 1937, in his address to the grand jury. Chief Justice Rose is reported as follows:

"The toll of life by motors is appalling and the number of people injured is infinitely greater," declared Chief Justice Rose in his address to the grand jury this afternoon.

"Careless driving will stop just as soon as the people of Ontario make up their minds that it is to stop," he continued.

It is the part of juries to see that there are convictions. If lawbreakers get the idea there will not be convictions they will continue.

His lordship said there appeared to be something illogical in the fact that a motorist who kills gets a term in prison, while another who is merely fortunate enough to injure his victim gets off easily.

As I have said, five years before that time, in the old country, a committee of both houses of parliament was set up to go into this question and it got something done. On February 13, 1935, there was a non-political debate on the subject in the Canadian house on a resolution of mine in which some twenty-seven members took part. In that debate I emphasized the fact that one of the commandments is, "Thou shalt not kill", but many men of real worth have violated the laws not only of God but of man.

No invention has contributed more to the education, pleasure and enjoyment of the people than the motorcar; but its use is one thing, its abuse another. As with every great invention, use and abuse are two distinct things. During the past century scientific discoveries in medicine, chemistry and physics have resulted in untold good to humanity, but the abuse of some of these discoveries in chemistry, biochemistry and physics has in war proved a curse to mankind. In like manner today the abuse of the motorcar is a curse to humanity.

On looking into this question, one finds involved in it tremendous annual losses in deaths, accidents, injuries and money. Untold sorrow and suffering are caused, intense pain and grief exceeding anything that the human imagination can conceive. The only evils which have equalled it are plague, pestilence and famine, battle, murder and sudden death. It would be misleading and mischievous to attribute all the blame for these ghastly horrors on our highways to all who drive and use motorcars. Ninety-five per cent of the drivers want to obey the law; it is the five percent about whom I am complaining.

One has to study the records to know the facts, and as I study the records of thousands of cases I am driven to the conclusion that, beyond dispute, this small minority must take the major part of the blame. They appear to have exploited for their own pleasure or profit the generous tolerance of others by using their cars in an irresponsible, careless, cruel and un-Christian way. The fault is grievous, and they can have no ground for complaint if they are put under restraint as far as the criminal code is concerned. Ignorance and thoughtlessness are no palliatives. Obedience is the only reparation they can make and it is long overdue.

I should like to quote something that was said by the late Chief Justice Meredith, who so ably presided on circuit for nearly forty-six years. At the last assizes over which he presided in Toronto he addressed the grand jury on the amendments that were made in 1930. He said:

And as now nearly everyone is a car owner and car driver, young and old, of all sorts and conditions, it is difficult to get justice in even a civil action.

Car-driver-jurors have nearly all the speed fever; and self-preservation instincts are so strong that they will not be persuaded to decide against drivers who have been no more unlawful than they themselves often, if not commonly, are.

What then is the remedy? I think it should be: Make the laws plain and reasonably severe and enforce them; and cancel licences freely.

And at the other end of the matter: Give no licence to anyone who is not proved to be mentally and physically, and from experience and a knowledge of the highway laws, thoroughly capable.

A situation such as this calls for a united effort from the church, the press, parliament, the legislatures, boards of trade, chambers of commerce and all other public bodies. The privation and sorrow, the broken lives and shattered homes, resulting from such a holocaust are just as real as at the time of the nation's supreme trial in the war. It is hidden, and it is suffered in silence; but how long will that continue to be?

Three features dominate the conduct of motor traffic: a domineering indifference to the convenience of others, excessive speed, and congestion. Ever since man learned to direct a machine more powerful than himself, he has asserted his superiority of force over his neighbours. "Make way or take the consequences" has been his cry. Yet this indifference to others is limited to a small number of motor drivers. The motor leagues of the provinces make the same complaint. It is a small number out of the large body of drivers who transgress; ninety-nine per cent of them respect and obey the law. The majority of motorcar drivers have only a hazy knowledge of the mechanism of their machine, and for absolute control the only condition in which a car is fit to be driven at thirty miles an hour is perfect adjustment. Even so, the machine is potentially as dangerous as a loaded gun and must be handled with equal care and vigilance. A moment's inattention may be fraught with dire results. Every motor vehicle is a dangerous implement, even when controlled by the most expert, and requires incessant vigilance in all circumstances, especially at speeds above thirty miles an hour.

Transportation should be a means to an end, not an end in itself. I could go on further, but I will not do so.

I come now to the bill itself. The first section deals with the use of pistols or air-guns, loaded or unloaded. Pistols can be purchased at many places. I know of an industry on Spadina avenue that sends out pictures and pamphlets describing its manufacture. They come over the border from Connecticut, in the United States, and it is easy to buy one.

Another section provides that "pistol" shall include anything of the shape or form or size of a pistol. Many of these fatal accidents have been caused as a result of the ease with which a pistol may be secured, especially by some of the younger people. The pistol, added to the abuse of the motorcar, is a menace to the people of this country.

My time is about up, but I may say that another section deals with those who drive motorcars under the influence of alcohol. That is a practice which has been condemned at many sittings of the courts by the Ontario government's expert, Doctor Rogers. He says that liquor is killing five people and injuring eighty-four every week on the highways of Ontario alone. I think the opposition members should look into this matter. This is referred to in Hansard of April 22, 1947. I propose an amendment under one section of this bill.

Every section deals with a different principle. Subsection 4 of section 55 of the criminal code as enacted uses the word "narcotic". I propose to substitute "under the influence of alcohol", so that the section will then read:

> Everyone who, while under the influence of alcohol or any narcotic, drives any motor vehicle or automobile is guilty of an offence and liable to . . .

And the punishment is set out.

The next matter dealt with is the hit-and-run drivers, the most cowardly type of all. I have seen instances on the main streets of our city where a hit-and-run driver comes along and injures someone. I was on Danforth avenue yesterday and I saw a small child on the road. Several cars passed her, and the last one came along at an outrageous rate of speed and knocked her down. Nobody could stop him. In fact a special policeman would be necessary for each car for that purpose. But these hit-and-run drivers get away with it. No one got that man's number. Yet the child was injured. Many children have been killed and injured in this way. In our city, in the riding which I represent, and it is an industrial riding at the south end, there are some poor people whose children have been knocked down and killed by hit-and-run drivers, and no penalty is meted out. It is a form of murder and there should be further legislation dealing with it.

Another matter dealt with in the bill is the failure to stop at level crossings. Several people were killed on Monday at one of these. I should like to have put in the code a section which would read:

> The operator of a motor vehicle on street, road, highway or other public place who neglects to come to a full stop before reaching a level crossing where a railway crosses such street, road, highway or other public place, and who does not look and listen for an approaching train before passing a level crossing, shall be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding $50.

The loss of life at level crossings is appalling, and some remedy should be found.

Another section provides that those who cause death are not to drive for two years. It deals with culpable negligence. Under the law of New York state it is for the jury to say. It takes two people to make any accident that I know of on the highway. You cannot have any accident unless two people are involved, one going one way and one another. The cause of death is for the jury to say. In some cases they assess the negligence at 20 per cent or 25 per cent on one side and 75 or 80 per cent on the other. If the jury brings in a verdict like that, the accused person is not to drive for a period of two years.

Another matter dealt with in the bill is the trial of a young person. The other day in county court in the county of Peel, we had an instance of the trial of a young offender. I believe the parents should be notified in these cases. I do not see why, when one is in Montreal or in another place, the parents should not be notified of their being held in custody for some offence.

The late Chief Justice Rose referred to the present law at the assizes in Toronto; I quoted him a moment ago. He said that the jury was to blame in some cases for not having the courage to enforce the law. The function of a judge is to explain the law to the jury, and the jury is bound to take what the judge says is the law. But in a charge to a jury I believe that, in these cases of manslaughter arising out of the operation of motor vehicles, the question of fact whether the accused is guilty or not guilty should be left to the jury. On the trial with a jury of persons who cause death or serious injury, it is desirable that the functions of the jury should not be curtailed or abolished. There has been much criticism of many cases of gross negligence having been taken from the jury. The jury is required to take the law to be what the judge says it is. In many cases trial by jury is almost negatived; there are so many loopholes, and many persons guilty of gross negligence get off. I contend that the law should be brought up to date to meet changed conditions. The remainder of this particular Bill No. 207, and some of the members have not read it or seen it, probably, refers to the summary convictions act in England, whereby time is given to pay the fine. This is the 101st day of the session and this is the first opportunity we have had of bringing the bill up for second reading. We are almost back in the days of "Little Dorritt" in Dickens, having regard to the number of people who have been sent to jail under the present system for not paying their fines. Many of them are minor offenders who have never been in jail before in their lives or appeared in court. I believe this is a good provision. The bill provides for time to pay, as is the case under the law of England, where half the prisons have been closed by this wise method of law reform there.

That is all I have to say about the bill. I believe the house should have given more attention to this bill in the early days of the session. There is no reason why we should not have more time to discuss these important matters of life and death to our citizens. It is only necessary to read the newspapers to learn daily about all these deaths which have taken place, not only from level crossing accidents but from motorcar accidents, drownings, fires in homes, children left alone and many other causes, floods and fires. This is one of the matters that should be looked into by parliament.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I have not much to say on this bill, Mr. Speaker, except to comment on one or two things the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) had to say as he went along. The bill is a lengthy one, and one would almost need to be a lawyer to follow through all its ramifications and understand it. Some of the penalties proposed in the bill are somewhat drastic.

When the hon. member was commenting on the bill. I was interested in the observations he had to make with regard to accidents at level crossings. His argument was that certain penalties should be applied where a driver fails to stop, look and listen at a level crossing. I do not think an amendment to the criminal code is the solution of that particular problem. I think level crossings should first be eliminated as far as possible. That is the responsibility of both federal and provincial governments, in the protection of the public. However, until such time as we can get around to the elimination of level crossings, I think the railroads, both short and main lines, should be compelled to place signals at level crossings. In driving through this country, I see hundreds of these level crossings which you come upon suddenly; you do not know a crossing is there until you are on top of it.

I remember being in New Brunswick a year ago, driving along behind a small car. An electric train came out of the woods suddenly and smashed the little car ahead of us, killing an old man who had been riding in it and badly injuring the driver. I was sufficiently interested to go back to that little town that night and listen to the inquest, for I was reasonably sure that if the little car had not been ahead of us we would have been on the crossing and would have been struck by the train coming out of the woods, since there was no warning and no signal. It is the responsibility of the railroads to erect signals of some kind at crossings like that. I heard the jury bring in a verdict in that case, and in their verdict no blame was attached to the railroad, despite the fact that there was no signal and no warning of any kind.

I wanted to make just this comment because of the argument by the sponsor of this bill that the criminal code should be amended to make it an offence, carrying pretty heavy penalties, for anyone on the highway failing to stop, look and listen at a level crossing. In some of the provinces of Canada you may cross the main line of the railway a dozen times in a hundred miles, where you criss-cross back and forth. All these crossings are bad and dangerous; but that is not a condition which can be remedied by legislation. In my opinion it is the responsibility of federal and provincial governments to eliminate such crossings where possible, and to compel the operators of short lines, particularly, to erect warning signals where they cross heavily travelled main highways.

Mr. JOHN R. MacNICOL (Davenport): In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) deserves credit for his indefatigable energy in endeavouring to protect the public in one way and another, and I for one congratulate him.

I want to add a word or two to what has been said by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), with much of which I agree. The problem is to have someone eliminate level crossings. The responsibility is that of the railways and the provinces and, I presume, also the federal authorities. We have an act on our books, and we vote a good deal of money for the elimination of level crossings; but, even so, I do not think any of us will live long enough to see all level crossings eliminated.

There are some very bad crossings of this kind. I have in mind one between Brampton and Georgetown, on No. 7 highway, where many cars pass daily. I was almost run into by a train there, because you do not see the train coming from the left, and you are on the track almost before you know it. So anything this house, the legislatures and the railways can do to eliminate level crossings should be done.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): I should like to say a few words on this bill, Mr. Speaker, which is very much like the bill introduced with the same subject matter last year by the hon. member. At that time I had not introduced the annual amendments to the criminal code, and I intimated that some of the ideas contained in the bill would be incorporated in those amendments. Apart from one of those ideas, however, I do not think there was any such incorporation in the amendments to the criminal code last year. That one related to the first two sections of the bill, having reference to the use of firearms and imitation firearms. In the criminal code amendments of last year, which are found in chapter 55 of the statutes of 1947, section 15 provides:

> Paragraph (c) of section four hundred and forty-six of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:—
> "(c) being armed with an offensive weapon or instrument or imitation thereof robs, or assaults with intent to rob, any person."

I suspect that my hon. friend's objective was to prevent robbery brought about by the use either of a weapon or an imitation weapon, though the amendments proposed in the bill which he introduced last year, and which he has reintroduced this year, do not attain that objective. As far as it is possible to do anything effectively by legislation, I think it was done by the amendment to the criminal code introduced in 1947, which I have cited.

The matter of the use of imitation weapons is only one of a large number of unrelated provisions contained in the bill before the house. It is not possible to discuss the principle of the bill without discussing some of these unrelated subjects dealt with in the bill. Part of the bill is devoted to a stiffening of the penalties and a change in the law with respect to the driving of motor vehicles by intoxicated persons. Undoubtedly there is a large loss of life on account of the driving of automobiles by persons who are intoxicated. Last year, when the amendments to the criminal code were being considered, the government gave some thought and spent some time in trying to decide whether it would be possible to make the law more effective in that regard. The conclusions we came to were that it would hardly be defensible to adopt the principle my hon. friend has argued for tonight; that is, that it should be an offence to drive an automobile while under the influence of alcohol only.

The reasons for that were stated in some remarks I made on criminal code amendments on July 3, 1947, which are to be found in Hansard of that date at page 5034. The passage is not very long, and I am going to ask the house to be indulgent enough to let me read it, because this is an important subject, and upon reading over these remarks, as I have recently, I find that they represent my views today:

> The hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) referred to an important subject, namely the question of driving motor cars by persons who are intoxicated. This is a matter of increasing importance. With the increasing amount of liquor being consumed in Canada, the increasing drink bill of the Canadian people, the increasing numbers of motorcars on the highways and the increasing number of accidents, parliament should take any steps it can which would be effective to prevent the causing of accidents or deaths on the highways.
> Much thought has been given to the matter without, I must admit, very great results in the bill. The penalties for hit-and-run drivers have been increased.

And, may I interject, those penalties were increased by our criminal code amendments last year. They are not as severe as those proposed by the hon. member in his bill tonight; but, as I have had occasion to point out to the house before, penalties may be so severe that convictions cannot be obtained. That is a consideration which I would call to the hon. member's attention. Then, on that occasion I continued:

> That is a peculiarly unpleasant sort of offence. We thought we would be justified in recommending an increase in the penalty. On the other hand, we did not think we would accomplish anything by increasing penalties for drunken driving. At the present time the penalties for drunken driving are seven days or thirty days, as the case may be. I, personally, do not think that raising it to fourteen days or sixty days would act as a deterrent.

There again, I believe that many of those persons convicted of drunken driving dread the seven days or the thirty days in jail just as much as they would the longer periods. If we make the detention longer magistrates and courts become increasingly reluctant to make convictions. In some cases they are reluctant now to convict. So we turned our attention from penalties to definitions, and considered how best we could define intoxication. The present definitions could possibly be made more satisfactory. The ordinary definition of intoxication in relation to drivers is that degree of intoxication or of being under the influence of liquor which renders the driving of a car dangerous to the public. This means that if the person were permitted to drive the car it would be a danger to the public.

That is accepted by most of the courts. Therefore there did not seem to be much to be gained by trying to extend that definition. It is almost impossible to say that a man is intoxicated if he has had a drink we will say, within one hour, two hours, three hours or four hours, because the variation is so great. It would be extremely severe to make it an offence to drive an automobile while under the influence of liquor. The courts have ruled that a person is under the influence of liquor after he has had a drink. The influence may be quite slight, and it hardly seems sufficient to make a criminal out of a man who has had a drink.

I think I should have said that it hardly seems appropriate to make a criminal out of a man who has a drink. Then I continued:

So we abandoned that.

We gave consideration to the reversal of the onus in some cases. The best section that I could evolve, and which I want to put on record for the consideration of members, is this:

"Provided that whenever a motor vehicle is involved in an accident, evidence that the person driving the said motor vehicle acted at or about the time of the accident in a manner indicating that he was under the influence of intoxicating liquor, shall be prima facie evidence that the said person was intoxicated."

I am not recommending it at this session, but if in the course of time it is found that we have to do something, from what consideration I have been able to give the matter, this is the most practical amendment I can suggest if an amendment is to be made to stiffen the section. The proposed amendment has much to commend itself, but it also has much against it. I should like those who are interested in the subject to give it some consideration between this and the next session. I may say that we have had strong representations to the effect that we ought to go quite far in amending the section. I have not gone very far, as will be seen when the section is reached; what I have done is to try to offset the decision of the courts with regard to one particular phase of the matter which will be explained when the section is reached.

May I say that the proviso, which was so carefully drafted and upon which I invited comment, elicited no comment whatever either in the house or out of it. Therefore I am unable to suggest any better improvement of the section in question. I really am of the opinion that to go as far as my hon. friend seeks to go in his bill would be going too far, and would move the criminal law of the country out beyond the proper realm of criminal law; and perhaps would do more harm than good.

As I said, in the bill there are a number of other sections dealing with a variety of subjects. I could take them up one at a time, but I doubt whether my hon. friend expects the house to pass the bill tonight. The discussion has served some useful purpose. He has brought these important matters before the house and the public, and has given hon. members an opportunity to express themselves with respect to them. I cannot accept the bill. At the same time, perhaps when the criminal code amendments come up, and a general discussion of the sections takes place, it may be that something can be done by returning to this bill at that time.

Therefore I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. CHURCH: If there are no other speakers I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Ilsley the debate was adjourned.

SUPREME COURT ACT AMENDMENT

AMENDMENT TO ABOLISH APPEALS TO THE PRIVY COUNCIL

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Jaenicke for the second reading of Bill No. 5, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

Mr. CHURCH: I would move the adjournment of the debate. I had risen the last time the bill was before the house. On that occasion it was three minutes to nine. I move the adjournment of the debate tonight again.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I thought the adjournment was moved by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the attention of the hon. member for Broadview to the fact that if he adjourned the debate he would close the debate. The hon. member for Lake St. John-Roberval (Mr. Dion) may proceed.

(Translation):

Mr. J. A. DION (Lake St. John-Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks concerning the matter which is now up for discussion, namely the abolition of appeals to the privy council. It may be that I shall repeat, under some form or other, certain arguments which have already been submitted during the debate, but there is no harm in that. Some truths are like nails: one must hammer at them repeatedly in order to drive them in well.

Mr. DECHENE: Hear, hear!

Mr. DION: Today the great majority of Canadians are in favour of abolishing appeals to the privy council. In fact, since the Statute of Westminster, it is admitted that the dominions are independent states within the commonwealth, bound solely by their common allegiance to the Crown. However, from a practical point of view, it must be admitted that Canada still lacks certain prerogatives which would ensure her the maturity of a free nation. I now repeat what I said last year: in order to attain the status guaranteed by the Statute of Westminster, our country still lacks three things: first, the right to amend her own constitution; second, a distinctive national flag; third, the abolition of appeals to the privy council. I shall deal only with this third proposal, because it is the one we are discussing today.

We must abolish appeals to the privy council first because our status of sovereign state calls for it; second, we have in Canada all that is required to create a judicial body complete in itself and capable of settling all our disputes; third, present conditions do not lend themselves to the prompt administration of justice for all amenable to law.

First, our status of free nation compels us to abolish appeals to the privy council.

When our country was still a crown colony, it was only logical that the final court of appeal be in the old country. As long as we were not fully autonomous in the matter of legislation, it was only logical that we should not be so in matters of law. But we reached our full constitutional development with the Statute of Westminster. Since then, nothing should prevent our abolishing appeals to a judicial body in another country.

This step has been put off since 1931, when the Statute of Westminster was enacted, and this for reasons of expediency rather than procedure. Inasmuch as last year, the privy council stated the Canadian parliament could, of its own authority, abolish such appeals, there should be no more obstacles to our doing so.

It can be said that since 1931, the country at large has been educated in this matter and public opinion now insists that appeals to the privy council be abolished. It is unworthy of a sovereign state to have its citizens subject in any way whatsoever to court decisions rendered in another state.

We exercise our sovereignty in almost every sphere. In the legislative field, for instance, we are absolutely free to enact whatever laws we choose, and this legislation no outside power can either change or disallow. In matters of international trade, it is entirely up to us to enter into any trade agreement we like, and the same applies to our external policy since we appoint our own ambassadors and diplomatic representatives. In 1939, war was declared by the Canadian parliament and duly accredited Canadian representatives sign peace treaties on Canada's behalf. Why then try to preserve an obsolete link, a state of things that is incompatible with our status of sovereign state?

A sovereign state must control its legislation, manage its external and internal policy and submit to no decisions other than those rendered by tribunals within its own boundaries. That is the main reason why we must do away with appeals to the privy council.

A second reason in support of this bill is the fact that Canada has the required and properly qualified court to pass final judgment on all disputes, whether they relate to the criminal code, the civil code or constitutional law.

In criminal cases, the matter is finalized, and our supreme court has been, for many years, the last tribunal to deal with them. In civil matters, nobody will challenge the fact that our supreme court judges are more conversant with our laws, legislation, jurisprudence, customs and traditions than the lords of the privy council.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DION: Be it said with due respect to those honourable gentlemen. Why then submit such cases to a British court, if our Canadian court is better able to pass judgment on them?

Mr. HARTT: Hear, hear.

Mr. DION: Then there are cases of constitutional law, especially litigation relating to the respective rights and prerogatives of the dominion and provincial governments.

Here it is claimed by advocates by privy council appeals that we should cling to its jurisdiction as a greater protection for the rights of provinces and minorities. To my mind, this claim is groundless. A comparison of supreme court judgments since it was first established with those of the privy council in such matters, will show that the rights of provinces and minorities were no more protected by the privy council than by the supreme court itself. The privy council jurisprudence is like a pendulum which is skillfully made to swing at times in the direction of dominion authority, and at other times toward provincial rights, and it would be quite difficult to ascertain the real trend of that changing jurisprudence.

Mr. LANGLOIS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DION: Moreover, to hold that, because they owe their appointment and jurisdiction to the dominion government, the judges would be prejudiced in its favour, would be casting reflections on the impartiality and the quality of our supreme court.

In the United States, the supreme court is called upon to pass final judgments on litigations arising between the states and the federal government. Justices of the United States supreme court are appointed by the central power, yet no one would pretend that their judgments are biased.

I might follow the comparison into another field. It might also be held that our sessions of the peace judges or our district magistrates, in the province of Quebec, are not competent to pass judgment on matters pertaining to federal legislation, because they owe their appointment to the provincial government. Such a statement would be most unfair and ridiculous. If that is so, why challenge the fair-mindedness of our supreme court judges because they were appointed by the dominion government? I believe I need not stress further the weakness of such an argument.

But even if we were to admit that assertion for the sake of the discussion, it does not follow that we should submit litigations of a constitutional nature to the judgment of a court which is not our own. All we have to do, if necessary, is to amend our judicial system, but I cannot agree that a sovereign federal state is unable to settle its own constitutional or judicial problems, that it must submit them to the court of another country.

[Mr. Dion (Lake St. John-Roberval).]

Lastly, there is a practical problem which we cannot ignore when dealing with the question of abolishing appeals to the privy council. Justice in this democratic country must be prompt and, as far as possible, within the reach of all who come under it. Now, when a case is to go to the privy council, it necessarily takes a long time before the matter is submitted to the final authority. In the province of Quebec, the case is tried first by the superior court, then by the court of king's bench sitting on appeal. Then another appeal is lodged with the supreme court sitting in Ottawa and, at long last, the case is taken to the privy council.

How about the high cost of carrying a case to the privy council? Men of wealth and power can manage it rather easily but those of small means, who cannot meet the cost, often prefer to drop the case or settle out of court on more or less satisfactory terms. To such may be applied the famous lines of fabulist de La Fontaine:

> According as to whether thou art mighty or penniless
> Court judgments shall make thee white or black.

I do not wish to labour the point, Mr. Speaker, but I do think I have made it sufficiently clear that appeals to the privy council are unworthy of a sovereign state, that they do not conform to our present status, that we have here in our own country, courts of law which are perfectly competent to pass judgment on all our cases, and that such a tribunal—i.e. the privy council—does not suit the needs of those who require the expeditious justice within the means of all.

For these reasons I support the bill before us at this time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

(Text):

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to this bill, because last year I was opposed to the principle of a similar bill. As the house knows, there are two classes of appeals involved in appeals to the privy council. One class relates to statutory appeals from the dominion or the provinces, the other class to appeals as a matter of grace, which no legislature in the empire can change. It is the right of any British subject to petition His Majesty in his privy council. I have here the very learned opinion of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, who was not only one of the most honoured members of the legal profession but chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, and at other times solicitor general, minister of justice, and afterwards lieutenant governor of a great province of this dominion. In an address to the Canadian Bar Association in 1914, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick gave his opinion on appeals to the privy council. He said:

In no part of the king's dominions has greater service been rendered by the judicial committee than in Canada, particularly since confederation.

Since 1867, the judicial committee has been called upon in scores of cases to trace out the line of demarcation between federal and provincial jurisdiction, and it must be truthfully said that the result has been eminently satisfactory. Removed, as the majority of judges are, from all local strifes, desirous as they are to distribute the most impartial justice, it is not surprising that the right of appeal to the king in his privy council is one of the privileges most highly prized by the people of the dominion. I do not mean to say that there has not been exception taken to the freedom with which appeals may be carried to the privy council in ordinary civil matters, but whatever view may obtain in other parts of the empire, so far as Canada is concerned, I think I may safely say that, amongst lawyers and judges competent to speak on the subject, there is but one opinion, that where constitutional questions are concerned an appeal to the judicial committee must always be retained.

I am offering that opinion to balance to some extent the opposite opinions which have been offered. I rather think the judicial committee of the privy council has rendered a real service to Canada. Their decisions have been one judgment, no dissenting judgments.

Mr. Conant, when attorney general of Ontario, gave opinions which almost coincide with those of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick. I quote:

Yesterday Attorney General Conant redirected public attention to one of the most contentious questions with which the forthcoming session of parliament will have to deal. It is the age-old proposal to abolish appeals to the privy council, formally introduced at the last session by Hon. C. H. Cahan. Then, as always, opinion was found to be strongly divided, and the bill was held over when the minister of justice suggested that it was too important a matter for summary decision.

It is important, vitally important, to the future of Canada and the commonwealth, and the considered opinion of Ontario's attorney general should be a valuable guide to the House of Commons debate. His opinion is based on both domestic and imperial considerations, none of which can or should be left out of unbiased deliberations. "With greatest respect for this (the appeal court) and all other Canadian courts," he said, "I incline to the view that in matters and cases involving constitutional questions, particularly in issues between the dominion and a province or between provinces, the right of appeal to the privy council should be continued."

This, emphatically, is not the view of some who are perhaps, quite as competent to judge. It is not the view of the sponsor of the bill. Whatever Mr. Cahan may think, there are many experts who cannot share his judgment.

In addition we have the opinion of probably the greatest lawyer which this country ever produced, namely, Sir Allen Aylesworth. I remember going into the court of appeal and seeing him handling the whole docket by himself. Three or four years ago Sir Allen Aylesworth said:

Now, when it becomes at least an academic question, if not a practical one, whether this parliament should do anything to limit or cut down that right of appeal, I desire to question, and to question strongly, the competence of any Canadian parliament to do anything of the sort. Of course, no one would argue that a mere resolution of one house of parliament would have any such effect.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for private bills having expired, the house will revert to its business before six o'clock.

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

The CHAIRMAN: We were considering item 429 in the Department of Secretary of State.

Mr. FLEMING: I wanted to say something on item 428, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GOLDING: Item 428 was carried before six o'clock, and we had been considering item 429 for quite a while.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand it is the desire that item 429 stand.

Item 429 stands.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

125. Combines investigation branch, $151,683.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the minister something about the prosecution of the dental corporations and what has been done in consequence of the direction of Mr. Justice Barlow to the jury that the evidence which was submitted by the crown was of such a nature that their verdict should be one of not guilty. I brought this matter up at the time the case was tried; for I found it very difficult to understand, having regard to the direct statements made in the volume issued by the commissioner of combines, that the judge under the circumstances should find that there was no evidence.

As I remember it, for I have not the notes before me, the judge directed the jury to bring in an acquittal because of the failure of the prosecution to make out a case: first, because of failure to prove that the documents which were taken from the possession of the nineteen defendants were in fact documents signed by the representatives of those defendants; and, secondly, because of the failure of the prosecution to prove that these companies were in fact incorporated companies and that the individuals in question, who had signed the letters upon which the prosecutions were based, were in fact officials of the corporations.

The answer given by the minister at the time was that the course followed by the prosecution in failing to prove these obvious matters was an intentional course. Well, if that be so, I should like the minister to explain this. If it was an intentional course, why did the crown counsel, upon the judge indicating the position he would take in regard to the prosecution, and the direction he would give to the jury, then ask for leave to introduce further evidence, which would be admissible, under the rules of court, only provided that the failure to prove these necessary elements was the result of inadvertence or mistake? That is the first question I raise in regard to the combines investigation branch.

The second question I will now state. I can quite realize that one of the arguments which might be advanced for the publication of reports on the part of the commissioner investigating combines is that publicity is a valuable deterrent. But I return to the matter which I dealt with the other day, or to which at any rate, I casually referred. Is there any justification for trying an individual by reports from government departments, before the bar of public opinion, which reports indicate the guilt of those mentioned, when subsequently prosecutions may take place?

I have no sympathy for those who exploit. Indeed, the minister will remember that it was an amendment which I suggested two years ago, accepted by his predecessor in office, that restored to private individuals anywhere in this country the right to take proceedings against combines designed to exploit the public. On the other hand, I think fairness demands that when an official such as the commissioner in charge of the Combines Investigation Act makes an examination of individuals allegedly guilty of infractions of the act, the conclusions at which he has arrived, as a result of the questions asked the individuals involved, or following investigation in general, should not be embodied in a public report until after prosecution has taken place.

I am not in any way considering at the moment the merits of the case against the optical companies. I have no interest in them either directly or indirectly, nor indeed has any one of them communicated with me. But I have an abiding sense of what is fair, and I believe the people as a whole have the same sense. I do not think it can be justified that individuals shall be found, as it were, guilty, by public authority in a public document, until the courts determine the question in the affirmative.

I should like to hear from the minister on these two questions, both of which I consider important.

We have had a committee sitting on prices for the past four months, and I suppose, as well, the commissioner has been investigating alleged profiteering in this country. What has been done by him in that connection? How many members has he on his staff investigating profiteering? To what degree has consideration been given to prosecutions, and how many prosecutions have in fact taken place against alleged profiteers who are exploiting the public?

A statement from the minister on the general set-up of the combines investigation branch today would be timely, for I remember the former minister of justice stating two years ago that up to that time there were no teeth in the legislation nor was there a sufficient force to act with dispatch, but that with the amendments, a new era would have dawned and action would be the result wherever wrongdoing was ascertained.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman has asked me two or three questions in connection with the administration of the Combines Investigation Act. The first question related to the prosecution of the alleged dental combine.

As the committee knows, proceedings against members of the Canadian dental trade association were instituted on the direction of the Attorney General of Canada, on indictment by a grand jury. Eighteen corporate members of the association were charged with offences against section 498 of the criminal code and tried before Mr. Justice F. H. Barlow of the Supreme Court of Ontario sitting with a jury. The trial began on February 23, 1948, and ended on March 18, 1948, when the judge directed the jury to return a verdict of not guilty on the ground that the evidence submitted by the crown had not been adequately authenticated.

The crown is appealing from this decision and the Ontario Court of Appeal has decided to hear the appeal in September. Now, since the case is on appeal, it would hardly be appropriate for me to argue the points of law, even if I were briefed, as I am not. But my understanding is that counsel for the prosecution gave consideration to this question as to whether it was necessary to prove the authority of those who signed these documents to act for the defendants, the companies, and relying on certain cases he decided it was not necessary. I presume it would have been an enormous job. The case took a long time as it was. Whether that had anything to do with it or not, I do not know. It is true that, after a long argument, counsel for the crown did make application at the last moment to be allowed to call evidence to prove that those who signed the documents did so on behalf of the defendants in the action. That application was denied. My hon. friend asks me, if it was not inadvertence, why that application was made. I am not in a position to answer that, but I think I have been in cases myself where at a late date I decided that, in view of the reaction of the presiding judge or something of the kind, perhaps I had better do something I had not planned to do at the outset of the case.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But not after your case was closed.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. At any rate that is a matter which I cannot answer. Mr. D. L. McCarthy was senior counsel and Mr. Peter Wright was junior counsel; there was a large number of counsel. But Mr. McCarthy had a great deal of experience. All we can do is to get the best counsel we can, place the case in their hands and be guided by their advice. As I say, the case is on appeal.

The second question the hon. gentleman asked me is an important and interesting one; that is, whether this act is fair in the provision that it makes. It must be borne in mind that we are on the estimates here tonight, and I do not know whether we should be considering the principle of the Combines Investigation Act. The act is not before the house for amendment. The relevant sections are first, section 12, which reads as follows:

> The commissioner shall, on application made under section 11 of this act, or whenever he has reason to believe that a combine exists or is being formed, or on direction by the minister, cause an inquiry to be made into all such matters as he considers necessary to inquire into with the view of determining whether a combine exists or is being formed.

And then later, section 27, paragraph 5, is to this effect:

> Any report of the commissioner or of a special commissioner, other than an interim report or a report of a preliminary inquiry under section 13 of this act, shall within fifteen days after its receipt by the minister be made public unless the commissioner states in writing to the minister that he believes the public interest would be better served by withholding publication, in which case the minister may decide whether the report, either in whole or in part, shall be made public.

As I said the other day when the hon. member raised this question on the orders of the day, that section or a similar section has been in the act from 1910 down to the present time. Of course, from 1923 until 1935, I think, the registrar was the important man; the general course was that the registrar made an investigation and a report, and the act was silent as to whether that report should be published or not. But if he reported that there was a prima facie evidence of a combine, a special commissioner was appointed; and the special commissioner's report was subject to exactly these provisions. From 1937 on, those provisions have been in the act.

I submit that it is necessary that there be publicity. At least, it is my contention or submission that there should be publicity. This offence is not at all like an offence that speaks for itself. It is all a mystery. The public has no way of knowing whether there is any combine or not. It is not like theft, bank robbery or any of those other overt or open acts where it is clear that there has been an offence. Here there is just a dark surmise and that is all. If the public is to know anything at all about this, it must be explained to them by the report of somebody who has made an investigation. If you have no provision that that report is to be made public, there is no possibility of an opportunity for public opinion to operate on governments, attorneys general or ministers of justice. There is no possibility of that; and you have to make a strong assumption that public officials will be fully alive to their responsibilities.

My hon. friend is not fond of delegating these great responsibilities to the ministers of the crown. I know that from what he has said in the house. In a matter of this kind I think the operation of public opinion is something to be encouraged. That does not mean that the commissioner should put in anything he feels like putting in that report. It does not mean that he should build up a brief there for the prosecution. It does not mean that he should seek to influence public opinion in a one-sided way. I think it is open to argument that there ought to be some safeguards of what is the purpose in the report. But after all, there is not much difference between the publication of a report by the commissioner and a preliminary inquiry into a criminal action. The commissioner has no judicial power; that is, he cannot himself determine the guilt of the accused. All he can do is express an opinion. The question is how far he should go in expressing an opinion, and whether he should not confine himself fairly well to facts.

I agree with my hon. friend that that matter is open to argument, as to how far the commissioner should go in that report. But I think there must be a report, and that as soon as he makes it, it should be made public in the normal case. I thoroughly understand the difficulty that my hon. friend points out. It is not usually done. It is done in a preliminary inquiry. People everywhere read all the evidence against the accused. They read that he is committed for trial, and that there is a prima facie case against him. Yet that is not deemed to be contrary to the principles of natural justice and to be poisoning the minds of the public against the accused, because they understand that it is to be followed by a trial, that then they will hear the other side, and that there may be another side. The trial is deemed to be a fair one. So long as it is understood that this is the result of an inquiry which necessarily precedes a trial, and so long as restraint is exercised by the commissioner in making a report, I doubt whether there is any serious infringement of the principle of natural justice.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. It occurred to me that a number of other members intended to refer to the dental supply case. The Minister of Justice has now informed the committee that notice of appeal has been filed and the appeal will be heard shortly before the appellate division of the Supreme Court of Ontario.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

The CHAIRMAN: In view of that fact, I thought I should remind hon. members of the rule respecting reference to cases which are sub judice. I would refer hon. members to citation 293 (c) of Beauchesne, second edition, which reads as follows:

> Besides the prohibitions contained in this standing order—

That is standing order 41.

> —it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada, that a member, while speaking, must not:
> (c) refer to any matter on which a judicial decision is pending.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is a salutary rule, Mr. Chairman, and one with which every lawyer would certainly agree.

I come back to the optical case. It is interesting to follow the reasoning of the minister. He placed the publication of the evidence as analogous to the proceedings in a preliminary hearing, as far as influencing public opinion is concerned. The statute provides that publication shall be made within fifteen days.

The report of the commissioner in this case is a strong condemnation of these companies, and goes farther than any mere indication of guilt. It suggests an absolute state of guilty mind, according to the opinion of the commissioner.

I was impressed with one statement made by the minister, that one of the reasons for the publication of this report was to ensure that public officials would discharge their responsibilities under the act, as a result of one public official issuing a report and arousing public opinion, which in turn would impel action to be taken. In view of the fact that action can be taken by the Attorney General of Canada, to whom was directed the report containing such comprehensive findings, I should like to ask the minister why, under those circumstances, action was not taken within the fifteen days, and why action has not yet been taken. The situation used to be that, before action of this kind could be taken, it was necessary to obtain the consent of the Attorney General of Canada and of the attorneys general of the respective provinces in which the offences were committed. Under the amendment I moved two years ago, that prerequisite was removed, and now action can be taken by anyone. In view of that fact, I should like to ascertain from the minister whether, having in mind what has been said and found by the commissioner, he as Attorney General of Canada intends to take proceedings.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no provision that proceedings have to be taken within fifteen days. Proceedings are taken when the attorney general is satisfied that there is a case. The report of the commissioner is very recent. It was sent to the attorneys general of the provinces, and the attorney general of the province in which most of the activities complained of took place has been asked whether he wishes to take action or whether he desires it to be instituted or conducted by the Attorney General of Canada. It takes a little time for that matter to be straightened out. There is no undue delay. There was a little longer delay than this, I think, in the case of the dental combine; but opportunity has to be given for the study of a long, complicated and involved report of this kind before a course of action is decided upon.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am not going to pursue the subject further, except to say that apparently the Attorney General of Canada, on receiving a report from one of the officials under the Minister of Justice, in which definite findings are made of a combine, still has to be satisfied that the report which so indicates has a foundation for the conclusion reached by the commissioner.

Mr. ILSLEY: Absolutely; certainly he does. The Attorney General of Canada is not bound to do what the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act tells him. He is not obliged to take his facts, and he is not obliged to take his law. Presumably he will take his facts.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is going quite a long way, because it means that the official responsible to the Minister of Justice, who makes the findings, may be able to convince the people of Canada as a whole that there is a combine and still may not be able to convince the Attorney General of Canada or Minister of Justice without the minister making further investigation, which is just one more reason—

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not further investigation; just giving consideration. My hon. friend would act in exactly the same way. That is the only responsible way to act, to give consideration to it. You have the report; you have the facts which are reported upon; you assume the facts are correct, and then there is a finding that there is a combine. You go over the whole thing with a fine tooth comb to see whether you could win a prosecution before you launch one.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is laudable, though the record has not been very good in the matter of wins in the courts after findings by the commissioner. I am not going to labour the point further, but I was most impressed with the statement by the minister that one reason for the publication was the creation of public opinion, which in turn would cause public officials to act.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I should like to say a few words on this item. Following the ruling of the Chairman, I shall not mention the optical case, which I understand is sub judice at the present time. However, from the statement of the minister I would say that, as the Combines Investigation Act is operating at present, it does not do what it was primarily set up to do; that is, it does not protect the people of this dominion against undue costs.

I believe a number of items could be mentioned which might very well be brought to the attention of the commissioner for consideration. One example is the dental case, in which I understand there is an appeal. Another example is the optical case. I say these are proof that the public are not protected under the act as it is constituted at present. Then, since the government has taken off price controls, we have had unreasonable increases in the cost of various commodities. As an example I could mention fertilizer, where we have a virtual monopoly, and where only last spring the government saw fit to force those who produce and distribute fertilizer to set their prices back somewhat.

The minister said it was very difficult under the act to find out all the ramifications in connection with these various matters. I admit that. He also said it was not a case of straight theft. I agree with that also, but certainly it is nothing short of legalized robbery. We in this group have tried to present cases to prove to the government that price control should have been retained in order to protect the people from these drastic increases in cost. I understand that the growth of monopolies in this country is nothing more than a stage of capitalism, and I am convinced that, under present conditions, we cannot stop that growth, that the Combines Investigation Act will never suffice to protect the people against unfair costs. I intend to have more to say when the act itself is up for revision.

Mr. FULTON: I should like again to raise the question I brought up on two earlier occasions this session. I mentioned it first when an amendment to the Canada Evidence Act was before the house and again when the estimates of the Post Office Department were being considered. I refer to the question of the prevention of circulation of certain pulp magazines which come under the general description of crime comics.

I wrote the minister in this connection on June 2, and it may be that he has not yet had time to consider my representations and to give a reply. I enclosed in my letter a sample of the type of magazine to which I was referring. Then, too, I have a question on the order paper to which the minister may not yet have had time to reply, in which I ask the following:

> How many offences under the criminal code, which might be classed as crimes of violence, have been committed by offenders eighteen years of age and under in each of the years, 1945, 1946, 1947 and 1948 to date?

This question was brought to my attention by way of a letter from the parent-teachers' association—

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, is my hon. friend going to mention crime comics on every item? We are discussing the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. FULTON: I understood that we had passed the first part of it.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. We are discussing the Combines Investigation Act item. It may be that there will be some item under which the hon. member can ask his question.

Mr. FULTON: I was under the impression we were discussing the general item.

Item agreed to.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

419. General administration, $276,326.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, the recent increase in salaries has been very much appreciated by the force as a whole, and was a step in the right direction. At the present moment I am not going to advocate any further increases, although I believe that at a very early day, certainly within the next few months, consideration will have to be given to further increases in certain specific ranks within the R.C.M.P.

I have a number of questions to ask in this connection. I would ask, first, the degree to which the mounted police is being maintained at strength. During the war their work on behalf of the war effort was effective and magnificent. Since the war they have been engaged in the enforcement of law, in the enforcement of dominion statutes and they have also been used in various municipalities as a municipal force.

On the last occasion the estimates were discussed I brought up the question as to whether sufficient recruits were being secured to meet the wastages apparent immediately following the war, when quite a large number of trained men ceased to serve at the conclusion of their period of service, and did not seek re-enlistment. The answer I then received was that sufficient men were available. Recently a campaign was started, and it still continues, to secure recruits, such applicants to be single, and between the ages of eighteen and thirty years. I should like to know the degree to which this campaign has been successful.

The second point I wish to raise has to do with investigation into the activities of communism in this country. On many occasions mention has been made of the report of the royal commission. In that report a significant finding was made, namely, that there exists in Canada a fifth column organized and directed by Russian agents in Canada and in Russia.

The second finding as it appears at page 685 of the report states:

Within the fifth column there are several spy rings.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

The next finding was:

We have been able to identify many of the members of one of these rings, namely, that of which Colonel Zabotin was the head in Canada. . . . Without documents such as Gouzenko placed before us we cannot identify any non-Russian members of the other rings.

What evidence is there or was there to support that finding? What evidence is there now that there exists in Canada a number of rings designed to undermine the state from within? That was a finding definite in its effect. The royal commission acted only in respect of one of these rings. I am asking the minister to let the Canadian people know what I asked him to let them know recently, at which time he replied that when the mounted police estimates came up the matter could be discussed. I am asking him to give to the people of this country some idea of the degree to which various organizations under Russian domination are in fact operating today in this country to the detriment of the country, and designed to sabotage our system and our form of government.

The finding is made by the commission. I ask the minister, without disclosing in detail matters which might be necessary to keep within the confines of the reports of the mounted police, the degree to which there was reason for this finding, and some indication of the amplitude of the government operating under communistic auspices.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think it would be in the public interest to discuss fully the knowledge the police have.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Just the general indications.

Mr. ILSLEY: I must say I have not that knowledge myself. I could not give it to the committee. I could get it, I presume, by going into the matter carefully with the police. But to talk about these rings, how far they have been pursued, where they are and what they are, would not be a proper thing to do.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I could not hear the last of what the minister said.

Mr. ILSLEY: I just said what I said at the outset, that it would be improper, I believe, for me to give information in the House of Commons of Canada to the public about police activities and the detecting of communistic activities, where it is going on, what is going on, who is doing it, and so on.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, Mr. Chairman, no one ever suggested that, and I made that clear. A finding has been made by a commission that there are several spy rings operating in this country, and I am asking the minister whether or not such spy rings are operating. I am not asking anything about the proceedings that are being taken by the R.C.M.P., but I want to know and I think the Canadian people have a right to know whether there is a spy ring or several spy rings operating here according to a finding made by a royal commission. I am not asking for any particulars of the investigation that may be going on. I had something to do with prosecutions in connection with this very matter long years ago, and I know something of the reports made by the mounted police and their activities. I think the Canadian people have a right to be apprised whether or not such rings in fact exist.

Mr. ILSLEY: If my hon. friend presses for an answer I shall have to give the matter careful consideration and leave it over until another time to see what I feel I can say. I certainly do not think I can or should say much about that matter.

Mr. PEARKES: Earlier in the session I asked the minister whether overseas service could be counted for pension purposes where a member of the force served in some branch of the service other than the No. 1 provost company and the marine and aviation sections of the force. The minister advised me that the question was receiving the consideration of his department. Could the minister give the committee the result of the deliberations of his department on this score?

Mr. ILSLEY: That matter was covered by the amendment to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act which was introduced earlier in the session. I do not know whether it goes as far as what my hon. friend has in mind, but if he has not familiarized himself with that amendment I think he should, because it is an extremely important one. That amendment provides:

> Time served on active service during the war that commenced in September, nineteen hundred and thirty-nine, may be included in the term of service of an officer for the purposes of pension under this part.

And also:

> Time served on active service during the war that commenced in September, nineteen hundred and thirty-nine, may be included in the term of service for the purpose of pension under this part.

Does my hon. friend have something different in mind?

Mr. PEARKES: That includes all men in all branches of the force who served in any service overseas?

Mr. ILSLEY: If they went into the force when they returned; it does not cover them if they are out.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister has not said anything about the degree of success there has been in the recruiting campaign.

Mr. ILSLEY: The estimates for 1947-48, the year just ended, provided for an establishment of 3,481 persons in the force; that is, in administration, land services, marine services and aviation, but not including any civilian establishment. The estimates for 1948-49 provide for an establishment of 3,329, or somewhat smaller. The breakdown is as follows:

Administration	63
Land services	3,015
Marine services	230
Aviation	21
	3,329

The actual strength on May 31, 1948, was as follows:

Administration	61
Land services	2,798
Marine services	216

This means that the force as a whole is 237 under strength, with the land services being 217 under strength. The recruiting was not proceeding satisfactorily, because it was difficult to get the right type of men, but recently it has improved to a marked extent and is proceeding satisfactorily at the present time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: A number of young men, well educated and physically fit, have communicated with me. At least two of them made application to the mounted police and were turned down. I should like to know the basis of the qualifications. I understand that within the last year the mounted police have again begun to train men for the musical ride. That is a fine thing. Now that the force has ceased to use horses, it has lost some of its traditional attraction, but bringing back the musical ride will regain some of the romantic past as well as carrying with it an incentive to many young men to join the force. Aside altogether from the physical, what are the educational requirements of a young man who comes within the age limits of eighteen and thirty years?

Mr. ILSLEY: As is shown by the figures, the standards are high. Since January 1, 1946, 12,200 have applied for admission to the force, of whom 803 have been engaged.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Can the minister give the engagements by provinces?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not a succinct statement as to the standards, but there are physical and other standards which have to be met. Occasionally I have to write a letter, and I get information from the commissioner that a young man is immature in his outlook or something like that. The applicant must answer questions and his general type is taken into account. These standards are not tangible, because they include maturity of outlook and that sort of thing.

Engagements by provinces, for the regular force, are as follows from January 1, 1946: Prince Edward Island, 4; Nova Scotia, 38; New Brunswick, 30; Quebec, 50; Ontario, 228; Manitoba, 84; Saskatchewan, 101; Alberta, 136; British Columbia, 73; making a total of 744. In the marine section the engagements are as follows: Prince Edward Island, 1; Nova Scotia, 16; New Brunswick, 3; Quebec, 2; Ontario, 17; Manitoba, 1; Saskatchewan, 4; Alberta, 10; British Columbia, 5; making a total of 59. Those two together make up the 803 I mentioned. They were selected out of something over 12,000 applicants.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: To what degree are veterans given an opportunity to join?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are given every opportunity.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has the minister figures showing how many of that 803 are veterans?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. I should not think the preference would count for much in a situation like that where you are trying so hard to get men who are suitable.

Mr. TIMMINS: Is there at the present time an auxiliary force connected with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police consisting of civilians who have volunteered to do much the same sort of work they were doing in wartime, having regard to recent subversive activities? If such an auxiliary force is in existence, how many are there in that force, and do they receive any pay or allowances?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are auxiliary forces in Montreal, Winnipeg and Toronto, and they get the pay of the regular members of the force when they serve.

Mr. TIMMINS: What is the total strength of the auxiliary force? Are they issued with uniforms which they wear when serving? Do they drill or take part in any activities of a police nature?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are 326 in this R.C.M.P. reserve. They are issued uniforms and wear them when on duty.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. TIMMINS: Do they have to pay for the uniforms, or are they issued free by the R.C.M.P.?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a free issue by the R.C.M.P.

Mr. TIMMINS: Last week there came into my hands a periodical sent out by someone connected with the R.C.M.P. It is a magazine issued to members of the R.C.M.P. and the auxiliary force, to which all members of the regular and auxiliary forces are expected to subscribe. A very poor plea was being made that this magazine was not getting along very well, that it was losing ground and needed more members. It seems to me that when we have a force like the R.C.M.P. it is a matter of concern to the public at large that such a publication should succeed and play some part in building up esprit de corps, particularly of the auxiliary force. Does the minister know of this publication and of the struggle it is apparently having to exist? Does he not think it is in the interests of the people of Canada that the publication should receive some assistance so that it shall not fall by the wayside but shall serve the purpose for which it was intended?

Mr. ILSLEY: This publication ran into a small deficit recently.

Mr. TIMMINS: The minister probably saw the letter that went out about it.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I did not see it, but the commissioner informs me that the former practice is being reverted to, of making a charge for the magazine. It was being distributed free. The government makes a grant to it.

Mr. TIMMINS: I notice that the price charged was $1 per member, and that was not enough to keep the publication going.

Mr. ILSLEY: There was a government grant of $1,500, and nothing was charged for the magazine for a while. It ran into a deficit, not very large, but that situation is being corrected and the magazine will be on a satisfactory basis from now on.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is the magazine for the purpose of inducing enlistment or to inform members of the force of what is going on?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is instructional. They have these publications in the defence forces. They are supposed to be a good thing in maintaining morale.

Mr. WRIGHT: During the war, applications were made to the mounted police by towns in western Canada to police their towns. I had one such case, and the reply was that the mounted police did not have the personnel necessary to give that service. Are they now in a position to give it and are they giving that type of service to different towns? How many towns in the west are being policed by the mounted police, and how many applications have been made in the past year? Are the mounted police now able to carry on this work as required by different towns in western Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: Rightly or wrongly, I have taken the position that it is not the business of the R.C.M.P. to act as a reservoir for municipal police. The R.C.M.P. needs certain reserves; they have peaks of demand and so forth, and therefore it is desirable that the R.C.M.P. should do some municipal policing, but not all that is asked of them, because this policing is being supplied at about half its cost to the municipalities, and the R.C.M.P. should not be maintained as a sort of source of subsidized policing for municipalities. For that reason we have never felt that we were under an obligation to load up our force with policemen to be used by towns wherever they wanted them; but, as I say, some towns are being policed. That is desirable in the interests of the force itself because, while they are operating as municipal police, they are available in an emergency for federal service. But it is a federal force, and the policy should be based upon federal requirements, including the requirements of policing the provinces, which is done by agreement with the provinces.

Mr. WRIGHT: Just how does the minister decide which towns shall be policed and which not? Are there certain regulations that it must be towns of a certain size or something of that kind? What is the determining factor?

Mr. ILSLEY: Nothing over 5,000 population and under 1,000, and if we have not enough personnel we turn down new applicants. That is all.

Mr. FLEMING: One matter I should like to bring to the attention of the committee is the pay of tradesmen attached to the R.C.M.P., not in the force personnel, but the administrative branch. When certain increases for the civil service were being put through not long ago such increases as were allowed tradesmen attached to the R.C.M.P., were, by any modern standard, entirely inadequate. One such case was brought to my attention within the last day or two. This was a carpenter; the increase he received was twenty-five cents a day, and when it came into effect the result was that the carpenter was earning $28 a week. That, I submit, is, by any standard, entirely inadequate for an artisan, and that is not the sort of thing that reflects credit either on the government of Canada or on the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, of which the country is so justly proud. I urge the minister to take steps to review the wages and salaries paid to the tradesmen who are in the employ of the R.C.M.P., and to see that they are put on a basis of decency and adequacy.

Mr. ILSLEY: If we are going into the question of pay and allowances, the first thing my hon. friend ought to do is to look at the pay and allowances for the R.C.M.P., and to see what they get in addition to actual pay, before he forms a judgment as to whether they are adequately paid or not. There is hospitalization; there is medical attention, dental attention; there are pension privileges and so on. I feel myself that the pay is adequate. It may be that there is some ragged edge somewhere there. I do not think $28 begins to tell the story. There are all sorts of things, in addition to that, of which that man is in receipt.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I understand something about the part played by tradesmen in military units. I am not clear as to the part they play in police affairs. Can the minister say a word about that?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is the maintenance of barracks, and some tradesmen are required.

Mr. FULTON: Have they farrier sergeants?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, farriers, not sergeants.

Item agreed to.

421. Marine services—arising out of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, enforcement of federal statutes generally, and other incidental expenses, $1,374,094.

Mr. PEARKES: Would the minister outline the duties of this section and say whether they have any responsibility in connection with rescue work?

Mr. ILSLEY: Their primary responsibility is the protection of revenue. That is the duty of the marine services of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, but they have done a great deal in salvage and rescue work as well.

Mr. PEARKES: During the last twelve months we have had a tremendous number of accidents on the Pacific coast, in which vessels both large and small have been wrecked and there has been loss of life. The suggestion has been made that a life-saving service might be established, but it was pointed out that the marine section of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were available in part to assist in that service. What facilities have they? How many vessels are there on the Pacific coast, and what type of vessels are they?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are two patrol boats on the Pacific coast and a considerably larger number on the Atlantic. The protection of revenue does not seem to require quite as extensive facilities on the Pacific coast as on the Atlantic.

Mr. PEARKES: I am more concerned with the protection of lives than with the protection of revenue. I want to know how many vessels there are on the Pacific coast.

Mr. ILSLEY: Two.

Mr. PEARKES: What type of vessels are those? Are they capable of going into heavy seas?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. They are coastal patrol boats.

Mr. PEARKES: Purely for inside waters?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. PEARKES: They cannot go up the west coast of Vancouver island?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. PEARKES: I see there is a reduction in this item. In view of the loss of life and in view of the fact that it is recognized, as the minister indicated a few moments ago by nodding his head, that the R.C.M.P. marine section was prepared to assist in rescue work, I feel that, with only two vessels incapable of going out in rough weather or doing anything but coastal patrol in inside waters, there is not very much protection as far as rescue work on the Pacific coast is concerned.

Item agreed to.

422. Aviation services—arising out of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, enforcement of federal statutes generally, and other incidental expenses, $177,254.

Mr. FULTON: What aviation services have the R.C.M.P. and where are they used?

Mr. ILSLEY: Aeroplanes are used in the Northwest Territories, flying personnel in and out, and they are used to some extent for patrolling the boundary line for protection of revenue, and also patrolling the seaboard for the same purpose. There are five aircraft in operation. There is a trainer in addition.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Do they do rescue work?

Mr. ILSLEY: In the Northwest Territories, yes.

Mr. PEARKES: None available on the Pacific coast?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Item agreed to.

423. Grant to the chief constables' association of Canada, $500.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to say just one word on this. This is a grant of $500 to the chief constables' association. Some years ago I had considerable contact with the association, through the former chief of police of Toronto, General Draper, and from him I obtained much information regarding the splendid work done by the association. A few minutes ago, or perhaps an hour ago, I had to be out attending another committee, and a number of items passed through the committee about which I should have liked to make some inquiry. Perhaps the minister discussed them. If he did, it is all right. What progress is his department making in the reclamation of prisoners turned out by these penitentiaries?

Mr. KNOWLES: We have not yet reached that item.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are not yet on the penitentiary item. We are discussing the R.C.M.P.

Mr. MacNICOL: I thought that item had been passed.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: You have not come to that yet?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Item 424.

Mr. MacNICOL: No, Mr. Chairman. Does the minister wish to say a word with regard to the helpfulness of the chief constables' association to the department in the reclamation of prisoners? That is their special work.

Mr. McLURE: On vote 424—

Mr. MacNICOL: Item 424 is not yet passed.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is an old item that has been in year after year.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know it has been. I thought maybe the minister had some record of the helpfulness of the association to the department.

Mr. ILSLEY: This vote helps the chief constables to pay the expenses of their annual convention and to carry on their proceedings.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the department not get from them a report of what they do?

Mr. ILSLEY: We get a copy of the report, yes. It is co-operation between the R.C.M.P. and the other police forces. This is a little grant that the dominion government gives them.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am sure that these chief constables would be of great benefit to the department in the administration of justice—

Mr. ILSLEY: The R.C.M.P., yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: —because they are trained in that respect. Nearly every city association has a committee which looks after assistance to and reclamation of prisoners released from penitentiaries.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Pensions and other benefits—

424. To compensate members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for injuries received in the performance of duty, $13,844.

Mr. McLURE: Is this an annual pension to those who are injured, or is it a lump sum paid for injuries that occur from year to year?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is made up of a number of pensions.

Mr. McLURE: Annual pensions?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have a long list of names of former members of the forces who are getting pensions for one thing and another, such as tuberculosis, loss of leg, injury to foot, injury to right arm, partial paralysis, loss of memory and so on. Those pensions granted to them under the provisions of the R.C.M.P. Act must be provided for every year, and this lump sum of money covers those pensions.

Mr. McLURE: The minister mentioned a man who lost an arm. What pension did that man get? I am referring to a case that I brought up two years ago. Has the minister one there from Prince Edward Island?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not the addresses here. What is the name of the man?

Mr. McLURE: Seymour Farquharson.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I have that name here: amputation of arm, $377.17.

Mr. McLURE: That pension was granted two years ago or increased to that amount. This young man, some forty-four years ago, lost his arm in the service and he was an excellent officer up to that time. Then he was discharged, sent home and had to eke out a living under a small pension that was paid to him, eventually amounting to about $23 a month. Two years ago, as a result of this matter being brought up before the committee and the department, this was increased, and I think it is now around $33 a month. This man has struggled for forty-five years to make a living. Now, when he has reached the age of about sixty-five or sixty-six, with this small pension, I think it is really a disgrace to the great R.C.M.P. that an officer who had the misfortune of losing an arm should be asked at that age to live on this pension of $375 a year. He has struggled hard all his life, trying to farm. That is about the only thing he knew when he came back. He raised a family. He is not now in a position to work hard at the age of sixty-five or sixty-six. I am certainly of the opinion that, when increases have been granted in connection with all pensions—and while this is not under the regular Pension Act, at the same time there is always a way by which this man could be properly compensated—he should not be getting any less than $50 to $60 a month. I should like to bring this matter to the attention of the minister, so that he can look into it and give the man a reasonable pension for the rest of his days.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. KNOWLES: No, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. McLURE: Wait a minute.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, I will.

Mr. ILSLEY: The Canadian pension commission fixes the amount of disability.

Mr. McLURE: A little louder, please.

Mr. ILSLEY: The Canadian pension commission fixes the degree or the amount of disability in this case and, I believe, the amount of pension. I will make inquiries, but I believe that, with the increase in the disability pensions that has been granted lately for members of the forces, persons here would have an opportunity of applying for increases. But I will look into that. I am not quite clear on it. It is not covered by this vote, which means that there would have to be some other provision.

Mr. McLURE: I would thank the minister, then, if he would look into the matter. I am sure from the human point of view he would judge that the compensation given for the loss of a right arm incurred years ago should be increased at the present time, with the cost of living so much higher.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wonder if the minister or the officials in front of him are sufficiently familiar with the case of Doctor E. A. Braithwaite of Edmonton for me to ask a question or two and in particular for the minister to make a comment. As I assume the minister knows, from the way he nodded his head, Doctor Braithwaite is now eighty-six years of age. His connection with the mounted police extended over a good many years. I am told that his total service in the Northwest Mounted Police, the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police amounted to forty-seven years and eight months, beginning away back in 1884. Of that period I understand that some twenty-eight years were spent in the ranks and as an honorary surgeon of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

The problem of Doctor Braithwaite is that of a pension. I understand that the matter has been taken up with the officers of the department a good many times by a good many friends who have been interested in this case. Doctor Braithwaite feels that he has claim to a pension; and many of those who know him and know of the long service he rendered to the force are surprised that he is not in receipt of a pension. However, I must be realistic in discussing this matter and admit that the minister has pointed out to me by letter that in his view Doctor Braithwaite does not have a legal claim to a pension. Nevertheless, I judge from a letter the minister wrote me on June 19, 1947, that the department has recognized a considerable moral claim on the part of Doctor Braithwaite, and considerable merit in the claim he has put forward. I base that statement on the fact that apparently the matter has gone to treasury board on at least one occasion, with the suggestion that a special vote by parliament might be asked, or even a special act passed.

If the Department of Justice has made a request of that kind to treasury board it would seem to indicate, I say, that there is merit in Doctor Braithwaite's claim for some kind of pension. In the letter to which I referred, the minister said treasury board had turned down this request, at least when it was made by one of his predecessors. I wonder whether a further request has been made to treasury board. If not, in view of the continued representations by Doctor Braithwaite and his friends, I wonder whether the minister would look into the matter further and see if something cannot be done for this man who gave so much service to the mounted police and who is now such an honoured elder citizen of the province of Alberta.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, Mr. Chairman, this case has been up quite often. My hon. friend says there is a presumption that if a request was made it was justified. I do not know that there is any such presumption. The presumption might be that treasury board was right about it rather than the minister who made the request. I do not know; I do not think I have made a request since I have been in the department. There has been a difference of opinion in the service, perhaps, about this case; but one thing is sure, and that is that there is no legal claim to pension. I am informed that this gentleman was a part-time doctor for a long time; that he never contributed to any pension fund; that he is not pensionable, and that it is just a question whether it is desirable to vote him a pension. It is not a legal question at all.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the minister whether he has looked into the case since he has taken over this department? I realize that he must have a great many matters to which he must attend personally; but the correspondence I have had concerning this case makes me feel that it would merit the personal attention of the minister. There does seem to be some dispute as to the kind of connection he had with the force. Certainly the doctor is of the opinion that he was in the force in every possible way. The minister tells me the doctor did not have a commission from the crown and therefore he does not have the kind of claim he puts forth. On the other hand, let me quote from the minister's letter to me, to which I have already referred:

> As Doctor Braithwaite was an honorary surgeon in the force, and still is, he was awarded the long service medal in 1928 in recognition of his long connection with the force.

The very fact that this matter has been considered to such an extent, and that a former minister of justice sent it to treasury board does, I submit, establish some presumption as to the moral and humanitarian claim, at any rate, of this old gentleman. So I hope the case may yet be given the kind of personal attention that seems to be necessary if anything is to be done for him.

Mr. CHURCH: As a former chairman of the Toronto police commission I have seen something of the good work done by the mounted police. They carried on through a long war, when they were enforcing tens of thousands of orders in council; and this is a very small amount of money to provide for those who have been injured while on duty. Following every war, as you know, there is a great deal of disorder throughout the country. As a result, these officers have to go out by night and by day and meet desperadoes and all kinds of people on the street; and they may lose their lives. Here we are voting only $13,000 to compensate members of this force for injuries received in the discharge of their duties. That is a very small amount, and I can tell you that the sum required in our city, where there are over a thousand policemen, is much larger. I understand that provision is being made for the future in many cases by an insurance scheme which recently passed the house, but I urge that there should be increases, not only in this item but in those dealing with the pensions paid to the dependents of those members of the force who gave their lives in the discharge of their duty. Peace has its heroes as well as war, and we would not consider giving such a small pension as is provided in the next item to a soldier injured in battle.

I want to commend the minister for the improvement he has made in his department. He has been hard working, conscientious and moderate in what he asks; but I urge that there should be a better deal for all ranks of the mounted police. On many occasions they have come to the support of the civil authorities, and they are doing excellent work. If you want to get good men for the force from now on you will have to increase the provision to look after them when they are injured, and to look after their wives and children if they should be killed.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I listened to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre speak of a very old friend of mine, Doctor Braithwaite. Perhaps I can agree with the hon. member, in the event we want to pension everybody, whether they contribute toward that pension or not. I know Doctor Braithwaite very well. He was with the mounted police, and now he is the chief coroner. I will go back a year; he may have died in the meantime. But up to a year ago he was chief coroner in the province of Alberta.

Mr. KNOWLES: He is definitely alive. I had a letter from him less than a week ago.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Frankly, I think he is infinitely more alive than the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. But, still, that is merely my opinion.

Mr. KNOWLES: Probably right.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It is neither here nor there.

Mr. HACKETT: That is a presumption.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Let us not talk about presumption. I know the doctor very well, and he has not done badly. It is a very rude expression, I know, but a great many people in Canada who have been feeding out of the public trough have not done badly. And now we, great fellows, all say that they must have pensions.

I am one of those people who do not believe in that. Certainly, with respect to our ill, our incompetent and our crippled, I believe in that sort of thing. I do not know this, but I am inclined to think that if we do not give Doctor Braithwaite a pension under the mounted police estimates the dear old fellow will not suffer very much.

But I know the socialists! They think everybody should have a pension. As a matter of fact, I imagine tomorrow they will introduce into the house in some manner or another, under some subterfuge, a suggestion as to a pension for the two people who have been recently elected to parliament—and I congratulate them upon that.

Mr. KNOWLES: Thank you.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): And my guess is that tonight in Vancouver Centre they will have another fellow. And so they will have a special bill—

Mr. KNOWLES: He is leading at the half-way mark.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You must be wrong about that. After all, I know something about time zones in this country.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was quoting a Canadian Press report.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The Canadian Press says he is leading at the half-way mark? I will go farther with you: He will be elected. That is my judgment. I was there, you see. I do not think there is any doubt about it, that he will be elected in Vancouver Centre. And, having met the gentleman, when he comes here with you delightful gentlemen I say you have a problem on your hands; because he is a radical, to the extent of being a communist. So now, all that you have sown will be reaped within your own party. You will have difficulty with that young man.

Mr. MOORE: He will be a bigger problem to you fellows.

Mr. KNOWLES: On a point of order, I have absolutely no objection to the hon. member for Calgary West making his political remarks at the proper time. But I do object to this sort of thing being dragged in, in connection with the case of this old gentleman, Doctor Braithwaite. Surely it is clear that I am not appealing for votes in the city of Edmonton; there is no by-election on there, and Doctor Braithwaite is only one old gentleman, eight-six years of age. I have raised this case with some reluctance. I have had some correspondence with him for several years, but until now I have not raised the matter on the floor of the house.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am surprised he ever wrote to you. But go on.

Mr. KNOWLES: Progress has been too slow. Hence I raised the matter tonight in all earnestness and in good faith, and I am sorry the hon. member for Calgary West has used the terms he has in connection with this case. He can say all these things about me or about the party any time he wishes, when we have a field day on that sort of thing. It is sheer nonsense, but we shall be glad to deal with it at the proper time. But we are now discussing an item respecting pensions for members of the mounted police force, and I suggest that the hon. member for Calgary West get back to that phase of the matter and give us a hand in this plea for Doctor Braithwaite.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, let me agree with everything my very good friend has said. But he will probably remember that I was turned aside twice because of interruptions from persons who sit behind him. I agree that we should stay within the rails; and if he would but control his own irrepressible youth who are sitting behind him, then of course I would have stayed within the rails and gone along with the discussion as we have had it.

Now that he tells me that he is a great pal of my friend Doctor Braithwaite, who is eighty-six years of age, I am inclined to think he should be very proud that my very good friend Doctor Braithwaite wrote him a letter at all. That is the greatest compliment I can pay to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, because, after all, the doctor is an old gentleman.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am certainly glad to hear that. I have been with him on many inquests. The doctor is not a lawyer. He has been our chief coroner; and if he could take care of some of the cadavers who are immediately to my left he could come to some excellent conclusions, which I think would do great credit to the doctor and to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. KNOWLES: Hear, hear.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Have I apologized to you sufficiently?

Mr. KNOWLES: Quite.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then that is fine. I am so happy to have the hon.

[Mr. Knowles.]

member for Winnipeg North Centre agree with me; because, of all the people in the House of Commons, of all the members I have seen in the house in the short time I have been here, he is the most generous with other people's money. I am very fond of him. I like his wit. At times it is incisive and, at other times, it is difficult to find. And when I meet him in the corridor and he explains his smart remarks to me, dumb as I am, after plenty of explanation, I finally find out exactly what he means—or perhaps the word "exactly" is badly used. Perhaps I should say I get a glimmering of the idea he had in his head before he destroyed it by talking. So we are getting along beautifully.

Mr. KNOWLES: Beautifully!

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): At the present time.

Mr. KNOWLES: And we are all enjoying it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): "Enjoying it"?—that word "enjoying" is a wonderful word. I have enjoyed what has happened in the last few days. I enjoy punishment, if it is delicate; but I admit I am not very happy about it—about what has happened in the last few days. I will not say I enjoyed it, because I can see the future. I will admit I am not happy.

But may I congratulate my very good friend upon his being so happy because of joining with the communists. They are now the big shots in politics in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am trying to—

Mr. PROBE: Very nicely put.

Mr. KNOWLES: But completely false.

Mr. GILLIS: As he knows.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): "Very nicely put"; "but completely false". The fellow who said, "as he knows" is, of course, just a partisan who will say anything. There is no truth in what he said. "Very nicely put"—I accept that. And somebody else says, "Completely false"—I do not mind that.

Mr. KNOWLES: You accept that, too.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I do not mind anyone saying that what I have said is completely false. That is a matter of opinion, so I cannot object to the statement by the hon. member for Regina City. You see, he has not been there very long. I was born there, and I know all about that place. I know about the decent pioneers who made that part of the country. So now we are in the position, because people have children—

Mr. PROBE: You are not the only pioneer there, either.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): No, I am not the only pioneer. My people came up in 1882, ahead of the railway, which got through in February of 1883. I was born only in 1886. The hon. member for Regina City is a great friend of my older brother and has been trying to beat him at golf for the last fifty years. He has failed in that as in anything else against the Smith family.

To come back to my very good friend, Doctor Braithwaite, I will not oppose any pension to Doctor Braithwaite whether he needs it or not. Is that a fair answer to what my hon. friend has said? The only reason he said this is to show how he is looking after our old people, but Doctor Braithwaite does not need looking after. But let me join my hon. friend in the broad position that we must look after our old people. I shall be delighted if Doctor Braithwaite gets $2.50, or $250, or $2,500. That would be nothing to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, as I remember so well.

An hon. MEMBER: And by-elections.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I had forgotten about that election back there. I remember so well that in New York there was once a man named Gates. He was quite busy in the stock market, and in the early days when railroads were being built he became known as "Bet You A Million Gates." I have often wondered what dire circumstances would ensue if "Bet You A Million Gates" had ever met "What's a Million Howe."

Mr. LOW: I have been trying to brush up on the correspondence mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but I have not had time to digest all of it. I should like to repeat what has been so well said to the minister by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. If there is any way by which this technicality could be overcome, I appeal to the minister to take the appropriate action.

This old gentleman has a long record of distinguished service, I believe going back as far as 1885. He is a friend of mine, because I worked with him in the government of Alberta for a number of years. A better chief coroner I have never seen anywhere. He used to tell me about his experiences while he was with the R.C.M.P. The minister has pointed out quite rightly that he was an honorary surgeon, but in whatever capacity he may have served, I am sure that he did it to the best of his ability, and his ability was great. If there is any way by which this technicality can be removed and Doctor Braithwaite given some consideration I would be happy to see it done.

Mr. GILLIS: Is it a matter of general policy of the department to grant pensions to the R.C.M.P.?

Mr. ILSLEY: We discussed a pension system in the bill which I had before the house earlier this session and which instituted a new pension system. There have been pension systems in the past, but this gentleman did not come under any of them. He has made no contribution. For a long period of time he was a part-time doctor—

Mr. LOW: An honorary surgeon.

Mr. ILSLEY: —with the R.C.M.P., and he continued to carry on his private practice. There was a time back in the days of the Riel rebellion when he was in the R.C.M.P. as a surgeon but not long enough to qualify for a pension.

Mr. GILLIS: I remember the contributory pensions provided for by the bill referred to by the minister. I was just wondering where all this reference to by-elections, communists and so forth came into the picture. I think we are wasting a lot of time. If a member of the R.C.M.P. served in the years before there was a pension scheme and did not have an opportunity of contributing, then I think there should be some administrative latitude to take care of extenuating circumstances. If a scheme had not been inaugurated at that time, that was not the fault of the service; it was the fault of those who administered the act.

This is not something peculiar to the R.C.M.P. We find it in many other industries across the country. Doctor Braithwaite was one of the pioneers in this service, and in our industrial set-up there are many old pioneers who are receiving no pensions and who are being relegated to the streets. They cannot come under the pension schemes that are being established.

The hon. member for Calgary West has assured us that this particular gentleman will suffer no hardship, but there may be other cases where hardships exist. I think, where anyone has made a contribution, as this gentleman has, to his country in the past and will in the future, the Department of Justice should be able to look after him in the event of circumstances arising over which he has no control and which cause extreme hardship.

Section agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

116. Departmental administration, $235,350.

Mr. ILSLEY: It occurred to me that some of the items might be non-controversial. Ordinarily the penitentiary item takes a long time, and I would prefer not to consider it tonight.

Mr. FULTON: I should like to say a few words about the question of crime comics. What I have to say will not take so very long, but I want to ask the minister a number of questions. If he prefers to leave this item until tomorrow it will be acceptable to me.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the questions are relevant to the item I think the hon. member had better ask them, so that I can read them in Hansard in the morning and perhaps be in a better position to answer.

Mr. FULTON: I brought this matter up under the general item, so that I might suggest to the minister certain measures to combat the increasing number of crimes by juveniles and to halt the increase of juvenile delinquency. Recently I have had brought to my attention a number of so-called crime comics which are widely circulated throughout Canada. This fact, coupled with the evidence of increasing juvenile delinquency, seems to me to demand that this House of Commons should request the minister to take certain steps to lessen the tendencies and to combat the causes. This is one of the active causes of juvenile delinquency. Unfortunately I have not yet got an answer to the question I put on the order paper asking how many offences under the criminal code, which might be classed as crimes of violence, have been committed by offenders eighteen years and under in each of the years 1946, 1947 and 1948. The minister will remember that quite a number of shocking crimes have been committed by juveniles in recent months. One of the most shocking was in Montreal recently, where a boy twelve years of age beat his mother to death with a baseball bat. He simply found her sleeping, lying there defenceless, picked up a bat and beat in her head for no apparent reason, except that, when being tried, he said he had seen that sort of thing in the comics.

This question has also been raised by the council of women who met recently in Ottawa. I have not seen all their resolutions, but I have been in discussion with some of the members of the council from my own part of the country and they said this question was vexing their minds to a great extent.

[Mr. Gillis.]

I have no official figures on the circulation of these magazines, but an estimate made by a responsible authority in Kamloops, a city of only 12,000 people, is that 15,000 of these magazines are sold on the newsstands there every month. They are sold as an article for profit. They are, I will not say attractively, but gaudily got up, so that they appeal to juveniles by their colours as they lie on the magazine racks. As if that were not bad enough, I have studied three of these magazines recently. I have one in my hand, "Green Hornet Fights Crime". Others I have seen, under a general title, which go on to say, "Crime Does Not Pay". That is the sort of cynical approach they make on the front cover. They are printed in Canada. The one I have in my hand is published bi-monthly in Toronto; Lou Ruby, publisher. It goes on to say "Second-class mailing rates approved by post office, Toronto. Any similarity between the characters contained in the comic section and any person either living or dead is coincidental. Printed in Canada by the Globe Printing Company, Toronto." This magazine sells on the newsstands for ten cents a copy.

I have spoken to people who have had experience in this type of thing and in dealing with juvenile delinquents in magistrates courts and so on, and they say that, without any doubt, this type of magazine is printed in a form which is calculated to make the maximum impression on juvenile minds. They portray crimes of violence, in pictures, with a few words as a caption which are easily understood.

I just want to give an example from the one I have in my hand. It starts off on the inside cover with the picture of a man striking a match and staring at it. The caption over the next picture is, "Tonight I dreamed of a blazing moon like a fiery wheel in the sky—burning trees were crashing about me," and the caption is illustrated. The next picture portrays him walking to a slum tenement, and he says, "I saw an old condemned building. Nobody would care if it burned down." The next picture shows this man holding a burning match, and the caption says, "Tonight I stole into the cellar of the condemned building and set my first fire." That is a fine thing to put before a youngster of twelve or so, who perhaps has just struck his first match.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, he would strike it before that.

Mr. FULTON: The minister says, "Oh". Is he shaking his head in disagreement? As I say, it is difficult to prove that these magazines do actually increase juvenile delinquency, but one can say at least that two coincidences go together, that there is an increase in juvenile delinquency and an increase in the circulation of this type of magazine in Canada.

I want to suggest certain specific remedies which might be taken to prevent the circulation of this type of magazine. The first one is direct censorship. I know the answer to that may be that since this comes under the heading of property and civil rights, it falls under provincial jurisdiction, and I suppose that to some extent that argument must be conceded to be valid. But certainly, in so far as the federal Department of Justice has any jurisdiction, it can, I think, directly order that the publication of these magazines be banned in Canada and, is so far as it has federal jurisdiction, prosecute anyone who publishes such magazines. Questions of the freedom of the press do not, I think, enter, because freedom has never yet meant license, and this type of thing is not freedom but license. It is abusing liberty to make a profit practically out of the advocacy of crime.

The CHAIRMAN: It is eleven o'clock.

Item stands.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

FRASER VALLEY—ARRANGEMENTS BETWEEN PROVINCIAL AND DOMINION GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to give the house the latest information as to the arrangements made between the government of British Columbia and our own government with respect to flood conditions in the Fraser valley.

Since his arrival in Ottawa, Hon. Byron I. Johnson, Premier of British Columbia, has been conferring with the Minister of Finance and other members of the government, as well as myself, regarding arrangements for co-operation between the two governments in meeting the appalling situation in the Fraser valley, which the government has recognized as a national disaster demanding action beyond the resources of the provincial government.

After consideration by the cabinet yesterday, the government agreed to accept financial liability for measures of relief and rehabilitation arising from the flooding of the Fraser valley, on the following basis:

1. The costs of temporary emergency relief to be divided equally between the two governments.

2. The costs of emergency measures already taken or being taken for protecting and strengthening the dikes and for their eventual reconstruction, and for the restoration of the protected lands by the pumping out of flood waters, to be met 75 per cent by the federal government and the remaining 25 per cent by the provincial government.

3. The costs of rehabilitating the areas affected by the floods to be settled by subsequent agreement between the two governments after receiving a report on the extent of damage from the Fraser Valley relief and rehabilitation commission.

In calculating the federal share of the cost of emergency relief and of protecting and restoring the dikes, it was understood that costs incurred by the federal authorities through the provision of services and supplies and as a result of the employment of the armed services would be taken into account.

Both governments have already directed their representatives, General Hoffmeister and Mr. Hamber, not to permit the working out of detailed arrangements to delay action urgently required to provide adequate emergency relief, or to maintain, to repair or to restore the dikes.

Mr. FULTON: Is the statement the Prime Minister has just read confined exclusively to the Fraser river valley, or will the same terms be extended to cover all areas throughout the province which are suffering damage from floods?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My statement relates to floods in the Fraser river valley only.

Mr. FULTON: Then are any discussions under way or were any discussions held with respect to damage occasioned in other areas?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; other areas have been considered, and matters with respect to them are still open. This is a statement on the agreement at the moment between the two parties.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): I have received a report from Colonel Snow, commanding officer of the Vancouver area, who has been co-ordinating activities in connection with efforts to control the flood and provide relief in the Fraser valley. From this it appears that the situation is not yet out of the critical stage.

Within the next two days we should know whether conditions are definitely on the mend or are likely to be considerably worse.

In view of the fact that in the United States they have had much more experience in flood control, particularly in connection with the Mississippi system, the flood control committee in Vancouver, with the concurrence of Colonel Snow, suggested that it would be useful to have the advice of American experts on the situation. Accordingly, at the request of the Premier of British Columbia, I made arrangements under which Colonel L. H. Hewitt, of the United States army, and two civilian engineers, Mr. John Monarch and Mr. Raymond Bracelin, were flown to Vancouver and yesterday inspected the dikes at Chilliwack and Vedder canal. We are greatly indebted to them for this service. Colonel Snow reports: "A number of suggestions were offered but general comment was that men in charge of dike work knew their job." They are looking over the situation in other areas.

At the present time, in addition to the naval and air force personnel engaged, there are 1,225 active and 1,359 reserve force army personnel, with another 500 active force on the way from the prairie command. Some of the reserve force men have been at work night and day for more than two weeks. Hon. members will agree that this is a very real contribution to meet a national emergency. It also represents a considerable contribution on the part of employers who would like to see their men back. Our intention is to release reserve personnel just as soon as the situation is in hand. In the meantime, I appeal to their employers to see the job through, as the men themselves are doing.

A rumour has been brought to my attention that several federal government employees have been told that the time they are spending on relief work will count against their holidays. On the authority of the cabinet I can tell the house that this is not so. Another rumour has reached me that an employer has laid off men because they were out with the reserves working on relief. I do not believe this; but if it were true I would think public opinion would be a sufficient corrective. No man should lose either job or holidays because he has been helping to meet a national emergency.

Mr. REID: Following the statement by the Minister of National Defence, commending the military and naval personnel for what they have done, I think it only fair that a word should be said on behalf of the many thousands who volunteered when the call came, and who have been working night and day without hope of reward. I rise today to commend them for having done so.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

PRINCESS ELIZABETH HOSPITAL FOR AGED AND INFIRM, WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in connection with the construction of the Princess Elizabeth hospital for aged and infirm, in the city of Winnipeg. Have representations been received from that city for assistance on the basis of the recently announced health program? If so, is consideration being given this request?

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I did not receive any notice of this question. I am not able to say whether any such request has been received but I shall take the question as a notice.

LOAN COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO DEFINITIONS, NUMBER OF DIRECTORS, ET CETERA

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 220, to amend the Loan Companies Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: I might point out to the committee that this bill was referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce. That committee made certain amendments to the original bill, which I shall read as we come to them.

Sections 1 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On section 5—Number of directors.

The CHAIRMAN: This section was amended in the banking and commerce committee to read:

Paragraphs (c) and (d) of subsection one of section fifteen of the said act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(c) The requirements as to proxies, the record to be kept of them and the time, not exceeding ten days, within which proxies must be produced and recorded prior to a meeting in order to entitle the holder to vote thereon; provided that an instrument of proxy shall not be valid unless executed within one year of the date of the meeting at which it is to be used."

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Executive committee.

The CHAIRMAN: A clause was added by the committee, to be known as 7A as follows:

7A. Subsections (1) and (2) of section twenty-two of the said act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"22. (1) The directors may by by-law provide for the appointment of a chairman of the board who shall preside at all meetings of the board of directors.

(2) If the chairman of the board is absent, the president, or in his absence, a vice-president, or in the absence of both the president and the vice-presidents, a chairman selected by the directors present shall preside at the meetings."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 8 to 24 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. MAYHEW moved that the bill be read a third time.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question about section 6 of the bill.

Mr. MAYHEW: Section 6 was carried. I do not think we should revert to the sections at this time.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member for Broadview is speaking on third reading. He can do that.

Mr. CHURCH: Does this bill amending the Loan Companies Act cover what were known as shark loan companies? Further, it seems to me that under section 6 these loan companies will be rich men's corporations. A shareholder must have stock to the value of $2,500. If he makes an assignment for the benefit of creditors he is disqualified. I should like to have my questions answered.

Mr. MAYHEW: To answer the hon. member's first question—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I would point out that we are now on the motion for third reading. The hon. member for Broadview has spoken.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first question let me say that this measure does not include the small loan companies. If the hon. member will refer to section 1(2)(i) he will find the expression, "exercising all the powers set forth."

[The Chairman.]

The word "all" is put in to include the loan companies but to exclude the small loan companies.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The parliamentary assistant has moved that the bill be read a third time. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. FRASER: With amendments.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: May I point out that the bill was not amended in committee of the whole. It was amended in the committee on banking and commerce, and was accepted in committee of the whole in the form in which it was presented.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

116. Departmental administration, $235,350.

Mr. FULTON: Last night when the committee rose I was discussing the question of the suppression of crime comics. I had made a brief review of the situation, based upon certain information I had, and I was about to suggest to the minister certain specific measures he might take to limit, if not to eliminate, the circulation of these magazines.

I have since noticed an article in the Ottawa Journal of Tuesday, June 8, which discussed the effect of these crime comics upon juvenile minds. The article is a report by Fredric Wertham, M.D. in the Saturday Review of Literature. Doctor Wertham is senior psychiatrist at the New York City Department of Hospitals, and director of the Bellevue and Queens general mental hygiene clinics in New York, so that he is a well qualified observer, and his article leaves no doubt that these crime comics have the effect which I suggested last night. This article is so outstanding, so clear and so helpful that I believe the committee would be pleased if I were to read it into the record.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I do not mind the committee having all the information possible on this subject, but I submit that the discussion is out of order. We are on departmental administration, and if any legislation which occurs to any hon. member can be discussed on this item, the field is unlimited. If my hon. friend will permit me to say so, my attention was called to the article last night by the hon. member for Stanstead, and the deputy minister of the department also called it to my attention this morning. I have not had an opportunity to read it.

Mr. HACKETT: We want to read it to you.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but I think it is hardly appropriate on the item for departmental administration to read a newspaper article involving possible amendments to the criminal code. I have drafted an amendment to the criminal code on this subject. I shall lay it before council—if I ever get a chance to get to council—and I shall come back to the house when the criminal code is being discussed, or before, and state what the decision of the government is on this matter.

The hon. member for Kamloops sent me a shocking instance of the abuse of freedom of the press. I agree with him, that it is just that. I am afraid, however, it is nevertheless legal; it is not an offence to publish the kind of material which was published and which is being distributed in various parts of Canada.

I am told that formerly these crime comics came from the United States and that they were subject to some check by the Department of National Revenue. Now, however they are printed and distributed in Canada. I think the hon. member has made a case for careful consideration of this matter. As soon as it can be considered by council I will advise the house, probably by way of notice of an amendment to the criminal code. If we decide not to do it, or if we decide that it is the wrong thing to do, when the criminal code comes up I will announce my decision and my reasons for it. I want to assure the hon. gentleman that serious consideration is being given to the matter.

Mr. FULTON: I certainly appreciate the assurance given by the minister, and under the circumstances I shall not delay the committee by reading this article, especially as the minister says it has been directed to his attention.

I should like to conclude by referring to the third suggestion I was going to make as to how this matter might be dealt with. Last night I suggested that it might be dealt with, first, by direct censorship, and second, by banning this type of magazine from the mails; and my third suggestion is that the minister might give attention to amending the Juvenile Delinquents Act. He has referred to a contemplated amendment to the criminal code, but he might find that the one or other or both would furnish a useful means for getting at this situation. I would refer him to section 33 of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, which is chapter 46 of the statutes of 1929. This section reads:

> Any person, whether the parent or guardian of the child or not, who, knowingly or wilfully,
> (a) aids, causes, abets or connives at the commission by a child of a delinquency; or
> (b) does any act producing, promoting, or contributing to a child's being or becoming a juvenile delinquent or likely to make any child a juvenile delinquent;
> shall be liable on summary conviction—

I imagine the difficulty in bringing a prosecution under that section would arise from the fact that the crime or particular act which produces, promotes or contributes to a child being a juvenile delinquent is not specifically defined. If there were inserted in this clause, or in a separate clause, a provision to the effect that the publication or circulation of magazines or books devoted to the portrayal of crimes of violence by means of pictures or by words and pictures shall be deemed to be an act contributing to juvenile delinquency, it would be easier to secure convictions under this act, or indeed under the criminal code. It did occur to me that the Juvenile Delinquents Act might well contain such a provision.

In closing I should like to express, not only for myself, but for those who have brought the matter to my attention and for many others in the country, appreciation of the fact that the minister intends to study it and hopes to introduce legislation to enable prosecutions to be successfully launched against those who are contributing to juvenile delinquency by publishing and circulating these books for profit.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, what has just occurred indicates the contribution a private member of the opposition can make to the better government of this country. The hon. member for Kamloops brought this question before the house the other day and again last evening. The cogency of his arguments in bringing the matter to the attention of the house has resulted in the press taking it up and in public opinion causing the government to act where action was long overdue.

In view of the numerous amendments to the criminal code which have been brought before the house I should like to ask what, if anything, has been done during the past year toward mobilizing the support of the law schools, as well as of judges or magistrates who have retired, looking to a revision of the criminal code and bringing it up to date by removing obsolete sections and changing others to conform to the penological, psychological and physiological advances which have been made.

This matter has been brought up before. On the last occasion either the minister or his predecessor said that it would be given immediate consideration. There has not been a revision of the criminal code since 1893. The result is that it is most difficult to reach a conclusion as to the applicability of many of its sections. A step has been taken in the right direction—I am not going to deal with this—so far as part XVI is concerned, and there is an effort in the amendments now introduced to bring some semblance of sanity and reasonableness to these sections. But many other sections require revision. The penalty sections should be changed in the light of present-day advances. The matter deserves serious consideration. Even though the minister is on the point of relinquishing the portfolio which he recently assumed, he could make a worthwhile contribution by laying the foundation for the setting up of a commission to revise the code as it is now constituted.

Mr. ILSLEY: The criminal code certainly needs revision. The commissioners on the uniformity of legislation have been working on it year after year. They advised me last August that they did not think they were the proper body to revise the criminal code. They are not remunerated for their work, and they do not have much time to devote to it. Certain provinces review certain parts of the code, and a great deal of work has been done. We have been rather hoping that a piecemeal revision of the code could be made by that method, and we have not completely given up the idea. The difficulty about revision is to get the proper persons to take charge of it, persons in whose judgment one has confidence and who are in every respect competent.

The amendments to the criminal code which I introduce year by year take an enormous amount of time. Decisions cannot be hastily made, because they involve balancing considerations. The amending bill this year is a long one. We adopted many of the recommendations of the commissioners on the uniformity of legislation; we rejected others, and we amended others. I suppose it would be an exaggeration to say that there is as much work on one of these criminal code amending bills as there is on the budget; but there is a great deal of work, days and days of it. It requires judgment which in the last analysis devolves on council. It comes to the minister, but the minister says, "I do not think we should do that; we should do something a little different." Finally it goes to council and we evolve a bill. If council approves I propose to introduce an amendment this year to provide for the revision of the statutes to be made by a commission, and that will include the criminal code. In the meantime we are making inquiries to see whether we can get together the type of organization we want for the amendment of the criminal code. The work has not ceased; it is being done all the time by the commissioners, and these important amendments which are being introduced year by year are continually cutting down the amount of work that is left.

There is a view that we should try to prevail upon the commissioners on uniformity of law to do the whole thing, part by part and section by section, but I do not think they are quite disposed to accept that view.

Mr. HACKETT: I have had occasion to refer more than once to the recodification of the criminal laws. It is a work which should be carried out. The Canadian Bar Association, which, as the house knows, works in close association with the commission on uniformity of laws, is of the view that piecemeal recodification cannot be final. A number of reforms and improvements have been brought in and grafted upon the criminal code, but a general revision is much needed. I do not think that that fact is in dispute. The task is a heavy one, and undoubtedly requires talent, knowledge, and perseverance of a high order. It has occurred to me that the commission on the uniformity of laws might, if requested by the minister, be able to render a substantial service. I am sure they could supply the minister with the names of a number of competent criminal lawyers who would be capable of doing the work very well. I understand, of course, that the government would not delegate to this body the privilege of naming a commission to review the criminal code, but I do believe that a discussion with the commission would yield a number of names from which a competent and aggressive commission might be chosen to revise the code.

I think one of the obstacles to a full revision is the fact that each year we do enact a few amendments that patch the roof and stop the leaks. It is because we deal with these emergency matters every twelve months that we put up with the general inadequacy of the code. I share the view of the hon. member for Lake Centre, and if the dire threat that is upon us is carried out and we are to lose the benefit of the wisdom and prodigious industry of the right hon. gentleman who presides over the ministry of justice, I do believe that if he were to set in motion within the next two or three weeks a movement which would bring about recodification, it would be one more thing for which he would be remembered and for which the profession and the non-criminal element of Canada would be deeply grateful to him.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the delays in the appointment of judges, I will mention one particular case—and I do not think the reason for the delay has been a shortage of Liberal lawyers. On the third of March I asked a question in the house about the vacancy in the district court in the judicial district of Prince Albert. I speak not as the representative of that constituency but as a member of the bar of that judicial district. This judicial district over the years has given one judge to the Supreme Court of Canada, in the person of Mr. Justice Lamont; has given to the diplomatic service two erstwhile judges, Chief Justice Turgeon, who now occupies the post of Canadian high commissioner in Ireland, and Mr. Justice Davis, who recently retired from the bench to enter the diplomatic service permanently and is now ambassador to China. That bar has turned out at least twelve superior court judges, besides some ten or twelve county court judges, in the last thirty-five years. Prince Albert was one of the first judicial districts established in Saskatchewan. Since January 1, 1947, we have had no judge for that judicial district. We have had the assistance of two acting judges, one from Humboldt and the other from Melfort. His Honour Judge Hanbidge, from Humboldt, has discharged most of the duties, and done it well. But, sir, the delay in making this appointment just cannot be brushed aside by the answer given by the minister on March 3, when he said:

> As the volume of judicial work in the Prince Albert district since the retirement of Judge Doak has been such that the judges from Humboldt and Melfort districts have been able to perform it in addition to the duties in their own districts, it has not so far been deemed necessary to appoint a successor.

That answer just is not fact; it does not answer the question at all. I shall not go into details unless the minister wants them. This judicial appointment should not be allowed to remain outstanding until a provincial election has been held. The appointment should be filled. Any number of possible Barkises are able and willing to accept the appointment. Why does that judicial district appointment remain in such a nebulous position, and why has it not been filled? It is a serious matter that this district, in which the volume of business is as great as in all but two or three of the other judicial districts in the province, should have to depend upon judges coming in from other judicial districts. If a judge is appointed or transferred to that district, we shall be perfectly happy. We have a right to the appointment of a judge instead of the delays such as we have experienced.

Mr. ILSLEY: This delay is not unusual. It occurs in provinces where there is a comfortable allotment of judges, as everyone knows there is in Saskatchewan. If this were in the province of Quebec, and we were dealing with superior court judges, we would be falling all over ourselves to make the appointment because of the greater rush of cases and the tremendous necessity of filling appointments promptly. There are some provinces in which that is not so, and Saskatchewan is one of them. I have never been told before that anyone is suffering as a result of judges from the outside coming into that district. I am not convinced at all that judicial business, or the interest of litigants, or the interests of the bar, have suffered.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If that is the attitude of the minister, so long as the people of Prince Albert understand it, it is all right with me.

Mr. ILSLEY: The people of Prince Albert are not being discriminated against. The same condition exists in various parts of Ontario, for the same reason. It often happens in the maritime provinces.

Mr. BROOKS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ILSLEY: But if there is a delay of years in filling a judicial appointment, for instance, that is when the need arises. When it comes to our attention that the business of litigants is not being transacted, we act immediately and responsibly to the requirements of the situation. My hon. friend has never said anything in this house to indicate that anyone is suffering as a result of this appointment waiting a while, as many appointments do, not only in Saskatchewan but in Ontario and in the maritime provinces, and I think in some other parts of Canada as well.

Mr. McIVOR: I should like to say a word in support of the splendid success of a judge at the head of the lakes who presides over the family juvenile court. If every city in Canada were taken care of in the same way that that judge takes care of the juveniles at the head of the lakes, the criminal code would soon become obsolete. Judge McKitterick, in addressing a group of young athletes, paid tribute to the men and women who control the athletic endeavours of the young people at the head of the lakes. During the winter there are twenty-four hockey rinks in operation in Fort William, and controlled and supervised playgrounds are in operation during the summer. Judge McKitterick said that not one boy or girl was sent from the head of the lakes because of juvenile delinquency. The reason he gave was that the boys and girls were well taken care of. I pay my tribute to the judge, because he is one of the direct causes of this desirable condition; and it is the result also of the manner in which he takes care of the mothers and fathers. He tells them how they should take care of their children; train them up in the way they should go, and when they become men and women they will observe the law. I thought it would be a little encouragement to the Minister of Justice to know that in some parts of Canada we are not thinking in terms of observing the criminal code; we are thinking of the care of our boys and girls.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not come from Saskatchewan, and unlike some others, I do not intend to take any part in the affairs out there, and I know of no Toronto member who wants to. I want to bring three or four matters to the minister's attention. I shall just mention them without discussing them.

There has been a lot of trouble about what is and what is not a voluntary statement made by one in the custody of the police. It was referred to in the court of appeal for Ontario last year in connection with a Hamilton case. There should be some clarification of the law in that respect, to find out how far a police officer can go in examining a prisoner in his custody. For example, the other day the court of appeal dismissed the case of an Indian charged with murder because the Indian said he was talking in his sleep. Notwithstanding all that the chief justice said about it, how could it be a voluntary statement? Many people talk in their sleep. They are not conscious—or it is the operation of the subconscious; it was not voluntary. I cannot understand it.

The second thing is this. Parliament has no power to enforce its own laws across Canada. A couple of hundred thousand orders in council were passed during the two wars and the interval in between. Since confederation the enforcement of all federal laws that we pass, the statutes and the orders in council and their interpretation are left to the crown officers of the provinces. For this reason, every bill we pass has become a very heavy burden on the municipal police systems. In Australia a bonus and subvention are given to the large city of Sydney. When I looked it up some years ago it amounted to a subvention of $2,000,000. I believe the time has come when two things should be done. Either the federal government should enforce its own federal laws, or it should give some bonus, subvention or subsidy to the police system, as they are doing all over the dominion today in many other matters involving section 92 of the British North America Act. A cash subsidy was given at confederation for the definite and specific purpose of maintaining municipal institutions and justice in the provinces. A duplicate municipal system has been foisted on the country by section 92. I hope this matter will be considered by the government during the parliamentary recess.

Many young people are in trouble today. It follows every great war. We all know what the Addington administration said in 1801. That situation followed Pitt on down through to 1815, and it has followed every great war. It followed the Crimean war, the South African war and others. Many young people get into trouble, but they have no counsel. They roam all over the country looking for work, and my hon. friends capitalize on them later on. Steps should be taken for the improvement and betterment of the citizen. During the days of the depression a large number of high school students were roaming around looking for jobs, but no work was provided for them. The result was that they got into trouble. The police could not do anything about them, and some of them were committed to jail.

I should like to know how far policemen can go in these cases. I know of about seventy-eight policemen in the Court Street station in the business district south of Queen street in Toronto. A large number of them are returned soldiers. They are the finest possible type of officer. Of the 104 members of parliament who visited our city the other day, one or two commented on that fact. We should have clarification of the law regarding our police officers. I am only expressing my own personal opinion about it. In many of these cases the youth is not armed where he is trying to do something he should not do and all that kind of thing. Some of them are panhandlers. Others are down and out, and they flock to the city. Some of these are displaced persons who have been brought in for certain specific work; they roam back to the city, and the police have trouble with them.

I suggest to the minister that there should be some clarification of the law as to how far a police officer may go in firing first in the air, then along the ground. He may injure somebody who may have committed only a petty offence under the law. Clarification is in the interests of the police themselves, because some of them have been sued in the civil courts for such offences.

I will just mention two or three other matters. One is with regard to accidents on the roads and highways in Toronto and throughout Ontario; all over Canada I believe it is the same. At weekends some of the poorer people who own a truck take fifteen to twenty people, including children, out to the country. The roads are crowded. Right here in this city there was a week-end accident. Five people were injured, and nobody faced a charge. In our city a small truck with thirty-two people in it collided with another vehicle. What is the law in that matter? As far as I know, there is no law except the Highway Traffic Act. This is a dangerous situation. You see these trucks going along on weekends, when there are thousands of cars on the roads. I know of no law by which anyone could be charged.

Mr. HACKETT: Provincial regulations.

Mr. CHURCH: There should be some federal liability to cover it.

Another thing about which there has been considerable trouble is the overcrowding in streetcars. I brought this matter to the attention of the house about a year ago and made a suggestion to the minister. The present minister, from what I have seen of him, has been efficient and hard-working. I suggested that where there is overcrowding in streetcars, or disorder in the streetcar system, something should be done. I had a clause in my private bill to cover disorderly control. This is a matter which was referred to in another place by some of those who seldom if ever travel in the streetcars. There is a great deal of disorder on the streetcars all over the country. There should be some amendment of the law to deal with it. There is such a law on the steam railways; I do not see why it should not be applied to buses and streetcars as well. Another matter has to do with the banditry which is going on all over the country. There is no amendment to the code, so far as I can see, to deal with banditry, although there are sections of the code having to do with this offence. The law clerk has written me a letter about it. I do not think there is anything personal in it, and I shall quote a part of it, as follows:

> All the offences that bandits can commit are already provided for in the code. I have searched everywhere for a definition of "banditry" and do not think there is a special one which would apply, and, if we were to improvise one, we would be sure to come into conflict with existing provisions of the code.

That is right. I might point out that it is difficult to secure a conviction because there are loopholes in the other sections.

I know of no law which compels a woman to wear a hat in a court of law because she is a person. Some of them do not wear hats even in parliament. I know of no law by which a judge can say that a woman must wear a hat before she can become a witness. Some of the hats worn are small, and some of them are large. As I said to the minister one day, when I was calling his attention to the matter, some of the judges might want a long hat about the size of the paper carton in which molasses is put up in the cafeteria or in the parliamentary restaurant. The hon. member for Temiscouata said those hats would be too big for the honourable justice who requires the ladies to wear hats. There is no law in the matter.

The time has come when there should be abolition of imprisonment for debt; this was covered in my criminal code bill of last night. The minister referred to it last night in connection with Bill No. 207, when for the first time second reading was moved. That is the first opportunity we have had to consider it, and this is the 102nd day of this session. We have never had five minutes' time in this house to discuss the matter. We talk about the rise and fall of stocks, the rise and fall of wheat, and all those material things, but we have never had five minutes' time to devote to one of the main issues here—motorcar and other deaths. Eighteen people were injured or killed on May 24 on the roads of our country. The highways are not safe, owing to the way people travel on them. Men and women have been murdered in cold blood by hit-and-run drivers. We have not investigated the deaths at level crossings, the deaths of children who have been burned in their homes, and all these other matters, including the problem of babies born in prison. In England there is a law with respect to that particular matter. I understand that at the great battle of Queenston Heights only eighteen lives were lost on our side. That many people are killed in a week-end right here in the two central provinces, and the rest of Canada is not much better. I suggest that more time be given to discussion of these important subjects.

In England there is a law with regard to babies born in prison. Some people have fines imposed on them with no time to pay them. Many people are committed to jail who cannot pay their fine. Some of these are women. With regard to babies born in prison, I suggest that it is against the public interest to give a pregnant woman a term of imprisonment. I understand that, under the present minister, these women are moved to some other place. I am hoping that we may have some law to deal with the matter so that a stigma will not be attached to an infant who has done no wrong. I believe some survey should be made throughout the country with a view to making it impossible for a condition, such as that to which I have referred, to be continued.

I should like to see the state do something further. The state is responsible for young people who leave jail. They have no chance. The hon. member for Spadina is not here this morning but his partner Mr. Borins, K.C., was assistant crown attorney in the city of Toronto for some years, and he was a good one. He knows the facts. He gave an interview to the press which appears under the heading "Young man leaving jail hasn't a chance—Borins". The article reads:

> Norman Borins, Toronto's 38-year-old assistant crown attorney, who prosecuted nearly half of all Ontario's criminal cases during the past eleven years and who has retired to enter private practice, yesterday expressed alarm over the fate of youthful offenders against the law in this province.
> Pointing out that 75 per cent of all crimes are committed by youths between 18 and 25, the attorney, who looks nothing like the Hollywood conception of a hard-driving prosecutor, said emphatically that the provincial system of dealing with young offenders is all wrong.

Then the report goes on to say:.

> "As a prosecutor, it was not my place to advise the courts as to the treatment of convicted men and women," said Mr. Borins, "but I always did what I could out of court to help young offenders and never put barriers in the way of pleas for consideration made by their lawyers."

Little or nothing is being done in this matter. Just the other day the Toronto Synod of the Church of England was complaining about the same thing. The diocesan council for social service built, at their own expense, a hostel to rehabilitate these young offenders. The Church of England have a hostel for young women in trouble, and they intend to do the same thing for boy offenders, at their own expense. When a great many of these young offenders who get into trouble are in the downtown district, it would help to keep some of them under control and assist them to get on their feet again. Nothing has been done about it, though, by the state.

There was a case in Toronto the other day, in the riding of the hon. member for Danforth, which in the newspapers has been called the battle of the trolley. Citizens who came to the aid of a constable were abused. The constable's uniform was badly torn, and he was assaulted. That is not the sort of thing we should permit on our street cars, yet it is comparatively common in most of the cities of this country. There is a law about it in respect to railways. The present minister I think did have some provision passed in that regard, but those in another place did not sanction it.

I do believe something will have to be done during the recess of parliament to speed up implementation of the report of Mr. Justice Archambault in regard to prison reform. The minister has done something; but as the Ottawa Citizen said in a long article the other day, the pace of prison reform is very slow. I believe there should be a real housecleaning, because conditions have not improved. I know about some of these prisons. In my own constituency we have the Toronto jail, which was built at about the time of confederation. Years ago the late Doctor Hastings, the health officer, and I, visited the jail and found it to be unfit for human habitation and against all known laws of public hygiene; yet today it is still used to house prisoners, many of whom have to sleep on the floors at night because of overcrowding. I compliment the minister on having made a start at prison reform, yet we are far behind the mother country in constitutional reform, parliamentary reform, cabinet reform and most of all law reform. So I believe we have reached the stage when more time should be devoted to these matters. Under our present control system many people are going to jail because they do not have the money to pay the huge, savage fines imposed in our police courts. I have objected to that, and I object to it again today. Just the other day a poor woman was sent to jail for some minor breach of the income tax law. She did not file a return, through a misinterpretation of the law. As a result she had to go to Toronto jail, where there is no room for her, or to Mercer reformatory, an institution which should have been burned down long ago. I can tell you that in England they have closed half their prisons through real law and prison reform. They have done this by means of what is called the summary offenders act, under which a person is given time in which to pay his fine. He may have to spend an hour or so in a central office down town or in a police station, but he is allowed out on bail before five o'clock on the same day, and is given time to pay his fine.

My hon. friends to the left have been adopting this policy, I understand, just as they have conscripted the policies of our party during the last five or six years, as well as some of the policies of the Liberal party. Let me tell you that if I have my way there will be no union government in Canada. We had one experience of that kind in this country, and even today they have coalition governments in British Columbia and in Manitoba. The only alternative to such a government seems to be the party to my left. I say to hon. gentlemen of the C.C.F.: you have adopted the policy of bonuses, subventions and subsidies; it is a Conservative doctrine. Hon. members may smile, but they need not worry; I am not going to Saskatchewan, nor do I know of anyone else who is going there to take part in the local election. On the contrary I invite them to come to my riding or city at any time; we are always glad to see them.

I agree with hon. gentlemen to my left to this extent, however; that it is the duty of the state to take care of the matters I have mentioned, including the granting of time in which to pay fines, looking after those who come out of our prisons when their time is up, and all that sort of thing. That is a form of Christian socialism, and I am a Christian socialist just as well as hon. gentlemen to the left. I compliment them on what they are ready to do.

I believe the day is coming when we should devote some time to these questions. Now we do not have an hour to spend on them. I do not blame the minister, because he has been very hard-working. I have had a great deal to do with him and a great deal of correspondence with his department, and we heard his speech last evening in which he said the department was considering many of these matters. I do urge that more time should be devoted not only to the questions I have raised this morning, but to motorcar accidents, level crossings, fires, drownings, floods and all other things that contribute to the loss of life. By doing so we will be following a form of Christian socialism in this country, as they have been in England.

Mr. BROOKS: I wish to say just a few words on the matter brought up by the hon. member for Lake Centre—the delay in the appointment of judges. The minister stated that at various times in the maritime provinces there had been some delay, and we all know that is quite true. We have suffered not only through delay in the appointment of judges in our province, but some judges have been ill for long periods of time, and as a result I think the work of the judiciary has suffered. The chief justice of New Brunswick died over two years ago, and another vacancy was caused by the death of Mr. Justice Fairweather. While the minister says he does not think law enforcement has suffered, I do not believe that is the opinion of the bar in general.

I should like to ask the minister when the vacancies in New Brunswick will be filled. The position of chief justice was filled a short time ago by the appointment of one of the sitting judges, Mr. Justice Richards. I want to compliment the minister on this appointment, which was completely non-political, since at one time Mr. Justice Richards was Conservative premier of New Brunswick. He has been on the bench of that province for the past thirteen or fourteen years, and has had wonderful success as a judge. I believe his appointment as chief justice has been received with very general favour in our province. There was some feeling, perhaps, that his appointment might have been made to prove the truth of a statement made by Mr. McNair, Premier of New Brunswick, that he personally would not accept the appointment as chief justice. However, the people of that province know that while the position of chief justice has been filled there are two more appointments to be made to the bench, and there is a feeling that while Mr. McNair was not appointed to this position he may still accept an appointment to fill one of the remaining vacancies. As I say, I wish to compliment the minister on the appointment of Mr. Justice Richards as chief justice, though I believe Mr. Justice Harrison could have filled the position equally well.

This idea of non-political appointments is very wise, particularly in some provinces. I do not say this to discredit the bar of New Brunswick, but I feel that political appointments in that province have been pretty well exhausted, as far as government appointments could be made. I suggest to the minister that in filling these vacancies he continue the policy of making non-political appointments. Appoint the best men you can get. There are splendid lawyers on the Conservative side in that province, and I know the minister would do great credit to himself and to the bar of our province if he forgot about politics in making future appointments, as he did in filling the position of chief justice, and that it would be better for the bar in general.

My object in rising was to ask the minister when he intends to fill these vacancies in New Brunswick. I do not think he can use as an excuse for not filling them the suggestion that they are not needed.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have a feeling it is quite unusual for a Minister of Justice to say when he intends to make recommendations for the appointment of judges. I should not like to create a precedent by doing so in this instance. The situation is constantly under review, and a recommendation will be made in due course and in accordance with the facts of the situation.

I thank my hon. friend for his kind words respecting the promotion of Mr. Justice Richards. I thought when he was saying that there were good lawyers on the opposition side he was going to say, "on the opposition benches"; but he did not go that far.

Mr. BROOKS: No, I would not go that far.

Mr. GILLIS: May I say first I am sorry this will be the last time the present Minister of Justice will pilot these estimates through the house. As a Nova Scotia man I was happy that we had in the house at least one sound and sensible person from Nova Scotia.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That is a bit hard on the rest of you.

Mr. GILLIS: I was referring to the government side, of course. I am sorry the minister has decided to leave us, because he will be greatly missed, particularly in the field in which he is now engaged. Because I view the Department of Justice as the one department which could do a great deal to civilize this country. I say that advisedly.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Even Nova Scotia?

Mr. GILLIS: More particularly Ontario, from the standpoint of justice.

I have checked over the details of estimates, and I have only this to say, I have listened to hon. members talk about reforms in the administration of justice, but in my opinion they are talking from the wrong end. Reforms do not come from the top; they must come from the bottom. From the point of view of personnel, administrative staffs, salaries, and the like, I believe the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice in the administration of justice in Canada is sufficient. In my view, if there is to be any reform in this regard, we must start in the magistrates' courts. My experience has been that across this country in most provinces—

Mr. HACKETT: They are not paid by the dominion.

Mr. GILLIS: All right; they should be. If you are going to talk about reforms you will have to get sane and sensible persons into the courts of first instance. No self-respecting lawyer in this country today wishes to hold the post of a local magistrate. The result is that, by and large, you have administering the courts of first instance local civic politicians with practically no training in law, and in many cases very little judgment. When juvenile delinquents and young offenders are taken before these local magistrates they are up against men who not only are lacking in knowledge of law but subject to civic pressure, small-town politics in most cases, pressure from all directions, and the pulling of strings.

In many cases young offenders who have been sent to the penitentiaries for a year or fifteen months have been made criminals in the first instance because a local magistrate lacked judgment and discernment in handling the case. The young man comes out of penitentiary stigmatized as a criminal, when perhaps he should not have been sent to a penitentiary at all. He comes out with a grudge against society, believing that he got a raw deal. And there is no doubt in my mind that many of them did get raw deals; their cases were not properly handled.

If there is a desire to reform the penitentiaries or to spend more money in the Department of Justice, I suggest that the department will have to make some arrangements with the provinces by which qualified persons, with knowledge of the law—they should be required to pass examinations in respect of their judgment in handling the cases coming before them —shall be appointed. Anyone wishing a position as a civil servant, a grade II stenographer or a filing clerk—anyone who wishes to hold even the lowest position in the civil service, must write an examination, pass aptitude tests, and so on. If we insisted upon that same procedure for the filling of positions in the lower courts, where the basis is laid for whatever may happen in the higher courts, and insisted that the man before whom offenders must first appear is properly qualified, we would be taking a proper step.

The man in the lower court should be obliged to pass an examination. We should see that he has a knowledge of law—because evidence in murder cases is heard first before local magistrates. In many instances the evidence is written in longhand by the magistrate himself.

Mr. HACKETT: I think that is not quite accurate.

Mr. GILLIS: I have sat in courts in Ontario and tried to read the handwriting of some of your local magistrates. I admit I am not a very good writer, but the worst writing I have ever seen was certain evidence that the magistrate scratched out himself. That is true in many cases across this country.

Mr. TIMMINS: The magistrate does not try a murder case. You know better than that.

Mr. GILLIS: Does he not? Go into some of the courts across this country and find that out.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): You were talking about murder.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes.

Mr. TIMMINS: Get back into your own field.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not trying to cover anything up. The trouble with the administration of justice in this country is that there is too much manipulation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. GILLIS: Oh, yes; there is. There is too much manipulation.

Mr. FULTON: What do you mean?

Mr. GILLIS: There is too much covering up. Law is made too mysterious. There is not enough honesty in it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. GILLIS: You can "no" as much as you like. When I hear an hon. member, particularly a member of the legal profession, say that everyone has his day in court in this country and that there is equal justice for all, I make this statement, without reservation: you are pretty much in the same position when you face the courts of this country as you are when you go out seeking medical attention. You will get as much as you are able to pay for.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LESAGE: That is false.

Mr. GILLIS: Is it?

Mr. LESAGE: That is communism.

Mr. GILLIS: I ask you if you work for nothing. How many of you fellows rush into court and for humanitarian purposes defend young fellows who are dragged into court? I know of many cases where young fellows were taken in and sentenced in the courts without having counsel.

An hon. MEMBER: The exception.

Mr. GILLIS: No, it is not the exception. It comes back to this business of the appointment of local magistrates. It happened right here, and in this province, with young ex-service offenders during the war.

If we are going to start to reform the administration of justice, and if we are going to do something about our penal institutions, then we have to keep young people out of these institutions in the first place, and not throw them in indiscriminately for minor infractions of the law, stigmatize them and bring them out as enemies of justice, because then it is almost impossible to do anything with them.

I know many young fellows to whom that happened. I know that under the present set-up the administration of law in the field about which I am speaking is in the hands of the provinces. If we are going to spend more money, if we are going to try to get equality before the law, a thing that we preach and a thing that most of us believe in, that is one thing; but if you come from the other side of the tracks and have occasion to run into these things you will find that the shoe is on the other foot. Do not make any mistake about it.

The appointment of more judges and the increasing of judges' salaries and all that kind of stuff is fine if proper conditions prevail all through the judicial field. I think the part of it that is administered by the present Minister of Justice is fairly and reasonably done. The field that lacks attention completely is the one I am talking about, the local magistrate's courts. The present minister or the Department of Justice should have a conference with the provinces with a view to arriving at some uniformity, and at least to see that trained personnel are in these posts and that once they are appointed they are free from local civic pressures. They should be qualified for the jobs that they are sent in to do.

I want to emphasize that point again. Anyone in this country who wants a job with the government must write an examination. In a field where we are dealing with social and human problems we should see to it that the men are qualified and at least have fair judgment in the matters they are going to handle.

Mr. HACKETT: I want to say a few words about the subject which has engaged the attention of the committee for the last few moments. The hon. member for Cape Breton South would like to have all magistrates pass an examination before they exercise their functions. I think sometimes it might be well if a like rule were applied to members of parliament, because to my mind it is almost criminal that an hon. gentleman, holding the responsible office he does, should speak about something concerning which his ignorance is rivalled only by his bitterness.

Mr. GILLIS: On a point of order, I suggest that the hon. gentleman who has just accused a member of the house of ignorance has too much dignity to allow it to stand on the record. It should be withdrawn.

An hon. MEMBER: Is it true?

Mr. HACKETT: When the hon. gentleman levels a charge of dishonesty, a charge of greed, a charge of duplicity—

Mr. GILLIS: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. HACKETT: I am speaking to the point of order.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not allowing the hon. member to place any words in my mouth. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. HACKETT: I am speaking to the point of order.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Stanstead is speaking to the point of order. I must ask the hon. member for Cape Breton South to resume his seat.

Mr. GILLIS: I thought he had the floor and was making a speech. He is putting words in my mouth.

Mr. HACKETT: I have said that when the hon. gentleman rose in his place and charged a profession with dishonesty, charged the magistracy of this country with ignorance—

Mr. GILLIS: Incompetency is the best word.

Mr. HACKETT: —with incompetency, if you will, he was making a statement about which the kindest thing to say is that he did not know what he was talking about. I did not wish to be dragged into a debate concerning which there can be no issue, simply because the hon. gentleman is not familiar with the conditions about which he has addressed the committee. There are many topics on which he has information, and I have always listened to him with interest when he spoke on those topics. I suggest to him that he remain within the zone in which he has information that is reliable.

I join with the hon. gentleman in hoping that magistrates will always be competent; but here we differ because I believe that most people holding judicial office in this country are not only learned, are not only honest, but are beyond reproach. Here and there may be a man who because of some weakness may not live up to the highest traditions of the bench. One out of the twelve failed, and I do not think the average of failure on the bench is nearly as high as it was in the tragic instance to which I have referred.

It is essential in a country like Canada, wherein the rule of law obtains, that the judiciary should be immaculate, unspotted, and unsuspected. I believe the judiciary of our country is that. I believe it is the strength of the judiciary that the people have in it a confidence that they could not have were there any serious departures from its high traditions. It may be that higher standards should be set, but I can speak for the province I know best and say I know that men of the highest integrity, men of unusual ability and learning occupy the posts of magistrates.

An hon. MEMBER: In Ontario too.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. HACKETT: I am loath to think that in Nova Scotia as a general rule the magistracy is recruited from a lesser breed than in the other provinces.

Mr. GILLIS: There is no difference across the dominion.

Mr. HACKETT: If my hon. friend takes that attitude—I am speaking about the province of Quebec, and here I know whereof I speak—he is wrong; he is stating something about which he has no knowledge. He is stating a falsehood; he is stating something which if true would be a blemish upon the profession, upon the integrity of one of the great institutions of this country. When he makes that statement in this house he forfeits his right to be heard in an assembly in which honest and honourable men congregate.

I should like to say just one more word. When I attempted to ask a few questions, nothing was more remote from my mind than being drawn into a controversy which has to do with one of the great pillars, one of the great institutions upon which Christian civilization rests.

There is the church, there is the university, there is the law, there is the Christian family; and anybody who finds it in his heart willingly to malign or belittle any of them is not a good citizen. While criticism is the very source of our strength, and is necessary to correct evils, it must be criticism that rests on the bedrock of truth. Otherwise it belittles, it weakens, it discredits both him who utters it and the victim maligned.

The question I rose to ask, and the only question I want to ask, is this. What is the position in Quebec with regard to the superior court? The right hon. gentleman knows that there are arrears which in varying districts run from one to two years, that in consequence there is disorder and delay and people are denied the rights which a more expeditious administration would give them. Representations have been made to the right hon. gentleman by the members of different legal organizations. I know that the necessary provincial legislation has been passed. I am not certain whether it has yet been made effective; I am not clear on that point, but I dare say the minister is, and I would ask him to make a statement as to the administration of justice in the court of first instance in the province of Quebec.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a notoriously large number of untried cases in the superior court district of Montreal, where some cases have not been reached although nearly two years have elapsed since they were inscribed. The legislature of the province of Quebec passed a bill authorizing the creation of six additional superior court judges for the province. The bill was to come into effect by proclamation, the proclamation to authorize not necessarily the whole six but any number up to six. The Department of Justice has not been notified that that act has been proclaimed, and we are proceeding on the assumption that it has not been proclaimed. When it is proclaimed there will be these additional judgeships to which we shall have to give consideration. It will require federal legislation to authorize the necessary salaries and create the additional positions here. It was suggested to me that we should pass the legislation conditionally, since the situation is so acute; but my reply was that that would be a complete departure from the practice that had always prevailed, that the province must first make up its mind whether it wants additional judges or not, and having done so, the dominion parliament will deal with the situation. It would be impossible for us to enact legislation here except by delegating certain authority to the governor in council, which I think would be undesirable in the matter of the creation of judgeships.

Mr. HACKETT: So do I.

Mr. ILSLEY: I want to say just one word about the speech of the hon. member for Cape Breton South on the specific point of the quality of the magistrates in Nova Scotia. I was surprised to hear what he said, because I was strongly of the impression that the last attorney general, the present Mr. Justice MacQuarrie, made important improvements in the magistracy of Nova Scotia. I know that in my part of the province there is no complaint whatever. I am acquainted with the magistrate who does a large part of the work in the rural municipalities of the western part of the province. I know him intimately, and not a word of criticism could be uttered against him, on the point of capacity, competency, character, or in any other way, and I was really feeling well satisfied with the quality of the magistrates in Nova Scotia. I know little about those in other provinces, but naturally the Department of Justice is concerned in the matter particularly in view of the fact that the new part XVI of the criminal code imposes additional responsibilities of great importance on magistrates. What the hon. member for Cape Breton South says about having good magistrates is true but I do not think his criticism of the quality of the magistrates in Nova Scotia is valid. I do not think it is correct.

Mr. GILLIS: Perhaps I may be permitted to say this, Mr. Chairman. What I said to this house stands on the record, and if the hon. member for Stanstead will read it tomorrow he will find that his remarks today were completely off the point I was making. I did not criticize the judiciary. I said I thought it was adequate and that I thought the Department of Justice was doing a fair job in its field. But I did say that if reform of our laws was necessary the place to start was at the bottom, in the local magistrates' courts. I have discussed this matter with some pretty able lawyers who occupied the position of magistrate and resigned because they just could not take it. I discussed it with them, not just yesterday, but as far back as 1940. I was not talking out of turn this afternoon, but upon pretty good advice. I repeat, if we are going to reform, the place to start is at the bottom, and my plea was for qualified personnel in the lower courts where the basis is laid for whatever may happen afterwards.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I believe the hon. member for Cape Breton South went beyond what he really intended to say. I feel that when he cast aspersions on the profession of the law as a whole he was not speaking from knowledge; for I know of no reputable counsel in this country who denies to anyone accused of crime his defence, regardless of the question whether there is any fee. I know that some of us who are engaged in the law, particularly in the field of criminal defence, are sometimes disparagingly referred to as criminal lawyers; but, sir, if it were not for the lawyers who believe in justice to the individual and who undertake the defence of an individual accused of crime, injustice would often occur in this country.

Some who are lawyers for corporations speak of others engaged in the defence of the liberty of the subject as criminal lawyers. The reason that Britain is what she is today is that the Hastings, the Bennetts, the Norman Birketts, and all the great array of able British counsel, did not consider it beneath their dignity, in the interests of the clear and untrammelled administration of justice, to go into the courts of the land and appear for the defence. They go further—and this is a lead which might be followed by lawyers across this country. In Britain, counsel learned in the law, however great his capacity, however widespread his reputation, however great the fees he may ask where there is ability to pay, will deny no citizen a defence if called upon to accept a retainer. That is something that should be known in this country.

I hear the argument raised of class against class. I raise no defence ad hoc for the profession of law; for all through the years, from Shakespeare down, from the days of Jack Cade, it has been the popular thing to excoriate this profession. It needs no defence from outside, but sometimes I think it needs defence from the inside. Too many of our profession are prone to say of those who undertake—often without fee—the maintenance of freedom, the assurance of the rights of the individual, the protection of the weak against the strong, because these things take place in the criminal courts, that they do not occupy the same position as those who go into an office and take up an equally honourable branch of the law.

I repeat what I said a while ago: British law, British justice, British freedom, which we have in our country as a heritage, is more dependent than most of us believe upon the instrumentality of lawyers, who, regardless of fee but with an abiding sense of justice, have given the British and Canadian parliaments leadership through the law. These men have assured justice by what they have done. In saying that, sir, I want to point out one thing that I pointed out before. If we are to retain wholesome respect for the judiciary of our country we must maintain detachment on the part of our judiciary. It is for that reason that over and over again I have advocated in this house that we resolve now not to use judges on royal commissions where political and other such considerations enter; for in doing so we bring the judge from his elevated position of detachment down into the cockpit of party politics, where, regardless of the decision he makes, aspersions are cast on him in his position as commissioner, inevitably resulting in a disrespect for the judiciary as a whole.

The minister can do no better than to follow the course he pursued in New Brunswick in appointing as judge a person of another political faith. Too often and too long in this country one of the qualifications of a judge, aside from ability, is political competence. The United States has answered that by insuring that thirty per cent of the judges appointed be of the opposite political party. When one considers that over ninety per cent of the judges in this country have been appointed by the administration led by the present Prime Minister, I suggest that a move toward elevating the judiciary would be a declaration by the Attorney General and Minister of Justice of this country that from now on, within reasonable limitations, political qualifications shall take second place to ability, capacity, judgment and the possession of the faculties that result in a judiciary so necessary to the maintenance of our security and our freedom.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Before the item passes will the minister be kind enough to answer the question raised by the hon. member for Broadview, who for seven years was chairman of the Toronto police commission? The minister will recall that he was almost ready to answer when he was diverted in his trend of thought. The question of the hon. member for Broadview was whether the minister's department is continuing day by day and month by month to improve the criminal code in every possible way. I hope the minister will take cognizance of what the hon. member for Broadview said, because he was speaking from wealth of experience.

Mr. ILSLEY: Certainly I will take into consideration everything that the hon. member has said. Probably I should have risen at once and said so. I have the greatest respect for the suggestions he makes and for the interest he takes in these matters. It is a good thing that some hon. members do.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The minister did not get an opportunity to answer.

Item agreed to.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF PENITENTIARIES

127. Administration of the office of the commissioner of penitentiaries, including $25,000 for grants to recognized prisoners' aid societies, as may be approved by the governor in council, $193,711.

Mr. FLEMING: I am glad that this item gives the committee an opportunity to consider again the question of penal reform. I know that this subject is not a new one, and that it is considered annually, usually on this item in the estimates of the Minister of Justice. But no member of this committee need offer apologies for again raising his voice on the imperative necessity of giving due attention to the subject of penal reform in Canada.

One of the most hopeful things that has happened since last year's debate was the enlargement of the commission last August. The committee will recall that General Gibson, chief commissioner of penitentiaries, was appointed some two and a half years ago. On August 20 last the Minister of Justice announced the appointment of two deputy commissioners: Mr. Joseph McCulley, who for some years had been headmaster of Pickering Boys College and a leader in boys' educational work in Canada, and Dr. Louis Philippe Gendreau, the chief psychiatrist at the Manitoba Mental Hospital.

When this item was under debate in the house on June 27, 1946, I uttered words of strong approval of the appointment of General Gibson as chief commissioner. I should like now to commend the appointment of the two deputy commissioners. It has been my good fortune to know Mr. McCulley personally for some years. We have had common interests in some aspects of boys' work. I regard his appointment as a most suitable one, for which the Minister of Justice should be highly commended. It is not my privilege to know Doctor Gendreau, personally, but from what I have heard about him I believe his appointment also was a most suitable one.

With a strong commission made up of these three eminent men, I think the public will have been led by this time to expect action in the field of penal reform. I urge upon the minister that he give to these three commissioners ample opportunity and a reasonably free hand to assume the task of penal reform. I hope he will give them every encouragement to take the Archambault report of 1938 and endeavour to make its recommendations a reality. Ten years have passed since this monumental report was written, with its eighty-eight recommendations, some of which have been carried into effect, but many of which have not. I conceive it to be the duty of parliament to continue to apply pressure to see that these salutary recommendations receive adequate consideration, and that they are given effect just as soon as possible.

In my humble opinion it would be a useful thing if we had a committee of this house which could hear the commissioners at first hand, receive a report of such progress as they have been able to make in the matter of penal reform, and discuss with them their plans for the future. There are grave limitations upon going into a matter of this kind in adequate detail in committee of the whole. We can address our remarks to the Chair and the minister can make his observations, but we do not have an opportunity of questioning the commissioners, who are dealing with the problem personally; or of discussing with them their plans for approaching the problem of reform. I am convinced that if this commission is given an opportunity, we shall see definite progress made in the direction of penal reform. At the same time I am conscious, as I think are all the members of the committee, of the need which still exists for it.

I am sure the committee is well acquainted with the unhappy results of several recent escapes from the penitentiary. I should like to mention two of them. One of them resulted in homicide, and one of the two persons who escaped was one of the four boys who had been involved in the homicide of a resident of my own constituency; the famous Tobias case. Speaking in this house on June 27, 1946, on the question of penal reform, I undertook to make some remarks upon that case—of course after it had been concluded. It happens that at that time those young men had been convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to penal terms by Mr. Justice Keiller Mackay, the trial judge. One of these young men was involved in the recent jail break which resulted in the death of the prison guard at Kingston. It emphasizes the necessity of seeing that juries really do their duty as such; that they be not swept away by maudlin sentiment, and points to the results that flow from the failure of juries, to carry out their duty under the law.

There was another unfortunate jail break in September of last year which resulted in the escape of three notorious criminals, Mickey Macdonald, Ulysses Lauzon and Nick Minnille. The chief commissioner, General Gibson, issued a statement following that escape, in which he indicated that an intensive investigation had been made and that administrative changes had been effected with a view to promoting efficiency of administration in the penitentiary. No system can be perfect, but I think that matters of this kind could usefully engage the attention of a committee of this house.

There is another side to the matter of penitentiary administration which I think warrants consideration by the committee. I wish to refer to a statement made by the chief coroner for Ontario, Doctor Smirle Lawson, following an investigation which he carried out in August of last year. It may be, Mr. Chairman, that the matter referred to in this statement by Doctor Lawson has been investigated by the commissioners, and that the situation disclosed in this statement has been remedied and redress made. But I have seen no public statement in regard to it, and I bring it before the committee of the whole because I think it is a matter that should receive its attention.

In the Globe and Mail of August 7, 1947, we have this article under the heading "Charges T.B. convicts not segregated at pen." The article reads in part as follows:

Convicts with tuberculosis in its advanced stages are kept in close contact with non-tuberculosis patients in the Kingston penitentiary infirmary, chief coroner Smirle Lawson charged last night.

The chief coroner declared the prison hospital was overcrowded and its equipment inadequate, particularly in the operating room. He made these observations on the basis of an official visit to the prison after a convict, Carl Woverenvitz, 57, had died in Christie street hospital.

Following Doctor Lawson's remarks, a coroner's jury investigating the death of Woverenvitz demanded that the federal government take immediate steps to segregate tuberculous and non-tuberculous convicts in the penitentiary hospital.

Woverenvitz did not have tuberculosis but died of complications arising from a wound he received during the first great war. He was treated in the penitentiary hospital and in Kingston general hospital before being moved to Christie street. The inquest was held because the law requires that a public inquiry be held whenever a convict dies while serving his sentence.

Doctor Lawson declared the prison infirmary was well run and spotlessly clean. He also praised the surgeon in charge, Doctor Thomas Tweddell. But Doctor Tweddell, he said, could do little in the face of the hospital conditions.

"I found that where Woverenvitz had been lying in the prison hospital there were advanced cases of pulmonary tuberculosis which other patients might quite easily contract," Dr. Lawson said. He added that the infirmary was small and that the proximity of tuberculosis and other patients was "not good medical practice."

Dr. I. H. Erb, provincial pathologist, was a witness at the inquest. "Would you say," Dr. Lawson asked him "that these tuberculosis cases, under the conditions I have described, were a menace."

"Yes," Dr. Erb agreed. "From your report, I think they would be a menace provided they were in relatively close proximity. They would be especially dangerous to younger men who might not discover their own condition until many years later."

Dr. Lawson commented that because men had lost their freedom, that was no reason why they should not get as good medical treatment as patients got in other hospitals.

The jury found that Woverenvitz had received correct treatment from the prison surgeon and at Kingston General and Christie street hospitals.

As I have said, Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the situation here referred to has been remedied. With the kind of men we have on the penitentiaries commission I would expect that, on this very serious matter being brought to their attention, they would have acted promptly to remedy it; but I think it should engage the attention of the house, and I hope the minister will be able to make some statement with regard to it.

From many sides we are hearing criticism of present conditions. We hear the youth of today castigated, and we hear different panaceas put forward as solutions for the problem of crime among youth. As one who has sought to interest himself in youth and its problems I want to express my profound disagreement with some of those who are busy denouncing the youth of today. I see the superintendent of one reformatory has said:

> Never at any time in the past twenty-five years has youth been found so insolent, so defiant, or so determined to do what is wrong as at the present time.

I think those words are unduly harsh. Those of us who have tried to keep in close touch with the youth of our respective communities will believe the youth of today are as good as were the youth of any other generation. On the other hand, however, they live in a very different kind of world, a fact which the older generation does not always take into account. Life is far more complicated; but fundamentally at the root of the problems of crime and delinquency among youth today is the question of control of children by their parents. It is not so much the failure of the youth of today, or delinquency on the part of the youth of today, as it is the failure on the part of the parents and the home. Everything that is weakening the influence of the home and weakening parental control and a sense of parental responsibility for youth is a detriment to our community. One of our great problems is the insidious pressure of materialistic forces and materialistic philosophies, striving to defeat religious and moral teaching which has its heart and centre in the home and the church. Anything we as men in public life can do to support healthy community influences, which in turn will not supplant but will help strengthen a healthy home influence, I am sure we will all consider it our duty to do.

There is one other aspect of this problem of which we should never lose sight, and that is the problem of the discharged prisoner. Much can be done in the early stages, of course, to guide the footsteps of youth into the paths of good citizenship and useful life. When youth goes astray, much can be done to guide its footsteps back into paths that will lead to useful life in the community. But there is a third aspect, a third stage of the problem, which at all times must engage our interest and concern. That is the problem of the discharged prisoner, the man who has gone astray, who has served a term and is released from a penal institution, only to be confronted by a world which may look to him quite different from the world he left when he was convicted; a world which in so many cases seems cold, unfriendly and inhospitable to him. Each of us, I am sure, has had experience with cases of this kind, but I wish to mention one which arose in an Ontario court some months ago. It is an example of the way in which a prison record dogs a man even when he is trying to go straight. It is an illustration of the fact that discharged prisoners, after they have paid their debt to society, need assistance from various quarters, not only from institutions such as the John Howard society, which is doing magnificent work, but from all who regard themselves as good citizens.

This was a case that came before the county court judge in Windsor. The man in question, whose name I shall not mention, was charged with uttering a forged cheque. The prisoner, who was just twenty-five years of age, had something to say when the court was about to pass sentence upon him. He referred to his police record as a nemesis and said that he believed society had failed in its treatment of men released from prison. He had been convicted first when a third-year university student. One would have thought he was in a position to advance himself into a career of usefulness to society, but he was convicted while attending university. Later he enlisted in the R.C.A.F.; but when his prison record became known he was discharged, just as he was about to receive a commission. That record, with one blot added to another, prevented him from obtaining a bond in one civilian position which otherwise would have been available to him, and it led to his discharge from a position in a Toronto munitions plant. This is what the prisoner himself had to say in court, as the judge was about to pass a further sentence upon him:

> My understanding is that society, through the legislature, enacts laws for its own protection. But when a man comes out that debt is paid, and if society hinders or hampers him in his return to them, then society has failed.

The crown attorney commented, "There is something in what he says."

I am not one of those who take a superficial or unnecessarily sentimental view of our treatment of those who have gone wrong. I do not believe we should approach this question in terms of mere sloppy sentiment. I do think, however, that a great deal remains to be done. It is not a task we can simply leave to such beneficent institutions and organizations as the John Howard society, to which I have referred already, which are doing so much to help to rehabilitate discharged prisoners. We cannot rely simply upon individuals. In that regard I should like to pay tribute to the outstanding work done by the former chief of police in Toronto, General D. C. Draper, who is president of the John Howard society, and who did so much in the formation of the Prisoners' Rehabilitation Society which, several years ago, became the John Howard society. But it is incumbent upon all of us who regard ourselves as servants of the public to do all we can to arouse the public to a sense of its responsibilities to these men. Given a fair opportunity, given guidance and friendly help when they come out, the great majority of them will go straight, as one can prove by statistics. But given a hostile or unfriendly reception, and being denied employment and the opportunity to find a place in and be useful to society, then we are simply inviting them to tread again the path of crime.

I am proud of Ontario and the commendable lead taken in that province in the setting up of a department of reform institutions under a minister whose task it is to seek as soon as possible to carry out extensive reforms in the penal institutions of that province, to see that youthful offenders are not permitted to mingle with hardened criminals, that different types of criminals are segregated, and that the guiding principle behind all our prison administration shall be the reform and training in useful pursuits of those who are incarcerated, so that they may upon discharge find a place in society. The purpose is that they may regard themselves as useful members of society, and not as enemies of society. This, of course, cannot be done overnight, but it is a commendable lead and one which could be widely followed.

I hope what I have said today has been constructive. I repeat what I said at the outset, that I commend the Minister of Justice for the two appointments made last year to the penitentiaries commission. They were such as to lead many of us to be hopeful that substantial reforms will be made in those penal institutions which are under the jurisdiction of the dominion.

Again I urge upon the minister to encourage the commission to take in hand the responsibility for carrying forward the task of reform and implementation of the recommendations of the Archambault report, and the modernization of our penal system.

Mr. BRYCE: Mr. Chairman, coming from a constituency which has within its boundaries a large penitentiary, I have an interest in the people employed there and, like the hon. member who preceded me, I am interested in the people who are confined there.

I should like to draw the matter of wages to the minister's attention. The cost of living has gone up by 153 points. The wages of those employed in prisons have not increased by anything like that amount. The Archambault report emphasizes particularly the fact that persons employed in prisons were not at that time being paid wages as high as were paid to those who cleaned the streets of our cities.

I made that statement before, and upon checking it again I find it still to be true.

I find this at page 344 of the Archambault report:

> Your commissioners are convinced that the success or failure of the recommendations contained in this report will depend almost entirely upon the prison personnel to be charged with carrying out the recommendations. The success of every prison system is dependent upon the type of officers in that system.

On the next page of the report the commission says, commenting on some surveys it had made:

> No matter what public service one deals with —social or fighting—if the personnel is not the right type for the work in question—I stress that, for the work in question—the results will be poor. This is particularly so in service where the main preoccupation of the staff is in dealing with human beings as opposed to finance or commerce. In no public social service is this more true than in the prison world where we have to deal with both sexes; men and women of all strata of society, old and young in years of crime, rich and poor, the good and the bad, and, in some cases, the very bad.

I am sure the minister will realize that if we do not pay proper wages it will be hopeless to get the type of men we need for these prisons. The hours they work should compare favourably with those worked by ordinary tradesmen, but in fact they work much longer hours.

By order in council 33/2047 an increase of $5 a month is given to guard grade I, guard messenger, and guard storeman. Let me point out that an advance of $5 in these times is not enough, in view of the present cost of living. I say they are entitled to much better wages than that.

The prison authorities have come to realize that they do not want men like the old sergeant-majors under whom I have served. Those old imperial sergeant-majors set out first to break your heart, even if they accomplished nothing else. That was the type of man who was employed in prisons in earlier days. I have served under such men. But in the modern world they are not accepted as fit for work in our prisons. Prison discipline and the management of our prisoners have made great progress in recent years. If we want the right men, we will have to pay wages equal to those received by men doing similar work in other spheres.

I shall not at this time go into the question of superannuation. I still have not had satisfaction in connection with the complaint I made last year that a man who has paid his debt to the government under a superannuation scheme, who has paid everything he owed with compound interest, should have to keep on paying until the day he dies.

[Mr. Bryce.]

There is another thing I want to bring up—the housing at Stony Mountain. For three or four years now I have appealed to the government to do something. Here is what the Archambault report has to say about housing:

> The accommodation for the staff is inadequate. It is unreasonable and unnecessarily humiliating to ask the members of the staff to live under the conditions that now exist in the officers' tenements belonging to the institution. These houses were built fifty years ago; they are without sanitary conveniences, and prisoners themselves are much more comfortably housed in their cells than the officers in the penitentiary tenements.
> Your commissioners are of the opinion that this state of affairs is destructive of the morale of the officers and that immediate steps should be taken to provide the staff and their families with respectable accommodation. In a large metropolitan centre the homes which are provided for the staff would, indeed, be condemned by the medical authorities.

Even with the scarcity of building materials, the Department of Justice should be able to do something. Bowling alleys and picture shows are still being built; surely the government can get some lumber and start some houses here. The greatest objection is that there are no sanitary conveniences.

Like the hon. gentleman who preceded me, I have always been interested in the care of the young criminal or first offender. It is unfortunate that more progress cannot be made in establishing the Borstal system or some equivalent system to care for our first offenders. Our penitentiaries today are for punishment more than for corrective purposes or the reform of the convict. Our system has a tendency to make an habitual criminal out of the first offender. He is put in with hardened criminals or men who have been convicted many times. Under the present system it is practically impossible to segregate the hardened criminal from the first offender. Someone sent me a copy of "Must Canada Continue to Create Criminals?" and I should like to quote from the second page as follows:

> The Borstal system of schools in England, for the reclamation of lads who are considered to have a chance, has proved its value. To be a success here, however, as they have been in England, the whole English system must be adopted. The juvenile court there, dealing with children from seven to fifteen, is the handmaiden of the Borstal system, which deals with lads from 16 to 23. The two reforms must go hand in hand.

In the report of the commissioner dated February 5, 1947, the following appears on page 15:

> The royal commission dealt at length with the methods of treatment of young offenders between the ages of 16 and 21 and recommended the adoption in Canada of the principles of the Borstal system which has been developed in the United Kingdom. Your commissioner is convinced that the principles of that system offer the best known opportunity for the reformation and rehabilitation of youths who have not yet become hardened criminals, and considers that any new institutions to be established by the government of Canada should be of a type to permit the adoption of those principles thereby enabling youths of the reformable type to be withdrawn from the penitentiaries for adults. It cannot be too strongly emphasized, however, that the success of the Borstal system depends primarly on the trained personnel it attracts to its service. It has been said that the foundations of the Borstal system are first the recruitment of the right men, then their proper training, and finally their full co-operation with one another in an atmosphere of freedom and mutual understanding.

I commend the reading of that to hon. members because it shows what can be done. But it must be remembered that wages will have to be increased in order to make this service attractive to people who can do a good job. The scheme advocated in the commissioner's report would be a step in the right direction. A system of this kind would tend to improve the effectiveness of our penal institutions, but no adequate system can be adopted until the indiscriminate herding of criminals in penal institutions is abolished. No doubt some wardens have attempted to discriminate between different offenders, but segregation under one roof cannot be very effective. Different classes of prisons will have to be set apart for young convicts who should receive Borstal treatment. Another prison could be set aside for first offenders and those who may be reclaimed for a law-abiding life. And of course there should be separate institutions for the habitual criminal who is a menace to society.

I do not want to take up any more time, because I think the minister knows what I am driving at. I want better wages for those who are going to try to correct these people. It does not matter how bad a man is; there is some good in him, and we should have some system that would try to bring out that good.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, I shall not discuss the Borstal system, because I did that on two previous occasions after making extensive surveys of the system as carried out in the prisons in England. What I want to bring particularly to the attention of the minister today is what can be done to reclaim prisoners. Frequently our talk is about prison reform but I have spent much of my time on methods of reclaiming prisoners. A previous speaker said that the prisoner should be taken care of after he gets out of the penitentiary. I have found that one of the main causes of a released prisoner again lapsing into crime is his inability to get a job, as the previous speaker mentioned, or a lack of funds.

I have been able to get jobs for many released prisoners, but I tell the minister it is quite a task. I have had to call up manufacturers and heads of firms and give my own personal undertaking that the prisoner would do a decent job. I am happy to say that in every case in which I have done that, the released prisoner has lived up to my best expectations. I try to treat them as a father would, and direct them in the right way. In their minds perhaps the best way to direct them in the right way is to get them jobs.

I should like to know what is being done by the department for prisoners after they are released. Let me refer to a tragic case that came up in Toronto recently. It was that of a well-known convict by the name of Hopkins. Here is his record as published in the Toronto Evening Telegram, after he had been shot to death recently by a constable while engaged in robbing a store:

1930. Convicted of theft at Hamilton; suspended sentence.

1932. Convicted of housebreaking, theft and breaking of recognizance; sent to the Victoria industrial school for an indefinite period.

1934. Convicted of breach of recognizance; given four months definite and eight months indefinite.

1934. Convicted again at St. Catharines of breaking and entering; given four months in jail.

1935. Convicted of theft; given six months definite and nine months indefinite.

1936. Convicted of carrying an unlawful weapon and being in possession of an unregistered revolver; given three months in jail on the first count and fined $50 or 30 days on the second.

1937. Convicted on August 1 of shopbreaking and theft; given five years in Kingston.

1941. Convicted of shopbreaking and theft and possession of loaded revolver; given five years on first charge and two years on second, to run consecutively.

1947. Convicted on December 12 on a charge of receiving; given one year.

Within the last month or six weeks he was caught with another convict breaking into a store and was shot dead in the lane behind the store. It is a tragic story—ten arrests and ten convictions within a comparatively few years. What is being done to reform or reclaim prisoners, if they can be reclaimed? I am convinced that the department and whoever is helping the department outside should make a much stronger effort to reclaim prisoners. This man Hopkins, after ten arrests and ten convictions in little more than a ten-year period, ended up by being shot. There are many cases of the kind, but I shall not take the time to give more examples. Is there any branch of the department that is making a strenuous effort to reclaim prisoners, if they can be reclaimed? Of course the Borstal system will help a great deal, but when a convict cannot be reclaimed, as apparently was the case with Hopkins, should he not be declared incorrigible and be put away for good? Every day we read of criminals who, after serving a term in a penitentiary, were released and committed a murder or some other crime much worse than the one they were sent down for.

I would say that the department should do one of two things: either reclaim these convicts or put them away for good. It has been said, and I agree, that the home has the greatest influence of all, and the sooner homes get back to the old habit of family worship, under which I was raised, the better it will be for the children. I can see my parents yet, reading a chapter out of the scriptures every morning, and then, after explaining it to us, offering up a prayer. There is not so much of that done in these days as there should be.

I recognize the tremendous job which the department and the police have to do. Nevertheless one of two things should be done: either the convict should be reclaimed, or when it is found he cannot be reclaimed, he should be put away for good.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I believe that a real work of reform is being done in some of our penal institutions. I refer particularly to Saskatchewan penitentiary, where the work done in the past few years has been such as to result in a minimum of recidivists. I know of several cases I could bring to the attention of the committee, but I do not propose to do so. I think it is only fair to say that while in certain areas recidivism is of serious proportions, the work being done in Saskatchewan penitentiary has been highly commendable. I know of one man who, after serving a long period in that penitentiary following his conviction for murder, was allowed out on parole some four years ago, joined the army, rose to the rank of sergeant, and is now back in the area in which he lived prior to commission of the crime, and is taking his place in society in a manner commendable both to him and to the system operated in the penitentiary of Saskatchewan. That young man entered the penitentiary at the age of eighteen or nineteen with a grade 2 education, and at the end of fourteen years he was discharged from that institution with the equivalent of grade 12 education.

The new commissioner of penitentiaries has an important and responsible position, and one that is difficult by reason of two forces sometimes pulling in opposite directions—punishment for wrongdoing, and reform. One worthy thing that has been done during the past year is the establishment of a policy of education and training for penitentiary officers. Some twenty-five of them have taken the course. To be a successful penitentiary officer requires not only the capacity to appreciate human shortcomings and the ability to enforce discipline, but also the capacity for intelligent coercion. The hon. member for Selkirk referred to the old type of officer who was an autocrat and sometimes a martinet. That type of officer is rapidly leaving the penitentiary service of this country, and properly so. But you cannot get the type of officers who are needed in the penitentiaries at the present rates of pay. A penitentiary officer receives a low salary having regard to present living costs—it runs from $125 to $140 or $150 a month—and he has no security. He is a temporary official who can be removed at any time. His right to be made permanent was done away with some fifteen years ago. It is a serious situation. It was done that way because it was thought that those in charge of the various institutions would not be able to exercise proper discipline if there were permanence in the appointments.

I come now to a question that was raised by the hon. member for Eglinton in what I thought was an excellent statement of the problem of penal reform. During the last year—and he made reference to it—there have been a number of penitentiary outbreaks. The minister should indicate to the committee the various penitentiaries in which these outbreaks took place. There have been rumours as to the circumstances under which revolvers and firearms get to the possession of convicts in these institutions. We had an example in Kingston penitentiary of what happens where there is no proper discipline. That is the most recent occurrence. Where did these convicts get possession of the firearms which they used in committing homicide in their escape? In what other penitentiaries in connection with which investigations have taken place in the last year have firearms been found in possession of prisoners? I cannot understand how firearms could get into the possession of convicts without assistance from within. If a lawyer goes to consult his client in the penitentiary he has no opportunity of being in a room with the prisoner. He is placed in the same position as a visitor; he is removed from the prisoner and separated by a net. How do these things occur? What happened? Was anything done to punish wrongdoers within the penitentiary and prevent a recurrence of such incidents?

I should like to say a word in respect to remission of sentences. The present system of remission of sentences is haphazard and uncertain, and in many cases works unfairness among prisoners who are serving terms for similar crimes and offences. Too often the exercise of remissions results from representations which are made, and not from consideration from time to time, by those in authority, of the remainder of the sentence. I mention one case in particular. It is difficult to maintain authority within a penal institution when certain prisoners have their sentences remitted at the end of the minimum period of sentence, and others who have equally conformed to the regulations, find that for some reason nothing is done. I find it difficult to see any rhyme or reason for the granting of remissions. Certainly the principle upon which they should be based, as I see it, is, first, that the sentence served has paid the debt to society; second, that the sentence served has been sufficient to punish the wrongdoer while giving him an opportunity to reform.

I know of a man in the Saskatchewan penitentiary who was sentenced for murder in 1929. If ever there was doubt as to the guilt of a man, there was doubt in that case. I am not going to give his name, but I shall send it to the minister. He was sentenced to death. He had no funds or friends. A certain lawyer, reading of the case in the paper, and believing that that man was entitled to appeal, undertook the appeal, which came before the court of appeal of Saskatchewan. The court dismissed the appeal, but expressed serious doubts with regard to the case. Commutation was granted. My doubts of that case are no less strong today than they were in 1929. That man sees others going out year after year. When an application for remission is made—and his record is perfect; he has discharged any debt to society, if he was guilty, of which there is still doubt, and he continues to protest his innocence—the reason given why he cannot have his remission is that nobody will assume responsibility for him and assure him a livelihood if he were discharged. That seems difficult to understand. There is no doubt about it. The question has been asked over and over again whether anybody will accept responsibility for him. I feel that that is the type of case which the remission branch should reconsider. The man's record in the penitentiary over nineteen years has been satisfactory. Remissions should be based on the record of the offender. In a case such as the one I have cited there should be no denial of opportunity for a man to take his place in society, even though the difficulties are almost overwhelming, having regard to the period in which he has been a ward of the state.

Mention was made of the John Howard society. Too often do we base success in life on material considerations. I am thinking at the moment of Mr. J. A. Edmison, K.C., a man who has taken over the position, as his life work, of secretary of this society. He sacrifices his profession and his monetary opportunities. During the past two years he has gone across this country, and I think more than anyone else has brought to the attention of the public as a whole the necessity of implementation of many of the recommendations in the Archambault report which, for all too long a time, did not receive from the Department of Justice the attention they deserve.

I do not know what can be done to rehabilitate the man who has served his sentence. It is trite to say that he finds grave difficulties. Everyone who practises the law has been told at first hand of men who, after having paid their debt to society, cannot secure employment because of their record. The John Howard society is doing something in that direction to assure assistance in rehabilitation to those men who made a mistake in life, and who have discharged their debt to society. While today some assistance is given to the John Howard society, I hope that I shall not be criticized for advocating a reduction of taxation on the one hand and then asking for additional expenditures on the other, when I ask for consideration by the government to making to that society a grant in order to enable it to expand its activities in this country for the benefit and rehabilitation of those who, having erred, now ask the opportunity to take their place in society.

Mr. McIVOR: I should like to ask the minister if he is in favour of cutting down the sentence of the criminal who has everything in his favour to indicate that he will make good, if somebody will sponsor him. I have had a good deal of experience with these cases. I think I have had about 134 men out under supervision in the past forty years, and only three have failed. The former minister of justice was willing; he thought it was a good thing if a man's sentence was cut down before he served a complete term.

My plan has always been to check up with the chief of police and not to ask for a man to be allowed out unless I interviewed him personally and found out his attitude. When a man is placed on his honour, but when he also knows there is somebody watching him with a live interest in his welfare, week in and week out, it gives him an opportunity to make good.

Only a little while ago I was asked to go out and see if it was possible to get a boy out of the penitentiary. When I went into the home the mother was smoking a cigarette and on the table was a bottle of Canadian rye with the cork out of it. I checked up with the police right away. I said, "Do not touch him. You will get into trouble. He has a bad habit, and he got it from his father and mother." I know some men like to take a drink. But when a boy is taught to drink in his home, he acquires a terribly bad start. But only three—and that is less than three per cent—of those we have had out, have failed. Thanks to the wholehearted co-operation of my better half, those boys were welcomed in our home and they enjoyed the friendship they found there. Does the minister think it is a good thing to have a man out on permit under certain conditions, or does he not?

Mr. REID: I have just two questions I should like to ask the Minister of Justice; but, before doing so, may I make one comment regarding statements that have been made here this afternoon? It is true that the segregation of criminals has created considerable interest in this country, and the Borstal system has been mentioned by many speakers on many occasions. But I took note that a commission was appointed not so long ago in Great Britain to investigate the Borstal system there; because, under the changed conditions under which we are now living, it appears that conditions have also changed with youth and with adults as well. I know the statement is commonly made that youth should be segregated in penitentiaries from the hardened criminals. But as one who periodically visits the penitentiary in Westminster, I may say I have found that many old hardened criminals have expressed to me the request that they be segregated from some of the present youth who come into the pen. I do not say that in any spirit of levity, or in the way of carping criticism. That is the actual fact. In view of the fact that Great Britain, with its great Borstal system, has found that something has gone wrong with the youth, I am wondering if the minister has any information regarding the commission and what they found out there. I thought I would rise in my place and tell what I had found out in my visits to the penitentiary.

[Mr. McIvor.]

On January 19, in a speech here, I drew the minister's attention to serious complaints with regard to their wages made by guards in the penitentiary at New Westminster. Like the hon. member for Selkirk, I believe these men are doing a special kind of work. If you want to keep them content, it is my opinion that you should at least pay them as much as guards are getting in the provincial prison. Each and everyone of us judges by comparisons. We are all satisfied until we find that somebody else is getting a little more than we are. The guards are human too. The class of work they are doing today has been elevated. We are looking for a higher type of guard to look after the welfare of the men in the penitentiary. I could never understand why guards who look after prisoners in a provincial prison should receive far more than do guards who look after prisoners in the penitentiary, although they may later be looking after the same prisoners that are being looked after in the provincial jail. Has any investigation been made into the request I made on January 19, regarding the salaries and wages paid to these guards?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I am desirous of commending those who are responsible for the appointment of Joseph McCulley. I say to the Minister of Justice that, from my own personal knowledge, this appointment is one which receives the support of my native province. It so happens that Pickering college, of which he was headmaster, was my alma mater. I have taken a keen interest in that particular institution and have personally observed the work of Joseph McCulley, which had to do with boys in the college where the surroundings were quite different from those he will find in the task he is taking on. The wonderful job he was able to do on behalf of hundreds of students who passed through his hands as headmaster at Pickering college is something which, to my mind, recommends him highly for the onerous duties he has now taken on as one of the commissioners.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to answer some questions that have been asked by speakers this afternoon. Perhaps it will not be possible for me to answer them all, but I think I can cover them fairly well.

In the first place, I think I should say something about the operations of the commissioner of penitentiaries during the past year. The foundation for the program being followed in the operation of the penitentiary system is to be found in the report of the present commissioner of penitentiaries, which I think was circulated in February of 1947. That was the report referred to a few moments ago by the hon. member for Selkirk. To some extent that report is based upon the Archambault report, but does not go the length recommended by the Archambault report; that is, the centralization of control of all penal institutions in the dominion government. That probably is not practicable. We have no reason whatever to think it is practicable. We have had no request for anything of that kind from any of the provinces with the exception of two, I think I am safe in saying; those are the provinces of Alberta and Manitoba. While I have stated in this house that if the provinces wished us to give consideration to this important change in the constitution of our penitentiary system we would do so, I do not anticipate that I shall get any request to give consideration to it, having in mind the acrimoniuos speeches which have been made in some parts of Canada about the desire of the dominion government to centralize authority here in Ottawa.

So we are proceeding on a different footing, the one set out in General Gibson's report of February, 1947. I should like to tell the committee some of the things that have been done during the past year. The new act was proclaimed on September 1, 1947. The administration was reorganized. General Gibson was appointed commissioner, and two deputy commissioners, Mr. McCulley and Doctor Gendreau, were appointed. There are three assistant commissioners, the senior assistant commissioner being Mr. Sauvant. A training school for officers was inaugurated, and the second course is now in progress. The courses are given at Rockcliffe, in the R.C.M.P. barracks there. Twenty-five of the personnel of the penitentiaries come in for each course, which lasts six weeks. I visited this school being carried on there under the guidance or control or direction of Mr. McCulley, and found the atmosphere to be excellent. In other words, those who come in from the penitentiaries are keen to learn all they can. The instructors seem very good. There is not the slightest evidence of any feeling that this is a holiday or a lark or anything like that. They are very much in earnest about learning what they can about how to carry on their duties in the penitentiaries.

The salaries have been revised in all grades. In the course of his remarks the hon. member for Selkirk said that the cost of living had increased by 50 per cent or thereabouts, and that the remuneration of the employees of the penitentiaries branch had not been increased to the same extent. But the remuneration has increased by approximately 50 per cent since 1939 in all except the highest grades. For guards the 1939 range was from $1,200 to $1,500 a year. After a recent increase, I think more recent than the last one with which the hon. member is familiar, and certainly more recent than the rate in existence last January, when the hon. member for New Westminster spoke to me about the matter, the 1948 range for guards is from $1,800 to $2,100, with a higher maximum than that for twenty per cent of the guards.

Mr. HACKETT: Are they not also supplied with clothing and uniforms and shoes?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, they are.

Mr. HACKETT: So they really get more than the amounts mentioned?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. They also get a free meal in the middle of the day and free medical services.

Mr. HACKETT: And some pension rights?

Mr. ILSLEY: And superannuation rights under exactly the same system as the civil service, which I cannot help reiterating is an extremely generous superannuation system, judged by any standard at all. The increases over the 1939 rates in the other grades are as follows:

	1939	1948
Keeper	$1,560-$1,680	$2,220-$2,580
Instructor	1,440- 1,800	2,400- 2,700
Chief keeper	1,740- 2,100	2,700- 3,300
Chief trade instr...	2,040- 2,520	2,700- 3,300
Warden, grade 1 ..	3,660- 4,440	4,800- 5,400
Warden, grade 2 ..	4,500- 5,100	5,400- 6,000

During the past year there has been an important, rapid extension of the system of classification. We have spoken in this house about the importance, first, of classification of prisoners, and, then, of segregation. I am prepared to admit that the segregation has not been carried on to the extent that ultimately it should be, because so much construction is required. There just are not the buildings and the facilities. The more you finally segregate, the more facilities you require, of course; but progress is being made in segregation, and more progress will be made in future when labour and material for construction become more readily available. First, however, there has to be classification. Classification officers have now been appointed in all the penitentiaries, and a proper system of classification is being developed.

Full-time vocational training has been inaugurated for young convicts at Collin's Bay and St. Vincent de Paul penitentiaries, where they receive instruction in construction carpentry, cabinet making, brick masonry, plumbing and steamfitting, tinsmithing and drafting. That system of full-time vocational training is not now in existence in all the penitentiaries, but there is to be a gradual extension—or perhaps not so gradual—of the system, and this autumn it is expected that it will be instituted in the Saskatchewan penitentiary. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Lake Centre say that the reformation which takes place in the Saskatchewan penitentiary is already fairly satisfactory, but it will be improved by the institution of these vocational training courses.

Greatly increased educational facilities have been introduced in all the penitentiaries. The number of full-time teachers has been doubled. Correspondence courses are available and are being used on a much larger scale than before; and the libraries have been increased in size. Last November we held a conference with representatives of the provincial governments to see if there could not be better co-ordination of the work of the dominion and provincial institutions. There was full discussion by representatives of all governments and, as I say, the provinces of Alberta and Manitoba asked if the dominion government would carry out the full program of the Archambault report. After consideration, however, I thought it necessary to advise them that it would be impossible to do that, for the reasons I stated earlier in my remarks. There is not the slightest evidence that any such complete centralization of control is desired or would be accepted by the provinces of Canada as a whole.

On the other hand, we did make the same offer to those other provinces as we did to the maritime provinces, that if they felt that two or three of the provinces should combine so that they could advantageously use a reformative institution, the dominion government would advance the money on a loan basis for the construction of the institution, and would operate it, to overcome any constitutional difficulties that might otherwise arise. We have not had a favourable response to that request from the western provinces, although it is thought that probably some program of that kind will be worked out with the maritime provinces.

Improved pre-discharge arrangements in penitentiaries are being worked out under the supervision of classification officers. Some months before a convict is discharged, steps are taken to see that contact is made between him and John Howard societies or prisoners' aid societies, so that the transition from the penitentiary life to life outside will be made as smooth and as satisfactory as possible.

We have provided in the estimates before the committee grants to John Howard societies and societies of a similar kind. Those are recommended in General Gibson's report and they are being provided for in the estimates introduced this year.

Let me run over some of the other matters brought up in discussion. The hon. member for Eglinton quoted a report from a coroner in Toronto to the effect that tubercular patients were not segregated from non-tubercular. I am assured by the commissioner that is not now so. He tells me there is complete segregation in the prison hospital of tubercular patients from others.

The hon. member for Selkirk said that the housing situation at Stony Mountain was unsatisfactory. If he will look at page 138 of the estimates he will find, about a third of the way down the page, an item of $515,200 for the construction of buildings, walls and ducts. The expenditure last year was $279,080. This larger amount for the present year includes $150,000 for the construction of houses at Stony Mountain.

Mr. BRYCE: For the housing of guards?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, for guards' houses. Therefore that is being taken care of.

Mr. BRYCE: I am pleased to hear that.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for Selkirk has repeated the complaint he has made on other occasions with respect to the pension system. His point is that certain persons have to keep on paying in some cases until they have paid in more than they could possibly get out.

Mr. BRYCE: I have three cases I shall send to the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: All right; I would like to see them. However, all I can say is that the rule being applied to these penitentiary employees is exactly the same as the one applied throughout the civil service. There is no difference whatever. I wish to reiterate that the Civil Service Superannuation Act is an exceedingly liberal act.

It may be that if a person has to pay up arrears and is given the option of paying a lump sum or paying so much for life, he will pay more by taking the latter option, if he lives long enough. But he will not pay anything at all if he dies very soon.

Mr. BRYCE: My idea is that the superannuation scheme is not a superannuation scheme at all when you find that when you come to the end of your usefulness and are about to retire you have to take $23 off your superannuation money and pay it back to the government. That is not superannuation at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let us be reasonable about this. These people were temporaries who became permanent. As temporaries they were not entitled to superannuation. They were given the privilege of paying for the back period which would partly—and only partly—pay the cost of their receiving a pension, or their families receiving pensions. They had the option of paying that up, with about one-third of the cost to the government. They could not do that, so it was said to them, "All right, instead of paying a lump sum, you may pay so much a year for the rest of your life." Well, the person who does that takes a chance of losing by living too long. There is no doubt about that. However that cannot be avoided. It is an option, and a fair option, based upon actuarial principles.

Mr. BRYCE: These men could not be temporary employees, because they were in the service since 1921.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are people who have been temporaries for many years. Finally they become permanent. My officials instruct me that these people did not elect to take advantage of the superannuation act. Then later in 1944, they elected to take advantage of the act.

Mr. BRYCE: When some of those people are sixty-eight years of age they will have paid compound interest on all they owe the government, and still they have to pay to the end of their days.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am satisfied my hon. friend is unreasonable in the position he takes. We are talking about these civil servants or penitentiary employees who were given a year or two years in 1924 or 1925 to exercise the option. They did not exercise it. But they found out twenty years later that it would have been advantageous for them to exercise it. Then they are given another opportunity to exercise it, provided that they pay up the arrears. They are given the option of paying a lump sum or of paying on an actuarial basis. If they find there is more money taken away from them if they go on that basis, they have no complaint.

Mr. BRYCE: I hope the minister does not really mean that—that I am unreasonable—because I think I am the most reasonable man in the house.

Mr. ILSLEY: Usually, yes.

Mr. BRYCE: I have indicated this grievance, and I would be failing in my duty if I did not bring it to the attention of the committee. These men have a just grievance.

Mr. ILSLEY: All right; we shall let it go at that.

Mr. BRYCE: Would the minister be good enough to mention the hours; is it fifty-one hours?

Mr. ILSLEY: Forty-eight hours, I believe.

Mr. BRYCE: Do you not think it should be less than that?

Mr. ILSLEY: If it is less than that you have to lock the prisoners up earlier.

Mr. BRYCE: There are lots of men in the country now.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is difficult to arrange the shifts.

Mr. BRYCE: That was the excuse made during the war, that there were not sufficient men. There are plenty of men now.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, it is forty-eight hours a week.

Mr. GILLIS: Would the minister answer a question on the point he has been arguing with the hon. member for Selkirk? The minister said that in 1921 these guards who were temporary employees had the option of coming under the superannuation scheme.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think I am wrong in that. I thought the hon. member was talking about temporaries. He was talking about permanents who were given the privilege of coming under the superannuation act in 1924 but who elected not to do so.

Mr. GILLIS: As temporaries they would not have that option.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, they would not have it as temporaries.

Mr. GILLIS: Is it not unreasonable to keep people in the service for twenty-five or thirty years, classify them as temporaries and deprive them of that privilege?

Mr. ILSLEY: These people were not. That is another question.

Then the hon. member for Davenport asked what was being done by way of reclamation. I believe I have answered that pretty thoroughly. Our whole policy is directed toward reform by all the methods I have mentioned. As I say, arrangements are made with the John Howard societies to get in contact with them upon their release from the penitentiaries, and the estimates provide for grants to the John Howard societies.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do they get them jobs?

Mr. ILSLEY: The prisoners' aid societies do the best they can to place them.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister will remember that I said I had exercised myself in obtaining jobs for those whom I knew. They have done very well, because I do not know of any who have relapsed. How much does a prisoner take out of a penitentiary in his pocket when he is released? When he is out of money, what does he do for more?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not less than $10, and it depends upon the length of time he has been in the penitentiary.

Mr. MacNICOL: That would not take him anywhere. Much of the trouble comes from a lack of supervision over the prisoner after he is released. I do not know how it can be done, but certainly $10 would hardly take him from Kingston to Toronto, even riding in a second-class car. When he gets to Toronto he may need some place to lie down in, because they do not all have homes to go to. Then he must eat. There should be some place where a released prisoner feels he can go to obtain aid. This would not be molly-coddling; it is simply a matter of keeping them from going out and robbing some home or knocking somebody down on the street and taking their money.

Mr. ILSLEY: The average cash taken out is $18 and transportation is paid to the place of sentence. The John Howard societies are communicated with to see if they cannot help to get these men established.

The hon. member for Lake Centre said something about pay, but I think I have answered that. Then he said there was no permanency. These men have the same permanency as civil servants, except that they can be dismissed by the minister for cause, while a permanent civil servant can be dismissed for cause, only by the governor in council. They have the same rights under the superannuation fund as civil servants.

The hon. member for Lake Centre wanted to know how arms get into the penitentiaries. The only recent instance is that at Kingston when a revolver got into the penitentiary. It is not known how, but the matter is under investigation.

The hon. member for Lake Centre said that the remission service was unsatisfactory. We do not get many complaints about the remission service, but it may be susceptible of some improvement.

The hon. member for Fort William asked whether I am in favour of letting out a convict whose record is good when someone will sponsor him? Our whole remission service is based on those principles which are pretty consistently applied.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

The hon. member for New Westminster asked if I was acquainted with the investigations of a royal commission in Great Britain into the Borstal system. I am not, but I believe I read somewhere that the figures with reference to the Borstal system are not quite as satisfactory today as they were some years ago. There has been a little deterioration, not in the system, but in the results from the system.

I thank the hon. member for Eglinton for the tribute he has paid to Mr. McCulley, one of the deputy commissioners. I think everyone agrees that it was a good appointment, as was also the appointment of Doctor Gendreau. I need hardly say that the same would apply to the appointment of the commissioner.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to call the attention of the minister to three or four matters. I am greatly dissatisfied with the inspection of these institutions. You are spending large sums of money, six to seven million dollars a year, and getting little value in the way of prison reform. The other evening I referred to the fact that in the old country they had had real law reform. Half of the prisons over there have been closed under the summary offenders act.

What prison reform has there been since the Archambault report? I venture to say that inspection is one of the most important functions you have, and there is no inspection except by crown officers. These institutions, whether they are rightly or wrongly managed, have been criticized by some of the superior court judges of the provinces. It is one of the cardinal principles of Magna Carta that the people shall take a large share in the administration of criminal justice. These institutions are managed only by crown officers, and the motto over their doors should be, "Abandon hope all ye who enter here".

As I say, there is no inspection except by crown officers. I had a bill up the other night for consideration. I want to compliment the minister on the amount of time he has given to this service since he took charge of the department. While I do not think the changes made go as far as they should, I want to say that he has done a great deal to bring these institutions to the attention of the public. He is one attorney general who has done this. I know that some never paid any attention to this branch of the department and were never in these places to see what was going on.

I should like to see these institutions inspected by businessmen because these places are extremely important. I remember when we were appointing a new chief constable in Toronto a deputation, including Sir John Eaton, asked that a soldier be appointed. I said to them, "Can you learn how to run a department in Eaton's in a day? How are you going to learn this police business in a day? How are you going to learn the police or penal institution business in a day?" That just cannot be done. You must be in the business all your life to know about it.

I believe that applies as far as possible to this department, but there should be a proper system of inspection. Hon. members of the House of Commons have been on the board of visitors for years, but how many in this chamber have been in any of these institutions to see what is going on? I know the hon. member for Davenport is one who has visited one of these places. Years ago the only reform in these institutions was by a Conservative government in Ontario under Sir James Whitney, and by our city of Toronto, a pioneer city in prison reform, which built in 1910-11 two jail farms, one for men on Yonge street and one for women three miles away at Concord.

We have an old jail down on the Don which is in my constituency. It was built about the time of confederation and what I am saying here to this government applies to that institution. The former hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers), and another hon. member looked into these institutions, and the construction inside them is against all the known laws of public hygiene, and the member for St. Mary said the same thing. There should be some better system of inspection and the public should know what is going on inside these institutions. You can never inspect them by sitting in your office. True, we have a very fine commissioner in charge of the penitentiaries. We have commissions on everything now. Everybody is changing his title. You change the name but you do not change the system. Under the present system you cannot find out what is going on in the penitentiaries, and we want to know and the public want to know. The Archambault report recommended that there should be a better system of conducting these penitentiaries. Every great war is followed by unrest, especially among the younger people who have travelled through difficult days, and the penitentiary population increases.

I should like to make the following suggestions to the minister. I do not want to hold up his estimates, because he has been very patient not only regarding private bills but the whole system of penitentiary and justice administration. The public are very much dissatisfied with the conduct of some of these institutions. We have not the system which we should have, especially for youthful offenders. It is many years since the Archambault report was brought down. It grew out of debates on these institutions in this house. The commission recommended many changes. It is true that some minor changes which have been made are listed in the back of the report of the present commissioner of penitentiaries. I admit that considerable changes have been made, and so far so good; but they are not sufficient, especially at a time like this when people are being sentenced for minor infractions of the control laws. Can you blame anybody from trying to escape from these institutions? The penalty is too great—no wonder there are escapees.

I wrote to some of the wardens a few years ago and I found that very little visiting of these institutions was done. Why not have the grand jury or even the petit jury inspect these institutions. Jury inspection has been the system in the province of Ontario ever since confederation. Why should the jury inspection system not apply to federal institutions? The jury would not go there to criticize the institutions but would strengthen the hand of the present commissioner. I do not say that they should go to these institutions more than once or twice a year, because in some provinces there are no grand juries and in others the petit juries are reduced to five in number. But undoubtedly we need a more adequate inspection system. That was urged in the report of Mr. Justice Archambault, and it was supported by the late Chief Justice Meredith, who tried more cases out on circuit at the assizes for more than fifty years than any other judge in Ontario or Canada. Many judges have emphasized the value of an inspection of these institutions, municipal, provincial and dominion, by juries, and I hope that something along that line will be done. It is the key to law reform. The public should be made aware of what is going on in these institutions. Some punishments are entirely too drastic, so much so that one would think we were living in the middle ages.

I want to thank the minister for the manner in which he has received my suggestions, in the same spirit as that in which I have made them. I am not criticizing the present commissioner. He has had a distinguished career in another sphere of activity, and it may be that in the years to come he may do good work in the penitentiaries; but the public believe that prison reform, which they had in Great Britain twenty-five years ago, is altogether too slow in coming in Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not want to hold up my own estimates, but many members are interested in penitentiary methods and prison reform, and I should like to send to the members of the house a copy of a speech made by the commissioner on February 16, 1948, at a meeting under the auspices of the School of Social Work, University of Toronto, which I commend to their attention if they want to keep in touch with what is being done in the administration of the penitentiaries. The figures with regard to the pay of the employees need to be revised to some extent, because the speech was made before the last pay increase, but the speech is worthy of reading by anybody who is interested in this matter.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

463. Departmental administration, $690,670.

Mr. FRASER: I have a return here, No. 167, which shows a property sold by the Department of Transport. It shows lots 122, 123 and 124, concession 1, west Yonge street, Toronto, twenty-one acres, sold for $105, although it cost the government $430, and I have information showing that property in that neighbourhood is selling and has sold at $400 or more an acre. I would ask the minister why this land was sold for less than it cost the government away back in 1907 to 1911. Despite the fact that the return says this land was sold by tender, I have reliable information that no tenders were called at all. I would like a little information on that.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Where is the land?

Mr. FRASER: Lots 122, 123 and 124, concession 1, west Yonge street, Toronto. It was part of the land that was bought by the government from 1907 to 1911 for the Newmarket branch of the Trent canal. The information I have here shows that the land around it has been selling at $400 an acre, and some as high as $500 an acre.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not remember the details of this particular sale. It is somewhat vague in my memory now, but my recollection is that it was advertised. It may be that there were no bids and that, later on, the land was sold privately, but I should not like to be committed to that statement. I shall look into the matter and give my hon. friend a reply before I am through with my estimates.

Mr. FRASER: Even if it were sold privately, those who sold it should have checked on the property nearby and should not have sold it for $5 an acre. That was giving it away. This is valuable land. The property around there is now all built up with houses.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I remember now; it was advertised on more than one occasion. There were bids in certain instances and in others there were not.

Mr. FRASER: That was other land round there.

Mr. CHEVRIER: What happened was, I think, that the land was put together in a block and sold. In any event, I shall get the information for my hon. friend.

Mr. FULTON: Has the minister a report as to the extent of the damage done to the Canadian National railway lines by the floods in British Columbia? What is the estimated cost of repairs?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I gave that information in much detail on the orders of the day.

Mr. FULTON: Today?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I gave a complete statement on it on Monday, I think.

Canals service—

467. Canals—construction and improvements, $579,660.

Mr. FRASER: I spoke about this matter last year and at other times when the estimates were up. The Rideau canal, and also the Trent canal have great attractions for United States tourists; but, owing to the fact that so many automobiles are used these days, the steamers which we used to have on these canals are not running today. Therefore the weeds are allowed to grow in the rivers and the lakes of the canals. Many of the little docks that the government put in years ago are of no use today, on account of the fact that the entrance from a lake or from the canal itself is blocked with weeds. Would it not be possible, and would it not be good business on the part of the government, to clear these weeds out of these sections, because in Canada, and especially in my district, the Kawartha district, we depend on the tourist for a great deal of business. We depend on them for United States dollars, and it is the United States tourist who is asking that these weeds be taken out of these channels. If the department had a weed cutter it would not cost very much to do the job. The excuse given to me last year was that if the department cut the weeds they would float ashore and create a menace, breed flies and so on. That condition would prevail for only a couple of days and then it would be over. If the weeds were cut, growth would be kept down. Another way of doing away with them around the docks is, of course, to put lime down. That keeps them down for perhaps two or three years, and I do not think it affects the fish at all. Something should be done in that regard. We spend $650,000 or more advertising for United States tourists, and we should do everything possible for their convenience when they get here.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The last time my hon. friend brought this matter up, I think the difficulty was that these weeds were not in navigable channels. They were in close to the dock or close to a channel which took care of boats of small draft. There are perhaps 500 miles or more of secondary canals, not all of which are of tourist value. Because of that, it would not be a simple matter in so far as the work and the costs are concerned. It might not be a big job to cut the weeds in the channels to which my hon. friend refers, but the whole question is whether it is a responsibility of the Department of Transport. If we were to cut them there, by inference it would create an obligation to cut them elsewhere. I am not saying that it cannot be done or that it will not be done, that is the objection which occurred to me when my hon. friend brought the matter up. I told him that I would ask my officers to look into it. They did, and they came to the conclusion that they would be assuming an obligation to cut the weeds in the other places as well. I do not know that the position has changed since, but I shall be glad to ask my people to look at it again.

Mr. FRASER: Take the case of Keene, Ontario. There is a government dock at Keene on the river that runs from Keene into Rice lake, which is only a short stretch. That dock was built at Keene by the government. Thousands of United States tourists go there. They come into the Rice lake district, winter, summer, spring and fall, but they can hardly use an outboard motor in that section today from the main canal in Rice lake up to the Keene dock. The dock is there. It was built when the steamboats were operating. The steamboats kept it clear, but an outboard motor cannot plow through there. It is not only for the convenience of the United States tourists who are there but also for the business people in the section. They need the business of these tourists. In many cases the tourists have to go up the river to Keene to get their mail, because some of them have no roads or they are on an island. They have to go by boat for their mail, but they cannot go all the way. They have to paddle through those weeds. There are not 500 miles of weeds which would have to be cleared.

There is another spot which should be cleared. It has been checked by the superintendent of the department in Peterborough, Mr. Ryan. I refer to Little lake. Weeds have grown in Little lake because of the dam and the locks below. There is a concrete dock and shed and everything on George street, right on Little lake, but to get from the main canal you have to go through weeds. The weeds in that section are a menace to the outboard motor and to health, I would say, because they stop the proper flow of water down that stream.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I add a word, because I have exactly the same situation in Muskoka outside the town of Bracebridge? It seems to me that the situation described by the hon. member for Peterborough West is something that somebody has to deal with; otherwise an impossible situation will be created, and many of these waterways will fill up and become unusable for local inhabitants, and what is more important, for the tourists. I am not quite clear as to the responsibility in these matters. The waters referred to by my hon. friend, and certainly the waters that I have in mind, are navigable waters. Am I right in assuming that the department has a responsibility there? If I am, then the minister will answer me.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I can answer that right away.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I first just ask a supplementary question? If the department is not responsible, then is it a matter of individual initiative for the riparian owner?

Mr. CHEVRIER: To answer the first question on navigable waters, the department has a responsibility with reference to aids to navigation and the keeping open of the channel; but it has no statutory responsibility with reference to the cutting of weeds.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What is meant by "the keeping open of the channel"?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Keeping it open in the sense of having proper beacons, lights and aids to navigation to permit traffic to go from one end of the waterway to the other.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): But the minister would not suggest that that is what happened between Montreal and Quebec? The department or whoever has the responsibility there keeps the channel open, free and available for the passage of traffic.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is another matter altogether. From Montreal to Quebec it is a matter of dredging.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is a different principle involved there? Between Montreal and Quebec there is the responsibility to keep the channel open. At first blush, the minister's answer does not seem to be a good one, because actually between Montreal and Quebec much more has to be done than is suggested by us. I take it that it would be a much more difficult task to do dredging than it would be to cut weeds. I cannot yet see that the minister has given an answer to my question. If this is a navigable stream and particularly, as my hon. friend has said, where you have built wharves, is it not your responsibility to provide access to them? On the analogy of the situation between Montreal and Quebec, surely it is.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is a distinction between the two. From Montreal to Quebec the department has dredged the channel to a certain depth—I think it is thirty-five feet—in order to keep it open for ships of certain draft. On the canal to which the hon. member for Peterborough refers, the situation is different. We do not usually take responsibility for cutting weeds on canals. We cut weeds on government property, on canal banks and the like. But cutting weeds for tourist purposes is not an obligation of the Department of Transport.

Mr. FRASER: It should be.

Mr. CHEVRIER: My hon. friend says it should be. That is another matter. With deference, I submit that it should not be. However, I shall be glad to have the matter looked into further.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I may perhaps be stupid, but it seems to me that the minister has not at all explained to me this distinction. In each of these cases you have a navigable water. In the one case, as the minister has pointed out, the department has assumed responsibility for keeping open a channel thirty-five feet in depth, and it acts accordingly. In these other cases, particularly where a canal has been built or at any rate where there is a navigable water of which the department has charge—and which, as the minister says, has navigating lights where necessary—and still more so where wharves have been built to which access has been had, surely the minister does not say there is no responsibility there. What is the difference in principle between cutting weeds and dredging out clay or whatever it is? I cannot follow that distinction.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am sorry if I am not making myself clear, but I hope I am when I state that there is no responsibility in the Department of Transport, as I understand it, to keep the water clear of weeds.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am sorry to persist; but why does the minister distinguish between weeds, let us say, and stones, clay or sand? What is the distinction? In the St. Lawrence you recognize that you must keep the channel clear. Why not in the Muskoka river? What is the difference?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The difference is as I have stated. The responsibility of the department is to keep the channel open for commercial traffic and not for tourist traffic.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Oh, that is a new point. Is that in the act? Surely a navigable stream is a navigable stream, and surely if you build wharves you have some responsibility to assure access to them.

Mr. CHEVRIER: We do not build wharves in the Department of Transport. That is not our responsibility. We have never built wharves in the Department of Transport. They were built by others. We operate the wharves once they are built.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): All right. The minister must not become too legalistic on me, because he is better at that kind of thing than I am. Let us get back to the point. Let me retract what I said about the department's building wharves. Will the minister say whether I am correct in thinking that those wharves are dominion government property?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): And am I correct in thinking that it is the duty of his department to maintain access to them? Is that correct?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is correct.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If weeds impede access to them, is it not your duty to take out the weeds?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not think weeds impede the access of ships bringing trade and commerce to a port. That is my understanding of the situation. But that is not the point which the hon. member for Peterborough raised. He raised the point that weeds are impeding tourist craft and boats of that kind from coming in. He mentioned the stretch from Keene to Rice lake. I do not know just what the position of the channel is there. I am not familiar with that.

Mr. FRASER: It is about a mile long.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Is it on canal property?

Mr. FRASER: It was originally, yes.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is probably connecting one canal with another.

Mr. FRASER: Rice lake runs from Hastings up to Bewdley, and Keene is on the north part of it, with the Indian river running down. The dock is up in there. Years ago all kinds of boats went up in there, including steamboats. Later on, there were launches. First there were naphtha launches and then gasoline ones. A gasoline launch cannot go up there now, because it would get tied up in the weeds.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is not a navigable channel.

Mr. FRASER: It was.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is not a navigable channel in the sense that ships bringing in a cargo come in there. How many feet deep is the channel?

Mr. FRASER: It would be as deep as you can make it. In some places the Trent canal has a clearance of six feet and in other places a clearance of nine feet. There would be no reason why you could not have a clearance of nine feet in there if you want it. Steamships 100 feet or more in length used to go up in there. At many other spots such as Harwood, Gore's Landing and Bewdley, the weeds should be cleared out. As I said before, thousands of tourists are going up in there. We are spending $650,000 or more to advertise for United States tourists. We must do everything possible to look after their interests when they get here. They are buying outboard motors which are manufactured in Peterborough. We want them to use those outboard motors. We want to keep the working men in Canada busy. We want to keep our plants going.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish to add something to what the hon. member has said. I really do not believe the minister can seriously say that the department's responsibility is to keep these channels open only for a certain type of craft and that the summer craft, such as launches and so on, are to be distinguished from what I think the minister implied were more the commercial type of craft. In the broad sense, these summer craft are just as commercial as anything in the world could be, because they provide a great deal of business in the district. It is an obvious fact, as obvious as it can be, that if these waters become impassable, it may be a great detriment to the whole area. It is clear to me that these weeds must be kept down. The minister's argument that the department is not responsible for that seems to me, if I have understood him correctly, to be untenable; because what he says is apparently that weeds must be treated in a different way from the more solid obstacles which he removes in order to keep the channels open. I cannot believe that the minister intends to say this summer traffic, which, after all, is important to that whole area, is to be disregarded and that, in so far as the department is concerned, these waterways with docks on them which are government property are to be allowed virtually to become impassable. I cannot believe he intends to take that position, and yet that seems to be what he has said.

Mr. FRASER: I should like to send this document over to the minister. It is entitled "Waters to explore—the Trent." It is interesting, and I know it will be quite an education to him.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have seen it, but I shall be glad to look at it again.

Mr. FRASER: I hope the minister will look into this weed cutting, because it means thousands of dollars to the people of Ontario.

While we are on this item of canals, I should like to mention once more the eyesore which still confronts us when we come into Ottawa, in connection with the concrete retaining walls of the Rideau canal. The department is doing some work on the walls, and I was wondering if that work would be continued until all the walls are straightened out and patched up where they were eaten away, and so on, and the banks fixed up. It is a very pretty spot, but it needs to be improved.

Mr. CHEVRIER: We are proceeding piecemeal with the repairs to the retaining wall to which my hon. friend refers. Last year we did some work; this year we are doing more. I believe a portion of the work is now complete, and there is an item of $25,000 in the estimates to provide for the continuation of this work.

Mr. FRASER: That is only a fleabite.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It may be only a fleabite, but we must proceed gradually. I think we have done very well in the last two years. A considerable amount of work remains to be done, and we propose to do it.

Mr. McLURE: While we are on this item of canal services, I should like to ask the minister what the gross revenue is from the operation of our canals. We have the expenditures here, but what is the gross revenue?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is about a million dollars, roughly.

Mr. McLURE: That leads me to this point—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. We are now dealing specifically with item 46.

Mr. McLURE: That is all in connection with canal service, is it not?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: No.

Mr. STOKES: I should like to ask the minister what provision is made for the removal of debris from the canals. I am now drawing attention to a condition in the Trent canal near the village of Frankford, directly in front of dam No. 6. A large amount of debris, presumably stone, covering an area of half an acre or more, has been deposited in the river, causing the main current of the stream to turn to the west and run over private property, damaging good garden land, the owner of which is not very well pleased. It seems to me that it would not be very hard to remove this material, because it is all loose. It was deposited there during high water. Probably the stone was raised up by frost and brought down, and it has been left in the middle of the stream in front of the dam.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I believe the hon. gentleman brought this matter to my attention last year. The position is that the equipment required to get rid of the debris to which he refers has not been available. We have it on hand now, however, and it is hoped that we may be able to remedy the situation during the course of the summer.

Mr. STOKES: Just in that connection, the man who owns the land told me, after I had been in consultation with the minister, that some official of the department came there and wanted him to sell his land. That official did not say anything about improving the condition.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I would hesitate to believe that an officer of the department would go there and ask this man to sell his land. If he did so, he was certainly acting outside his authority. I would not think that a proper thing for an officer of the department to do.

Mr. STOKES: I found it rather peculiar at the time; but the owner of the land is a responsible resident of the village of Frankford, and I would have every confidence in anything he told me.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): This item provides an amount of $579,660, and the total of the items under canal service is $3,886,408. I want to point out to the committee that these expenditures are made almost entirely in central Canada. We in the maritime provinces have been overlooked pretty much since confederation. We have one canal project with which I am sure the minister is familiar, though I do not know that he has done much about it. I refer to the Chignecto canal.

Those of us coming from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have brought this matter before the house on different occasions since that canal and ship railway were projected. A subsidy was voted by parliament; and earlier in the session I made the estimate that if the money voted had been placed to our credit at compound interest it would amount by now to well on to $15,000,000. A subsidy for the completion of the Chignecto canal was cancelled for financial reasons; the builders were not able to complete their work within the time specified.

We do not object to these canals in central Canada, and we realize that it is necessary to maintain them. They are used for transportation purposes. With the canals, the river services and the lake services, manufacturers and shippers in central Canada are able to get cheap transportation. The railways have put competitive rates into effect, and this portion of Canada gets the advantage. We have no canals, though we are entitled to them; we have no such competitive rates, so that we have to pay the regular freight rates.

In view of our claims; in view of the fact that this undertaking was being dealt with before confederation and at the time of confederation; in view of the fact that a subsidy was voted in order to provide this service across the isthmus of Chignecto, I ask the minister and his department to take some action to advance the project. I ask him to see that surveys and estimates are prepared, and that a practical investigation is carried out as to the cost today. The maritime board of trade, the maritime mayors, members of parliament, newspapers and so on in recent months have been placing before the minister and the public the claims of that part of Canada for some consideration; and I make another appeal today. Since I have been here, I have brought up this matter on many occasions, and again I ask the minister and his department to deal seriously with this question and to take some action, so that we may have the benefit of modern transportation facilities across the isthmus of Chignecto.

Mr. BROOKS: I rise to second the remarks of the hon. member for Cumberland. It is not necessary to speak at length at this time, because this matter has been raised on numerous occasions by members from the maritime provinces. I must say, however, I cannot find myself shedding any tears for the failure to remove obsolete canals in Ontario, so long as canals are being neglected in the maritime provinces. It was all very well for Ontario to have pleasure excursions, scenic beauty and places for the boys to go swimming, but we in the maritime provinces are asking for canals which would be of some benefit to the maritime provinces and to the whole of Canada.

As the hon. member for Cumberland has pointed out, the rest of Canada, particularly Ontario, owes the maritime provinces a great debt, so far as canals are concerned. Those canals in Ontario were not built by the province; they were built by the federal government, and the maritime provinces contributed many millions of dollars. Now that those canals have become obsolete, and when at the same time there is an opportunity to build a canal which would be of some commercial benefit to the country, I suggest that some of this $4,000,000 be taken to construct the Chignecto canal, which I sincerely believe would be of great benefit to the whole country.

This matter has been before the house on many occasions and has been discussed by all members from the maritime provinces. As the hon. member for Cumberland has stated, our press has given a clear outline of the possibilities, and the great help such a construction would be to commerce in this country.

One of the finest things the Minister of Transport could do would be to begin construction of the Chignecto canal. If he were to do so, I know his name would go down in the history of our part of the country and, I believe, the rest of Canada, as being a most efficient minister in his department.

Mr. ISNOR: I have heard of a game in which, if you hold two cards of the same kind, and then add another, your position is considerably strengthened. I am not as familiar with that game as some others might be, but in this instance when two aces are showing I should like to add my strength, and to put in my word for further consideration of this project.

In the past I have not urged this to any great extent, because I considered there were some features which might not be entirely in the interests of certain sections of Canada. I am always a little careful in connection with disturbing interests certain sections hold. I have in mind particularly the shipping of the great port of Halifax. I can see where, at great expense, the proposals now made might operate to the detriment of Halifax.

At the same time I am in accord with the thoughts expressed by the hon. members for Cumberland and Royal, and I hope the minister will look into the matter to ascertain whether this would be a wise expenditure, and whether the project is feasible. Anything the minister can do in connection with this or any other project which will help transportation and give us greater possibilities in trade with central Canada should be looked into.

Mr. McLURE: I rise to support what has been said by the hon. members for Cumberland and Royal in connection with the building of the canal. If that canal service is put through, perhaps it would be of greater benefit to the farmers of Prince Edward Island than to any other group in Canada, and especially in the maritime provinces. Therefore I gladly endorse what the hon. members have said.

The minister has just said there is a revenue of about a million dollars from the canals. I notice that the remaining expenditures are not charged up as a deficit, but that they appear in the public accounts as a service. I would draw to the minister's attention the different circumstances which apply to the ferry service to Prince Edward Island, which is a much greater revenue producer than are the canals. When the accounts are balanced a deficit is charged against Prince Edward Island, or against the service. I say it should appear in the public accounts in the same manner as this is shown, namely a service paid by the federal treasury.

I would endeavour to impress this upon the minister, so that at another time when public accounts are being made up, the word "deficit" would be deleted, where it applies in respect of the ferry system between Borden and Tormentine, and that it should appear as a canal service. It is a service which we purchased in 1873 and for which we paid highly. Why should it now be charged as a deficit?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to have a statement from the minister. When we sit opposite him we get the impression that he understands the representations we make, and that he is in sympathy with us. If his name is identified with the construction of the Chignecto canal he will have shown his administrative capacity and his control of his department.

The matter has been discussed today by hon. members from the maritime provinces, and I shall not be content with only a smile or a good-will greeting from the minister.

I want a statement from him in which he sets out his attitude toward the construction of the Chignecto canal, always keeping in mind the three or four hundred million dollars already expended in central Canada, and the further fact that in the estimates now before us there is an appropriation of $3,886,408 for the canal service. What is the minister's attitude toward the Chignecto canal?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. member has inquired about two things. His first question was whether all the sum voted for canal purposes, operation and maintenance, is in respect of canals in Ontario and Quebec. The answer is yes, with the exception of a small expenditure of about $20,000 on the St. Peter's canal in the maritime provinces.

With reference to the Chignecto canal, the hon. member has made representations about this before, and he made them again this year on these estimates. Representations have been made also by the hon. member for Royal.

All I can say is that I have received many representations from bodies in the maritime provinces, and that I am sympathetic to these representations. No minister of transport who has at heart the opening up of transportation facilities could be anything but sympathetic. However I have to look at the position as I find it on the record. The hon. member unquestionably knows that down through the years many surveys and reports have been made concerning the advisability, the feasibility and the economic advantages and disadvantages of constructing the Chignecto canal. Surveys were made as far back as 1822, and I think there have been eight or ten altogether.

Mr. BROOKS: When was the most recent one made?

Mr. CHEVRIER: In 1931. That was made by virtue of an order in council appointing a commission to inquire into the Chignecto canal project. I have the report before me, and the recommendation on page 11 reads:

> Having regard to transport facilities already available in the maritimes area, we cannot see where any interest would suffer were the Chignecto canal project to be permitted to stand in abeyance until it can be further examined in the light of future developments in Canada's economic situation.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): What is the date of that?

Mr. CHEVRIER: 1931. Of course that recommendation was not detrimental or opposed to the building of a canal; it simply stated as a conclusion that, having regard to all the circumstances, the commission could not see where any interest would suffer if the matter were allowed to stand.

[Mr. Black (Cumberland).]

Mr. BROOKS: That was at the height of the depression.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That was many years ago, in 1931. It may well be that economic conditions have changed to such an extent that another survey would be warranted. The hon. member suggests that we begin construction immediately, but I think he will agree with me that, before that is done, we should look at it by way of a survey or investigation along the lines of that carried on previously and having regard to the position as it now is. I am not prepared to state that it is possible to do that at this time, neither am I prepared to state that we would not do it. However, I can say that I shall be glad to look into the matter again in the light of the position as we find it now. I would have to consult my colleagues in the government to ascertain whether it would be advisable to appoint another commission to see if, because of changed conditions, it would be practical to consider the construction of the Chignecto canal.

Mr. MacNICOL: As one friendly to any proposal which will assist in the economic advance of the maritime provinces, I am glad to hear what the minister said a moment ago, that the matter of the Chignecto canal will be looked into again. He said it had been discussed since 1931, but it goes back much farther than that. I was interested in reading some of the reports made in the early days of the French regime. The French administrators strongly recommended to their government in Paris that a canal be cut across the isthmus.

A couple of years ago I had the pleasure of covering more or less all that area in company with the hon. member for Cumberland. There are many good vantage points from which one can see the isthmus, and I remember remarking at the time that the early French pioneers deserved a lot of credit for the vision they had.

There have been many engineering advances made since the last report was presented. I read over the report; in fact I took it with me on my last survey of the isthmus. While it would not be the easiest engineering feat to perform, it can be performed. Our United States friends had a somewhat similar problem in connection with the canal they cut across the Cape Cod isthmus. One of their main engineering problems was to keep the sides from falling in, but they overcame that. Another problem was caused by the six-foot tides. During one portion of the day there would be six-foot tides at the west end of the canal, while for the other portion of the day there would be six-foot tides at the east end.

They overcame all the difficulties, and that canal is now providing a fine service. It is a good commercial canal, and they have a couple of large bridges which lift up to let ships go through, but it is also of strategic importance. I doubt very much, if the United States had to do it over again, they would wait as long to build that canal as they did.

The Chignecto canal would not be only a commercial canal; it would be of strategic value to Canada. It would render great service to commerce in the bay of Fundy and to "the island." The hon. member for Queens will not listen to anyone who calls it anything but "the island." Everyone is supposed to know what is meant when you say "the island." It is a beautiful island. If the canal were opened up it would bring Charlottetown much closer to Boston and by a route that would be comparatively safe. Has the minister been across the isthmus?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I would like to be there with him if he is going again.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. member followed me quite closely on his last trip.

Mr. MacNICOL: I think we were there about the same time. It is an intensely interesting trip, especially to anyone interested in engineering. The Cape Cod canal is about fifteen miles long and it takes much larger ships than it is proposed would pass through the Chignecto canal. Then the United States propose building a sea-level canal across the Panama isthmus. Anyone interested in the building of the Chignecto canal would find many things of great value in the engineering works proposed for the new Panama canal. In order to take care of tides that run as high as twenty feet on the west side, they propose building a gigantic lock dock. On the west side, ships entering from the Pacific ocean, say on a twenty-foot rise of tide, would be lowered down to the canal level in the lock dock and sail to the east side of the isthmus; and similarly boats travelling west would enter the lock dock and remain until they could get out into the Pacific ocean. Some such lock dock as that would be necessary, I am satisfied, in connection with the Chignecto canal. If I remember correctly, an engineer—I have forgotten his name—did plan building a railway across the isthmus and he projected the route. I went over it, and I have nothing but praise for those who engineered that route, which was for the purpose of taking ships across on a railway. The proposal was to build an entrance lock dock on the west side, into which the ship would rise up and go down with the rise and fall of the tide.

To close the argument, I assure the minister that I shall be glad to support any estimate he brings in for building the Chignecto canal and will be as much help to him and to whoever has to do with the proposed works as I can be. I am firmly convinced that a canal across the Chignecto isthmus would be a great thing for the maritime provinces. It would mean, for instance, that ships could load up on the bay of Fundy with Joggins coal or Springhill coal. They would not need to be ships of a capacity to go out into the ocean, but 2,000 to 5,000 tonners, which could load up on the bay of Fundy, sail through that canal and go right up to Montreal and Toronto. It would be a great thing for us, too, in the central provinces, because we would load the ships up with products to send back to the maritimes, so that there would be commerce both ways. I hope that the minister will look into the matter carefully and consider also the strategical angle. This country is becoming more and more interested in international affairs and if it ever became embroiled in another world war, just fancy what the Chignecto canal would mean to our warships and to United States battleships coming to assist us in the defence of the gulf of the St. Lawrence. The minister should take up that question with the defence department and invite them to come in and help build the canal not only as a commercial canal but also as a strategic canal.

Mr. HODGSON: The Trent valley canal is more important today than it ever was dreamt of being forty years ago. I can show the minister tourist resorts along the Trent valley canal, in which a great deal of money has been invested and which are bringing more money into Canada in one year than was thought of as possible in ten years, some forty years ago. There is a lot of work to be done on that waterway. It is without doubt the greatest tourist resort of any place in Canada. The minister should think of it in terms of tourists rather than in terms of commerce. It is of great importance to Canada to keep these waterways open for tourist traffic, and docks should be built at different places. I do not know whether that would come under the minister's department, but probably he could requisition the public works department to have money spent all along the Trent valley canal at places like Cameron lake, Sturgeon lake, Blossom lake, lake Simcoe, and throughout all that area where tourist resorts abound by thousands, and thousands more can be accommodated there if his department does the things it should do.

During the war period I have no doubt that the department was busy with other things, but the war has been over now for three years, and we are looking for developments and for money to be spent along the Trent valley canal which will bring thousands of tourists to Canada, to the benefit of our own economy. If the minister would come up to that part of the country I should be glad to meet him with a boat and give him two weeks holidays in the greatest land of beauty there is in this whole dominion.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I would not want the hon. gentleman to think from any remarks of mine, and I am sure he did not get that impression, that we in the Department of Transport do not give the canal the attention it so well deserves. If my hon. friend will only look at the estimates he will see that we spend a considerable amount of money on the canal each year, and there is also a great deal of revenue coming to the department from the canal. We are spending $347,000 this year on operations and another $84,000 on improvements, which is far more money than is spent on some of the more eastern canals in Ontario. I can assure my hon. friend that we do not intend to neglect the canal, nor have we been neglecting it in any way.

Mr. HODGSON: I hope the minister will keep on spending money there for a number of years, because it is required.

Mr. CHEVRIER: We intend to.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I come back to the subject of weeds, in which the minister is not as much interested as I am. Weeds, although humble, have their uses and abuses. The minister has made a distinction that I do not think he will stick to. He has divided navigable streams into two categories; those on which what he called commercial vessels ply, and those on which other kinds of vessels ply. I have here a very large dictionary, and I am going to read a definition of what a navigable river is. It has nothing to do with the kind of ships that ply on it. The definition is: "A river fit to be navigated". These waters we are talking about would be fit to be navigated if the weeds were not allowed to accumulate through the negligence of some government department. I am not sure which department it is, and the question I want to ask the minister is this: Have these weeds in the past been cut by any department? I understand that they have. Would the minister answer that first? I understand that these weeds have in times past been cut. The obligation to do so was recognized, and it is only of late years that neglect has arisen.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I should perhaps put the position a little more clearly. What I said a moment ago, and if I did not say it I certainly intended to convey that impression, was that there is a doubt in my mind as to the responsibility of the Department of Transport to cut weeds. My hon. friend would like me to make a statement that there is no such responsibility or that there is such responsibility.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to know one way or the other.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I will not say one way or the other. I am making the statement now that there is some doubt in my mind. I do not think I need go any further in explaining the doubt. It is a legal question. That perhaps might have some importance or not; but there is in my mind some doubt, and, that being so, I am sure that the hon. gentleman would not want me to make a statement in so far as the responsibility of the department is concerned which I could not later substantiate.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I want the minister to clear up the doubt now.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I cannot.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Why not?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Because there is doubt in so far as the legal position is concerned. The weeds are there. Do they impede navigation? Do they impede navigation as we understand it in the Department of Transport? I am not familiar with the particular case to which my hon. friend refers and, without knowing the facts, I do not intend to make a statement on it.

I said to the hon. member for Peterborough West a moment ago that, in so far as the particular position was concerned, I would be glad to have it looked into. There are weed cutting apparatuses which can be purchased. I do not know what they cost. Perhaps they are fairly costly. I do not know what the position is. I cannot add anything other than what I have said, namely, that I shall be glad to look at the position from Keene to Rice lake, a channel of some six miles long.

Mr. FRASER: One mile.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I think there are one or two other places.

Mr. FRASER: And also Little lake.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There are one or two other places in the vicinity, but I cannot say more than that.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is the minister to leave us in this position? Is he to tell us that he cannot answer a simple question? He says there is a legal difficulty. What is the Department of Justice for if it cannot solve the difficulty? The minister also used this phrase, "Navigation as we understand it in the Department of Transport." As I understand the minister, he keeps that a closely guarded secret, and he will not tell us what it is. I have not been able to discover what the understanding of navigation is in the Department of Transport. I submit to the minister that it is reasonable for us to ask him to define navigation as it is understood in his department, because this is a matter of considerable substance to the people who live in the tourist areas. It is not academic. I am not hair-splitting. I have had people anxiously consulting me with regard to the same question. We are entitled to an answer on this. Surely the minister is not going to say that there is a legal difficulty. If he does not want to answer the question now, all right; let him answer it tonight or tomorrow or whenever he is prepared to do so. I do not think he should tell us that no answer can be given.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I did not tell the hon. member that no answer can be given. I have given my answer. I am telling him that there is some doubt in my mind as to the responsibility of the Department of Transport to cut weeds. My hon. friend asks what the Department of Justice is for. I suppose I could consult the Department of Justice. I have no objection to doing that; I shall be glad to do it. I cannot give a categorical answer to that.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am not suggesting that the minister should answer before he is ready. I am only asking him not to leave us in that position.

What is the division of responsibility between public works and transport in this regard? Is there some responsibility on public works?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The responsibility on public works is to build the wharves. Once they are built, we maintain and operate them, except for small expenditures of under $5,000. Public works is responsible for certain dredging, but I do not know that that would include the cutting of weeds, although I cannot speak for my colleague.

Mr. FRASER: The minister mentioned weed-cutting machines. Some years ago the Department of Transport did look after the weeds. They used to use the old chain method, which is efficient. That has been used for some time on the river at Keene. It used to be used on Chemong lake and was effective, and also in other parts of the Trent canal. The chain method worked very well, and it does not cost very much. They can do a long stretch in a day.

Mr. HODGSON: Did I understand the minister to say that the Department of Transport is responsible for docks under $5,000?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I did not put it in that way. I said the Department of Public Works constructs the docks and wharves, and we maintain and operate them; but expenditures on wharves or docks up to $5,000, I understand, are the responsibility of the Department of Transport. My officer corrects me now and tells me that it is even lower than that. It is expenditure up to $50. There is an item of $5,000—perhaps that is how I got confused—for such repairs up to $50.

Mr. MacNICOL: Perhaps I can add a word to help the minister arrive at a satisfactory answer to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. The Muskoka river which the hon. member has in mind is at the head of navigation. But not only that; the railway ends there, and the ship which navigates through the lakes is loaded at that point. It delivers all sorts of freight of one kind and another and takes it to various tourist points on the lake. If the weeds are obstructing that channel which is as sinuous as a snake, and it might be possible because of the turns in the river, although the water is otherwise deep enough that weeds would grow as they would do, if they are extending out into the channel, it should not be much of a job to clean them out. The weeds would be an obstruction, not only to a fair-sized boat but also to the power boats. Many power boats come into Bracebridge, load up with material and take it up the lake. I have often boarded a boat there myself for a tour around the lakes. It is an important tourist centre, an important tourist route, and an important tourist lake. If the minister is not familiar with it, perhaps he will take some advisement from me. If he does I am sure he will acquiesce in what my hon. friend asks for. If the weeds are there they should be cut.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If the minister is going to let us know what he considers to be the responsibility in respect of those navigable waters, and also his definition of navigable waters, I am ready to let the matter go on that understanding.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I shall try to get the information on both counts and give it at eight o'clock. I do not know whether I shall be able to get it then, but I shall get it as soon as I can.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—
477. To provide for breaking ice in Thunder bay, lake Superior and other points deemed advisable in the interests of navigation, $30,000.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I have one matter that I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. Perhaps we had better leave it until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock they were considering item 477. But the hon. member for Cumberland wished to speak on item 474 just for a moment.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I wish to thank you, Mr. Chairman, for allowing me to say a few words in connection with aids to navigation under the general heading of marine service. A large amount of money, namely, $3,387,234, is involved. We in Nova Scotia are greatly concerned in these services. We have many lighthouse keepers and these men are the guardians of our shipping. They are on duty day and night the year round in most instances. They perform a necessary and, in many instances, a self-sacrificing service. We have a great deal of sympathy for the mail carriers with respect to their duties and their remuneration. I feel that like consideration is not given to the claims of our lighthouse keepers.

I have in my hand a communication from one of them in my own county. He is Vance F. Barteaux, Cape d'Or, Advocate Harbour, in the western portion of Cumberland county jutting into the bay of Fundy where the tides are high with dense fogs and where there is heavy shipping to both Minas basin and Cumberland basin. This lighthouse keeper has been in the service for twenty-eight years. His station is partly isolated. Although he is on the mainland, he is a distance off the main highway. The roadway which serves this lighthouse is almost completely neglected. I appeal to the minister to have this case looked into, and have the roadway serving this lighthouse put into a better state of repair than it is at the present time. The roadway serving the lighthouse is owned by the federal government, while the road leading up to it may be part of the provincial highways. Anyway, it has been neglected and should be placed in better repair.

Then I should like to make an appeal to the minister, on behalf of this lighthouse keeper and all other lighthouse keepers, that more attention be given to their living quarters. They and their families must live in quarters, which have been more or less neglected. They should have bathrooms and sanitary facilities. They should have electric lights. There should be an extension of the rural electric services; or if that is not possible, there should be some separate diesel electric systems installed for lighthouses such as these. A rural electric service has been established at Advocate Harbour, within a short distance of this lighthouse. I feel that the lighthouse keeper should have the advantage of this modern facility, and believe that it would be an added advantage for the protection of shipping.

While I am dealing with lighthouses in the province from which I come, I should like to refer to the range light at Pugwash. That was burned down a number of years ago. At the present time there is just a stick or pole with an electric light. It has a most disgraceful appearance for a structure under the control of the minister's department. I am sure that if the minister saw it he would not tolerate it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: When was it burned down?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I think it was during the war.

I should also like to point out the necessity of improving the channel serving Pugwash harbour. I am pleased that the Minister of Public Works is in his seat at the present time. He will be equally concerned with the Minister of Transport in this matter. The Minister of Transport is responsible for shipping and transport, while the Minister of Public Works will have the responsibility of doing the actual work of widening and improving the shipping channel. I doubt if as much shipping, at as little expenditure of public moneys, has gone through any other harbour in Canada as has gone through Pugwash port, since confederation. In recent years, especially during the war, steamers plying in and out of that port have become larger, and are having more difficulty in navigating the channel. The channel is deep enough, but there are bends where dredging is badly needed. There should also be work done in deepening the outer part of the harbour, at the bar. At the present time the harbour will take a steamer with a 22-foot draft. Ordinarily this is a safe harbour, but the captains and the pilots, who have a great responsibility, should have a better chance to give their ships safe entrance and safe exit. I therefore appeal to the Minister of Transport and to the Minister of Public Works to give this matter special attention. I have spoken to the Minister of Public Works and he has assured me that his department has it under consideration. I hope that some dredging can be done there this year. A large volume of shipping uses Pugwash harbour. This is an expenditure which is well warranted.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am glad to give my hon. friend the assurance that I will look into the case of the lighthouse keeper to whom he has referred, as well as the condition of the place in which he lives.

As far as the light at Pugwash is concerned, I have no information as to why it was not rebuilt and put back in proper condition. I presume the explanation is that during the war years it may have been found impossible to rebuild it, but I can see no reason why that should not be done. I shall look into the matter and advise my hon. friend.

Mr. ISNOR: I wish to support the views expressed by the hon. member for Cumberland, not in reference to any individual case but rather on the general picture as far as the lighthouse keepers on the Atlantic coast are concerned. I have already dealt with the difficulties under which they operate, and I should like to ask the minister whether there has been any reclassification of the salaries of these men. While the minister is saying whether or not there has been any up-grading of salaries, he might also deal with the question of the lighthouse keepers who do not come under the civil service regulations concerning pensions. I refer particularly to the lighthouse keepers in the lower brackets who, after serving for from twenty-five to forty years, are retired without any consideration whatever. On their behalf I make the plea that, instead of these men being retired without any provision for their maintenance, as is the case at present, some method should be devised by means of which they would be given a retiring allowance.

Mr. CHEVRIER: As far as lightkeepers are concerned, I have to tell the hon. gentleman there has been no general reclassification. But there has been an upward revision in the salaries of most classes of lightkeepers.

Mr. ISNOR: Could you give us the salaries?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is a long document to place on Hansard. Class 1 has been increased from a range of $3,000-$3,300 to—

Mr. ISNOR: It is those in the lower brackets I am particularly interested in, the men for whom no provision is made. The $3,000 man is entitled to superannuation.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I thought the hon. gentleman was dealing with two questions, first, in connection with the reclassification or up-grading of lightkeepers under the civil service and, second, as to what provision has been made for superannuation of others not under the civil service.

Mr. ISNOR: Then give us a couple of classes.

Mr. CHEVRIER: In class 1 there has been an upward revision from a range of $3,000-$3,300 to a range of $3,480-$3,780.

Mr. ISNOR: May I ask how many would be in that class?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I can get that information in a moment.

Mr. ISNOR: Not very many, I imagine.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Then let me take class 3, where there has been an upgrading from a range of $2,280-$2,580 to a range of $2,580--$2,880. In class 10 the up-grading is from a range of $900-$1,080 to $1,200-$1,380; class 11, from a range of $540-$600 to $660-$720; class 12, from $480-$540 to $600-$660. As to the other question concerning those not covered by the civil service, I presume they would be part-time lightkeepers, and there is no provision for superannuation.

Mr. ISNOR: Do classes 10, 11 and 12 come under the civil service?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. ISNOR: The $660 man comes under the civil service?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wonder if I might ask the indulgence of the committee to direct a question to the minister in regard to item 468. We were galloping along so quickly just before the dinner recess that I missed it. I wanted to ask the minister to say a word in general as to whether studies are still proceeding in this connection, or just what we are continuing to do here. I take it that these expenses in connection with the St. Lawrence ship canal have to do with the portion west of Montreal.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Last year and again this year an amount has been set aside for the study of the St. Lawrence scheme in general. The explanation I have here is that it is to provide for the continuation of the work now under way in connection with the review of plans and estimates of cost of the various sections of the proposed deep waterway, as well as for the completion of the work now being carried on by the board of engineers for the Lachine section. That is a board which was appointed a short time ago. I thought it was this year, but I am told it was appointed in September of last year. The object in appointing the board was to ascertain whether the scheme of 1926, of the joint board of engineers, is practicable today; to ascertain also whether the scheme could be carried out as a joint navigation and power scheme, and what the cost of a separate navigation scheme would be as compared with a joint power development and navigation scheme; and further to bring the costs up to date and in line with the more recent costs of the international section of the waterway.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Then would the minister answer just one further question. Are the changes which have taken place physical or other changes which might invalidate the previous report?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, Mr. Chairman. The previous report recommended a navigation scheme only in the Lachine section, but not a power development; whereas in the international section it was a joint scheme. Recently in the international section costs were brought up to date by United States and Canadian engineers, and this board sought to ascertain whether it would be more practicable to have a separate navigation scheme and a separate power scheme, or a joint scheme; and they have not yet reported.

Mr. BURTON: This item has to do with breaking ice in Thunder bay, lake Superior "and other points deemed advisable in the interests of navigation," and in view of that rider which has been tacked on, I want to ask the minister a question. What provision has been made for the keeping of records in connection with the possibility of having navigation into Hudson bay during a greater portion of the year? In discussing this question with the captain of the first ship to enter the strait during the past season, a number of us were told that when he entered the strait there was absolutely no sign of ice either to the naked eye or through the use of radar equipment, that everything was in such condition that he was satisfied he could have entered the strait much earlier than he did. We also discussed the matter with some of the residents at Churchill, some of whom had lived there prior to the building of the railway. They told us that the mouth of the river was free of ice for a much longer period than that covered by the navigation season. So, if possible, I should like the minister to give us a little resume of any steps the department may be taking to help lengthen that navigation season, which, in view of my information, would seem warranted.

Mr. CHEVRIER: This item provides for the breaking of ice in Thunder bay and is not an expenditure for the Hudson bay area. If my hon. friend wishes to bring that up when we are dealing with the Hudson bay item, it will be satisfactory.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

480. Life-saving service, including rewards for saving life, $191,285.

Mr. FRASER: Why is there an increase of $124,915?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The reason for the increase is the cost of two new lifeboats and the necessary equipment. One is at Bamfield, British Columbia, and the other at Little Wood island, New Brunswick.

Mr. FRASER: Are these both power boats?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

481. To provide subsidies for wrecking plants —Quebec and British Columbia, $65,000.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Are those subsidies payable to dry docks?

Mr. CHEVRIER: They are contracts entered into by the Department of Transport with the Quebec Salvage Company in respect of wrecks on the St. Lawrence, and the Pacific Salvage Company for wrecks on the Pacific coast.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is that a sort of stand-by fee to have the service available? Is it necessary for the government to subsidize in order to have this service? Cannot the business carry its own load?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is necessary to subsidize to the extent of entering into a contract. It is a form of insurance.

Mr. ISNOR: For many years we had in Nova Scotia a company operating from Halifax, which at one time, if I remember correctly, enjoyed a subsidy of $10,000 and, at another time a subsidy of $20,000, while on the Pacific coast the amount was $25,000, and Quebec had a subsidy of $40,000. Why was it necessary to do away with the subsidy paid to the firm in Nova Scotia.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am afraid I shall have to ask my hon. friend to let me get the information for him. My officers tell me the contract to which he refers is not within their term of office in the department. It must be some years back.

Mr. ISNOR: I do not know how long the officers have been with the department, but certainly, since I have been a member of the house, $10,000 was paid at one time to the Maritime Foundation Company. Because of the need for the service, the amount was raised to $20,000. I am not so much concerned about the amount as I am with the service for the Atlantic coast, particularly that portion north of Cape Breton through to Newfoundland. It is a dangerous section and one which should be serviced as carefully as other places in Canada.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I would ask the hon. member to allow me to get the information for him. If I can get it before my estimates are completed, I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. ISNOR: I shall be happy to allow the minister to look it up, in the hope that he will consider the request I am placing before him.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

484. Steamship inspection and the carrying out of the provisions of the conventions for the safety of life at sea and load lines, $284,400.

Mr. FRASER: Are these inspectors kept in the same districts all the time, or are they moved from place to place?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Steamship inspection officials are maintained at points such as Toronto, Montreal, Kingston, Midland and Collingwood, and, when required, they move from those centres to various other regions where steamship inspection is required.

Mr. FRASER: I remember some few years ago a certain steamship was inspected. Not long after the inspection, I went aboard and I would not have put a dog in one of their lifeboats. They were not safe. The man who did the inspection is dead. I wonder if a proper check is made?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I cannot comment on the particular case to which my hon. friend is referring.

Mr. FRASER: I understand that.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If in the hon. member's estimation there was a breach of regulation I should be glad to look into the matter. I do not know the details. However, the inspection branch of the department have regulations under which they operate, and by which they must abide. They must see that a ship is not given a certificate or allowed to sail unless it has the required equipment and is in seaworthy condition.

Mr. FRASER: Are these inspectors wholly employed by the government?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: They are not allowed to do other work?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No.

Mr. FRASER: Some inspections used to be made by men who were known as inspectors, but who at the same time had other occupations.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Not since I have been in the department.

Mr. FRASER: No; that was some time ago.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Probably so; I am not able to answer the question.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

486. River St. Lawrence ship channel—contract dredging in the St. Lawrence river and Montreal harbour, including cost of administration—capital, $3,492,000.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What is the explanation of the large increase for contract dredging?

Mr. CHEVRIER: This is a contract which provides for the dredging of the St. Lawrence river from Montreal harbour to some forty miles below Quebec. The item appears by virtue of a contract which has been entered into, the provisions of which cover the widening of the channel to a certain width. It varies from 550 feet to, in some places, 1,500 feet, on the curve, and to a depth of thirty-five feet. The contract was entered into, providing for the expenditure of a certain amount of money over the years.

The reason for the increase is that it is expected for this year it will be possible to spend more money than last year, on account of the fact that last year the company was late in getting started. The engineers of the ship channel feel that it would be possible for the company to do this amount of work in the coming season.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): This is a contract which is let out?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): How much of it is administrative, and what is the significance of the expression "including cost of administration", when the contract is let out?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not think any of it is administration.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It says so.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is by contract price.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Perhaps the minister will read it. It states:

River St. Lawrence ship channel; contract dredging in the St. Lawrence river and Montreal harbour, including cost of administration.

Mr. WEBB: Is this all the dredging that is proposed to be done this year on the St. Lawrence?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. I am afraid I shall have to ask my hon. friend to allow his question to stand, and I will get the answer as quickly as possible.

Item stands.

Marine service—

487. River St. Lawrence ship channel—administration, operation and maintenance, $495,278.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The same question of administration arises. I am particularly interested because this is another item covering the river St. Lawrence ship channel, administration, while item 486 also includes the cost of administration. How much of item 486 is administration?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The St. Lawrence ship channel administration has its head office in Montreal. There is an engineer in charge with a staff, and his business is to supervise the dredging in the St. Lawrence. He also has certain other duties, such as looking after the signals service and crews of certain ice-breakers and other vessels required in the maintenance and upkeep of the ship channel. That item includes the cost of administration and the operation of the ship channel fleet.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I want to follow that item of administration for 1947-48.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. CHEVRIER: The amount for administration for 1948-49 is $495,278, made up as follows:

Salaries and wages	$142,096
Overtime	6,100
Allowances board	25,965
Printing and stationery	1,000
Fuel	40,400
Materials and supplies	21,000
Repairs and upkeep of equipment	49,800
Sundries	6,692
Dredge maintenance	200,000

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Might I have the figure for salaries for 1947?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Salaries, $128,235, an increase of $13,861.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It is understood that this question of administration will stand over under item 486?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I understood that dredging came under the Department of Public Works.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is so, but this is a separate job that was delegated to the Department of Transport when dredging in the St. Lawrence was first started. It dates back some years. I do not know just when the first contract was given, but at first the channel was deepened to twenty feet; then it was deepened further until now it is thirty-five feet below the low-water level datum of 1894.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Could we delegate the straightening of the Pugwash channel and its deepening in certain places to the minister's department? He has a large appropriation and, if the minister will assume that responsibility, I should like to assign it to him.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I would have no objection to accepting it, but I am afraid that is a matter still under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Public Works. I gave the reason why this was assigned to the Department of Transport. There was formerly a fleet of dredges under the department. I do not know that it would be proper for this department to take on dredging jobs elsewhere, because we would be interfering with the jurisdiction of another department.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I would not want to interfere with the Department of Public Works. I have had conferences with the minister, and he has assured me he will give this matter sympathetic consideration. I should like him to have the assistance of the Minister of Transport.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): To revert to what the minister said a moment ago, does the Department of Public Works disinterest itself entirely as far as St. Lawrence dredging is concerned? In other words, is this administered entirely by the Department of Transport, or is there dual control?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Perhaps I might explain that. The St. Lawrence ship channel was never under public works. It was under the old Department of Marine, which had a fleet of dredges with which they carried on the dredging themselves. Some years ago those dredges were sold and the work was carried on under contract. The contract is renewed every three or four years in order to keep the ship channel dredged to a depth of thirty-five feet.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It is entirely a matter for the Department of Transport?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Absolutely.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There are one or two things I should like to speak about.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I was just giving a word of explanation.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There is a river in British Columbia badly in need of dredging.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): That could be dealt with when my estimates come up.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: This item concerns the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. SINCLAIR: With all due deference, Mr. Chairman, the St. Lawrence river has been dredged to a tremendous extent, and I do not think it is unreasonable that the great rivers in the west should also be dredged.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. member can bring that up when we get to the item dealing with the west. This is not that item, and I think hon. members should confine their remarks to the item before the committee.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There is no item dealing with dredging in the west, and that is the reason why we are having floods today. Since the Minister of Public Works was giving an explanation, I think I should state that the people of Vancouver are wondering when the half million dollars which was voted two years ago to clear Vancouver harbour will be spent, either for contract or government dredging. Would the minister answer that?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I wonder if we could allow the Vancouver item to stand until we reach the national harbours board item?

May I answer the hon. member's question about the cost of administration in item 486? If he will turn to page 276 of the estimates he will find that the total vote is $3,987,278, from which has been deducted an amount chargeable to administration and operation, $495,278, which is the amount to be voted under item 487.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I cannot follow that. First of all, the minister said this item of $3,492,000 included the cost of administration, and the minister explained that the cost of administration is $495,278, which is item 487.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, and I added that if you look at page 276 of the details you will find there $3,987,278, from which has been deducted $495,278, which is item 487, administration proper. That is the explanation my officials give me now.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): According to the information the minister has just given me, the $3,492,000 has no administration in it?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right; only capital.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): But the words "including cost of administration" appear in item 486.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, but I am informed they should not be there.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): One other question. What is the full amount of this contract? If I understand correctly, there is an over-riding contract, of which $3,492,000 is being worked out this year. What is the extent in time of the contract?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The amount of the contract is $14,697,764, and the work is to be completed in a period of five years.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Who is the contractor?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Marine Industries Limited.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

488. To provide towards the construction of a service vessel for the eastern arctic patrol—capital, $1,100,000.

Mr. SKEY: Would the minister explain this item and say whether this is a new vessel the department is building?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is a new vessel that is being constructed for the eastern arctic patrol. Previously much of the work of the Department of Transport, Mines and Resources, and other departments was done by the Nascopie, which, as the hon. member knows, foundered off Baffin island. The Department of Transport came to the conclusion that it would be in the interests of our service to have an arctic patrol vessel on the east coast, which would break ice when required and do patrol work along the east coast, and at certain seasons of the year proceed to the east half of the arctic circle and there service weather stations and various other depots of the Departments of Transport and Mines and Resources.

Mr. SKEY: It seems to me that this is one very useful national service which could be well given over to the naval branch of the defence department. Surely, following the last war, it must have surplus ships which could perform this service, and the experience of servicing the eastern arctic and Hudson bay would be useful in giving the Navy further experience in seamanship. Has that been considered by the minister and his colleagues instead of the Department of Transport building a new vessel at a cost of over $1,000,000 to perform this service?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, it was given consideration by the government, but if the navy were to take it over it would not serve the purposes that are required of this ship. The navy have no ships for icebreaking, and this is an icebreaking vessel. While I am not free to speak for my colleague the Minister of National Defence, I think if he were here he would give his view that he is strongly in favour of the service being performed in this way; in fact, my recollection is that the representations came not only from Mines and Resources but also in part from National Defence. This was some time ago and I should not like to be held too strictly to it, but that is my recollection.

Mr. SKEY: That is just the point. We are spending in Canada about one quarter of a billion a year on national defence. We all know it is a protective expenditure, but there is no reason why our defence forces, in all three branches of the service, should not perform nationally useful functions such as this and such as the great job they are now doing on the Fraser river in British Columbia. I think it is entirely wrong for the government to consider the navy as a body entirely separate from the rest of the government service. It should be integrated into our national life in ways such as we have here, where it could perform a useful function and at the same time give additional experience in seamanship to the navy personnel. I would strongly recommend that the minister, if he sees any merit at all in my suggestion, ask his colleagues to reconsider the building of a new vessel and placing this service under the defence department.

Mr. FRASER: How much will the ship cost?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The cost is $2,273,000.

Mr. FRASER: To complete?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: This is the second Canadian government ship that has been destroyed in the last few years. The first one was the Charlottetown, which turned out to have been destroyed as a result of great negligence. I never heard what punishment was meted out to those responsible for its destruction, except that I believe they were relieved of their command, but that is not sufficient punishment. The minister said the Nascopie foundered. The Nascopie was destroyed through being run on the rocks. Surely somebody was responsible for that.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The ship was not the property of the department, but was owned by the Hudson's Bay Company.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is the Nascopie?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then I shall not pursue what I was going to say.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

489. To provide towards the construction of a lighthouse supply and buoy vessel for the east coast (estimated cost $1,800,000)—capital, $300,000.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I see that the lighthouse supply and buoy vessel for the east coast is to cost $1,800,000, and the vessel for the west coast, provided for in item 492, is to cost only $700,000. I certainly know that the supply vessels on the west coast are none too good, and whenever we approach the department for some additional aids to navigation they tell us that they cannot service any more lights. I am curious to know what different types of vessel are being provided for the west and east coasts.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The vessel for the east coast, that is the lighthouse supply and buoy vessel, is a 250-foot vessel; whereas the one on the west coast is a secondary ship, 140 feet by 28 feet.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): What boat is it replacing?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is replacing the Birnie, which is a secondary ship, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Where have these contracts been let? Have they been let to the shipyards in Nova Scotia, or to what particular shipyards?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The contract for the item we are on now has not been let, neither has the one for the lightship at Saint John. They have been advertised, but the bids are not yet in.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The minister said that the ship for the eastern arctic patrol would cost $2,273,000. Where was that contract let?

Mr. CHEVRIER: At the Davie shipbuilding.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Where was that?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Lauzon.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

490. To provide towards the construction of a lightship for the port of Saint John, N.B. (estimated cost $850,000)—capital, $100,000.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): This item really fascinates me. The proposed cost is $850,000 for a lightship for Saint John harbour. I certainly hope that is for the open sea outside Saint John harbour. All a lightship is, is a hull on which a light is put. It has to be seaworthy and not too large. It has to have good anchors and good anchor chains. Why in the name of heaven we have to build a new ship to pack a light on at a cost of $850,000 to this country when we have been giving corvettes away, supplying them at the cost of scrap, is something that I do not understand.

An hon. MEMBER: What have we received for them?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Not very much, I gather.

Mr. SINCLAIR: About $25,000.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I do not think we have received that much for them. Was consideration given by the department officials to the possibility of using one of these vessels?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Corvettes would not do for this sort of work. This vessel is for the Lurcher station, and it operates at the entrance to the bay of Fundy. The present position is that the lightship in the Saint John area is over thirty years old. There are no spare lightships in Quebec or Saint John, and the spare lightship available in Halifax at the present time is so old that it could not be used for this purpose. I am informed that a corvette could not do this particular type of work.

Mr. FRASER: What about some of these Park ships that were sold by war assets?

Mr. CHEVRIER: These are 10,000-ton cargo vessels. I am sure they would not be suitable as a lightship.

Mr. FRASER: They certainly would be suitable.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am not a deep-sea man like the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, but with his encouragement I am certainly anxious to know a little more about this investment, because it does seem to me—I am not posing as an expert—that that amount of money is somewhat fantastic. I should like a short description of this vessel. I should like to have an idea of this vessel and to know a little about this investment, because I think the suggestions of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni are sensible.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The approximate dimension of this vessel is 128 by 30 by 21. The estimated cost of construction is $850,000, and the time to build it, provided that the materials are available, as expected, will be a little over a year. No plans have been made covering the construction. The new lightships which have recently been placed on the Atlantic coast by the United States coast guard, with minor modifications, suit the requirements at Saint John. The general arrangements, plans and specifications have been obtained from that service, and the lightship will be built somewhat along the lines of those to which I have referred. The plans and specifications have been sent out to various contractors. Bids have been asked for, but the tenders are not yet in.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): It does seem to me strange, as it does to everybody, that the government can build ships in wartime; then private business comes along, obtains the ships and is quite able to convert them to commercial needs. It would seem to me that a lightship has to be seaworthy. It has to have a light on it and some auxiliary engines.

Mr. MacNICOL: Always built in the centre of the ship.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I realize that the minister cannot look after everything. I wonder whether he has discussed the matter with his officials. I am sure he is just as anxious to save three-quarters of a million dollars to the country as is any other hon. member.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I can tell my hon. friend that I have gone over this matter very carefully with my officials. I discussed the whole building program of the Department of Transport at the beginning of the year. At that time a program of ship construction was mapped out for the department. In the Department of Transport there are some over-age ships, and the time has come when these vessels should be replaced and new ones built. There is a continual complaint in this house about the manner in which some of these ships are operating, their obsolescence, and the like. When one comes along with a progressive program, suddenly there is a desire on the part of certain hon. members that this program be not brought forward.

Mr. JACKMAN: Explain.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If there is to be an up-to-date program of new ships to meet the conditions as we find them I believe the time has come to do it now. There is a program here for several million dollars. Instead of complaints and criticism, there should be commendation.

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Chairman, we do not have to sit here and take any lectures.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister has not yet answered why these corvettes, which are only four or five years old, and which were built for real deep-sea work and are quite seaworthy, are not being used. We agree that these old ships should be replaced, but they certainly should be replaced by corvettes, which have been sold for from $10,000 to $25,000. These ships were built to operate in the very areas the minister has mentioned.

As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has pointed out, a lightship should be seaworthy and have sufficient auxiliary power to keep a revolving light in action. The minister has not yet told the committee why these corvettes, which were good enough to spend weeks on end out in the middle of the Atlantic, are not seaworthy enough and not good enough and have not enough power to keep a light flashing in Saint John harbour and the like.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Does the item carry?

Mr. FRASER: Only under protest.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): In spite of the minister's rebuke, I am going to carry on, because I agree entirely with the hon. member for Vancouver North. The points raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni have not been answered. I should like to know whether vessels such as corvettes, Fairmiles and frigates still remain unsold and in the hands of War Assets Corporation.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am afraid I cannot answer that question. If some of them have been declared surplus I suppose the minister responsible for that branch can tell the hon. member. Unfortunately, I cannot; but even if they were available the statement which I made a moment ago, and which I repeat now, still holds good. The information I have is that a corvette would not be suitable for this type of work.

Mr. JACKMAN: Why, because it floats?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I confess I still find the statement of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni infinitely more convincing than that of the minister. I think we are entitled to more information. It seems to me that we have had no explanation at all. The minister speaks about having a program of building ships and that we must be up to date and so on. Of course that is true with regard to ships which are going to ply the ocean. What the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the hon. member for Vancouver North said about these ships is surely true. Anyone can see that all this ship needs to be is seaworthy enough to be able to anchor at sea and powerful enough to manipulate a light.

Mr. SKEY: Let me bring this matter to a head if I can and ask the minister directly if either he or his officers have consulted with the Royal Canadian Navy and War Assets Corporation to find out if there are suitable vessels available which could be converted to this use at a much smaller cost than the $850,000 now asked for. Will the minister answer that question?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am unable to answer that question. I have sent for one of the officers who, I presume, will be here in a moment.

Mr. HERRIDGE: During the war we were able to build a 10,000-ton ship for one million dollars. It now costs $850,000 to build a ship of the size described by the minister. Why is that so? I think the cost is terrific.

Mr. FRASER: The minister has not given us the tonnage of this ship. What was it?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is a lightship. It is not a cargo vessel. The size of it is 128 by 30 by 21 feet.

Mr. FRASER: The minister does not know the tonnage?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Perhaps we might allow this item to stand.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. The hon. member has asked for some information which I have not available at the moment.

Item stands.

Marine service—

492. To provide towards the construction of a lighthouse supply and buoy vessel for the west coast (estimated cost $700,000)—capital, $100,000.

Mr. PEARKES: I wish to ask for some information regarding this vessel, because I wonder whether it is good enough for the job it has to do. I believe we have only two vessels on the Pacific coast which are carrying out the duties of servicing the lighthouses and the lightships and also are looking after the life-saving duties on that coast. Has this vessel any life-saving duties to perform?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, it has not.

Mr. PEARKES: Not very long ago I remember questions were asked about the possibility of establishing a life-saving service on the Pacific coast. At that time in a previous debate it was pointed out that we had a number of serious ship wrecks on the coast of British Columbia during the last year. I was under the impression then that vessels of the Department of Transport were available for rescue work. Are there other vessels besides those available for that work?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The statement I made at the time covered certain of the vessels of the Department of Transport that were available, as well as aircraft and other services on the Pacific coast. But there is no life-guard service as such.

Mr. PEARKES: I realize that. Am I correct in saying that there are only two vessels of the Department of Transport employed in servicing lighthouses and life-saving duties on that coast?

Mr. CHEVRIER: There are four vessels of the department on the west coast. Two are larger vessels and two of them are secondary vessels. This amount is a portion of the vote covering the cost of replacement of one of the secondary vessels.

Mr. PEARKES: Where will the vessel be stationed?

Mr. CHEVRIER: At Victoria.

Mr. PEARKES: Only yesterday we heard that another service, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police which had boats which were also included in this life-saving service, had only two small boats which could not put to sea in heavy weather, but could only be employed in the calm waters between Vancouver island and the mainland. Will this vessel be able to go around the west coast of Vancouver island?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It will be able to go the same range and distance on the coast as the Birnie which it is replacing. I understand that the Birnie—

Mr. PEARKES: I know the ship.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It will be on the same run as the other ship.

Mr. PEARKES: I feel that it is totally inadequate for the services which are required. We should have a much better vessel than one just to go around and recharge a certain number of batteries and supply services to a few lighthouses. What we require is a vessel which can combine those duties with life-saving duties when there is an emergency on the Pacific coast. I cannot help thinking that a vessel such as the one the minister describes is totally inadequate for the work which so urgently needs to be done. Can the minister give us some hope that another vessel will be provided to carry out more important duties than are to be performed by this vessel which is to replace a small ship which goes around and just leaves supplies at a few lighthouses? I feel that this is a big question. I consider that we are overlooking the necessity of providing a life-saving service. We are like an ostrich; we are putting our heads in the sand and saying that we are having a vessel which will service lighthouses and will be available for relief in case of shipwrecks when we know full well that this vessel cannot carry out those duties at all.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Of course the point that my hon. friend raised is one which, while it is connected with this item, is a separate one, namely, whether or not the department should set up coast-guard services or life-saving services on the various coasts of Canada. This vote provides for the construction of a lighthouse supply and buoy vessel for the west coast. Its main duties are not coast-guarding or life-saving, although incidentally they can be. There is provision in the estimates—and we dealt with it this afternoon—for a lifeboat on the west coast at Bamfield at a cost of $65,000 or $70,000. That was mentioned in the course of the afternoon.

Mr. CHURCH: I am glad to see the minister doing something for the east and west coasts in regard to these marine services which have been somewhat starved because of war and other conditions. I want to call his attention to one point. I believe the time has come now when these services should be extended, when we have this vast transportation system for advancing the grain to the seaboard from the upper lakes. I am glad to see the east and west coasts get these services; but I believe the time has come now, after a great war like the one through which we have just come, when these services should be extended.

I call the minister's attention to the need of further marine services of the same type on the upper lakes where these storms occur in October, November and December, when the ships are taking the grain crop to the seaboard. At the present time I am glad to see something done for Parry Sound in connection with the boats there; it is badly needed in Georgian bay. But in lake Huron, Georgian bay, lake Erie, parts of lake Ontario, and lake Superior, there are practically no modern aids to navigation in the way of marine services. So much is that the case that if an accident happens to one of these Canadian vessels of transport, as a result of having no proper aids to navigation on the upper lakes, the vessel must sound its siren until some kind of United States aid to navigation in the form of marine service comes to its aid. That should not be the case.

I am in favour of the principle of confederation for all the provinces and not just for some. I believe there should be equality of treatment from the gulf of St. Lawrence up through this great chain of lakes to the upper lakes. They have been overlooked in the years gone by. I hope that between this session of parliament and the next, the minister will look into the situation in the upper lakes. Many men have been lost there. It is a wonder to me why some of the members from Ontario representing the constituencies in which lie Owen Sound, Collingwood and other places on the shores of lake Huron and lake Superior, where there have been several disasters, do not ask for the same marine services as are given in other sections of the country, and in time a great lakes marine commission to develop water-borne traffic.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. CASE: I should like to make an observation here; and I am very glad the hon. member for Broadview has referred to the upper lakes.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. This item is to provide for the construction of a lighthouse supply and buoy vessel for the west coast.

Item agreed to.

Canadian maritime commission—

493. Administration, $134,300.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the minister tell us briefly the functions of the Canadian maritime commission and how long it has been in existence?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The maritime commission was set up only recently, in November or December of 1947. Since its establishment, the commission has had many duties to perform. It has made recommendations to the government on many problems faced by Canadian shipping and shipbuilding industries. Its main problem has been that of modernizing the Canadian fleet to enable Canadian ship owners to meet foreign competition more effectively.

The Canadian fleet now consists of the war-built ex-Park ships, sold by the government to private Canadian shipping companies on liberal terms, with a restrictive flag transfer clause prohibiting their being resold with transfer of registry. Many ship owners now require faster, newer and more specialized ships for their services, and the commission is carrying out a tonnage replacement plan which makes it possible for Canadian ship owners who need new tonnage to sell their ex-Park ships to foreign purchasers, on condition that the Canadian owners discharge their mortgages before sale and deposit the sale proceeds in escrow for the building of new ships in Canada. Up to the present time, eight ships have been sold under this plan.

Another duty of the commission is to inquire into and report upon practical problems affecting Canadian shipping which may be referred to it from time to time by the government.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): For example?

Mr. CHEVRIER: For example, it has investigated and made recommendations upon the carrying of cargoes under ERP in Canadian bottoms. Another of its duties and responsibilities was to review the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act.

In carrying out its work the commission has had to confer with other departments from time to time. There is what is known as the knock-for-knock agreement between Canada and the United States, which during the war years was administered by and under the jurisdiction of the Department of Munitions and Supply. Those duties are now transferred to the maritime commission. It has further undertaken the control and direction of two government agencies dealing with shipping matters; that is, the steamship subsidies branch, which is more particularly dealt with in the estimates and which was formerly a part of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and Park Steamships.

Mr. ISNOR: We on the extreme east coast were very much interested in the creation of this maritime commission, and I think that applies equally to those on the west coast. We were hopeful that a long-range program would be drawn up and made public with respect to the duties of this commission.

The explanation given by the minister with respect to the disposition of the present fleet, with the object of purchasing new ships, does not entirely satisfy us as far as the duties and objects of this commission are concerned. I believe the minister should make a further statement as to the long-range policy or plan of the government in reference to the carrying of cargoes in our own Canadian bottoms to all parts of the world. To set up such a system, I believe it is necessary to have, not men who come from one particular section of Canada but men who will represent the whole of this country, men who are familiar with both east and west coasts as well as the ports of Montreal and Quebec. I have nothing to say against Quebec or Montreal in regard to their shipping facilities; but, speaking more particularly for the east coast at the moment, I say we are aiming for greater export trade and greater shipping activity.

To repeat what I have frequently said on the floor of this house, during the war period Canada made great use of the eastern ports. They were busy spots, with ships going in and out. We had ships sailing every four minutes to make up convoys totalling from sixty to one hundred vessels. So it was very busy at Halifax, Saint John and the other ports. Today there is not the same activity. When the maritime commission was set up we hoped it would inaugurate some program which would bring back those prosperous times as far as our ports were concerned.

For a moment I want to deal with the personnel of the commission. I do not know the gentlemen who compose it, but I am advised that the chairman is a lawyer, no doubt a man of ability and outstanding in his own profession but with no practical experience as far as shipping is concerned on either coast. I may be wrong in that statement, and if so, the minister will correct me. I am told that the other member of the commission comes from central Canada. We on the east coast are asking that you select a man from the maritimes, who will be familiar with shipping matters on the Atlantic.

The minister did not enlarge upon the matter of steamship subsidies or upon the question of coastal trade, which is an important question in the three maritime provinces and an important question in the duties of the maritime commission. I repeat, we feel we should have on the commission a man from the maritimes who is familiar with that subject. The officials of the minister may be efficient men with a certain amount of training and experience in connection with subsidies, but with all respect to the gentlemen sitting in front of the minister, I say their experience is limited. We have men down east who have grown up in the steamship business and in coastal trade, and who have all the qualifications necessary to make a real contribution to this particular work. We are asking that the minister give favourable consideration to naming as a member of that commission a man from the maritimes. We strongly urge this upon the government. If the minister thinks it over, the name of this commission itself indicates that its duties relate to a great extent to the east and west coasts, and for that reason I ask him to give this suggestion his very serious consideration.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Perhaps I should follow my hon. friend's suggestion and enlarge somewhat upon the statement I made a moment ago concerning the maritime commission. Canada's wartime shipbuilding program produced 441 cargo ships totalling approximately 3,810,000 deadweight tons. These vessels were all built in Canadian yards by Canadian labour. I need not dilate upon the value of the service which these vessels rendered during the strenuous war years, because my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce has already dealt with that at some length in a statement he made in the house on June 16, 1947, which can be found at page 4195 of Hansard.

I might remind the committee, however, that the Park fleet, which was composed of 176 vessels, cost the government the sum of approximately $277,500,000; and in spite of the fact that they were regarded in the same light as munitions of war, nevertheless the government succeeded in recovering the sum of approximately $199,500,000, being seventy-two per cent of their original cost, through the operation of these ships and their sale to private operators after the end of the war.

In order to maintain a Canadian flag fleet, the government has sold practically the entire fleet to Canadian operators, including seventy-eight vessels still on charter to the British ministry of transport, which vessels are now in process of being returned to Canada. One of the conditions of sale was that no owner is permitted to apply for transfer out of Canadian registry without permission of the Canadian government.

After making preliminary studies, the Canadian maritime commission has advised me that the restriction against transfer of flag is leaving the Canadian fleet in a static condition. While the vessels built for war purposes are suitable in some trade as bulk carriers, they are not competitive with new tonnage which has been and is being built in other countries. If the Canadian flag is to continue on the high seas, it must be maintained by a well-balanced fleet consisting not only of bulk carriers but of faster and more modern units with refrigerator capacity able to compete with vessels of other flags on scheduled services.

The Canadian shipping industry is in its infancy. Prior to the war, Canada did not have a fleet of ocean-going dry cargo vessels. While there is no doubt that government policy has stimulated the shipping and shipbuilding industry, there is no doubt that the Canadian shipowners must be afforded at least an opportunity of selling vessels which are becoming obsolescent, in order to acquire efficient units.

To enable Canadian owners to acquire such vessels to modernize their fleets, the government, on the recommendation of the Canadian maritime commission, has now adopted a policy of permitting sales of ex-Park vessels for transfer to foreign registry. Any owner desiring to sell must apply to the maritime commission for permission to do so. The commission investigates the circumstances fully and determines whether or not the sale of an ex-Park vessel and replacement by modern tonnage will be to the advantage of Canadian trade.

In so doing, it takes into consideration in particular the competition with which the vessel is faced in the specific trade in which it is engaged. If the commission decides that it is advantageous to secure replacement, the owner is given permission to sell to any purchaser approved by the commission, subject also to the approval of the commission as to price and terms of sale.

The owner is required to discharge fully any indebtedness due to the government in respect of the purchase of the vessel from the government, and then must deposit the proceeds of sale in escrow with the commission to secure replacement by modern tonnage. The commission reserves the right to approve the plans of the new ship and the terms and conditions for her construction, and the new ship must be maintained under Canadian registry.

It is anticipated that ships built under this scheme will be constructed in Canadian yards, provided that costs of Canadian shipbuilders are kept within reason, and if not, the commission may, under special circumstances, allow owners to acquire tonnage abroad. It is not expected, however, that this will be the case, and it is hoped that the escrow fund will provide a backlog for shipbuilding in Canada for some years to come.

A number of rumours have recently been circulated to the effect that Canada's fleet is being put on the auction block or that transfers are being permitted to enable Canadian owners to take advantage of low-cost labour in foreign countries. This is definitely not the case.

There will be no great volume of sale in the near future, and modernization of the Canadian fleet will be a matter of gradual development. The original Park fleet being built for war purposes, the accommodation for seamen in some cases leaves much to be desired, and there is no question that the building of modern tonnage will improve the living conditions for all seamen. The replacement policy will afford employment for Canadian shipyard labour, and the new vessels to be constructed will not only further Canada's overseas trade but be a credit to the Canadian flag.

The senior hon. member for Halifax referred to subventions being administered by the department. I have a lengthy statement on not only that, but other activities of the commission. I gave my statement briefly in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, when he referred to the personnel of the commission.

Of course, when one is setting up a new body such as this it is almost impossible to have on it representatives of all interested groups in the country, those interested in shipbuilding, seamen, operators, exporters, and importers on the great lakes, and the like.

In order to do that we would have to have a body of perhaps seven or eight. The government came to the conclusion, however, that a commission composed of three members would answer the purpose.

The chairman of that commission, Mr. Clyne, is a man of wide experience, experience which he has obtained on the west coast. He has been handling maritime matters, legally and otherwise, for the greater part of his adult life, and he is well equipped to fulfil all these duties.

Mr. ISNOR: What is his profession?

Mr. CHEVRIER: He is a lawyer.

Mr. ISNOR: A lawyer?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. The other member of the commission was in the Department of of External Affairs for some years. He was an officer in the navy during the war, with a distinguished career.

Mr. FRASER: Who is the third one? There are three members?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: The chairman and two commissioners?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: Who is the third one?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The third one is Mr. Rahlves, who was president and manager of—

Mr. ISNOR: "Is" or "was"?

Mr. CHEVRIER: "Was." I was going to say in a minute that he had resigned. He was general manager of Park Steamships during the war and had a wide experience in the operation of ships.

Mr. ISNOR: The minister did not tell us where the second member resided or lived.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The second member lives in Ottawa.

Mr. ISNOR: Ottawa?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. ISNOR: One from the west coast and one from Ottawa; is that right?

Mr. CHEVRIER: One from the west coast and one from the central part of Canada.

Mr. ISNOR: Now hon. members will appreciate the point I am trying to get at, that we should have one from the eastern maritime provinces, as a third member.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I wish to support the senior member for Halifax. I thought, when this commission was first set up, it would operate in place of what was known as the maritime rights commission for the benefit of the maritimes. There is no part of Canada more interested in maritime matters to which this commission would give attention than are the maritime provinces. I agree wholeheartedly with the senior member for Halifax when he says that one of the members of the commission should come from the maritime provinces.

While I do not want to be too definite about it, I still have doubts about the necessity for this commission. The Department of Transport is well officered. I think it should be able to administer the duties placed in the hands of this commission to at least as good satisfaction as would the commission, at great saving in costs. I have great respect for the officials in the minister's department, and most of the higher officers in the civil service. I am under the impression that they could carry on the duties assigned to this commission at a great saving to the taxpayers and with at least as great, if not greater, efficiency.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What was the exact reason for setting up this commission in 1947? Had some other organization disappeared and was there a gap that had to be filled?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It did not replace any other organization; it was a new body that had been requested during the war years by various groups in Canada. When the matter was debated in the house there were many strong supporters on my hon. friend's side, particularly the hon. member for Vancouver South.

Mr. ISNOR: All parts of the house.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That is as it may be, but I do not remember. The minister says this did not take the place of any body that had existed before. As far as I could make out from what he said, there was no new work that they had to take up. As far as I could follow what he said, it would seem to me that the work must have greatly decreased since the war years and the immediately subsequent time.

However that may be, I want to associate myself with what has been said by the hon. member for Cumberland. After listening to what the minister has said as to the duties, I cannot for the life of me understand why the people in his department could not carry them out. It seems to me that this is just another of these commissions set up for the purpose of spoon-feeding people and holding the hands of people whose hands do not need to be held. I notice that they have to approve contracts, investigate this and give judgment on that. I do not know whether they are competent to do so, because I do not know the gentlemen; I am not offering any opinion on that, but when I look at this item of $134,000 I wonder whether it is going to make a single extra dollar for the people of Canada. I would gravely doubt it.

When I look on this building of commission on commission it seems to me that we have a mania for this kind of thing. I was astounded at a figure given the other day, I believe by the Winnipeg Free Press. However, upon reflection I am afraid that it must be true. They stated that the various taxing bodies in this country are taking something like one-third of our national income. They went on to state, and I think it was fairly stated, that that is higher than in any other country in the world. I am quoting those figures subject to correction, but I believe they were put forward by competent people and are absolutely true. Again may I say that I doubt very much if in his heart the minister will disagree with the statement that the $134,400—

Mr. CHEVRIER: I disagree most heartily.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister can speak for himself. Nothing that the minister has said tonight makes me feel that this $134,000 will add a single dollar to the wealth of this country or that the services which are being performed can not be performed by the perfectly competent people in his department. We have a list here, as long as your arm, of engineers and competent people of various kinds. I see the Minister of Trade and Commerce wishes to speak.

Mr. HOWE: In addition to carrying out duties that were not performed before, this commission is taking over the duties of the Park Steamship Company, which at the height of its career operated some 200 ships for the government. The commission is carrying on functions which were held over from the Park Steamship Company. It is operating boats that are only partly paid for, and it is discharging functions that were formerly carried on by the Department of Trade and Commerce, namely, those having to do with steamship subsidies.

It seems to me that this commission has onerous and continuous duties. I suggest that, if anything, it is under-staffed rather than over-staffed.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I understand that Park Steamship Company is now being operated by private interests.

Mr. HOWE: No.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario).]

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Whom is it being operated by?

Mr. HOWE: By the maritime commission. The Park Steamship Company is a crown company. Some of the ships which were formerly operated privately through the Park Steamship Company have been sold, but there are continuing functions of the Park Steamship Company still being carried on.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Did it not have an adequate staff to run its affairs? Was it not carrying on before 1937?

Mr. HOWE: There is no Park Steamship Company today, but the duties are being carried on by the commission.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I do not understand the minister. He says in one breath that the duties are being carried on by the commission, and in the next breath he says the ships are being operated by a crown company.

Mr. HOWE: The crown company has been disbanded.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I add just a word? The hon. member for Cumberland has suggested that there is no function for this organization. There is a similar organization in the United Kingdom and in the United States. The object of the commission is to protect shipping for the country. If we were to follow the same steps we followed during the last war we would lose all our ships. The commission is to interest itself in a shipping program for Canada. By the amalgamation of the operations of the Park Steamship Company with those of the maritime commission, there has been a saving of $80,000 a year.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I want to commend the minister most highly for his endeavours to build up a shipping fleet in this country and to maintain it at something like efficiency.

Mr. WINTERS: Could the minister provide a little information on some of the aspects of the operations of this commission? I understood from what has been said tonight that it is largely concerned with ocean-going steamers of 10,000 tons or thereabouts, but recently it has embraced in its scope fishing boats and fishing schooners. An advisory committee has been set up to advise on small boats and sailing vessels.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Another commission.

Mr. WINTERS: So far as I know, there is nobody with any practical experience or knowledge of fishing boats on this commission.

My attention was directed to that point by the remarks of the senior member for Halifax who asked that someone with practical experience in maritime matters generally be placed on the commission. I receive letters almost daily from people in the fishing industry who ask what the Canadian maritime commission intends to do about the fishing industry and in what respect their boats come under the commission. I have also had letters asking me to indicate who with any knowledge of fishing boats will be on the commission. To date I have not been able to find out very much about this, and I should like the minister to make a statement.

There is another uncertainty creeping into this picture. In the Halifax press and, I presume, in the press across the country, there was a story that three ocean-going transports were being tied up at Halifax because they could not compete with ships of other nations. Then, on the strength of the announcement made by the minister that our merchant ships are being sold, the presumption grows that they will be sold to competing nations who can operate them with mariners at lower rates of pay, and thus put us in an unfavourable position. The sale of our ships is likely to aggravate the situation and also the status of fishing boats. in the harbour at Halifax. I wish the minister would take a minute or two to clarify that situation and also the status of fishing boats.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There are several matters which the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg has brought up. First, he asked whether the operations of the maritime commission cover only foreign-going vessels. The answer is generally yes; but it also has to do with other duties such as I outlined in the statement I made when we took up this item, such as subsidies for coastal vessels, the administration of steamship subventions, and generally advising the government on policy.

The hon. gentleman asks if there is anyone with experience or knowledge of the fishing boat industry. The answer is no, there is not, because that is not directly a responsibility of the commission. However, under the Maritime Commission Act provision is made to set up advisory committees, and one of the advisory committees that has been set up in case it may be necessary for the government to seek advice is represented by the fisheries council.

My hon. friend feared that these vessels which were sold might compete with our own vessels. That is what we are trying to avoid by setting up the policy of the transfer of flag in certain cases. It is to bring our ships up to the highest possible standard, to streamline and modernize our fleet, so that competition will not overtake us. We are beginning to notice that other countries are building bigger, faster and more modern ships than our Park vessels. In order to compete we have to do likewise, and we have accordingly adopted the policy set out in the memorandum I read a moment ago. The policy was adopted just to obviate and counteract the situation to which my hon. friend referred.

Mr. ISNOR: Would the minister be good enough to answer these questions? How many ships were operated by the Park Steamship Company during the war; how many ships were sold, and how many are being operated at the present time?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The following ships were sold to Canadian companies for operation under the Canadian flag: one hundred and fifteen 10,000-ton ships; twenty-two 4,700-ton ships, or a total of 137.

The following Canadian-owned ships are still on charter to the United Kingdom ministry of transport: twenty 10,000-ton ships. They are being returned from the United Kingdom to Canada in 1948 for delivery to Canadian purchasers; also, fifty-eight 10,000-ton ships, which will remain on charter to the United Kingdom ministry until 1950, when they also will be returned for delivery to Canadian purchasers.

The United Kingdom ministry will retain for an indefinite period seven 10,000-ton "stores issuing" ships and eight 10,000-ton "maintenance" ships.

Canada's fleet of ocean-going ships of over 500 gross tons therefore consists of 229 dry cargo ships, with a total deadweight capacity of approximately 2,100,000 tons.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Who operates those?

Mr. CHEVRIER: These are ex-Park vessels which have been sold to private operators. Some of them have been sold on terms and have been chartered. Those that have been chartered are still being administered by the maritime commission in its capacity of successor to Park Steamships.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What does the minister mean by administered? Operated?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No. Park Steamships is out of operation altogether. I mean collecting charter hire.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Do you need a commission costing $134,000 to collect charter hire?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, my hon. friend did not understand me, or perhaps I did not make myself clear. I do not want to be offensive at all.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I think we shall get on better now that your colleague is away.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The duties of the maritime commission with reference to Park Steamships are only a very small portion of its functions because Park Steamships is being gradually, if not entirely, wound up. It did operate these ships during wartime and they are gradually being sold. The commission has taken over those that remain and will soon wind up the operations of Park Steamships.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That is grand. You have torpedoed what your colleague said and now we are getting the facts.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have tried not to be offensive, but if my hon. friend wants to take my colleague to task in that manner I am afraid he and I will not get along. I do not think it is fair for my hon. friend to say that I have torpedoed what my colleague said or that he has torpedoed what I said. I am trying to be helpful.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I think you are.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am doing the best I can, but if my hon. friend wants to be critical—

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am not being critical of you.

Mr. CHEVRIER: —I am quite prepared to put up with it. If my hon. friend wants to know what the duties of the commission are I have already put them on the record once and have explained them twice. The duties of the commission are of an advisory nature. I am positive that the commission is doing a very fine job. The House of Commons approved the work of the commission when it passed the bill last year. The bill was debated at great length, and was supported, if my recollection serves me aright, by all parts of the house and by many hon. members from that side of the house. It was then conceded that it was necessary, in fact urgent, to have the maritime commission established. Many members from my hon. friend's side of the house had been continually advocating the formation of the commission long before action was taken and, indeed, took my colleague the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to task for not having moved earlier. So I do not think it is a nullity in the department. I think the commission is very necessary and is performing a good service, without which we could not have a shipping industry to compete with those of other countries.

Mr. ISNOR: I started this question. It was a fairly simple question, and I think the minister can answer it one, two, three. How many ships were operated—I am not talking about their size or anything else—during the war by the Park Steamship Company? How many ships have since been sold; how many are at present being operated and come under the direct control of the maritime commission? These are three simple questions.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The answer to the first question, how many ships were operated by Park, is 238 approximately. The answer to the second question, how many were sold, the same number. The answer to the third question, how many operated under the commission, none, except for the purpose of completing the charter hire and collecting the money under the charter hire.

Mr. ISNOR: Now we have the answer. No ships are being operated by the maritime commission. What are their duties?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I want to thank the minister for getting us part of the way on. We have now got rid of the idea of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that this is an operating unit. The minister has made it clear that, so far as operating Park Steamships is concerned, what it does is receive payments. It does not need a $134,000 commission to do that.

The minister has said, and on this I should like further information, that the commission advises and is apparently to keep up the level of our shipping, is to consider our foreign trade and the kind of ships we should have. It seems to me that on that we are entitled to a little further information. I am still skeptical. I still do not see why it is that when you establish a business someone should come along and tell you what to do. I am glad to see that the senior hon. member for Halifax is with me. I would like to know if the minister can go a little more fully into what the functions of these gentlemen are. So far as I am concerned, I am completely in the dark. If I may add something, I am carrying it in my mind that the minister has competent, scientific, expert advisers, who, with all due deference to the profession with which I had once a bowing acquaintance, seem more competent to advise him on these technical questions than a lawyer.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have already said what the commission's work was since its establishment. Perhaps I can summarize it again. The main problem that the commission has to deal with is, as I said a moment ago, that of modernizing the Canadian fleet to enable Canadian shipowners to meet foreign competition more effectively.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the minister permit a question there?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Will my hon. friend allow me to answer his question? This means that Canadian ship operators have to meet keen competition because new, more modern and faster ships are being put onto certain trade routes, so that our ship operators who are doing business with ex-Park vessels, that is 10,000-ton freighters, 4,700-ton freighters and certain tankers, find themselves at a disadvantage. Therefore the commission has adopted a program whereby it will allow some of these operators to sell their Park vessels, but not to sell them unless the purchase price is deposited in escrow, and the money used for the purchase of new ships, of the type necessary to compete on the trade routes, to be built in Canadian shipyards. That in itself is a man-sized job.

Then, as I said a moment ago, the commission has inquired into and reported upon several practical problems. One of them I gave to the hon. gentleman. It has investigated and made recommendations upon the question of the role of Canadian shipping in the European recovery program. The Canada Shipping Act, which was amended and passed in this house, was given attention by the commission. As a central agency, another of the duties of the commission is the administration of shipping matters. The commission has given assistance to Canadian ship owners in many fields. The commission has a responsibility for investigation, certification and settlement of claims in the knock-for-knock agreement. It has undertaken the control and direction of two government agencies, steamship subsidies and the remainder of the activities of Park Steamships.

The commission has not yet been in existence for a year, and it still has other duties to perform. The future commission expects it will take about six months to complete a survey of the shipbuilding industry. In carrying out this survey, the commission will obtain and consider the recommendations of ship owners, ship builders, labour organizations, exporters, importers, manufacturers, primary producers and other Canadian interests and other organizations affected by shipping policy. That was the object of appointing the advisory committees authorized under the act. I do not know that I can give the hon. gentleman any more complete details than that.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am not going to pursue the matter further. I just want to say this, without wishing to be in the least offensive to the minister. I think what he said was just a lot of words. I would be much happier to have the minister make these decisions himself, along with some expert person with whom he might consult from day to day. I would far rather rely on that than this commission which is spending tens of thousands of dollars on things which, to me, are just a lot of—I do not want to use extreme words. I think the whole thing is unreal.

Mr. BAKER: I want to support this item of $134,000 for the administration of the Canadian maritime commission. I supported the resolution which preceded the bill and I still support it. I have some knowledge of marine matters. I fully realize that if we do not have the maritime commission, or some equivalent body, our merchant marine will go down to what it was before. At that time it was practically negligible. Canada had one of the largest merchant fleets in the world in the old sailing ship days when Nova Scotia, Quebec, New Brunswick and the maritime provinces generally owned so many ships. They dwindled down to practically nothing.

This maritime commission is in its infancy. Hon. members can criticize it now and criticize it justly. I think the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg has brought out some pertinent points. The commission has to be broadened in its scope. It has to get more men with practical knowledge of marine matters than it has at the present time. The commission is just growing up. I support the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg and also the senior hon. member for Halifax. I think they brought out some useful points, but we must have this commission.

The company with which I was concerned prior to going into the army in 1939 imported from the old country. Most of our cargoes came in Scandinavian bottoms. The reason was that our Canadian ships and the British ships could not compete with the Scandinavians. The maritime commission may be able to help out in that regard. If we are to have a merchant fleet we may have to subsidize under certain circumstances, but we must have a body of specialists who can handle this. The Department of Transport as such cannot do it. I am quite positive of that. They must have an advisory body. I do recommend that more men with practical marine experience be brought in and that the scope of the commission be broadened. I particularly want to see the fishing vessels and the smaller craft brought in here. I think we would be making a great mistake if we did not support this item. This body is just in its infancy, and in the years to come hon. members will realize that they have been wise in having established a maritime commission.

Mr. FRASER: It is not a case of supporting the item; it is a case of trying to find out something about it. What is meant by "Professional and special services, $25,000"? No amount was voted for this item last year, but we are asked for $25,000 this year.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is provision for audits in connection with steamship subventions.

Mr. FRASER: $25,000.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. FRASER: How much do they audit?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Let me take a minute to explain this to my hon. friend.

Mr. FRASER: I wish you would.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There has been a demand for increased subventions. That demand is because of increased costs; and the government has felt that before increases were granted, there should be an accounting of the books of certain of the applicants. That is a sensible thing to do. Before you pay out money, it is logical to ascertain whether those who claim that conditions require increased subsidies, are correct in their statement, and whether their figures can be verified. An audit has been made in a number of cases, and this item is for that purpose.

Mr. FRASER: These are subsidies that are paid out from the minister's department?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. FRASER: These are subsidies for mail, mostly, are they not?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes; the items following, in votes 495 and 496.

Mr. FRASER: Just following this up, does the treasury department not make audits of this?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I did not catch the question.

Mr. FRASER: Does the minister's own department not make audits of this?

[Mr. Baker.]

Mr. CHEVRIER: We have no auditors in the Department of Transport. There is in fact an auditor or two in the board of transport commissioners, but their work has to do with railway matters. There is no auditor in the Department of Transport.

Mr. FRASER: You mean to say that subsidies are given without any check-up on them?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FRASER: That is what it looks like.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is exactly what it is not; and that is exactly what I am telling my hon. friend this provision is for.

Mr. FRASER: The minister stated that this has been set up for only about a year.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, I did not say that.

Mr. FRASER: The minister said that this commission had been set up for only about a year.

Mr. CHEVRIER: But not steamships subventions. Those have been in existence for years.

Mr. FRASER: Yes; but evidently there was no audit.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member for Grey North.

Mr. KNOWLES: The port of Owen Sound.

Mr. CASE: The minister says there has been an application for an increase in subventions. As I review the details of the services at page 276 of the estimates, it would certainly appear that there has been a tremendous demand for an increase in salaries. Just let me review this matter to some extent. For the chairman of the commission there is an increase from $5,000 to $12,000.

An hon. MEMBER: For part of a year.

Mr. CASE: Yes. There are two commissioners at $20,000 a year. Why could not the scope of their administration be enlarged? From listening to the discussion and the answers given by the minister, I cannot understand how these men are fully employed in the task which he has outlined, because it would appear that their responsibilities are less. I am thinking now that a maritime or marine commission could administer the affairs on the great lakes in which I am particularly interested. The city of Owen Sound has, I think I can say without fear of contradiction, one of the finest harbours on the great lakes. It is the last to freeze up in the fall and the first to open in the spring. That can be verified. For years the board of trade and other public bodies have appealed to the Minister of Transport to allow the lightship St. Heliers to be in the port of Owen Sound. The mariners have also appealed, because markers are put out early in the spring and then in the fall. We have not been able to get anywhere with that suggestion. I have had an opportunity to review some of the correspondence between the minister and the board of trade and between the board of trade and the minister, and I cannot for the life of me understand why, when you are putting lightships there, those ships should be wintered in Midland.

Mr. CHEVRIER: We are past that item.

Mr. CASE: I am speaking of the advisability of enlarging the duties of the commission, so that the minister's estimate of $134,300 might be more properly justified. I rose a while ago to discuss this item and I was told I was wrong. I may be wrong now. I should be glad if the minister could tell me now why the present procedure is necessary, and why we have not the advantage of one of these lightships placing markers for the benefit of mariners for life-saving and so on. It means a great deal to them as they ply the great lakes and the boats go down from the head of lake Superior, from Port Arthur and Fort William, with their cargoes late in the fall and leave the port early in the spring. If it would not be asking too much, I should like to have the minister say why we have not one of these ships in the port of Owen Sound.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. member is not asking for too much. I can tell him that the maritime commission has absolutely no jurisdiction over the subject which he raised a moment ago. The St. Heliers lightship is a matter that comes under marine services. I know the position fairly well. I had representations from my hon. friend. It is certainly not a matter over which the maritime commission would have any jurisdiction.

Mr. MacNAUGHT: I wish to support the remarks made by the senior member for Halifax, which were to the effect that when appointment is made of a successor to Mr. Rahlves on the Canadian maritime commission, consideration be given to appointing a man from the maritime provinces. I have the utmost respect for the chairman of the commission, Mr. Clyne, and his associate, Captain Audette. I think they are both competent and capable men. But in matters pertaining to the east coast, I submit that we should have a man of experience in matters pertaining to that coast. This is more particularly true, because a large number of the ships owned and operated by Park Steamships was sold to Atlantic Shippers with head office in Halifax. At the moment three of their ships are tied up in the port of Halifax. For these reasons I submit that great attention should be paid to the remarks made by the senior member for Halifax, and that every avenue should be canvassed in trying to get a suitable man from the maritimes to take the place of Mr. Rahlves.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I can assure my hon. friend that every consideration has been and is being given to that matter.

Item agreed to.

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions—

494. Administration, $19,949.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to bring before the committee and the minister the matter of the subsidy on a service across Minas basin. This was for a ferry service which was established forty-five or fifty years ago to serve the people in Annapolis valley and Cumberland, and, in more recent years, to serve the tourists. In about the year 1926 a special boat was built to operate on that service. It was called the Kipawo, a name which is formed from the first two letters of the ports at which it called, namely Kingsport, Parrsboro and Wolfville: Kingsport in Kings county, Parrsboro in Cumberland county and Wolfville in Kings county. We made the sacrifice of allowing that ferry boat, which carried cars, to be taken over by the naval department about 1942, with the expectation that it would be restored to the service. This was one service that was subsidized by the federal government and by the provincial government. I think the federal government gave $4,500 or $5,000 a year and the provincial government the same amount. That boat was taken over by the naval service and finally transferred to Newfoundland. At the end of the war it was sold by war assets for $26,000, fully as much as was paid for it in the first place; it was not a large boat.

The people of that section of Nova Scotia were much annoyed and put out by the action of the department in not restoring this boat and this subsidy. The provincial government supported it and offered to pay its portion as before. It made representations to the federal government. At that time shipping subsidies were under the Department of Trade and Commerce, and I believe the then minister was sympathetic; because it was the only subsidy in all Canada that was discontinued, notwithstanding the fact that this ferry service had been in operation for more than forty years. Boards of trade in the maritime provinces and interested people made repeated representations. Hundreds of boats were acquired by the government in the naval service and the Park Steamship Company, mentioned by the minister, but not one was made available to renew this ferry service.

During the war, motorists had to go 150 miles further. Gasoline was scarce; it was almost impossible to get tires, but our people made the sacrifice and were willing to continue to make it as long as necessary, as Nova Scotians did in every phase of the war effort. But they did expect this service to be re-established at the end of the war; they did expect this boat to be brought back, but it was sold and the proceeds held by the federal government.

I request the minister to look into this grievance and have the service restored. It is only about nine miles from Parrsboro to Kingsport, and about fifteen miles to Wolfville. An improvement might be made by having direct connection from Parrsboro to Blomidon, the nearest point in King's county, which is only three and a half miles away. If a wharf were built there it would be only a short service from Parrsboro across the Minas basin. It would land at a point on Blomidon, which is being advocated by the government of Nova Scotia and by many people as the site of a national park.

Now that the subsidies come under the minister's direction, I would ask him to deal with this matter. I do not believe the people in any other part of Canada would have been subjected to this treatment. We in Nova Scotia are long suffering or we would not have put up with it. This was the only subsidy discontinued in all Canada, just because we sacrificed our boat in order to be of service during the war. I believe this ferry should be re-established as a service to the local people, as a service to tourists, and as a matter of pride for the whole countryside. The destruction of this service is another sign of retrogression, and the people concerned are very much grieved and hurt. I ask the minister to give this matter his personal attention.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I should like to speak on this general item—

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I wonder if I can get a statement from the minister concerning this matter.

Mr. CHEVRIER: My hon. friend has raised two points; the service between Blomidon and Parrsboro and between Parrsboro and Hantsport and Windsor. The position is as he stated, that the service was taken off during the war; but, as I understand the duties of the steamship subventions branch of the commission, they do not include establishing a service, but rather deciding whether or not a subsidy is necessary for the operation of a service.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): But in this case—

Mr. CHEVRIER: Would the hon. gentleman permit me to continue? If someone makes an application to operate a ferry service between these points, unquestionably the commission will have to give the matter its attention. I would even go a step further and say the commission can and will look into it and, after doing so, they may decide to intervene. But it is not the business of the commission to institute service. It may be that some injustice is being done to the citizens of these points, but that is not a matter with which the commission is directly charged. I take it that there is no service between Blomidon and Parrsboro, and my information is that there is no wharf at Blomidon, so that I suppose there would be some considerable expenditure before such a service could be considered, since a wharf would have to be built. I do not want my hon. friend to think we are not prepared to give the subject he has raised every consideration. I shall ask the commission to look into it and see if something can be done to assist the people in that area.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I want to thank the minister for going as far as he did, but I point out to him and to this committee that we are not asking the government to establish a new service. The government destroyed the service which was there for forty or fifty years, so that they have a very real responsibility to see that the service is re-established. They took the boat which was specially built under the authority of the province of Nova Scotia when I was provincial minister of highways, and which operated there from 1926 or 1927 until 1942. That boat was taken over by the naval department and sold by war assets; and we have been denied that service ever since.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I should like to speak on this general item. The hon. member for Cumberland has just said the people of Nova Scotia are long suffering and hard done by. The senior hon. member for Halifax was complaining that, because of the lack of a maritime provinces man, on the maritime commission he thought, the people of the maritimes were not getting as fair a break as other parts of Canada. But looking at pages 72 and 73 of the estimates, I would suggest that the maritimes are doing extremely well, as far as mail subventions are concerned. For the west coast of British Columbia we have three items totalling some $79,000. For the maritimes we have a page and a half of items totalling about $1,150,000.

As I pointed out a little earlier this session, during the debate on the Canada Shipping Act, coastal shipping on the British Columbia coast is of much greater significance than that on the east coast, because of our total lack of north and south roads. A tremendous volume of traffic moves up and down the coast. There is a small subsidy for the service on the west coast of Vancouver island and a small subsidy for service between Prince Rupert and the Queen Charlotte islands, but my point is that there has been a very great difference between the subsidies paid on the west coast and those on the east coast.

My second point is that, since the end of the war, a condition has arisen which makes the need for these subsidies on the west coast very much greater. Before the war, we had three services on the west coast: the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian National and a small coastal line known as Union Steamships, which called at all the small ports. It was a slow service but a good service, in that no logging camp or fishing village was too small for Union Steamships to push in, drop off the mail and push on. After the war, quite a number of naval veterans thought they should enter this coastal trade. They bought some of these war vessels, which apparently the department thought very little of, but which these people thought a great deal of. Then they reconverted them. In my riding alone there are four of these coastal lines. These lines decided to service only the bigger points of Gibsons Landing, Sechelt, Pender Harbour, Powell River and Britannia Mine. They picked the cream of the trade, leaving the Union Steamships calling at the smaller points, in which they have mail contracts, thus losing the business out of the big points.

As a consequence, the only thing the bigger company could do was to begin to drop their service to the smaller points. I am sure the maritime commission will know the points I am referring to—Halfmoon bay, Lang bay, Lund and Egmont. These little points are all along the coast. Their only connection with Vancouver is by sea. There is no road and no rail connection. No subsidy is paid to this new line, and certainly insufficient subsidy to the Union Steamships to justify that service. So they have dropped the service.

The unfortunate member of parliament for that district, the hon. member for Vancouver North, gets the full complaint: "Why is this happening?" Most abuse is against the steamship company, the residents not realizing the situation which the company has to face.

For the entire mainland coast of British Columbia, from Vancouver to Stewart, which is about 600 miles direct and about 5,000 miles by coast line, we have a subsidy of $37,000 which, I suppose, is divided among the three lines, the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian National and the Union Steamships.

I now look at the eastern coast and I say—and I would be corrected if I am wrong—that every single coastal steamship line of the maritime provinces, and certainly of the St. Lawrence river, is paid a subsidy. These lines on the St. Lawrence river will be operating only part of the year, and they also have rail and road communication; the water is not their only means of access.

This raises one other point of great interest. The reason we have such a high freight rate is not only the mountain differential, but also the lack of road and bus competition which you have in the east. The result is that we have to pay the full traffic. Before we start with the 21 per cent increase, or the 25 per cent mountain differential, the people of British Columbia have good cause to resent subsidies for coastal traffic along the St. Lawrence river which results in cheaper sea routes and cheaper transportation along the St. Lawrence, which in turn must result in lower railway fares.

So apparently we are in the business of subsidizing coastal traffic in the east, despite the fact that rail traffic rates are lower, with the result, of course, that the prairies and British Columbia take up the slack.

I would ask the minister the reason for this amazing difference between $79,000 for British Columbia and $1,160,000 for the east coast, when most of these points are already serviced with either rail or road. You may have this new line servicing these little points making an application for a subsidy along the scale of that permitted in the St. Lawrence and Nova Scotia. If so, will they be given, shall I say, careful consideration, or favourable consideration?

Mr. CHEVRIER: To answer the first question, one of the reasons is that the operators on the west coast are perhaps more capable of supporting themselves. Another reason is that there is a substantial amount for west coast services in the supplementary estimates. I am not in a position to say what it is now, but certainly it is over $300,000, far more than the amount in the main estimates.

The hon. member's other point was whether, if the small lines were to make application, they would be given careful or favourable consideration. I can say they would be given both.

Mr. PEARKES: I should like to support what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver North, because the same situation affects my constituency in the southern part of Vancouver island. I was amazed, too, at the difference between the amount of money voted for the coast of British Columbia as compared with the amount for other parts of Canada.

When the bill to set up the maritime commission was introduced last year, I supported it. I sincerely hope they will now see that the amounts are equitably distributed between the various parts of Canada. The hon. member for Vancouver North has referred to conditions on the Atlantic seaboard. I would call the minister's attention to the amount of grant paid to a vessel on one of the fresh water lakes, here in Ontario, plying between Owen Sound and a little island somewhere out in that lake. There they have a grant of $65,000.

I have seen that vessel. It is just a fresh-water vessel plying between the mainland and a little island which can be seen off the mainland of Ontario; whereas, in British Columbia we have ocean-going vessels from British Columbia going up through the open water to Prince Rupert and from Prince Rupert across to the Queen Charlotte islands. Then there are other vessels going around the southern shore of Vancouver island and up the west coast exposed to all the fury of Pacific storms.

I know the people who live in the southern part of my constituency, in places like Port Renfrew, are served by mail by one of these vessels. They have no other means of getting mail. But the vessel comes only once every ten days. This vessel running out of Owen Sound to Manitoulin island is carrying mail every day, I should think. It seems to me that it is all wrong to have one getting $65,000 and the other only $10,000.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The reason for the subsidy of $65,000 is that there are three vessels, and they operate three services. May I add that one of these vessels travels 472 miles?

Mr. PEARKES: That may be true, but what is the population served? The population of British Columbia has increased in the last three years by twenty-seven per cent, a greater increase than in any other part of Canada. Large numbers of people have moved in there. I say it is the service rendered, not the number of vessels rendering the service, which is important. Was the vessel running out of Owen Sound built by the government?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No.

Mr. PEARKES: Was the building of it subsidized by the government?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No.

Mr. PEARKES: Has it an exclusive monopoly for the carrying of mail?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No. But referring to the service to which my hon. friend referred on the west coast, one point which must not be forgotten is that the $10,000 to which he referred is given by the Canadian Pacific, and that railway is a pretty substantial organization and well able to look after itself. It is true that if they can show that amount is required for certain purposes, the steamship subvention branch will grant it. But, to compare the small vessel operating at Owen Sound with the Canadian Pacific—well, they are two different things.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The minister is right in some ways. I believe the basis upon which they must calculate these subsidies must be that if a company like the Canadian Pacific in British Columbia has some lucrative runs, they would also be asked to take on some of these less profitable ones.

However I agree with what the hon. member for Nanaimo has said. On the west coast they have about a 600-mile run in open ocean, and they receive a subsidy of $10,000. I understand that they lose $50,000 or $60,000 a year on the operation to the mainland.

I was recently interested in the operation of a company which was in there and tried to compete by providing a service twice weekly up the west coast. I can tell the committee that they lost approximately $30,000 in the operation in one year. How would that company have gone about obtaining a subsidy? Would it have been considered favourably, if it has provided the necessary service?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not sure whether they would be considered favourably, but any application is considered in the light of necessity and losses. If a company in receipt of subsidy can show that its costs have gone up and will submit to audit, the commission will give the matter consideration. But I cannot say that the application will be granted.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The minister said there would be another $300,000 in the supplementary estimates, and I thank him for the information.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Would the hon. member permit me to make this further observation? The commission could not possibly subsidize two people for the same service.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Then there is no chance of a section of the country which is now receiving inadequate service receiving better service?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I would not say "no" to that.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): That is what it amounts to. If the present company is not willing to provide better service than the present inadequate service some other company would have to step in.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is part of the contract that is entered into that adequate service will be provided for the subsidy that is given.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The contract was made forty years ago.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It would be reviewed every year. Any other company could make application.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Is it not true that during the war we had a Commodities Stabilization Corporation which handled some of these subsidies?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I think what the hon. gentleman has in mind is the stabilization fund that was operated by the Department of Finance. That was done away with on January 1 of this year.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Has that made necessary increased subsidies?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is responsible for the increased subsidies which will be included in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Did I understand the minister to say that they would not pay a subsidy to competitors on the same run?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Would that mean that if a second steamship starts in operation the subsidy would be removed because, if there is competition, there is no need for a subsidy?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The first remains until the year is out, when it can be reviewed. The competitor may make application if he is operating at a loss. If he is operating at a profit he is not entitled to a subsidy.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I would think the new man entering a field would be more likely to be operating at a loss than the chap who has the subsidy. Would not it be better to provide a subsidy for the two?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed that that would be impossible to do.

Mr. STANFIELD: I should like to add my support to the hon. member for Cumberland in connection with the ferry service across Minas basin. For some years the S.S. Kipawo plied across this basin, but when the war came along it was taken away for war service. That was perfectly all right but the people there naturally thought that after the war the Kipawo would come back and the service would be restored. However, when the war was finished the Kipawo was sold and has never been brought back.

I would point out that it is some 200 miles around this bay, which is a long piece for a motorist to drive when he is in a hurry or for a truck driver to drive when he is moving freight back and forth between points on each side of the bay. I think it is only fair to the people in that part of the country that that service should be restored. I understand that the subsidy was not large, and it would be a great help in having produce moved back and forth. It would also aid tourists and motorists who wanted to get around the 200 miles in a short time.

It would not be necessary to build wharves or anything else at Parrsboro, Wolfville or Hantsport, as these places already have good docking facilities. I suggest they should call at Hantsport as well as Kingsport, as Hantsport is on the main highway and more convenient for motor traffic. I would ask the minister to give consideration to having this service on the Minas basin restored.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I wish to support what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver North, the hon. member for Nanaimo and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I am particularly interested in the mention by the hon. member for Nanaimo of a subsidy paid to a small line operating on fresh water. That gives me hope that our transportation situation on the Arrow lakes will be solved.

For twenty years we have had a poor steamship service. The company claims that they have been operating at considerable loss. The lake is 140 miles long, and the steamship line serves many isolated farmers, fruit growers, lumbermen and people of that sort, who depend entirely on steamship transportation, and the service has been very poor.

In view of the fact that this company has been operating for a number of years at a loss; in view of the fact that they have to spend up to $600,000 to build a new steamer in order to give improved service, is there any possibility of a subsidy being considered if an application is made?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The answer is yes.

Mr. PEARKES: Do I understand the minister to say that one of the conditions of granting a subsidy or subvention is that efficient service is being rendered? There are isolated points along the south and west coasts of Vancouver island where the mail is delivered by steamer only once in ten days. The steamer leaves Victoria, goes up the west coast, turns around and comes back, the round trip taking about ten days. Under modern conditions, to receive mail only once every ten days cannot be considered as efficient service. When passengers have no opportunity to go out to do their shopping or their business in Victoria more often than once in ten days it is not efficient service.

Surely if the subsidy were increased a more efficient service could be rendered. I know the Canadian Pacific is a large company and there are only small people who live out in these villages. I wonder if this large company is not trying to cover up its losses by charging high rates for freight and passenger service in an effort to make up the lack of assistance that it receives?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not think I was using the word "efficient" in the sense that my hon. friend understood it, or if I was, that was not my intention. I am informed that one of the conditions of granting a subsidy is that the service is essential for the economic needs of the community. It need not necessarily be an efficient service as my hon. friend understands it. He has referred to a service once in six, seven or eight days, but it is not on that basis that a subsidy is granted. It is granted on the basis of the economic needs of the community.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): It seems to me that I smell a badly decomposed rat. The minister says he has taken over from the Department of Finance the operation which was carried on during the war to keep fares down and to meet advanced costs.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I cannot allow my hon. friend to say that. I did not say any such thing. I said that during the war the Department of Finance operated a stabilization fund which went out of existence on January 1. Since then and because of that, applications have been made for increased subsidies. That is not what my hon. friend is saying.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The necessity for increased subsidies must be due to the fact that the stabilization fund has been discontinued.

Mr. CHEVRIER: And higher costs.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): During the war we endeavoured to keep fares down, and that was a worthy object, but because of that we are paying higher subsidies. We pay subsidies to some companies, while other companies do not get a subsidy. How is a company that is just starting in to compete with a company that is subsidized? Actually it is not just $79,000 but close to $400,000, because the minister brought in supplementaries amounting to approximately $350,000. This means that $400,000 went to these selected companies on the Pacific coast, Union Steamships, Canadian National Steamships—

Mr. CHEVRIER: Not Canadian National but Canadian Pacific, and Union Steamships.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Just two companies. But there are many smaller companies operating and providing a vastly improved service, which have to compete with these large companies which the taxpayers are subsidizing to the extent of $400,000. That is not fair to the smaller companies.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If there is any company which feels it needs assistance and can establish that it is operating at a loss it can make application and it will be considered, but if the company does not make application, my hon. friend would not suggest that we go out and give it a subsidy?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): No; what I am saying is that you are subsidizing these two large companies to the extent of $400,000, which probably allows them to charge less than a proper fare.

Mr. CHEVRIER: They are not subsidized on that basis but on the basis of an operating loss, and we make sure, through a firm of auditors, that they are operating at a loss and need the subvention in order to make receipts balance with expenditures.

Mr. McLURE: Who are the contractors for the Pictou, Souris and Magdalen islands service, and do they set their own rates on all freight? I would also ask the same question with respect to the Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland service, which runs from Charlottetown to Newfoundland, and also takes in Montreal and other ports. This Newfoundland service is of great benefit to the farmers of Prince Edward Island. We are the only island province in the dominion, and for that reason are more interested in transportation than any other province. We find that this Prince Edward Island-Newfoundland service is one of our greatest assets for the shipping of goods by our farmers. Who are the contractors on that service?

The Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia service, which is called the Wood Island-Cariboo service, has been built up within the last few years and is operated by Northumberland Ferries Limited. No one can dispute that it is giving an excellent service to Prince Edward Island. One of the few things in connection with this service which the contractors do not have to look after is the docks. The docks at Cariboo are fair, but the docks at Wood Island are far from adequate to take care of the shipping that is done there. Most of the freight originates at Wood Island. I would ask the minister to give that matter his careful and sympathetic consideration.

As I said, transportation is the most important thing to our island province. I do not see an item in these estimates, but I hope there will be one in the supplementaries for a subsidy to a new ferry which I understand will be established between West Point and Buctouche. That is one of the parts in the western end of our province which has been sadly neglected, and I hope that some consideration will be given to it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The operators of the service between Pictou, Souris and the Magdalen islands are the Magdalen Island Transportation Services Limited. The operators of the service between Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland are the Inter Island Steamship Company, and for the service between Wood Island and Cariboo, Northumberland Ferries Limited. A service between West Point and Buctouche is under consideration.

Mr. McLURE: Do they set their own rates?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do the docks at Cariboo come under the control of the transport department?

Mr. CHEVRIER: They certainly do not come under the control of this particular branch, the maritime commission. I am informed that they come under the Department of Public Works.

Item agreed to.

Railway service—

497. Repairs and expenses in connection with the operation and maintenance of official railway cars under the jurisdiction of the department, $64,000.

Mr. SKEY: Would the minister take advantage of this item for railway cars to make a statement to the committee on rolling stock, with special reference to passenger rolling stock of the Canadian National and state whether anything is being done to replace and perhaps modernize the sleeping accommodation so as to give a little better service to the public, now that we have passed through the difficult war years?

Mr. CHEVRIER: If my hon. friend will look through the first discussion that took place on these estimates he will find a statement there, although it is not a full one. My recollection is that I said something like this. The Canadian National, and I am sure the Canadian Pacific as well, were continually moving in the direction of modernizing their equipment. Boxcars, which is an important part of the equipment of both railways, are being built. Both railways have a program for the building of boxcars, refrigerator cars, ore cars, diesel switching locomotives as well as coaches. Extra coaches are being built in the various shops. For the year 1948 the new equipment program contains twenty sleeping cars, twenty-five air-conditioned coaches, and a long list of other equipment, 2,000, 50-ton boxcars, 700, 50-ton boxcars, 140 boxcars. The list is interminable. I can assure my hon. friend that the railways have an up-to-date new equipment program.

Mr. SKEY: If they are building only twenty sleeping cars and twenty-five coaches this year one might as well say that the passenger facility program is waiting, pending the transportation side of the business, the boxcars and the working equipment of the railway.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Railway service—

498. Hudson Bay railway—construction and improvements, capital, $88,000.

Mr. FRASER: I note that the word "capital" appears in this item. Does that mean improvements to some of the buildings?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: Or is it rolling stock?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is for the building of a new freight office at The Pas, Manitoba, at a cost of $80,000. The $8,000 is for installation of two new culverts and extension of The Pas station platform.

Item agreed to.

Railway service—

499. Hudson Bay railway—to provide for the difference between the expenditures for operation and maintenance, and revenue accruing from operation during the year ending March 31, 1949, not exceeding, $500,000.

Mr. FRASER: Has there been some improvement on this line in the amount of revenue, because at Churchill we have a United States detachment of 300 or 400 men?

Mr. CHEVRIER: There was a decrease over last year, a deficit of $25,000. During the war years, of course, the operation was profitable for one or two years.

Mr. FRASER: There are United States men there at the present time?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. The movement of passengers, because of the airport, would not affect the revenues greatly.

Mr. FRASER: The freight rates on that line are so high I wondered if there was an improvement.

Mr. CHEVRIER: They were put into operation recently, if the hon. member is referring to the 20 per cent increase.

Mr. FRASER: No, I did not mean that. The rates were high before the increase.

Mr. CHEVRIER: They are on the same level as the prairie scale; the same scale, not any higher.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member is right; they are high.

Mr. FRASER: It costs a lot of money to use that line.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I suppose relatively everything is high.

Mr. FRASER: Yes, the sky is the limit. To get an automobile over to Churchill from The Pas costs so much that it is almost out of sight. It costs almost the worth of the car to get it there. Because of the United States forces at Churchill, I wondered whether the revenues did not jump up a bit. Of course the cost of maintaining the line would jump at the same time.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, the revenues did jump up, but the cost overtook them and the deficit is about the same.

Mr. MOORE: Do the station and the freight shed at The Pas belong to the Canadian National railway or to the Hudson Bay railway? What rental is paid by the one who makes use of the property to the one who owns it?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed that the station belongs to the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. MOORE: What is the rental paid?

Mr. COLDWELL: What rent is paid by the Canadian National to the Hudson Bay railway?

Mr. CHEVRIER: For the operation of the whole line it is $1,000 a month. I would have to get the information with respect to the use of the station.

Mr. MOORE: Will the minister find out for me what rental is paid for the use of the four miles of track between The Pas and Flin Flon junction? I understand that it belongs also to the Hudson Bay railway and is used by the Canadian National.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I shall have to get that information for the hon. gentleman; I have not it here.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the minister know offhand the number of millions of bushels of grain that was shipped from Fort Churchill last year to the old country?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Speaking from memory, I think it is 5,000,000 bushels.

Mr. COLDWELL: How many ships came in?

Mr. CHEVRIER: About nineteen.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): There is a decrease in this appropriation. I should like to know the reason for that. Is consideration being given to the whole matter of using the Hudson Bay route for the export of wheat? As the minister knows, western farmers have made representations to the government asking that this port be used to the fullest extent, because it will mean that farmers will get from six to eight cents a bushel more for their wheat. Because of the knowledge gained by the government during the war regarding the use of that port, we are anxious that full advantage be taken of it. I suggest that in the future the government make plans to have grain shipped there, so that we can have a real test of the Hudson Bay port and find out whether it is feasible to use it for both export and import, for cargoes coming into and going from western Canada.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. member asks why the decrease. It is because of the increased cost of operation. There was a difference of $25,000 between last year and this year. On the question of traffic moving, I have already dealt with that on two occasions, and my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce dealt with it the other day.

With reference to grain, all I can tell the hon. gentleman is that the chairman of the wheat board has advised the officers of my department that he hopes to fill the elevator with 2,500,000 bushels of the old crop. Any additional movement of the new crop would depend on crop and harvest conditions at present unknown. I do not know what the position is with regard to lumber. It was thought at first that some lumber could be shipped, but it is doubtful if that can be done. With regard to incoming cargo, I expect that it will be greater this season than last season.

Mr. MOORE: A year or two ago the present Minister of Trade and Commerce informed the house that the capacity of the shipping route in one season from Churchill would be approximately 20,000,000 bushels. It was argued at that time that if 20,000,000 bushels could be shipped from Churchill in one season—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. This item reads:

499. Hudson Bay railway—to provide for the difference between the expenditures for operation and maintenance, and revenue accruing from operation during the year ending March 31, 1949, not exceeding $500,000.

That is all the item says.

Mr. MOORE: That is the very point I was coming to. Since the property at Churchill is largely owned by the federal government, we would like to see some policy adopted by which the government would make use of these facilities to ship through the port the amount of grain for which it was designed to handle in one season. If that were done the railroad could be made to pay the cost of operation.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I cannot add any more to what I already said when the hon. gentleman spoke on this before, namely, that it would require about 25,000,000 bushels of grain to make this a profitable operation. It has not been possible for the wheat board to do this in the past. Actually the wheat board has been asked to move as much wheat as it could, and the opinion I have is that it is hoped to fill the elevator to capacity with 2,500,000 bushels this year.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Tomorrow we have two short bills. I am told they are not contentious.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We cannot hear what the minister is saying. Will he speak a little louder?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Tomorrow we shall take up two short bills at the outset.

The first one will be Bill No. 339, to amend an act respecting the national battlefields at Quebec. The second one will be Bill No. 335, to amend the Criminal Code (race meetings). Then we shall go into supply in the departments of—

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the third bill?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The second bill is Bill No. 335.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What are the items in supply?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I shall be there in a minute. In supply we shall take the following departments. We shall continue with transport, then take Secretary of State, trade and commerce, reconstruction and supply, veterans affairs and national health and welfare, though not necessarily in the order I have indicated.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): May I ask the minister when we may come to the resolution on the international wheat agreement standing in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I could not say tonight. I will inquire.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I was asked the same question last night. I brought it to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), and I think he would like to go on with it as soon as possible. However I think it is the intention to deal with these bills first.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 10, 1948

The house met at eleven o'clock.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Sixth report of special committee on veterans affairs—Mr. Mutch.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

VETERANS INSURANCE

Mr. PROBE:

1. How much insurance is in force under the Veterans Insurance Act, and how many veterans are involved?

2. How many veterans have been refused insurance under the terms of this act since its inception?

Mr. GREGG:

Return as at June 8, 1948:

1. Veterans' insurance in force, $55,038,465. Number of insured lives, including veterans and others eligible under the Veterans Insurance Act, 18,463.

2. 115.

TAXATION AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCES—ONTARIO AND QUEBEC

Mr. FULTON:

1. How much would be the payments to Ontario and Quebec under the Dominion-Provincial Tax Rentals Agreement Act, 1947, in respect of each of the years 1947 and 1948 if those two provinces had entered the agreements?

2. What was the amount of the collections by the federal treasury under (a) individual income tax; (b) corporation income tax; (c) succession duties, for each of those provinces in the fiscal year 1947-48?

3. Have either of those two provinces entered the tax fields, exclusive use of which was asked for by the dominion beyond the point which would be allowed under the agreements; and if so, what tax fields and to what extent?

4. If the answer to question 3 is in the affirmative does the federal treasury now lose in revenue or have to pay any rebate or make any offsetting adjustment to the taxpayers of Ontario and Quebec as a result; and if so, how much?

Mr. BELZILE:

1. Preliminary estimates of payments which would be payable to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec under the Dominion-Provincial Tax Rentals Agreement Act, 1947, in respect of the years 1947 and 1948, if these two provinces had entered the agreements, are as follows:

	1947	1948
Ontario	$74,012,000	$77,288,000
Quebec	63,056,000	65,929,000

2. Total collections by the dominion government of individual income tax, corporation income tax and succession duties in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec during the fiscal year 1947-48 were as follows:

	Individual* Income Tax	Corporation Income Tax	Succession Duties
Ontario	$302,406,377	$150,466,340	$15,890,474
Quebec	171,773,056	107,480,594	7,807,023

*Does not include gift tax or deferred tax.

Does not include excess profits tax or special tax on distribution of accumulated surpluses in the case of private companies.

3. Any provincial government which signs the agreement undertakes not to impose or permit any of its municipalities to impose an income tax or a corporation tax or a corporation income tax, with the exception of (1) a defined 5 per cent tax on corporate income earned within the province (to be levied only until its abolition is requested by the dominion); and (2) any tax on income derived from mining operations or from logging operations levied by the province, or by a municipality in lieu of a tax on property. The dominion does not ask for the exclusive right to levy succession duties.

Neither Ontario nor Quebec has levied an individual income tax.

Both of these provinces, however, have levied a corporation income tax of 7 per cent. This rate is 2 per cent higher than the rate of tax which agreeing provinces may levy under the terms of the agreement.

Ontario and Quebec have also various specific taxes on corporations, such as taxes on capital, taxes on premium income of insurance companies, taxes on railway mileage, etc., which could not be levied under the agreement.

Both Ontario and Quebec levy succession duties which they could continue to levy under the agreement, if they so desired.

4. The dominion treasury does not lose any revenue as a result of Ontario and Quebec using tax fields, the right to use which they would rent to the dominion if they signed an agreement. If these provinces signed agreements, the dominion treasury would have to make substantial payments to the two provincial governments, but certain taxpayers in the two provinces would pay less in taxes than they do now.

Succession duties paid to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec may be deducted by the taxpayer from succession duties payable to the dominion government up to one-half the amount of the dominion duty. However, this situation would continue if either province entered into an agreement and chose to remain in the succession duty field.

IMMIGRATION FROM BRITAIN

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the government any central register in Britain for those who want to emigrate to Canada?

2. As to the announcement made on Thursday, June 3, in the British house by Philip J. Noel-Baker, Secretary for Commonwealth Relations, that 300,000 Britons are waiting to emigrate to Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, has the government of Britain any figures in reference to Canada?

3. What are the figures for Canada of Britons ready to come here; in what cities can they register; what are the conditions governing their coming and what cash are they allowed in dollars?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. No. It is not necessary for a British subject to register before coming to Canada. The immigration regulations provide for the admission of a British subject by birth or naturalization in the United Kingdom who is in good health and in possession of sufficient means to maintain himself until he becomes established in this country or is destined to relatives or friends in a position and willing to assist him. The immigration branch have centrally located offices in London and Glasgow and will be opening offices at Liverpool and Belfast shortly.

2. Information not available.

3. No information available as prior registration not required. See answer to question No. 1 regarding conditions for coming to Canada. It is understood that British emigrants leaving the United Kingdom are allowed the transfer of $1,000 per annum for four years.

TORONTO POSTMASTER

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has anyone yet been appointed as director of the post office in Toronto?

2. If so, by whom was he appointed, and where did he reside before?

[Mr. Belzile.]

3. Has the government adopted the policy of transferring heads of post offices in other cities to Toronto?

4. If so, when was such a policy inaugurated by the government instead of the principle of promotion?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

1 and 2. Mr. W. M. MacLean, postmaster, Hamilton, has been selected by the civil service commission for promotion to the position of postmaster, Toronto, as a result of a competition amongst employees of the Toronto postal district.

3 and 4. In adherence to the principle of promotion which requires the holding of competitions, it has been the policy for many years to advertise vacancies in the more important positions amongst employees of the postal district concerned and to promote the best qualified candidate.

PURCHASE OF FORD HOTEL BUILDING, MONTREAL

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Are negotiations now being conducted or have they been completed in connection with the purchase by the dominion government of the Ford hotel in Montreal?

2. If the sale has been completed what is the amount of the purchase price?

Mr. WINTERS:

1. Yes.

BUTTER

QUESTION AS TO POSSIBLE SHORTAGE NEXT WINTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. WHITE (Middlesex East): I wish to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the shift in production from butter to cheese, will he tell the house what plans, if any, have been made to protect the consumer from a butter shortage this coming winter?

Mr. ROBERT McCUBBIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): This matter will be taken into consideration, and an answer will be given later.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is the same answer as was given before.

Mr. GRAYDON: Little Sir Echo.

TRANSPORT

UNLICENSED PASSENGER SHIPS ON INLAND WATERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I regret that I did not have time to give him advance notice of it, but it was only since I came into the house this morning the matter was drawn to my attention by the secretary of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the fact that passengers are being carried on ships in Canada's inland waters without a passenger licence?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Representations have been made to me that ships have been operating through the canals without the necessary life-saving equipment. I have gone into some of these cases. I found in one instance that this is not being done. I am investigating the other cases which have been brought to my attention, and if the facts are in accordance with the charges made, action will be taken accordingly.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister referred to the carrying of life-saving equipment. I was aware of that, too; but I was asking more particularly about the question of passenger licences.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The complaints I received were with reference to carrying passengers in excess of the life-saving equipment. The question asked was answered in that light.

Mr. MacINNIS: Will the minister investigate the matter of passenger licences as well?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. If I remember correctly, this is the first instance where I have heard representations of that kind. The others were as suggested a minute ago.

SHORTAGE OF PERSONNEL ON SHIPPING ON INLAND WATERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport; since we are sitting in the mornings, there was no opportunity to give notice to the minister. My question comes from the same source as that of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), and has to do with ships sailing on Canada's inland waters. On those ships there has been a serious shortage of personnel. Has this been brought to the minister's attention; if so, what steps can he take to remedy the situation?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Instances have been brought to my attention, although I do not know whether they include the particular question the hon. member has in mind. I would not attempt, however, to reply to the hon. member's question at this time. I shall look into the matter.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does the minister not consider that undermanned ships are a menace to navigation of other ships which are fully manned? Is there not danger of collision?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Ships have to be manned by a certain crew. If they are undermanned, a breach of the regulations or of the act has been committed. If reports as to breaches of the act are brought to my attention and prove to be accurate, I shall deal with them accordingly.

OLEOMARGARINE

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, before the session closes, would the Attorney General (Mr. Ilsley), by means of reference to the Supreme Court of Canada, under the authority of the Supreme Court Act, give consideration to the question of oleomargarine, both as to its national and international implications? Perhaps the minister will take my question as a notice, and reply tomorrow.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Attorney General): All right.

INCOME TAX ACT

REQUEST FOR DISTRIBUTION OF PRINTED COPIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). As the minister is not in his seat, perhaps his parliamentary assistant will answer. When may we expect printed copies of the Income Tax Act? I encouraged the minister to have the legislation advanced, and it received second reading on Tuesday. I made inquiries late this morning, but thus far I have been unable to obtain a copy.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I understand the bill has had first reading. If it has, then it is only a matter of printing.

Mr. KNOWLES: The bill has had second reading.

Mr. MAYHEW: I shall look into the matter and find out why the bill has not been distributed. It should have been.

Mr. GRAYDON: The farmers would like to have a look at it.

An hon. MEMBER: The election is over.

[Later, in committee of the whole:]

Mr. MAYHEW: This morning the hon. member for Cumberland asked a question in reference to printed copies of the income tax bill not being available. I want to point out that it is now in the boxes of hon. members. It is a lengthy document, and that was the reason for the delay.

EDUCATION

QUESTION AS TO GRANT FOR OPERATION OF SCHOOL AT CHURCHILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RONALD MOORE (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport, of which I have given notice. Have officials of the department of education in Manitoba communicated with the Department of Transport or any other department of the federal government requesting an increase in the educational grant for the operation of a school at Churchill?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): I cannot speak for any other department but my own. So far as the Department of Transport is concerned, no application has been made for a grant with reference to education.

NATIONAL BATTLEFIELDS

QUEBEC—PAYMENT TO COMMISSION OF $1,000,000 OVER PERIOD OF TEN YEARS

Mr. GLEASON BELZILE (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 339, to amend an act respecting the national battlefields at Quebec.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Payment of $100,000 a year for ten years authorized.

Mr. CHURCH: This is a most laudable bill. I saw the battlefields many years ago, when the fields and the monuments were in a state of decay. The government has done good work in the past few years in reconditioning these battlefields, and I commend them for what has been done. Canada has not shown the gratitude she owes to her heroes of the past.

I am pleased to see this action to increase the grant to preserve these national monuments, so that they may impress properly the new settlers who come up the St. Lawrence when they first arrive in Canada. As they pass these historic sites they will learn something of the other people who came to Canada in the early days.

I should like to see the principle of the bill applied in the Niagara district. A former Ontario government did good work in reconditioning the battlefields of the war of 1812-14, in which important engagements took place in the Niagara district. There is still, however, a great deal of work to be done there. I hope the government will continue its present policy and make it national in scope. This work of improvement should be a national project, so that we may properly honour the heroes who have served us.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Acquisition of certain lands authorized.

Mr. FULTON: This is an unusual section, inasmuch as it gives notice in advance that the government, or a government agency, intends to buy a certain tract of land. Normally this would give opportunity to speculators to get in ahead, and then hold up government purchasers for a big price. Have any steps been taken to prevent the government's being held up in this way?

Mr. BELZILE: No expenditure is involved in this transaction, other than the normal payment for the necessary deeds and documents. We will acquire this land from the national harbours board, and it will be only a matter of a simple transfer.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the parliamentary assistant considered my suggestion of the other evening, namely, to take in some land at the mouth of the Montmorency river, at which point there was severe fighting between Wolfe and Montcalm; also the land on the isle of Orleans where Wolfe's camps were located, and where the lines must be still visible, and at Point Levis, where further lines were established? Is it the intention to include all these historic sites for preservation?

Mr. BELZILE: As the hon. member for Davenport knows, most of that part situated east of the city of Quebec, alongside the Montmorency river, is low and marshy. That was the site of Wolfe's first disembarkation. On account of the low and marshy land I do not believe it would be practicable; on the contrary it would be difficult and expensive, to beautify those grounds. I understand that higher up the river and above the falls the fields are now occupied by a golf course and other developments of the kind; the grounds are well cared for, and cairns have been erected to commemorate what happened there. They were put up by the historical society of Quebec.

Mr. MacNICOL: What about Ile d'Orleans and Point Levis?

Mr. BELZILE: That is farming country, and I do not know what could be done there.

Mr. FRASER: If the commission are doing any repair work on this property I hope they will not make a mess of it as the national parks commission did at Fort Prince of Wales at Churchill. An old gateway there had fallen down, and they erected a new one of concrete instead of using the old stone with which the other gateway had been built. It spoiled the whole thing.

Mr. BELZILE: I can assure the hon. member that this is a beautiful park that is well kept. This commission endeavours to duplicate what was there before.

Mr. LOCKHART: Where does federal jurisdiction end and provincial jurisdiction begin in connection with these battlefields?

Mr. BELZILE: The act of 1908 contained a provision under which any province that contributed $100.000 to the fund would be entitled to appoint one commissioner. The provinces of Quebec and Ontario each contributed $100,000 to the fund, and under section 1 of the act they were entitled to appoint one commissioner, while the federal government appointed seven commissioners. The commissioner for Ontario is Hon. William H. Price.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): The government is to be commended for keeping up this memorial and agreeing to pay from the consolidated revenue fund certain sums of money for its development. I understand that the commission consists of seven members.

Mr. BELZILE: Seven federal and two provincial; nine in all.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Could not this commission handle other historic sites across Canada, or are their activities confined to this site in Quebec? There are many historic sites across Canada, such as those commemorating the Red River rebellion, which should be kept up.

Mr. BELZILE: This commission was appointed to look after the battlefields of Quebec. Other historic sites in Canada are looked after by different boards or commissions.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Is there not an unnecessary expenditure of money when the one commission could handle all the sites across the country?

Mr. BELZILE: A fund was raised to commemorate the centenary of the founding of Quebec by Champlain in 1608. Private subscriptions amounted to some $468,000, and the dominion government added $300,000 in 1908, and the provincial governments of Ontario and Quebec added another $200,000. There was some money left over from the cost of the celebration, and the commission was set up and acquired the battlefields of Quebec in order to overcome the neglect of the previous years.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Is this commission responsible to the governor in council?

Mr. BELZILE: Oh, yes—to this parliament.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Is the property which it is intended to purchase contiguous to the present site?

Mr. BELZILE: It is the actual site of the battle of the Plains of Abraham in 1759 and of the battle of Ste. Foy in 1760.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): The new property will be just an extension?

Mr. BELZILE: The new property is being bought because a road which ran along the boundary of the park was moved by the municipality of Sillery. This left about 60,000 square feet of land between the old Champlain road and the new road. There was a bad curve there which was straightened out. The commission felt that this land should not be left in the hands of the municipality, because it might be sold to someone who would erect a building and spoil the appearance of the park.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not opposed to this bill, but after listening to the discussion it seems to me that this is another example of the national government catering to the provinces which might have $100,000 to enable them to come into this national commission. If the bill were to set up a commission to deal with all of Canada, and money were to be spent for the development of historic sites, I would say it was all right, but I do not like the idea of putting a gun to the head of a province and asking for a contribution of $100,000 so that they may come within the scope of this national commission. It is not a national commission; it is a commission to look after historic sites in the two central provinces from a national point of view. That is what it means.

Personally I do not like the idea of perpetuating or glorifying war. I do not like the idea of keeping before our children memories of battles that were fought, of people who died in battle and of victories we were supposed to have won. You do not win anything in a war. As long as we keep reminding our people of war by monuments of this kind; as long as we continue to glorify war and perpetuate the idea of war, we will forget that no one ever wins anything from war. There is nothing to glorify.

I sat on the reconstruction committee in 1942 along with many members of this house. Representations were made by people from every section of the country and every social stratum as to the rehabilitation of this country following war. The consensus of opinion of that committee was that after the second world war was over there were to be no more stone monuments to commemorate it. The whole house endorsed the committee's recommendation that the kind of monument to be erected should be a cultural centre in every section of Canada to commemorate those who had laid down their lives in the preservation of freedom. I remember hearing representations from the library association, representing all Canada, that a national library should be established, and today in Ottawa a national convention is being held at which that very subject will be discussed. It disturbs me to find how short are the memories of the members of this house. Everybody was agreed then on the kind of monument we should erect, but now, only a few years later, all that seems to have been forgotten. Now we have before us a bill setting up a commission, which is national in name only, since it relates to only two provinces and ignores entirely the principle that was laid down by the reconstruction committee of 1942. These battlefields tend to perpetuate war. The more money you spend on this kind of thing, the more strongly people will feel that there must be other wars. But apparently the government has adopted the policy of catering to a province which can put up $100,000 and is setting up a national commission which will be paid for by the taxpayers of all Canada; and mind you, every province will contribute its proportionate share, although they are not all included in this scheme. In my own part of the country there are many historic sites, but to have anything done about them you have almost to use a miner's rod to search out who is responsible for caring for them. I wish good luck to Quebec, but the principle of perpetuating war by monuments and that kind of thing is contrary to my way of thinking.

I am disappointed that the recommendations of the reconstruction committee with regard to the development of cultural centres across this country as war memorials are not being carried out by this bill. The bill rather indicates to me that we are going back to where we left off, educating our people in the glorification of war.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am afraid that my hon. friend is not familiar with the purpose of the vote before the house. I attended the tercentenary celebration of the founding of Quebec by the great Champlain, and I know that those who were in charge of the program thought that it would be a sad mistake to leave what is now a very beautiful park in Quebec city, which embraces the battlefield of the Plains of Abraham as well as the battlefield of Ste. Foy, to be exploited by anybody and everybody. From the beginning I have been a supporter of this park. As the parliamentary assistant has very well said the purpose of this vote is to acquire additional land to complete the outline of the park, land which might otherwise be acquired by private individuals who would exploit it, so that it would be of no benefit whatever to that great park. It is a magnificent park, Mr. Chairman, and is very well looked after. There are only two monuments there, one to Wolfe, and the one at Ste. Foy, which suggest that the park was once a battlefield.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South was not fair. He apparently forgot Louisburg, Nova Scotia, where the government took over a very large acreage, restored the old lands, and made a great park out of the territory adjacent to the ruins of old Fort Louisbourg. The same can be said of Fort Beausejour. My hon. friend has been there, I am sure; for he could hardly pass it without going in. All that land around Beausejour has been acquired and made into a beautiful park. People go there to see the museum and admire the park. I am in accord with that, Mr. Chairman. I do not believe in forgetting the past. I think we should hold more to the past than we have been doing.

Some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Assiniboia were in order, but he did not seem to know that all our historic sites are looked after by the historic sites and monuments board. No matter where you go in the west you will find monuments erected by the board. They are erecting a number of them now.

Mr. GILLIS: Why not put them all under one commission?

Mr. MacNICOL: The national battlefields commission at Quebec was established long before the historic sites and monuments board. I am not arguing that all these sites should come under one body. I am arguing that this is a sound vote, because it will take out of private circulation a piece of property which should be added to a great national park in a city that is growing very rapidly; it will eventually have half a million population and will need every foot of that park.

Mr. McIVOR: I am sorry that I cannot agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. FRASER: You ought to be glad you can't.

Mr. McIVOR: I read in the old Book that Moses set up a stone and said: By this stone ye shall know of the victory that Israel won over the Egyptians. It would be a sad day for Canada if our historic sites should be overgrown with weeds. These things tell their tale, and I do not think this money is badly spent.

Mr. FERGUSON: I certainly cannot agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South. Our battlefields in this country show to coming generations what the veterans of the past did to make this country what it is. It would be a shame to allow the Plains of Abraham, Queenston Heights and other battlefields throughout Canada to become overgrown with weeds. Queenston Heights commemorates the days when the French and British fought side by side in the defence of this country. To keep these historic sites in a proper state of preservation certainly will not antagonize the people of the United States, but will remind them of how a handful of people in this country preserved their homes and their freedom. Without such monuments the coming generations would have little to remind them of what the pioneers in Canada did and suffered and died for in order to make this country what it is today.

I do not believe the hon. member for Cape Breton South wants all of these historic sites obliterated. They should be turned into the finest parks we can possibly make, so that our people will realize that wars do not help us very much. If it is necessary to fight a war for an ideal, whether it is won or lost, the heroes of that war on both sides should be commemorated in a proper manner.

Mr. GILLIS: By remembering the ideal, and doing something about it.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I partly agree with my colleague from Nova Scotia, but I have to separate from him if he says that the historic sites should not be preserved and historic monuments set up. I feel that there has been some discrimination against the historic sites of the maritime provinces. I believe preference is given to the city of Quebec. I am not opposed to this bill; I am in favour of it. I am in favour of what the minister has said, but I wish to point out that in the maritime provinces we have historic sites of great importance to this country. One of these sites is Fort Louisbourg, in the constituency of the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond. Others are Fort Beausejour, in Westmorland county, adjoining my own constituency; Fort Cumberland, in Cumberland county, and the oldest site of all, Fort Anne, at Annapolis Royal. These sites have been commemorated and preserved to an extent, but it was done belatedly by the federal authorities. A museum has been established at Fort Beausejour, another at Annapolis, and one at Louisburg. I want to pay tribute to Viscount Bennett who gave his support and built the museum at Beausejour during the years of the depression. That museum was erected at the instance of that great Canadian, Doctor J. C. Webster, C.M.G., now chairman of the historical sites and monuments commission. He has done a magnificent work for Canada. The museum was established and filled to overflowing with collections from our historical past. They are now appealing to the government for an extension to the building. They have already had one addition, but they want further space. It is most unfortunate, Mr. Chairman, that this work was not done a hundred years before it was. If it had not been proceeded with by the late Viscount Bennett and Doctor Webster I doubt whether it would ever have been established, and whether many of these priceless relics of the past would have been preserved. I am in favour of this bill, and I want the minister and the government to give further consideration to the extension of these historic sites in the maritime provinces and give further grants to the museums in these three places to which I have referred in order that such relics of the past that we have may be preserved for all time, and that whatever further relics can be secured may be housed and the historic sites commission made responsible for their preservation.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to say that the inscription on the memorial on the Plains of Abraham should be in all the history books of this country. I shall never forget what Macaulay said about the principle embodied in this bill. He said:

> The various tombs of the captains have been sought and repaired and embellished. It is impossible not to respect the sentiment which manifests itself in these tokens. It is a sentiment which appeals to the higher and purer part of human nature and adds not a little to the strength of states. A people that takes no pride in the noble achievements of remote ancestors will never achieve anything worthy to be remembered.

I commend to the government that principle enunciated by Macaulay and express the hope that all the battlefields and historic sites in Canada will be marked out and honoured.

CRIMINAL CODE

INCREASE OF PERCENTAGES RETAINED FROM PARI-MUTUEL BETTING POOLS

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General, for the Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 335, to amend the criminal code.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

[Mr. Black (Cumberland).]

On section 1—Percentage deduction retained by the association.

Mr. CHURCH: We passed a bill the other night about horses consumed for meat. Is there any necessity for this one now? Since they have eaten all the horses, there will be no further need for racetracks.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I am told there are a few left.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Railway service—

500. Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals—construction and improvement of terminal facilities—capital, $3,547,000.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Perhaps I can clear up some of the points that were left in abeyance last evening.

The hon. member for Peterborough West asked some questions with reference to lots 122, 123 and 124, concession 1, west Yonge street. He felt that the sale price in comparison with the purchase price a few years previously was high. I have inquired into the details of the sale and I find that these lots, 122, 123 and 124, concession 1 west of Yonge street, township of East Gwillimbury, are comprised in a parcel of marshland 400 feet wide by 2,400 feet long, 21 acres in extent. This parcel of land was purchased as the site for a proposed channel connecting the east and west branches of the Holland river. The property is low-lying marshland of no value to the department and of little value to anyone else unless reclaimed by diking and pumping. This parcel was advertised, together with other parcels, but no tender being received, the sale price was set by negotiation.

There was a question with regard to weeds, and I assured my hon. friend the member for Muskoka-Ontario that I would look into the matter. I have a statement which I think will meet with his approval. I did not refer the matter to the Department of Justice but to counsel in my own department and the statement, I think, meets the position.

In the first place, there is no statutory obligation to cut weeds growing in navigable waters. Second, the Department of Transport has hitherto cut weeds in the main channels of the Trent canal system, and the department will continue this practice. In the third place, in the case of other channels than main channels of the Trent canal system, where weeds impede the navigation of small boats the department will consider in each case whether it is in the public interest to make an expenditure for cutting weeds. Fourth, the Department of Transport has no responsibility with respect to weed cutting in navigable waters other than in the canals under its jurisdiction.

There was some question last night in connection with the item which provided for the lightship Lurcher, and I was asked why we had not purchased corvettes from War Assets Corporation. There are several technical reasons why corvettes and minesweepers would not answer the purpose. I have them listed here:

The conversion of corvettes and minesweepers was carefully considered by technical officers of the department and they were found to be unsuitable as lighthouse supply and buoy vessels. Here are some of the characteristics which must be present on supply and buoy vessels if they are to function efficiently:

1. Wall-sided bow in order to approach buoys without causing damage.

2. Sea kindliness in order to be able to lift buoys in fairly rough weather.

3. A long well-deck forward and near the waterline in order to facilitate lifting of buoys and providing area for storage of buoys, also anchors and chains.

4. Considerable cargo capacity.

5. Shell plates and scantlings in general of rugged construction.

The above requirements are not found in corvettes, which were built for a special purpose; the full form, the general lay-out, their light construction and excessive power make them unsuitable vessels for such alterations.

Corvettes, on account of their size, are not suitable for use as lightships; and minesweepers, in addition to being overpowered, are not of suitable hull shape for use as lightships on exposed stations. The lightship must have much more freeboard than an ordinary vessel and be of a special form so that it can stay on station in all weathers. Furthermore, the ship requires to be fitted with a large amount of special equipment. The main propulsion unit on a lightship vessel is relatively small, thus providing the extra space required for the special equipment. In addition, the lightship requires large bunker and fresh-water capacity so as to minimize the necessity of constant attention and the frequent delivery of supply while on station.

Minesweeper hulls, in view of their shape and general lay-out, could not be held at anchor on exposed stations.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I support the principle of this vote for the car ferry and terminals and all the rest of it, of which $1,360,000 is a revote this year, and I support it because I have always advocated the confederation principle of each for all and all for each. No doubt what is for the good of the maritimes is for the good of the rest of the country. I have always been a believer in that policy, and have never faltered in that belief.

I would point out to the minister, however, that the principle of this vote should be extended to other parts of the country. I could discuss questions in connection with two or three other items but I do not want to take up the time of the committee unduly. We have an old boat, the Northumberland, which came from the same place that is being serviced by this new car ferry. It has been operating in the Niagara district, and when I visited that part of the province last week end I saw people lined up at the station waiting for trains. We need a car ferry to take care of the large volume of traffic that is moving from the Niagara district to Toronto, and there is need also for a car ferry to serve the lake Erie district. Port Dover, Port Huron and Port Stanley are idle because of lack of car ferry service across lake Erie. The provision of an adequate car ferry service in that part of the province would greatly improve the coal situation in western Ontario, and I trust that when the recess comes the minister will seriously get down to that program. The old boat which has been serving the Niagara district for the last thirty years or more was sent up to us because it was not good enough for the maritimes.

The principle of this vote should certainly be extended. In my opinion the time has come for a maritime commission on the great lakes, because what is good for the maritimes or for Ontario or for western Canada is good for the rest of the provinces. I urge the minister to study the situation. I have visited United States ports along these lakes and I can assure the minister that we are miles behind them in marine services on the upper great lakes.

Mr. MacNAUGHT: I wish to make a few remarks about transportation problems at Borden and Tormentine. In the first place, I wish to compliment the minister and his department on the excellent motor vessel Q.S.M.V. Abegweit. It is without doubt the best icebreaker in the world. Last winter, although the ice was not abnormally heavy, it was the usual kind of season and the ferry was able to keep to its schedules with reasonable regularity. This is commendable, and I am sure our winter transportation problems are solved. But we still have a bottleneck at Borden and Tormentine. I submit that as long as we have a ferry operating on two services—by that I mean operating for railway and operating for automobile and bus traffic—we shall continue to have difficulties. If the trains are late, the ferry must wait to take over freight cars, express cars, mail cars and passengers. Consequently long lines of automobiles are delayed in the heat at Borden or Tormentine and often must wait one or two hours before crossing.

I believe this bottleneck would be lessened if we had an auxiliary ferry. An auxiliary ferry would not cost very much, because it would not operate in the wintertime and would not need to be built as strongly as the present Abegweit. If we had such an auxiliary steamer it could operate on schedule and tourists or other persons wishing to cross over in automobiles or trucks would know with reasonable certainty when the crossing could be expected and would not be there waiting many hours in the heat for a crossing. This would materially help our tourist industry and would also help the export of products of the farm and sea.

I was pleased that the minister was able to have the railway car deck planked to permit trucks to drive off and on under their own power. During the past autumn and this spring trucks loaded with perishable products often had to wait from one to two hours for a crossing. If you had a load of smelts or lobsters going to New York, Boston or Philadelphia, this loss of time was important and often discouraged the shipping of such products to those markets.

I urge upon the minister the necessity of exploring the possibilities of procuring an auxiliary steamship solely for the purpose of carrying automobiles and trucks. I am sure that if such a steamer is available, and if the docks can be made to accommodate it, our transport problems will be much lessened in the future. I would ask the minister to give this matter his best consideration.

[Mr. MacNaught.]

Mr. FRASER: When we started on this item this morning the minister made a statement in regard to the property on the Trent canal that was sold. I referred to lots 122, 123 and 124, concession 1, west Yonge street. He said he would have to have diking done, and so on, to take care of that. This is excellent truck garden land. The property adjoining it cannot be bought today for $500 an acre. I still say that the government should have got more than $5 an acre for this land, and I will continue to say it because the advice I have received from people who know is that the property right next to it cannot be bought for $500 an acre.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Why did they not tender?

Mr. FRASER: They never had a chance to tender.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, they did.

Mr. FRASER: Where did you advertise?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The lots were advertised.

Mr. FRASER: Where?

Mr. CHEVRIER: In the press.

Mr. FRASER: What press? My advice is that this property was not advertised.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman is free to make his statement if he wants to.

Mr. FRASER: I have made it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am making the statement now that the price obtained for these lots was a reasonable one. We advertised, and there were no bidders. When there are no bidders, the practice is to sell by negotiation.

Mr. FRASER: All right. I am asking whether it was advertised.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It was advertised in the press—the Toronto press.

Mr. FRASER: In what press was it advertised? That is something I cannot find out. I have tried to find out.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Just a minute, Mr. Chairman. In the return that was tabled on each one of the lots sold, with the exception of lots 122, 123 and 124, it is set out that the sale was made by tender.

Mr. FRASER: And there was only one tender.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There was only one tender in connection with the property other than lots 122, 123 and 124. For them no tender at all was submitted.

Mr. FRASER: There was just an offer to buy, but it was not advertised.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The information I have is that lots 122, 123 and 124 were advertised along with the other parcels. If my hon. friend wants to maintain that this parcel was not advertised, I am saying it was, on the information I have received from my officers.

Mr. FRASER: In what papers was it advertised?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I will find out and tell the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FRASER: All right.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. The item before the committee now is the Prince Edward Island car terminals.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is an omnibus item.

Mr. FRASER: As soon as we went into committee this morning the minister made a statement. I have the right to answer that statement and say what I like about it in reply to what the minister had to say, irrespective of what item we are on.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. That was with the consent of the committee. The minister was just giving information that last night he promised to give. The item before the committee now is the car ferry in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. FRASER: Yes, but we have a problem to discuss.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I would also point out to the hon. gentleman that when he is discussing this matter he is supposed to address the Chair.

Mr. FRASER: I am addressing the Chair.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member for Peterborough West is absolutely right, Mr. Chairman. This particular item was held up last night in order to give the minister an opportunity to reply to both the hon. member for Peterborough West and the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. When the minister made his statement I assumed that he was replying to the questions which had been asked by those two hon. members last evening. Therefore if they are not in order, this other item must come back before the committee.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is not correct to say that the item was held up by the question asked by the hon. member for Peterborough West. I have no objection to discussing the matter. I promised to get this information, and I have obtained it. I do not intend to object to what the hon. member is doing. If he wants to make a speech on it, let him go ahead.

Mr. FRASER: No, I do not want to make a speech. I just asked for information.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I will get the information.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I commend the minister for the work that is being done in constructing the car ferries and building the terminals serving Prince Edward Island. The people in that province have waited many long years for this. It is pleasing to know that the new ferry steamers operated so satisfactorily during the winter.

Before this item of $3,547,000 passes I should like to have some further information from the minister. How much of the vote is payable on account of the new car ferry? What is the total cost of the car ferry up to the present time? I should also like to know how much of the appropriation is for construction of the terminals on the Cape Tormentine and Borden sides, and what the total expenditures are for the building of these terminals. Will the minister also indicate whether this appropriation will satisfactorily complete the terminals at both landing points?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The total estimated cost of the terminals at Tormentine and Borden was $6,622,000. That estimate was made about a year ago, and had to be revised again this year because of certain increases. It is now fixed at $6,877,900. The hon. gentleman knows of course that all this work is under the supervision of the Canadian National Railways. They are acting as agents for the government. Thus far $3,330,000, including $98,000, has been spent. That money was spent last year and a portion, $3,547,000, is to be spent this year. Of the amount of the estimates, $1,360,000 is a revote. The Canadian Dredge and Dock have the contract for the work at Tormentine, and it is about sixty-four per cent complete.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Is that a lump sum contract, or a cost plus contract?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Oh, it is not cost plus. I would think there is an escalator clause in the contract. I understand the Canadian National Railways have proceeded in that manner. I must say however that in connection with one of these points—I am not sure whether it was Tormentine or Borden—we were not able to get a contractor to do the work. There were no answers to our advertisements, so we had to proceed by way of negotiation.

At Borden the contractor is Foundation Maritime Limited. They have completed a little more than fifty per cent of their work.

It is expected that the Tormentine terminal should be completed by about the middle of May or June, 1949, and it is expected that the work at Borden will be completed at about the same time.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): At what place was the department unable to secure a contractor?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am speaking from memory, and for that reason I do not wish to be held too closely to what I say. I believe, however, it was for the work at Borden. The department advertised but received no bids. This was a time when material costs were high.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I understood from the minister that the work was proceeding at Borden.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Oh, yes; we finally gave a contract. But we had difficulty in getting a contractor to do the work.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): What was the name of the contractor?

Mr. CHEVRIER: At Borden the contractors are Foundation Maritime Limited and Canadian Dredge and Dock Company. The Canadian Dredge and Dock Company have the contract for the work outside the jetty, including the extension and filling, and inside the jetty the construction is being done by Foundation Maritime Limited.

The hon. member asked as to the final cost of the Prince Edward Island car ferry. Again I speak from memory, but I believe it is a little over $7 million. I would not like to say whether it is $7,200,000 or $7,100,000.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Will the appropriation now before the committee complete the terminals at Tormentine and Borden?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed it will. This year we are going to spend $3,500,000, and we have already spent $3,300,000. That makes the revised estimate of $6,800,000 which I gave a few moments ago.

Mr. GILLIS: Would the minister mind putting a little information on the record? In answer to the hon. member for Cumberland the minister said that the contract under discussion was cost-plus, but that it contained an escalator clause. What is a contract with an escalator clause? What is the difference between the two?

Mr. CHEVRIER: A cost-plus contract, as I understood it during the war years, is a contract which provides the payment of a certain fee for the work done, plus cost. To the contract are annexed memoranda of the items of cost which may be charged. There may be twenty-five or there may be ten items of cost. The escalator clause does not include a series of cost items, but it does provide that if there is an increase, for instance, in wages and materials after the contract has been entered into, such increase may be charged up in addition to the fixed amount of the contract, always subject to audit.

Mr. GILLIS: In effect there is not much difference.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Oh, yes.

Mr. GILLIS: If that is so, why does the Department of Public Works hold up a job every year—and I think it is still being held up—for a dry dock at Saint John, New Brunswick, because they did not want a contract with an escalator clause? Is the escalator regulated to work both ways, or does it just go up? Is it regulated so that it will work the other way? My understanding is that a contract is based upon an estimate; then if you are out one way or another in your figures, or if there is additional cost, such as wages or the like, the escalator clause provides that you can revise the figure. But where a contract is let in which a large amount of money is involved, does the escalator clause permit departmental officials to turn the machine downward so as to protect public funds if it develops that the estimate was too high?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The contract in which there is an escalator clause proceeds on the assumption of a basic amount. If wages rise above that, the escalator clause provides for an increase. There is no provision for decrease.

Mr. GILLIS: It is not only a matter of wages, though?

Mr. McLURE: I was out of the chamber for a few moments and I did not hear anything that was said under this vote. I wish to say a few words about the ferry system between Borden and Tormentine.

As an outsider I know that there was great difficulty in getting people to tender for the contract work on the Borden side, but the work that has been going on for the past six months under a cost-plus contract is proceeding most satisfactorily. Some hon. members may feel that the vote from time to time for the Borden-Tormentine ferry involves a large amount of money. In actual fact it is only a small amount for the service which the island province requires. Prince Edward Island is the only island province in the dominion, and to the people down there transportation is vital. Over sixty-five per cent of them make their living from agricultural pursuits. During the war our province made a real record in production of the sinews of war, and the farmers are still producing.

For the benefit of some hon. members who may feel that the expenses of our transportation system are high, I should like to place some figures on the record. Let me point out at the beginning that these expenditures are due us under the contract made with us in 1873. The freight handled on the Borden-Tormentine ferry is one of the best-paying freight-handling operations of the Canadian National Railways system.

I prepared these figures a few days ago, and I had to take those for the month of April. Outward freight figures for that month show that 1,415 cars of potatoes were ferried in April, 1948, from Prince Edward Island to the mainland, or almost 500 cars more than in 1947. The total cars ferried to the end of April for the crop season was 7,046. Practically all of these were for long-haul shipments—the most beneficial from the point of view of the railways. But that was not the only freight ferried in April. In addition there were 20 carloads of eggs, 75 carloads of livestock, 20 carloads of meat, 15 carloads of pulpwood—and ninety per cent of all this was for long-haul carload shipments. Besides these larger movements there were many smaller ones.

I have been referring to the outward freight, but the inward freight is also long-haul freight. There were 119 cars of coal; 40 cars of hay; 24 cars of automobiles; 175 carloads of fertilizer; 245 carloads of flour and feed; 40 carloads of cement; 14 carloads of fruit; 18 carloads of soft drinks—because, as you know, ours is a prohibition province; 15 carloads of sugar and 6 carloads of molasses. In both inward and outward freight there were over 2,500 cars during the month.

When someone gets up and says that this is a large amount to pay for a steamer, I say: No; we should really have another steamer to assist in carrying our freight. I am not going to urge that at the present time, but I do want to say to the committee that the outgoing and incoming freight that has been produced is simply wonderful for Prince Edward Island. Nothing is too good for our farmers in the way of transportation, and that is why from time to time we advocate better truck service. At the present time the truck service is not what it should be for the exporting of farm products.

The minister said the other day that they were going to plank at least part of the deck of the Abegweit, either with wood or with steel, so that trucks could run on under their own power. I submit that there should be no freight charge over and above what it costs to haul the same freight by truck over a highway. This question has been debated at many sessions, and we did succeed in having truck charges reduced by about fifty per cent. But they should be reduced so that the terms of union in 1873 will be met, and one of those terms was that the ferry should be treated simply as a highway.

Can the minister give the committee definite assurance that the Abegweit will be ready for service before July 1?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The information I have is that the planking will take about fourteen days and that the vessel should be in operation in plenty of time to look after the tourist traffic.

Mr. MacNICOL: As one who has advocated an improvement in the service between the mainland and the island, I want to express my appreciation of the minister's efforts in this connection. He visited the area and made his own investigation, as others have done, and it is pleasant to observe his interest. When I was there last summer I examined, as I had done before, both terminals, and I would like to know whether they would consider a boat that might be specially designed for truck and automobile service. I am thinking of a ship something like the large ones on the great lakes which ferry only trucks and motorcars. The tourist traffic to the island is increasing greatly, as it should, but it will be retarded unless the tourist can get on and off the island more rapidly than he can today.

The facilities at the Wood Island end are not exactly what they should be, and I am sure that if the minister goes there he will decide to improve them. At the Borden end it should be possible to have cars get on and off the boat more quickly. The present ferry is good, but too large to permit this kind of entry and exit. I strongly urge upon the minister that he consider building a boat specially designed for motorcars and trucks which could run in between the trips of the larger boat. When I examined the docks I could not make up my mind that they would be suitable for a low-level motorcar and truck traffic ship.

Item agreed to.

501. Strait of Canso—Transportation improvements and facilities—capital (revote $250,000), $500,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: I read in the newspapers a report that new ferries were to be provided. I am not particularly opposing that, but I think ferries are outmoded for this particular area. The minister has shown a good deal of vision, and I should like him to consider eliminating the question of a ferry. There is no place for car ferries in these modern times, especially across a strait of that width. They were all right years ago, but in these days they are too slow. They retard traffic and increase costs beyond what they should be.

This is an ideal location for a bridge. I have surveyed many large bridges, but perhaps I could mention some that I have not surveyed. I am going to try to get down to see the gigantic bridge at Sydney, Australia, which spans the great harbour entrance there. There is no reason why there could not be a similar bridge across the strait of Canso. The minister frequently goes to New York, and he must have seen the gigantic bridge across Hell Gate. There are two giant bridges at San Francisco which span a much greater distance than would have to be spanned across the strait of Canso. At St. Louis there are great bridges across the Mississippi, and they are planning the construction of six more. They are also planning the building of two more very large bridges at San Francisco.

A bridge increases traffic; a ferry retards traffic. Of course if there is no ferry or bridge, there is no traffic. In this day and generation a ferry in that area is altogether outmoded. I strongly recommend to the minister that he keep before him the desirability of bridging that strait. It would not have to be an exceptionally long bridge; I doubt if it would be as long as the bridge at Quebec. It certainly would speed up traffic considerably between Sydney and Montreal and Toronto, and would pay for itself by the reduction in freight charges that would accrue over the years. It would make for expansion of all business in that part of Nova Scotia. I am not opposed to the vote, but I am opposed to the continued use of ferries in preference to bridges.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not going to make a speech on this subject; I think I have made enough of them. A bridge across the strait of Canso is one of the main issues in the province of Nova Scotia today. In these estimates there is an appropriation of $250,000 to improve the existing ferry facilities. To those who think the government really means something in continuing to survey the possibilities of a bridge across that strait, it looks strange to see such a large amount spent on improving the present facilities.

I questioned the minister in the house a short time ago as to the progress that is being made by the commission of engineers appointed by his department, and when he expects to receive their report. His reply was, the latter part of July. That was recorded in the press, and I have received several letters about it since. Throughout the province of Nova Scotia organizations have been formed—non-political organizations, religious societies, veterans' bodies, and the like—which meet all over the province weekly. Their purpose is to press upon the government the necessity of improving the transportation facilities between the mainland and Cape Breton island, which would also do much to relieve the unemployment problem. The people down there appreciate the fact—and I think it is not generally appreciated throughout Canada—that one-third of Canada's basic steel, and perhaps half of all the coal produced in Canada, is produced on the island of Cape Breton. Yet these products have to be dragged out from Cape Breton island by the present outmoded transportation facilities. I know the minister realizes that, but apparently he is tangled up with incompetent engineers or with the treasury branch.

Mr. KNOWLES: Perhaps both.

Mr. GILLIS: Maybe both. I am continually receiving letters and resolutions asking what the government is going to do about this bridge across the strait of Canso. I do not bother the minister any more with them, because I feel sorry for him. I feel that he would have built it long ago, if left to himself, if only to stop me and the hon. member for Davenport from talking. The letters I get are to this effect: What is the government doing about it? Is it trying to fool us? They have been making borings for a long time, and they know how deep the water is; they have had several engineers' reports. I might say, Mr. Chairman, that I received a return on this subject that would fill this desk; yet in spite of all the information the government has, it appointed an engineering commission to make further investigations. The letters I receive go on to ask: Why is the government continuing to spend half a million dollars on improving present facilities if it is really in earnest about building this bridge? They feel that the government does not intend to build it, or that something is wrong somewhere.

Another point they make is this: It is strange that the minister expects to get a report from his engineers only after the house closes. Why could not this engineering commission make a report now, with the information already available, information which has been gathered over the years? I personally think that the engineers could have come to a conclusion before the end of July. Anyway I have promised myself that towards the end of July I shall come to Ottawa and I would like to meet the minister at that time and those who are going to finalize the engineering report; I am sufficiently interested in the matter to do that. I suggest to the minister that if he hustles up that report it will relieve the minds of the people of Nova Scotia; for they are beginning to mistrust the intentions of the government in spending money on the survey of a project which apparently they have no intention of going ahead with, because at the same time they are spending a large amount of money to improve the existing transportation facilities.

We were discussing here this morning an item of $3,500,000 for a car ferry for Prince Edward Island. Anyone who has travelled in the United States knows that if the Americans were in this country they would have had a tunnel between those islands long ago. It is in our own interest to do that. But it is a dead horse in this house so far as I am concerned. While I have a great deal of confidence in the minister himself, I am beginning to look behind the scenes. I think he is being pulled hither and yon. I would ask him before this house closes to make some statement on the building of a bridge across the strait of Canso, so that I can go home and reassure the people of Nova Scotia that everybody is not dealing dishonestly with them but that there is some evidence of going ahead with this very necessary national improvement. And it is a national improvement, because it would affect not only Cape Breton but everything clean through from Cape Breton to Moncton. The transportation facilities on the C.N.R. are good from Montreal to Moncton, but not so good from Moncton to Sydney. They need overhauling. I trust that the minister will make a statement before the house closes that will be sufficiently definite for me to be able to say something definite to the people back home.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I think I can—

Mr. ISNOR: Before the minister replies, Mr. Chairman, I wish to add my voice in support of the representations made by the last two hon. members in regard to the Canso strait project. I do not propose to speak at any length, because the minister is going to reply and he is quite familiar with the subject which has been placed before the committee by the hon member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Davenport on more than one occasion, as well as by other hon. members from the maritimes.

I would ask the minister whether he is familiar with the brief presented by the transportation commission of the maritime board of trade with regard to the proposed bridge or causeway, and if so, to deal with the various points outlined in that brief. I would also ask him whether he has ever read the representations made before the rehabilitation committee of this house about three or four years ago by the then premier of Nova Scotia, the Hon. A. S. MacMillan. The brief goes into the matter fully and deals with the report prepared and presented by Mr. D. W. McLachlan, of the Canadian National Railways, whom we all recognize as an authority and a man of vast experience. I would ask the minister to deal with the figures presented by Mr. McLachlan, and not to stop at the boring surveys which are now under way.

I do not always agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I did not agree with him yesterday, when I think he was entirely out of his field; but today he is dealing with something of which he has an intimate knowledge, and something which is directly connected with that part of the country. We are all interested in the development of Cape Breton and the mainland, as well as the rest of Canada. We want to see steps taken which will bring about a greater opportunity in Cape Breton for the development of the coal and steel industries. It is a well known fact that the shipment of coal is handicapped because of the lack of proper facilities. That has all been set out. The realignment of the Canadian National Railway tracks to provide necessary and suitable haulage is all set out in the report to which I refer. The costs are given, the distance and the type of bridge are mentioned. The whole thing should be carefully studied and a statement made by the minister. Perhaps he is not in a position to do it today, but it should be done at some time.

The report refers to the amount of coal which was shipped in the various years, particularly in 1937 and thereafter. It is with that thought in mind, the shipment of greater quantities of coal to the mainland and in turn to central Canada to increase the prosperity of the coal fields of Cape Breton, that I join with other hon. members in urging the minister to give greater consideration to this matter and to tell us what he is willing or anxious to do to help the economy of that section of our country.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I wish to add my voice to what has been said by the hon. member for Davenport, the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the senior member for Halifax. There is one undertaking on which the 650,000 people of Nova Scotia speak with one voice, namely the construction of this bridge. There is a feeling throughout Nova Scotia, and I have it too, that there has been unnecessary procrastination on the part of those in authority at Ottawa. The senior member for Halifax has just said that Mr. A. S. MacMillan, who was the premier of Nova Scotia at the time, returned from Ottawa before the last election and announced that he had had a commitment from the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply that the bridge would be built. Why it takes so long to get the information, as pointed out by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, I do not know. Surveys have been going on for many years. Surveys have been made within the last two years. Engineers have been appointed to review the plans. Why they cannot accept the figures and bring down their report, even if it is only a progress report, and let us know what their views are, I do not know. I should like to know why it is put off continually and why there is so much procrastination. The people of Nova Scotia do not understand it.

I was minister of highways in Nova Scotia for over eight years. When I first became minister there was inadequate ferry service for highway traffic. We had wharves and ferry boats built. The service was improved; but it appeared to me every time I went to Cape Breton that it was a logical and necessary undertaking to have a bridge or causeway over the strait of Canso. The distance is short, and the foundations are good. I do not understand why there is so much delay. Anyway, I want to repeat that the people of Nova Scotia demand this and require it. In that respect they speak with one voice. I am glad to join with other hon. members who have expressed their views today.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I think I can make as accurate a statement on Canso now as I could even if I acquiesced in the suggestion of the hon. member for Cape Breton South that further information be obtained before the house rises. The position is simply this. In July of last year I made a statement in the house outlining the position at that time. I explained the various projects under consideration: a causeway, a bridge, improved facilities and the realignment of the line. I went into it at great length. As I then said, it was a report which was prepared by the engineer, who had already given careful consideration to the brief of the maritime board of trade, to which the senior member for Halifax referred, as well as the presentation made by the former premier of Nova Scotia. Following the decision reached by the officers of the department, an item was placed in the estimates. However, following that, the premier of Nova Scotia and a delegation from that province waited upon the then minister of reconstruction and supply and myself. This matter was fully discussed. I am not free to state here what was said at that time, but there was an engineer with the group that came up, the premier himself, and one other individual. Certain aspects of the scheme were put forward, and we promised to give it further consideration.

Later the proposal was made that we set up a board of engineers to review the reports and special surveys previously made by the Department of Transport. That committee has been appointed. It consists of three engineers, Professor D. S. Ellis, Dr. A. Surveyer and Dr. P. L. Pratley. These men have gone to the scene, have consulted with our officers and are studying whether or not it is practicable from the several standpoints to construct a bridge capable of accommodating a single-track railway and highway traffic, to construct a causeway for a railway and highway traffic, to construct a tunnel for highway and railway traffic, and the provision of improved railway facilities and ferry service. That board was appointed only in January of this year. The fact that it will not report until July has no significance. I can assure my hon. friend that if he comes up here after they have reported I shall certainly be delighted to see him, as I am at any time.

There seems to be some apprehension about the amount of money that was spent last year. While $250,000 was voted, only $20,000 has been spent. That amount was expended because the borings were not completed and it was not possible to spend a greater sum. As mentioned in the statement made last year, a decision was reached to improve the facilities, and that would cost $4,500,000. This amount is placed in the estimates in order to provide for the beginning of the work. The facilities are not good. They will have to be improved in any event, pending the finding of the board, and if it is decided that a scheme other than this should be proceeded with, the money simply will not be spent. So that until such time as the board of engineers has reported, I am afraid I am not able to add anything to what I have already said.

Mr. ISNOR: I should like to bring one other point to the minister's attention. Taking into consideration the $5 million estimated as the cost of the ferry, and the twenty per cent saving which Mr. Fairweather estimated would be made by the realignment of the tracks—

Mr. CHEVRIER: The cost of the ferry is about $1,500,000, not $5 million.

Mr. ISNOR: Taking the cost of the ferry at $1,500,000, and against that the saving which would be effected if the tracks were realigned, what is the minister's long-range view as to the saving that would be made by the Canadian National Railways? It is shown in Mr. Fairweather's report that whereas the largest type of locomotives from Truro to Moncton can take a haul of 1,930 tons, from Moncton to Edmundston they are capable of hauling 3,500 tons; or, to state it in the equivalent of cars, from Sydney to Port Tupper, 21 cars; from Mulgrave to Stellarton, 17; from Truro, Nova Scotia, to Moncton, 26; and from Moncton to Edmundston, 45. They are able to haul about twice as many cars from Moncton to Edmundston as they can over the line of track the realignment of which is being considered. The fact that the realignment was not done, no doubt added to the C.N.R. deficit of last year. And when you remember that 78·2 per cent of the revenue came from freight, I suggest that it is an important item and we should consider whether it is feasible and good business to carry out the project that is suggested.

It is roughly estimated by Mr. Fairweather, in his evidence before a parliamentary committee, that an improved railway from Sydney to Moncton would result in a twenty per cent reduction in the cost of moving freight over that line, and that twenty per cent would naturally be reflected in the price of coal and steel shipped to central Canada.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed that the saving in railway operations would be $300,000.

Mr. ISNOR: For what period?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Per annum.

Mr. ISNOR: And against that you pay the interest tied up in the $1,500,000, operation costs, and so on. Can we get a picture of the whole thing so that we may see it from the sound business point of view?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Are special efforts being made under the minister's direction to improve the grades and alignment of the road from Moncton to Sydney? Are steps being taken in this direction by the Canadian National? Can the minister say what is practicable in the circumstances, what the cost will be, and how soon the work will be undertaken?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The engineer in the department went into the question fully. The hon. member no doubt remembers that evidence was given in the committee before I made the statement referred to a moment ago, and the Canadian National Railways have come to the conclusion that the capital cost would be such that they could not approve its being done.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): If the proposal cannot be carried out in its entirety so as to bring the whole road up to the highest state of perfection, can the minister say whether those sections where the greatest difficulty is encountered now could be improved and brought up to a satisfactory standard?

Mr. McLURE: One word in reference to the strait of Canso. The hon. member for Cumberland said that Nova Scotia would speak with one voice on anything that made for improved conditions at the strait of Canso, and I add that Prince Edward Island would be happy indeed to see the construction of either a bridge or a causeway, or whatever the engineers decide should be undertaken, to take care of traffic at that point. We produce foodstuffs for which we could find a home market in Sydney. According to statistics—the hon. member for Cape Breton South will correct me if I am wrong—over $50,000,000 a year is paid out in wages there alone, and that is not the only amount that is distributed in wages. If a bridge or causeway were erected, farmers in Prince Edward Island would benefit because they could take their trucks direct into Sydney, where they would find an excellent market. I can assure the hon. member for Cape Breton South that Prince Edward Island would take the same view as that expressed by the hon. member for Cumberland. We are prepared to support anything that may be undertaken for the benefit of the three maritime provinces.

Mr. KNOWLES: The rest of us, too.

Mr. GILLIS: So what is holding it up?

Mr. ISNOR: One more question. I have never been able to get figures in connection with freight originating in the maritimes and going to central Canada, or from the Atlantic to the central region. How does the minister arrive at the $300,000 that was mentioned a moment ago?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I cannot give the answer; I do not know.

Mr. ISNOR: You have experts.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. ISNOR: I want to put on the record the statement that the minister is unable to provide that information.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is what I have said.

Mr. ISNOR: Thank you.

Item agreed to.

Air service—

508. Air transport board—salaries and office expenses, $154,297.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): These items have been going through so fast that I have not had a chance to ask the question I want to ask now. Can the minister make a statement as to subventions for maritime freight rates? Is enough provided to look after the twenty per cent increase in freight rates?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The answer is no.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): That will be supplementary?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Will the minister give an assurance that the twenty per cent over-all will be made available under the Duncan commission's freight rates recommendations?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is statutory. It has to be done.

Mr. GILLIS: I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce, shortly after the freight rates were increased, whether the subventions as applied to the movement of maritime coal would be increased to absorb the freight rate increase, and his answer was definitely, yes. It is merely a matter of stepping them up.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Air service—

508. Air transport board—salaries and office expenses, $154,297.

Mr. KNOWLES: Under this item I should like to ask the minister a question which no doubt he expects me to ask. I promise him I have no intention of repeating the speech—

Mr. CHEVRIER: Does my hon. friend promise it is the same question?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, but I hope I get a different and better answer. My question has to do with government policy in relation to a transpacific air service. As the minister knows, in the past the stated policy of the government has been quite clear, namely that this service will be operated by Trans-Canada Air Lines. Rumours that have appeared in the press, and the indefiniteness of ministerial answers have led me to wonder whether a change, which I would deplore, is in prospect. Can the minister now state what is the present government policy with respect to the operation of a transpacific air service, particularly the service set out in the Canada-Australia agreement?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am sorry I cannot enlighten the hon. member any more than I did the last time he asked the question. I have to repeat what I said then, namely, that the policy of the government has not been altered, and that if and when it is changed I shall make a statement.

Mr. KNOWLES: About all I can say in reply to that is that it is just about the same amount of enlightenment as the minister gave previously, which is none. I hope there will be no change in government policy, but the kind of answers being given seem to suggest that one is in prospect; and it is, I fear, the sort of change I deplore and protest.

Mr. BRYCE: There is a matter I should like to bring before the minister under this item. I believe this is the correct item on which to do so; if not I shall wait until later. I have had some correspondence with the Rivercrest community club; and for the information of the minister I may tell him this represents a new settlement of veterans' homes in my constituency. They are all in West St. Paul, and in this fully modern residential district there are fifty-eight veterans' homes. The whole district lies between the highway and the Red river. They are disturbed because an application has been made to the air transport board for a licence to operate an aircraft establishment, which would mean that planes would take off from and land on adjacent property. Perhaps I would save the time of the committee by quoting from the last letter I received, in which they say:

> This not only constitutes a public nuisance and a hazard but decreases our property values also, and we are unanimously opposed to such an establishment in our neighbourhood. We petitioned against this undertaking to the municipal council, who passed a by-law prohibiting such installations within certain areas of the municipality and advised the Department of Transport of their action, requesting them at the same time to refuse to issue a licence. The Department of Transport here have referred the whole matter to Ottawa for decision, and we would like to have you intervene on our behalf if you would be kind enough to do so.
> We are all greatly concerned over the matter, and several of our members have signified their intention of giving up their homes and moving elsewhere if the proposed aerodrome becomes a reality. We are building up a nice community here and would hate to see it spoiled.

I do not think I can add very much to this. The veterans who have set up this modern residential district do not want an aerodrome next door if they can possibly avoid it. I appeal to the minister to have the air transport board give this matter every consideration. I have to leave now for a meeting of the veterans affairs committee; if the minister is not able to give an answer at the moment, perhaps he could give one later.

Mr. CHEVRIER: All I can tell the hon. member now is that I am informed that if any such application has been made it is not to the knowledge of the board or the officers of the department. When such matters come before the board, licences are considered if in the public interest; and from the letter my hon. friend has quoted these representations unquestionably would be taken into consideration either by the board, if the letter should come before it, or the director of air services. I can assure the hon. gentleman now that these representations will be brought to their attention.

Mr. BRYCE: Thank you very much. According to this letter the Winnipeg office has referred the whole matter to Ottawa; therefore it will probably come before the officials here.

Mr. SKEY: I should like to bring the discussion back to the Pacific air routes. Am I to understand that no charter has been issued either to T.C.A. or any other applicant for the operation of Pacific air routes from Canada?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The answer is that no licence has been granted for transpacific services, either to T.C.A. or to any other carrier. In case I should be misunderstood, I should say a licence has been granted to an Australian company to operate a service from Australia to Canada, as the hon. gentleman knows.

Mr. SKEY: But no Canadian company has yet received a reciprocal privilege?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No.

Mr. SKEY: For a moment I should like to support the view that Canada should inaugurate Pacific flights from Canada, and should grant a Canada charter to a company to fly to the Pacific islands, Australia and New Zealand. In these times I think it imperative that we should open up such routes as these, even though in the beginning they may be a bit uneconomical to operate. I would urge that the government give every consideration to any application for such a charter, or to giving T.C.A. a charter to operate over those routes. I spoke on this matter in 1946, when I was strongly of the opinion that we should draw the chains of empire closer together, and that Canada could perform a real service in opening up these routes to our sister commonwealths in the south Pacific.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation division—

510. Control of civil aviation, including the administration of the Aeronautics Act and regulations issued thereunder, $569,523.

Mr. SINNOTT: There are several aeroplanes landing along the Red river under charters which permit them to operate to various points in the northeastern portion of my constituency. They are rendering good service; but in landing on the Red river with their pontoons they cause considerable damage to the banks, which has led to several cave-ins, especially in the vicinity of the East Kildonan canoe club. I would ask the minister to see what can be done to keep these banks from falling in.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation division—Airways and airports—

511. Construction and improvements, including radio facilities; and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $452,000—capital, $11,138,309.

Mr. SKEY: What radio installations are being made at airports controlled by the department, and where?

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is a long list of them.

Mr. SKEY: I do not wish to delay the committee.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the hon. member will say in which airport he is interested, I can give him the expenditures in respect of that one.

Mr. SKEY: It would serve my purposes if the minister or his office would supply me with the information privately.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Thank you very much.

Mr. SKEY: I have one further observation to make which I believe is of considerable importance. I wish to congratulate the minister's department upon having the foresight to employ Doctor Norman W. McLeod, whose contribution in runway construction has been unique. Doctor McLeod is a Canadian, and a graduate of Canadian universities. His contribution has been of a novel and excellent type, so much so that he was given an international award for his work, to which I shall refer briefly.

I believe Doctor McLeod is in the department on a part-time retainer basis; but his particular contribution is to bring to the technique of runway construction a new method of analysis of the undersoil, and a method of correlating the undersoil with the wheel loading which can be used on particular runways. His method can be applied not only to runway construction, but to any type of highway construction. When the results obtained by his method were compared with those of the United States corps of army engineers it was found that in some instances by his method it is necessary to use only about half or less than half the thickness of concrete in order to meet the safety factors required in runway construction.

I have taken these few minutes of the committee's time to congratulate the department upon having at its call such an excellent Canadian scientist who has made a real contribution to the development not only of our airways but of our highways as well.

Could the minister or his officials prepare a brief memorandum on this technique which could be passed on to all provincial departments and municipalities concerned with road building? This method represents a substantial saving to Canadian taxpayers. The application of his formula means a tremendous saving in public money in all fields of highway and air force runway construction.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Doctor McLeod has already prepared a report in the form of a book which deals with the very work to which the hon. member has referred, including preparation of the soil, and the like. We are making use of that book. While it is not a public document, it is in our possession, and if Doctor McLeod has no objection it could be circulated to the provincial governments.

Mr. SKEY: I feel strongly it is the duty of the minister's department to see that this report has the widest possible circulation among those who are interested in construction work.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Before going to a special committee I should like to bring to the attention of the minister certain facts in connection with the airport at Castlegar in my constituency. It is now used principally by Canadian Pacific Air Lines. The airport is being maintained as a result of co-operation between the provincial government and the local citizens, and is providing excellent facilities.

The provincial government leased to the community a considerable area of land formerly owned by the Doukhobors. The local people have raised money and have done considerable work, so that they now have an airport fairly well advanced, and with possibilities for development into an excellent airport. This service is required in that part of the interior of British Columbia. In addition we have a number of smaller airports for the landing of smaller aircraft, which are coming into that district in increasing numbers, and for emergency landings. These airports have been neglected in recent years.

In view of the importance of the airport at Castlegar and the necessity for its development, I think it is most unfair that the development should rest with the local citizens. This airport serves a need in the community, and gives facilities for emergency landings. What is the government's policy with respect to these airports, and the giving of federal assistance for their development?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The policy is to help the airports on request. This airport is not under the jurisdiction of the department. It is operated and maintained by Canadian Pacific Air Lines. If application is made to the air transport board it will be dealt with in the same manner as other applications are handled.

Mr. PEARKES: Has the department recently taken over from the R.C.A.F. the airport at Patricia Bay?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. We have taken it over for their operation, and for ourselves as well, and it is for their future use.

Mr. PEARKES: What about the administration of the airport?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is our responsibility.

Mr. PEARKES: May I congratulate the minister upon having taken over such an excellent airport. For some time adjustments with neighbouring farmers in connection with the extension of runways and the establishment of guide poles have been somewhat up in the air. Now that the Department of Transport has taken over, can final settlement be speeded up? These farmers have been waiting for over twelve months for their adjustments. I am sure the minister's department knows the people to whom I refer. I would ask that since the department has now taken over, final settlement be made.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I can assure the hon. member that, having taken over, we will speed up adjustments as quickly as possible.

Mr. PEARKES: I have every confidence in the minister.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to ask a general question about this group of items. I shall base my question on item 511, but I would point out that in the group we have expenditures amounting to about $28,000,000. I should like to make this general observation: These are expenditures about which the ordinary layman can know very little. We are in the hands of the engineers, and we cannot expect the engineers to be particularly interested in money matters. I believe their whole instinct—and a very proper one indeed—is to try to carry their side of the matter as far as they can. Here we have expenditures which I suppose, according to judgment exercised, might vary between $10,000,000 and $15,000,000; they might run up to $40,000,000 or $50,000,000, according to the application of, first, construction, and second, the newest type of scientific investigation.

Obviously the minister cannot exercise complete and detailed judgment—and for two reasons: First, I believe it can be said he is not a technical man and, second, he is busy with other affairs. I should like to ask two questions. First of all, what means does the minister use to satisfy himself as to how far we should go? I admit that is a very difficult question, because in one way these new scientific inventions are useful and necessary, but in another way they are like delightful toys that people can play with ad lib. My second question is this: What is the relationship in matters of expenditure between the minister's department, as it applies to air transportation, and the Department of National Defence? I take it that scientific expenditures in respect of radio and the like are made under the air branch.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. member asks what means are adopted to ascertain whether these expenditures are controlled. They are controlled in two ways: first, by the close watch which the treasury board keeps on all these items, and then by the air transport board to which application is made for additional services. In so far as the relationship between Defence and this department is concerned, anything of a civil nature is controlled entirely by the air division of transport. Some of the airports being abandoned by the Department of National Defence are taken over by us. I believe we took over last year some seventeen airports belonging to national defence and there is another item which we can discuss when we get to it if the hon. gentleman wishes.

Mr. McMASTER: Will part of this expenditure be made at Malton airport?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. McMASTER: Are Trans-Canada Air Lines charged for the use of Malton and other airports?

Mr. CHEVRIER: They pay landing fees and rental for hangars.

Mr. McMASTER: Where would that appear? Would that be in your budget?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It goes into consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. McMASTER: Approximately what are they paying for everything?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed it is about $1,250,000.

Mr. McMASTER: That is in connection with all airports?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is for all air services.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is there an operating statement for Malton airport to show what the receipts and disbursements are?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Can the minister give those figures?

Mr. CHEVRIER: A monthly report is received in connection with Malton airport showing the revenue and the expenditures. It is not a public document; it is for the information of the officers. I can see no objection, however, to getting the figures for the hon. gentleman if he wants them.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I do not want to press for figures which in themselves might not be significant, but it seems to me that it would be a matter of relevancy and of some importance to know in a general way what those reports showed, what revenue was produced and what were the carrying charges. I will not hold up the matter now. Perhaps the minister can give us the information later.

Mr. McMASTER: I notice in the breakdown given on page 279 an item of $1,817,000 for radio services. Can the minister give us some idea of how and where that is spent?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I was asked that question a moment ago, when I said there is a long list of items for radio services, which could be described pretty much as follows: 100 radio range stations, 15 fan markers, 3 frequency modulation relay stations, 11 instrument approach systems, and other installations with reference to radio in various airports. The list comprises some four or five pages. I can give the details if the hon. member wishes.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not think I want all the details. Will any of this money be spent at Malton? I was just wondering where it is spent and why.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is no provision for radio construction at Malton, but there is for the installation of an instrument landing system, which is quite costly. Of the amount referred to in the estimates, $1,817,350 is being provided for radio services, with another $811,000 for the acquisition of radio equipment for various airports.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am interested in the point which has been pursued by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario and the hon. member for High Park. I think the facts that they brought out are pertinent to the whole question of our air services. If I did not misunderstand them, they were getting at the fact that part of the cost of operating Trans-Canada Air Lines is hidden in these items covering airport and radio beam services. I think that is perfectly true. I should like to point out to them—and I think they will suspect what is coming—that the same thing applies to the privately-owned air lines. A while ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that it was only recently that private air lines such as the Canadian Pacific have been showing a profit. In order to be consistent, my hon. friends will have to admit that Canadian Pacific Air Lines show a profit only because many of the services necessary to the operation of their planes are paid for out of the public treasury.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The Canadian Pacific are operating their air services at a loss.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not want to follow what the hon. member of Muskoka-Ontario did last night, but that is not what your colleague told us not long ago. He said that they had got out of the red and were into the black. Whether they are operating at a loss or a profit, the sums of money that we are voting right now are evidence that we are able to maintain air services in this country, whether privately or publicly owned, only because huge amounts of money are spent by the government in a capital way and on the operating of air services. I agree that this should be done, but because this is in the nature of a public service and a public monopoly, I have supported down through the years the extent to which the government has gone in for the public ownership and operation of air lines. I hope to see that policy continued, and not weakened or vitiated in any way by any backward step on the part of the government.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): What is the present status of the Tofino airport? We spent about $5,000,000 there during the war and I am curious to know what the department is going to do with it.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is maintained by the Department of Transport.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The department is taking care of its upkeep?

Mr. CHEVRIER: And operation and maintenance.

Mr. IRVINE: What is the situation with respect to the airstrip at Dawson Creek? The minister may not have the information at his fingers' ends, but I brought this to his attention some time ago. I do not even know at the moment under whose jurisdiction it comes, but I do know that it is badly in need of repairs, and I should like to know what the situation is.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed that we have made a survey of the airport and airfield at Dawson Creek, and while no decision has yet been reached, it is a difficult operation and one that would be quite expensive to maintain. I would not like to go further at the moment.

(Translation):

Mr. CAOUETTE: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Transport a few questions in connection with item 511. In view of the stupendous development that has taken place in the northwestern part of the province of Quebec, it becomes important to set up an air line in that region. The minister has received numerous requests from different organizations of Val d'Or and Rouyn asking for the construction of airports. Our region has now a population of more than 100,000. Therefore it is essential that we give those people the opportunity of travelling a little more easily than they do now. By railway, the trip from Val d'Or to Montreal takes from 16 to 18 hours. So it is urgent to set up an air line.

Could the minister tell us whether he has received any petitions from Val d'Or or Rouyn with reference to the building of an airport at either place? What action has he taken in the matter? Do these credits provide for the building of an airport at the earliest opportunity?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Speaker, I may say that there has been no request for the building of an airport at Rouyn or Val d'Or, but there was one for the setting up of an air line, which is not quite the same thing. When the application is submitted to us formally—there are more than one, I am told—it will be acted upon in the regular way by the air transport board.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Were those applications for an air line charter filed by individuals or by companies.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Companies.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Privately owned companies?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

(Text):

Mr. JACKMAN: I think the minister should make a general statement on the construction of airfields. I do not want him to misunderstand me; I am not necessarily against them; in fact I am very much for them. But I think the committee is entitled to a statement in regard to the substantial expenditures which are being made, particularly in view of the fact, as has just been said, that Canadian Pacific Air Lines is losing money, and we also know that Trans-Canada Air Lines lost money last year, and we do not know just what the prospects are. As my colleague the member for Muskoka-Ontario said a short while ago, with most of the technical details in the hands of engineers, we may be doing things which are not a practical economic necessity. It is from this point of view that I would ask the minister to make a statement justifying these increases in expenditure. For example, item 511 shows that we appropriated last year $4,900,000, in round figures, and this year we are appropriating $11,138,000, an increase of approximately $6,200,000. We find in subsequent estimates that only a small portion of the total amount voted last year was used. I would like to know, first, why the amount voted last year was not used, and second, why the estimates this year exceed the total used and unused portions voted last year. In view of the fact that air lines in this country are operating at a loss, why are we making substantial appropriations to increase the facilities for something which does not justify itself economically?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The operation of these airports is of course being done at a loss. The house is familiar with the operations of T.C.A. It was operated at a profit for some years, but in the last two years there has been a deficit. That is the position not only in this country but in Great Britain and the United States; and in the United States the loss is proportionately greater than it is in Canada. The object of the department is to see that these airports are maintained in a condition that is safe for landing aircraft. What we do is to make the repairs, improvements and capital expenditures which are necessary in order to provide for the safety of the travelling public. The item we are now discussing contains a revote of $3,109,500. The appropriation provides for the construction and improvement of airports, the construction and improvement of aerodromes and emergency landing fields to meet modern aviation requirements. It also provides for the installation of high intensity lighting, the extension of runways, boundary and approach lighting, the establishment and extension of radio facilities for the safe operation of airways in Canada and Newfoundland. The department has been fortunate in that many of the airports which were taken over were built during the war. If they had had to be built in peacetime the expenditure would have been not $11 million or more, but twice or perhaps three or four times as much. What we are doing now is to maintain and operate them for the safety of air navigation.

Mr. JACKMAN: Where is the end of these large expenditures, as well as of current maintenance expenditures, in this particular field? Is it the view of the government that these air services will ever justify themselves from a dollar-and-cents point of view? If the minister replies in the negative, that in the foreseeable future the revenues from these air services will not equal the expenditures, should not these airports and facilities be looked upon as a matter of national defence and not as something having to do with civil aviation?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I hope the day will come when these services will pay for themselves. But, as my hon. friend has intimated, I cannot say that that is possible in the near future.

Mr. FLEMING: Substantial reconstruction is under way at Malton airport. What amount does this item provide for the reconstruction of buildings and for control and other improvements of the field at Malton? Is anything provided here for the Toronto island airport? Is any extension contemplated by the department which will increase the usefulness of the island airport, or is it simply to be used in the future as it has up to the present, largely for small planes and trainers? Are any changes contemplated at the Uplands airport? I understand that since the new planes were introduced by Trans-Canada Air Lines they are not using the Uplands airport. Apparently the field at Uplands is not large enough for the new planes that are in service; they are operating directly between Montreal and Toronto, but not on the triangular service via Uplands. Can the minister tell us something about that, and indicate whether any changes are provided for Uplands under this item?

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is provision for extending the runways at the Malton airport.

As my hon. friend knows, a substantial sum is being expended for renovation of the administration building.

Mr. FLEMING: How much?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I will get the figure in a minute. We are not spending any money on the island airport. It is under the jurisdiction of the Toronto harbour commissioners. At Uplands, or the Ottawa airport, we do not propose to make the runways large enough to accommodate the new T.C.A. North Stars. We feel that that expenditure would not be justified at the moment.

Mr. FLEMING: Can the minister give the expenditures at Malton under this item?

Mr. CHEVRIER: They are provided in another item. The amount for the completion of the terminal building, facilities and administration building at Malton is $525,000.

Mr. FLEMING: When is it expected to be completed?

Mr. CHEVRIER: When I saw it two weeks ago it was progressing fairly well. I would think that by the end of August or early September it would be completed.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Who is responsible for making requests for improvements at the various airports? They must come from somebody. When requests do come in, on what basis is it decided whether the expenditure should be made or not?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The demand for improvements is made by the district inspector, and they are given consideration by the director of air services, who decides in the affirmative or in the negative in accordance with the importance of the airport, the amount of traffic, and the economic need.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Do the inspectors get their information or requests from the various air lines such as the T.C A., the C.P.A., the United States lines, and so on, which are using these fields?

Mr. CHEVRIER: If my hon. friend has Malton in mind, the inspector is in Toronto. Toronto is the headquarters of the central division. He would be guided by the amount of traffic and also by the representations that were made to him by the various air lines using the port.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The air lines are the one who really make the request. We have been talking about operations. Is there a standard schedule of charges for the various air lines? What are these charges? Are they the same in Canada as they are in the United States for similar airports, and do all the air lines pay the same charges? What is the total revenue that comes in by way of charges? I should like to know how the charges compare.

The CHAIRMAN: Would it be better to let these questions stand until we reach the item?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The discussion has been very general on this item. We have been going on to other items. I shall try to get the information for my hon. friend.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I want to know what the charges are and whether they should be higher or lower. The government does not own railway stations; the railways have to put them up themselves. It seems to me that the air lines which are operating should pay an economic rent for the stations they use.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The charges that my hon. friend inquired about are uniform throughout the country. They are not necessarily the same in this country as they are in the United States. They are based on the economic service.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Are our charges lower or higher than the charges of comparable airports in the United States?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed that we cannot compare the charges in this country with those of the United States, because they are not based on the same service. The rates and the charges are not established on the same basis.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There are two air lines operating from Toronto to New York. One is operated by Trans-Canada Air Lines and the other by a United States air line. Do these lines pay the same charges at Malton near Toronto as they pay in New York when they land there? Is there a difference, and if so, why? Why should we charge less than they do, if we do?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The United States has no standard basis for the establishment of these charges. They vary in each state, and sometimes at each airport. That is why it is difficult to compare them. In some instances ours are higher and in others they are lower, but in every instance there is uniformity throughout the country.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Do we pay the same landing charges at LaGuardia field in New York as the United States air lines do? Do the United States air lines pay the same charges at Malton as Trans-Canada Air Lines pay?

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is no discrimination at any airport as to the amount of the charges.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Does Trans-Canada pay the same charges in New York as the United States air lines pay?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Here we are contemplating an expenditure of about $30,000,000. I ask the minister this question. Are we just going along doing this, that and the other thing, which we think is important, partly for civil aviation and partly for military aviation? Is there any plan of any kind in our minds? In the first place, is there any reason why we should carry commercial passengers at away below cost? I assume we are doing that. If I am wrong, the minister will correct me; if I am right, why are we doing it? What basis is there for arriving at this huge expenditure? Here are millions of dollars to be spent on airports. I imagine it is fully justified, but I do not know. There may be justification purely from the national defence point of view, but I think the minister should give us a statement indicating some underlying principles. We are engaged here in the completely blind business of voting millions of dollars in the absence of any principle on which the money is being spent, and in particular—I come back to this—without knowing whether those who are using the air purely as a means of transport, without any particular reason, are paying their way. In charter services, such as the bush lines, the lines up in Muskoka, and the tourist resorts, people must pay their own way. They do not get government assistance, and I do not think they should; but I suggest that people using the air for ordinary travel should not get government assistance either.

I come back to the first question. Must there not be in the government's mind some basis whereon they determine whether they shall spend ten, twenty, thirty or forty millions, and must there not be in their mind also some part of that amount which is necessary for the purpose of national defence and which would have to be spent anyway? Can we be given that figure? Can we, in other words, be put in a position to exercise some kind of judgment? At the moment all we can do is look at the amount of money we are spending, without knowing the principle on which it is spent.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The request is a legitimate one, and I think the best I can do is to prepare a statement, which I will bring in as quickly as possible, outlining the reasons and the basis for the expenditure.

The CHAIRMAN: Before any other hon. member speaks, may I say to the committee that I try to see that discussion comes from every quarter of the chamber and is not confined to any particular party or group. With that object in mind, it is perhaps necessary for me to call on an hon. member who has stood up only once, when some other hon. member may have stood up four or five times in an effort tc get the floor. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has the floor now.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I am curious to know whether the department has been approached by any of the air lines operating in Canada, in the same manner as the steamship lines have approached him, and approached him so successfully. If we give them $2,000,000 in the form of a subsidy to serve people in the outlying areas, has his department considered the granting of subsidies to bush air lines? Coming to the Post Office Department, one can establish an excellent case for the provision of air-mail service. The people in some parts of my riding receive mail every ten or twelve days, and it is conceded down here that that is not good enough, but they say that they are not the department of government which has the function of subsidizing air services. The time is coming when the departments of transport and reconstruction will have to face the problem of providing assistance or better facilities for the people who live on the frontiers. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario suggested that the government should not give assistance. I hope I do not misunderstand him. His riding and mine are similar in certain respects. I suggest that if Canada is to be developed, the people who live in the cities, enjoying all the facilities that are provided, must see to it that the people who live on the frontiers and who are producing the natural wealth of the country are also provided with these facilities. I should be glad to assist the minister with my humble vote if he ever came here with provision for assisting the bush-flying organizations. I do not know whether Canadian Pacific Air Lines on the main routes or Trans-Canada need great assistance, apart from what they get now in the provision of first class airports; but these airports, apart from their military value, strike me as being much the same as government docks that we provide. They are for the service of all the people. Heaven knows when any of us will have to use the lines for very urgent reasons. There must be some way in which the department can be of assistance to the people in the outlying districts. I am all for it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Perhaps the day will come when we shall have to consider the question of subsidies to air lines and air carriers. Thus far we have not given it consideration.

Mr. KNOWLES: Except indirectly.

Mr. CHEVRIER: My hon. friend has taken the words out of my mouth. We have done so indirectly by aiding in the construction of airports and aerodromes, and paying for their operation and maintenance.

Mr. KNOWLES: And radio beam services.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni made an excellent socialist speech a moment ago.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I am broadminded.

Mr. KNOWLES: He comes from British Columbia.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not need to repeat what he said. However, I wish to ask a question. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario and others have criticized these expenditures. They wish to know whether they have justified or will justify themselves. I believe they have done so already. In Trans-Canada Air Lines the people of Canada have something to be proud of.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Hear, hear.

Mr. GILLIS: I think that if we ever arrive at the point at which the hon. member is aiming, where we shall have a fair base to work from and supervise service in the air, there will have to be a consolidation of all under one government department. In my opinion this form of travel, so far as the public is concerned, will have to be closely supervised, and I do not think there is anyone in the country in a position to do that job except the government of Canada, which is responsible to the people. In my opinion the bush lines and C.P.A. should be under T.C.A. There is no comparison between the services, and if the job is to be done properly the government now is providing practically all the facilities. The other lines get the benefit of it. The time will come when the whole thing will have to be operated by the government; I have no doubt about that. What I did rise to ask the minister—

Mr. McMASTER: You were going to ask a question.

Mr. GILLIS: You do not like what I am saying, do you?

Mr. GRAYDON: He didn't say that. Maybe you would like him to.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. McMASTER: You are willing that they should spend all the money.

Mr. GILLIS: If you have been reading the newspapers and watching the trend of events in the country within the last few months you will come to that conclusion too. You cannot hold the tide back.

I challenge contradiction of the statement as to the comparison of the services. The one service in Canada that I am proud of is T.C.A. They are doing an excellent job, and I do not think we are good Canadians if we do not admit it. Every dollar spent on T.C.A. has been money well spent. There are many other things we are spending money on for which we are not getting value.

I will put my question. During the war there was a meteorological service at Sydney airport. It is the main jumping-off point for overseas airways and the main landing point on the way back. That service was discontinued. I understand that they must get weather reports from other places, and that delays them and causes confusion at times. Is there any intention of re-establishing the service there? I think it is absolutely necessary. Further, to what extent is the department encouraging the development of civil aviation at that airport at Sydney? I know a small commercial company was formed there to give service to outlying sections, with small planes, and I believe they were having considerable difficulty in reaching an understanding with the department.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The answer to the first question would be yes, that the meteorological services at Sydney are now in the process of being re-established. As far as the importance of the airport is concerned, there can be no doubt about that. It is not, of course, the only important one. Dorval is the most important, in the sense that it is a transatlantic airport; but Sydney is being given consideration as an alternate.

Mr. HAZEN: Is any part of this amount of $11,138,000 for the construction and improvement of airports earmarked for the Clover Valley airport near Saint John? A few years ago the then minister of transport gave the municipality the green light to go ahead and acquire land with a view to the establishment of an airport there. The municipality went ahead and expropriated the land; then the matter was held up. Is the minister able to tell us the present position with respect to that proposed airport, and whether any of this money is to be used to develop it?

I should like also to ask the minister whether any portion of this amount is earmarked for the purpose of developing an airport at or near Fredericton, New Brunswick. Last September and October there was a great deal of discussion in some parts of New Brunswick as to the development of an airport at Fredericton. Will the minister tell us whether any of this money is to be used for that purpose, and whether it is the intention of the government to go ahead with an airport at the capital city of the province?

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is no provision in these estimates for the construction or extension of an airport at either Saint John or Fredericton. Pennfield Ridge, which is an ex-R.C.A.F. airport thirty or thirty-five miles from Saint John, is being used by and for the people of that city.

Mr. HAZEN: Could the minister develop the point any further at the moment, as to whether anything is being done to provide Fredericton with an airport?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I cannot, at this stage.

Mr. HAZEN: Is the minister able to say whether anything more is being done in connection with the airport at Clover Valley, near Saint John? Is that matter still in mind, or has the government decided to wash out the whole thing?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No decision has been arrived at as yet.

Mr. HAZEN: In either case?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have given the answer with respect to Fredericton; I said I was not able to give any information. I shall do so when the supplementaries are up for discussion.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then may I ask the minister if there will be any estimates in the supplementaries for the Fredericton airport?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not know.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not often go to New Brunswick, but it is always a great pleasure when I do. Last fall I was there on some public business, and at that time a great many things were said about an airport for Fredericton. It seemed suspiciously close to by-election time, and I was wondering if perhaps the government promises were to be carried out in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I did not make the promises; I do not know what they were.

Mr. GRAYDON: I did not find the minister there, but there were plenty of others ready to speak on his behalf.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is there no cabinet solidarity in the matter of election promises?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I am sorry, but I do not think the minister answered one of my questions. I want to know the charges when one of our planes lands at LaGuardia field, whether they are the same as the charges at Malton. I should like a comparison.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The answer is no.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Then what is the difference between the cost of landing at LaGuardia field and landing at Malton?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It would depend on the size of the aircraft and the schedule.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Take the regular trans-Canada plane that goes from here and lands at LaGuardia field. How much do they charge us? Then take the same plane coming back to Malton. How much is it charged there?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I wonder if the hon. gentleman would permit me to answer the question by sending him a copy of the tariff. It is pretty lengthy and a somewhat complicated document.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Surely the minister can answer that simple question.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have not the tariff before me.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to know the difference.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I shall be glad to get the tariff and send it to my hon. friend as quickly as possible.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Very well.

Then, following the remarks of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, what are the prospects of these airports becoming what might be called economic in their operation? When may we expect expenditures to go down and revenues to come up? Is there any prospect of that? From the information we have obtained today, and in view of this amount of something like $8 million for operating expenses alone, it seems to me that we are voting one of two things. I should like to know if we are voting something that is necessary for Canada, or whether we are voting an expensive luxury. It seems to me that is the way to put it, because I have not been able to make up my mind which it is. We have a great many boards to look after. We are told this board does this and that board does that, and the recommendations come in. I do not know how well they are supervised; I do not know how necessary they are, and as yet the minister has not told us how necessary all these things may be.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I promised the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario that I would bring in a statement setting out the basis. In reply to the specific question my hon. friend asks, namely, as to the chances of these airports becoming economic in their operation, I stated a moment ago that in the foreseeable future I could not see that they would become so, though eventually I hope they will. All I can say is that the gap is gradually closing.

Mr. ADAMSON: I want to make a plea to the minister with respect to a specific airstrip, namely the one at Banff. This is a small strip in the centre of one of our national parks, where service is provided by a small operator named Gaetz, who is doing some excellent pioneer work in flying in the Rocky mountains. This service is making great areas of the Rockies available to people who otherwise could not possibly see them, without engaging expensive pack trains and having expensive equipment. Service from this strip is opening up a vast mountain territory which up to the present has been virtually unknown to and unseen by Canadians and Americans alike. I realize that in the national parks there are certain restrictions with respect to flying, which in the main I think are archaic; but if for no other reason than that of dollars and cents, in attracting United States tourists, I should like to see this airstrip provided with shelter, facilities for tethering light aircraft, a hangar, and gasoline service. It is estimated that today in the United States there are about 300,000 owners of private aircraft. Most of these are light machines, and the owners do a considerable amount of touring and travelling. I believe that if this airstrip were made available to owners who wish to take a flying holiday, it would be of great advantage to Canada.

I have flown there myself. I have flown out of Banff and extensively around the Rockies. I believe it can be said there is nowhere else in the world where one would find such magnificent scenery or a territory which might be opened up with such profit as our own Rocky mountain region. This is particularly so in the winter months when, because of the vast snowfields, landing hazards are greatly diminished.

I believe the airport itself could be of great value, not only to open up the vast mountain areas, but as a great revenue producer from Americans who wish to come here with their own aircraft in the summer months.

Mr. CHEVRIER: We are not doing a great deal in connection with the development of the airstrip at Banff. The same applies to Jasper. The reason is that the landing field is on national parks' property, and the parks administration is opposed in principle to the extensive development of those resort areas. Then, while the country is all right to fly over, it is not easy to land in. So that at the present time we are not contemplating any expenditures at Banff.

Mr. ADAMSON: I realize the difficulties and I understand that attitude of the parks branch. I believe I have said before that it is archaic. I have done considerable flying in the national parks, and I know that, particularly in the winter months, the difficulties of landing are not as great as have been emphasized. I believe aircraft, and particularly the light variety, offer one of the few ways of really opening up the national parks.

When this matter is considered between the minister himself and the Minister of Mines and Resources, who has direction of the national parks, I hope consideration will be given to the tremendous advantage of making the national parks available to the people. At the present time eighty or ninety per cent of national park areas are not available, unless those who wish to go there outfit themselves with expensive pack trains or are prepared to go on major mountaineering expeditions, either of which is extremely costly. By means of aircraft, great areas of the national parks are made available to the man of average means.

Mr. MacINNIS: Surely the hon. member for York West does not mean that, by the use of air transportation, the parks will become available to persons of average means. Either they won't or his "person of average means" must have means considerably above what I consider average. I think of my own constituency of Vancouver East, composed of average people—ordinary people, people who work in factories and stores.

Mr. JACKMAN: In Russia they live in palaces.

Mr. MacINNIS: Some do; and in this country also, some people live in palaces. Perhaps the situation has not changed at all; except that different people are living in the palaces today than lived in them in the past.

But that is not what I am looking for—although it is what my hon. friend is afraid might happen. He is afraid there might be a change here in those who are living in the palaces today. I am thinking of the people who find it all they can do to take their children to the park on a Sunday afternoon or on a holiday—and travel by street car. These are the average people in Canada; and they do not go either by aeroplane or by pack train to our national parks.

I do not think any great claim can be made for the development of airstrips in our national parks. There is a great deal of development of civil aviation still to be done in Canada, and I shall be prepared to support the minister in that part of the development which is economically useful and reasonable.

Mr. SKEY: Could we get back to a consideration of the specific details in the vote? What are the seventeen airports the minister took over last year?

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is a specific item for that later on, at which time I shall give the details.

Mr. SKEY: Is any portion of the $11,000,000 being voted for the development of new types of engines and experimental aircraft?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No.

Mr. SKEY: Where does that item come in?

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is no such item.

Mr. SKEY: Do I understand that the dominion government has no interest in the experimental work going on at Malton airport?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, we have a deep interest—but not in this department. The Department of Reconstruction and Supply did spend a considerable amount of money on the development of aircraft engines and equipment. What the position is today in so far as their expenditures are concerned, I do not know. All I can say is that there is no provision in these estimates for that item.

Mr. SKEY: Does this amount of $11,000,000 represent more in the way of an initial outlay than a final or complete outlay for equipment for the air force for the supply of radio ranges and instrument landing equipment?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is neither the initial nor the final; this is a continuing item. I believe I shall be able to establish, when I answer the question asked by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, that we look at these airports across the country and decide how much it is possible to spend this year. Then we apportion it in accordance with the needs, safety and importance of the airport or aerodrome.

Mr. SKEY: I have had some experience with these matters and I know how costly it is. If Canada wishes to retain any place in the aviation field the government will have to be prepared to make these expenditures.

Mr. JACKMAN: No doubt some of the expenditures will be for lengthening and strengthening runways to accommodate the four-engine North Star aircraft? I understand that a jet transport plane is now being developed. If it is accepted, as it gives every promise of being, will the runways have to be strengthened or lengthened? Would the minister be good enough to say whether or not that consideration has been borne in mind in these appropriations?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed by the director of air services that the jet transport plane, as now being developed, will take about the same size of runway as the North Star.

Mr. JACKMAN: I understood, on what I believe was good authority—I know nothing about the technical details—that a jet-operated plane will not require as long a runway or as heavy a roadbed. Is that the fact?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It will require about the same strength of runway, but the length has not been determined.

Mr. JACKMAN: Will any substantial part of vote 511 be used to lengthen runways to accommodate the new four-engine planes we are using?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No.

Mr. FERGUSON: This seems to be a case of the blind leading the blind. The hon. member for Cape Breton South has said he is in accord with the manner in which this government enterprise is being carried on. The facts have shown quite clearly in the last three months that private corporations are able to run in the black rather than in the red, but he claims that they should be taken over by the government. I think he is trying to mislead this committee and the people of Canada when he advocates taking over Canadian Pacific Air Lines and other similar companies that have been able to operate without any assistance from the taxpayers. The Canadian Pacific have gone ahead on their own under private enterprise and are now operating at a profit. It is certainly a case of the blind leading the blind—they have been partly successful in the last three months—and the people will soon get on to that kind of nonsense. I think we are doing a great job of squandering the taxpayers' money. The fact is that the hon. gentleman knows nothing about aviation in any way, shape or form.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member for Simcoe North says that private companies like the Canadian Pacific do not ask for a single dollar of the taxpayers' money. He makes that statement right at the moment this committee is voting $11 million, along with other items, to provide for air services which the minister admitted a while ago constitute indirect assistance to all companies, including private air lines such as the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. FERGUSON: May I say this to the hon. member who has resumed his seat: Has not the Canadian Pacific railroad assisted the government railroad just as much as this? It is not all charity from the government.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think the hon. member is taking the wrong example there. He must know, as most of us do, the history of railroad development in this country. We know that back in the last century the public assistance to the Canadian Pacific was tremendous. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce first announced the government's aviation policy he said that one thing his government wanted to avoid was the kind of scandal we had in connection with the development of railroading in this country.

Air service—Civil aviation division—Airways and airports—
Operation and maintenance—
513. Radio aviation services, $3,868,495.

Mr. McLURE: I have come to the conclusion that this committee has wonderful faith in the Minister of Transport and I am sure he must be gratified. Out of a total vote of $50,000,000, we are being asked to give a blank cheque for $10,000,000 because no details are shown for that amount. In vote 513 there is one item of $2,198,000 for which some details are given, but then there is a blank cheque for 70 per cent, or about $1,670,000, where there are no details whatever. That is quite all right if we have extreme faith in the minister, but I think there should be more definite details for the $10,000,000 that is being voted for temporary assistance.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not know that I understand what my hon. friend is getting at. We are now dealing with vote 513, which is for $3,868,000.

Mr. McLURE: Details are given for $2,198,000, but the $1,669,000 is without detail.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am afraid my hon. friend is on the wrong page. The details are given on page 280 of the estimates.

Mr. McLURE: You have a vote of $3,868,000, with temporary assistance of $1,669,805.

Mr. CHEVRIER: This vote is made up of salaries for employees of airways and airports to the amount of roughly, $2,000,000. Then the other items are:

Materials and supplies	$564,000
Repairs and upkeep of buildings, works and structures	140,000
North Atlantic meteorological communications	120,000
Light, power and water	132,000
Telegrams, telephones and postage	44,000
Printing and stationery	25,000
Trans-Canada Air Lines operational traffic contract	287,000

Mr. COCKERAM: Will the minister explain that item?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Trans-Canada Air Lines operates a radio communication service by virtue of a contract made with the Department of Transport for which we pay $287,000. The total of those items is $3,868,000.

Mr. COCKERAM: I notice there is a reduction in the number of radio operators. With the expansion of Trans-Canada Air Lines and flying generally, it is surprising that there should be a reduction of practically forty.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is an increase.

Mr. COCKERAM: Last year there were 108 radio operators, but this year the number is down to 62.

Mr. CHEVRIER: They were promoted to grade 2.

Mr. COCKERAM: Even then there is a reduction.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Instead of having 108 radio operators, grade 1, we have sixty-two.

Mr. COCKERAM: There are twenty-six radio operators, grade 2, and sixty-two radio operators, grade 1, or eighty-eight altogether as compared with 108 last year.

Mr. KNOWLES: But there are twenty-seven radio technicians this year.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes; nineteen radio technicians, grade 2; two radio technicians, grade 3, and six radio technicians, grade 4. That accounts for it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): On page 281 of the details the salaries for the permanent staff are shown as amounting to $336,974 and, for temporary assistance, $1,669,805. Why is that item for temporary assistance so large? What do they do?

Mr. CHEVRIER: In every department there has to be a proportion of temporaries. I do not know just what it is, but there is a ratio established between temporaries and permanents. That practice has existed over the years.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): But there are five temporaries to one permanent. I cannot understand why that should be.

Mr. CHEVRIER: We are behind in our conversion from temporaries to permanents.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation division—

515. Grants to organizations for the development of civil aviation, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $30,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: I want to say something in connection with the Royal Canadian Flying Clubs Association. I note in the details relating to item 515 there is a grant to the Royal Canadian Flying Clubs Association of $5,000, and it is upon that item I desire to say a word or two. No doubt members of parliament generally have, from time to time, been kept in touch by the organization known as the Royal Canadian Flying Clubs Association with the financial aspect of the association's activities. As the minister knows and the committee is aware, prior to the war, indeed as early as 1928, a flying clubs association was set up, comprising the operators of flying clubs throughout Canada, and until the war broke out, government grants were made to each of these clubs. If my memory serves me aright, there was at one time a grant of $1,000 to each of these clubs from the dominion treasury. It requires no words of mine, Mr. Chairman, to indicate the vital importance of the work done and the contributions made by those who were trained in the flying clubs of this country prior to 1939. Some 350 pilots, properly trained, were available at the time war broke out. Many others had gone overseas prior to 1939 and enlisted in the Royal Air Force. The importance of the work done by these flying clubs therefore does not need to be emphasized at this time, because it is generally recognized and is well known to all hon. members. But with the war the activities of these clubs were diverted, of course, to other things, and not until after the war was over did the old flying clubs attempt to re-establish themselves and new clubs come into being.

One of my personal interests in this matter is the excellent and progressive flying club which has been established in my own part of Canada near the town of Brampton. I think most of us realize what this means with respect to our whole national picture. There are at the present time some forty-three flying clubs in the organization known as the Royal Canadian Flying Clubs Association.

Training pilots has never been a profitable business; it has been an unprofitable business by and large, and I am told that none of these clubs all across Canada is in a strong financial position, but rather that most of them can be said to be in a weak financial position, with some of them running definitely in the red. I do not need to emphasize to this committee or to the minister or the government how important flying training is to our national defence, or the other aspects of the club's activities which, of course, are valuable assets in peacetime set-up. Bearing that in mind, it seems to me that the government should include in its estimates a grant or subsidy to these flying clubs. I know of nothing that would meet with more general approval, and I make an earnest plea to the minister now to see if that cannot be done before the session is brought to a close. It may be that the minister has in mind including an amount for that purpose in the supplementary estimates, and if so I hope that it will be a generous amount, because the young men who are operating the flying clubs are for the most part veterans who gave conspicuous service to their country in the recent war. They are trying now in another way to do something for Canada in peace, and perhaps also have in mind our national security in case of another emergency. I think, therefore, it becomes a matter of national concern. I should not like to see club after club go out of existence, simply because the government had not given them something in the way of the grant which they required.

The operational costs of these clubs have, of course, increased as have the operational costs of everything else. The clubs are confined, as you, Mr. Chairman, well know, to certain kinds of training, and they have not the opportunities of going into commercial business as some other concerns have whereby they can make a profit which helps to keep the other end of their operations out of the red. I hope that the minister will be sympathetic to the plea I am making on behalf of a section of our citizens who have done a magnificent job in war and are anxious to do a similar job in peace, through training young men in the art and science of flying. I would ask the minister to give every possible consideration to the plea I have just made.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I can tell the hon. gentleman that I have some knowledge of the work done by these clubs, because when I was parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply I had the good fortune to be chairman of a subcommittee which went into this matter thoroughly and strongly recommended in favour of assistance being given to these clubs. In fact, I think the report went so far as to say that if it had not been for the work of the flying clubs it would have been impossible to develop our air strength to the position it reached. The hon. gentleman will find me quite sympathetic to the application that has already been made. I have had the responsibility for this part of the Department of Transport for about a month. One of the first things that came to my attention then was this very matter to which my hon. friend refers. I have not been able to deal with it in the sense of arriving at a decision, but I can assure him that it will be given careful and most sympathetic consideration.

In this item $5,000 is provided for the Royal Canadian Flying Clubs Association. That, of course, does not begin to meet the position. It is a grant which is included in the estimates. When the time comes for consideration of the supplementary estimates I think I would be prepared to see that a similar amount is put in the supplementaries; but on the general question raised, I can tell the hon. member now that he will find me sympathetically disposed toward it.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I make one suggestion. I think something more than another $5,000 would be in order—

Mr. CHEVRIER: I agree.

Mr. GRAYDON: —because that would seem to me to be wholly inadequate. I believe the minister will agree with me that something much more substantial than that will be necessary to alleviate the present situation.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I did not intend to leave the impression that a grant of $5,000 or even $10,000 would meet the situation. Neither did I want to leave the impression that the problem can be dealt with in the supplementary estimates. I do not think it can be, but I can assure the hon. member that it will be carefully looked into.

Mr. LOCKHART: I want to add a word. Some two months ago I made reference to this matter in the house. I think it was on the speech from the throne that I brought the matter to the attention of the minister. I do not believe the present minister was charged with that branch of the department at that time. When I saw these estimates I came to the conclusion that, in making an appeal for more consideration, I was just a voice crying in the wilderness. I mentioned at that time that civilian groups put large amounts of capital into the picture. At that time the flying clubs associations across Canada took hold of the promotion of the training of aviators so urgently needed at the beginning of the war.

When the minister mentions $5,000 I know it is just a nominal amount. He has shown us that he is sympathetic. The committee appreciates that, but I wish to remind the minister of the work done, not only by the personnel of the flying clubs associations, but by the great men who got behind this with their money. We do not know just how soon we may have to turn to these facilities again. In these days of uncertainty we never know what will happen. When the minister comes to make his decision I hope that he will put a couple of digits at the end of the $5,000.

Mr. SKEY: I should like to support the stand that has been taken by the hon. member for Peel and the hon. member for Lincoln in requesting assistance for the flying clubs of Canada. In doing so, I shall not go into the job that they did before and during the war, except to say that they formed the elementary flying training schools which turned out the bulk of the British commonwealth air training plan pilots. As the minister knows, at the end of the war they turned back millions of dollars—I am prompted to say $6,000,000—to the government. It would be unfair if I did not point out the situation which has arisen as a result of some of the government's kindness to these clubs. Although they turned back their money, the government did hand over to them hangars and many other facilities at these various airports. We now find that the cost of operation and maintenance of the very things that were given to them has placed some of the clubs in an unfortunate position. We cannot criticize the government for what it has done. We can say that in many instances the clubs have taken on more than they can handle. I suggest to the minister that the government consider permitting the clubs to draw on the moneys turned back at the end of the war for the training of pilots to licensed standards. I would say men and women pilots, because I do not think women should be excluded from the aviation field.

Of course we can turn to the defence side of the picture and make a good case for it there, but even on the civil side of it there is no doubt that our country is peculiar in the way in which it lends itself to all forms of aviation, geographically and in many other ways. Unless we develop pilots, we shall never be able to explore, settle or progress to the north in the way that we should. The moneys that were handed back could be used for this, and I am sure the minister could make a good case before his colleagues.

I was pleased to hear him say this afternoon that he had had an initial experience with these clubs. I am sure that his dealings with them will have convinced him, as they have convinced me, from what I have seen of them, that at least they are run by excellent citizens, people with vision and imagination, people who, if given some assistance now, could continue to do the wonderful job for our country that they have in the past.

I shall end as I have begun by asking the minister for more than the sympathetic support of his colleagues. I ask him to put the case to them before the supplementary estimates are brought down, so that this temporary pre-war scheme can be reinstated and the whole position fully discussed between the government and the flying clubs.

516. Meteorological services, $4,674,335.

Mr. COCKERAM: I notice that the total of wages and salaries paid to the permanent staff amounts to $376,478. The amount paid for temporary assistance amounts to $2,037,451. The minister has said that this happens in all departments of government. In this case I take the view that the amount is out of all proportion to the number of permanent employees of the department. Will the minister give us a breakdown of the $2,037,451? Let us have an explanation of this temporary assistance.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. member would like an explanation of why the temporary assistance amounts to $2,037,451 as compared with the amount for permanent employees. The answer is that during the war it was impossible to make these employees permanent. That is why the relationship between permanent and temporary employees is so one-sided, Until such time as the war was over and we moved into a more stable position, it was not possible to do what my hon. friend has in mind. It will take some time before it can be done. When, I do not know. I am informed by my officials that it is being carried out gradually, and that the normal position, which should be, I suppose, eighty-five per cent permanent and fifteen per cent temporary, will be reached in due course. When, I cannot say.

Mr. COCKERAM: How many employees are covered by "temporary assistance"?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Roughly, 1,100.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the hon. member for York South has a point there. There is nothing wrong with it, except that members of the committee do not know the number of temporaries as compared with the number of permanents. The matter came up in one of the committees I happened to be on and there was some questioning. The explanation is fairly simple. The minister mentioned fifteen per cent as temporary. I believe the percentage given me was twenty.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It was at that time.

Mr. MacINNIS: I was given that the other day, but it is not worth quarreling about. During the war there was a great increase in many departments, and these additional employees will be for the most part temporaries until they have served their probation and have been made permanent. If the department, in presenting the estimates, would give the number and grades of temporaries as well as of those who are permanent it would clear away the difficulties and we would know where we stood.

Mr. COCKERAM: How many of these meteorological stations are there in Canada and what is the set-up? Some in the north country have only one man. Can the minister let us know something about the department in which we spend so much money?

Mr. CHEVRIER: There are about twelve main forecast offices in such places as Goose, Gander, Halifax, Moncton, Dorval, Malton, Winnipeg, Edmonton, Whitehorse and Vancouver, and 220 surface weather reporting stations. Of these, 110 provide weather information every hour and thirty-five provide winds aloft information.

Mr. COCKERAM: Most of those in the north are the kind with only one man?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The surface weather stations would have from two to four, and the main forecast offices would have as many as forty. There are 740 climatological stations. Of these, about 460 are manned by voluntary observers.

Mr. PEARKES: Two years ago the forecast station at Victoria was discontinued and, since then, we have been getting weather reports from Vancouver. It would appear that the weather on the south coast of Vancouver island has deteriorated ever since that change. Can we get our station back?—because really there has been no change in the weather.

Mr. KNOWLES: Good old weatherman.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Has the minister given further consideration to the establishment of a weather reporting ship off the north Pacific coast? I understand that representations have been made. Can such a ship be established? It is conceded that it would be a valuable addition to the facilities for providing weather information in Canada.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is no finality on that question. The matter is under consideration, but no decision has been arrived at.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Do the officials think it would be desirable to have such a station?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not know.

Mr. PEARKES: Can you open up our Victoria station?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is true that the station has been discontinued. Vancouver has been given the job of forecasting weather over that area.

Mr. PEARKES: They have done it very badly.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The complaints are being investigated from head office here.

Mr. SKEY: What is the division of responsibility as between the minister and the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply? Are all these items which we have dealt with this afternoon under the immediate jurisdiction and authority of the Minister of Transport?

Mr. CHEVRIER: During the war, when the present Minister of Trade and Commerce was appointed Minister of Munitions and Supply, he assumed full responsibility for all air services and continued to have that responsibility until about a month ago. The position now is that the responsibility, which was at first with the Minister of Transport but which, by virtue of the Transfer of Duties Act, went to the Minister of Munitions and Supply, is once more under the Minister of Transport, save for responsibility for Trans-Canada Air Lines, which remains with the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The responsibility is now with the Minister of Transport with that one exception.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is no item in the estimates of transport for which the Minister of Trade and Commerce is responsible to parliament.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No.

Mr. SKEY: So T.C.A. is now in the same situation as Polymer and Park Steamships?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. SKEY: The minister of reconstruction is operating the air lines and the Minister of Transport runs all the rest.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

517. Administration of the Radio Act and regulations, $540,277.

Mr. COCKERAM: Can the minister explain this set-up? I notice that there are many engineers. What are the duties of this division, having regard to Canadian broadcasting activities?

Mr. CHEVRIER: This estimate is a consolidation of the normal and former demobilization and reconversion appropriations. It provides for the headquarters staff at Ottawa engaged in the general administration of the radio division and the Radio Act. It provides for the operation and maintenance of five frequency standards and monitoring stations at Hartlen Point, Nova Scotia; Ottawa, Strathburn, Ontario; Winnipeg, and Vancouver; two ionospherics observation stations at Clyde River, Baffin Island and St. John's, Newfoundland; the radio standards laboratory at Ottawa; aircraft radio inspection services at Halifax, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver, $12,205; and for prosecutions in connection with radio licences and other infractions under the act, $17,725.

Mr. HERRIDGE: May I refer to the radio reception under this item?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That will come under item 519.

Mr. SKEY: If this can be treated as a general item I should like to put some questions to the minister on the subject of television, because I see no other place I can deal with it. I want to begin by asking whether the department have any plans for inaugurating television service in at least the major urban centres of Canada in the near future.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed that at their last meeting the board of governors of the Canadian broadcasting corporation gave consideration to this question. A report has not been forthcoming from the board, however, and until it is, I am afraid I am not in a position to give much information. I have some ideas, but I would not attempt to put them forward until I knew what the recommendation was, if there is one, of the C.B.C.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the C.B.C. report to you?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It reports to the Minister of National Revenue; but, as far as licences are concerned, the Minister of Transport may approve the recommendations made by the board of governors of the C.B.C., and, as a rule, he does not interfere with those recommendations.

Mr. SKEY: I am glad to learn that this decision has not yet been taken, because I should like to make one or two personal observations which I think will meet with the approval of anyone who has ever seen television in operation. May I ask the minister if he has ever seen a television set in operation?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have not.

Mr. SKEY: I would strongly recommend that, before any decision is reached, the minister and as many as possible of his colleagues should see television demonstrated. Recently I had an opportunity of seeing it in operation, and I was tremendously impressed with the clarity with which the picture comes through on the electronic beam and tube. I should like to put on record one or two statistics for the minister's consideration. In the first place, in the United States advertising by television has increased by over 800 per cent in one year. There are twenty-seven television broadcasting stations now in operation, and there will be a coast to coast hook-up in the United States by the end of this year.

These figures are significant when one realizes that here in Canada we have experts and electrical companies who have gone a long way in research in these fields. I have particular reference to Wing Commander Patrick, formerly of the R.C.A.F., who is now with RCA-Victor and who was our radar specialist at Clinton school during the war. If the attitude of the C.B.C. can be liberal, shall I say, in this field I believe it will bring forth great advances in Canadian culture and in the sporting field. So I believe we should not only ask the C.B.C. to enter the television field, but that private radio stations should have the right to apply for television licences, which should be granted in particular to those serving urban centres.

I should like to touch on just one more point, and it is this. Unless the government takes action in the television field, we shall find our country invaded by the television broadcasters of the United States, in one way or another. If we wish to maintain our own institutions and our independent method of operation we should get moving now in the television field.

518. Radio direction finding stations, radio beacons and radiotelegraph stations, operation and maintenance, $1,508,243.

Mr. PEARKES: Representations have been made that the radio beacon service on the west coast has been far from satisfactory. I know, when the minister was visiting Vancouver island a year ago, this situation was pointed out to him, and I understood that efforts were being made to improve that service and to have two new radio beacons erected on the coast. What progress has been made in that direction?

Mr. CHEVRIER: We have been reviewing the position, and we are making provision for two new beacons.

Mr. PEARKES: They are included in this estimate?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Where are those beacons to be located?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The sites have not been finally determined.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): But they will be erected this year?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is in the estimates.

Air service—Radio division—

519. Suppression of radio interferences, $321,291.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Under this item, I want to bring two matters to the attention of the minister, one concerning radio reception in my district, and the other having to do with radio interference. In the district I have the honour to represent, we have two radio stations, one at Trail and the other at Nelson. I speak of the situation there, because I know in recent years these stations have served the outlying districts less and less, as a result of the increased power of the United States stations. The local stations serve the two communities of Trail and Nelson very well indeed, but in the upper portion of the Arrow lakes, particularly, and in some parts of the Kootenay lakes these stations cannot be heard satisfactorily, particularly at night. I am not an expert; I have very little knowledge of anything mechanical; but cannot something be done by putting in a booster station, or something of that sort, to provide satisfactory radio reception for those living in these isolated places? I realize it is a difficult problem, but quite a large number of my constituents now get very poor reception indeed, which I understand is largely due to the fact that the stronger United States stations drown out the local stations, particularly during the evening hours.

There is another point with respect to radio interference. It seems that as the years go by, interference becomes worse and worse. I understand that all the new electrical gadgets, razors and machines of all types, cause a great deal of difficulty. I believe the departmental officials have toured the district and done their best to locate the trouble; but it is still a serious matter, so much so that in the upper Arrow lakes and some sections of the Kootenay lakes it is not worthwhile to listen to the radio. I do not know what the laws are in that respect; but I am sure something can be done to place protective devices on this electrical equipment, which is being used to a far greater extent than ever before; and this must be done if we are to have any sort of satisfactory radio reception.

I should like the minister's comments on the matter of reception and on the question of radio interference.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the poor reception to which the hon. member refers is due exclusively to other, high-powered stations either in our own country or in another country, then the way to overcome that difficulty is for the private station to increase its power. That situation did not exist years ago, when many stations both in Canada and the United States used less power than they use today. The situation in my hon. friend's community is a duplication of what is happening elsewhere. Many of the smaller stations have found it necessary to make application for an increase in power, and in most cases, when the position is as my hon. friend states, these applications have been granted.

As far as interference is concerned, we have inspectors looking after such matters. I do not know where the nearest one would be to my hon. friend's constituency; I presume he would be in Vancouver, though I am not too sure. It is part of the duties of these inspectors to go out with the interference car and ascertain what may be the cause of the bad reception. There is a multitude of causes, such as defective wiring or alternate current. Very often in the homes there are oil burners, washing machines and the like which affect the reception. If the hon. member will write to the inspector or say a word to the officers I think there would be no question about the inspector's going out, getting the facts and finding out what the causes are, with a view to eliminating them. Some of those causes are local, and sometimes people do not like to instal the equipment necessary to do away with the interference.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I have a problem similar to that mentioned by the hon. member. I am curious to know if there is any co-operation between the suppression branch of the minister's department and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I often think I would like to see the C.B.C. in the capable hands of the Minister of Transport. The two would work well together.

For instance, a man from the suppression branch comes to Alberni and states that there is no chance of proper or adequate radio reception there until C.B.C. programs are piped in by wire. The result is that 10,000 or 12,000 people have not proper or adequate radio coverage. I have applied to the C.B.C. for an extension of the wire facilities in there, but I am wondering what the effect would be if my representations were supported in some routine manner by the minister's department.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have to tell the hon. member that there is no connection between the radio services of the Department of Transport and C.B.C. Perhaps the best answer to the question would be this, that if the radio service were under the C.B.C. or if the C.B.C. were under the radio service branch of this department, that would meet the position. C.B.C. operations have to do with the licensing of stations, not with the interference with and suppression of radio activity.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): It has always seemed to me that the Department of National Revenue could have nothing to do with radio. Certainly there is no revenue from the C.B.C. It would seem to me much more satisfactory to have it in the hands of the minister.

Mr. MOORE: The hon. member for Mackenzie and I have had communications in the last two years in which we have pointed out radio interference at Gillam, Wabowden and Churchill, caused by the operation of government teletype machines at Churchill. Several attempts have been made to overcome the interference in the past, but I understand that up to the present time those attempts have not been successful. Would the minister look into the situation and, if possible, have it corrected?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have already had correspondence with the Canadian National Telegraphs, and I shall look into the matter again.

Air service—Radio division—

520. Issue of radio receiving licences—(Transport department only), $571,439.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Chairman, to my mind the C.B.C. should be under the wing of the Department of Transport. This vote shows extravagance on the part of the government, and there can be no justification for the vote at all. It is just a silly thing. This is a nuisance tax, and we find that the consolidated revenue fund has to pay for the collection of this $2.50 tax, the amount of the licence fee.

The C.B.C. receives the full amount of fees collected. The situation is really incongruous. It is hard to understand how the government would act in this way. Here we have an expenditure of $571,439 to collect $4,798,000. I got those figures today from the C.B.C., and perhaps the minister would tell me if they are correct. This $571,439 is not chicken-feed; it is taken from the taxpayers of this country, just in the same way as any other taxing money comes from the taxpayers. This amount of money appearing in the vote is the expense in connection with the collection of moneys to be paid over to the C.B.C. It is raised by the Department of National Revenue, through taxation of one kind or another which, on the average, is collected for about one per cent. But when one looks at this he finds the ridiculous situation where it costs eleven per cent to collect this sum of $4,798,000 which is paid over to the C.B.C. I cannot understand how anyone with ordinary common sense would say that we should pay eleven per cent to collect a nuisance tax; and why it is collected, I do not know. Why pay that amount, when money can be collected for slightly more than one per cent?

More than that, many people forget to pay this tax, and other people do not buy licences. There are plenty of people who have radios and who have paid no tax.

Not only that, if you have one radio you must pay a tax of $2.50, but if you have ten radios you pay no more. However, if you have a radio in your car you must pay $2.50 extra. The whole thing is silly. And if one does not pay his tax, the next thing he knows he is hauled into court and must pay not only the tax but the expense of collecting it, and a fine.

Why is the tax collected? It is collected, supposedly, to support the C.B.C. in its programming. Yet, in many places the C.B.C. cannot be heard. Only a short time ago in Fort Frances, while the C.B.C. could not be heard, the people were forced to pay their tax, simply because they had radios.

This amount is not for the policing of radio, because that is provided for in another vote. The Department of Transport does that on another basis by an expenditure from the consolidated revenue fund. This $571,439 is simply for the collection of the $2.50 fee from everyone. It is collected from the pensioner who gets only $40 a month, from the burnt-out soldier, from the widows—and to these people the expenditure means a great deal. The whole thing is ridiculous.

And, what is worse, it is not the listener who must pay, but the owner of the radio. It is he who pays the sales tax, the 25 per cent luxury tax; and because he has a radio operating he must pay this fee of $2.50. The whole thing is so silly! I cannot say how silly I think it is! What the principle is I do not know. If you are going to tax at all, you should tax every radio. On the other hand, if you are going to tax you ought to tax the people who are listening, not the people who have the radio and are giving enjoyment to the public who have no radio.

I just have to make this protest again. I could go on and talk much longer. Parliament passed an act which provided that the C.B.C. were not to be charged for the collection of this fee as had been the case in the past. All you need to do if the C.B.C. needs money is to pay them something for every person in Canada, pay them on a per capita basis and have them stick to that, instead of having this nuisance tax, having people come up and ring your doorbell and ask if you have paid your radio fee. There are hundreds of other people who have not and others are called into court because they have not paid or have neglected to pay. The thing is just too silly when one comes to think of it.

It costs $571,439 to collect $4,798,000 which the C.B.C. get without any charge. Why should they get the total amount? It is only a subterfuge. If they need more money, why not raise the rates, or why not charge on every radio?

If this is an indication of government policy in connection with the estimates of the other departments; if all estimates are as extravagant as this, then we ought to scrutinize the estimates of all the departments much more than we have been doing. This $571,439 is the taxpayers' money, and it is collected for no reason at all that I can see.

Mr. COCKERAM: This item reads:

Issue of radio receiving licences—(Transport department only).

What other cost is there in the issuing of radio licences if this does not cover it all?

Mr. CHEVRIER: There are accounting services by the Department of Transport.

Mr. COCKERAM: In going through the minister's estimates, I find that over three-quarters of a million dollars are for sundry items. Surely there should be a better system of handling expenses, so that you would not need to have over $750,000 in sundry items.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to have the minister's opinion of this $2.50 tax on radios. I want to know whether he thinks eleven per cent is a reasonable cost of collecting this tax?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, I think eleven per cent is more than good; it is more than what it would cost to do it in any other way. The hon. member has been critical of this item, but he has not suggested any other way in which it can be done.

Mr. ROSS (St Paul's): I have suggested that a per capita amount be granted to the C.B.C. from the consolidated revenue fund, and in that way it could be collected for a little over one per cent. The minister says this is an economical way to collect this tax, but how would he like to collect all taxes and have it cost eleven per cent? How can he justify taxing the poor fellow with one radio $2.50, while the other fellow with ten needs to pay only the same amount? Then those who cannot get reception from the C.B.C. have to pay as well.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I repeat that eleven per cent for collection of this licence fee is not only average; it is good. I do not know of any other way in which it can be done as economically. My hon. friend has suggested a method, but if it were done in that way it would destroy the independence of the C.B.C.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It would not destroy their independence.

Mr. CHEVRIER: My hon. friend has been doing a lot of talking, and perhaps he will allow me to say something. The hon. member makes a speech on this item every time it comes up. He does not like the $2.50 charge and I do not imagine anybody else does. However, there must be a charge in order to administer this service. At one time it was $2 and then it was increased to $2.50. It has not been changed in the last several years. My hon. friend wants to know what I think of it. I think the fee is a fair one. Perhaps it would be far better if it were possible to do without it, but I think the charge is fair, having regard to the service given. I do not think the average person who sits at home and listens to a program from the C.B.C. or some other station will complain very much about the $2.50. The proof of that lies in the fact that on an average the people pay up fairly well.

Mr. KNOWLES: Five cents a week.

Mr. CHEVRIER: On an average they pay more voluntarily in the radio field than they do in others. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says it is only five cents a week. No one can complain about that. I suppose, on this item, we could enter into an argument which would go on a long time. I am familiar with my hon. friend's views, because I have heard them before. He is entitled to them, but I do not think it would be advisable at this time to do away with the $2.50 fee.

[Mr. Ross (St. Paul's).]

Mr. SHAW: It occurred to me when I first examined this estimate that the cost of collecting the licence fees was unreasonably high, and I have not been entirely convinced that it is not. The minister asserts that they have adopted the best method possible, at least what they believe is the best method possible for the collection of these licence fees. I fancy that the government would be well advised to give further consideration to a less costly method of collection.

It is true that eleven per cent might be quite reasonable, having regard to the methods employed, but I personally feel that the government would be well advised to give further consideration to developing a better method. On page 285 of the estimates appears the following item:

> Payments to Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in lieu of commissions to issuers.

I should like to have some clarification of that statement. My understanding is that the Department of Transport now remits to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation $2.50 for each $2.50 collected, the cost of collection being a charge against the Department of Transport. I am not positive as to the reason for the change in procedure, unless it was to make the balance sheet of the C.B.C., a public enterprise, look more favourable to the public. I sometimes think that was the reason. Will the minister explain that statement at the bottom of page 285?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The authority for the change whereby the Minister of Finance passes directly into consolidated revenue fund the amount of the licence fees is to be found in section 14 (1) (a) of the Canadian Broadcasting Act, which was amended last year. That amendment reads:

> (a) the gross amount of the moneys received in each year from licence fees in respect of private receiving licences and private station broadcasting licences without deducting therefrom any costs of collection or administration.

Prior to that, costs of collection were deducted. That is why this vote has been increased, because it includes not only the cost of administration but the commission to the agents who collect the licence fees.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister argued that if so much money was taken from consolidated revenue and handed over to the C.B.C. it would destroy its independence. That is exactly what is happening now; the money is being handed over to the C.B.C., but its independence is not destroyed. I cannot see how the minister can justify the present situation in which $571,000 is taken from the taxpayers of Canada in order to collect this

$2.50 licence fee. No inspection is given in return for the licence fee, no more than is given of an electric heater or a stoker that a man may have in his home; nor does the department get any benefit from this $2.50. The thing is silly.

Mr. COCKERAM: Would the minister explain that item of sundries and let us know why a little closer estimate cannot be made of the department's requirements?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Which item?

Mr. COCKERAM: I was referring to the sundries items which appears all through these estimates. These sundries amount to over three-quarters of a million dollars.

Mr. CHEVRIER: In most of the administrative votes, not only for air services but other branches, there is a breakdown and, as my hon. friend says, there are a number of items for sundries. They are to cover miscellaneous unforeseen expenses which cannot be classified under a particular heading such as "salaries."

Mr. COCKERAM: What is covered by "sundries?" They do not cover printing, telegraph and telephone service, because these items are mentioned separately.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am trying to tell my hon. friend what is covered by "sundries," if he will allow me. Apparently he has made an addition of all the sundry items. I have not added them up and do not know what they total. What I am trying to say is that in every business or corporation, and much more so in government, there are a number of unforeseeable expenses that come up from time to time, depending on things that take place. In the administrative items there is a breakdown. If my hon. friend wants a detailed explanation of all the sundries I suppose I could ask my officers to procure the information, but it would be an almost impossible task to give a breakdown of sundries. I am looking now at the item for sundries in the vote for departmental administration, transport. The amount is $22,591.

Mr. COCKERAM: There is another item for sundries totalling $301,120.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Which is that?

Mr. COCKERAM: I will find it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is another one in the radio service for $30,000. It has to do with increased cost of snow removal, increased contributions to unemployment insurance, rental of buildings, equipment and land which had not been foreseen and which was not provided for when the main estimate was made up. All that was lumped in the item for sundries.

Mr. CHURCH: I want to say something about prosecutions for not having a radio licence. In the first year the prosecutions were practically confined to the city of Toronto. There were practically no prosecutions in this city or in the city across the river. Furthermore, there should be uniformity in the fines. A person should not be fined $25 in one town and practically nothing in another town. There should be a uniform scale of fines. I look upon the radio corporation as one of the most mischievous in this country. They give our hon. friends to our left a great deal of advertising. I do not blame them for getting it, but they do get it. Our proceedings in this house might just as well be conducted in secret for all the reports that are carried of them on the radio or in the newspapers. The columnists in the gallery walk out as soon as questions on the orders of the day are over, and let the public know only what they choose to have them know about proceedings here. I do not want to hold up the minister's estimates, because he has been here all day. I am not objecting to my hon. friends to the left always getting the radio and press precedence in the proceedings of the house. No doubt some speeches here about their policies are good, and some not so good.

There is a lot of dissatisfaction with the radio programs and cost of licences and fines. The public do not think they are what they should be. Secondly, we are spending a very large sum of money on radio. I know the minister has not had charge of radio for very long, but I do say that there should be equality of treatment and a schedule of fines for one and all, with equality. I fail to see why a person should be fined $25 in our police courts and practically nothing in some other city with no prosecutions in some. That might have been what an hon. member was referring to yesterday when he spoke of the magistrates' courts. On the whole, though, I have found them fair. There should be a lot of improvements made before we spend all this money on radio.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I say a word in connection with the matter of radio licences? I realize that it is very popular to complain about any tax and that it is similarly unpopular to defend a tax; but it seems to me that this is one tax, if you can call it that, about which there is not much complaint, and to which there should be little objection.

Mr. FRASER: The hon. member must have been asleep.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Did you hear the hon. member for St. Paul's?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes; that is what prompted me to get to my feet; you can blame him for my intervention at this time. The minister caught my interjection that this $2.50 means only five cents a week. I think that is a pretty small amount to pay for the service which we are getting from the C.B.C., and for what the C.B.C. is doing in helping to bring this country closer together, to improve programs and generally add to our cultural development. I was amazed to hear the hon. member for St. Paul's complain about this huge amount of money, $2.50 a year, which amounts to five cents a week. When I went to a show last Saturday I found that, despite the fact that the amusement tax had been taken off by the federal government, it was still being collected by the provincial government of Ontario.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): For the hospitals.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is being collected by a government which the hon. member for St. Paul's supports. I find that if one goes to the Capitol theatre in the afternoon the ticket costs thirty cents, plus six cents tax. If you go in the evening the ticket costs forty-six cents, plus nine cents tax.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I thought you fellows couldn't afford to go to the theatre.

Mr. FRASER: In the afternoons?

Mr. KNOWLES: Saturday. I go so seldom that I had to telephone the theatre just now to find out what these amounts were.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Buy a liquor licence.

Mr. KNOWLES: I will leave that to my hon. friend who is trying to get the floor. The hon. member for St. Paul's supports the government of the province of Ontario which charges six cents for a two-hour show in the afternoon and nine cents for a two-hour show at night; yet he kicks about five cents a week for a licence for a radio to which you can listen twelve or fourteen hours a day, seven days a week.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The hon. member who has just spoken forgot my opening remarks. I said there was no justification for this vote. I suggested that a cost of $571,000 to collect $4,000,000 odd was out of the question.

Mr. CHEVRIER: We heard you.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes, I know. I suggested that that was not an economical or a sound way of doing it; that is all. I also mentioned that it was not a fair tax. If the hon. gentleman thinks a cost of eleven per cent is the right way to collect the tax, all I can say is that probably that is C.C.F. policy, but I do not agree with it. I do not think it is right, and I cannot see any principle on which it is based. I cannot see the principle on which the tax is collected. You either license the radio or you license the listener. What are you going to do?

Mr. KNOWLES: All that my hon. friends are trying to do is to harpoon the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): No, I have nothing of the kind in my mind. I think the corporation is doing a wonderful job. I do not mind saying that, but I say there is another way of collecting this tax. There is no harpooning in it. I think this is an extravagant way of collecting money that is to be used for the development of radio, and the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat knows it.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I would ask the hon. member for St. Paul's to address the Chair when he rises to speak. I want to be fair to all hon. members.

Mr. CARDIFF: Why is it necessary to subsidize the C.B.C. either by the tax that is collected from the individual as a radio licence fee, or by the government, when independent radio stations are self-sustaining without any assistance?

Mr. FRASER: That is the $64 question.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed the reason is that the C.B.C. have to provide programs which involve a certain cost, and they have no revenue other than this.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes, they have.

Mr. FRASER: They have commercials.

Mr. CHEVRIER: They have some commercial revenue, but not enough to meet expenses, and that is one of the reasons why it was decided last year to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation Act, in order to provide for the payment into the consolidated revenue fund of these licence fees, so that the C.B.C. could get the full advantage.

Mr. CARDIFF: Does the C.B.C. not charge any fee for the use of their stations by individuals as private stations do? We have a private station in my own riding. It serves all that section of western Ontario. The operators of that station started out with absolutely nothing. Now it is one of the best radio stations we have in western Ontario.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am afraid my hon. friend is entering into a field for which I have no responsibility. I am not responsible for the operations of the C.B.C.; the Minister of National Revenue is. There is an item in his estimates, or annexed to his estimates, covering that. I would appreciate it if my hon. friend would direct his question to the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I am given to understand that marine radio telephone stations are required to make a deposit of $50 with the Department of Transport. Is that so?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, I am informed that that is correct.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): That is unfortunate. Our fishermen are honest chaps. Most of them who have a radio station on their ships have invested $70,000 or $80,000 in these ships. If they go into the oil dock to get oil it is naturally assumed that the ship is liable for any fee. I wonder whether this is not an unnecessary amount of capital that we are asking our fishermen to tie up when we ask them to make these deposits. I would hardly think it should be necessary. It is a reflection on our maritime fishermen.

Mr. TIMMINS: With respect to this item, it occurs to me this is the proper time to make a protest in connection with the way in which part of the money which we are voting here is spent by the C.B.C. I am not going to take any time on this, but I want to say it seems silly for us to be taking money from the people in radio licences and at the same time pouring it down the drain by a lot of advertising that the C.B.C. carries every day. In the papers in Toronto, and probably throughout the dominion as well, we have an advertisement which is called "Kesten's Corner". It is an advertisement in respect of CJBC. They call it "Better Listening".

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman and say that I have no responsibility for the matter which he is now discussing. This item has to do with radio receiving licences. I am not responsible for the operation of C.B.C. or for the expenditures.

Mr. TIMMINS: I do not want to labour this point. I simply say that to me it is incongruous that on the one hand the Minister of Transport is asking for money in respect of these matters, and on the other hand we, the representatives of the people, can see the money being poured down the drain in a lot of nonsense in respect of radio advertising. I make my protest. This minister may not be able to deal with it, but there is a lot of silly advertising material in the papers with respect to a corporation which is really a monopoly, and it is quite out of order. Somewhere along the line we should make a protest, and I make that protest now.

Mr. COCKERAM: I want to go back to sundries. The minister did not realize that there was one item of $301,120, a sundry item in his estimates. Surely there is an explanation for an item of that size. It is on page 279 of the estimates, in airways and airports.

Mr. CHEVRIER: We have passed airways and airports.

Mr. COCKERAM: But we are talking of these sundry items.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not propose to go back to sundries in connection with airports.

Mr. COCKERAM: You were going to just now. I got you in an embarrassing spot on this and you will not answer; that is all.

Mr. CHEVRIER: You may think I am in an embarrassing spot.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Under what item can I find collection of fees for sending and receiving radio stations on ships? I am interested in this matter in connection with fishing boats. Under what item does the $50 deposit come?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed it is under item 517.

Mr. COCKERAM: Will the minister give the details of this item for sundries?

Mr. CHEVRIER: If it is the $301,120 which we have already passed, it has to do with proficiency allowances, telegrams, telephones, travelling expenses and other miscellaneous expenses and, having regard to the fact that the vote covered $11,138,000, proportionately, it is about the same as any other administrative branch.

Mr. COCKERAM: All through these estimates there are items which we vote for telegrams, telephones, printing and so on. Why should they come back in sundries? There is a little extra money that should not be there.

Mr. SHAW: We understand that each year radio licence renewal forms are sent out. I believe there are inspectors constantly at work making a check-up in the various communities throughout the country, with reference to these licences. I find nothing on page 285 making provision for inspectors to carry on this work. How many such persons are there, and where is provision made for them?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Under item 517.

Mr. McMASTER: This is a case where we are spending money for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No. We are not spending money for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. We are collecting licence fees.

Mr. McMASTER: It is done to obtain money for them. It is rather a bonus to them, and what I protest against is this. If you ask the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for a statement showing how their expenses are made up they give you about four items. One is for talent, which is something over $1,000,000; another is for engineering, also something over $1,000,000, and there are several items which go to make up a sum approximately the same as the amount of the licence fees collected, that is, $4,800,000. We have every reason to object to this item, unless the C.B.C. will give to parliament a detailed statement showing how the money is spent. It is another case where the government hides behind a crown corporation; yet, because of its majority in parliament, asks us to bonus that corporation, and we have no control over their expenses.

Mr. LENNARD: The minister asked for suggestions with regard to collecting the money required for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I have a suggestion which I think would prove satisfactory. Instead of having this nuisance tax, with the trouble and expense entailed in collecting it every year, it might be done away with, and while there might be a period in which the revenue would be slim, I suggest that new radios sold could have a tax put upon them which would be final and there would not be all this fuss that we have seen this afternoon.

Mr. FRASER: The hon. member for York South asked a question regarding sundries and the minister said that sundries covered telephones, telegrams and so on.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. FRASER: If that is the case, why do we find, listed above sundries—

Mr. CHEVRIER: I was dealing with the particular item to which reference was made, the $301,000 odd in connection with airports and airways, where there was no provision for telegrams and the like.

Mr. FRASER: What would sundries in these other items cover? That is what the hon. member was asking.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No. He was asking for a breakdown of the other item.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. COCKERAM: I asked that before you said it was telegrams.

Mr. CHEVRIER: This particular item was passed two hours ago.

Mr. FRASER: Not the item I am asking about.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The item you are asking about was passed two hours ago.

Mr. FRASER: I am asking about the item at the bottom of page 285 of the estimates. It is a small amount, but there is another "sundries", and these are the ones the hon. member was asking about.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I cannot give any other explanation than that which I gave the hon. member for York South some time ago, namely, that it is to take care of expenses which cannot be foreseen when the main estimates are brought down. Another point I attempted to make at the time was that in every corporation and business there is an item covering miscellaneous and sundry expenses and, having regard to the small amount of $7,790 with reference to the entire vote, it is not out of proportion.

Mr. FRASER: I asked if that covered telegrams and telephones—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: It being six o'clock, I now leave the chair.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is the item carried?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

429. Citizenship registration branch, $165,105.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like briefly to discuss one matter and to ask some questions of the Secretary of State, arising out of the appointment last July by the government of a royal commission to inquire into and report upon the claims of persons of Japanese race arising out of their dispossession of lands and personal property at the time of the movement eastward of those people in the hectic days after the Japanese entry into the war.

I do not intend to go back over the long story which was revealed before the public accounts committee during the session of 1947. I merely make this comment on the facts as elicited by that committee, that, making all allowances for the grave exigencies of the times, the story does not reflect credit upon the administration of the lands and properties of those persons. In most cases those lands were taken from them and sold by the custodian of enemy property, an officer of the government, to another government department at a price which I submit was unwarrantably low and altogether inadequate. That is clearly established by the fact that the price paid by the one government department to the other did not yield more than two-thirds of the assessed valuation; and when some of these properties were valued at a later date it was found that the values established by the officers and committees appointed by the custodian of enemy property were in the aggregate more than twice those established by the other government department, namely the Veterans' Land Act administration, for these properties. In the case of some few which were sold in the open market, the values realized were several times those paid for similar properties by the government department which bought them, namely the Department of Veterans Affairs.

I do not intend to go into that story in greater detail. It was fully covered in the public accounts committee, which submitted a report to this house. In the concluding paragraph of that report, the committee made what I conceive to be an important recommendation. The report of the public accounts committee was tabled in the house on June 17, 1947, and was adopted by the house on motion on June 27. The report will be found set out at pages 536 and 537 of the Journals of the House for 1947. The recommendation in the concluding paragraph of the report reads:

> In view of the evidence adduced and in order that more information may be obtained as to the desirability of adjusting any apparent discrimination or loss which may have resulted from the taking over or sale of property of any kind, your committee recommends that a commission be appointed under the provisions of the Inquiries Act to inquire into and report upon the claim of any person of the Japanese race now resident in Canada for alleged loss which resulted from the amount received by him being less than the fair market value of his property at time of sale or loss.

That is the recommendation which was adopted by the house without dissent. I draw attention to the concluding words. The royal commission which was proposed should inquire into and report upon the claim of any person of Japanese race for alleged loss resulting "from the amount received by him being less than the fair market value of his property at time of sale or loss." Some weeks later the government did proceed to appoint a royal commission. That appointment was announced from Ottawa on July 23, 1947. The government appointed as royal commissioner Mr. Justice Henry I. Bird of the British Columbia Supreme Court. In the statement issued by the Secretary of State announcing the appointment of Mr. Justice Bird as royal commissioner, the terms of the commission of inquiry were set forth. In those terms, the commissioner was instructed to report to the governor in council—and these are the words used:

> . . . the claims which, in his opinion, are well founded and the amount which, in his opinion, would fairly and reasonably compensate the claimant for failure of the custodian to exercise reasonable care.

I draw attention to the fact that those terms of reference were very much restricted as compared with those approved by this house on the recommendation of the public accounts committee. They confined the scope of the inquiry to claims arising out of negligence in administration on the part of the custodian of enemy property. That was not a democratic action on the part of the government; and I am sure all hon. members are glad that wiser and more democratic counsels prevailed within the government, because on September 12, 1947, the Minister of Justice announced that the order in council providing for the inquiry into the disposition of the property of persons of the Japanese race had been broadened to meet with suggestions made by the public accounts committee in its report to parliament.

I have looked for that second order in council of September 12, 1947, enlarging and broadening the terms of reference. I have not been able to find it; but I take it that the press dispatch announcing the passing of the order in council was an accurate statement, and that the commission of inquiry was broadened to conform with the precise terms of the recommendation of the public accounts committee, which was unanimously endorsed by this house. In passing, I would ask the Secretary of State to give the committee the terms of the order in council of September 12 enlarging the scope of the inquiry.

I have seen press dispatches of the same date indicating that the task before the royal commissioner, Mr. Justice Bird, in all probability would consume no less than three years. It is a large task, and no doubt involves a detailed review of many claims, each involving proof of perhaps a number of items, many of them no doubt small, and in circumstances such as to render it perhaps difficult today to obtain complete evidence, by reason of the fact that six years have passed since the date of dispossession.

There are some questions hon. members will wish to ask. I for one wish to ask certain questions of the Secretary of State with reference to the progress being made by the royal commissioner in the heavy task he has assumed. I would ask the Secretary of State if he would be good enough to give a report on the sittings of the commission to date, telling how many claims have been filed, whether the royal commissioner has made any interim report with respect to the claims he has heard, whether any action has been taken by the government on the reports so made, how long the hearings are expected to last, how they are progressing, and other questions of a similar nature.

May I add this in closing, that in acting in conformity with the wishes of the house as expressed on June 27, at the time of the adoption of the report of the committee on public accounts, the government in my opinion has acted properly, although tardily; and it is the hope of many of us that even at this late date justice will be done to those who suffered from a situation which no doubt can be attributed directly to the exigencies of the war, but the impact of which, many of us think, fell unfairly and in a discriminatory manner upon these unfortunate persons of the Japanese race.

I do not wish to open any old wounds. However, at this time I think all hon. members will wish to concentrate on seeing that, so far as possible, at this late date, full efforts are made to redress the property losses which these persons, residents of Canada, sustained in those trying days.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): To answer this question, I would say that the commission which was appointed comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Justice. However I shall secure a copy of the terms of reference as extended by the order in council of September 12, 1947, and see that it is tabled. I understand that in the neighbourhood of 1,800 claims have been filed, that the commissioner has held hearings in Vancouver and throughout the western provinces, that he has completed his hearings in Toronto and is at present completing them in Montreal. I understand that he will be returning to the west and will hold further hearings upon reaching Vancouver.

In the meantime, other judges have been appointed with power to hear evidence, so that the commission may be completed at as early a day as possible. I understand that up to the present no interim report has been filed.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to say a few words at this time; and in doing so—

[Mr. Fleming.]

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We are on item 429, citizenship registration branch.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes. I thank the hon. member for Eglinton for mentioning this matter and dealing with it in the manner in which he has. I thought of rising myself, but I was not sure whether it would be proper to do so, while the lost property is subject to inquiry by the royal commissioner.

I have a large number of cases which, on the surface, appear to show that a tremendous injustice has been done to many of these people. As a matter of fact, injustice has been done to them, apart from their loss of property. There has been, however, that injustice in the matter of property. I appreciate that it will be difficult to give those claims their proper value, because one has to keep in mind the accretion of property values from the time these people were moved from the Pacific coast to the present.

There can be no point in emphasizing the matter further at this time, but I hope the royal commission will keep in mind not only the value of the property itself and that there will be adequate recompense in that regard, but also the injustice that has been done to these people by uprooting them and scattering them throughout the country in the way it was done.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Chairman, I have in the back of my mind a profound respect for our approach to problems of this kind with regard to the civilization which you, sir, and I, and all of us in Canada enjoy under our present standards. But when my hon. friend rises in his place and uses an expression of the magnitude of "tremendous injustice," when speaking of those people who, while residents of Canada, are not necessarily citizens of this country, I have cause to wonder. These people perhaps feel today, and looking back over the last two or three years hold the view that, as the hon. member for Vancouver East has said, they have been uprooted, and cast here and there.

This was the uprooting of a few citizens of Japanese origin who were placed in other parts of Canada because we were worried about their proximity to a coastline nearest to their mother country. We thought, in our wisdom, that it was necessary to transplant them—and I use that word for the lack of a better one—or to put them somewhere, so that, geographically, they might not be in a position to act as their hearts might dictate or in a way which might be to the advantage of the race from which they sprang, the land beyond, whence they came.

We have to ask ourselves whether we were not justified in transplanting them at some point removed from the district in which they might be of some assistance to their fellows in their homeland of Japan, thus preventing them from acting in a manner which would be detrimental to those of us who call ourselves Canadians.

I do not think it was a great sacrifice to transfer them from one point to another in this wonderful land of Canada, thus in turn removing them from the temptation of yielding to inclinations which they might have in their minds and hearts, that of being of some assistance to their native land.

I do not think they had to sacrifice much or were greatly embarrassed. I do not think this "tremendous injustice" was quite so tremendous, when I remember what was happening about that time. It was my high privilege in 1944 to be "down under" in Australia when I had the honour of listening for some two hours and a half to General MacArthur's deposition as to what happened when he found himself brushed out or transferred from the Philippines along with a lot of other United States citizens and citizens of other countries. But many were left there to suffer at the hands of the Japanese and the Filipinos in that particular geographical section.

I could not avoid thinking of those who had been left there in that year 1944, because I am one, among other highly privileged citizens, who has passed through his hands in the last two decades close to 1,000 nursing sisters who graduated from the hospital services under a board of which I had the honour to be chairman. General MacArthur got out of the Philippines, but he left behind many of those nursing graduates. They were dear souls, upon many of whom I had had the privilege of pinning that little graduation pin. I could not avoid thinking of those ambitious women who had been left in the Philippines when everyone else had gone.

I think of what happened or what might have happened to those young women who, in the service to humanity, had signed their names to that particular nursing service. Then, in this chamber tonight I had to listen to the hon. member for Vancouver East—I marked his words down—saying that tremendous injustice had been done to the men and women of the Japanese race through being transferred from one part of Canada to another. This has been done under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State. How are we to compare this injustice, which is called "tremendous" by the hon. member, with the injustice done by our friends of Japan to these innocent young women of the nursing profession who unfortunately found themselves in Japan and in the Philippines when our friends of the United States boarded steamships and pulled away and left them?

For two and a half hours I interviewed these men who had got away from the Philippines, but during those two and a half hours I thought not of what General MacArthur had to say to those who were privileged to be there—I call the hon. member for Vancouver East as a witness because he sat in the same room—but only of those young women who had been left behind. Yet we hear the hon. member saying that a tremendous injustice has been done to the Japanese through being re-established. I ask him to rise in his place and tell this honourable chamber of those tremendous injustices. He was there in 1944 and he heard the evidence of General MacArthur when we were in Australia. I ask him to state whether or not this Canada of ours has not been abundantly fair to that other part of civilization known as the Japanese race.

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise to a point of order.

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): When you compare what occurred there with what took place—

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): —during the evacuation of the Philippines—

Mr. KNOWLES: As one who would like to reply to this, may I point out that it is wholly out of order on this item.

Mr. CARDIFF: Are you running this committee?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The item before the committee is the citizenship registration branch. The hon. member for Eglinton asked permission to ask some questions about the commission which was established to inquire into sales of Japanese property, which questions should have been asked on the administration item. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is quite right; we should not deal with this matter under the item before the committee.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I realize your difficulty, Mr. Chairman, and I realize the difficulty my hon. friend is faced with in trying to bring his mind into position, so that he can deal with a subject which has been greatly enlarged since it was first entered upon.

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise to a question of privilege. This committee knows that none in this group is afraid to deal with this question. The point of order I raised was raised solely as a point of order. I submit that this subject is out of order on this item. I think you were generous, Mr. Chairman, and properly so, in letting the hon. member for Eglinton ask the question which he did and to which he got an answer, but I do not think we should take all night discussing a matter that is not really relevant to the item before the committee.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): When we were on this item last night the hon. member for Eglinton came into the chamber after having been at a committee meeting. He got here just after the first item was passed. He asked if he could speak, and I informed him that I would be glad to answer any question that he brought up which he had not had an opportunity of bringing up earlier in the evening. However I do not think we should enter into a general discussion on this item.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I quite realize the minister's position. My only question of privilege is to be permitted to reply to two words which emanated from one section of our organization, namely, "tremendous injustice" to the Japanese race. Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, the best thing would be to let those who have occasion to listen or to read draw their own conclusions, and I include you, sir, and every member of this honourable chamber, and more particularly the minister who is piloting these estimates. Tremendous injustices? Just read the record and draw your own conclusions, and I shall be content with the considered judgment of all those who can read.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): A Canadian woman who marries an alien loses her Canadian citizenship. What process has she to go through to get back her Canadian citizenship?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Under the new Citizenship Act a Canadian woman who marries an alien no longer loses her status as a Canadian.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): She does not lose her Canadian citizenship if she marries an alien?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): No.

Mr. COCKERAM: The minister told us the other day that 15,000 citizenship certificates were issued last year. Is that correct? While the minister is looking that up, I notice that we paid close to $200,000 in salaries for the issuance of these 15,000 certificates. That is quite a large sum for 15,000 certificates. Would the minister explain why this great expense is incurred in issuing these certificates? This item deals with the citizenship registration branch. Further on, there is another item dealing with the citizenship branch. Why are these two items separate?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): They are two entirely separate branches. The registration branch was formerly the naturalization branch. It makes all the investigations that are necessary of those who apply for citizenship. A great deal of work is involved in going through the records of all those who file their applications. The branch has a great deal of correspondence. Last year, for instance, we had 125,000 items of correspondence alone in that department.

Reference has been made to the amount of money expended. This year we are asking for $165,000, of which $10,000 is to microfilm a lot of old records. A great deal of space has been taken up by maintaining files of all those who have been naturalized, and it has been found that a great saving of space can be made by microfilming the important documents and destroying the others.

Mr. COCKERAM: I take it that the estimate we are now discussing is for citizenship registration?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes, that is right.

Mr. COCKERAM: I notice that there are twenty-one permanent employees. How many temporary employees are there in this branch?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): There are eighty-five employees altogether, twenty-one of whom are permanent.

Mr. COCKERAM: In other words, the temporary employees are receiving twice the amount in salaries that the permanent employees receive.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The temporary employees are receiving $83,000, and the permanent employees, $42,000.

Mr. COCKERAM: Just about twice the amount.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes.

Mr. COCKERAM: In view of the fact that many applicants have now received their papers, why are so many temporary employees needed? Are you going to clean out the temporaries?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): It is not a case of having employees who are filling positions which are temporary. The positions will probably be there forever. During the war we did not make employees permanent, because we were reserving the positions for those who came back from overseas. Until the civil service commission has had an opportunity of going through each department and deciding how many positions should be permanent and how many temporary, we are not able to make permanent appointments of some of those who have been acting as temporary employees. We have at present only twenty-one permanent employees, but later on I hope that we shall have an establishment providing for a higher number of permanent employees. In that case some of those who have had overseas service will be eligible for permanent appointment.

Mr. COCKERAM: How many citizenship papers were issued last year?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The certificates issued by that branch numbered 25,691.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Surely the minister did not mean that some of these positions would be retained forever. Will the service not gradually grow less and less?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Not if we bring more immigrants into this country. We hope that a great many of them will apply for citizenship.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Will the minister withdraw "forever"?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I will say indefinitely.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Are the temporary employees all appointed through the civil service commission?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes, all of them.

Mr. COCKERAM: What percentage of them are returned men?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): A good many of them are, of course, female clerks.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister said a while ago that a Canadian woman who marries an alien does not lose her Canadian citizenship. How long has that been the case? I think there must have been an amendment to the Citizenship Act.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Since the new Citizenship Act came into operation on January 1, 1947.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have in my riding a Canadian woman who has lived in Canada all her life. She married an alien and was told that she would have to become naturalized herself to regain her Canadian citizenship.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): If she married before January 1, 1947, she would have lost her Canadian citizenship and would have to apply again.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Could not an amendment be made to the act to make its application retroactive, so that people who are in the position of this woman would not have to go through the whole process of getting citizenship papers?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): That proposal has been made. I did not intend to bring in any amendments to the Citizenship Act this session. In Great Britain they are making the provision that those who lost their citizenship through marriage prior to their new citizenship act will be granted British citizenship automatically if they wish to have it. If we bring in an amendment to our Citizenship Act next session consideration will be given to bringing in a similar amendment.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): All it needs is a slight amendment to the act. These people are in the position now, and they have to remain that way for another year or so. It is quite important that the amendment should be made. I do not think it would be a serious matter to have it fixed up.

Mr. CHURCH: I want to say a word on this particular vote. I fail to see why we should have in the estimates two items dealing with registration of citizenship and the citizenship branch. The county court judges have handled this very well since confederation. I fail to see why the government has gone into all this brass-band way of introducing citizenship, and other things. I fail to see any sign of retrenchment in the estimates which the taxpayers back in the constituencies are expecting. Years ago the civil estimates consisted of several million dollars; now they are two billion dollars. How are we to pay for it? The result of this policy was shown in the elections in Ontario the other day. I would far rather see the old system in effect. A great many people do not want to attend these functions where they have orchestras, banquets and all that kind of thing. In my opinion it is unnecessary to become a citizen in that way.

My second point is this. Everybody is desirous of getting away by the end of next week, or by the 25th at the latest. If the government proposes any change in the elections act I think it will be invalid. It is against the constitution to do that without consulting the provinces, especially to substitute proportional voting. On the ballot there will be a list of seven names, and you start crossing them off. I would cross them all off. I would not like to vote for any one of the seven. You start off with first place to one, second place to another, and all that kind of thing.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: That is all I have to say about the minister's estimates. I will tell the government that if they want to close up by the time they have proposed they had better drop some of this legislation.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The hon. member for St. Paul's asked why it was not considered advisable to bring in that amendment at once. Naturalization laws have been similar throughout the commonwealth, and I think it is desirable to keep them that way so far as possible. A change has not yet been made in Great Britain. I do not know whether it has yet been made in any of the other dominions; I understand not. Consequently we would be well advised to wait and see what they do in Great Britain before we make any change in our existing act.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The example I have in mind is that of a woman who married a man before 1947. In the meantime the man became a Canadian citizen. She is still an alien. She was a Canadian before she married.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I want to ask the minister a question with reference to the statement he made a few minutes ago, in which he pointed out that when a Canadian woman marries a foreigner she does not lose her Canadian citizenship. That would mean, I take it, subject to the laws of other countries, that she may be a citizen of Canada and of another country as well.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes, that is correct.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): As a matter of interest, could that be any embarrassment? Are there any cases where double citizenship has been created?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): If the woman wants to adopt the citizenship of her husband or his nationality she can, of course, renounce her Canadian citizenship. She has the right to do that if she wishes. If she wishes to retain her Canadian citizenship she is entitled to do so. There are numerous countries in which there is dual nationality. While it does cause embarrassment on occasions, yet we feel that when a woman gets married she should be permitted to retain her citizenship if she wishes to do so.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If we ever have military conscription for women it would be awkward if they were conscripted for two armies.

Mr. COCKERAM: We examine these estimates with the idea of trying to save some money for the taxpayers of this country.

[The Chairman.]

I am wondering why items 429 and 434 could not be combined and a general saving made, because in both of these items there are excessive sums for temporary assistance. They both have printing and stationery, and so on. If our object is to try to cut down expenses there should be some amalgamation of departments of government so that this money could be saved.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): That suggestion is prompted only by the fact that the two names are somewhat the same. The work of the two divisions is entirely separate. The citizenship branch is the one in charge of looking after the people who come to this country, assisting them to become good Canadians. For example, we know the communists are hard at work in this country trying to bring pressure to bear on newcomers to Canada. In the past we have not had any organization to train our people to be good citizens. Education comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces; consequently there is some difficulty in working out programs for the benefit of those new arrivals in Canada. We now have a Canadian citizenship council which is endeavouring to co-ordinate the work of the provinces, of the dominion, and of the welfare organizations throughout this country. The citizenship branch works with the council by keeping in touch with the various ethnic groups in this country. It is having a marked effect, and is able to provide literature to assist newcomers to this country to understand what it means to be a Canadian citizen, and what obligations as well as responsibilities they undertake.

Mr. COCKERAM: What I have in mind is this. The two departments are handling practically the same thing, so far as I can see. The minister says there is some difference. The minister said that 25,000 naturalization papers were issued last year. The other day he said that 15,000 citizenship certificates had been issued. If these two branches were amalgamated the money saved could be spent on education of newcomers to this country. It seems to me that is where we should spend the money, so that the newcomers may be absorbed into the country as we would like them to be. There is no excuse for having two separate departments dealing with the one subject.

Mr. REID: When the new Citizenship Act was passed, and while it was being discussed in the house, we were informed that all those persons, especially those from the old country who had been in Canada for five or more years prior to the time the act came into force, would be Canadian citizens. I remember asking the question whether that citizenship would be recognized by the United States. Instances have been brought to my attention where residents of this country for many long years before the Citizenship Act was passed have had difficulties with United States authorities when they were asked their nationality. When they said they were Canadians the United States authorities asked in what country they were born. Some said England; some said Scotland and some said Ireland. It was drawn to my attention that in one or two instances the United States authorities would not accept the statements made by these persons that they were Canadian citizens, although they had lived here for five, ten, fifteen or twenty years. My question to the minister is this. Will the United States authorities recognize to the fullest extent our new Citizenship Act, without those who are challenged producing papers?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): We may say that the United States authorities may recognize that a person going into that country is a Canadian citizen, but for the person entering the country in some cases that unfortunately is not the criterion which is adopted in the United States. The criterion they adopt is where he was born, irrespective of the country to which he happens to belong at the present time, and there is nothing in our law that can make the United States adopt any other attitude.

Mr. REID: Would that embarrassing situation be obviated were each one to obtain a certificate? Would that certificate be recognized?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): It would not have any effect.

Mr. FRASER: A foreign-born woman coming to Canada marries a Canadian citizen. After she is here for a year she can make application for citizenship, and three months afterwards she becomes a Canadian citizen?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes.

Mr. FRASER: That is a foreign-born woman. Suppose a British subject comes to Canada and marries a Canadian citizen. Does she get citizenship papers sooner?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): They get it in the same way.

Mr. FRASER: It takes fifteen months for them anyway.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): It takes a year and whatever length of time the court takes after that. The minimum is a year.

Mr. FRASER: It does not matter whether she is a British subject or foreign born?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): No.

Mr. FRASER: In neither case do they need to file intention to make application?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): That is right.

Mr. McMASTER: As I recall it, when the Citizenship Act was brought into force, the then secretary of state went around and did a lot of work in the way of instructing newcomers to Canada. I wonder, since he has given up the position, how many temporary employees have been taken on to do the work he did before.

Mr. FRASER: The then Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) did that.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister said that no change would be made in the act to take care of the situation I mentioned, for the reason that it was desirable to have the law uniform in the commonwealth. Can he give me any particular reason why the situation I have indicated is not different in Canada from that in any other member of the commonwealth? His reasoning does not appeal to me.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The act has been in operation for only slightly over a year. It was realized when it was introduced that it would be necessary to make amendments, but I did not consider it advisable to bring in piecemeal amendments until we had an opportunity to find out how it has been working. It is not intended to amend the act this session.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There is another point. Some of these people who married aliens in days gone by did not know they would lose their Canadian citizenship and they are faced with that situation. It is a pity that something cannot be done about it. The minister's reasoning with reference to other members of the commonwealth does not appeal to me. I do not see why something could not be done in this direction.

Mr. HLYNKA: It is usual for members of parliament and, I presume, for other persons to complain when something goes wrong in any department, but when everything goes well and officials deserve credit I believe we are all inclined to overlook the good points about these men and we refrain from saying anything in praise of them.

I wish to take this opportunity, therefore, to mention something favourable. I deal a lot with the Canadian citizenship registration branch and also with the Canadian citizenship branch, and I may say that the heads of both these branches are doing excellent work for Canada, in the interests of this nation. I would first mention Mr. J. E. Duggan, head of the citizenship registration branch, who is efficient, well-informed and courteous and who is doing a splendid job in his position. His officials and staff are doing likewise.

The head of the citizenship branch, which has to do with education, preparing our newcomers and other persons for citizenship, is Mr. Frank Foulds, about whom I should also like to say a word. In what I say about him I associate his staff. These men and women are really doing a very good job, also in the interests of Canada, and I congratulate the minister and his predecessor, the present Minister of National Health and Welfare, on having organized this department on the basis on which it now functions.

The only criticism I have to offer is that the government has not seen fit to put up a building in which these offices would be located. It seems to me that we have reached the time that we must find better quarters for these important branches. These persons are working in cubbyholes, and that is not good enough. I leave that thought with the government, in the hope that they will get busy as soon as possible and erect proper buildings so as to enable these men and women in the two branches I have mentioned to do their work under the best conditions.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Last January there was an interesting conference in Montreal at which the Secretary of State was present. It was called by the Canadian citizenship council in collaboration with the Canadian association for adult education, and in that conference participated not only government officials but representatives of voluntary organizations who are interested in the problem of immigrants and prospective new citizens. There were also present representatives of labour organizations and industry. I will not repeat the excellent expressions of opinion we heard there, because the minister himself was present and gave a fine address at a dinner we had, and he is therefore familiar with the situation.

I should like to find out to what extent the recommendations made by the conference have been carried into effect up to this day. I have a copy of the report, as no doubt the minister has, setting out certain recommendations arrived at by the conference, which recommendations were originally suggested by various sections of the conference in panels. In connection with the allocation of responsibility, the committee which had to do with that subject suggested that the conference be called at the earliest possible day, on the initiative of the federal government and in collaboration with the provincial and municipal authorities, in order to sift over and allocate responsibility for the various services required by new arrivals in this country.

There are certain difficulties to be ironed out, for example hospitalization in some cases, needy widows' allowances, and various other services which ordinarily may fall within the jurisdiction of the province or the municipality. Because immigrants coming to this country are under the jurisdiction of the federal government in the first instance, some of the provinces and municipalities feel that this government should assume some of the initial responsibility, at least, for these services, until these people become fully resident in this country.

Another recommendation passed by this conference, I think unanimously, was in connection with the family allowance. I realize that the actual administration of the family allowance comes under another department; but, since the recommendation was made by this conference, I am sure the minister will have some representations to make—or he may have made them—to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The Family Allowances Act provides, for example, that a person must live in this country for three years before becoming eligible. This conference pointed out that a certain amount of hardship results from this requirement. This is the argument of the committee which dealt with that matter, if I may put it on the record:

> Family allowances are not paid to newcomers in Canada until they have resided in the country for three years. The new arrival is operating with additional handicaps at best. It seemed to the group unfortunate that the children of newcomers should suffer the further handicap of being denied the benefits family allowances could give them, particularly in view of the fact that normally their parents would be earning their lowest income at the beginning of their residence in Canada. The greatest need for family allowances is precisely during the period after arrival. It was distinctly unfortunate that these children should receive this additional handicap for three years.

Later on, a recommendation was made in definite words, to this effect:

> That the Department of Health and Welfare be asked to modify the three-year resident provisions of the Family Allowances Act and its regulations so that the children of new arrivals to Canada will receive the benefits before three years.

A couple of weeks ago I happened to be in the Okanagan valley, where I met a gentleman who had just arrived from South Africa.

He had brought with him his wife and six children, and told me it cost him more than $3,000 to make the trip. He was greatly disappointed to find that, in spite of being a British subject and in spite of having given up certain services in his own country, his family were not eligible for the family allowance in this country, and he felt something should be done about the matter. That may be just one case, but probably it could be multiplied by many thousands.

I am not going to pursue this point further, because I realize that the administration of that act comes under another department. But this conference, which was quite representative, passed a recommendation asking this department to request the Department of National Health and Welfare to make a change at some time in the near future, and I hope the minister will take that into consideration.

I want now to say just a word about some of the other work done at this conference, which I thought was of great importance and of a very high character. Recommendations were made in connection with naturalization and the pre-naturalization education that should be given newcomers to this country. I hope the department is taking full advantage of the views expressed at this conference and the excellent recommendations made; because, as one who, in the past, has taken some part in the education of new immigrants to this country, I can say to the minister that many of the handicaps I experienced at that time would be overcome if the recommendations of this conference were accepted by the citizenship branch, and adequate financial provision were made to carry through a program of education.

I also want to add a word to what was said by the hon. member who preceded me, with respect to the citizenship council and the citizenship branch. I have in my hand a number of pamphlets published by various agencies, all of which are available either from the Canadian citizenship council, which has its headquarters here in Ottawa at 166 Marlborough avenue—and I am putting that on record in case someone wants to look it up later—or at the citizenship branch of the Department of the Secretary of State. For example, I have in my hand one entitled, "Everyman's Guide to Canada's Parliament." It is not a very large publication, but I recommend it to all hon. members, so that we may see ourselves as others see us. It will enable them to get a bird's-eye view of how we are seen in this house. Another one is entitled, "How to become a Canadian citizen," and is published by the Canadian citizenship branch. It is also an excellent booklet which should be widely distributed and which people should be encouraged to read. I have here another one called, "Our Canadian Government," which is also available through the Canadian citizenship council or the Canadian citizenship branch; and a fourth one entitled "'Citizenship; the Teacher's Problem."

Just here I should like to say that in many of the rural areas of Canada much of the work of providing the elementary or primary education for new arrivals will fall upon the shoulders of rural teachers, who will have to do that work after their regular duties are finished. That is so, because in those areas they have not the facilities which are provided in larger centres through either voluntary organizations or government branches. So I would urge the minister, in co-operation with the various provincial departments of education, to provide every possible facility and encouragement, in the way of both finances and available material, for these schoolteachers, who do a valuable job in the evenings after their day's work is through, and who are contributing a great deal to the future citizens of our country.

Mr. McLURE: There has been a good deal of discussion concerning the employees of this department. Before asking the question I have in mind, I should like to direct the minister's attention to the fact that the estimates for his department amount to a total of $1,437,521, of which almost 50 per cent—to be exact I think it is 43 per cent—or $591,297 is required for temporary assistance. I should like to know from the minister how many of those temporary employees are engaged by the year and how many are just here today and gone tomorrow. I should like to know also how many temporary employees are drawing this amount of money, which accounts for some 43 per cent of the total vote for his department.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): These employees are all paid by the year, and the actual numbers I can give as we come to each branch. In the printing bureau, for example, many employees are on prevailing rates. Those in the other branches are on salaries set by the civil service commission for the various grades they occupy; that is, they are clerks, grade 1, grade 2, grade 3 and so on. While the employee is temporary, the position is there and it remains temporary only until the civil service commission goes over the establishment and decides how many of the positions should become permanent and how many should remain temporary.

Mr. McLURE: Are they appointed by the civil service commission even if they are temporary?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): All are appointed by the civil service commission.

Mr. COCKERAM: What is the salary of the highest paid official on the temporary staff, and how long has that employee been with the department?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): That is difficult to find out on a moment's notice. I can find it out; but the hon. member must realize that we have the estimates here of a great number of divisions; consequently we would have to go through each of these to find out which is the highest paid. However, I could get that information and give it to the hon member.

Mr. COCKERAM: I want to know the salary of the highest paid official in the one class we are now dealing with, and how long he has been a temporary employee in that one branch.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I have not the exact figure, but it would be about a grade 2, drawing about $1,800.

Mr. COCKERAM: That is the highest paid official on the temporary staff.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes, on the temporary staff.

432. Bureau for translations, $572,145.

Mr. FRASER: What is the reason for this increase? Is it salaries or extra work?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): This is because of additional translators being required for departments which had not formerly been serviced by the translations bureau. I refer to the Department of External Affairs, the civil service commission, the bureau of statistics and the treasury branch. The translators there required are now being supplied by the translations bureau.

Mr. FRASER: Does the minister mean that this branch does it for them?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): We supply translators for them.

Mr. FRASER: Before this time they had their own, did they?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes, on their own staff.

Patent and copyright office—

435. Administration division, $42,353.

Mr. FLEMING: In the 1947 session the patent office received more attention than it had received in many previous sessions, and I suggest it was well that it did. This interest arose in the first instance in connection with a bill the government introduced, proposing certain extensive amendments to the Patent Act. The bill was referred to the committee on banking and commerce; and that committee, seized of the importance of studying the conditions in the patent office, recommended to the house that it should be empowered to inquire into the administration of the patent office in regard to staff, office space, equipment and the like, and to report to the house in relation thereto. That report was submitted to the house on March 4, 1947, and was adopted the same day.

An extensive study of conditions in the patent office was carried out by the committee on banking and commerce. The facilities available to the patent commissioner and his staff were studied at first hand by a subcommittee of the committee on banking and commerce, with the result that an extensive report covering the studies of the banking and commerce committee and its subcommittee was tabled in the house on July 15, 1947. No motion was made for the adoption of the report. The committee will recall that that was only two days before prorogation. Although not adopted by the house, the report nevertheless has behind it the full authority of the committee on banking and commerce, following an intensive study.

The first fact that should be remembered in any approach to the question of the adequacy or inadequacy of the staff and facilities of the patent office is this, that the patent office is a money-maker for the government. It should not be thought that this office is a bill of expense to the taxpayer. While the committee is called upon to vote certain appropriations for the patent office, nevertheless over a long period of years the fees earned through that office have considerably exceeded government expenditures in respect thereto.

In the banking and commerce committee a year ago the figures for the ten years from 1936 to 1946 were tabled. Those figures are to be found at page 13 of the proceedings of the committee for 1947. I shall not trouble the committee by going into the figures in detail, but I shall place on record the aggregate results of those ten years of operation.

The expenditures in connection with the administration of the patent office in that ten-year period aggregated $2,048,000 in round figures, whereas the fees earned through the patent office aggregated $3,525,000. Thus in the ten-year period I have mentioned the patent office earned for the government a net revenue of $1,500,000. The sum of $3,525,000 received in the ten-year period, together with the additional sums paid in fees in the two and a half years since, were paid by persons doing business with that office, who, in return for the payment of fees, are entitled to expect prompt and efficient service.

I wish to make it as clear as I possibly can, here and now, that I believe the commissioner of patents and his staff are rendering as efficient service as it is possible for them to render under present conditions. I believe the commissioner of patents has rendered great service, and is an able official; and I am sorry that on him has fallen the brunt of the problem of functioning or trying to make his office function under great difficulties and handicaps. These are handicaps, not only of inadequate space, but also of inadequate staff. One of the reasons the staff is inadequate is that the space is inadequate, and there has not been space enough to accommodate a staff adequate to meet the needs of the office.

The committee's report is found in the Journals of the House for the 1947 session, at pages 910 to 915, and that report demonstrates the situation clearly. It sets out a condition which, in my opinion, cannot be permitted to continue. In brief, at that time the patent office was three years in arrears with its work. The backlog of applications uncompleted was over 31,000, which represents between two and a half and three years work of the patent Office. At that time the office could not keep abreast of current work. The situation in regard to staff was serious, because salaries paid at the prevailing scale were inadequate to attract personnel having the necessary technical qualifications. The office of the commissioner of patents had suffered a serious and substantial loss of personnel during the war, particularly technical personnel. I need not tell the committee that personnel of that kind is difficult to obtain in times like these. When private industry is offering substantially greater rewards to personnel possessed of the qualifications of which a patent examiner must be possessed, it is obvious that the patent office cannot, under present circumstances, expect to retain its personnel, let alone recruit additional necessary staff, unless it is prepared to offer adequate remuneration for the purpose.

After a study of the situation, it was the view of the banking and commerce committee that the salary scale obtaining at the patent office was quite inadequate to attract the additional personnel required. Some headway has been made, because the commissioner was able to report to the banking and commerce committee a year ago that he had recently been able to recruit some additional personnel, both technical and non-technical, but the situation with respect to adequacy of staff as described to the banking and commerce committee still exists.

The problem of inadequacy of staff was closely related to the problem of inadequate accommodation. The fact of the matter is that, even if the commissioner had been able to enlist the additional technical personnel needed at that time, he would not have had any place in which to put them. It was an extraordinary situation. These trained examiners were working two or three to an office, sometimes quite a small office, under conditions which greatly impeded the efficiency of their operations. Valuable records were stored under conditions which made it very difficult to have access to them. There was a crying need for additional accommodation.

I hope I am a reasonable person. I do not expect the government to create buildings out of thin air. I do not expect them to be able to bring into existence overnight, building accommodation when there is a considerable scarcity of it in Ottawa. Nevertheless the situation that existed a year ago was most serious. The public dealing with the patent office was not receiving the service they should have received. I submit that this problem is entitled to a position of leading priority among the government projects for the post-war period.

Again I emphasize that the office of the commissioner of patents is a money-maker. Canadians and others making application to the patent office are entitled to receive service commensurate with the fees they are paying. It is quite unfair that the government should continue to derive a substantial net profit from the operations of this office and not give the service to which those paying the fees are entitled.

The situation was advanced a stage further by the legislation which parliament enacted at the 1947 session. I think the Secretary of State will be the first to admit that the banking and commerce committee did a most useful service last year in connection with the revision of the Patent Act. The amendments which were introduced in the house and referred to the committee were carefully reviewed. Many changes were made and further amendments in the Patent Act were introduced. I think it is generally conceded that the result was a much more workable Patent Act than was the case before the 1947 legislation came into effect.

But there is one curious result. The increase in fees was enacted by parliament on the assumption that the patent office would be equipped to give improved service. Section 19 of the bill which was adopted last year introduced into the act a new section 17 which had the effect of increasing practically the entire scale of fees. The note to that section of the bill read as follows:

The purpose of this amendment is to secure revenue from which to defray expenses involved in the printing of specifications and drawings of patents, as provided for in section 25 of the principal act.

It is a matter of record that at that time there were not in the patent office facilities for the printing of specifications and patents. When compared with the patent office in Washington and patent offices in other countries, that was a serious shortcoming. The committee concerned itself at some length with the printing of specifications and drawings, and in its report to the house it made recommendations with respect thereto.

I think at this stage I might read the three recommendations with which the committee concluded its report, and which are to be found on pages 913 and 914 of the Journals of 1947.

They read as follows:

Staff: Attached to this report is an appendix showing the minimum staff which should be supplied to the patent office, and your sub-committee recommends that this staff should be supplied at the earliest possible date.

The appendix proposed a substantial increase in the number of employees in the patent office. The next recommendation reads:

Office space: Attached to this report is an appendix showing the amount of office space, storage space, et cetera, required by the patent office, and your sub-committee recommends that when the government is expanding its building program for the housing of government departments, suitable space both as to size and of fireproof construction, should be made available to the patent office.

I observe here that the reference to the subcommittee is to the subcommittee of the banking and commerce committee. Its report was adopted by the banking and commerce committee. The appendix shows that not less than 109,590 square feet of floor space is required. The third recommendation reads:

Printing of patents: Your sub-committee recommends that a printing plant by the offset process should be installed in the patent office for the printing of patents, specifications, claims and drawings, and that the necessary staff be employed to operate the same at the earliest possible date.

May I say that the committee considered the cost of printing specifications and drawings. It had before it a report from the king's printer, indicating that the cost would be substantial. It also had a report indicating that if the offset process were used the cost of printing could be materially reduced; in fact it would be only a fraction of what it would cost if it were done in the office of the king's printer. That was the reason why the recommendation was made that facilities be provided in the patent office for the printing of specifications and drawings by the offset process.

We had, therefore, a situation where parliament was passing a measure to increase the fees to be charged in the patent office for the purpose, as stated in the note to the bill, of securing revenue to defray the expenses involved in the printing of specifications and drawings of patents. I ask the Secretary of State to give the committee a report on the progress that has been made toward providing facilities in the patent office for the printing of specifications and drawings. I am informed that no printing has been done, that increased fees are being charged but that the service for which the increased fees were imposed is not being given.

I ask the minister also to give a full report on the progress, if any, that has been made toward implementing all the recommendations of the committee. I recognize, Mr. Chairman, that these recommendations have not behind them the full weight that would have been attached to them had they been adopted in the house by formal resolution; but I am bold enough to venture this statement, that if the report of that committee had been discussed in the house it would have met with the endorsement of the house. I remind hon. members that that report was brought in, unfortunately, only two days before prorogation in July last year. The report had behind it the full weight of the unanimous support of the banking and commerce committee, after a lengthy and intensive investigation.

Some arrangements are, I am told, being made to move some parts of the patent office into the Canadian building. In a matter as serious as this I do urge upon the minister that the committee is entitled to receive from him a very full report. It is not a situation that can reflect credit upon the administration of governmental affairs in this country that the patent office should be permitted to continue for from two and a half to three years in arrears with its work. That is not, I emphasize again, the fault of the commissioner or of the staff. Sometimes one wonders that they do as well as they have done, labouring under their present handicaps. I submit that this is a matter which must receive immediate attention. The situation is so serious that it must receive top-ranking priority among the projects which the government ought to undertake immediately.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, I am glad that my hon. friend spoke as well as he did on this subject, because I am sure that too many members of the house are ignorant of the situation in the patent office. The patent office in this country has always been the poor child of the government; it has always been treated as though it were something that was not needed, although, as the hon. member pointed out, it has been a revenue-producing branch ever since its inception. It is high time that more members of the house took an interest in the patent office.

In the United States the patent office is not a revenue-producing branch. It is run as a service to encourage inventors to invent and produce for the benefit of the public. But in this country we have never encouraged inventors by the service we have given them in the patent office.

The staff of the patent office is very good. We have a very good commissioner, very good examiners, and a devoted clerical staff. But we have too few of them, and the staff is underpaid. I had hoped, after last year's report by the banking and commerce committee, that there would have been a substantial revision upward in the salaries of the technical men in the patent office and also a revision upward of the salaries of the clerical staff. Mind you, it is not ordinary work that some of the clerical staff do in the patent office, but there are more grade 1 and grade 2 clerks who have been around there for twenty years as grade 1 or grade 2 than there are in any other department of the government. They have been overlooked altogether. That is not the fault of the commissioner of patents. It is rather the fault of the heads of the department. I believe that the cabinet ministers who have been in charge of it from time to time have thought that, since it was a good revenue-producing branch, it should be left as such. I suggest that we take a little more serious view. The staff is too small. I have been dealing with patents since I was eighteen years of age, and it has always been the same old story in the patent office. Everything is always a couple of years behind, and the result is that as patent solicitors we get complaints from our clients who think that we have taken their money and are not doing anything to help them, that we are robbing them, because they do not hear from us for eight or nine months.

The staff of the patent office do their best. If a case is exceptional we will get a special order; but we cannot ask that all our cases be considered as special cases, and therefore the impression is given to the United States public, who are the greatest contributors to the patent office, and to our Canadian clients, that we are delinquent in our duty. That is not a good situation for solicitors and lawyers to be in. I therefore ask that the staff of the patent office be increased, but you cannot increase the staff if you do not pay reasonable salaries to the technical personnel which forms the patent office. Further, I ask that the clerical staff be enlarged and that, whatever the civil service commission may say, there be a proper classification of the clerical staff and that they be paid salaries which are reasonable for clerks or technical men.

I understand that some space has been found in the Canadian building, but part of the patent office is still in the Langevin block. The most important part of the patent office is the search room and the library. We should have a proper search room and a proper library immediately, because that is the very life of the patent office. That is where the public must search to find out whether an invention is new. The records are in the library and in the search room. At present all that is in one room, in cramped quarters, with no facilities for solicitors to sit down and study. As a result, the government is losing revenue. It follows, of course, that when we have printed records of all the patents already issued, searches can be made much more easily, but I understand that we cannot have printed patents within one year. Indeed, I am sure that it will take another year or two before a start is made on the printing of patents.

I spoke to the commissioner some time ago, and I understand that the printing bureau is now in a position to print patents at a cost which would compare with that suggested by the banking and commerce committee. It is true that the recommendation made last year by the banking and commerce committee was made with a view to offsetting the cost of printing patents; but I must say that the increase was not very substantial, and it does not compare at all with the fees which are being charged in other countries. As a matter of fact I consider that the fees are still too low and it is working a hardship on this country, because two-thirds of the fees which come into the patent office come from the United States.

There is another small matter which I think should be rectified. When we file an application for a patent in the United States of America we have to take our affidavits to the United States consul here. The Secretary of State should make representations to the patent office in Washington, so that it should not be necessary for Canadians to take an affidavit before a notary public in this country to have it authenticated by the United States consul. We have never asked for that from United States citizens. I do not think Canadians should be put to that extra cost when filing an application for a patent in the United States.

I hope that the Secretary of State, who I know has progressive ideas on this matter, will see to it that sufficient space is secured in the Canadian building, if that is to be the building to house the patent office. By "sufficient" I mean ample. I hope he will remember my remarks about the search room and the library. If we had more facilities to search and study patents we would have more revenue. More people would come here to find out about our patents; they would secure copies of patents, and they would file applications. If we had more service to give we would find that a great number of United States patents which are not filed in this country would be filed, because people would expect that they could exploit their patents within a reasonable time. At the present time, many inventors are discouraged because they know they cannot get a patent for perhaps two or three years, and in that time the patent would be of no use to them.

Mr. LENNARD: I have sat here year after year listening to criticism being levelled at the patent office and the commissioner of patents. He has been criticized; the division has been criticized severely for long delays in the issuance of patents, and that sort of thing. I wish to say right now that, while I am not an authority—I am not a patent attorney—there are more delays created in the offices of the legal profession and in the offices of patent attorneys in Canada than there are in the office of the commissioner of patents.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): On a point of privilege, I hope the hon. member does not refer to me.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister a direct question in connection with the matter of accommodation for the patent office? As I understand the present situation, the patent office is in two buildings; part of it is in the Langevin block and part of it in the Canadian building. The situation is almost as intolerable from the standpoint of getting business done as it was before. There is something behind the scenes somewhere which is stopping the patent office from getting into the Canadian building. We had better bring that out in the open. I understand that there is another department of government there that will not get out. If that is so, we ought to know about it. There ought to be some liaison, or some pressure brought to bear on the department and the cabinet to see that that department does get out, because we cannot allow this intolerable situation to continue, as I see it, with one part of the department in one building and the other part in another. The minister had better bring this thing out in the open and tell us exactly what the situation is, and who is preventing the patent office from getting into its proper quarters.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The hon. member for Peel speaks as if there were some secret or hidden mystery about this patent office. There is nothing that I am ashamed to mention.

I want to answer what the hon. member for Eglinton had to say in regard to the work of the office. As hon. members know, at one time, before the new plans were made, the patent office was spread around in about six different buildings in Ottawa. I am glad to say that we were able to get accommodation in the Canadian building. The first step that we took was to bring in all the outlying branches of the patent office from the various buildings into the Canadian building. We were not able to get the whole Canadian building at once. We have now got a good part of it, but two floors in the Canadian building are occupied by the wartime prices and trade board, and one floor by the succession duties branch of the Department of National Revenue. These have not yet been vacated. It is expected that we shall have the whole building, the part that has been allotted to us, within the next few months.

The printing of patents was authorized. A question arose as to whether the patent office itself should undertake that work. After some careful consideration of the matter, we worked out an agreement between the patent office and the printing bureau, under which the printing bureau will do the work at the patent office. That is, the printing bureau, which has experienced men, and has knowledge of the machinery required, is purchasing the necessary equipment which will be installed in the Canadian building in the patent office; but the actual printing work will be done by contract with the printing bureau on the premises of the patent office.

There has been some increase in staff; but, as the hon. member for Eglinton said, it is not easy to get the qualified men, and we still have some vacancies for examiners, which is, of course, a technical position. It is not easy to fill.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister has not yet told us what is the hold-up in the Canadian building. I am anxious to know what the obstacle is and who is there that we cannot get out.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I am afraid my hon. friend was talking to somebody else when I mentioned it. I said that at the present time the wartime prices and trade board are still in the building. It is expected that they shall be out very shortly.

Mr. GRAYDON: I understood that this was to be done months ago. Why is the wartime prices and trade board there? Has that board any special priority in the building when the patent office is much more important than the board?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I do not think the national defence library has altogether pulled out. Although they were occupying space on the ground floor, they have started to move. I do not think they have all their books out of that part. Of course, when the other departments moved out of the other parts of the building a certain amount of redecorating and rearrangement of the rooms on the upper floors was necessary, which took some time, to make them suitable for the patent office. They will be very pleasant quarters when they are completed.

Mr. GRAYDON: When will the entire patent office be moved to the Canadian building?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The last report I have received is that the whole move will be completed within the next few months.

Mr. GRAYDON: In a few months. I am asking these questions with a definite objective in view. I am really concerned about the position of the patent office. From the information I get from many quarters I think it is a scandal to allow this office to be hung up in this way. The minister ought to go to the Minister of Finance or whoever is responsible and clear this thing up and get the wartime prices and trade board out. Let us cut all the red tape that this thing seems to be tied up with. You will never get in there if you do not do that.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I want to put in a word here. We have had two powerful statements tonight from persons who are familiar with this situation. We have had the hon. member for Eglinton recalling to the committee what was done a year ago when the banking and commerce committee reported to the house. That happened almost a year ago. Then we had the hon. member for Ottawa East giving in great detail some of the defects. The minister has given an answer recognizing that there is a situation to deal with. I got no sense from the minister that this was regarded as something which had absolutely top priority and which should be done. I should like to ask the minister this question. As I understand it, it has been said that the work is some two and a half to three years behind. The seriousness of that in several ways has been made clear. It is not merely the inconvenience to those who are putting in applications, not merely the discouragement to inventors who might put in applications, but actually the great loss in business probably to the office because the facilities are not available. Is there some plan by which this will be dealt with? Is there a plan under which these arrears are to be grappled with, so that they will be wiped out within a given time?

The minister says, and indeed it had already been indicated by those who spoke before him, that it is difficult to get men. That is clear. But are steps being taken to meet this difficulty? Are special inducements being offered? Surely this is something that is in a different category. We have boards and institutions of all kinds, about the value of which we may have great differences of opinion, but here is something on which everyone is agreed. It is generally agreed that the public wishes to have this branch put in the highest state of efficiency. I would ask the minister whether there is now a plan whereby these arrears will be brought down. Is there any plan whereby staff will be got and the necessary steps taken to get them, so that within a reasonable time these arrears will have been wiped off? Nothing short of that is a satisfactory answer to the arraignment, and it is an arraignment to which the committee has listened tonight.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): My hon. friend is not an authority on the patent law, or he would realize that, when reference is made to the fact that patents are in arrears, that is a standard condition. The length of time they are in arrears is another matter. When applied for, a patent is not issued within a week or within a month. I think the Canadian record at the present time compares quite favourably with the record of other countries in the average length of time it takes to issue a patent. It does not depend entirely on the activity of the patent office. They receive an application and they write back and make certain requisitions, and that goes back to the solicitor who is handling the application. He then calls in the inventor, and perhaps a period of six months goes by before a reply comes into the patent office. That is dealt with; there has to be a second application. It goes back to the solicitor, and in some cases it is a matter of six years before the patent is obtained, depending on the speed with which applicants apply for patents. Sometimes they do not wish to have a patent issued too early. Having filed their application, they are protected, but they may not want it at once. They may not want time to run against them, and sometimes there is a purposeful delay in answering the questions of the department. Sometimes six months go by without a letter being answered.

Mr. TIMMINS: The minister will admit that the evidence given last year before the committee was that when the application was filed in the first place it would be acknowledged by the department; but that a matter of eight months would go by before any further step would be taken by the department. Has the situation changed in that regard in the last year? The department was not itself in a position to have the necessary work done by the examiners for a period of eight months. Has that situation changed?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes. The situation has improved. We are not in a fully satisfactory position and shall not be until we get into one building, and we want an increased staff. I would not say the work of the patent office is unsatisfactory.

Mr. TIMMINS: Is the minister not seized of the fact, which came out before the committee last year, that one basic necessity in the proper working of the patent office is adequate housing for the whole staff in one building?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I agree.

Mr. TIMMINS: Will the minister tell us tonight that within a matter of a few months he will have the office together in one building?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): That is right.

[Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West).]

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister is perfectly right when he says that I am not an expert, but I have listened to two hon. gentlemen who I thought and still think are experts, and when I heard the word "arrears" used I took it in its ordinary sense. The minister says, in effect, that things are not so bad, that there is no real urgency. If that is the spirit of the approach to this question, that there is no real sense of urgency, then I suggest that other persons who are more competent than I am should say whether there is, in fact, such urgency.

Mr. FLEMING: I am bound to say to the minister that his answer concerning delays in the patent office does not strengthen the position he has taken on this matter. The minister will be the first to recognize that we who have spoken on the question are trying to strengthen his hands in an effort to see that the patent office situation is cleared up. We are trying to help him to obtain accommodation and personnel, and his answer that the situation is satisfactory is entirely inadequate. It is a most incomplete answer to say that there are inevitable delays in dealing with patent matters. Of course there are. It takes time to make due examination of patents. There must be correspondence; there must be citations, and all that sort of thing. No one expects the patent office to function on applications the day they are received; nevertheless it is quite inadmissible for the minister to say that the patent office is not working unsatisfactorily at the present time. The commissioner before the committee said, not once but many times, that the public is not receiving from the patent office the service to which it is entitled. Is the minister going to say, after that, that the office is working satisfactorily? I hold that, through no fault of the commissioner and the staff, the office is not working satisfactorily. It is working in a manner far from satisfactory. When we have the irrefutable evidence, taken before the banking and commerce committee last year, that the time lag in dealing with these patents runs from two and a half to three years from the date of receipt, no one may say that the office is working satisfactorily.

On the question of accommodation in the Canadian building, may one express the hope that the minister will be firm and insistent in pressing for due accommodation for the needs of the patent office. I had hoped that we would receive something more favourable from the minister than the statement that in a matter of months the patent office will have completed its move into the Canadian building. "Months" may be a long time. We heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce, not so many months ago, tell us that, according to his definition, "months" might mean more than a year. I do not know whether the Secretary of State frames his definition of time with the same degree of elasticity as his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but I tell him that if in this case "months" means a year or more this matter will be up again next year and will be pressed with vigour. I make that promise.

Again I say to the minister that we are trying to help in alleviating the problem, for which he is not alone responsible. Those of his predecessors who had the problem under their charge and who did not grapple with it must share the responsibility with him. We recognize that during the war the demands for government space were pressing, and therefore we are trying to be fair about the matter. Nevertheless there is a deplorable situation to be met, and it is not being corrected with the speed at which the government ought to set about redressing it.

Item agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

50. Salaries and contingencies of the commission, $676,220.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to ask the Secretary of State a question or two with respect to the interesting questionnaire that has been circulated just recently among civil servants. First, may I inquire whether the filling in of this questionnaire is compulsory, and what would happen to a civil servant if he did not fill it in. The newspapers report that some employees have torn them up, all five copies.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I read about that questionnaire in the newspapers, and made some inquiries about it. It was not issued by the civil service commission, but, I understand, was circulated by two departments among their own staffs. Those departments, I believe, were external affairs and national defence; but it was not issued by the civil service commission and is not being circulated throughout the service.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then failure to fill in the form would not involve disciplinary action of any kind, as far as the minister knows?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I cannot say. I know nothing about the questionnaire beyond the fact that it was circulated in those departments.

Mr. KNOWLES: I appreciate that the questionnaire was circulated in two departments over which the minister does not have jurisdiction; but it was circulated to these people as civil servants. We are now dealing with the item in respect of the civil service commission, and it does seem to me that, being responsible for the civil service commission, the minister should be able to give some assurance in reply to my question.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I cannot give any assurance at all, because I do not know anything about the administration of other departments. The civil service commission, whose estimates we are considering here, is just an agency which obtains employees for the various departments of government. Once those employees have been obtained, they come under the jurisdiction of the departments to which they are assigned.

Mr. KNOWLES: But once people have met the requirements of the commission and have been employed permanently, is there any guarantee in connection with that permanency, or is it possible for another department to dispense with the services of an employee for any cause, such as failure to fill in this questionnaire?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): If they were on the strength of the civil service the commission would ordinarily reassign them to some other department.

Mr. FERGUSON: If the heads of a department consider it is necessary for that department that these questionnaires be filled in, and a member of the civil service takes it upon himself to tear up the questionnaire instead, is that permissible? Has the civil servant such protection as would permit him to tear up a questionnaire which the heads of his department consider necessary, thus permitting him to defy the power of his superiors? I should hope not. I hope no civil servant in Canada gets such protection that he is able to run his department, irrespective of his position in the service.

Mr. GILLIS: I am glad I am not working for the hon. member who just took his seat.

Mr. FERGUSON: I can assure the hon. gentleman that he would never be able to fill the job.

Mr. GILLIS: We were not talking about jobs. If you were hiring people, with the attitude you have just shown, they would have very little liberty inside or outside the plant.

Mr. FERGUSON: I could bring five hundred employees who would say you are quite wrong.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not think the answer we were given by the Secretary of State is sufficient. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has pointed out, we are dealing with a questionnaire which the Secretary of State explains was sent out by two departments of the government. Nevertheless these people are civil servants, and were employed in accordance with civil service regulations. I have a copy of the Ottawa Citizen of June 9. On the front page there is this caption, "Questionnaire in CS arouses anger." I do not think any hon. member can take the stand that a department of government has the right to expect answers to the type of questions contained in this questionnaire. So that hon. members may have some idea of what they are like, I am going to quote the first sentence of this article:

> Civil servants are up in arms today over a "personnel questionnaire" which they are being required to fill out in quintuplicate, giving details of the residence and present employment of their brothers, sisters, uncles, aunts and cousins, etc. Perhaps the real joker in the deck, however, is the five lines left—

I think this is the most serious part of it.

> —to list the clubs and associations of which a civil servant is a member or past member.

I do not think it is the business of anyone, even the hon. member for Simcoe North, who might employ me, whether I am a member of the Knights of Columbus, the True Blues, the Canadian Legion or anything else. Those are matters within my own rights as a citizen. I do not think it is the business of the Department of National Revenue, once I have met the requirements of their regulations, to have me to fill in a form and tell them where my brothers, sisters, uncles and all the rest of them are working. I do not think that is any of their business. As long as I perform my duties as a civil servant, I believe the matter ends there.

So, until a satisfactory explanation is given this committee, I believe this item covering the civil service commission should stand. I believe the minister should be in a position to state that no department has the right to interfere with the personal affairs of civil servants. Tonight we have been talking about citizenship, freedom and all that kind of stuff. I do not believe any department coming under the civil service commission has any right to interfere in any of these matters outside their own organization.

[Mr. Gillis.]

I think this is pretty high-handed on the part of the Department of National Defence, and I am surprised that a minister like the hon. gentleman who presides over that department should permit this sort of thing to be done. This is bureaucracy in the extreme; it is interference with the rights of a person as a citizen, and I believe the time to stop this kind of thing is now. This is the thin edge of the wedge. If one or two departments of government can get away with it, then it may become the rule in future. Civil servants may become much less free than they are today; and they do not have so much freedom now. There are many freedoms they do not have which I should like to see them have. So I am seriously suggesting that, until we get a more satisfactory explanation of this questionnaire, this item should stand.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Any question in regard to the questionnaire may be brought up on the estimates of the two departments concerned. The civil service commission has no knowledge of it at all.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, we are dealing with the civil service commission now. I believe it should be asked for an explanation, and I think we should get that explanation before we pass these estimates. In my opinion the departments concerned have no business putting out this kind of thing. The civil service commission is the body responsible for the jobs of the people affected by this questionnaire.

Mr. FRASER: Oh, no; not entirely.

Mr. GILLIS: Before people are taken on as clerks or anything else in national defence or external affairs, they have to pass the civil service examinations.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What are the two departments?

Mr. GILLIS: External affairs and national defence.

Mr. FRASER: Both secret departments.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is it not true that all those employees, especially if they are permanent, have already been required to take an oath of allegiance?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Why not?

Mr. KNOWLES: I have no objection to that, but my point is that, they having done so and having passed the examinations, these inquiries about their sisters, cousins, aunts and so on certainly border on an infringement upon their freedom, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South has pointed out.

Mr. FRASER: The oath of a Labour-Progressive would not mean anything.

Mr. McLURE: Are there any temporary employees in the civil service commission?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes; there are 143 permanents and 117 temporaries.

Mr. McLURE: Temporary employees receive $668,868?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): That is in the two departments. It is divided into two parts. There are 117 temporary employees in the regular civil service branch, and in demobilization and reconversion there are 295. So that those are both included in the total sum that the hon. member mentioned.

Mr. COCKERAM: Is the work of the demobilization and reconversion branch going on at the present time, and is it likely to continue? A large amount was spent last year. Surely that work must be fading into the distance by this time. When will it disappear altogether?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): They will eventually merge into one division. At the present time, however, a survey is being made.

Mr. COCKERAM: In other words, until the merger is carried out we shall not save money?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): It is making a survey of various departments to find out what their post-war requirements may be, and for that reason they have a larger staff than will be necessary later on.

PUBLIC PRINTING AND STATIONERY

323. Canada Gazette, $83,430.

Mr. COCKERAM: What is the revenue here? I take it that this is in addition to the revenue brought in from the sale of the Canada Gazette. I meant to ask a similar question in connection with the patent office, but it slipped my mind. How much money do we take in from this source?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): In the last year or two we have had a deficit on the Canada Gazette. It is being printed in two parts. At one time it carried itself, but at the present time there is a deficit of about $7,500.

Mr. COCKERAM: That is not my question. I did not ask whether there was a deficit. How much came in from the sale of this publication?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Expenditures were $60,067.19, and the revenue was $52,400.

Mr. COCKERAM: So that there was a loss?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes, of about $7,500.

Mr. COCKERAM: I suggest that this is one branch which should pay. If there is a loss on the Canada Gazette, then surely those of us who subscribe to it should pay at least the cost of printing it. How many copies are issued?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): A great many free issues are distributed. I do not think those who pay for it should necessarily have to pay the cost of the free distribution.

Mr. COCKERAM: How many free copies are issued and how many are subscribed for?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Two thousand copies are printed, of which 1,200 are distributed free.

Mr. COCKERAM: To whom are they distributed free? Let us get down to the point as to why this branch cannot be made self-supporting. That is all I want to know.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Part II is distributed to all those who receive free copies of the statutes, including the libraries of Canada, members of parliament, judges, legal libraries and the like.

Mr. COCKERAM: Only 800 copies are paid for?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes, but in addition there is the revenue secured from those who put in advertising.

Mr. COCKERAM: What is the revenue from advertising in the Canada Gazette?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): It is $54,000. The revenue from subscriptions is $18,214 and, from advertising, $34,260.

Mr. COCKERAM: I just wish to point out that in my opinion those figures are not correct. What is the cost of the Canada Gazette today? It is $3 a year, is it not?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): No; it is $8 a year.

Mr. COCKERAM: The minister has said the revenue from subscriptions is $18,214. How does that work out? The minister told me a moment ago that only 800 copies were paid for. That is what I am getting at. He said there were 1,200 free and 800 paid for.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I understand from the king's printer that 2,000 copies of part I are printed; 3,000 copies of part II, and 1,000 copies in French.

Item agreed to.

325. Distribution of official documents, $68,300.

Mr. COCKERAM: I should like an explanation of this item, because I think it is in just about the same position. Why does it cost so much, and what are the documents?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Official documents are distributed to various government offices, to libraries and to members of parliament. For example, the Statutes of Canada are distributed to senators and members of the House of Commons to the extent of 250 copies in English and seventy-nine copies in French. They go to the lieutenant governors of the provinces, government officials in the provinces, police magistrates and provincial libraries. The total distribution is 1,787 in English and 489 in French.

Mr. COCKERAM: Is that just the official statutes, or is it everything?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): That is the official list. Government publications are sent to the same list.

Mr. COCKERAM: I think this is one place where a saving could be made. Every member of the House of Commons receives copies of the divorce bills, and I think practically ninety-five per cent throw them in their wastepaper baskets without looking at them. A number of official documents are sent to members, which could be cut out if a questionnaire were sent around to find out just what we wanted.

Mr. KNOWLES: In connection with the divorce bills, I should like to amend the figure I gave the other night. I pointed out that the divorce bills and proceedings which had come to us this year would make a pile eleven inches high for each member. I multiplied that by the number of members of parliament and senators, and told the house that it would make a pile 312 feet high. Tomorrow morning, when hon. members are walking up the walk, if they will look at the flag on top of the tower they can realize how high the pile would be. One of my French-speaking colleagues in the back row has reminded me that the French-speaking members receive copies in both English and French of both the bills and the proceedings. Therefore the height of the pile would be considerably higher than the flag.

[Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West).]

Seriously, I think something could be done. It would only be a fleabite when compared with the money we have to spend, but surely it would be worth saving. Some way should be found to do away with the printing of the huge quantities of these things which all of us just throw away.

Mr. LENNARD: That would apply to a great many other publications issued by the government to all members of parliament. I know we all get from different departments publications which are just thrown away unwrapped into the wastepaper basket. I agree with the hon. member who has suggested that a questionnaire should be sent out, so that we could indicate what publications we desire. A considerable saving could be effected.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): This is a matter that really should be taken up with the committee on printing, because the printing bureau does the actual work and makes the distribution in accordance with the instructions it receives. It does not decide for itself what distribution shall be made. If the committee on printing would give it some latitude, so that members could be asked what they desired, instead of their being supplied automatically with material, possibly a saving could be made.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That brings to my mind the thought that the Secretary of State might be the proper person to follow that up and try to get it done. These divorce petitions are the greatest waste of money. They are sent to us by the score each year, and I am sure that each one of us just throws them in the wastepaper basket. They involve a waste of envelopes, time and everything else. If a change in the statute is required, let us have it done. I suggest that the Secretary of State charge himself with trying to have that done.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I shall be glad to bring that to the attention of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. KNOWLES: Hon. members will recall that when we received the 1947 statutes last year a change had been made. The announcement was made that the 1947 statutes would be printed in two volumes, one containing the statutes other than the divorce acts and the other volume containing the divorce acts. We were told that if we wanted to get the volume containing the divorce acts, we could get it, but if we did not particularly want it and did not especially apply for it we would not get it. That did not come through the committee; that decision was made at some official level. I would hope that at the same level a decision could be made that at the beginning of the year each member of parliament would get a sample divorce bill and a sample copy of proceedings and evidence. I do not know who would pick them out, but they are still the same, and we could let it go at that.

Item agreed to.

326. Printing and binding official publications for sale and distribution to departments and the public, $125,000.

Mr. COCKERAM: This item is in exactly the same position as the last one. I assume that the explanation given by the minister would cover this item as well.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

440. Departmental administration, $272,600.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few observations about this item and take advantage of this occasion to refer in a general way to trade and commerce and to make a request of the minister. Undoubtedly foreign trade has a special significance in our minds this year by reason of events which took place last year and the special measures which had to be taken. I am going to try to make my request in an entirely uncontroversial way, because I am most anxious to put it to the minister in such a way as to get what I think we need, a comprehensive statement of our trade position, not just a few general words.

I want to remind the minister briefly of the events which we both have in mind: the steps which were taken last autumn, including his own speech; the measures which have been passed and, finally, the reference which he made last autumn to the Marshall plan and to the position in which we now find ourselves. What I suggest the minister should give us is up-to-date figures showing the results achieved, first of all, under the exchange conservation bill, with its three aspects, the exclusion aspect, the quota aspect, and the permit aspect; secondly, what he has been able to do pursuant to his radio address last autumn to promote the increase of exports of Canadian manufactured goods to the United States, and finally, I come to say a word about the Marshall plan.

I quite appreciate what the minister said the other evening, that it is difficult, perhaps impossible, for the department to estimate exactly what benefit we shall get under the Marshall plan, although the minister hoped last autumn that he might be able to do that. I appreciate what he said, that the Marshall plan puts United States funds into the hands of European countries which can then use them as they see fit. Therefore I realize it is difficult for the minister to attempt to anticipate just what benefit we shall derive from these moneys put into the hands of these countries.

That brings me again to the question of trade, and I point out to the minister that the whole situation involves our foreign trade position, and that this place and this time is the proper place and time for a comprehensive statement to be given such as the Minister of Trade and Commerce is best able to give. May I suggest to the minister that it should not be done in any offhand way in any five or ten minutes. What we should have and are entitled to is a carefully prepared, comprehensive, reasoned and complete statement giving us the best estimate he can give us at the present time, first of all, as to what results have been achieved since last autumn and secondly, as to our expectations based on the best analysis he can make of our foreign trade position and the best analysis he can make of what we may expect in the development of our trade. In other words, he should put us in a position to judge where we stand in our foreign trade balance position. I put that to the minister. I am not pretending that it is a small thing. It is quite a big thing. It will need a comprehensive statement, and I hope the minister will give it. I think this is the time and this is the place that it should be given.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Chairman, we spent five hours on this subject the other day but perhaps my hon. friend was more pleasantly engaged. However, if he wants a statement I will give him one, although it will take a little time. I hope he will listen patiently.

The remarks I have to make refer to the administration of schedule III of the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act, which deals with the imports of a specified list of capital goods and production materials.

The dollar value of imports from the United States of capital goods and production materials enumerated in schedule III has been held during the first four months of 1948 at $187 million. This is a level slightly above the first four months of 1947 when the figure was $177 million, but well below both of the remaining four month periods of 1947, when the same imports amounted to about $206 million in each case. These figures are shown in detail in table I which accompanies this statement. With the permission of the committee, I will put the table on Hansard.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Has the minister permission to put the table on Hansard?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. HOWE: The table is as follows:

At the end of 1947, when the government sought power to control these items, it is to be remembered that domestic investment had reached a record level and that imports of capital goods from the United States had risen correspondingly. The survey of investment intentions which I tabled in the house had indicated the grand total of new investment in construction, machinery and equipment might continue to rise from the level of $2·4 billion in 1947 to perhaps $2·8 billion in 1948. In comparison with the increase of imports of capital goods which would otherwise have occurred, the control program in this field has already achieved substantial United States dollar savings. Prices of machinery and materials have continued to rise in the United States in the meantime, so that in the reducing of the dollar value of these imports, their physical quantities have been reduced still more.

When schedule III items have been brought under control it has been necessary to consult the industries concerned and to make a careful study of each case. The items have, therefore, been brought under control in groups announced at successive dates. The details of this are shown in the attached table III.

It should be noted that the Minister of Finance was initially responsible for some of these items. By June 5, over 72 per cent of the items in schedule III had been brought under control, and these items accounted for about 49 per cent of all the imports in schedule III in 1947.

Because a number of these items have recently been controlled, import statistics available to date do not as yet fully reflect the operation of the controls which have been applied. These should result in larger savings of United States dollars during the remainder of the year. Some results are, however, already to be noted. For example, imports from the United States in March and April of the current year were in each case lower than for the same months of 1947 for schedule III items. Table II shows such import statistics as have become available on items brought under control. Table II follows:

* In many cases these figures cover somewhat more than the items enumerated in schedule III. They are as close an approximation to schedule III as can be made with official import statistics.

[Mr. Howe.]

It is clear from these figures that the imposition of controls has resulted in a diminution of imports and that the greatest saving to date has been in the case of automotive vehicle tariff items 438a and 439b, which were made effective on November 18, 1947. It should further be borne in mind that imports have been admitted in many cases in schedule III where contracts were made prior to November 18, 1947. It is clear that these cases will become of less importance as time goes on although it was recognized in advance that there would be a large number of them at the beginning of the program.

Methods of administration have been devised which take account of the various problems which arise in the import of schedule III items. Wherever possible, import quotas have been applied, or dollar allotments as they are called. In most cases these have followed the general pattern of the formula applied to imports of the automobile industry which I explained in this house at an earlier date. These dollar allotments have been found most suitable in controlling the imports of parts for production use enumerated in schedule III.

In other cases not subject to these dollar allotments, applications are received for import permits on an individual basis. Until the end of May a total of $21·5 million of import authorizations have been granted in this way, $14 million for imports from the United States and $7·5 million for imports from other countries. This has involved thousands of individual applications, each of which had to be carefully screened.

A third system has been evolved to deal with anyone engaged in a project such as the construction of an industrial plant. Applications may be made for blanket approval of all the imports necessary for the particular project. Project approvals which are issued in these circumstances are, in effect, an assurance that individual shipment permits will be issued as they are needed. Up to the end of May, a total of 232 project applications had been approved. A large proportion of these cover the expansion of industries which will either increase exports or diminish our dependence on imports on a sound economic basis. About forty project applications have been approved for the replacement of obsolete and uneconomical equipment. A number of these latter were in the textile industry. Seventeen of these project permits deal with public service projects, of which by far the most important is the hydro-electric power development now taking place throughout Ontario.

The total value of materials still required for these 232 projects amounts to some $495 million, $73 million of which is material covered by schedule III to be imported from the United States during 1948 and subsequent years. Almost every Canadian industry of any size has been affected by this project authorization system. Apart from public utilities in Ontario, the industries which account for the largest expenditures in the above total are pulp and paper, textiles, petroleum, chemicals and processed foods and beverages.

Schedule III was not designed to place drastic limitations on industry. Quite the reverse; it was intended to promote industrial growth in the most constructive possible way. This program is being developed every day. Imports of capital goods were in danger of going beyond what we could afford to spend in United States dollars, but drastic curtailment would have been undesirable. It would have impeded industry's plans and would have caused unemployment and attendant difficulties in many parts of the country. Hasty or ill-considered action might well have altered our course from our present booming prosperity to the reverse, recession and falling incomes. This has been avoided. New industries are being established in Canada all the time to continue the development and further integration of our national economy. Thus the program is not merely to save dollars in the short run, but also to assist industry as a whole to spend our scarce United States dollars where they will do the most good for our future development. The co-operation on the part of industry has been excellent throughout, and there has been evidence of widespread public desire to assist in solving the dollar exchange problem.

Imports of steel provide a good illustration of efforts made to obtain adequate supplies of an important basic material for Canadian industry. We are not anxious to cut down our steel; on the contrary we are anxious to import as much as we can get, consistent with the allocation of steel which must be made in the United States to many other important uses. In the first quarter of 1948, tonnage of structural steel imports subject to control was about fifty-seven per cent higher than in the first quarter of 1947, although about sixteen per cent below the fourth quarter of 1947.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the minister the total tons?

Mr. HOWE: I have not the tonnage, no; I can look it up for the hon. member. Total imports of all mill forms show a similar trend in the same periods.

Tariff item 438a, motor vehicles, was put under control on November 18, 1947. I estimated in the house in February that we would effect a total saving, on this tariff item alone, of about $55,000,000 in 1948. Additional savings on automotive parts were estimated to bring the total saving on automobile imports up to $70,000,000 or $75,000,000 in 1948. It looks now as if savings of this magnitude will be attained. Nearly all the reduction in imports thus far is attributable to diminished imports of complete vehicles from the United States. The import formula for the automobile industry has permitted the continued imports of parts at a high level. Along with this, production in the Canadian automobile industry bids fair to be comparable with the high levels of last year. In the first quarter of 1948, roughly 60,000 vehicles were produced. Types of vehicles will be manufactured in Canada which were previously imported from the United States, and at least one manufacturer has been hastening plans for the Canadian production of his car which was previously imported. Another manufacturer is moving into the production of motor coaches in Canada. A number of Canadian industries have expanded the manufacture of automobile parts and sub-assemblies which were previously imported. They include new types of wheels, non-vacuum fuel pumps, hub, drum and transmission assemblies and others.

The industrial expansion which we are encouraging can best be illustrated by referring to a few of the industries for which imports of machinery and equipment have been authorized.

Among our largest imports last year were textile fabrics, that is, cottons, rayons and woollens. These amounted to about $180 million and were largely imported from the United States. Well over one-half of the imports consisted of cotton fabrics. As hon. members know, it has been necessary to make large reductions in our imports of cottons and rayons from the United States and, especially in the case of cotton fabrics, import restrictions will sharply reduce the supply available for the domestic market. At present there are a number of large expansion and modernization projects under way in all branches of the textile industry that will contribute substantially to a reduction of our imports of these materials as well as of yarns and fibres, and will increase efficiency in the industry. These projects will not only aid in our immediate dollar saving program and alleviate material shortages but also contribute to the improvement of our long-term dollar position. In these respects the expansion of our cotton industry will be most important. I can add, too, that the completion of a rayon plant now under way will make it less necessary to import rayon fibres and yarns.

[Mr. Howe.]

In the pulp and paper industry there is a large expansion program under way to increase our production of a number of products, particularly for export to the United States. Some of these projects will process pulp previously exported; others will convert our paper into containers and other paper products now being imported. In the past, Canada has imported a substantial amount of copper and brass products. In this industry, too, a large expansion project now under way should materially reduce our dependence on imports. The same is true of our asbestos industry. Heretofore, a large proportion of our asbestos has been exported as a raw material, and it has been necessary for us to import various manufactured asbestos products. A number of large projects now under way will not only increase our production of asbestos but, in particular, increase our production of manufactured products for both the domestic and export markets.

I have already referred to recent developments in our automobile industry, and there are similar developments in a number of our other secondary manufacturing industries. For example, one of the largest United States manufacturers of automatic washing machines is to establish a plant in Canada for the manufacture of his products. The Canadian plant will supply most of the export markets already established by the United States parent company, and at the same time will manufacture repair parts for the world market, including the United States.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): That plant is located in Amherst, Nova Scotia?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Nine million dollars.

Mr. HOWE: We always take care of the maritime provinces. Another instance of the kind of industrial development at present occurring in Canada is the manufacture of noiseless typewriters. In this case as well, one of the largest United States companies is establishing a plant here to manufacture noiseless typewriters, to supply its entire market for this type of machine. Similar developments are occurring in other fields which cannot be detailed here, except perhaps to mention such products as fountain pens and pencils, various publications, et cetera, which are to be produced in Canada to supply foreign markets already established by United States parent companies.

Expansion now under way in still other industries will reduce our dependence on imports and will increase our exports. Some of these are petroleum products, industrial chemicals, pharmaceuticals, ophthalmic lenses, machinery, tools, hardware, food products, et cetera. In many of these plants, products that have never before been made in Canada will be manufactured here.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish to thank the minister for the statement he has given us. He has covered part of what I asked, and I think, very fully. The minister has dealt in a somewhat detailed way with the operation of 3, part III, of the conservation act, and he has given certain general indications as to what may be expected in the way of increased exports, not merely to other countries but to the United States. I want to ask him for figures on the last point. What actual figures have we got up to date? And that leads me, of course, to ask what the situation of the exchange fund is from month to month.

There is the other point I mentioned, when we come to the foreign market, namely, what is the position there? What are our trade agreements and what are our other expectations? We should like to know something about this, so that we can form our own estimate, as well as we can, of what we may expect to derive through purchases in Europe and elsewhere by their making use of Marshall plan dollars. If the minister has not those figures available, they can be given later, but I think we need them in order to get the complete picture. I am grateful for what he has given tonight. It is along the lines of what I wanted.

Mr. HOWE: As far as imports and exports are concerned, I can deal with the two largest markets, the one in the United States and the other in England. As regards the United States, our imports are dropping month by month and our exports are expanding as compared with similar months a year ago.

In January of this year imports from the United States were $150 million as compared with $136·4 million in 1947. In February they dropped to $136·8 million as against $138·4 million last year. In March they dropped to $138·3 million as against $165·1 million. For April the figure is $161 million as against $183·5 million for 1947.

So much for imports. As far as exports are concerned, a better showing is made. In January, 1948, we exported $105 million as against $79·5 million in January of last year. In February of this year we exported $94·8 million as against $69·4 million last year.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Could the minister break down a typical month?

Mr. HOWE: I have only the over-all figures. There are thousands of these items.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I meant in groups.

Mr. HOWE: I will see what I can do. In March we exported $112·5 million to the United States—that is, this year—as against $83·1 million last year, and in April we exported $111·4 million as against $91·3 million last year. So much for the United States.

I turn now to England. Imports are rising steadily, which is desirable. Exports are always up, but only slightly. In January, imports from the United Kingdom were $21·6 million this year as against $14·3 million for 1947. In February of this year we imported $17·9 million as against $10·5 million in February last year. In March of this year we imported $21·6 million as against $13·8 million last year. I am sorry we have not the April figure on imports.

As regards exports to the United Kingdom, in January of this year we exported $64·9 million as against $50·5 million last year. In February we exported $51·7 million as against $44·9 million last year. In March we exported $59·2 million as against $47·6 million last year.

So that the trend is definitely in the direction we require: reduced imports from the United States and increased exports to the United States; and as far as England is concerned, increased imports from England.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Again I am grateful for what the minister has given, but I would point out that there are other things which I included in my first statement and which I hope he will give tomorrow. These figures will appear in Hansard, and I hope the minister will not bring this on at eleven o'clock because we shall not have Hansard at that hour. The minister has given us these figures, but I think we should have a breakdown of some months in order to have an idea of quantities and the nature of goods in addition to the over-all figures. We want to know about payments, about the amount which is assured to us by contract for the rest of the year, and in general—while I repeat my thanks to the minister for what he has given—we need a good deal more to enable us to get the complete picture. I hope the minister will continue what he has so satisfactorily begun.

Mr. HOWE: I can give the hon. member a breakdown now. These are balances, not absolute figures, ups and downs with corresponding months last year. From January to April, 1948, as compared with January to April, 1947, in aluminum and products our exports increased by $19 million; copper and products, our exports increased by $10 million—

Mr. HACKETT: To where?

Mr. HOWE: That is all Canada's trade. It does not matter where very much; it is all for dollars. Nickel and products increased by $7 million; pulp increased by $14 million; newsprint increased by $12 million; lumber dropped $1 million; in wheat there was no change; flour dropped $13 million owing to the shortage of the crop, resulting in the fact that we had not the wheat to make flour; bacon increased $19 million; other meats dropped by $2 million; farm machinery increased by $12 million; and trucks dropped by $11 million.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It is now eleven o'clock. The minister has given us a good deal of material; and I would ask him to put himself in our position, because I hope that we shall have enough wit to ask further questions in order to get the fullest information available—it may not be absolutely complete, but the fullest information available—as to just what our position is at the moment.

Mr. HOWE: If you will be patient I can put on the record the imports for the same period.

Mr. HACKETT: Are the figures just read the whole trade of Canada to all the world?

Mr. HOWE: Just differences from last year.

Mr. HACKETT: I know, but differences in all trade with what countries?

Mr. HOWE: The world. Imports for the same period; from January to March, 1948, inclusive, coal imports increased by $13 million—

Mr. MacNICOL: Have you the total?

Mr. HOWE: No. Petroleum increased by $19 million; farm machinery increased by $8 million; other machinery increased by $17 million; automobile parts increased by $4 million; automobiles and trucks dropped by $11 million; cotton products dropped by $21 million; and fruits and vegetables dropped by $12 million.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Tomorrow we shall go into committee of supply and take the following departments: trade and commerce, reconstruction and supply, national health and welfare, transport, labour, national revenue and public works, though not necessarily in that order. We shall start with trade and commerce.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I reiterate my request, which I think is reasonable—

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend should attend here a little more frequently. I have engagements as well, and I have accommodated the opposition by postponing these estimates twice, not at the request of my hon. friend but at the request of other hon. members opposite. I have to leave town tomorrow, and I should like the privilege of placing these estimates before the committee.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister can proceed or not, but I am making what I think is a reasonable request. He has placed many figures on Hansard tonight. If we were meeting at three o'clock tomorrow I would not be making this request, but we are meeting at eleven and we shall not have Hansard before us. Quite frankly I think the public interest should take precedence over the minister's personal convenience.

Mr. HOWE: I quite agree, but I have spent five hours on this, and have obliged the opposition already on two occasions. So I think hon. gentlemen opposite might have a little consideration for me. I have a few things to do also. Probably I have as much to do as my hon. friend, and I should like to fit in my appointments somehow.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Well, now—

Mr. HOWE: I am going to bring my estimates on tomorrow. My hon. friend can talk about them then if he wishes.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would it be helpful to suggest that the minister come on with his items at eleven o'clock, as he says, but that he might make some rearrangement to suit the convenience of my hon. friend?

Mr. HOWE: Certainly; I do not expect to finish tomorrow.

Mr. KNOWLES: Start with some item other than this one; we might make better progress in that way.

Mr. HOWE: Certainly.

Mr. KNOWLES: What about the international wheat agreement? The minister might even bring that on.

Mr. HOWE: I hope to bring that on some day, but I am going to have my estimates passed first, if hon. members opposite will let me do so.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 11, 1948

The house met at eleven o'clock.

THE MINISTRY

RESIGNATIONS AND APPOINTMENTS—ADDITIONAL PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANTS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce certain ministerial changes, and the appointment of additional parliamentary assistants.

I regret exceedingly to have to inform the house that, due to protracted illness, the Honourable J. Allison Glen has felt it necessary to tender his resignation as Minister of Mines and Resources, and that in existing circumstances I have felt it my duty to submit Mr. Glen's resignation to His Excellency the Governor General, and to advise its acceptance.

I cannot say how deeply I regret the severance of official relations with so highly valued a colleague in the government, and so old and loyal a friend. What I would most wish to say at this time is set forth in the correspondence which has passed between Mr. Glen and myself. It would, I believe, best explain the situation were I to read the correspondence to the house.

The day before yesterday I received by Canadian National Telegraphs the following telegram, dated at Winnipeg, Manitoba, June 9, 1948, at 8.27 p.m.:

The Right Honourable
William Lyon Mackenzie King,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

I have been informed today by my medical adviser that my illness may be protracted for an indeterminate period. I feel therefore that matters of urgent importance in my department requiring early consideration and decision may suffer by my continued absence, and I have consequently decided to submit my resignation as minister, to be acted upon in your discretion, which I herewith do.

May I add that it is with the deepest regret that I feel constrained to take this course, which severs the very happy ministerial association which it has been my privilege to enjoy with you and my colleagues in the cabinet, an association which I shall always gratefully cherish.

J. Allison Glen.

To that telegram I replied yesterday, June 10, 1948, as follows:

The Honourable James Allison Glen, M.P.,
541 Cambridge Street,
Winnipeg, Manitoba.

My dear Glen:

I have just received your telegram of yesterday. I am indeed deeply sorry to learn that your strength has not returned as rapidly as we all hoped it might. If, as you say, there is a possibility of your illness being protracted, I think you are right in seeking to relieve yourself of the responsibilities of administering the affairs of the Department of Mines and Resources and giving yourself as much in the way of rest and freedom as possible. This should greatly assist you in expediting your recovery. In the circumstances, I have decided to submit your resignation to His Excellency forthwith and to advise its acceptance.

I need not assure you that it is with a regret equal to your own that, for the reasons mentioned in your telegram, I feel it my duty to recommend the acceptance of your resignation. Before, however, making any recommendation to His Excellency, I should like to thank you warmly for the splendid service you have rendered Canada as a minister of the crown, and for all that your helpful counsel and close co-operation has meant to our colleagues, and to myself in particular, in the work of the administration.

My deep regret at the severance of these happy and helpful relations will be shared, I know, in full measure by all our colleagues. Fortunately, your retirement from the ministry will not mean the loss of the association which, as members of parliament, we have enjoyed over so many years, and to the continuance of which, through the opportunity afforded you of rest and freedom from ministerial responsibilities, will, I trust, be assured for some time still to come.

With warmest personal regards to Mrs. Glen and yourself,

Believe me, as always, dear Glen,

Yours very sincerely,

W. L. Mackenzie King

I am sure hon. members generally will deeply regret, with my colleagues and myself, the Honourable Mr. Glen's retirement from the ministry, and especially the reason for it; we will all wish in deepest sincerity that his health may speedily be restored, and that we may see him again in parliament at the beginning of another session.

I wish now to announce the resignation of the Honourable James A. MacKinnon as Minister of Fisheries, and Mr. MacKinnon's appointment as Minister of Mines and Resources, the department over which Mr. Glen presided and of which Mr. MacKinnon, during a portion of Mr. Glen's absence, has been the acting minister.

I have great pleasure also in announcing the appointment of Mr. Robert W. Mayhew as a member of the Privy Council of Canada, and as Minister of Fisheries. Mr. Mayhew will be British Columbia's representative in the cabinet.

I wish to announce the transfer of Mr. Robert H. Winters of Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, from the position of Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Revenue to that of Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport.

I announce further the transfer of Mr. Thomas Reid of New Westminster, British Columbia from the office of Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries to that of Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Revenue.

It will be recognized at once that it would not be advisable that the parliamentary assistant in the Department of Fisheries should be from the same province as the minister of that department. The transfer of Mr. Reid from the Department of Fisheries to the Department of National Revenue will fortunately leave an opening for the appointment of a parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries from another province which, up to the present time, has not had representation in the house by way of a parliamentary assistant.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Scotch and the Irish will collect the taxes from now on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish also to express my pleasure in announcing the appointment of Mr. Leslie A. Mutch, of Winnipeg, Manitoba as Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. The house will recall that a short time ago a vacancy was created in that position through the resignation of Mr. Walter Tucker, who had formerly occupied that position.

Finally, I have much pleasure in announcing the appointment of Mr. J. Watson MacNaught, of Summerside, Prince Edward Island, as Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries.

While it is not necessary to table the orders in council respecting these several appointments, I think it might be advisable to do so, and I therefore table the orders respecting the ministers and parliamentary assistants.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I had a question for the Prime Minister this morning in regard to representation in the cabinet for British Columbia, and I am glad that I have not had an opportunity to ask him. I wish to be the first to congratulate the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., (Mr. Mayhew) upon his appointment to the cabinet.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I certainly speak for all members associated with me in our party in expressing regret that Mr. Glen has felt it necessary to resign, and to say a word of appreciation of his services, both as Speaker and as minister of the crown. Naturally one congratulates the others.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

First report of the joint committee of both houses on the library of parliament.—Mr. Speaker.

Second and third reports of the special committee on the Dominion Elections Act, 1938. —Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce).

SUBSIDIES AND SUBVENTIONS

REFERENCE TO INFORMATION GIVEN IN ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, may I say that in a return tabled on February 23, 1948, in answer to a question of mine, information regarding the payment of moneys under the war emergency training program was given in full by the Department of Labour. In a return, sessional paper 186B, May 17, similar full replies were given by the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Fisheries. But a letter contained in the return from the deputy minister of trade and commerce withholds the same type of information on the ground that "it is not considered to be in the public interest to give information as to subsidies paid to individual concerns."

Evidently, in view of the other information in this return and the return of February 23, this statement of the deputy minister is not correct, and in my opinion is an interference with the privileges and rights of the members of parliament, who should be able to secure details of the expenditure of public moneys appropriated by or under the control of parliament.

I therefore request that the Secretary of State table the information asked for under the order of this house of February 25 moved by the member for Maple Creek (Mr. McCuaig).

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

BANKING AND COMMERCE—PRICES—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved:

That the name of Mr. Gillis be substituted for that of Mr. Argue on the standing committee on banking and commerce.

That the name of Mr. Irvine be substituted for that of Mr. Zaplitny on the special committee on prices.

Motion agreed to.

JAPANESE

ORDERS IN COUNCIL RESPECTING PROPERTY IN CANADA

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with an undertaking given last night to the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) during consideration of my estimates, I wish to table two copies of order in council P.C. 1810 of July 18, 1947, and two copies of order in council P.C. 3737 of September 17, 1947, with regard to Japanese property.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES ACT

PROVISIONS AS TO ISSUE, CONVERSION AND AMENDMENT

Mr. PAUL E. COTE (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 343, to amend the Government Annuities Act.

Mr. KNOWLES: Explain.

Mr. COTE (Verdun): The chief purposes of the bill are to provide greater flexibility in the provisions of the Government Annuities Act relating to the issue, conversion and amendment of annuity contracts and payments thereunder, and to clarify provisions of the act which have given rise to legal or technical difficulties in the administration thereof.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works, for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution.

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway company to issue securities not exceeding $85,882,200 in principal amount to provide the moneys necessary to meet capital expenditures made or capital indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1948; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal, and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the making of temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $85,882,200 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and indebtedness; with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system and to authorize the Minister of Finance to place at the disposal of the national company or the Trans-Canada Air Lines, such amounts as may be necessary to enable them to pay operating and income charges if at any time in any year the available revenues of the national railway system or the Trans-Canada Air Lines and subsidiaries, respectively, are not sufficient to pay such charges: Provided that all such amounts shall be reimbursed to the Minister from the recipients' annual revenues in so far as such revenues are sufficient, any insufficiency to be provided for by subsequent deficit appropriation by parliament.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSING

OWNER OCCUPANCY OF HOUSES PURCHASED BY VETERANS

On the orders of the day.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance or his parliamentary assistant. I find great difficulty in rearranging my thoughts with respect to the various changes that have just been announced; therefore if I direct my question to the wrong member, perhaps I may be excused at this stage.

Mr. GRANT: A lot of changes, the same as in Toronto.

Mr. GRAYDON: I notice you were not included, so perhaps I may proceed.

May I offer a word of congratulation to the new Minister of Fisheries and express the hope that this time there will be some permanency—at least until the next general election—in his appointment. I have always felt a little sorry for the finny tribes of Canada, in that they never get a chance now to know the minister who is supervising their activities. I sincerely congratulate the minister as a very popular member of this house.

I should also like to express on behalf of our party our deep regret that, on account of ill health, Hon. J. A. Glen has found it necessary to sever his connection with the cabinet. We shall all recall his excellent work as Speaker of this house, and his courtesy and efficiency in administering the Department of Mines and Resources, of which he has had charge for the last few years. All of us I am sure wish for him a speedy and permanent recovery from what we hope is just a temporary ailment.

When I have had an opportunity, as the Prime Minister often says, of studying the other changes, and finding out who are the parliamentary assistants to whom, I shall have a word of congratulation for them; because they are all very good friends of ours.

I would ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance whether consideration is being given to making it easier for veterans to get possession of the houses they have purchased from those now occupying them as tenants. I understand that the government has had the matter under consideration, and I should like to know what progress has been made, and whether any announcement will be made before the end of the session.

Mr. BELZILE (rising):

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, probably on this occasion the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance will allow me. I want to thank the Prime Minister for the honour he has conferred upon me and upon my constituency. I hope that I shall be able to do justice to the department to which I have been appointed as minister. I also want to thank the members of the house for their very kind reception of the announcement, and I hope I shall be able to retain their good will.

I think the question asked by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) should be directed to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, because it has to do with a matter which is entirely in the hands of that department.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, I was hoping I would not have an answer like that, because surely, after all these changes and additions, more work is not to be given to the minister of reconstruction. I had in mind a matter which comes under the rental control branch of the wartime prices and trade board, not the department of reconstruction.

Mr. MAYHEW: I do not think it comes under our department, but I will look into it, and I am sure the parliamentary assistant will give my hon. friend an answer later.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Prime Minister if he will take the matter up tomorrow with the cabinet and find out who is responsible?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry, but I shall be in Toronto tomorrow for a very important engagement.

Mr. GRAYDON: I said Monday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will look at Hansard he will see he said "tomorrow".

MAPLE HILLS, CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. Is the minister prepared to make a statement with reference to Maple Hills housing problem, Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): There has been some correspondence on the matter between the federal government and the provincial government. It is not fresh in my mind, but I shall be glad to review the correspondence and make a statement later.

FEED SHORTAGE

INQUIRY AS TO HAY LAND ON CATTALO RESERVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture may I direct a question to the government? In view of the serious feed shortage in the neighbourhood of Wainwright, Alberta, will the Department of Agriculture reconsider its decision to reserve four sections of good hay land on the Cattalo reserve, and issue permits for local cattle men to obtain much needed hay?

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Acting Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I have been asked to make the following reply: The matter of reserving hay lands at Wainwright, Alberta, will be reviewed by the Department of Agriculture.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

PRINCESS ELIZABETH HOSPITAL FOR AGED AND INFIRM, WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he can now give an answer to my question of two days ago in regard to the Princess Elizabeth Hospital in Winnipeg?

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I thought I had explained the situation to the hon. gentleman privately, but since he has asked the question, may I say that my parliamentary assistant, who is also a member for Winnipeg, had spoken to me about the matter several days before the hon. member raised the question in the house.

Mr. KNOWLES: But the minister did not even know about it when I questioned him in the house the other day.

Mr. MARTIN: What the hon. gentleman should have said is that when he put his question the minister did not recall the particular incident. The question raised by the hon. member is one that I think can properly be discussed on the supplementary estimates in connection with the new health program, when I shall deal with that and similar questions.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO RELIEF FOR BONAVENTURE COUNTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. BONA ARSENAULT (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. I am well aware of the rule of the house that questions have to be brief and to the point, but in this particular instance my question is in connection with a disaster which has just occurred in my constituency, and I beg the indulgence of the house.

I have just returned from an inspection tour of the flooded areas of Bonaventure county, where I have conferred with several local delegations. The population of Bonaventure county living in the valleys of Nouvelle West river, Cascapedia river and Bonaventure river, as well as other districts, have been severely flood-stricken and have suffered loss and damages to the extent of over one million dollars.

For one full week, all communication by train and by highway was cut off between Bonaventure county, on the south shore of the Gaspe coast, and the rest of the province, on account of railway and highway bridges having been washed out.

At Nouvelle West there is a large area of cultivated land still lying under water, owing to the fact that the Nouvelle river went out of its original channel to form three new channels to the sea.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ARSENAULT: What would the Minister of Public Works be prepared to do in order to help and relieve the flood-stricken population in Bonaventure county?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. May I remind hon. members that I have been very generous in the last two weeks to hon. members who have asked questions concerning flood conditions in their constituencies. Hon. members should be fair to the hon. member who is asking the question.

Mr. ARSENAULT: Alongside the Cascapedia river, in the Barry Mountain district, a road which is essential to lumber operations has been washed out for a distance of about thirty miles. It is estimated that 50,000 cords of pulpwood have been driven to the sea by the flood. My question is: what would the Minister of Public Works be prepared to do in order to help and relieve the flood-stricken population of Bonaventure county?

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): I believe I shall have to give the hon. member the answer I have given to other hon. members who brought their cases to my attention. Flood conditions generally do not come under the control of the federal government. We may take up the instance of a national disaster such as has occurred in British Columbia, but not ordinary flood conditions. Where navigation is unimpeded, we have no jurisdiction. That comes under provincial jurisdiction. If I understood the hon. member correctly, he said that a road has been covered by water. Roads come under the provincial government. I believe the provincial government has the responsibility of maintaining the roads or protecting them from damage.

Mr. ARSENAULT: I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. My question is in connection with the floods and washouts experienced in the Nouvelle West district, Bonaventure county, when the Nouvelle river flooded a large area of farming land north of the Canadian National Railways line, and then washed out three new channels to the sea. Will the Minister of Transport give consideration to securing the assistance of the Canadian National Railways in order to take up with the federal government, the Quebec provincial government, as well as the Quebec drainage commission the question of having the Nouvelle river in Bonaventure county returned to its original channel, known locally as the Mercier channel? A return of the river to its former channel, however, will not entirely handle the spring freshets in that district, and the Canadian National Railways should leave sufficient openings at their bridges to drive piling at mileage 32·8 and 33, in order to allow the excess of water to pass through without causing washouts in the future.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): I shall be glad to ask the officials of the Canadian National Railways to ascertain what the position is, and I shall give my hon. friend the reply as quickly as I can.

OLEOMARGARINE

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): Yesterday the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) asked whether the government would give consideration to referring to the Supreme Court of Canada the question of the constitutionality of the provision of the Dairy Industry Act prohibiting the sale and manufacture of oleomargarine. Later in the day a resolution was passed in another place expressing the opinion that such a reference should be made. Under the circumstances the government will give consideration to the question.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

440. Departmental administration, $272,600.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Chairman, may I make a statement? A request was made that we do not proceed with this item at this time. If it is the wish of the committee I am willing to let the item stand and go on with item 441, foreign trade services.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I shall be grateful if the minister will follow that procedure.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 440 stands. I should remind the committee that when I call the items we shall have to discuss the matters which are strictly relevant to the vote under consideration.

Item stands.

[Mr. Arsenault.]

Foreign trade services—

441. Commercial relations and foreign tariffs division, including contribution of $2,800 to international customs tariffs bureau, $102,513.

Mr. ISNOR: This item deals with commercial relations and foreign tariffs division. I think this is the item on which I should like to make a few remarks because of statements made by certain hon. members of the opposition about the Department of Trade and Commerce, and particularly about the trade commissioners.

As a member of the banking and commerce committee, it has been my privilege to listen to witnesses appearing before that committee to explain the Geneva trade agreements and other matters regarding trade. As a businessman I wish to pay tribute to the excellent work being carried on by this department. When I say that I believe I am expressing the views of a great many people in Canada. It is not my habit to pay compliments to officials but I realize that we have efficient men carrying on in all the departments, and I think they are outstanding in the Department of Trade and Commerce. In view of the favourable remarks made by the Halifax board of trade when a group of representatives from the Department of Trade and Commerce visited that city, I felt I should say what I have just said. We are fortunate in having so many efficient men in this department.

I am particularly interested in the export and import officials who appeared before the banking and commerce committee of last year. They explained in detail their work and the manner in which they were bringing more business to our country.

I wish also to make a brief reference to the publication entitled "Foreign Trade" which is put out by the department. It is a valuable publication, and is of real help to those interested in the development of our import and export trade. I compliment those who are responsible for it. I have before me a letter from a bank manager in Nova Scotia commenting on the valuable and useful information that he and others derive from its pages.

May I call the attention of the minister to the international wheat agreement and to ask certain questions about it. I take it for granted that it has some connection with the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. HOWE: Ratification of the international wheat agreement is the subject matter of a notice of motion which appears on the order paper. I submit that it is hardly in order for the hon. member to discuss it now.

Mr. ISNOR: Then I approach the matter in another way, in an effort to get this question cleared up. I have in mind the method of approach adopted by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. When he cannot get his answer by one means he tries another. I do not wish to enter by the back door, but I feel that this is a question in which we are all interested, and perhaps certain clauses might be considered for the very reason the minister has mentioned, that is to say, that the agreement has not yet been fully approved.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, I ask for your ruling. Is it in order to discuss that subject now, in view of the fact that it is on the order paper?

The CHAIRMAN: The following resolution appears on the order paper under government notices of motion:

Resolved, that it is expedient that parliament do approve the international wheat agreement opened for signature at Washington on March 6, 1948, and that this house do approve the same.

In view of that notice of motion, I must rule that it is not in order to discuss the matter under the item now before the committee.

Mr. ISNOR: I shall be pleased to abide by your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I hope to discuss the matter on a later occasion, but I would ask the minister to be good enough, in connection with all agreements into which Canada enters, to give consideration to the shipment of goods through Canadian ports. That should be definitely written into every agreement made by the Department of Trade and Commerce; otherwise I do not know how we shall get the business that rightly belongs to us. If someone is selling or buying goods, it is his privilege to indicate to the buyer or the seller, as the case may be, whether he wishes the goods shipped by freight, express, water, or rail, and whether they should be shipped via Canadian National or Canadian Pacific, to suit his convenience. I suggest that this principle should obtain in all agreements made by the Department of Trade and Commerce. There is no reason why a clause could not be written into such agreements to ensure that we shall enjoy the business that can be derived from the shipment of goods through Canadian ports. I have particularly in mind the situation that arose last year, and that is why I was going to ask the minister some questions in that regard. I am thinking of the statement made by the food minister in the British House of Commons last year, that, owing to the fact that the St. Lawrence had frozen, the British government were unable to ship through eastern Canadian ports in the winter months and were obliged to ship through Canadian Pacific coast ports and United States railways and ports. I think the minister should safeguard our interests so that in future we shall not be faced with a foolish situation such as arose at that time. Perhaps he will be good enough to indicate whether such a clause as I suggest could be written into all agreements.

Mr. GILLIS: I wish to get some information, and at the same time to support the senior member for Halifax in what he has said in regard to the Department of Trade and Commerce regulating shipments of goods and materials they may be sending from Canada to foreign markets. I suggest that as far as possible there should be a balance in goods shipped as between port and port in Canada. The member for Halifax has a legitimate grievance as to the way in which that port has been used since the end of the war. During the war it was a very important port,—

Mr. ISNOR: And still is.

Mr. GILLIS: —which was cluttered up with ships from all parts of the world, and the city took a terrific beating in its efforts to accommodate war personnel and provide refuge, rations and so forth for ships from various ports. In other words, in time of war it was a handy port; since then it has been completely forgotten. Not so long ago I was in that city and I saw people cutting grass off the plot in front of the little railroad in connection with one of the piers.

Mr. HOWE: Wherever you have a railroad hauling wheat you will find something growing beside it.

Mr. GILLIS: I am talking about the way the port has been neglected, and I think the increase in freight rates has aggravated that condition.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. GILLIS: I am discussing foreign trade, which is the item before us.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I could shorten the discussion by saying that increases in freight rates do not apply to the export of wheat.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not talking about wheat at all. I am not mentioning wheat. I am referring to imports which normally would be unloaded at Halifax and shipped by rail. Ships that were partly unloaded when the new rates went into effect were taken to United States ports and came up the lakes or went to Montreal, and the result was that the eastern end of the Canadian National lost money. In my opinion it will continue to lose money as a result of that increased rate.

Mr. DICKEY: Can the hon. member give the details of any particular instance? I should be interested to hear them.

Mr. GILLIS: I have already done that in the house by questioning the minister on the strength of telegrams received from Halifax during this session. The minister already has the details of at least two ships that were affected in that way. I have not the information at my fingertips; it is in my room.

Mr. ISNOR: My colleague went fully into that.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not know anything about what the hon. gentlemen's colleague has done. If he knows the answers, he should not be asking me questions.

Mr. DICKEY: Read Hansard and you will see the answers.

Mr. GILLIS: I have already had the answers from the minister, and am not satisfied with the deal which the port of Halifax is getting.

Mr. ISNOR: We are glad of your support.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not think the senior member for Halifax is satisfied either, but I am doubtful about the junior member for that city. I am merely adding whatever weight I can to the representations of the senior member for Halifax. There is rank discrimination against that port. However, what I did get up to say was this. The department keeps elaborate statistics and turns out good information on our imports and exports. Are there any statistics in the Department of Trade and Commerce with regard to our internal trade as between province and province?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. GILLIS: Perhaps there is a reason why such statistics are not kept, but I am seriously suggesting that they should be. If it is necessary for a person to ship goods from the maritimes to Vancouver, he is in the same position as if he were competing in world markets; or he may even be in a worse position. A large volume of trade flows between province and province. Different conditions exist as between province and province, and there are differences in the cost of production. The cost of marketing in the central provinces goods produced in the others is so great that it is time the government began to keep statistics with a view to achieving some kind of trade balance between one end of the country and the other.

What I see growing up in Canada is not the united nation we talk about. Greater division is setting in all the time, arising out of economic inequalities. If we are to build Canada into a nation, we must at least begin to recognize the right of every section of the country to an equal share in what we are producing, and, as nearly as possible, to equality in income. If we do not recognize that right, before very long British Columbia and the prairie provinces will be trying to go off in one direction in order to look after themselves and the maritimes will be forced to do likewise. It has been made clear that there is no thinking in this country east of Montreal.

Mr. FULTON: And none west of Fort William.

Mr. GILLIS: And none west of Fort William, as the hon. member says. I am sure of what I am saying about east of Montreal. No matter what comes up, it ends at Montreal. The rest of the country to the east is just held there for taxation purposes and as a base from which to operate in case of war—or that is what it looks like to me. I am not blaming the present minister. I have often felt sorry for him, because he has been chucked into every difficult problem the government has had to handle. But his shoulders are broad and I believe he is fair. If he were permitted to do as he would like to do, the situation might be different. I am asking him if it is possible, starting from now, to keep statistics as to the flow of trade between province and province. If we were getting a little booklet monthly on this subject, as we are on foreign trade, it would be a great education to hon. members and to the public generally to see just how unequal that balance of trade is as between province and province. I sometimes think we are whistling in the dark in order to keep up our courage when we talk about the united nations, government at the world level, and freedom of trade between country and country, when right here in Canada we do not have that and are not trying to get it. A good start would be the compilation of such statistics as I have mentioned.

Mr. HOWE: To answer the question asked by the senior member for Halifax, may I say that the Department of Trade and Commerce has an active transportation commissioner whose duty it is to see that trade is directed through Canadian ports to the greatest possible extent. The department is neither the buyer nor the seller. In ordinary commerce the buyer dictates the route by which goods will travel to market. If the traffic statistics of the port of Halifax in pre-war days are compared with those of today, I think the hon. member will find that great strides have been made in the movement of Canadian products to that port.

To reply to the hon. member for Cape Breton South, I can think of no good purpose that would be served by considering the movement of trade over provincial boundaries. Trade is a national affair, and every effort should be made by all governments to see that no interprovincial boundaries are set up. On occasions in the past, artificial restrictions have been attempted with regard to trade crossing a provincial boundary. They have always been resisted by the federal government, and I think that is the proper course. I believe we must regard trade in Canada as national in character rather than provincial.

Mr. GILLIS: I did not suggest any tariff arrangement between province and province. I merely suggested the compilation of statistics so that we could get a look at the flow of trade between province and province—for example, on a dollar basis, the amount of goods shipped from the maritimes to Ontario and Quebec. What is coming out of those provinces?

Mr. HOWE: Coal and steel.

Mr. GILLIS: On a dollar basis we get back perhaps ten cents for every dollar they take in.

Mr. HOWE: No. You are exporting from the maritime provinces far more than you import.

Mr. GILLIS: We do?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: Oh, no.

Mr. HOWE: Certainly you do.

Mr. GILLIS: What we export is our people and raw material. It is processed up here, and then we buy it back. We export one third of Canada's basic steel, but it is processed in Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. HOWE: Oh, no.

Mr. GILLIS: Then we buy it back.

Mr. HOWE: Three-quarters of it is processed in the maritime provinces.

Mr. GILLIS: Where?

Mr. HOWE: At Sydney and New Glasgow.

Mr. GILLIS: There is no processing at Sydney at all. Sydney is just a raw material plant.

Mr. DICKEY: Before we leave the item relating to foreign trade, I should like to say a word with respect to trade through the port of Halifax. The minister is correct when he states that the volume of business through that port at present compares favourably with the pre-war volume of business.

Mr. GILLIS: So you are back to 1939.

Mr. DICKEY: No; we are well above 1939. But what we want to avoid is a return to the days of 1939 and those preceding. What we are interested in is to try to have as much of the maritime business as possible put through the port of Halifax. I trust that the officials to whom the minister has referred will do everything they possibly can to keep the Canadian export and import trade moving through Canadian Atlantic ports. After all, parity of rates is maintained, and exporters and importers should be urged to use Canadian channels.

My question to the hon. member for Cape Breton was prompted by the fact that he appeared to refer to the effect of the freight rate increase in diverting trade from the port of Halifax. Two instances were suggested right after the increase came into effect, in which it was alleged that these increases in rates had diverted trade from Halifax. Those cases were immediately investigated and were discussed by me and other members in this house. From the remarks made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South I presumed he had heard of other instances which have not been brought to my attention. From his answer to my question I realize that he was simply discussing the two cases that had been thoroughly investigated and found not to have any basis. I do not think the port of Halifax or any other port can be assisted by trying to make cases that do not exist.

Mr. GILLIS: The answer given by the minister in the house did not suggest there was no basis for the complaint from Halifax. Actually two ships were in process of unloading. They battened down their hatches and left; and the longshoremen's union, who were working on the job, made the complaint that, in effect, it was the result of the freight increase. I have seen editorials in Halifax papers supporting that argument. I am not a fortune-teller. But actually, two ships did pull out for the reasons I have suggested, and these are supported by the men who worked on the job. At the time, the minister said it was not because of the freight rate increase. Hon. members may accept that statement if they wish. I am still doubtful. I do not doubt the minister's word, but I would think there was a real reason for the ships leaving Halifax harbour at that time.

Mr. CHURCH: This item refers to commercial relations and foreign tariffs division, including a contribution of $2,800 to the international customs tariffs bureau. There has been a complete change in the set-up of the department. This is a practically new division. If we turn to page 251 of the estimates we find the details for this item. This new division deals with tariffs and exports, and in my view it upsets the whole policy of the department as it has operated since confederation. As to the reference in the item to the international customs tariffs bureau, I say that is where our trouble started—over at Geneva, with these foreign bureaux. Trade in grain and cattle used to flow east and west to the overseas market of the world. Now, however, because of these Geneva pacts, a great change in exports and imports has been made, and this new division has been created. We are upsetting the whole trade and commerce of this country as it has operated since confederation, and this change has come from Geneva. Trade and commerce is the lifeblood of this country. Under former ministers and the present one we have become the fifth trading nation of the world. The department has done excellent work, but our trade commissioners throughout the world have been duplicated most unnecessarily by those from other departments.

The businessmen and working class depend upon trade for their work. I do not believe in the department's new policy of going all over the world and arranging new divisions. I say that all this trouble started in the international customs union. I believe our trade agents throughout the world have done good work. One has only to visit the international trade fair to realize the truth of that statement. I hope those who did not see the fair the Saturday before last will see it tomorrow, because that is the last day. The trade fair is housed in the coliseum which was built by the city. The government has helped to the extent of only $100,000 for a trade and commerce building at the exhibition grounds. The city of Toronto has spent nearly $30,000,000, of its own volition for ground buildings and permanent exhibits; it received only a small grant.

Mr. TIMMINS: Following what has been said by the hon. member for Broadview, hon. members must have been chagrined to read in the press last night that there had been some criticism of the international trade fair by some of the exhibitors from Great Britain. I believe hon. members who attended were more than pleased and gratified with the exhibits and the progress the various exhibitors told us they were making. I am not for one moment attempting to foment criticism, but I would ask the minister to see that investigation be made or some attention given to the complaints, and an answer made to those who, in a way, have tried to pour cold water on the benefits which, as I believe all hon. members will agree, have resulted from the international trade fair.

Some time ago we were told in the press that the fair would be held again next year. I should like to hear some cheering words from the minister about the fair held this year, and I suggest that the rumours that the fair has not been a success should be quashed.

The publication "Foreign Trade," put out early last year by the Department of Trade and Commerce, has been well received by industry and commerce in Canada. In my own constituency of Parkdale I have sent out a great number of issues of this publication. I know that one person, who was engaged in the forwarding and shipping business, sending goods to all parts of Canada and to Great Britain, found the publication of such great interest that he immediately communicated with all the trade commissioners appointed by Canada, and by so doing has made a direct contact for business to flow to those various countries.

A few moments ago the minister said that he had an active transportation commissioner here in Canada, but he also pointed out that the buyer is the one who dictates the route by which goods are shipped. I am satisfied from my own experience in business that industry in Canada does not know the routes, and does not know the way it should be shipping goods. I am pleased to know that the publication to which I refer has had the effect of informing the public to some extent as to how they should go about it. If I might offer a suggestion, I would say the department should find ways and means of placing in the publication further information respecting transport.

Most of the people engaged in industry are looking for new markets abroad. As some of our markets in some of the sterling area countries seem to be drying up, our trade commissioners, who have done a good job, should make their positions just that much more active. We live by trade in Canada; it is the backbone of our country, and we must back up this particular branch of our Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. HOWE: Referring to the trade fair, let me say that there are about 1,500 exhibitors, representing most of the nations of the world. Of that number, many are doing good business, while others are not. That is bound to be so. I have talked to a good many exhibitors and, by and large, they are happy about the fair and intend to return next year. But there are those whose goods are priced out of line and they are not able to sell them. I understand that that is true of a few English firms.

The real test of the fair will come next year when we see how many exhibitors of this year will pay the fees for the privilege of exhibiting next year. All the information we have now is that the fair next year will be even more successful.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is it intended that the fair shall be an annual event?

Mr. HOWE: We are going to hold the trade fair next year, anyway.

Mr. CASE: I think we all appreciate the significance of the trade fair. I want to thank the minister for his invitation to attend the opening ceremonies and view the exhibits. It was a unique opportunity to see the products of various countries. I believe that much good will come from it, inasmuch as those who are exhibiting will have an opportunity to become better acquainted with the products and the producers of other countries.

With the hon. member for Parkdale, I think that this is one department of government with which we should all be most vitally concerned. Canada is a tremendous producing country. Probably we would have a better appreciation of our productive capacity if we looked back at the production during the war. If we are to survive we must cultivate the old markets and seek new and greater ones. I am glad to see the interest that is being taken in maintaining and possibly improving our present position. We produce far more than we can consume, and we must have an outlet for our surplus products.

There is a matter I want to discuss which is related to this item but which runs through all the various items of this department and of others. Perhaps the minister can give an explanation which will serve to answer for all. I am referring to the items for temporary assistance. In this item there is an amount of $49,551 for temporary assistance, while the total for all the items for the department is upwards of $1,500,000. What I am anxious to find out is how these people are employed and what qualifications they must have. Are they under the civil service? How are their appointments made? What is the average period of their employment? Are they seasonal employees? Why is this item of temporary assistance in every estimate?

Mr. HOWE: At the moment the department has a total of 3,447 employees, of whom 449 of the staff in Ottawa and 760 of the staff outside of Ottawa are permanent. The temporary staff in Ottawa amounts to 1,413, of which 1,091 are in the bureau of statistics. My hon. friend will appreciate that the work of the bureau fluctuates. When the bureau is taking a census there is a big expansion, and in between times the requirements are for fewer employees. Aside from that I do not think the proportions are out of line with those of the other departments.

I could not say how long some of these temporaries have been employed. My hon. friend will appreciate the fact that during the war the Department of Munitions and Supply and the Department of Reconstruction and Supply were temporary departments and all the employees were temporary. The practice of this department is not any different from that of the other departments in the division between permanent and temporary employees.

Mr. CASE: I do not suggest that the temporaries in the minister's department are out of line with those in other departments. Are these temporaries full-time employees?

Mr. HOWE: They are full-time employees appointed by the civil service commission, in the same way as other employees, but they have not obtained permanent status.

Mr. JACKMAN: Can the minister tell us more about the system? Does the civil service commission or the department recommend the appointments? In this case the salaries of the permanent employees total approximately $39,000, while those of the temporary assistants total $49,551. Apparently there are not many persons involved, because I imagine that those with permanent status would be relatively few. I take it their salaries would be the higher of the two classifications. There must be a large number of persons in the $49,000 group. Do they have to be with the department a year? What is the system? This all seems rather odd; one would not find it in any other type of business with which the minister is familiar outside of government administration. I should think the temporary nature of the employment must have some effect on the morale of the workers, particularly if they are kept on year after year on a temporary basis. If their morale is affected, that in turn affects the work and efficiency of the department.

Mr. HOWE: When any person enters the public service he does so as a temporary, and there is a minimum requirement of one year's service before he can be made permanent. Usually more time than that is allowed to elapse before he is made permanent. The example to which the hon. member has referred is a new branch. In the import division there are 45 employees, of whom seven have been made permanent and 38 are temporary. As the branch grows older, more permanent positions will be established and more temporaries will be moved into those positions.

Mr. JACKMAN: I believe it is the foreign trade services vote we are dealing with at the moment. There is nothing out of line there in the ratio of permanent and temporary employees; in fact it is rather in favour of permanent employees in comparison with other items having to do with the Department of Trade and Commerce. I want to find out if there is any hard and fast system which might keep only ten per cent of employees on a temporary basis, as is done in the post office, or do the employees know where they stand when they seek a position with the department? Surely there is some system.

Mr. HOWE: It is the system that applies to the whole public service. A man enters as a temporary, and after a certain time when positions are set up—

Mr. JACKMAN: How long?

Mr. HOWE: The system is pretty well operated by the civil service commission. As a matter of fact when a man enters the employ of the department he is under the direction of the civil service commission. At a certain time his status is changed from temporary to permanent.

Mr. JACKMAN: If it is a certain time, it is not an uncertain time; what is the time?

Mr. HOWE: A minimum of one year.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is most uncertain. The minister appreciates the significance of my question?

Mr. HOWE: He certainly would have to wait a year, anyway.

Mr. JACKMAN: Can the minister say how many of the temporary employees included in the $49,000 item have been there less than one year, and how many have been there three years? Can he give me some indication of the length of time they have been serving in the department?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is discussing the commercial relations and foreign tariffs division, vote 441?

Mr. JACKMAN: The vote we are on now. It is a small item.

Mr. HOWE: I was looking at the import division when I gave the other figure. There are 28 employees in the commercial relations branch, of whom 12 are permanent and 16 are temporary. I think my hon. friend will find that the salaries are in about the same proportion.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. JACKMAN: I am surprised to know that, because one would think that the permanent employees would be the senior men and would get substantially more than the temporaries. Surely positions commanding salaries, for instance, of $4,800 and $3,400. should be entitled to permanent status after a reasonable length of time during which it can be determined whether their services are satisfactory and they can pass the required examination. I again ask the minister if he knows how long these sixteen temporary assistants have served, how many have served one year, how many have served two or three years, and so on.

Mr. HOWE: Four or five have been taken on in the last few months. I would have to get the individual records of each person to give my hon. friend the information he wants.

Mr. JACKMAN: There is a minimum requirement of one year's service as a temporary before an employee can be made permanent, and the only certainty in the department seems to be the uncertainty as to how long a person must work as a temporary before he is made permanent. This item comes up time after time in the estimates, and I think we should know exactly what the situation is. Surely after one year's service a man would have demonstrated whether he was efficient enough for permanent status.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, I feel I should rise now in view of some remarks made about the Canadian international trade fair in Toronto, lest an erroneous impression be sent out across the country as to the success of the fair. I had intended to speak about it on another item, but in view of remarks that have been made I should like to say, as a business man with many years of experience in manufacturing and in big business, that the fair is a pronounced success. I read an item in the papers about the non-success of the fair, but that item was erroneous. I had the opportunity of discussing the fair with many exhibitors, and all with whom I spoke were enthusiastic about it. A booklet has been published about the fair, and eighty-four pages are required to list all the exhibitors. There are in addition two hundred pages of exhibits. In my judgment it is the finest fair of its kind I have ever attended. It is of course the first international trade fair we have had in Canada. It is not in the same category at all with our national exhibition at Toronto, but is strictly a business fair for manufacturers and others. This is evidenced by the fact that for the first week of the fair the general public were not specially invited. The first week was for the buyers.

As a business man I am proud to say—not from reading about it, but from practical operation of big business—that the fair is a wonderful success. I talked to several big exhibitors, of whom there are quite a number, and I found them all enthusiastic over the success of the fair. One man told me that his company had taken orders for $254,000 worth of their materials, and in lines which for the past few years they had not been able to sell in quantities in the old country. He was just as enthusiastic as he could be, and said that he was not only coming back next year but would bring with him many other exhibitors.

I talked with another exhibitor who had sold £5,500—about $25,000 worth—of the goods they make. He too was enthusiastic about the success of the fair. Nearly all the business men there with whom I talked agreed that it was an outstanding demonstration of what industry can do. The minister said there were 1,500 exhibitors. I did not count them, but I have pointed out that the list of exhibitors covered eighty-four pages in the booklet I mentioned a moment ago. The exhibits ranged all the way from locomotives right down to toys, and there were some wonderful toys there, and manufactured goods of every description.

I was interested in the report of the fair sent out by the Canadian Press, and I think it is worth while to put on Hansard a word or two from that report. Their representative had talked with the exhibitors, men who know how to make things and sell them, how to look for business and how to get it. The Canadian Press report says:

> Doctor Kien Shaw expressed the hope that the Canadian International Trade Fair might come to be known as the "Fair Trade".

That is a very good name for it. It goes on to say:

> Doctor Shaw is head of the twenty Chinese exhibitors at the current world meeting in Toronto—

I looked over the Chinese exhibits, which were very interesting.

> —and his words seemed to sum up the eagerness of peoples to work together despite world alarms.

The report goes on to compare the troubled conditions in various countries with the peacefulness found in Canada. I am satisfied that the fair will result in bringing many businesses to Canada.

I was sorry to read the unfavourable report which was mentioned earlier, and I thought it only fair to say from my own experience—and from my own experience I ought to be a judge in matters of this kind—that the fair is a pronounced success, and the fact that many of the exhibitors have already expressed their intention of coming back next year and bringing others with them indicates that to them also the fair has been a great success. It is a great fair, Mr. Chairman, and I hope to see you there tomorrow.

Mr. JACKMAN: The minister did not enlighten us on the question I put. If he is sometimes disgusted with the operations of parliament he should remember that members may be disgusted when they cannot get the information they seek. We still do not know what the system is as to making temporaries permanent. All the minister has told us is that there is a list of temporary employees, and in this particular branch, in relation to the small number of employees which I took as an example, he said that five or six came in during the year. I know nothing about the others, whether three or four of them have served for two or for three years, or what not. If the minister would be co-operative I am sure he would find that the committee would be co-operative with him.

Mr. HOWE: It is hardly the job of the minister to move civil servants around. That is the job of the civil service commission and the personnel officer of the department. My hon. friend picks out a group of fifteen people and asks why they are not made permanent. Perhaps they do not want to become permanent. A great many girls in the civil service are not the slightest bit interested in permanency or in a pension. I can tell my hon. friend that because I know of cases that prove my point. A case came up the other day of a man who had been fifty-one years in one branch, and was still a temporary, because he prefered to be a temporary. I do not know how I can explain the inner thoughts of a group of civil servants whom I do not know personally. My hon. friend has been here a long time, and no doubt has been in contact with the civil service commission. It is not a matter of some general rule. If it were, I could explain the rule to him. It is a matter of the individual's wishes, and not knowing the individuals, I cannot give my hon. friend the information he wants.

Mr. JACKMAN: The average salary is $3,000, and not many of these would be in the classification the minister mentioned. If it is the wish of the employee himself that he be not put on a permanent basis, very well; we have got something. If there is a limit of one year's temporary service, has the department recommended the permanent appointment of every employee in this little section who has been there one year and who has fully proved himself? Does the commission wait for the recommendation of the head of the department? If the head of the department has not recommended for permanency an efficient civil servant who has been there for one year, why has he not done so?

Mr. HOWE: If we are satisfied that the employee intends to make a career of the public service, usually he is made permanent. If we are not satisfied that he intends to make a permanent job of it, or if we are not satisfied that he can fill his particular niche to the satisfaction of the department in the long run, he is not made permanent. That is about the size of it.

Mr. COCKERAM: There is another item which recurs all through these estimates, namely, sundries, to which I referred yesterday. In this department it amounts to about $160,000, or 1·25 per cent of the total estimates of the department. It seems to me that these are excessive expenses which cannot be specified at the time the estimates are made up. I am beginning to think that instead of having a sundry item for each division or branch of the department, there should be a sundry item for the department itself. This sundry item for the whole department should be under the control of the minister or the deputy minister. Here we have one and a quarter per cent of all the estimates of this department indicated as sundries. I think it should be under one heading.

Mr. HOWE: I think the officers of the department would be all for what my hon. friend suggests, the big blanket item, but I do not think it would be as good for the treasury as it is to have the sundry items limited to small amounts in each particular branch.

Mr. COCKERAM: It is the small amounts that make the big amount in the end.

Mr. ADAMSON: I want to say a word about the trade fair. I think the minister will find that the people who were not able to sell goods at the trade fair were from countries whose currencies were overpriced in terms of world currency. I think that is the main reason.

The very great success of the trade fair was in no small measure due to the officials who staffed it. I should like to pay tribute to Colonel Orme Barrett and the officials who worked under him so effectively for the success of this fair and of the accompanying "world trade week."

[Mr. Jackman.]

Mr. HOWE: Since the subject has been brought up I should like to say that we have a splendid group of officials in charge of the fair. Mr. Bannerman, and his assistant, Mr. Dayton, took the fair in hand with very little to work on. The success of the arrangements and the success of the fair in general are both due to the zeal and imagination that they have put into the project.

Item agreed to.

442. Export division, $197,564.

Mr. FRASER: I noticed in the press the day before yesterday that 3,000 pounds of flour had been seized on an Italian ship in Montreal harbour. Was it seized because these people were unable to get an export permit? The Royal Canadian Mounted Police stepped in, seized the flour and demanded $400 as a penalty or a fine, and said there would be further charges. Is it difficult to get a permit to ship flour out of Canada?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, it is very difficult to get a permit. Flour and wheat are under strict international allocation. Anyone who could buy flour in the domestic market and export it might reap a handsome reward, perhaps double his money, and, in doing so, deprive the farmer of participation in the export price, or rather the world price of the product. I do not know the circumstances of this particular shipment, but I would judge that it was wheat bought in the domestic market and sent into export channels without a permit.

Mr. FRASER: The article said that the flour was bought in local stores in Montreal; therefore they evidently knew that they could not get a permit. I wanted to find out if the department had strict control over that.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Item 442 and the items following it amount to an expenditure of almost $3,000,000. The items are divided into export division, import division, industrial development division, trade commissioner service, and so on. I want to ask the minister first the general question as to how this whole thing is organized. I have in mind the debate which took place on the passing of the export-import bill a year ago. I formed a great respect for some of the officials who were dealing with that. I want to know just how this shapes up in the minister's mind. We passed the export-import bill a year ago, the duration of which was roughly a year. It was extended this year. I should like to have the minister give us first information as to the likely duration of this. I am not asking him to predict how many months or years it will last; I am asking him to give us a picture of the kind of trading world we are in at the moment, and in particular the relation between this export and import branch and our trade commissioners all over the world. Are the export and import branches purely controlling branches? Are they merely prohibiting this or that, or are they actually entering into and controlling business?

I want to give the minister an illustration of what happened before the committee. He will know of the kind of thing I have in mind. A year ago we had this illustration which interested me very much. It was pointed out there had to be certain export controls on steel. It was also pointed out that the department was exercising a discretion as to the kind of business which would be allowed an export licence—that is to say, businesses which they thought would be more likely to continue after the reconstruction period were given export licences. On the other hand, those that they thought had less expectation of going on were denied export licences. I mention this only as an illustration of the fact that these controls seem to be entering very largely into the whole course of business.

I recognize the fact that we are living in a world where controls are in the atmosphere. To sum up, I ask the minister to give us in this connection, as I asked last night, a comprehensive picture of the import and export situation. Will he illustrate by saying that certain commodities are restricted, and tell us just how it enters into the whole fabric of the business community? What is the course at the present time? Are things tightening up? Is there less freedom or more? Finally, will the minister state as specifically as he can the relationship between these three organizations, if they are three organizations, namely, import, export and trade commissioners? I take it these are the people who are seeking business all over the world for our exporters.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is going outside the foreign trade services. He is talking about the import permit division.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I thought we were on item 442.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, but it does not include the licensing division. If the hon. member will look at item 462 he will see that that section deals with the export permit branch. These are all promotional branches. Item 441 is concerned with furnishing information on tariffs; item 442 promotes exports from within Canada, and item 443 promotes imports into Canada—that is through men working in Canada to promote imports. Item 444 has to do with the industrial development division.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: We have not come to that yet.

Mr. HOWE: No. Item 445 has to do with trade commissioner service, trade commissioners located in different countries. Item 446 has to do with trade publicity and advertising in Canada and abroad. We can discuss the licensing division on item 440 when we return to it.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I accept the minister's correction. I did not observe item 462, but I now ask the minister this question. As I understand it, item 442, the export division, has to do with a group of people working in Canada to promote export trade.

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I can understand trade commissioners working abroad to promote export trade. I think I understand the nature of their functions. I do not think I understand fully the functions of those covered by 442. Perhaps the minister will explain.

Mr. HOWE: The trade commissioner reports on the requirements for a certain commodity in South Africa, let us say, or Australia, or some other country. That comes to the department and it is sent to the branch we are now discussing. That branch gets in touch with appropriate manufacturers and says, "We have a market for this commodity; can you supply it?" Information goes back to the trade commissioner that it can be supplied by a certain firm or firms. The branch is simply a link between the trade commissioner and those desiring to export from this country.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Would that be small firms who do not themselves maintain a selling staff abroad?

Mr. HOWE: Even firms who do maintain staffs abroad are glad to get the help of the trade commissioner service. It is available to every firm in Canada. It is the business of this branch to know Canadian industry and to know what parts of Canadian industry would be interested in inquiries abroad for certain items.

Mr. TIMMINS: Who heads this particular division?

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Bull.

Mr. STEPHENSON: There are certain products for which we are finding it difficult to get a market. May I discuss the export of apples and tobacco under this item?

Mr. HOWE: I suppose so.

Mr. STEPHENSON: We can now produce more tobacco in Canada than we can use domestically, and therefore there is an exportable surplus. The English market is pretty well shut off at present, by reason of their austerity program, I presume. I understand an effort has been made to find other markets, but I would like to know whether England might be in a position to import some of our surplus tobacco this year. The minister was good enough to meet a delegation and discuss the matter with them, but I do not know whether any further information is available. Has England indicated whether she will import Canadian tobacco this year, or are other markets available for our surplus?

Mr. HOWE: I do not think there is anything to add to what the tobacco industry has been told. We are working on the problem, but there is no indication as yet that we shall be able to sell Canadian tobacco to England. However, the door is not closed, and we hope that sales will be possible.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Has the department made inquiries to find out whether other countries might be interested in our surplus Canadian tobacco?

Mr. HOWE: Every trade commissioner has been advised that Canada is likely to have a surplus of tobacco for export, and all trade commissioners are working on it.

Mr. STEPHENSON: A special effort should be made along this line, because there is a great deal of submarginal land that could be used for growing tobacco. This would bring under cultivation many areas that have not been able to produce a great deal in the past. It would be to the advantage of various counties in this province and other parts of Canada as well where tobacco can be grown. I urge that every effort be made to find a market for our surplus tobacco.

I would also like to ask what the situation is as regards apples. I understand there is a surplus in Canada. Is there a possibility of finding a market for it?

Mr. HOWE: We are aware of the importance of tobacco and are making an effort to sell it. We have sold every tobacco crop so far, and we hope to sell this crop. As far as apples are concerned, we are taking care of the situation in every part of the land. The 1947 crop in British Columbia has been wholly sold.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. SINCLAIR: Wholly sold?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: British Columbia?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There are 600,000 boxes still in Yale.

Mr. HOWE: I have definite information that the crop is sold.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Perhaps the minister could check that up.

Mr. HOWE: I am giving the information.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I was asking if the minister would check it up.

Mr. HOWE: I have the information and I am giving it. The crops in other parts of the country have been taken care of, with the help of the government. We are doing all we can about the apple crop. The British market is closed to Canadian apples. The domestic crop in Britain is considerable and the United Kingdom government does not permit importation of apples. The United States tariffs have been lowered, and every effort will be made to sell apples in that country. A good proportion of the British Columbia crop was sold in Brazil under a barter arrangement for oranges, which was worked out with the help of the department. We are exploring every possibility of exchanging apples either for dollars or for some other saleable commodity.

Mr. STEPHENSON: As for apples being sold, I think it might be well for the department to ascertain whether they have been sold, because in my part of the county they have been finding it difficult to get a market. They had to peddle them around in the various cities to get rid of them, putting them up in special packages. There were apples in my county for which a market could not be found.

Mr. MENARY: A good many fowl are exported from my district to the United States. I had occasion last week to get a permit for one of our shippers and he was held off for a week. There were 10,000 birds in stock that had to be fed. I presume this comes under the export permit branch.

Mr. HOWE: It is really under 442. We have not yet come to that. However, the department issues export permits for fowl, with the advice of the Department of Agriculture. This department exercises no discretion in the matter. We simply take the advice of the Department of Agriculture. The export of live fowl is under permit, and we regulate exports in consultation with the United States Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MENARY: Just now they are cutting down on the granting of permits, so they say. This firm could not get one for about ten days. This small firm say that they are giving them to large packers. Is that right?

Mr. HOWE: I do not know.

Mr. MENARY: If you give them to large packers you should give them to the small ones too, because you should treat all the people in the same way in the export of these birds.

Mr. HOWE: I can assure my hon. friend that if we are giving export permits, the small man gets them first.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I wish to bring to the attention of the minister a matter that I pointed out to the Minister of Agriculture some time ago. I refer to the shipping of gift apples to Britain. Before the war we sent large quantities of apples as gifts from British Columbia. The apples were exported for delivery to the persons designated. They were sent to Great Britain in bulk or carload lots, and then delivered by carrier to the person designated. The British ministry of food will not accept them unless they are consigned to the ministry direct, and they are allowed to designate where those apples shall go. The fruit organizations in British Columbia are confident that they could ship this year in the neighbourhood of half a million boxes of apples to Great Britain as gift apples, a direct contribution of the Canadian people, by putting on a campaign in co-operation with the Canadian Legion, women's organizations and farmers' organizations. But they cannot organize a campaign because of the present restrictions imposed by the British ministry of food. I ask the minister if something cannot be done to discuss this matter with the British ministry of food so that this half million boxes of apples can go forward. It is a matter of particular concern to some of the fruit growers in my constituency who for years have been growing two particular varieties of apples for the English market. I refer to Cox's Orange and Jonathan. Owing to the loss of the British preference, unless something is done in this respect the Cox's Orange growers will simply not have any income this year.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend will understand that the Canadian government is doing nothing to interfere with the sending of gift boxes of apples to England. This government has discussed the subject with the British ministry of food, who have explained the problems surrounding the situation and have not acceded to the Canadian request for consideration. I think there is a good deal of reason behind their refusal to do so. Therefore I can offer little hope that the British ministry will change its position.

Mr. JACKMAN: In connection with trade commissioner service there is an item here of $366,000 for permanent help. I want to relate that to an item lower down, living allowances, $476,000; and to another one further down, cost of living bonus abroad, $56,000. These items look disproportionate, but there may be sound reasons behind them. In fact I have known cases in which foreign trade representatives have been underpaid in relation to the job they were called upon to do. Will the minister explain how it is that a group of trained men of standing who get $366,000 require $476,000 for living allowances? Are the living allowances tax free, or are they partly to allow for inflation, which latter item I suppose is covered by the cost-of-living bonus abroad? In other words are these foreign trade officers, to whom I suppose the item largely relates, paid anything like an adequate salary, or is it necessary for them to get a cost-of-living bonus in other countries? Surely the cost of living in the various countries to which they are assigned cannot be so much higher than it is in Canada. Yet the ordinary salary does not seem to be adequate. As to cost-of-living bonuses where there may be inflation, there is a smaller item of $56,000. Would the minister explain generally why those items are disproportionate?

Mr. HOWE: The salaries of trade commissioners are based on the Canadian cost of living. The cost of living varies greatly in other countries. For instance, I am told that in Caracas a stenographer gets $400 a month, and that is consistent with the scale of living in Caracas.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What kind of money?

Mr. HOWE: United States dollars. We have prevailing today an uneven situation throughout the world with respect to the cost of living, and it is necessary to adjust the living allowances accordingly. The bonuses relate to the help that is employed abroad. That is, in Egypt bonuses are paid to Egyptians who are employed in our service. The allowances are made after careful survey by the dominion bureau of statistics as to a proper adjustment which in the specified country would give a salary-plus allowance which would be equivalent to the salary alone in Canada at the rate indicated.

Mr. JACKMAN: It seems extraordinary that the allowances would require to be nearly 150 per cent more than the salaries themselves. After all, these people are not called upon to maintain large establishments. They are business representatives. I have certain fears on one point, and I should like to be reassured. Are they paid a salary which is commensurate with the position they must maintain abroad to do the work which the department expects them to do? If the answer is in the negative, does the minister expect that in the future, as the world becomes more stabilized—as we hope it will in short order—this item will almost entirely disappear?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend will appreciate the difficulty of fixing a man's salary on the basis of the fact that he happens to be stationed for the time being at Buenos Aires. We could adjust his salary so that he could live properly in Buenos Aires, consistent with his situation in that country. But we prefer to fix his salary based on his living in Canada, and make such adjustment by way of bonus as the temporary situation warrants. I think my hon. friend will agree that is a sounder method. If we move the man to a country where the difference in the cost of living is not great, he would get a small allowance. But if he happened to be moved to a country such as the one I mentioned, namely, Caracas—which I believe is the extreme situation today—he would need a much larger living allowance. We believe the salaries are reasonable for the position, provided the cost of living is the same as in Canada.

Mr. JACKMAN: I suppose the living allowances are tax free?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: I must say this indicates that Canada deserves some credit for the fact that the cost of living in this country is so much lower than that which prevails in other areas.

Mr. HOWE: We seldom get much credit from the opposition.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, the recent discussion has been on item 445, but item 444 has not yet been called.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the point raised by the hon. member for Davenport is well taken. We have been considering item 445. Can we carry item 445?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MacNICOL: But, Mr. Chairman, you have not yet called item 444.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): We are surely still at item 442.

The CHAIRMAN: The last item called was 442. But as the hon. member for Davenport has stated, we have been considering trade commissioner service, and that is item 445.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Let us carry them all.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not opposing the carrying of item 445, because the discussion has been on that item. But after lunch we should go back to 444.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall item 442 carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. HOWE: Let us carry something.

Item 442 agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall item 443 carry?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): On item 443—

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It is one o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand the hon. member for St. Paul's has a few questions.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I had better wait until after lunch.

Mr. KNOWLES: What about item 443? Is that carried?

The CHAIRMAN: Item 442 is carried. Items 443, 444 and 445 stand.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Chairman, may I make one general observation? I understand the minister is leaving to receive an honour from his old university. I am sure we should all like to congratulate him. It is pleasant to think that he will there be in an atmosphere free from criticism—we might say where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest.

Mr. HOWE: I may say that hon. members are bidding their adieus too soon, because I expect to be with them for a couple of hours this afternoon.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

440. Departmental administration, $272,600.

Mr. TIMMINS: The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario is out of the house for about half an hour. Will the minister allow this item to stand?

Mr. HOWE: Do we have to run this house to suit the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario? This is the third time it has happened.

Mr. CASSELMAN: You have been out more often than that.

Mr. TIMMINS: I am not going to make excuses for the hon. member.

Mr. HOWE: He agreed to take it at three o'clock.

Mr. TIMMINS: He told me that unfortunately he was detained. I am asking the minister if he will extend the courtesy of delaying this item for a short time.

Mr. HOWE: All right.

Item stands.

443. Import division, including contributions as detailed in the estimates, $132,084.

Mr. TIMMINS: Who is the officer in charge of this division, and what work does it do?

Mr. HOWE: The division is in charge of Mr. Denis Harvey. The work of the import division is exactly the same as I described for the export division, except that it deals with imports instead of exports.

Mr. TIMMINS: Do the officers of that branch work in conjunction with each industry in Canada to assist in the matter of imports? I refer to commodities such as sugar.

Mr. HOWE: If any Canadian firm wishes to import anything at all it will get in touch with the import division, and that division, in turn, will get in touch with the appropriate trade commissioner.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Has any consideration been given by the minister to the provisions of schedule I, goods coming from Great Britain? I cannot see very much reason for this provision, because Great Britain needs dollars.

Mr. HOWE: I take it the hon. member is referring to schedule I of the bill.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes, the list of prohibited imports from Great Britain.

Mr. HOWE: That is administered by the Minister of Finance. I cannot answer the question.

Item agreed to.

444. Industrial development division, $27,863.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am sure that with his great knowledge of industry the minister will have an opportunity here to do one of his big jobs. The vote of course is small, and it is possible that the work has not yet got well under way. The promotion of industrial development is one activity in which the minister has had a good deal of experience, and I am sure he will do a good job. I should imagine, however, that the division would have to work differently from the manner in which it now works.

Perhaps in this connection a leaf could be taken out of the program of the Toronto industrial commission, an organization with which I am sure the minister is familiar. They have done a masterful job in promoting industry in that city. The commission was organized in 1929 by the private effort of gentlemen in Toronto who were interested in the growth of the city's industrial activities. Since that time many promoters of industry, including myself, have been greatly pleased with the work they have done.

The commission in Toronto has brought to the Toronto district 264 businesses, both large and small, now employing directly about 16,000 employees. That is a large number of men and women to be furnished employment and to be kept occupied. The sum of $45,000,000 has been invested in new capital, and these new business ventures occupy about 6,000,000 square feet of floor space.

With the small amount of money at its disposal, this division of the minister's department will not be able to do a great deal. I learned recently from an old country industrialist that no less than a thousand industries of one kind or another plan to come to America. Naturally, if it is possible to get them, we want most of those industries to come to Canada, and to open up business in the various provinces.

The Toronto industrial commission, when submitting information to an industrialist who is considering coming to Ontario, follows certain lines which I suggest might well be followed in all the provinces. They try to present to the industrialist the advantages of Toronto as a great railway centre, favourably situated so far as highways, airways, and shipping are concerned. They explain carefully the facility with which raw products can be brought to that city for fabrication. Many centres in Canada have raw products right at their doors.

The Toronto commission attempts to present the desirability of living in a city like Toronto, with its educational facilities, the beauties of the surrounding country, a ready market, and other important features. They also say that we have cheap power.

Mr. HOWE: At times you do.

Mr. MacNICOL: As the minister knows, the present condition is only temporary. No one knows that better than the minister. We have expanded our power requirements by leaps and bounds, until today I believe the provincial hydro commission is selling around three to four million horsepower of electric energy a year. That is a tremendous amount of power. There is no doubt that the province will soon overcome its temporary power shortage. Within a year or more they will be connecting their wires to another million and a half horsepower. There may be a shortage even after that—indeed, I hope industrial development is such that there will be. In the next year we should have five or six million horsepower available, and I should like to see industry grow to a point where we would require seven or eight million.

I should like to see this division make those representations to prospective industrialists. They should point out that power is available. Indeed, if the program I enunciated on April 25 for producing power in the maritime provinces is carried through, to produce power out of coal, they too will be in a position to provide cheaper power facilities for new industry.

The vote would indicate that at present the division is a small one. However, no one knows better than I do the capacity of the minister to bring industry here—and I give him credit for it. I am not one who censures him. I know his capacity, and I believe the division should be expanded so that it could bring to Canada the greater portion of the thousand industrialists who will move from the old country, France and Czechoslovakia to America.

I look forward to this country having a population of 25,000,000. I may not live to see that day, but we have incomparable resources, we have great potential power developments, and there are great advantages here. I feel sure that this branch could be expanded to do a wonderful job, just as the Toronto industrial commission has done with its limited facilities. Other cities and towns have industrial commissions, but I am not wholly familiar with them. I support the minister and urge him to expand this division.

Mr. HOWE: I thank my hon. friend. I might say that the merger of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Reconstruction and Supply will make it possible greatly to strengthen this division. The committee will be aware that the work of the department of reconstruction is to stimulate industry, create new industries and facilitate the changing of war industries into permanent industries. The men engaged in that work are still in the department of reconstruction, but we hope the merger will have taken place within the next year, after which we would hope to have a much stronger industrial development division.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I am happy to hear what the minister has just said, and I support what the hon. member for Davenport has said about this division. I think what the hon. member has said is in accordance with what we in this group have advocated for years, in fact it is part of our program. There is a need for a commission or board which would plan the development of the resources of this country from coast to coast. With a disintegrated economy we have the development, on the one hand, of things which we do not need, and a lack of development, on the other hand, of resources which would balance our economy.

I notice that this vote is only for $27,863. That would seem to indicate that the only service that could be rendered would be the diffusion of information to industrial firms. As we go into the post-war period I think an industrial commission should be set up in order that our people may have the benefits of the resources of this country. We are penalizing our people by placing restrictions on imports because of a shortage of United States dollars. We import coal from the United States to the amount of $225 million, or about one-quarter of our deficit of United States dollars. If we had a reasonable and imaginative program to develop our coal resources we could largely offset our deficit of United States dollars. In addition, as the hon. member for Davenport has pointed out, there should be a further development of our power and other resources.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Does this division have anything to do with the establishment of new industry, particularly in the west, where processing industries of many kinds could be set up?

Mr. HOWE: If anyone desired information as to the potentialities of a particular area, that would be provided by this division. The type of work mentioned by my hon. friend would be carried on by the department of reconstruction.

Item agreed to.

445. Trade commissioner service, including payment of compensation to trade commissioners for loss of furniture and effects, under regulations approved by the governor in council, $1,999,571.

Mr. IRVINE: How would a trade commissioner lose his furniture?

Mr. HOWE: Largely as a result of enemy occupation.

Mr. COCKERAM: Is this just for this year?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. COCKERAM: Will it be a recurring item?

Mr. HOWE: It may be. There is an order in council providing for compensation should a trade commissioner lose his furniture in the performance of his duties.

Mr. COCKERAM: How much of this item is to cover loss of furniture?

Mr. HOWE: About $50,000.

Mr. COCKERAM: How does that compare with last year? Where was the furniture lost last year? Where was it lost this year?

Mr. HOWE: It was covered by order in council last year, and it is covered by order in council this year. I do not remember how much it was last year, but it would be whatever the furniture that was lost was worth.

Mr. COCKERAM: It is a large item.

Mr. HOWE: $50,000.

Mr. COCKERAM: Where was the enemy action this year that would account for this loss? Surely those things should be cleaned up before now.

Mr. HOWE: This is really a clean-up fund. For instance, the trade commissioner in Hong Kong had to evacuate in a hurry and he left his goods there. It is not possible as yet to judge what the loss is. The sum of $50,000 has been put in to cover losses in Hong Kong, Japan, and other occupied countries where trade commissioners had to leave in a hurry and leave their possessions behind.

Mr. COCKERAM: Will there be more of these items coming up later, or will this one clean the thing up?

Mr. HOWE: We hope this vote will clean it up.

Mr. MURPHY: I am concerned over the fact that the item for trade and industrial promotion is only $27,863, whereas the total salaries are some $922,000.

Mr. HOWE: Is my hon. friend referring to vote 444?

Mr. MURPHY: No, 445.

Mr. HOWE: The industrial development division is a small branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce at Ottawa, while vote 445 covers the trade commissioner service all over the world.

Mr. MURPHY: I was referring to the details of vote 445, which are to be found on page 253, in particular to the fourth from the last item on the page, trade and industrial promotion, $25,000.

Mr. HOWE: That is a fund for special promotional work. For instance, if we wish to bring a trade delegation here from France, the expenses of the delegation would be paid out of that fund. Last year we had a trade delegation go from Canada to South Africa. The expenses came out of that fund. It is an item to cover unexpected development work.

Mr. MURPHY: Are these trade commissions or any of their personnel active in promoting our tourist industry in those various countries?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, all of them.

Mr. COCKERAM: Is the $476,267 for living allowances for our representatives abroad?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. COCKERAM: Is it based on a uniform per diem allowance, or do the rates vary with different countries?

Mr. HOWE: I explained that in detail this morning, but perhaps my hon. friend was out of the chamber. The personnel are paid salaries that would be adequate in Canada, and adjustments are made to suit the requirements of the countries in which they are stationed.

Mr. TIMMINS: There is an item of $54,200 for opening new offices. What new offices were opened in 1947, in what countries, and for what purposes?

Mr. HOWE: Offices are being opened in Karachi, Berne, Switzerland, and Turkey, for the purpose of promoting trade.

Mr. TIMMINS: Have we any staff in Ankara?

Mr. HOWE: We have a trade commissioner in Karachi. We have just moved Mr. Lamontagne, our former trade commissioner in Paris, to Berne, Switzerland.

Mr. TIMMINS: We have always had a substantial trade with Switzerland. Last year we exported to Switzerland $14,000,000 worth of goods, and imported $12,000,000 worth. Is there any particular reason why we should have a trade commissioner there when trade is flowing so well between the two countries?

Mr. HOWE: Switzerland has always been handled by the trade commissioner in Paris, but trade problems are becoming so complex that the department in its wisdom decided to have a trade commissioner in Switzerland.

Mr. COCKERAM: What new offices are to be opened this year?

Mr. HOWE: I have just given that.

Mr. COCKERAM: You said they were opened last year.

Mr. HOWE: Provision is being made for them for the first time now.

Item agreed to.

446. Trade publicity and advertising in Canada and abroad, $303,308.

Mr. MURPHY: Page 254 of the details shows $150,000 for advertising in Canada and abroad. Has the minister a breakdown showing the amount spent in Canada and the amount spent abroad? What is the name of the firm handling the advertising?

Mr. HOWE: I can get the breakdown in a moment or two. The advertising is handled by Walsh advertising agency.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Apparently there is a decrease from $300,000 odd to $150,000 for advertising in Canada and abroad. This would appear to indicate a change in policy. I would like to have some explanation. I am not objecting to the reduction, but why did we spend so much before if we can do with half as much now?

Mr. HOWE: The item last year was used to a considerable extent in publicizing the international trade fair. There is a separate vote for that this year. It is just a transfer from one vote to another.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It is not really a reduction at all?

Mr. HOWE: It was not represented as such.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Ordinarily when you see an amount of $150,000 set up for this year and $300,000 for last year you assume there is a reduction.

Mr. HOWE: You must not trust too much to a superficial view.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I admit that figures are often misleading, if that is what the minister is saying. What was spent for the trade fair this year?

Mr. HOWE: $250,000.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Then why is there not a reduction from $250,000 as against $150,000?

Mr. HOWE: Because we are doing some other promotional advertising.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If it involves another $100,000, we would like to know about it.

Mr. HOWE: It is believed to be a reasonable amount for promotional advertising.

Mr. FRASER: I see an item in the details of $30,000 for films. Were they made by the national film board or by a commercial company?

Mr. HOWE: All expenditures on films are made through the national film board.

Mr. FRASER: Yes, I know, but was the film actually made by the national film board or by a commercial company?

Mr. HOWE: I could not say.

Mr. FRASER: Usually the department makes a requisition.

Mr. HOWE: I am informed that the film was made by the national film board.

Item agreed to.

447. Exhibitions, including a contribution of $1,000 to the international bureau of exhibitions and, subject to regulations to be approved by the governor in council, to authorize pro rata refunds to be made to lessees of space at the Canadian international trade fair of rentals moneys received from such lessees determined to be in excess of the expenses incurred by Canada in promoting the Canadian international trade fair, such refunds to be made from the revenue received, $647,401.

Mr. COCKERAM: Is this for the expenses of the trade fair?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. TIMMINS: Does the minister expect that we shall be able to reimburse ourselves for our expenditures on the trade fair?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. This is the gross expenditure. The income from the fair I think is slightly in excess of the expenditure.

Mr. TIMMINS: Shall we need this much money?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; unfortunately in government accounts you can receive as much as you like but you still have to appropriate all you spend.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Does the minister think that we have to go on with this nonsensical method for ever?

Mr. HOWE: I have tried to change, but I had great objection from other parties in the house. That is the purpose of crown companies.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): One of the purposes.

Item agreed to.

Standards division—

449. Electricity and gas inspection services, including administration of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, $452,733.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): This is a very large expenditure. I want to understand more about it. To what extent is electricity and gas inspection services a dominion affair, and how does it relate to provincial activities in the same field?

Mr. HOWE: The dominion has the responsibility of inspecting every meter in Canada. The provincial governments rely on the dominion government for that service. It is a revenue-producing service. The charges cover the cost of the service, but it has been performed by the dominion government for many years and should properly be performed by the dominion government.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Why?

Mr. HOWE: Because if the Ontario hydro is selling electricity direct to a consumer, the consumer is entitled to have some third party say whether the current is properly measured.

Mr. COCKERAM: The minister says that this is a revenue-producing department. Can he tell us the amount of revenue the department produced last year?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; it was $555,209.75.

Mr. COCKERAM: That goes into the consolidated revenue fund?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Item agreed to.

452. Weights and measures inspection services, $515,837.

Mr. MURPHY: Can the minister tell me whether any members of his staff check the scales used in weighing sugar beets from which sugar is obtained?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, we check all scales. We check the scales used in weighing sugar beets.

Mr. MURPHY: Does the department also check the scales of the processing plants?

Mr. HOWE: We check every scale. By law every scale must have a certificate from the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Item agreed to.

Dominion bureau of statistics—

454. Statistics, including contribution of $2,474 to the Inter-American Statistical Institute, $2,548,973.

Mr. COCKERAM: May we have some explanation of this amount? How is it arrived at?

Mr. HOWE: This is the cost of running the statistics division of the department.

Mr. COCKERAM: How many employees are there in the department?

Mr. HOWE: The details are on page 259.

Mr. COCKERAM: There is an amount of $1,204,209 for temporary assistance which is two and a half times the amount for permanents.

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend will turn to page 259 he will find every expenditure of the department set out in great detail.

Mr. COCKERAM: I am asking how many temporary employees there are in the department.

Mr. HOWE: I gave that this morning.

Mr. COCKERAM: The minister did not give us that.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, I did.

Mr. COCKERAM: Of a total staff of 1,423, 295 are permanent, 1,091 are temporaries in Ottawa, and 37 are temporaries outside of Ottawa.

Mr. BOUCHER: Will the minister explain why there are so few permanents and so many temporary employees? This seems to be a common complaint. We have too many temporaries employed; in some of the departments the number is far in excess of what it is in others. The minister should give some consideration to that.

Mr. HOWE: If we could get the opposition in the house at one time we could explain this thing. We spent an hour on it before lunch. If my hon. friend would get up a little earlier he would get the whole thing. If he will read Hansard he will find the whole story there.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Does the Department of Trade and Commerce report to the bureau of statistics, as an ordinary commercial firm does, the number of employees and the amount of salary paid month by month?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): When the bureau of statistics are making up their figures, is it not possible for them to give the figure month by month, showing how many employees there are in the government of Canada, the number of permanents, and the number of temporaries?

Mr. HOWE: It is published every month.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is not published every month.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, it is.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have asked for a return year after year, and it has taken about three months to get it. I have asked for a return as to the individuals employed by the government. If it is published by the bureau, it ought to come through the next day.

Mr. HOWE: If the hon. member will examine the publication of the bureau of statistics he will find that the number of government employees is published every month.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): And the monthly salary of each of the employees as well, and the numbers who are temporary?

Mr. HOWE: No. The total salaries are published, not the individual salaries.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I mean the total salary paid out.

Mr. HOWE: It is published every month.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): By the different departments? Then from that the people of Canada ought to be able to get an idea of the amounts paid. Does the publication give the number of employees and the amount of salary that was paid to them, say last month?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): And the number of permanent and temporary employees?

Mr. HOWE: It does not give that.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Could that information be given?

Mr. HOWE: I am told that the number of temporaries and permanents is also published.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In what document is it published?

Mr. HOWE: In the civil service statistics.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister has stated that very confidently, but I find it difficult to believe that he is right. First of all, let me say I have great respect for the bureau of statistics and for Mr. Marshall in particular. I have found him most helpful and co-operative. I found to my great surprise that I could not get from him a complete list of the government employees, and he was frank in saying that he could not give it to me. I thought it was a most astonishing thing, and the only explanation I could glean from my conversation with him was that there are a lot of departments that hold out information of their own, and there is no full and readily available statement. I spent a good deal of time trying to find that out. I hope the minister will not regard this as just something that I am bringing up in an offhand way, because it is not.

Mr. HOWE: I shall be very glad to send for the publication, mark it, and send it across to my hon. friend. The reason the question cannot be answered easily is that hon. members ask questions which never coincide with what is actually published. I am told that we publish the numbers of all people regularly employed in the civil service, but not in crown companies or in various branches. We state how many employees are permanent and how many are temporary. We state the total salaries paid during the month. That is published each month. I shall be glad to get the publication and send it to my hon. friends. The questions asked in the house are not as simple as that. Hon. members ask for other data which require compilation.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If this was merely the result of questions I put down on paper, I would not have the same objection; but what I am talking about is the result of several conversations with Mr. Marshall. The result was we got to the point where he told me the figures were not available. I was not able to get any figures that I could use at the time I wanted them. I am not criticizing Mr. Marshall—quite the contrary.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister said that the questions which are asked are not asked in the way in which the figures are kept. The point is that the information which the member asks for is no good to him three months after the question is asked. I asked a question as to the number of employees on such and such a date, say December 31 of last year. The reply I received gave the number to December 15 last year, or whatever date suited them, and did not give the general picture. Like the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, I have tried time and time again to find out how many employees there are in the government of Canada, how many in the C.B.C., and so on, but I never could find out. I should be glad to have the publication sent to me, too.

Mr. DROPE: I am not so much concerned with the question whether the employees are permanent or temporary as I am with the possibility of getting the number reduced so that there can be some relief for the taxpayers.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Are there any statistics in regard to the cost or selling price of electrical power in various parts of Canada, such as Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal, my own town of Amherst, Halifax, and Cape Breton? Some time ago certain areas used to advertise that they had the cheapest power in Canada. The proposal was made a few days ago by the hon. member for Davenport that electrical power be subsidized. Perhaps the minister can tell us whether there is any statistical record of the selling price in different parts of Canada. The hon. member for Davenport the other day made a statement, which was wholeheartedly received in the maritime provinces, with regard to the granting of a concession to the producers of power by subsidizing coal in order that we might be put on a fairly equitable basis with other sections in power production.

Mr. HOWE: The dominion statistician tells me that the bureau publishes an index, not of cost, but of cost to the consumer of power in various areas in Canada. The production of power is a matter over which the dominion has no control. It has no policy for subsidizing power in any part of the country.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Is that a special publication prepared for distribution?

Mr. HOWE: It is a separate bulletin. The dominion statistician says he will send a copy of it to my hon. friend without delay.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Thank you.

Item agreed to.

455. Census of population, $591,411.

Mr. COCKERAM: Can the minister tell me why in 1948 we should be making payments in connection with a census taken two years ago? Surely there is a better system of keeping accounts than that.

Mr. HOWE: It takes a long time to compile the information, which is being printed at present.

Mr. COCKERAM: To whom would these accounts be payable?

Mr. HOWE: The staff engaged in that work, the 1,400 employees the hon. member talked about.

Item agreed to.

Wheat and grain division—

456. Salaries and other expenses, $41,737.

Mr. MENARY: Many farmers in my district, in the spring of 1947, took flax from the Middlesex flax company to sow, and in payment they were to give this quantity back plus a stated amount for the use of the seed. The government declared a bonus of fifty cents per bushel which they are unable to collect. The amount owing the farmers varies from $75 to $200.

Mr. FAIR: Can the minister tell me whether anything is being done to keep the grade of red bobs wheat at No. 1?—because we understand that it is being cut down to No. 3.

Mr. HOWE: I am not familiar with that. That grade has come in since I knew something about wheat. I shall be glad to inquire of the board of grain commissioners.

Item agreed to.

Canada Grain Act—

458. Operation and maintenance, including inspection, weighing, registration, etc., $1,997,864.

Mr. CHARLTON: On page 262 there is an item, below "temporary assistance", for wages in the sum of $60,000. Can the minister explain that?

Mr. HOWE: It is for casual help around the grain elevators. There are people who are steadily employed, but in rush periods it is necessary to take on casual help, and the item of $60,000 is provided for the purpose. The hon. member will note that it is a reduction from $150,000 last year.

Mr. COCKERAM: But there is an increase in temporary assistance of $230,000.

Item agreed to.

459. Canadian government elevators, including equipment, $727,049.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Are any Canadian government elevators rented to private companies? If so, what are the conditions of rental?

Mr. HOWE: The only one I know of is the government elevator at Port Arthur, Ontario, which is rented to the McCabe Grain Company. I am not familiar with the terms of the lease, but I shall be glad to table it, though I am under the impression that it has been tabled.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): What is the $727,000 for? Is it for repairs and new equipment, and what is the relationship between the storage of farmers' wheat under the wheat board and the cost of storage there? What is the method of handling wheat for the farmers?

Mr. HOWE: The handling charges and the method of handling are the same as though the government still operated the elevator. The charges for handling wheat at all terminal elevators are the same, whether owned by the government or by the private trade. The reason it was leased to McCabe brothers, as I remember, is that grain firms having country elevators ordinarily attract grain from their elevators to their own terminal, and the government elevator was doing little business because it had no feeders in the country.

Item agreed to.

Canadian government travel bureau—

460. To assist in promoting the tourist business in Canada, $1,038,046.

Mr. ADAMSON: Can the minister give a breakdown of the value of the tourist business to Canada? I have frequently seen statements published as to the value of the tourist business, but I have never seen a breakdown of it. I should like to know the number of tourists from the United States and elsewhere; the number who come for twenty-four or forty-eight hours, or for three days or a week or more; the number who come in the summer, and the average expenditure. I have not seen these figures, though, for all I know, they may have been published. I should like to see them. I see there is a sum of $700,000 here for advertising. How was that spent? How much of it was for radio and how much for United States publications? How was the item of approximately $200,000 spent? If there is any document published on this, I should like to have it.

Mr. HOWE: May I send this document across to my hon. friend?

Mr. ADAMSON: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: It will save my reading it. It tells the whole story.

Mr. ADAMSON: What is the document?

Mr. HOWE: It is the annual report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1947.

Mr. ADAMSON: Can the minister give me the breakdown of the figure for advertising? How was that $700,000 spent? There is another sum of $208,000 for publications. What were those publications? These details are referred to on page 263.

Mr. HOWE: One of them was a map indicating the main automobile roads between Canada and the United States.

[Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia).]

Mr. COCKERAM: How much did they cost?

Mr. HOWE: I could not say. Other books published were: "How to Know Canada"; "Canada's Game Fields"; "Sport Fishing in Canada"; "Canoeing in Canada" and "A Trans-Canada Automobile Tour"—

Mr. FRASER: That would be good.

Mr. HOWE: —a new brochure entitled "Skiing in Canada" which was prepared and made available for distribution; "Canada Vacations Unlimited" which was received from the printer at the end of the year under review and was distributed; "With Rod and Reel in Canada", another brochure for fishermen; and three moving pictures were made and distributed by the national film board.

Mr. ADAMSON: What about the $700,000 expenditure for advertising? Was that done through United States publications?

Mr. HOWE: That is largely advertising in the United States handled through Cockfield, Brown and Company of Montreal. About $350,000 has been spent already and the balance will be spent in the autumn preparing for next season.

Mr. COCKERAM: That is all United States funds?

Mr. HOWE: Most of it, yes.

Mr. WEBB: I do not wish to take up a great deal of time on this matter now, although I feel it is a most important one, especially for the particular area from which I come. I am not criticizing in any way, shape or form. With the staff available, and the facilities they have for handling this large business, as it is at the present time, I think the bureau is doing a good job. In a speech in the house here some time ago it was suggested, I think by the hon. member for Lambton West, that a separate department should be set up. Later on, speaking on the same subject, I myself suggested a commission. I fully realize that this is a big job. I want to pay tribute to Mr. Leo Dolan, director of the travel bureau, who is serving this country well, not only in his operations in this country but in all his travels. I think he is doing a marvellous job for us wherever he goes. Recently I think he did a magnificent job in going to the United States when we were having a little bit of difficulty with our exchange problem, and when we were being threatened with a boycott of money coming into Canada. I followed that matter up, and I think Mr. Dolan did a grand job there. He was able to overcome many difficulties.

However, I still have a strong feeling that with the amount of work which comes under the Department of Trade and Commerce this is a big item to come under its jurisdiction, unless there could be some way of setting up a commission or at least a commissioner. If Mr. Dolan carried with him a title similar to that of deputy minister, I think it would be of great advantage to him in approaching the people of other countries, and would pay off well in Canada. Not only that, but it would give him an approach when meeting provincial and other governments.

Coming back to the actual department, it would seem to me, that if he were in a position of more power to carry this message to the people about this important business, it would be something worthwhile to this country. I make that as a constructive suggestion, and not in any other way. Is the department giving any consideration to methods whereby this great industry of ours will be taken care of, by possibly giving it more stress and placing it in a position of greater importance than it has occupied in the past?

I have gone into this matter of advertising. I looked up all the different magazines and the different methods of advertising our country and I do not know that I have so much criticism with regard to that matter. But I make the suggestion that a personal contact, either through Mr. Dolan or an assistant to him, in other countries, would be worth a good deal. I believe one personal contact with a group of businessmen in those respective communities is worth a great deal more than advertising that will cost considerably more money. I feel that there is nothing like personal contact when it comes to advertising our goods. Therefore I would make that suggestion; and I should like to have the minister, if he will, comment on it at this time.

Mr. HOWE: The activities of the federal government in the field of tourism, as my hon. friend will appreciate, are confined to only one agency, which is intended to be a co-ordinating one and to supplement the work being done by the nine provinces, whose expenditures run into considerably more money in the aggregate than is spent by the federal government. We feel that Mr. Dolan is running a most aggressive department. We think he is drawing tourists to Canada. It will be the constant effort of the department to strengthen the branch.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): First of all, I should like to commend the department, and Mr. Dolan as well, for the work that has been done. One of the things that would help the tourist traffic in Canada more than anything else, especially in my own city, is in connection with the increase in the limit to $400 in the amount of goods a United States person may take back with him. I might point out to the minister that the tourist will not buy in Canada fine luggage and things of that kind that they can take back, because they will not pay the 25 per cent excise tax. If the government will remove that tax on things of that kind, they will increase the tourist trade. They would do more good by taking many of these taxes off, which are not necessary now anyway, than by any other method I know of, and their removal would certainly help the tourist trade.

Mr. HOWE: I might as well set my hon. friend right. There is no excise tax on goods bought in Canada for export.

Mr. MURPHY: But people take them back, individually.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Do they get a refund of the excise tax when they take them back?

Mr. HOWE: They have it delivered to them.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I was not referring to having it delivered.

Mr. HOWE: It is cheaper to do it the other way.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): They want to take it with them.

Mr. MURPHY: I am sure hon. members would like to have some expression from the minister respecting the repeated suggestions since 1945 by those who are interested in the tourist industry. Those suggestions have varied from that of having a separate ministry to having a commission which would work in co-operation with the provinces and municipalities, and also the suggestion to have a deputy minister in charge of the tourist industry.

We know that in Ontario they have a new department for that purpose, and I believe in Quebec the tourist industry is under the supervision of the premier. From time to time it has been pointed out in the house by hon. members on both sides that it is important to develop this industry. I have suggested repeatedly that a separate ministry be considered. Before I proceed further with my questions, would the minister be prepared to advise the committee whether or not any change is contemplated or has been under consideration? After he has completed what he has to say, I should like to continue.

Mr. HOWE: I do not think the government ever considered appointing a minister for tourist traffic. It seems to me that the overhead of the ministry might be more than the expenditures. We now have a tourist branch, and the head of that branch has all the authority he requires. We have recently given him a senior assistant, the purpose being to free him to do more travelling in countries which are the source of our tourist business. So far as I know, he has no difficulty in working with other provinces of the dominion. I have attended conferences at which he has presided, and it seems to me that his position there is quite assured. I cannot imagine any step which would make his position any stronger. If hon. members think the best executive organization is a commission, they are entitled to their opinion. I have never shared that view. I believe a director is much more efficient, so far as organizing the tourist industry is concerned.

Mr. MURPHY: I appreciate the minister's frankness. I am wondering, however, if the government appreciates the possibilities of the tourist industry. Figures concerning the industry are quite revealing when one remembers that the administration of it is not on a departmental level. For that reason I have maintained that it is entitled to more consideration than it has been given. We know that in some countries the tourist industry is a large one. I am told that in Switzerland it runs to about a billion dollars a year, and we know that in the United States it is much greater than the difference between the population of the United States and that of Canada would indicate.

We are not getting what we can get of United States money, which we need so badly. It has been only within the last two or three years that the tourist industry has been discussed with the provinces, and no doubt some good has come from those discussions. I was not suggesting that the director be appointed a deputy minister. I was more concerned with some change which would increase our tourist industry to the point which I think this country should have.

Perhaps I might illustrate what I have in mind. Under the present set-up, we shall suppose a representation is made to develop the tourist industry. Let us suppose that it is recommended that a boat basin or well be cleaned out on a stream emptying into lake Huron. The only reason for clearing the sand bar would be to permit yachts and pleasure craft coming in from Detroit. If they were able to use the harbour they would probably spend two or three hundred thousand dollars a year in that area. Would representations be made through his department, if any association wished to undertake that work so as to bring United States dollars to this country?

Mr. HOWE: An application of that kind would be made to the Department of Public Works, although it might come through the director of the tourist industry. As my hon. friend knows, the Department of Public Works is charged with the responsibility of developing harbours.

However, I do not think the difficulty in Canada is in getting the numbers of tourists, because the numbers are satisfactory. Our difficulty is that we have not the resorts or other attractions which would induce the tourist to stay here to spend his money in Canada. When we were free to travel to the United States, although our numbers were small when compared with the numbers who came from the United States to Canada, our total expenditures in the United States for holiday purposes were about half the total expenditure by United States tourists in Canada. I agree with the hon. member that further developments should be made in connection with tourist accommodation and tourist attractions.

Mr. MURPHY: I certainly agree with what the minister says with respect to accommodation, or lack of it, for United States tourists. No language could be too strong to impress upon those who cater to the tourists that they must do their part to see that good food and proper lodging are accorded. I believe that in the last fifteen years there has not been $100,000 spent for tourist accommodation all the way from Windsor to Ottawa; yet they clamour for tourists. I would take this opportunity to say to those who are interested in the promotion of the tourist industry, by way of giving accommodation, that they are not doing their share. I have in mind particularly hotels and restaurants, and other facilities for tourist accommodation.

What plans has the government further to integrate this work with the work of the provinces and municipalities in the promotion of this industry? Then, has the government considered developing the industry by offering accommodation in the nature of fields for the landing of aircraft throughout the various areas in Canada; and what further plans has the government with respect to the Trans-Canada highway?

Mr. HOWE: My. hon. friend has covered a good deal of territory. For the last two years we have held an interprovincial conference for the discussion of the tourist traffic.

At that conference the plans of all the provinces, the transportation, bus and steamship companies are laid on the table. It is presided over by the head of the federal bureau. Plans are co-ordinated, and suggestions are made wherever they can be strengthened. So far as I know, there is a continuous effort to improve our tourist industry in Canada, and to strengthen it.

Mr. MURPHY: Has the department under consideration any plan for the exchange of films with the United States? It occurred to me that perhaps through some form of barter we could have our films shown in the United States with a view to increasing our tourist industry. Would it be possible for the minister's department to make arrangements with the film industry so that our films could be shown in the United States?

Mr. HOWE: We have been doing that during the past few months and have had spectacular results. A great number of shorts have been made in Canada about Canada and circulated to every movie house in the United States. Records descriptive of Canada have been circulated through all the radio stations in the United States, and I am told by those who have visited there that they are being frequently used. An active promotion program is being carried on under the auspices of the moving-picture industry. I am told that, as a result of the present campaign, two full-length movies will be made in Ontario during the current year.

Mr. MURPHY: Some few years ago several writers visited Ontario, as a result of which a great deal of publicity was obtained. I recall an article by Rex Beach in the Saturday Evening Post. I was wondering if the department had any such plan under consideration. Then I was wondering what plans the department has to further this industry by way of lecturers and speakers in the United States.

Mr. HOWE: This month, in co-operation with the province of Ontario, we are entertaining a group of writers in Ottawa. We have circulated the titles of books which we think would be appropriate for movies based on Canada. It was a considerable list of most attractive titles. I do not know the value of lectures because I never attend them myself, but perhaps some people do. We have no plans for lecturers.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Sometimes we have them here.

Mr. MURPHY: I understand that last year the director of the travel bureau made some thirty-five appearances on the other side, speaking to service clubs and other organizations. I think the senior officials of the department, including the director of the travel bureau, could serve a most useful purpose by speaking to service clubs and other organizations on the other side. It should be done on a planned basis, so that a great area could be covered. Other efforts like sportsmen's shows and exhibits could be co-ordinated. I really think the amount allocated for the promotion of the tourist industry is small compared with what could really be developed if it were carried on in an aggressive manner.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I have never been able to understand the program and policies of the travel bureau. I appreciate the great work they are doing, but I am of the opinion that there is considerable overlapping in some cases, as I shall explain later, and a conspiracy of silence in other cases.

Some years ago I took up the question of tourist publicity for the district which I have the honour to represent, with a prominent official of the Canadian Pacific. I said to him, "You do not advertise the Okanagan lake; you do not advertise your steamer service; you do not advertise your other services". He admitted it, and then he said, "I'll tell you the reason why. We like to keep people moving along the main line from one big hotel to another. If we advertise your little steamship services it would divert people going from Banff to the coast."

It would almost appear that the dominion government advertising is coincidental with Canadian Pacific advertising. These smaller places with smaller hotels and tourist camps offer excellent facilities for large numbers of people who would be willing to go to the less known places. I can hardly believe that this is accidental. It seems to me that the advertising of the dominion government travel bureau and that of the Canadian Pacific indicates a common policy to advertise in such a way that the large hotels will be filled up and people kept on the main lines of the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National. Hundreds of these smaller and more attractive hotels and tourist resorts are being overlooked. I should like to know upon what basis the travel bureau advertises, in the United States, tourist facilities in Canada.

Mr. HOWE: The federal government can do only a national job. It invites people to come to Canada; not to any part of Canada, but just to come to Canada. It may show the attractions of various parts of Canada, but it does not say, "Come to Georgian Bay," or "Come to Quebec City" It does not say, "Come to the Canadian Pacific Hotel at Banff". It says, "Come to Canada". There are other agencies here which do that type of work, the provinces and the transportation companies. They advertise particular resorts and travel between particular points.

I think my hon. friend will appreciate that that is not a job for the dominion government. We simply advertise Canada as a whole. I suggest that the province of British Columbia would be the logical agency to advertise the beauties of Okanagan lake which I enjoyed immensely on my recent visit, even though my purpose in going there was not accomplished.

Mr. FRASER: The minister has said that the job of the travel bureau is a national job. When the director receives an inquiry from someone in the United States, does he write that person and ask if there is any particular section he would like to come to?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. If a person indicates an interest in a certain section, full information about that section is given, either by means of dominion government literature or by means of provincial government literature. The province would be advised that such and such a tourist was interested in such and such a resort. There is a complete exchange of information. The proper agency would reply and give the information. We simply do a national job which is intended to be in the interests of every part of Canada.

Mr. FRASER: The minister says the province would be notified that a person wanted to go there, and in turn they would write to that person. Do you also take it up with any local agency, with a chamber of commerce or board of trade? I come from the Kawartha lake section. Would you take it up with the chamber of commerce at Peterborough or the director of tourist publicity?

Mr. HOWE: We notify the province and the province would notify the particular city. The local situation is a provincial responsibility. It might interest my hon. friend to know that the bureau ships out two tons of mail daily, handles from three thousand to six thousand inquiries daily and has serviced 147,391 inquiries from January to May, 1948.

Mr. FRASER: After looking at some of the exhibits put on by the dominion government—I mentioned this to the director—I believe it would add colour if the Department of Justice would allow one or two mounties with their red coats to accompany the exhibit to the United States. There is no doubt about it, they are dull. They try to put on a good show, but I believe if they had a mountie on the job all the time it would help. Years ago they used to have mounties. Away back in 1900 or 1901 the Trent waterway development association was able to induce the dominion government to help them put on an exhibit in Grand Central Palace in New York city. We managed to get mounties to go with that. That exhibit was put on for about five years. I would like the minister to comment on the sending of mounties along with exhibits to the United States.

Mention was made of insufficient hotel accommodation, and that complaint is perfectly justified. Some of these hotels are not really fit for tourists to go into. That is why the Ontario government is now, last year and this, having all these tourist resorts, cabins and restaurants inspected to see that they are kept clean. If they are not, the owners are told to clean them up, and if they do not, their licence is cancelled.

Has the director received any complaints from fish and game associations in regard to people going up to James bay and shooting ducks and geese from planes? United States tourists have complained to me about that matter.

Mr. HOWE: The complaints ordinarily go to the fish and game departments of the provinces. We have had complaints, and the air regulations people have taken action.

Mr. FRASER: They have taken action recently?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: What about the mounties?

Mr. HOWE: That is a matter for the Department of Justice. That staff is recruited for the protection of Canada, and during the war it was not possible to divert members of the staff. Perhaps now it will be possible again. I will draw the views of the committee to the attention of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. FRASER: I think the director will agree that it is certainly something that should be done.

Mr. HOWE: It is certainly a great advertisement for Canada.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister said that the 25 per cent tax was not paid by people from the United States on goods they sent home, but they have all the nuisance of going through customs, and a great many visitors do not know that they can get these goods tax-free for shipment home. I suggest to the minister that it might be wise to go through the list of articles to which the 25 per cent tax applies with a view to eliminating the tax. I think the results would be more worthwhile to Canada than anything brought in by the tax.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The word "co-ordinate" nearly always frightens me. It nearly always means someone who is put on to help other people work together who probably would work better without a co-ordinator. I am not saying that is true here, because the minister has given us evidence that some real co-ordination is going on. Nevertheless do not let us fool ourselves. As soon as you set up a little kingdom, the king of that kingdom has one great desire in mind, to extend it. He would have to be superhuman if he had not that desire. Therefore I would like to ask a little more about this co-ordination. This has become something quite beyond co-ordination. In the first place, it is spending a lot of money itself. In the second place, it is evidently inviting large numbers of inquiries to be directed to itself. That is not co-ordination. That is setting up a little kingdom of its own. I am not saying that can be avoided. I am only putting it to the minister. It seems to me unfortunate that the inquiries should come in here, then, I presume, be allocated to the provinces, and then be re-allocated to them. I am not wanting to crab this thing because by and large I think a good job is being done, but does the minister not think there is a real danger of allowing this branch to grow up and up and having inquiries directed to itself? Do those inquiries need to come here? Should they not in the first instance be directed to where they are to be acted on?

Another thing; one of the finest ways of wasting money, if one does not watch it, is to give a lot of money to an advertising agency to spend. They will spend it—leave that to them. But whether that advertising produces results commensurate with the expenditure is a question. My query is whether that kind of advertising is anything like as good as money spent on personal contacts.

The minister spoke about publications brought out by the department—"Skiing in Canada", "Rod and Reel". It seems to me that these are a natural thing for a central body to handle, because they deal with conditions across the country. But I would like to hear the minister say a word more on co-ordination, which frightens me so much. Mr. Dolan is a sensible man, so far as I know, who would be able to get people to work together. The minister spoke of having meetings with the provinces. I would like to know whether he is satisfied that this co-ordination is real co-ordination and is not creating a new department here which is doing a lot of work that is just a duplication of what ought to be done in the provinces.

Mr. HOWE: I have been associated with this bureau for quite a few years; it used to be in the Department of Transport. Care is taken that there is no overlapping. Our inter-provincial relations are exceedingly good in this matter. This is one field of endeavour where the provinces work very closely with the dominion. Through co-ordination a lot of duplicate work is avoided. Certain work is allotted to the federal field, other work to the provinces, and still other work to the railways and bus companies, which are also large advertisers in other countries. All this advertising is co-ordinated. You will seldom pick up a magazine and see an obvious duplication of advertising from Canada, which I think is a tribute to the work of the federal bureau. By and large it is doing a good job, and a better job each year, in avoiding duplication in the field of advertising.

My hon. friend asks whether I think advertising is good. I have not the faintest idea. Some people ask if movie publicity is good. I do not know. But most great enterprises do a great deal of advertising and must think it is good. I would think the advertising we do in United States publications is about the right kind of advertising, judging by the standards of other great enterprises.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What about having a large number of inquiries directed here which have to be re-routed to the provinces?

Mr. HOWE: It is not a matter of directing them here. The advertising put out by the bureau carries the stamp of the federal bureau; the advertising put out by the provinces carries the stamp of the provinces; the advertising put out by the railroads carries the stamp of the railroads. The bureau is a clearing house. If people inquire of the federal government about fishing in Nova Scotia we would not want to say: We know nothing about it. The bureau acts as a universal clearing house to get the inquiries into the right channels.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Would it mar the appearance of the advertisements if they showed the various provincial offices to which inquiries could be directed?

Mr. HOWE: I think that would hardly be feasible. I think you must have a clearing house, and the present system I think works fairly well.

Mr. WEBB: I think it is pretty well agreed that we should have more and better tourist accommodation. I have been approached by possibly a hundred good clean-cut returned boys who want to go into the tourist business and build cottages of some description to take care of visitors to Canada. The difficulty is they have no funds. They do not want the money given to them particularly, but they want to borrow it. Has the department ever given any consideration to setting up some sort of trust fund or mortgage board of some description through which assistance might be given these boys who have a desire to go into that business in Canada? If that were done we might build up something which might be worthwhile.

Mr. HOWE: A good deal of thought has been given to it. The director of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation developed quite a plan, and it is being studied now by the Bank of Canada and by the government. I do not say that it will be put into force next year. It probably requires more working over. It is a fairly comprehensive plan of financing tourist establishments in selected areas. It is quite a big plan. As my hon. friend will appreciate, it takes a good deal of money. It is not a thing to be jumped into immediately, but it is certainly worthy of the consideration it is receiving.

Mr. WEBB: It is receiving consideration?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. CASE: Some of us may have wondered why, after all the portfolios he has occupied, the minister was selected to be Minister of Trade and Commerce. This afternoon I think we know why, because he has shown that he is the most versatile man in the government. He has answered questions about financing of soldiers, the mounted police, and so on.

In examining this item, I find there is one thing we have overlooked. I do not know whether the government is overlooking it, but in our discussions I believe we have overlooked assistance toward bringing tourist business to Canada. The tourist business in Canada is tremendous. I think the department, and I know the various governmental services in the provinces, are bidding for the tourist traffic. A very good job is being done in that regard. I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Leeds that we are just about taxed to our capacity as far as accommodation is concerned. We have various travel associations. I have been associated with the Blue Water Highway Association and the Huronic Historic Sites Association, which embraces that area from Orillia to Barrie, Midland and Owen Sound, which is considered to be the one place where civilization in this country began.

I want to put on the record a few figures which I thought would be of interest to the committee with regard to what tourist travel really means. I am going to refer to the Collingwood area. I could select the city of Owen Sound, the scenic city of Canada, where the atmosphere is so invigorating and the scenery so beautiful; but for fear of being accused of boosting my own home town and constituency, I shall take the neighbouring town, Collingwood. The report I have is for the year 1946, when we had a survey made at Wasaga beach. It is not as up to date as I should like to have it. We have not the figures for 1947. Wasaga beach has a population of around 300 persons, I would say. In eight weeks in 1946 they had a daily average of 55,000 persons. Twenty-five per cent were citizens of the United States. Therefore seventy-five per cent of our own people were patronizing that beach.

We have been seeking to encourage our farmers to believe that the tourist business means as much to them as it does to the businessman. We have encouraged them to invest their funds in tourist associations and to assist in promoting the tourist trade. I shall now give figures to show the amount of food that was consumed and produced on farms adjacent to Wasaga beach in 1946: poultry, 434,840 pounds; butter, 68,000 pounds; eggs, 536,925 dozen; meat, 2,202,000 pounds; vegetables, raw, 4,800,000 pounds; and milk, 186,000 gallons.

In a discussion of the tourist business we hear a lot about United States tourists. We are certainly glad to have the United States tourists; probably we are happier now than ever before because of our exchange situation. It means a great deal to have this tremendous export business, so to speak, of the goods consumed in our own country. I leave that thought with the minister. I am not suggesting for one moment that the government have not had that thought in mind, but the development of our interprovincial and inter-community tourist travel is very important. Generally speaking, however, when we compare the United States tourists who come to Canada, with the vast numbers of our own people who spend their winters in the south in the more moderate climate, I do not know how much we are ahead of the game in the year; but I do know that, in the matter of putting money into circulation, the encouragement of travel gives opportunities and advantages to see our own country, which, after all, so few Canadians know. It affords opportunity for travel in Canada, and that is the one trait we should seek to develop, because we have much in common. Let us have as much of the other traffic from outside our country as we can attract, but let us seek to provide suitable accommodation for those who are visiting us, so that they will go away with some appreciation of the holiday they have had.

We have certainly a lack of modern accommodation. The province of Ontario is now giving consideration to the inspection of tourist homes, which is all to the good. I am one of those who would like to congratulate and compliment Mr. Leo Dolan. I have had many long years of association with him indirectly, and I appreciate very much the work he is doing. I am glad to see this sum in the estimates, and I hope it will be well spent for the general benefit of the tourist traffic in Canada.

Mr. ADAMSON: I should just like to say this on the question I asked on this item. The figures I asked for are not contained in the annual report of the Department of Trade and Commerce. It is pertinent, because what I am trying to find is the behaviour pattern of the United States tourist when he comes to Canada. It has been said generally that the United States tourist comes to Canada and buys a hot dog and that the Canadian tourist goes to the United States and wants a cabana at $40 a day, or he spends six weeks in a de luxe hotel in Florida. What I should like to find out is this. How many United States tourists come to Canada? What do they spend? How many spend three days or a week in Canada? What do they do particularly when they are here? In other words, what I should like to have is a breakdown of the value of the tourist trade to us in Canada.

I have heard it said that the tourist trade is worth $300 million to Canada in a year. I have also heard that that is an over-estimate. We should have an analysis of the tourist trade so that we can encourage it where it is most valuable. I make one suggestion. The hon. member for Calgary West has made this suggestion before. I refer to the Banff and Jasper national parks, and particularly to the development of those parks in the winter. There are three million people in the United States who ski. According to the best information I can get, the average expenditure is at least $100. There is a traffic of $300 million in skiing alone. Something should be done in the national parks, lake Louise, and Banff, so that we would end up by having these great hotels open in the winter as well as in the summer. There is a tremendous field out there. I should like to have some idea of how many United States tourists come in for two days or three days, and where they go and what their expenditures are. I mention again the development of the Rockies in the winter, because the skiing season is just double the summer season. The people who come to visit us in the winter are not the 24-hour tourists; they are people who come and spend a week or two weeks. On the whole they are much more valuable to us. I wonder whether the department has a breakdown of these figures or whether they can be obtained.

Mr. HOWE: I am advised that a study of that kind is published each year by the bureau of statistics, showing the effect of the tourist traffic on the international balance of payments. I have asked the director to send a copy to my hon. friend today, so that he can have the latest information.

Mr. ADAMSON: There is no study of the behaviour pattern of the tourist when he gets here?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; it covers that.

Mr. ADAMSON: That would be most valuable. It would show the type of tourist coming in, the type who spends a week or a couple of weeks.

Mr. HOWE: I will send a copy to my hon. friend.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I join with others who have commended the minister for the expansion of the department, and also in their expressions of appreciation of the headway made by the tourist bureau. Federal concern in this whole subject originated with Senator Dennis of Nova Scotia, who brought the matter before the senate, where a committee was set up of which he was chairman, and a policy was enunciated. The tourist bureau has developed from these beginnings into the present Dominion Government Travel Bureau, which is its present full name.

Reference has been made to other parts of Canada, but in this discussion I have not heard anyone refer to the maritime provinces, and that is a serious neglect, in view of the fact that the present tourist bureau in Canada had its origin in Nova Scotia with Senator Dennis, and the director, Mr. Dolan, is also from Nova Scotia; yet the maritime provinces have not been mentioned.

I do not believe there is a section of Canada that has greater attractions for the tourist than our provinces by the sea. Every part of the maritimes has its particular attractions. The visitor will find a great deal of enjoyment, health and hospitality in the Annapolis valley, the south shore, unequalled scenic beauty of Cape Breton island—I do not think it can be equalled on the continent of North America—along the Northumberland straits, in the county of Cumberland, and Prince Edward Island with our warm sea water and clear invigorating air. We hear of millions, indeed tens of millions of dollars being spent in the development of tourist resorts in the state of Maine, but there is no such expenditure in the maritime provinces where we have equal or greater attractions.

The minister should make a special effort to induce more people from central Canada to visit the maritimes, thus saving Canadian dollars. Large numbers go there now, and once they familiarize themselves with the attractions and the healthful surroundings, many decide to establish summer homes there. For every one that goes there now, there should be hundreds. No part of the tourist business holds out greater possibilities for development than the maritimes—Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick.

I commend the minister for the development of this branch. I know how busy the director is at this season. I picked up my home paper today before coming into the chamber, and I see that a special invitation has been extended to Mr. Dolan to address the board of trade of Amherst, but he replied that he was unable to do so because he was too busy serving the people in central Canada. He could not give special attention to our part of Canada. Perhaps I am not quoting him correctly, but I think that is, in effect, his reply. At any rate, I am pleased to support this appropriation.

Mr. MURPHY: I support the request made by my hon. friend (Mr. Adamson) for a breakdown of the amount involved in the tourist industry, and I would ask the minister to separate it into provinces and seasons.

Mr. HOWE: I am not sure what the breakdown is; I have not seen it. Such as it is, however, I will have it sent to you.

Mr. MURPHY: Another suggestion I have to make, and I offer it in the belief that it will produce good results, is that when the next session opens we should set up a House of Commons committee on the tourist industry. I know a committee of this kind has been functioning elsewhere, but I am confident that a committee of the House of Commons, representative of all the provinces, would make a great contribution to the promotion of the tourist industry.

Mr. ADAMSON: If the tourist industry is worth $300 million a year, it is one of the first two or three industries in Canada, and an analysis should be made showing how the money comes in.

Mr. GILLIS: I, too, am pleased to join with the hon. member for Cumberland and others in support of this vote. There are two things

[Mr. Black (Cumberland).]

I would say. First I wish to compliment the director on his activities. His work is excellent, and that is to be expected; he is a maritimer, full of energy. He is one of those whom we had to export to promote national affairs. An hon. member suggested that the director might be made a deputy minister. I do not think that is really intended; but in this department, as in all departments of government, the work of those who direct matters in the field is to a large extent restricted by red tape. There are many things that could and should be done quickly; but it is necessary for the field workers, who have the actual job of administration, to go back to the deputy minister and finally to the minister, and by the time certain orders and regulations that are called for have been got through to the minister, the tourist season is over.

I would suggest that the person who directs the tourist bureau should be given considerable latitude and authority to carry out the work, without the necessity of going back and checking and rechecking and getting orders, and all that kind of thing.

There is one point I would make in regard to promoting the tourist industry of the maritime provinces, and that is with particular reference to my own end of the country, Cape Breton island. The tourists who come to that part of the country are not in the ordinary category of tourists. They are largely people who migrated from that part of the country to the United States and particularly to the New England states. There are thousands of them, and these people would like to come back, but one thing that militates against a larger number returning to that part of the country is the condition of the secondary roads leading into certain sections. Did it ever occur to the minister to inaugurate a direct plane service from that airport in Sydney to Boston or other airports in the New England states?

Mr. HOWE: We have that now.

Mr. GILLIS: A direct flight from Sydney?

Mr. HOWE: It stops at Halifax.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, on a roundabout course. It costs a great deal more money. That is something like getting from Ottawa—

Mr. HOWE: It does not cost more money.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, it goes to Halifax and Moncton; and you have to roam all over the country and pay a great deal more money in order to get to that destination. I am suggesting a direct flight which would cut the time down considerably as well as the expense. Thousands more people would be brought in if that kind of service were established in place of what we have at the present time.

The tourist industry in Nova Scotia is one of our major ones today. Just recently I saw a report by the minister of industry of Nova Scotia, and the amount of money left by United States tourists in Nova Scotia staggered me. I never thought it ran into the figures shown in the report. If that report is true for that section of the country, I think it is true for nearly all of Canada. This would be one of the greatest industries assisting in the cutting down of our shortage of United States dollars, if we could bring more people in and have them spend their money here. I merely rose to make the suggestion of a direct plane service between that Sydney station and eastern United States stations, because I think it would pay for itself.

In the second place, I wanted to say that I appreciated the work done by the director. I have had considerable contact with him. He is active and always on the job. The field workers in all departments such as this one should have a great deal more authority than they have. If the line of red tape back through government, which is necessary under the present arrangements, were cut considerably and if a little more authority were given to these workers, I believe they could do a better job in promoting the industry.

Mr. McLURE: I wish to solicit the support of the minister to the end that he may use his influence with his colleagues in the other departments. I have reference to the final road leading to our national park, which is our drawing card for tourists in Prince Edward Island. A short distance of road—about three-quarters of a mile—in the park area is under dispute. The dominion government do not wish to take it over; yet they claim they own it. The provincial government will not repair it. Between the two of them, the road has really become a mud-hole for about a mile over which tourists must travel in order to get down to the beach and also to get to the finest golf links, they say, in Canada.

One other thing we have appreciated in the advertising in the last couple of years is the fact that Prince Edward Island is now on most of the maps I have seen. Prior to two years ago, we were put on about once in every ten years.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member advertises the province every day in the house.

Mr. McLURE: However, this improvement is probably due to the fact that advertising experts have found that there is in Prince Edward Island a tourist resort equal to any. Now we are getting a better return from the advertising. As I mentioned before, until last year we could not get proper accommodation for most of the tourists who came there. But this year I think we shall be able to take care of twice as many tourists as we have taken care of in any other season. We are proud to say that, through good advertising and through having a good place to which to come, I understand that the Governor General of Canada is to vacation in our province this summer. We hope that this will be one of the finest advertisements we have ever had for the tourist business in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. HOWE: I may say that I have a special interest in that bit of road. In my house I have a handsome piece of plate awarded to the victor of the tournament held at the opening of that golf course, and I will ask my colleagues to give consideration to this matter.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I merely rise, Mr. Chairman, so that the public will know that there is someone from Alberta here.

Mr. HOWE: If this item could be considered carried, I should be glad. It is necessary for me to leave now in order to catch a plane, and I shall turn over the responsibility to my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

245. Departmental administration, $623,428.

Mr. FLEMING: I have some remarks to make on this item, Mr. Chairman; but at the outset I should like you to give some indication to the committee, for its guidance, as to the extent to which members may discuss, under this section, the subject matter of additional grants to assist the construction of hospitals, and other health matters proposed by the Prime Minister in his statement in the house about a month ago. The Prime Minister at that time indicated that supplementary appropriations would be introduced in due course to deal with that matter. I think it would be of assistance to all the members of the committee, Mr. Chairman, if you would indicate at the outset if that matter may be discussed.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: No. I would have to say immediately that it would not be in order to discuss it under this item.

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): May I say one word in that connection. I had a chance of informally discussing this matter with several members of the house, including the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. I suggested that, as there would naturally be great interest in the details of the program announced by the Prime Minister, and that, as the supplementary estimates in connection with that program are not yet before the house, we might avoid duplication of discussion if we confined the general discussion in connection with this department to the moment when we have before us the supplementary estimates, which would give ample opportunity for a wider discussion and thereby possibly avoid discussing the same matter twice. I am in the hands of the committee in the matter, but I understood from the conversation I had with other hon. members that such procedure would likely be in accord with their views and wishes in the matter.

Mr. FLEMING: May I just say that if a ruling is made to that effect, which will be binding on the committee, it will, I am sure, be entirely satisfactory to all of us. We all wish to be guided by the same ruling in this matter. It is of the highest importance. If you make that ruling, Mr. Chairman, we will adhere loyally to it. We understand, however, that when the supplementary appropriations are brought down, they will be brought down at a time that will afford an ample opportunity for discussion of this matter.

In other years it will be recalled that in the discussion of the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare much has been said about the kind of program members have felt should be brought in. If we leave over that kind of discussion for the supplementary appropriations, then I suggest it is most important that the government allow ample opportunity for it, and that it should bring in the supplementary appropriations at a time which will give hon. members ample opportunity for discussion. I suggest that we should not be caught at the last moment in a rush which may lead to glossing over a matter of such great importance. Would you give a ruling, Mr. Chairman?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I shall have to rule that it would not be in order to discuss matters which will be brought in later with the supplementary estimates. We shall have to confine our remarks to the item now under discussion.

Mr. FLEMING: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. There are some remarks of a general nature I should like to make respecting the estimates of this department.

We have before us increased estimates for the fiscal year. The estimates for the new fiscal year amount to $345,660,705, whereas those of the previous year were $319,990,101, showing that the department is budgeting this year for an increased expenditure of $25,670,604. This department is now the second greatest spending department among all the departments of government, its expenditures being exceeded only by the Department of Finance, and in that instance only because of the charges paid annually through that department on the national debt.

For those who like to compare expenditures on these vitally important subjects of health and welfare with expenditures on other matters of essential importance, I mention in passing that the expenditures this year for the Department of National Defence are $232,408,239.95, and that the expenditures this year for the Department of National Health and Welfare will therefore exceed those of the Department of National Defence by about $113 million. When the supplementary estimates are introduced, as forecast by the Prime Minister some weeks ago, we may expect further substantially increased expenditures in this department, marking it as the department through which there is the greatest expenditure of funds for services in the Dominion of Canada.

These figures demonstrate the importance of the department and the importance of the task upon which the committee is now engaged in reviewing the estimates. I make no apology for alluding at this point to a matter to which I have referred in previous sessions because, unhappily, this is about the only opportunity one has of adverting to it.

I have had on the order paper for the last four sessions the following resolution:

> That, in the opinion of this house, standing order 63 be amended by adding after subsection 1: (m) on public health, welfare, social security and housing to consist of thirty-five members, ten of whom shall constitute a quorum.

This proposal is for the establishment of a standing committee on health, welfare, social security and housing. We have a great many committees of the house, some of which function actively, and some of which do not. But we have not yet, even in this year of 1948, established a committee charged with the responsibility of reviewing matters of the kind to which I have referred. I believe most members, when confronted with those matters, would frankly concede them to be of the highest importance. Great advantages would accrue to the house from the appointment of a standing committee on health, welfare, social security and housing. The value of such a committee would be demonstrated not alone in the matter of reviewing estimates, although at a time like this I suggest its value would be clearly demonstrated. I am thinking more of the duty placed upon hon. members to inform themselves of all aspects of these important matters.

We gather information from reports—which often are stale by the time they reach us. We try to keep ourselves informed through the press and other publications. Hon. members, however, have not an opportunity of questioning officials of the department at first hand, a procedure which I conceive to be one which would bring great benefit to the House of Commons by way of obtaining additional information and making the house better informed as to the functions of the department. Such a committee would assist the house greatly in determining where money can wisely be spent for purposes of health and welfare, or where it might be more wisely spent than it is at the present time. It would give an opportunity, furthermore, for the proper analysis of proposals submitted by various interested organizations such as medical and welfare groups, those who are making a study of housing problems, and labour organizations which have done much in giving assistance and oftentimes a lead in the approach to social problems.

A committee of the house could go into matters of that kind in a really useful and efficient manner, at first hand. Present procedure denies us that opportunity. We can put our questions to the minister. He will answer certain questions; but we do not have first-hand contact with the information in the minds of the officials.

I believe the minister has sympathy for this proposal. I would urge upon him to press it, and to the limit of his resources to endeavour to bring about an amendment of the rules of the house which would permit the appointment of such a committee. It seems to me utterly useless for a private member to place on the order paper a resolution in which he seeks to amend the rules, even where those rules appear to be archaic. As I have pointed out, my resolution has been on the order paper for four sessions; and at the rate we are going I suppose it will be there for fifty years before it will ever be reached. But the government has it in its power to advance proposals of the kind, if it wishes to take the subject in hand. I urge upon the minister that he regard this not only as an opportunity, but as a duty.

When we come to a review of the estimates we see at once the usefulness of such a committee. I do not wish to thresh old straw, because I have spoken on this subject before. I must say, however, that I believe the house approaches its task of reviewing estimates inadequately equipped for the purpose. That inadequate equipment is not the fault of members of the house, nor do I think it is altogether the fault of the government. I do say we must revise our procedure with a view to improving its efficiency. No business organization in the country would approach the problem of budgeting for its fiscal needs in the ensuing year without knowing precisely what was expended in the previous one.

In the present instance we are dealing with the expenditure of about a third of a billion dollars, but we have not before us the expenditures made by the department last year. We have to assist us in our comparisons only the appropriations which were voted last year. We do not know in the case of any item to what extent the appropriation is exhausted. We do not know to what extent the appropriation proved to be more than was required. The committee is simply working at least in the dusk, if not in the dark, in proceeding with its budgetary task on that basis. What the committee ought to have before it, before it ever settles down to this task, is the full detail of last year's expenditures under these items.

So that I may put myself on a common footing with the minister, at this point I am going to ask him to give to the committee when he speaks—this will save the time of the committee of the whole—details of the expenditures made last year in connection with every item appearing on pages 33 and 34 of the estimates. I asked that last year, but the minister chose not to give it and I was compelled to ask for the previous year's expenditure on each item as it was reached. In order to save time, I hope that this year the minister will give the committee a statement in advance showing the actual expenditure under each item. I know that will save time, because I for one intend to make it my business to find out the actual expenditure last year on each item. In the external affairs committee where we were reviewing the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, we were furnished, before we began our task, with detailed expenditures under each item of the estimates. That was of great assistance to the committee and saved much time.

There are some other matters of a specific nature which I intend to take up, but at this stage I ask, as the first item, that the minister furnish us with further information. One reason why it is necessary to ask for this information is that the reports we have before us are stale by the time they reach us. Of course, that situation is not peculiar to this department; it is inherent under the procedure under which we work. The last report we have is for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1947. The information in that report is now fifteen months old. Conditions change and a report of that kind is of limited use at this stage. I ask the minister to supply us with certain general information. First, will he tell the committee the number of employees in the department at the present date. According to the annual report to which I have referred, the number of employees in the department at March 31, 1947, was:

Permanent	303
Temporary	1,625
Total	1,928

I am sure the committee will be impressed with the small proportion of employees on a permanent footing and the high proportion of employees on a temporary footing. We appreciate that this is a young department, having been in existence now for a trifle under four years, but one would expect that by this time a greater number of employees would be on a permanent footing. I think it will interest the committee to know the number of employees today and to have that number broken down as between permanent and temporary employees. I have already asked the minister to furnish us with the detailed expenditures of last year.

There is another matter which I am sure will interest the committee, because the committee has shown its interest in it in previous sessions. There are many amounts scattered through the various branches of this department under the euphonious title, "Educational and informational publicity." I note that the amounts budgeted for this year aggregate $406,850, whereas last year the amount budgeted for was $480,507. It would appear that there has been a reduction of $73,657 in these items for so-called educational and informational publicity, formerly called "publicity and information." However, I have a suspicion that if we compare the actual expenditures last year with the amounts estimated for the present year we shall find that it is not a decrease but an increase that is being estimated for now. I ask the minister to give the total expenditures last year under these items of educational and informational publicity.

I am also interested in the items of travelling expenses. There are many of them scattered through the various items, I think approximately thirty. According to my calculation, these amounts total no less than $643,000. Last year the aggregate amount budgeted for was $515,650. The estimates this year show an increase of exactly 25 per cent over those of last year. The committee will wish to know why there should be such a substantial increase in the travelling expenses for this year. In case any wrong inference should be drawn, I ask hon. members to look at page 190 of the estimates. They will then see that the amounts provided under travelling expenses apparently have no relationship to the expenses of delegates to international conferences. We know that leading officials of the department on both health and welfare sides are being asked to attend international conferences at New York and elsewhere, and under the departmental administration item there is an item on page 190, reading as follows:

Allowances and other expenses of delegates to international conferences, $10,000.

From that, I assume that the other items of travelling expenses have no relationship to the expenses of delegates attending international conferences. I again observe that the travelling expenses for this year show an increase of 25 per cent over the estimates of last year. I think the committee will wish to know the actual amount expended last year on travelling expenses because, if the estimates of this department run true to form and history repeats itself, I believe it will be found that the amount actually expended last year was less than the amount estimated, and therefore the increase in the estimates of this year over the expenditures of last year will be more than 25 per cent.

For the purpose of saving time, I ask the minister at this stage to put on the record the information that he has in relation to family allowances. The kind of information I refer to is to be found on pages 4465, 4466 and 4467 of Hansard of last year. If that information were put on the record at this stage it would give hon. members an opportunity to prepare their questions on the matter, and time would be saved. If it is left until the item is reached before the information is put on the record, more questions will probably have to be asked because we would not have the figures before us. I make that suggestion in the interests of saving time.

I turn now to another subject. I shall be brief, because I do not desire to prolong these remarks as I believe the committee will wish to discuss the items. The subject I should like to mention now is the dominion-provincial relations with respect to health and welfare. I have no intention of trespassing on a subject which will be discussed when the supplementary estimates are before us. But we do know that a conference was held in Ottawa this week, attended by officials of all the provincial departments of health, at the invitation of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. If the minister is in a position to give a report on that conference, without revealing matters which should not yet properly be revealed, I would urge him to do so. The country and, I am sure, this house are anxious to know the subjects that were discussed at that conference, what success attended its deliberations, and what action may be expected to ensue from the conference.

It is significant, I think, Mr. Chairman, that when an invitation was issued by the dominion authorities for the holding of a dominion-provincial conference in this field, which requires joint dominion and provincial action if it is to be properly covered, all the provinces readily responded. I think that indicates to all and sundry the readiness of the governments of all the provinces to meet together with the dominion and with their sister provinces to discuss matters pertaining to health and welfare for the general advantage of all Canadians. I hope that that start will be followed up and that the dominion government will follow through now by calling another dominion-provincial conference or conferences with a view to bringing about common consultation and common action in matters of common concern to the dominion and the provinces.

We see great needs to be met in the field of health and welfare in Canada. Many of the needs are of critical proportions. I know the house is familiar with them. On the health side we have a critical shortage of nurses, a critical shortage of hospital accommodation, and a serious shortage of doctors, particularly in certain areas. We see certain diseases increasing in their incidence in Canada. For instance, I am sure the house was impressed by the report issued last fall by the Canadian Tuberculosis Association, calling attention to the necessity of an intensified tuberculosis program across the dominion, and pointing out that ground was lost in the previous year in Canada in the fight against this scourge. A total of 5,797 Canadians died of tuberculosis in 1946. The death rate from tuberculosis climbed from 45·9 per 100,000 of population in 1945, the all-time low, to 47·2 per 100,000 in 1946. Perhaps the minister will have further figures for the full year 1947. Perhaps those figures are not yet available. But let no one think the fight against tuberculosis has been won when we see this scourge raising its ugly head once again in this manner.

Mental disease in Canada appears to be on the increase. Last year more than 53,000 persons were treated for mental disease in institutions for that purpose in Canada, and the cost this year of fighting mental disease in Canada will approximate $30,000,000. That is only one aspect of the tremendous cost of disease and does not take into account all the impairment of health, the impairment of efficiency, and the loss of production of wealth in Canada by reason of illness and impairment of faculties.

The committee will wish to hear from the minister what precisely has been expended from dominion revenues on research. We hear a great deal of talk about research, but there has been altogether too much inclination to leave the burden of meeting the cost of research on the provinces and on institutions such as universities and hospitals which are largely supported by provincial and, in some cases, by municipal revenues. The committee will wish to hear from the minister exactly what sums out of dominion revenues were actually devoted to research in the field of health in Canada last year. The impression I think of most Canadians who have studied this problem is that research has largely been starved in Canada.

Again, on the welfare side, we find similar needs and similar shortages. There will be opportunity as the debate proceeds to discuss some of the needs. I mention, in passing, the serious shortage of trained social workers in Canada. I am glad to see that grants are proposed again this year to assist schools of social work in Canada. They are needing assistance because they will need to turn out more and more young people trained for social work if we are to have any hope at all of meeting the needs in this field. We cannot hope to hold our social welfare workers in Canada in places where they are so badly needed at the present time unless their salaries are commensurate with the need and importance of their work. We have been losing, over a period of years, many of our best trained social workers to the United States and in other avenues of employment, because of the inadequacy of the remuneration offered to them in welfare organizations and in public service at various levels of government.

My concluding observation in this preliminary debate is this. In the vitally important fields of national health and national welfare there can be no standing still. New needs are pressing upon us all the time as life becomes more complicated on the social side. On the health side the tremendous loss that ill health and disease take in toll each year has made such an impression on the Canadian people that I believe they are fully convinced that the health of all the people of Canada is the concern of all the people of Canada. I am glad that there will be an opportunity later, on the supplementary appropriations to develop our views on this point further. I leave this thought before the committee. Whatever promises to assist in meeting our problems with respect to national health will, I am sure, be readily subscribed to by all parts of the house.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, perhaps this is a department the estimates of which would be best dealt with item by item as we go through them. In other words, it might be well for us to limit our discussion on this general item. Accordingly, I shall try and follow my own advice and make my remarks brief at this time; but I should like to indicate a few of the subjects in which we feel the people of Canada are particularly interested, and concerning which we shall have something to say as we go through the various items.

First of all, I want to say that I accept the suggestion and the ruling of the Chair that we wait until we reach the supplementary estimates before we discuss the government's recently announced health program. That, of course, is one of the features of the work of this department which, at the moment, attracts great interest because it is new, and because it is a beginning which we hope will develop into something really worthwhile in the not too distant future.

However, as we go through these estimates which are before us today, I note that there is again the usual item covering health insurance studies. I hope that when we reach that item the minister will have something to say about it. I remind him that last year we were disappointed over here—the disappointment was expressed in particular by my colleague, the hon. member for Mackenzie—to discover that all the money voted the previous year for this purpose had not been expended. In fact we felt that not sufficient work was being done in this field. I note now that there is a decrease in the amount asked for under health insurance studies this year. I am sorry to note that. It seems to me that the opposite ought to be the case.

Mr. MARTIN: If the hon. member will wait until the item is called I can explain it.

Mr. KNOWLES: All I am saying is that I am warning the minister that this is an item in which we are particularly interested.

Another item which we shall have something to say about relates to the question of family allowances, and I should like to ask the minister to be ready in particular to tell us whether consideration has been given to the request made to him a number of times regarding children of immigrants coming to this country. That is a point which the hon. member for Dauphin made most recently the other evening. We feel that it is unfair to children who come to this country to be put to the disadvantage of being denied the benefit of family allowances until they have been here for three years.

When the family allowances legislation was brought in it was emphasized by the Prime Minister that it was for the children, and that they were not to suffer any disabilities for causes over which they had no control. A case in point is that of illegitimate children. It was pointed out that it was not their fault, and that they should get the benefit of the allowances, as they do, and rightly so. It is hardly a comparable case, but in a sense it is, and I suggest that this is an amendment to the act—if that is the way it has to be done—that is overdue. I hope the minister will have something to say about it when the item is reached. I do not recall whether we had a great deal of discussion about this phase of the matter when the bill was before the house in 1944. The likelihood is that at that time we were not thinking in terms of the more extensive immigration that we are having at the present time.

Another of the items in which we are particularly interested is that relating to blind pensions. I speak of blind persons separately from old age pension recipients to emphasize the fact that the time has come for special legislation for these people. The minister knows of the representations that have been made by the various organizations representing the blind, and I hope that we might get some word from the minister this year as to changes which might be in prospect with reference to legislation affecting the blind.

In particular I should like to urge that the time has come for us to spend a little more money on the prevention of blindness. It seems to be the case—maybe I am overstating it so as to drive home my point—that a person who is in danger of becoming blind is unable to get financial assistance that might be necessary to procure the medical attention to prevent it. Rather, he is told to go back home and wait until the blindness has overtaken him and then he can qualify for the pension. As I say, Mr. Chairman, maybe I have overstated it a bit, but I have done so to emphasize the point, and I hope that the minister may have something to say along this line that will indicate some new and better legislation with respect to blindness and blind pensions.

Lastly, when we reach the item having to do with old age pensions I hope that we may have some better news from the minister than has yet been forecast during this session. The day that the Prime Minister made his announcement about the health program there were rumours about that announcement around this house of rumours in which we live. The rumour was partly correct, but only partly, because many people around thought the announcement was also going to contain some amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act itself. I hope that the minister will have something to say to us along that line, while we are dealing with his estimates.

I know it is only a year since we amended the Old Age Pensions Act and raised the basic amount to $30 a month. Once an amendment like that has been made, there is always a tendency to sit back and accept it as sufficient for the time being; but I submit to the minister that what has happened to the cost of living—and as chairman of a certain committee he knows all about it—during the year which has passed since the amendment was made, calls for an improvement in the standard of living that we make possible for our old age pensioners. I hope that the minister will not try to pass this back to the provinces again. We can indulge in that kind of political warfare if we want to among the various provinces of this country, but I hope that we shall not do that here in this house. The thing that I deplore is that this question has been made a football, passed back and forth from one level of government to another, with the result that the old age pension varies from province to province, and the old age pensioners themselves are the victims.

I feel strongly that the time has come to increase the amount and to put it on a nation-wide basis. There are two or three different approaches to this question which I suggest to the minister. One would be the implementation of the federal government's offer to the provinces back in 1945. I feel that the failure of two provinces to sign dominion-provincial financial agreements is not sufficient excuse for the failure of the government to go ahead with the implementation of these proposals, at least for the people of the provinces that have agreed. But I go further than that. I do not feel that the people in the two central provinces should suffer because their provincial governments have not seen fit to make certain agreements with the federal authorities at Ottawa.

Mr. FLEMING: They are not suffering.

Mr. TIMMINS: They will look after themselves. You talk about Saskatchewan.

Mr. KNOWLES: If my hon. friends want to make interjections like that I will tell them that in the province of Saskatchewan an extra $5 has been added to the basic $30 by the provincial government.

Mr. TIMMINS: After you took it away.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just a minute. They have added an extra $5, and that $5 is being paid to the old age pensioner of Saskatchewan. It averages out to something like $4.42 per pensioner, which added to the average that the Saskatchewan old age pensioner gets on the basis of the basic $30, brings the average per pensioner up to $34 a month, while the average in Ontario—where so much has been said about an extra $10—is only $31 a month.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): In view of the preliminary ruling which was given, I think we have gone afield in the discussion of the first item so far as this matter is concerned. I did not wish to interrupt my hon. friend until he had finished his additions, but we should confine ourselves to the item before us.

Mr. KNOWLES: The point of order taken at the beginning was clear. Those of us who have spoken have respected the ruling of the Chair, which was that we were not to discuss the recently announced health program but should leave that until the supplementary estimates dealing with it are before us.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): But the Chairman added that we should confine ourselves to the rules under item 1.

Mr. KNOWLES: Item 1 is departmental administration, governing the work of the department, and as a matter of fact I am covering some of the same items that were dealt with by the hon. member for Eglinton.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I will withdraw my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: I should point out that if general discussion is allowed on the first item, no particular item should be discussed in detail. We will call the items and then there can be a discussion on each item. I shall leave it to hon. members not to transgress the rule that discussion should be strictly relevant to the item under consideration when we are in committee.

Mr. KNOWLES: I assure you, Mr. Chairman, I am seeking to avoid any transgression of the rules, and had there not been these interruptions I would have been through and back in my seat before now. I tried to indicate the things that we are interested in, so that the minister might be ready to deal with them as we come to the various items, and in another sentence or two I would have been through.

In addition to the possibility of implementing the federal government's proposal to the provinces in 1945, in respect of old age pensions, I would say that the government should also consider a higher amount than they proposed at that time, which was $30 a month to all persons seventy years of age and over, without any means test.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member for Calgary West was certainly correct. What you are doing now is discussing specific items. When we come to old age pensions, that is the place to make an argument. You are putting me in the difficult position of having either to reply or not to reply. The proper place for the discussion of a particular question is under the item covering it.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is strange that neither the hon. member for Calgary West nor the minister said a word during the speech of the hon. member for Eglinton. I assumed he was in order, and he not only dealt with the individual items on page 33 of the estimates, but turned to the details on pages 190 to 201. This whole point of order is one that we have to get straightened out some time.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I did not say anything, but I thought the hon. member for Eglinton was out of order, and I still think so, but I am not supposed to get up and check him. That is not my job.

Mr. KNOWLES: One more sentence or two and I shall have finished. The other point I wish to make is that the people of Canada feel that the time has come for a complete overhauling of our old age security legislation. It is time to put it on a contributory basis, because what we wish to achieve is a complete, over-all program of social security which will protect the Canadian people against all circumstances beyond their control, and which, in particular, will provide adequate and dignified security in old age.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I hope I shall not transgress any more than anyone else has done. In any event, I shall be only two or three minutes. There are two things in which I am particularly interested. One is the treatment of the blind, which I can find in the details; the other is the question of arthritis, which I am not bright enough to find in the details. I will ask the minister, before we rise at six o'clock, to let me know roughly where it will appear. A third thing I want to do is to ask the minister, at some time during his estimates, to prepare a table, which should not be a difficult matter, taking the progressive population of Canada and the progressive use of hospital beds and making a comparison. I think the minister will see what I am driving at. I know there are shortages of hospital beds, but if the hospital-bed occupancy is increasing beyond the population increase, there are certain conclusions we might draw, and I do not think that would be a matter of great difficulty.

I am very much inclined to think that in this department we should have some such method as that suggested by the hon. member for Eglinton, or a variation of it, where we members of parliament might have a preliminary examination of the estimates. That is particularly true of this department. Take finance; we all have some knowledge of that. In this department, however, we are dealing with operations within the department, of which we as laymen are perhaps in the most complete ignorance. I know I am in that situation with respect to these various matters. Take the word "arthritis". If we were in committee it would be of great value to me to examine, in the most friendly way of course, and purely for the purpose of getting information, and not at all critically, to find out what these professional people have been doing by way of research and so on. It would help us all to answer the many letters we get, dealing with a subject like this.

In the estimates there are some big words the meaning of which I do not know. I have no idea whether this or that word stands for some part of the human body or something used in the laboratory. I do not know what it is. I think a committee, a reasonably large one, to which the rest of us might be invited to sit in and listen, would be advisable. We could hear doctors and physicists, research people and chemists, giving us in ordinary language an account of their accomplishments or their failures; in any event, what they have been trying to do. In this department, above all, that would be valuable to all of us, and I am certain it would help us intelligently to examine the estimates. If it did no more than broaden our own education it might be worthwhile, I hope I have not breached the rules any more than I said I would.

Mr. SHAW: An examination of the individual items indicates to us that there is hardly a subject which is not dealt with under some specific appropriation. I shall therefore refrain absolutely from making any reference whatsoever to those matters mentioned in the separate items.

During the course of two or three or possibly more years, and again today, the hon. member for Eglinton has reminded the house of a resolution which he proposed. It is a resolution which he has had on the order paper for some time, calling for an amendment to standing order 63, which would result, of course, in the setting up of a committee of the house on health and welfare. I for one stand solidly in support of his motion. I cannot understand why there should be any hesitation whatsoever on the part of the minister or the government themselves in recommending and advocating the establishment of such a committee. I am one who happened to be a member of the social security committee of the House of Commons which sat for a couple of years. I regard the experience I obtained as a consequence of being a member of that committee as being of inestimable value.

These estimates always seems to come before the house during the dying hours or days of a session. It seems hardly fair, when one realizes the importance of national health and welfare, that we should be placed in the position of being given such a limited opportunity not only of expressing our views but of acquiring the many facts relevant to these two important subjects. I realize that in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne or possibly during the budget debate we can make reference to health matters; but the minister is not always here, and he cannot be expected to be. Therefore, as a rule we find ourselves just talking with no opportunity of securing information or of asking questions. Consequently I urge that appropriate action be taken to amend standing order 63 for the purpose of setting up a committee which can sit throughout the months of a session and do the important work which I believe such a committee can do. Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I shall go no farther at the moment because, as I stated earlier, there is to be an opportunity to discuss the many other items in which I am particularly interested.

Mr. BLAIR: I find it difficult this afternoon to follow this discussion. Owing to the fact that the supplementary estimates are to be introduced at a later time, also to the fact that we cannot consider some of the items on the list without coming to the same discussion which would sooner or later entail these supplementary estimates—

Mr. MARTIN: That is right.

Mr. BLAIR:—I shall confine my attention to a few remarks in general, and reserve any criticism I have for that future time when we have been promised an opportunity of discussing these items.

I am interested in the matter of the setting up of this house committee referred to by the hon. member for Eglinton and the hon. member for Red Deer. That resolution has been on the order paper for two successive years.

Mr. FLEMING: Four.

Mr. BLAIR: The hon. member says it is four. We should really do something about it. It is true that we have in this house a voluntary committee on public health, but that is more in the nature of an entertainment committee. I readily enjoy going to those meetings. The subjects under consideration are often technical in nature. We enjoy the lectures and the social part of the proceedings. But from the viewpoint of accomplishing anything in the way of national health or public health, I think it is a waste of time. A little while ago the hon. member for Calgary West said he was confused in regard to technical matters. We have had two or three fine lectures which would be really hard to follow if one did not have some acquaintance with the subject itself. All hon. members are not well versed in these technical matters.

Having regard to national health conditions in Canada, I feel that this house owes more to its members than just this voluntary committee on health that we have. The chairman of it is doing a good job, but it is an unfortunate fact that we have a secretary from outside the house, and with no connection with it whatsoever, who arranges the meetings and the subjects discussed. While that is all very well and convenient, something is lacking. If we had a committee of the house on health, with members appointed by the various parties, at whose meetings members of the house could be present and listen to the discussion, I believe it would be a step in the right direction.

Certain vital matters were placed before the house, and I believe that more opportunity should be given to discuss some of these questions than is afforded by a few hours on the estimates. Very few of the items before us today do not dovetail in some place with the supplementary estimates. If, for instance, this proposed committee were set up and members of the house had an opportunity of listening to the people called in by this committee as experts, they would be better educated in the subject of national health. It is only necessary to look around the chamber today to see the small interest that is shown in these matters. The average member says that these are matters for the people who are dealing with national health, such as the doctors and the minister. Their attitude is that they do not know anything about it but will do whatever is right and will vote any appropriations that are necessary. Therefore I agree with the hon. member for Eglinton.

I brought this matter up a year ago. I made an appeal for a committee of this house to examine into certain things. There are two salient facts before this house and we should not lose sight of them. As I have repeated time and time again in this house, you cannot get by the fact that forty-two per cent to forty-four per cent of the young men who were called up for service were found to be unfit. If the percentage of unfitness was so low in that group, there is no doubt that it is much lower in other age groups. From the standpoint of national defence, no nation can be strong with forty-two per cent to forty-four per cent of its young men unfit.

The other fact to which I referred is one which cannot be disputed. We congratulate the minister or any other person concerned that the infant mortality rate is gradually dropping. At the present time it is 5·2 per thousand of live births. But you cannot get away from the fact that the percentage in the United States is 3·8. That nation has a large southern population and large cities with large congested areas. It does not stand to reason that in this country, with twelve million people, we should have a higher infant mortality rate than has the United States. Something is radically wrong. Such matters as cancer, tuberculosis and that sort of thing will naturally come up when the supplementary estimates are discussed, as will also the question of hospital beds and in fact practically all the most important items that come up in the main estimates.

Mr. MARTIN: Everything.

Mr. BLAIR: So that I reserve any criticism and anything else I may have to say until that time. I think we are wasting time to duplicate the discussion.

Mr. MARTIN: I hope there will be some praise, too.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

The CHAIRMAN: The committee was considering item 520, radio receiving licences.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—Railway and steamship service—

525. Steep Rock mines, construction, $256,900.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to speak briefly about item 525 and, if I am permitted, at the same time to refer to item 526. I am pleased to see that Steep Rock mines are given support, first, in the construction item, 525, and, then, in the subsidy item, 526.

I hold in my hand a piece of Steep Rock iron. It is the best iron I have seen anywhere. I have never seen ore with so much real iron in it as this from Steep Rock. I might add that I have not seen iron from Labrador but, if at all possible, I am going there this summer.

I do know the Steep Rock iron, however, and it is so good that, without any further treatment, it can be put right into the smelters, like scrap iron.

Mr. REID: What is the sulphur content of it?

Mr. MacNICOL: Very low sulphur content. It is the purest iron ore I have seen. At Steep Rock there is a very large deposit. There are three areas of ore in the three branches of Steep Rock lake. The ore in one of those branches has already been opened, and I believe over a million tons were shipped last year. The minister would know whether I am correct or not.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: The aim is for 2,000,000 tons this year, and it is hoped in a few years time to reach 5,000,000 tons per year. Unfortunately—perhaps fortunately, owing to the dollar crisis—practically all this quantity is now being shipped to the United States. I look forward to the time when large quantities of the ore will remain here in Canada. Under the present set-up, however, I suppose it is necessary to ship as much as possible to the United States.

In my view, by making these votes available, the government is taking the proper procedure. I understand that the first vote is to help remove the overburden from the second ore bed, and the removal of that overburden will cost a large amount of money. They will take it out by steam-shovel, as they are now doing in the first bed.

The whole Steep Rock enterprise is a remarkable tribute to a number of Canadians. The first of these is the late Joseph Errington of Toronto. It was his vision and his persistence, along with that of Julius Cross of Port Arthur, that this venture was made possible. I believe Mr. Cross is a friend of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. Certainly they are citizens of the same community; I do not know just how friendly they are. Then, there was the dynamic president, Major-General Hogarth, and an American friend—a former Canadian—Mr. Cyrus Eaton of Cleveland. These four men developed this enterprise and deserve credit for it. They now bring in United States dollars, so that is what the government saved, and through the bringing in of these United States funds more than paid for the subsidy the government is granting. In other words, we are getting something for nothing. There can be no doubt that this is a worthwhile proposition and one which deserves support.

I am convinced that when production reaches about 5,000,000 tons a year, sufficient of it will remain in Canada to enable a great expansion in the steel mills at Sault Ste. Marie, where they now use the low-grade ore from the Helen Mountain mine. This type of ore would be most beneficial when added to that low-grade product.

I have no doubt that in due course a steel mill will be erected near Windsor. A few years ago an attempt was made to erect a steel mill at Ojibway, near Windsor, and the old blast furnaces are still standing there. There is no reason why Windsor should not be the centre of a great steel industry. As a matter of fact, the demand for steel across the river in Detroit would be tremendous. That would be a great thing for the Windsor area, as well as for Ontario and Canada.

Then, I heard that some of this ore is being shipped to Hamilton, where there is a blast furnace. It would be helpful to that plant to have that supply, and to expand its operations. I hope to see the day when we shall have a blast furnace in Toronto. Then ships coming down the lakes could unload some iron ore at Sault Ste. Marie, some at Ojibway, a further quantity at Port Colborne—there was a blast furnace there at one time; I do not know whether it is still there—some at Hamilton and, if we had a blast furnace at Toronto, a further quantity could be unloaded there. We have a good location in Toronto for this type of industry, and it would be of great advantage to the city.

I should like to see Steep Rock mines developed to the extent Major-General Hogarth tells me is possible. They are under the impression that in those three ore beds they have perhaps 500,000,000 tons of ore—perhaps more. It is about the same quality as comes from the Mesabi range in Minnesota. The minister has my sincere and full support in the two votes for the development of the Steep Rock mines.

Mr. CHURCH: Last year when this vote was before the committee, I happened to be out of the chamber, and for that reason I should like to say a few words this evening. The votes are for construction and subsidies at Steep Rock mines. Last year there was a long debate respecting the Labrador ore, and we now find that we have this rich ore bed at Steep Rock.

I should like to refer to two of the gentlemen in this company, Mr. Cyrus S. Eaton of Cleveland, who was born at Pugwash, and was a schoolmate of the hon. member for Cumberland. I would refer also to Mr. William R. Daley, also of that company. These gentlemen have been large contributors to Canadian universities and charitable institutions, and they are public-spirited Canadians. In addition to his interest in this ore bed, Mr. Cyrus S. Eaton has had a strong influence on the history of Toronto, because he was instrumental in building five large buildings, on Bay street. There was the Federal building, the Sterling building, another building at the corner of Sheppard and Richmond streets, and two or three others. They did a great deal between the two wars and at the end of the last war to create employment for bricklayers, carpenters and others. They did considerable developing on Bay street and in the downtown business section. They also carried on work in other cities. They secured money at low rates of interest for the municipalities of this country, and considerable money was invested in Canadian enterprise. I cannot speak too highly of the work they did. Cyrus Eaton has been engaged in many enterprises on both sides of the border.

I believe in this development of New Ontario. Some day I hope to see a smelter there which should lead to further industrial expansion. I commend the measure to the government and I tell them that I appreciate what they have done. One of the things that held New Ontario back, something to which I have referred before, was the lack of cheap light and power. In the early days in 1909 and 1910 one of the few mistakes made by Sir James Whitney was not to electrify the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railroad. That would have provided light and power to New Ontario. Had that been done, the production of gold, silver and other metals would have been much greater. Under private ownership power at Cochrane cost $60 per horsepower, but they now have a magnificent hydro-electric development which has proved a great boon to the mines.

One of the things that held the mines back was heavy overhead and the difficulty of getting power. This development will create more employment and will prove a good investment for this country in the areas where these mines are situated.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to ask a few questions on items 525 and 526. First, who are the owners of Steep Rock mines? Second, toward what kind of construction is this contribution being made? Third, what is the nature of the subsidy? Fourth, how much has the government of Canada contributed for construction purposes and by way of subsidies? Fifth, what return does the government receive for this money?

Mr. CHEVRIER: In answer to the first question, may I say that the mines are owned by a private company, the directors of which are mostly United States citizens. Then, as to what the assistance is for, the first vote is for capital requirements, while the second is for a subsidy. The first vote of $256,900 is for the construction of additional trackage made up as follows: a spur track at Port Arthur, $101,900; a spur track at Atikokan, $53,500. Then there are other small items such as lighting and mooring facilities, making a total of $170,790. The rest of the item is for the acquisition of equipment in the form of two gantry cranes and one car shaker. It was found difficult to separate the ore on account of solidification, and in order to facilitate unloading at Port Arthur these gantry cranes were purchased by the Canadian National Railways, who are operating the spur line and the ore dock. They have been found to be of great assistance thus far. The total amount of money spent in construction costs and the provision of facilities for handling ore from Steep Rock Iron Mines Limited to the end of March, 1948, amounts to $2,948,574. The Department of Transport has received $130,205 by way of amortization of the costs. There is a subsidy of twenty cents per ton on the first five million tons of ore handled, paid to the Canadian National Railways. Thus far 2,539,000 gross tons have been handled, for which a subsidy of $692,821 has been paid.

Mr. MacINNIS: Between what points is the ore shipped on which this subsidy is paid?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is shipped from Atikokan to Port Arthur, there loaded on ships destined for certain ports in the United States.

Mr. MacINNIS: The subsidy paid is in connection with the rail shipment from the mine to where it is put on board ship?

Mr. CHEVRIER: To the Port Arthur ore dock.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. MacINNIS: I imagine that the figures the minister gave would not include the items now before us, because he said they included up to March 31, 1948, and these items have not yet been approved. The total of the items he gave is something over $3,500,000. What is the expected return to Canada? We own this ore; it is a Canadian natural resource, and I should like to know what return Canada can expect from this outlay of money. Is any royalty paid on the ore taken out? How much ore has been taken out up to the present time?

Mr. CHEVRIER: As I stated a moment ago, roughly 2,500,000 tons. The advantage to Canada is that by the export of this ore, which is highly rated, to the United States, we are able to get a better quota of iron ore for our own mills. We are able to derive much needed United States dollars at a time when there is a shortage. In those two respects the government have found this a profitable enterprise, and not only profitable but essential. During the war years and since, there has been a great shortage of iron ore and steel, and it was felt that this subsidy as well as the capital expenditure which was approved and provided for during the war years should be continued.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister said we had a claim on a proportion of this 2,500,000 tons of ore that was shipped to the United States and processed there. What proportion of that 2,500,000 tons represents Canada's quota in the form of steel billets or whatever it may be?

Mr. CHEVRIER: During the war years, as the hon. gentleman knows, many of our resources were pooled, and these particular resources were pooled to some extent. By virtue of an arrangement which was made in the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, then Munitions and Supply, we were able to secure, because of these shipments to the United States, a larger quota for our mills than we otherwise would have received. I am sorry I cannot give the hon. gentleman the figures, but I am sure that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, if he were here, would know the answer.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think it is an important point. This ore is a Canadian natural resource, part of the potential and real wealth of Canada, and we ought to know what accrues to us in a tangible form out of this transaction.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is so. I will endeavour to get the information for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. KNOWLES: I share the satisfaction expressed by the hon. member for Davenport that this resource is being developed. I also share his sense of amazement at the accomplishment itself. I, too, had the privilege of visiting Atikokan and Steep Rock mines and seeing this operation. But at the same time I feel that the observation of the hon. member for Vancouver East is absolutely correct when he draws attention to the fact that the basis of this whole operation is a natural resource which belongs to the people of Canada. What is happening now is that it is being alienated from the people of Canada and to a large extent being shipped out of the country. I think the hon. member for Davenport expressed the hope that we ought to have more mills in our own country making use of this raw material, and I agree.

There is nothing new about what is happening in this connection. It is a story we have had over and over again, and when one contemplates the tremendous, the almost incalculable wealth which is buried under what used to be Steep Rock lake and which it is now possible literally to scoop up with those huge electric shovels, it does seem to some of us a tragedy that this resource is being alienated from the people of Canada.

The question I would ask the minister is this. Has our contribution from the public treasury been confined solely to transportation facilities, such as the spur line from Steep Rock to Atikokan and the facilities at Port Arthur? My second question is this. Have we paid the whole cost of those transportation facilities that have been provided?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman asks, first, whether this expenditure has been directed toward transportation facilities only. I would think the answer is yes. There is an order in council covering it. It has been tabled and I thought I had it with me, but I did not bring it. It provides for the manner in which the capital expenditure shall be made, and my recollection is that it has to do with the construction cost of transportation facilities and the ore dock for the loading and unloading of ore. The subsidy is, of course, exclusively directed toward the freight rate.

Mr. KNOWLES: Have we paid for the whole facilities—the spur from Steep Rock to Atikokan, the facilities at Steep Rock for loading the ore, the special cars carrying the ore from Steep Rock to Atikokan, and the dock facilities and trackage necessary at Port Arthur?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is quite a bit of assistance we have given.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: What are the freight charges per ton from Atikokan to Port Arthur?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The rate is $1.32.

Mr. MacINNIS: And the dominion government is paying twenty cents of that?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Chairman, I have no financial interest in this undertaking and no personal interest, but I have a great pride in this development. The person responsible for it has already been referred to by the hon. member for Broadview and the hon. member for Davenport. It was Mr. Cyrus S. Eaton, a country boy from my own constituency, from Pugwash in Nova Scotia. It took tremendous courage on his part and tremendous effort in convincing many people that this very difficult undertaking could be accomplished. I am pleased that the minister and his department have co-operated in this development.

Mr. Eaton is one of the great industrialists of the United States, also one of its great educationists and one of its great philanthropists, and it is with great pride that those of us who come from Cumberland and Nova Scotia watch his accomplishments. It is our regret that he and so many others have had to leave our province. He had an uncle born near where he was born, Hon. Doctor Charles A. Eaton, who is and has been for some time chairman of the foreign relations committee of the house of representatives in the United States. He has headed that committee through these troublous times.

A short distance from where Cyrus Eaton was born, J. D. Johnson was also born and brought up. He is head of the Canada Cement Company. A few miles away, Doctor Simon Newcombe, one of the great astronomers of all time, was born. The historic sites and monuments board has erected a tablet to his memory.

These are only a few of the men whom our section of the country has contributed to the life of Canada and the life of this continent, and, I might add, the world. So it is with pride that I support this vote in order that we may assist Mr. Eaton and his associates in developing this great Canadian resource.

Mr. TIMMINS: I take some pleasure in following the hon. member for Cumberland in his remarks in respect of this venture, particularly having regard to the fact that a question was asked a short while ago—I do not think the minister quite answered it—as to why this iron ore has been shipped to the United States to be smelted. In the first place,

I understand that in Canada we have only three large iron ore mines, and that to date iron ore mining is one of the greatest and most expensive ventures that we have in the country.

I know something about the venture that has been undertaken by the Steep Rock mines company. It has been not only a venture; it has been an adventure to bring an iron mine into production in Canada. I am told by the officials in the Department of Mines that there is just not enough money in Canada to provide the kind of machinery necessary to produce and smelt the iron ore from our own Canadian mines, and that, therefore, in order that we in Canada may get the benefit of the iron ore, we must transport it to the United States. We all hope that the time will come when we shall get iron ore in Canada in large enough quantities that we shall be able to smelt it and fabricate it here. I am all for a venture of this sort. I commend the minister and his department for what they have done to facilitate it.

I am one of those who believe that the future of this country is bound up with the finding and the producing of iron ore. Probably it will be the salvation of this country, which will never come through the dollar conservation policy as we have it at the present time.

So that we may keep the record clear on this matter, I should like the minister to tell the committee if I am not correct in saying we have not just the kind of money that is needed to buy the machinery to put into operation the facilities which are necessary to produce and smelt iron ore into steel and ingots in Canada, and that is what causes the transportation of this iron ore to the United States. If I am wrong in that I wish the minister would correct me.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman is far from wrong, and I commend him on his attitude in connection with this vote. But in order to put a statement on the record, I suppose I should go back to what happened during the war years. There was a time in 1941 and 1942 and again in 1943 when steel was in very short supply, not only here but also in the United States. It was required, as hon. gentlemen know, for all kinds of construction, but particularly for war purposes. It was felt by the government at that time that a contribution of this sort was little enough for a venture of the kind that was undertaken at Atikokan. The order in council which was passed in 1942 sets out that the development of the mine would be advantageous to Canada and a protection against a possible shortage of ore to meet war requirements. It is true that the war is over, and to that extent the position has changed; but the position has not changed in so far as the shortage of iron and steel is concerned. Anyone who has to build ships or planes, or to make additions or extensions to industry, knows how difficult it is to get iron and steel. I have in mind several examples at the moment in my own department where the construction of ships is being held up, or the date on which a ship was to have been delivered is delayed because of lack of the required steel. Therefore, as I said a moment ago, the purpose of this in the war years was to pool some of our resources. We pooled our shipping; we also pooled this, and from it we got treatment other than we would have received had we not been able to place this in the pool. Moreover, as I said a moment ago, we are getting much needed United States dollars.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wonder whether the minister would explain to me just how we are getting United States dollars here. I do not doubt the minister when he says we are getting United States dollars. In view of the fact that a United States company owns the mine, is the ore taken out of that mine, sold to buyers in the United States, and does Canada thereby get United States dollars? If not, I shall be glad to know just how we acquire United States dollars from the mining of this ore.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Perhaps I can get the information before the evening is over.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister has not the information now?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No. I should draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that this operation is carried on through our agents, the Canadian National Railways. There was an opportunity for a full discussion of this matter in the committee. However, I think the hon. gentleman should have that information.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to support this vote. There has been some talk about the natural resources of Canada going to the United States. Another point was made that we were wasting the assets of Canada. This talk has been coming from hon. members to my left. I should like to point out to the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this vote that, had it not been for the United States allowing us to take our iron from the Mesabi range for a number of years, to the extent of hundreds of thousands of tons a year, we would never have had any steel business in the great lakes area. I am all for more mills to produce our own ore. We shall get that some of these days, but in the meantime we have to send our extra iron ore somewhere. It is up to us to return some of the iron ore we have taken all these years.

With respect to the venture, something has been said about Mr. Eaton and what he had to do with this venture. I should like to say something about some of the fellows in this country who have had something to do with it. One of these is General Hogarth who was very much interested in it from the start. I know of one man who has since died. He was one of the engineers on the job. They did not know whether they would be able to get the water out of that lake to get at the iron ore. It was a marvellous venture that they went into, and I am proud of the men who went into it. I support the vote.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Would the minister not agree with me that, so far as getting United States dollars from this is concerned, it is a case of a Canadian company selling goods in the United States and getting United States money for its product?

Mr. KNOWLES: This is a United States company.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The hon. gentlemen are confusing shareholders of the company with the company. This is a Canadian company selling its goods in the United States and getting United States dollars for doing so.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Has the minister any information on the possible lifetime of this venture in terms of years? How long are we likely to be able to extract ore from these Steep Rock mines?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not know the amount of ore that is there, but I understand that it is likely to continue for quite some time.

Mr. MacNICOL: When I spoke I said the best engineering reports available are that there are approximately half a billion tons of ore there. There are three beds, two of them in one lake and one in a third lake. Our own railway, the Canadian National, has already received between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000 in freight that they never would have had otherwise, because the amount of freight over that particular railroad was not of great magnitude.

In addition to that, there are at Steep Rock some 300 high-paid men. Better still, all the officials at Steep Rock, the engineers and geologists, are young Canadians. I have forgotten the name of the manager, but he is a young Canadian from the maritimes. The country may well be proud of what these young Canadians have done in developing the Steep Rock mines. It has been indeed a regular gold mine as far as returns to the country are concerned.

Civil aviation division—Airways and airports—

527. Operation and maintenance of municipal and other airports, $448,557.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman, I think I can shorten my remarks to a large extent if you will allow me to read a twenty-five word telegram I have received. If I can put this telegram on the record it will end my remarks on this subject. It has to do with a matter I raised yesterday with reference to Fredericton airport. My memory has been somewhat refreshed by the telegram which I wish to put on the record.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but we are now dealing with airways and airports, operation and maintenance of municipal and other airports, and as he knows, I said there was no vote for the Fredericton airport. There being no vote for it, if my hon. friend is going to read into the record a telegram having to do with that airport, I submit with deference that he is not in order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have no objection. I was only trying to shorten the proceedings. The minister cannot tell me that I cannot deal with a matter which is not in the estimates if I wish to ask that it be put in the estimates. I can suggest anything I like.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not telling the hon. gentleman anything. I do not usually tell people things or instruct them to do things. I try to handle my work in the house as courteously as I can, and I do not like his telling me that I told him anything. I do not tell people what to do. I am submitting to the Chairman that if the hon. gentleman is going to read a telegram having to do with the airport in Fredericton he is out of order, and if the Chairman thinks I am wrong he can put me right.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I do not know what the telegram is about. I do not know whether it refers to this item or does not. The rules, however, are clear. Any speech in committee must be strictly relevant to the item before the committee. I do not know what the telegram is.

Mr. GRAYDON: I will not put it on the record. In the circumstances I shall have some remarks to make with respect to the question.

The minister has made a submission to the Chair, to put it in that way, and I assure him that I did not reflect upon his courtesy. I know the department is a difficult one to administer and he has been a long time on his estimates. I have no wish to take up any extra time. I submit, however, that where airports and airways are mentioned in the estimates, it is not possible for you, Mr. Chairman, under the rules to order me to say nothing about a matter which I think should be in the estimates. That is done every day in connection with many estimates, for so long a time as the minister and I have been in the house. If I may, I should like to refresh the mind of the committee in respect of this matter, and it will shorten the proceedings if I read this telegram:

Fredericton

Fredericton airport Howe definitely promised me railway committee 1944 government would build airport no strings attached like site now provided by city costing one hundred thousand whole thing disgraceful in view promises made by him and present member during by election.,

R. B. Hanson

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not wish to get into a discussion with the hon. gentleman, but it just shows that the point I attempted to make was pertinent. The item under which construction of airports should have been discussed was item 511, and we spent considerable time on it. This is municipal airports. Fredericton is not in existence so far as an airport is concerned.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation division—

528. Care, operation and maintenance of Royal Canadian Air Force airfields transferred to the Department of Transport, $433,500.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): There are several items that seem to overlap, and "seem" is perhaps the right word. The minister will remember the question I asked yesterday or the day before, regarding which he was going to make a statement.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I will.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): When does the minister propose to do that, at the end?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If the minister could make that statement now it might obviate questions I should like to ask at the moment. However, if he prefers we can go ahead with this.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The statement I propose to make is fairly lengthy and covers the whole government policy of air services and airports generally, and I thought perhaps I might leave it until the end.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Then may I ask a question regarding care, operation and maintenance of Royal Canadian Air Force airfields transferred to the Department of Transport? Am I right in saying that this in a sense is a duplication of certain previous items, or is this purely operation and maintenance, and were the previous ones exclusively construction?

Mr. CHEVRIER: This is not a duplication of any of the previous items. These are airports that have been taken over by the air force. They are airports that are no longer used for air force purposes. They are turned over to us either for disposal or for operation. We look them over and those we decide that we cannot operate profitably or economically—when I say profitably I do not mean from a financial point of view—we turn over to war assets for disposal, and the others we operate. In this vote of $433,000 odd, eight of the airports have been taken over by us and operated, and in respect of nine, we act as caretakers only until such time as they can be disposed of by war assets.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Has the minister any idea of disposing of all these airports? What may not be at the present moment a useful piece of equipment in the form of a landing field may possibly lend itself to development in the future. You cannot sell an airstrip for anything. It seems to me that the care and maintenance would be a very small item of expenditure, and it might be wiser for the department to keep them under its control before it goes about disposing of them. I can understand disposing of the buildings that have a salvageable value, but I think we might be well advised to keep these airports under the minister's control for some time until we see what can be done with them.

Mr. CHEVRIER: We follow this practice. We never dispose of an airport or an airfield or aerodrome which national defence feels might have some value for national defence purposes in the future.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I suggest that any money spent in maintaining these airports is well spent. It is a good investment. The minister's officials can keep an eye on them and see that they are taken care of in the matter of drainage and so on. A concrete strip can be easily ruined.

Mr. CHEVRIER: We endeavour to maintain them.

Mr. MacINNIS: How many of these airports or airfields are there, and where are they located?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The vote provides for the transfer of seventeen such fields from national defence to the Department of Transport. Eight of them will be fully maintained and operated by the Department of Transport. They are as follows: Comox; Whitehorse; Medicine Hat; Mount Hope, Ontario; Quebec; Sydney, N.S.; Torbay; and Yarmouth. Nine are provided for on a maintenance basis; that is, we keep a caretaker there until such time as we can dispose of them.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): May we have the names of those that are being maintained?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Massett, British Columbia; Terrace, Vanderhoof, Woodcock, Bowden, Claresholm, Shepard, Chatham and Maitland.

Mr. CARDIFF: What ones in Ontario?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mount Hope, Ontario, is one we are maintaining and operating.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Is the Massett airstrip being maintained so that it is feasible to land on it?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The answer is yes.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): In the names of the airports which the minister said he was maintaining, I did not hear him read out the name of Tofino.

Mr. CHEVRIER: We are operating Tofino. Tofino is not under this vote. These are airports taken over from the R.C.A.F. in this particular vote.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Tofino is not being operated. It is only being maintained at the present time. This is one of your bigger airports on the Pacific coast.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I get an answer to that and give it a little later?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Yes.

Mr. STUART (Charlotte): Is the airport at Pennfield being operated?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, it is.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation division—Northwest communication system—

531. To provide for the difference between the expenditures for operation and maintenance and revenue accruing from operations during the year ending March 31, 1949, not exceeding $728,412.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will this item be covered by the minister's statement? If so, I will not ask any questions on it now. Otherwise I would want to get some information.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not want to be unfair to the hon. gentlemen. In the statement which I will make I shall not deal with details or with particular votes. I shall refer to the policy generally in connection with the construction of airports and moneys being expended on airports generally. I will not touch on this because it is a telecommunication service.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Then I had better ask my questions here. Can the minister give us the receipts and disbursements figures?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Perhaps I had better give the hon. gentleman receipts first.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the minister break them down, roughly?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. First of all, I should say that this system is operated by the Canadian National Telegraph Company; it was taken over by the army and transferred only recently to the Department of Transport. There are certain revenues from it, and this is a vote to look after the deficit.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the minister make clear just the scope of the operation? I am a little bit foggy about it.

An hon. MEMBER: You always are.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is the operation, from Edmonton to Whitehorse, or wire lines that were built by the United States during the war years. We paid the United States a substantial sum of money during the war for all the work they did in the Northwest Territories, including Canol and many other things. This was one of the items in that sale. National defence operated this for a time and then turned it over to transport in 1947, or perhaps it was 1946, I am not too sure which. We have appointed the Canadian National Telegraphs to operate it.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I ask why they were appointed?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Because they were already in the area, because they have a telegraph system, and because they are efficient. We could have given it to a private company.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): This is just a communication system?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is all it is. The receipts amount to $671,000. I will just give the amounts in thousands. That is made up of lease of lines to the United States government, $271,000; lease of lines to the Department of Transport, $135,000; lease of lines to air line operators, $47,000; lease of lines to R.C.A.F. and army, $70,000; commercial traffic and other leases, $147,000. The total of revenue therefore is $671,000. The total of expenses is $1,399,000, and the difference in the two is this vote, $728,000.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Then will the minister give us the items of expenditure?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Salaries and wages, $685,000; allowances, $37,840; telegrams, telephones and postage, $4,500; printing, stationery and office equipment, $3,500; materials and supplies, $254,000; freight, express and cartage, $26,000; light, power and water, $55,000; repairs to buildings and works, $22,500; repairs to equipment, $69,000; special services—maintenance, $29,000; contracts and agreements, $44,000; pensions, $23,000.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I think that is enough. On the face of it, these figures stagger one. The total receipts are $671,000, and salaries alone are $685,000.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is there any prospect of that situation substantially altering, or is this a service that must be maintained regardless of its return?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is something that must be maintained, if we are to have an air service in that part of the country. As the hon. gentleman knows, we maintain air communication from Edmonton to Whitehorse, a route which is several thousand miles in length. My hon. friend knows that is fairly barren ground or territory up there. No one likes to go to live in that area unless he is adequately remunerated.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It may be that I shall have some further questions later. I presume the minister is going to deal with this matter.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, I expect to.

Item agreed to.

Government-owned enterprises—non-active accounts—

National harbours board—

556. Advances to national harbours board, subject to the provisions of section 29 of the National Harbours Board Act, to meet expenditures applicable to the calendar year 1948 on any or all of the following accounts:

(a) Retirement of maturing debentures—Saint John, $282,900.

(b) Reconstruction and capital expenditures—Halifax, $2,605,775; Saint John, $2,000,000; Quebec, $122,200; Churchill, $50,000; generally unforeseen and miscellaneous, $200,000; total, $4,977,975.

Less amount to be expended from replacement funds, $426,000; total, $4,834,875.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Hon. members will find the item on page 83 of the estimates under government owned enterprises.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Before you went to that item, Mr. Chairman, I was going to bring something to your attention. The minister promised last night to give us further information with regard to item 490, the cost of the Saint John lightship.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. Item 490 is passed.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I did give that information. I put it on the record at eight o'clock last evening.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We are considering item 556. Shall the item carry?

Mr. ISNOR: No. This has to do with the national harbours board, as I understand it.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: That is right.

Mr. ISNOR: I should like to say a word on it.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): You promised far more than that last year. I think it was $17,000,000.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There are so many of these that I hardly know where I am at.

Mr. KNOWLES: That was before the by-election.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The senior member for Halifax will tell us about that.

Mr. ISNOR: I do not think I can oblige hon. members of the opposition in regard to election talk. I think we are more serious at the present time in regard to the estimates.

Mr. FLEMING: Were you not serious last July?

Mr. ISNOR: The result would almost lead one to think I was.

Mr. FLEMING: Regarding what was said in the campaign?

Mr. ISNOR: I am always serious.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Could we get along with the vote?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That is what we are trying to help in.

Mr. CHEVRIER: You were helpful a while ago, I must say.

Mr. ISNOR: I do not think it is necessary for me to go over the history of the inauguration of the National Harbours Board Act in 1936, and to deal with the development of the board under present conditions. All hon. members are fairly familiar with that. I should like to deal with it as we see it from a local standpoint. What I shall say with respect to the port of Halifax applies equally to practically all the seven ports. I make that statement because I have heard criticisms from each and every port district throughout Canada, and from members representing constituencies in which the national harbours board operates under the present system.

I do not think it is possible under that system to give as direct attention and supervision as would be the case if we were operating under local committees; and in my view, from a local standpoint, that supervision is necessary. Someone will say, "Look at the record since 1938. See how our revenues have increased. See how our expenditures have been kept down." But that is not the whole answer in business. Efficiency plays an important part. On the other hand the greater interest brought about by the use of local advisory committees develops just as great efficiency, creates a greater interest in the ports and secures business which would otherwise be lost.

I honestly believe that if we had had a local advisory committee last year we would not have lost the freight we did lose through its being diverted to Portland, or other United States ports. The same applies to the amount of business being diverted to those ports at the present time. I feel that there are items which at the present time would help in the development of the port of Halifax which, on account of the attitude taken by the members of the national harbours board, are lost. When I say that, I make no reflection upon the ability of the board. I am simply stating that they are so far away from local ports that they have not the same interest as would people who are directly connected with them.

Once or twice a year members of the board visit Vancouver at the extreme west, and on other occasions they come east. But their visits are so brief that they cannot possibly get into close touch with matters relating to the development of the port; and I feel this could be done by local authorities.

I do not want the minister to say, "Do you want us to go back to the old system?" It is true that at the present time there is on the order paper a resolution suggesting that we revert to the old system. I am not proposing that this evening; that matter will be dealt with at the proper time. I do say, however, that the minister should now give serious consideration to taking action to bring into effect the recommendations laid down in the Gibb report. That report was made in the best interests of the various ports, and it said that greater efficiency could be brought about with the assistance of local committees. This would naturally create greater interest in boards of trade and the community in general, including longshoremen and workers on the waterfront. With a local committee representing these various groups, there would be general support. I do not say those committees must be given full authority, but, I feel that they should be in a position to advise; and certainly I believe they could advise more intelligently than men living a thousand miles away. In the east—and I believe it is the same in the west—this is referred to as a system of remote control.

This can be understood when it is realized that in Halifax we think of Ottawa being a thousand miles away. Quite often, from the attitude adopted by the minister and members of the national harbours board, I form the impression that, instead of their being a thousand miles away, they are ten thousand miles away, when they look at matters from Ottawa eastward.

To my mind there is a vast difference between trying to control a business from a thousand miles away and having someone right on the spot. We seldom see large concerns such as Eaton's and Simpson's following that practice—and I do not wish to advertise those companies. They set up local committees and give them full power to act. They do not just appoint a manager, as we appoint a port manager; they invest real authority in their local managers, so that they are permitted to do the buying and selling of merchandise and to carry on the business generally, under their own power.

On the contrary, this does not apply in respect of the ports. In Halifax an appointment cannot be made without the authority of the national harbours board. If a watchman is to be employed or given a permanent position, it must be approved by Ottawa. Perhaps in the first instance the recommendation would come from the local port manager, but the final approval must come from the board at Ottawa.

I am hopeful that, following the appointment today of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters) as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport, he will be able to do some of the things the minister has not had time to do, and to come into closer contact with us on the east coast. He is a fine, bright, keen young man, and he appreciates our problems.

I venture to say that the national harbours board has not taken any direct or definite action to make sure that there is a sufficient quantity of grain in the elevators at Halifax at all times to meet the requirements of ships making regular calls at that port. Someone may say, "Oh, well, we have an elevator there of two million bushels capacity." That may be so, but it is never filled to capacity. We need that grain there at all times, to provide ballast for ships coming in and calling at our port.

I believe that if the figures are checked for the last ten years it will be found there has been a gradual decrease in the amount of grain shipped through Halifax—with the exception of one or two years when we waged a strong drive to have a few thousand bushels added for shipment to that port.

There are many local matters on which the minister could be better advised by a local committee. I do not wish to speak at too great length, because I shall have an opportunity of asking questions later on; but I do hope that he will take definite action to provide local advisory committees composed of local men, with authority, so that they may advise intelligently those at Ottawa and thus bring to our port a greater amount of trade, and prevent trade which otherwise belongs to Canadian ports from being diverted to the United States.

Mr. DICKEY: Before the minister replies, I should like to say a word in support of my colleague who has been fighting the battle of the port of Halifax in this chamber since 1935. The minister has been asked to give further consideration to adopting a system of advisory committees to look after the interests of the various ports which come under the administration of the national harbours board. I would point out to the minister that the Gibb report recommended the setting up of a national harbours board to administer the Canadian harbours, but at the same time it pointed out the value of local advisory committees to assist the national board in properly looking after the interests of the various ports in this country, each of which has its own individual problems and interests which must be attended to.

I think it is unreasonable to expect that a national administration will be thoroughly satisfactory to all parts of the country, without there being local committees to assist and advise. For the last two years there has been at Halifax a port of Halifax club. This is a private organization without any official standing, but its membership is made up of business and shipping men who have the interests of the port of Halifax at heart. If the minister will inquire from the port manager and the officials of the harbours board, I think he will find that that unofficial organization has made, in its short life, many constructive and helpful suggestions which have worked out to the mutual advantage of the club, the port of Halifax and the harbours board.

If an unofficial organization can make a contribution of that kind, I think it must be realized that a local advisory committee, having some official status and having definite duties, would be able to do much more. I hope the minister will give further serious consideration to the full implementation of the Gibb report. After all, the approval of the national harbours board in that report was to a large extent conditioned upon having local advisory committees to assist.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, coming from the other end of the country where there is a harbour of sorts, I want to say a word for fear the minister might too readily succumb to the eloquent pleadings of the senior and junior member for Halifax. The present system was adopted after another system had had many years of trial. I think the present system is much more satisfactory. The senior member for Halifax mentioned a committee with authority. If it is to be an advisory committee, it cannot be a committee with authority. If it is a committee with authority, it is something more than an advisory committee. In making any change in the present system the minister should be most careful.

I am all in favour of having advisory committees, but I know the dangers of small town machine politics in matters of this kind. If the minister needs any support in the matter and if mine is of any value, I shall be glad to give it to him.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. members for Halifax will expect me to say something. I want to commend both the senior member and the junior member for Halifax for their advocacy of local advisory committees. I say that, because the senior member at least has persistently brought this to my attention and to the attention of this house. Thus far the government has not seen fit to appoint local advisory committees, for the reasons which I have already given on other occasions and which perhaps I need not repeat in detail, but I do not say to the hon.

gentlemen that the question of advisory committees should not be given careful consideration.

In his report Sir Alexander Gibb recommended the appointment of local advisory committees, but on the other hand we must keep in mind that when reports are brought down they generally contain a number of recommendations which the government need not accept in their entirety. As far as the Gibb report is concerned, the government accepted some of the recommendations and did not deal with others. One of those which it did not act on was the appointment of local advisory committees. As such committees would have no financial responsibility, the government thought at the time that that recommendation should not be given effect to. I think now of the port of Toronto where a commission was set up under departmental jurisdiction and authority, but where the funds are provided, administered and spent by the city. The dominion government does not contribute to those expenditures.

The government felt that it would be much better if they were able to obtain outstanding men as port managers, men with experience, men who knew local conditions, men who were able to deal with local requirements, men who could meet with various groups in the community. We have been successful in getting two new port managers in recent years who, I think, are doing excellent work. The port manager at Halifax has had a great deal of experience. According to the information I have from my officers, he is able to meet and deal with various groups in the community.

My hon. friend says there is difficulty when one is far away from the central government, and to that I cannot take too much exception. There is bound to be criticism on that account. I have heard it in Vancouver; I have heard it in Halifax, and I have heard it also in Saint John. But one must keep in mind that when the National Harbours Board Act was passed and the board appointed, one of the objects was to avoid competition as between one port and another as there had been under the system which existed prior to 1937. If the government, through its national harbours board, were to encourage competition between the various ports, I do not know that that would tend to good administration. As it is now, the position of the port of Halifax so far as total cargo tonnage is concerned is good. In 1938 the total cargo tonnage was about 2,000,000 tons, and at the end of 1947 it was 3,577,000 tons, or an increase of more than one and a half million tons, which shows—

Mr. ISNOR: What was it in 1944?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I will get that in a moment. That shows that the administration of the ports is progressing. I do not want to tell my hon. friend that I will not give consideration to the establishment of local advisory committees. The question comes up periodically, but thus far the government has not seen fit to establish them, for the reasons I have given. I am always open to conviction; as my hon. friend says, I now have the advantage of a new and young parliamentary assistant coming from the maritimes, and I am sure that he, too, will give this matter his very careful consideration.

Mr. ISNOR: I wish to thank the minister for his promise of consideration, although I never liked that word "consideration." I like "favourable review" very much better.

I should like to comment on the minister's remark that we do not want to set up competition between the various ports. That might sound all right to the minister, but if he considers the large commercial firms, wholesale and retail, which have branches throughout Canada, and the trust companies and the methods of banking institutions with branches spread all over the country from the east to the west, he will find that there is the keenest competition for business between the various branches. There are wholesale drug firms with branches in the province of New Brunswick, at Saint John, for instance, and Nova Scotia, at Halifax, all competing with one another for the business of the Annapolis valley and other sections of Nova Scotia. I do not think it was a particularly good argument which the minister advanced that competition is not a good thing, particularly as the policy of this government is, I believe, free enterprise. Incentive and competition are the life of business. I say to the minister that if you have the right type of man—and I believe you have in the majority of cases; you certainly have a very fine port manager at Halifax—if the opportunity were afforded to him of going out after business, the port of Halifax would get more business than it is now getting.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I say he has that authority now.

Mr. ISNOR: Then he does not appreciate that fact, and I doubt whether the officials in front of the minister will grant him authority to canvass for the business.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am saying on my responsibility as a minister he has that authority.

Mr. ISNOR: I am pleased to have that assurance from the minister. I will pass it along, and then, if I should have any criticism to make of him for letting business be diverted to United States cities, the responsibility will be on his shoulders.

We have at least gained one point this evening by raising this question. I do not want to rehash the question of the business we lost to United States ports last year, but there is a close connection between the activities of the Canadian National Railways and the operations of the national harbours board. I believe that there should be closer co-operation between these two bodies so far as Halifax is concerned. We in Halifax look upon the Canadian National Railways as having its eastern terminal at Halifax, and because of that we think a greater effort should be made to bring ships into Halifax and that the Canadian National Railways should carry ship cargoes from Halifax to the great lakes. But the members of the commission will say: We cannot go out and canvass business against Saint John. I say that in co-operation with the Canadian National Railways the national harbours board should be endeavouring to route all the freight possible direct to Canadian ports over Canadian National Railways lines. If that policy were followed I believe we would have a great deal more business in the port of Halifax than we are getting at the present time.

Item agreed to.

National harbours board—

560. Advances to national harbours board, subject to the provisions of section 29 of the National Harbours Board Act, to meet expenditures applicable to the calendar year 1948 on any or all of the following accounts:

Reconstruction and capital expenditures—Montreal, $853,105; Vancouver, $115,000; total, $968,105.

Less amount to be expended from replacement funds, $100,228; total, $867,877.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might now make a statement which I promised to the committee. The hon. member for Peterborough West asked me last evening in what papers were advertised certain lands having to do with the Trent canal which were sold in the area adjacent to the township of East Gwillimbury. I was unable to give him the details last night; but I have found an advertisement, which I have here, and which covers all the lands mentioned. The advertisement appeared in the Globe and Mail, the Star and the Telegram, all three Toronto papers; also in the Era and Express of Newmarket, and in the Witness of Bradford. There were two insertions in each of the Toronto papers and one insertion in each of the other two papers. The advertisement in the Toronto papers appeared on January 23 and 24, 1947; in the Era and Express on January 23 and in the Witness on January 29, 1947. The schedule of lands to which reference is made in the advertisement includes lots 122, 123 and 124, concession 1, township of East Gwillimbury.

I promised the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario that I would make a statement on the policy of the government with reference to the expenditure of money on air services and air construction.

On April 2, 1943, a statement was made in this house by the Prime Minister relating to government policy with reference to civil aviation. Then on March 17, 1944, the Minister of Munitions and Supply reaffirmed that policy and extended it. Those statements give an accurate picture of government policy, although a few changes have been made and announced since that time. Additional changes will be made if and when new developments and conditions occur.

Enlarging somewhat on certain items of those previous statements, I should like to list the following responsibilities which the government has assumed:

1. Commercial air services:

(a) The establishment of trans-continental and main line services throughout Canada by Trans-Canada Air Lines, to a standard comparable with similar services in the United States, such services being based upon agreements between Trans-Canada Air Lines and the government, under the provisions of the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act.

(b) The encouragement of feeder line schedule services throughout Canada, where present or future public convenience and necessity indicate that such services are required, such services to be provided to standard consistent with the traffic requirements.

(c) The encouragement of frontier or "bush" services, so as to aid in the development of Canada's natural resources and adequately to provide for the development of those areas of Canada not served by other transportation facilities, where public interest indicates that such services are required.

(d) The encouragement of the development of such specialty air services as are from time to time appropriate in the public interest.

(e) The establishment of such international air services as are appropriate with Canada's interest in international trade routes.

2. Airports:

(a) The progressive development of main line airports, to permit of the utilization of the most modern types of aircraft at the minimum capital outlay consistent with safety and economy of operation.

(b) The development of a minimum number of international airports consistent with Canada's position in the international civil aviation field and our obligations under international air agreements.

(c) The encouragement of and assistance to municipalities for the development of airports throughout Canada, where it seems desirable that such airports should be developed, maintained and operated by municipalities, to standards set out by the dominion government.

That deals more particularly with the first item that we discussed this evening.

(d) The assistance in the establishment of airstrips at air bases feeding remote areas, for the purpose of stimulating the development of Canada's natural resources.

(e) The assumption, for the time being, of part of the costs of maintenance and operation of those airports which are under the control of the Department of Transport, and to assist municipalities in the maintenance and operation of airports where such airports have either been transferred to, or developed by, municipalities.

In this connection, there has been established a scale of landing fees intended to meet part of the cost of the maintenance and operation of runways, which charges are based upon the ability of the air operator to pay and are approximately three per cent of the estimated revenue on a reasonable basis of operation.

Hangar rentals and other special facilities provided at airports at government expense are based upon a rental which is expected to amortize the cost involved over a reasonable period of time.

Efforts are being made to obtain revenues at the principal airports under the control of the Department of Transport, from such concessions as can be exploited with a view to meeting the expenses of maintenance and operation.

3. Aids to air navigation:

The provision and maintenance of aerial aids to navigation, such as radio ranges, instrument landing systems, meteorological services and air traffic control, if necessary, so as to ensure the regularity and safety of air navigation.

4. The government keeps abreast of all civil aviation developments. As a member of the international civil aviation organization, Canada has played a leading part in the establishment of common procedures in the technical aspects of civil aviation. The government will continue to favour the policy of international collaboration and co-operation in air transport.

I have two or three other answers to questions which were asked last night. Perhaps I might say they are questions of minor importance, and the committee might allow me to write to the hon. gentlemen giving them the information rather than giving it on the floor of the house.

Mr. ISNOR: Perhaps my question in reference to wreckage was of minor importance.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I saw it today. May I give the answer now?

Mr. ISNOR: This is one of the minor questions to which the minister referred.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. I find that there has been no salvage service in the maritime provinces since 1917. The last payment was made to the Maritime Foundation Company, I think, which operated a wrecking plant in those years. This company is now doing its own work. I am informed it is in a sound financial position, and for that reason it has not been necessary to pay a subsidy.

Mr. ISNOR: I wish to thank the minister for the information, which I do not think is entirely correct. Perhaps at some time or other I will check on it and make a further observation. I am reasonably sure that there was a payment. Before the officials leave, I have a question.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): We are still on item 560.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, the last vote.

Mr. ISNOR: I have reason to believe that a subsidy was paid to the Maritime Foundation Company since 1935. In any event, if subsidies are not needed on that dangerous portion of the Atlantic coast, surely they are not needed to the extent of $45,000 in other parts of Canada. I shall let that stand for the time being.

The minister was good enough to give the tonnage for 1938. When I mentioned 1944 he said that he would give that. I ask him to give the tonnage; that is all. In view of the large increase in the import and export business enjoyed by Canada during recent years, and bearing in mind the figure the minister gave for 1938, will he be good enough now to tell us the figure for 1944 and 1947?

Mr. CHEVRIER: For 1944, 6,238,000 tons; 1947, 3,577,000 tons.

Mr. ISNOR: That proves the point. We are not getting anywhere near our share of the business.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. member must keep in mind that 1944 was a peak year, not only in the operations of the ports but also in rail and other transportation facilities.

Mr. McLURE: Probably my question was a minor one, too. Some time ago I asked the minister about the word "deficits" appearing in the reports instead of the word "service". I think he said it would be given consideration. I notice that item 557, which has been passed, contains the word "deficits" instead of the word "service".

Mr. CHEVRIER: All I can tell the hon. gentleman is that he has brought the question up repeatedly. He brought it up again during the sittings of the railway committee. I then said to him that the Duncan report clearly stated in one of its recommendations the reason why this is set out as a separate operation. The Canadian National Railways were then required to segregate the receipts from the expenses and keep a separate account. I think the president of the Canadian National Railways told the hon. gentleman that he would give it some consideration. He is guided to some extent by that recommendation.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish to say that I am not going to press this matter further at the moment; nevertheless I wish to make one or two comments to the minister about the statement which he read. What I asked the minister was for a statement showing the line of reasoning which had been used in air development, and particularly the relationship between the civil and the military side, the relation which defence had to ordinary commercial aviation. I think the minister will agree that the statement which he has read has said nothing about the security side, except by implication that these fields no doubt have a relation to security.

Any criticism that I make I realize is not levelled against the minister at all, because he has only just taken this branch over, and that is one of the reasons why I am not going to press the matter now. I think the statement he has given has in one way answered nothing. It has given us a certain number of figures. One could sum up by saying that it says we have felt it desirable to keep up with the Jones's; in other words, with other nations in the matter of civil aviation. I am not saying it is not a good thing. What I am saying is that it is no attempt to answer my question as to why we are carrying commercial passengers at a rate far below cost, which I assume we are. He has not answered that at all. He has not attempted to, but there is an important point in these expenditures which we are making for the defence element on the one side and the commercial element on the other. I will not press that now. I will simply say that, so far as any evidence that we have at the present time indicates, there is no reason to suppose that there is any thought-out basis on which we are proceeding. We are simply going ahead in the belief that keping up aviation is a good thing—as I think it is—

Mr. MacINNIS: Then you are in agreement with the government.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am not either agreeing or disagreeing. I am simply pointing out at the moment—and I will leave it at this—that next year there will be an opportunity to question the minister, and I hope that the questions which I asked the day before yesterday, and which I think are sound questions, will be answered. As a matter of fact, I do not think they can be answered because they have not been considered.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman has been very kind and courteous this evening. If I understood him rightly last night, I thought he felt that there was no predetermined plan which we were following, and I attempted this evening, in this statement, to show that there was. We have divided it under three heads: commercial air services, airports, and aids to air navigation. It was my intention, when I asked the officers to get this information, to have it prepared in the manner in which it has been prepared in the department under previous ministers, and they told me that this was the policy. I am giving it to the committee with that assurance. It may not be what the hon. gentleman had in mind, but I suppose if I had brought down a statement of another kind he would have been free to criticize it and to say it was not satisfactory—

Mr. KNOWLES: He would have wanted this one.

Mr. CHEVRIER: —and to shoot at it in the manner in which he has shot at this one.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): He has been very gentle with you; he has not shot it at all.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have been grateful for his courtesy, and I hope that next year I shall be able to answer his questions.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am not going to press the matter. I simply ask the minister to read my question of the other day, which I asked in good faith, and which I believe has something to do with the essence of the matter. He has not been able to answer the question, but it is not through any fault of his own.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): This is item 560. Apparently there is no one from either Montreal or Vancouver. I am looking along the line and I do not see anyone from Vancouver.

Mr. MacINNIS: Your sight is not good.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I was looking in that direction. I think I hear someone saying that no Conservative could ever see anything in the direction of socialism. I agree with that heartily. We are in agreement on that point.

Mr. KNOWLES: The statement was that you could not see even in the direction in which you are looking.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I hear a fellow from Winnipeg—I beg your pardon, Mr. Chairman, an hon. gentleman from Winnipeg—saying that I cannot see anything even in the direction in which I am looking. I assure you, sir, I can see more through the back of my head than he can see through his eyes, so that we are all even there. I think there is another shot coming. How many barrels have they to this gun anyway?

Mr. KNOWLES: Which way are you going when you are looking through the back of your head?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I shall be going straighter then than you are, no matter in what direction I am going. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will laugh that one off. I think I scored that time.

The CHAIRMAN: I wonder if all hon. members would address the chair and discuss the item under consideration.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I shall be happy to do that, sir. I began by trying to do so, but certain influences—I can only call them that—to my left, distracted my attention. I am sorry, and I am sure they will join me in an apology to you.

I was going to say that there is roughly $1,000,000 in this item. There is $968,105; we are spending $853,000 odd in Montreal and $115,000 odd in Vancouver, and there is an increase over last year of $336,000 odd. Would the minister let me know what the major items are in an expenditure of that size? I live inland and I should like to know what these things are.

Mr. CHEVRIER: To deal first with Montreal, there is an item for wharves and piers, $60,000; paving and drainage, $40,000; construction of single storage shed, $350,000; installation of cargo beams, $30,000; installation of fire hydrants and transit sheds, $45,000; tracks to serve new sheds, $54,000; cold storage plant, $25,000.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Where is that?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is on the harbour front.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): How many miles does that cover?

Mr. CHEVRIER: About twelve miles.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I can find it without trouble.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Turning to Vancouver: renewal decking, $40,000; reconstruction of conveyor gallery, $18,000; construction of shed to replace shed No. 1, Lapointe pier, $5,000; replacement of substructure, shed 2, $45,000; electric power supply cable at fish dock, $7,000.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Would the minister give me similar figures in the gross for the two ports in the previous year? There is an increase of $306,377. Can the minister give me the comparative gross for the two ports last year?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The actual gross expenditure last year for Vancouver was $230,000, and for Montreal, $123,000, which added together is much less than the amount mentioned in the estimate, because we did not spend the money voted.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

245. Departmental administration, $623,428.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister was going to give a great deal of information that had been asked for.

The CHAIRMAN: Before the minister replies, it occurred to me that some other hon. members might wish to ask questions. If not, the minister has the floor.

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Before making general observations, I was waiting for any other questions that hon. members might have wished to put. Perhaps I might start where the last speaker but one, the hon. member for Calgary West, left off, so that I can cover in a general way, at this stage, as many as possible of the points raised by those who have thus far discussed the estimates.

Of course it is difficult on these estimates, because of their particularity, to define the relationship between what is done under this vote and what might, within the rules of the house, more properly be discussed under the specific items to be contained in the supplementary estimates which will embrace the national health program announced a few weeks ago by the Prime Minister. But the question raised by the hon. member for Calgary West is one that I think comes under the general administrative vote; and perhaps on that account, and because of the importance of the matter, I should make a comment.

The hon. gentleman referred to what the department was doing with regard to one of the great causes of suffering in this country, namely rheumatism or, as it is more properly called, arthritis. A good part of what I would want to say about that subject, by the very nature of the program announced by the Prime Minister, would have to be discussed when we discuss our supplementary estimates in connection with the grants we intend to make to the provinces and which, among other things, in the public health grants, include some assistance toward trying to relieve human suffering in this country in terms of arthritis.

As the hon. gentleman has said, there is a general interest in this subject. Certain organizations throughout Canada have expressed a desire that provincial and federal administrations should seek to do something about this great cause of human suffering in our country. About nine months ago, having a layman's point of view in connection with this department, I asked two of my officials to go to England and to get in touch with Lord Horder, whose work in the field has perhaps been the most outstanding in the world. As a result of their conversations with him last September, I convoked here at Ottawa a conference of all the provincial governments, the medical colleges and the leading rheumatologists in this country, with the idea of seeing if there was something that we might do on a national basis to try to bring about co-ordinated action in regard to what is properly called arthritis.

The result of that meeting was the establishment in this country of an organization to be known as the Canadian arthritis and rheumatism society. The organization of the body followed the technique of the previously successful attempt in creating on a national basis the Canadian cancer institute. I am happy to say that the job of the Canadian arthritis society will be, first of all, to try to provide, through their films and pamphlets and whatever other known media are available, information which the specialists on this subject have—and I must say that I am advised it is a limited knowledge—with regard to the ways and means by which rheumatism, in the two hundred and over forms in which it exists, can best be corrected by medical action.

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): By medical what?

Mr. MARTIN By medical and professional treatment. At the end of the last war the government in this country and the world generally, because they had in their midst tubercular veterans, were obliged by that fact to try to make some real effort to remove the scourge of tuberculosis. The impetus that was given by the Department of Veterans Affairs in this country, as well as by similar departments in other countries, sponsored by the obligation of looking after tubercular veterans, set on foot in this country a tremendous amount of governmental and voluntary effort in an attempt to remove tuberculosis from our midst. I have every reason to suggest that, as a result of world war II, it may be possible to duplicate in the arthritic field—and I am now merely expressing what I trust will ultimately prove to be an eventuality—the same kind of impetus that was given at the end of the last war. Why do I say that?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Do your experts with respect to arthritis say that today they have any cure in the world for that disease?

Mr. MARTIN: No, I cannot say that they do. I shall come to that in a moment.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am sorry to interrupt.

Mr. MARTIN: That is all right. What I was trying to do was just to give the committee a picture of the imagination that has gone into what, in a humble way, we and the provinces are now attempting; and what we have done was done on the basis of the best professional advice existing in this country and in the United Kingdom. As a result of world war II, it may be expected that science, through the resources placed at its disposal by this nation for the treatment of arthritic veterans may bring about the same kind of encouragement that followed the action taken by the governments with regard to tubercular veterans at the end of the last war and its consequences on the civil population.

At Sunnybrook hospital, which I understand many hon. members will visit tomorrow, and at one or two of our other major veterans hospitals in this country, but notably at Sunnybrook, there has been built in terms of equipment, I am told—and I have never examined it; I am not personally qualified to comment on, to pass judgment on or to assess the value of that equipment, or to do other than rely upon what those who by training should know better about it—what is perhaps the most modern plant of its kind in the world. We are hoping that, as a result of that equipment, and as a result of the work of the rheumatism and arthritis society, as a result of the moneys which will be given by the central government to the provincial authorities, we may be able to do three things: first, to assist that society in carrying on an educational campaign in this country among those who are suffering from rheumatism, or arthritis as it is properly called; second, to give an impetus to the profession itself in the treatment of this subject. I hope it will be feasible to bring to Sunnybrook and to similar institutions in this country, for purposes of giving refresher courses with regard to arthritis, this terrible cause of suffering, certain people in the profession.

With regard to the specific question of the hon. member for Calgary West, whose great personal and national interest in this problem will, I am sure, commend itself to every member of the committee, because of his own close relation to it, we have had this conference with nine of the leading rheumatologists of this country, headed by Doctor Wallace Graham of Toronto, Doctor Wright of McGill and several others. We have relied on their judgment in the creation of this institute and society. The steps that we are taking to provide financial assistance to them, along with the moneys provided by the Canadian Red Cross will, I hope—and I cannot say any more at this stage than hope—set on foot a movement in this country which will at least partly relieve 100,000 people—that is an estimate based upon a survey made about seven years ago—who are seriously suffering from this disease, and perhaps another 700,000 who are not as seriously suffering.

I cannot at this time say any more than that about the matter. There is not as much known, so specialists say, as one would like. There are many forms of the disease which lend themselves to curative action, by rest treatment. But I wish to assure the hon. member and the committee that the interest I have taken personally with regard to the cancer institute—and I am not going to be overly modest about that achievement—will be as intense in this particular matter.

When we come to the supplementary estimates, once these matters are before the house I shall be able to indicate on the basis of anticipated agreement with the provinces as a result of the conference of last Monday and Tuesday, what I might reasonably expect in terms of dollars and cents we might be able to do in trying to begin at long last to do something on a national basis in connection with this problem.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Research?

Mr. MARTIN: Research and treatment. Research in connection with arthritis is on a different basis. In the case of cancer, you can have research carried on in laboratories, as I shall ultimately indicate, as well as research carried on under treatment. In connection with arthritis, Doctor Wallace Graham, and these others tell me that there is a closer relationship between treatment and research. In other words, pure research in the case of arthritis does not exist as it does in cancer. You can more readily put a man to work in a laboratory on cancer.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You have it right in front of you?

Mr. MARTIN: That is right. With regard to cancer, as I indicated last session to the house, it is one of the great killers, taking annually about 14,000 lives in this country. It seemed to us in the department that, while jurisdictionally health is a matter for the provinces, the same impetus which drove us to defeat the enemies of freedom should cause us to try to defeat the enemies of man in days of peace; and cancer is certainly one of those diseases and enemies.

I might say that in the Department of National Health and Welfare I have found this, that whatever may be the relationship between the provincial authorities and the central government, traditionally or actually, thanks to the successful functioning of the dominion council of health, I cannot, as Minister of National Health and Welfare, complain about the collaboration that I, as minister, have had with the provinces of Canada. Twice each year the dominion council of health meets to discuss in our department, under the chairmanship of the deputy minister of national health, problems of national and provincial interest in the field of health. Those conferences have allowed each of us to survey the field of national health without in any way creating the danger of intervening in places which are constitutionally reserved for other government authorities. And it was because of the experience at the first meeting of the dominion council of health which I attended a year ago, that last January we convoked a meeting of the cancer societies in Canada, the medical colleges in Canada, the provincial governments in Canada, the leading public bodies interested in providing financial assistance, the nursing association, and the like, with the thought of presenting to them this particular challenge, that, while in some provinces a special attempt was being made to eradicate or try to find some solution for cancer on the research side and to provide better diagnostic facilities and greater public information about the danger of cancer on the other, the time had come when we should try to co-ordinate in the national field what was now being done in several provincial jurisdictions. The result was the creation or the establishment of the National Cancer Institute of Canada.

I am pleased to say to the committee tonight that, as a result of that accomplishment, there began last September 12, twenty-seven different fundamental research projects on cancer in Canada. That, I think, is a significant achievement, for which I take no credit, and for which I am not asking that credit be given to the administration. The credit belongs to all who co-operated in creating that national body. That is in keeping with the tradition of this department, for our job on the national level is essentially and legally one of co-ordination of the activities carried on in the field of health by the various provinces.

When we come to the supplementary estimates I shall be able to indicate the financial assistance we are prepared to give, not only to the cancer institute but to the provinces, to enable them to carry on greater treatment facilities in respect of cancer, a greater system of education—and this is very important, because of the importance of early diagnosis—and greater financial resources to carry on research with regard to cancer.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Are these twenty-seven organizations co-ordinated, or are they duplications; or are they on separate problems in connection with the same matter.

Mr. MARTIN: I might say that the national cancer institute is a non-governmental national body. But they have agreed that the agency that should pass upon all applications for research projects should be the medical division of the national research council.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The clearing house?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, the clearing house. That body is made up of some of the most eminent professional and medical men in this country. At this stage there is no duplication; but there may be duplication within the third year, on the theory that you do not necessarily engage in further effort when there is a duplication of research. A man might be engaged in one place on a particular research project, and another research scientist somewhere else might be engaged in the same field.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Diabetes, for example.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, diabetes is a good example. When Doctor Banting made his discovery it was based upon work done by a doctor at Yale, whose work in turn was being duplicated by scientists elsewhere.

I merely mention these two bodies to indicate that whatever may be the constitutional difficulties, there has grown up an opportunity through the dominion council of health to circumvent provincial boundaries to try to get common agreement with respect to action, and a proper assessment of which body is best fitted by any standard to deal with particular health problems. When, as I say, we come to the supplementary estimates I shall be able to particularize in much greater detail.

Then, the hon. member from Winnipeg spoke about treatment of the blind. Let me say simply this, that I cannot disagree with what he said, for I feel that this is a field where caution should not be underlined. What we all want, regardless of party, is to do the best we can in this important field of human endeavour.

I agree in the main with what he has said with regard to spending too much. There is something I should like to tell the committee, and I think this is the first time it has been said. Last year we reduced the age at which blind people could receive what I think is improperly called an old age pension—it is a pension which is paid under the Old Age Pensions Act—from forty to twenty-one years. I suggested to my officers that we should at once give consideration to the implications of the step we were taking and ask ourselves whether we were doing enough to prevent blindness, whether we were doing enough to try to improve the eyesight of people who, unless improvement was brought about, would ultimately grow into total blindness and be beyond the pale of improvement.

We have now proposed a scheme to all the provinces whereby, if they agree to spend twenty-five cents, we will contribute seventy-five cents toward the treatment of selected cases from among those people in receipt of pensions who are partially blind and try to improve their eyesight in the expectancy that such improvement will not only give them the freedom they want but will also relieve them from the pension rolls. Thus far we have been able to conclude one agreement, with the province of New Brunswick, but I have every hope and expectancy that within the next few months we shall be able to conclude similar agreements with all the provinces. Thus a man of, say twenty-three years of age with thirty per cent vision, who is in receipt of a pension under the pensions act will be taken in hand to see what we can do to improve his eyesight and take him off the pension roll. This policy will be vigorously pursued.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is this proposal being made to the provinces apart from the program recently announced by the Prime Minister?

Mr. MARTIN: It is a separate program. Mention has been made that we are spending more now in this department by some $80,000,000 than is being spent in the Department of National Defence. Roughly speaking, that is true. I am glad to say that is true. I do not for one moment minimize the importance of national defence at this time in our history, but I do think that if there is one department—I am assuming now that the money appropriated is properly spent—where we cannot measure results by dollars and cents, it is surely this department.

Without being adjudged irresponsible, I have endeavoured to put forward the point of view that wherever we can, by ourselves or in collaboration with the provinces, bring about improvement in health standards of our people, we should seek to do so. That is the only apology I have to offer for our expenditures. I am not referring to that as criticism by the hon. member for Eglinton, because he did not offer it in that vein. It was simply an observation he made, pointing out the growing importance of the department.

Mr. FLEMING: It is $113,000,000 more than national defence, not $80,000,000.

Mr. IRVINE: That is the best kind of defence.

Mr. MARTIN: As someone says, I think that is a pretty good kind of defence. The hon. member for Eglinton asked a number of questions. He asked about medical research. As the committee knows, there is provision in the new national health program for research on a basis higher than we have ever gone before and, I find on examination, higher than any other federal state in the world. When we come to those estimates I shall be glad to particularize.

In the meantime I can indicate that through the national research council, medical division, the sum of $300,000 is currently being spent in the field of medical research. The Department of Veterans Affairs carries on clinical research in its major centres, notably, as I indicated earlier, with regard to arthritis. The Department of National Health and Welfare supports research projects in connection with the administration of Indian and Eskimo medical services.

I should like to make a digression at this stage. With regard to tuberculosis, the fact is that one per cent of our population is responsible for twelve per cent of the tuberculosis we have in this country. The tubercular rate is very high among our Indians and Eskimos. It may be that some day someone may be open to criticism for the amount of money we are spending in this field, but I make no apology for it. In 1927 we were spending about $700,000 on Indian health; last year we spent $5,000,000, and this year we are going to spend approximately $7,500,000.

I am not saying that is adequate by any means, but it is adequate in relation to our ability to get the necessary professional skill to keep in touch with and be consistent with the program we are gradually developing. Hon. members who live in western Canada will appreciate the work being done by the Indian health section of this department. There is our Charles Camsell hospital at Edmonton with 350 beds. I am told by those who are in a better position to know that it is one of the best tubercular institutions in Canada.

There is our institution at Coqualeetza with 200 beds and the new hospital at Nanaimo which ultimately will have 200 beds. Then there is the hospital at Brandon with 200 beds and at The Pas with 185 beds. These are institutions devoted exclusively to the cure of tuberculosis among Indians and Eskimos and they represent a program which was begun nearly two years ago.

Hospital costs which are terrific are increasing the budget of this section of the department. This represents an attempt to deal with 130,000 people, the total of our Indian and Eskimo population. I am sure the committee, regardless of political affiliation, will join with me in saying that we owe an obligation to these people to try to remove this terrible scourge from their midst. In doing that, we help ourselves, because in those areas where the native population is contiguous to the white population, one frequently finds that the tubercular rate among the white population is higher than in other centres further removed from the native population. So quite apart from the question of duty there is the question of self-interest. I do not want to prolong this discussion on Indian health; I simply made that digression to indicate the importance we attach to it.

The hon. member for Eglinton asked the number of employees in the department. As of April 31, 1948, the employees numbered:

Permanent	305
Temporary	2,031

That total does not include doctors on a part-time basis, who are scattered all over the country in the most hidden places, doing a remarkable service to bring medical attention to our native population. The reason for the high number of temporaries is that this is a new department. We are continually adding divisions in the light of our concept of new obligations. But since the beginning of the present year, the creation of permanent positions in lieu of temporary positions has been given considerable attention. Authority has been sought from the civil service commission for a departmental quota of permanent positions, and the civil service commission advised only last week that they are taking steps to put into permanent capacity a very large percentage of those now in the temporary bracket. Just as soon as the probationary period has expired, this section of those now in the temporary class will be given permanent status.

With regard to educational and informational publicity, I would say, in reply to the hon. member for Eglinton, that the estimates for this year aggregate $409,350, whereas last year they aggregated $471,199, or a reduction of $61,849. He questioned whether the actual expenditure for last year would not show that we were asking for more this year than last. I might say that I have consented to the reduction with the greatest reluctance, because I feel that one of the best things we can do in this department as a national body, having in mind the constitutional responsibility of the provinces, is to assist them in the field of education; and if anyone does not think there is not an opportunity in the field of information for the work that is being carried on by films and by pamphlets and by publications I would be only too happy to show him convincing proof from both provincial and municipal governments and school authorities that the opposite is the case.

Mr. FLEMING: I asked the minister to give the actual expenditure on educational and informational publicity last year, but he simply repeated the figures I gave.

Mr. MARTIN: Our estimates this year actually total $409,350, and last year, $471,199.

[Mr. Martin.]

Our expenditures and commitments last year totalled $439,262. Our estimates this year represent a reduction from this figure of $29,912.

My hon. friend asked other questions with which I propose to deal when we come to the particular items. But he did raise one matter that I should like to mention to the committee now, so that the members will have these figures before them when they are considering the supplementary estimates in relation to the new health program of the government.

I have reference to hospital admissions in Canada. The reports of the dominion bureau of statistics show that the number of hospital admissions in Canada increased from 574,489 in 1938 to 1,365,928 in 1945. To put it in another way, the index has risen from a base of 100 to 237. Comparable figures on the number of beds are not immediately available. However, the total number of patients under hospital care rose from 58 per 1,000 of population in 1932 to 110 per 1,000 in 1944. Many factors enter into this. There is a greater tendency to use hospitals, on account of changes in the way we live and changes in medical practice. There is also a more rapid turnover of patients, as a result of the shortening of many illnesses by the use of new drugs such as penicillin, which means that one bed serves more patients than ever before, and there is also the spread of health insurance schemes, all of which have played a part in changing the statistical picture.

The hon. member for Eglinton asked a question with regard to T.B. statistics. The figures for 1947 are not yet available. The increase mentioned by the hon. gentleman between 1945 and 1946 is probably not significant when the general trend is noted. The death rate in 1900 was 200 per 100,000 of population, and in 1946 it was 47·2 per 100,000. The rate varies from 17·5 in Saskatchewan to 70·4 in Quebec. But I agree that, in spite of the tremendous improvement which has been made we cannot be satisfied until we have had, with regard to tuberculosis, the same results that we have had with regard, for instance, to diphtheria.

The last observation I want to make in a general way at this stage is that the estimates this year are naturally over-shadowed by the important announcement made by the Prime Minister, but I wish to say at this stage that we did have on Monday and Tuesday of this week—I am not now going to give the results of our conference with the provinces—an exploratory conference with them which I think I can describe as being more than satisfactory. The committee may wonder why that conference was called before I had had an opportunity of having appropriated the estimates involved in the announcement made by the Prime Minister. I must accept full responsibility for that anticipated action. The reason it was done was that I felt the house and the country generally would want both the provinces and the federal government to begin at the earliest possible moment to implement the program, which is dependent upon action by both provincial and federal governments, and so, in order to avoid delay, I called the conference long before the moneys were appropriated by parliament, in the expectation that parliament would, of course, appropriate the sum of money involved in the new health policy. There is a great deal of ground work to be done. The provinces have to appraise their situation, and giving them this opportunity to assess their needs and exchange information with us may well mean the saving of some weeks. I thought it was only meeting what I felt would be the public wish as well as parliament's wish that there should be no delay in trying to set in motion the machinery by which this program is to be made more readily effective.

I do not think I have now anything else to say, except that the suggestion made for the setting up of a committee dealing with both health and welfare matters is one which is receiving attention. The suggestion has much merit, and I am hoping that I shall be able to take some definite steps at a later date in connection with it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): In giving a comparison of hospital admissions in Canada, the minister used the years 1938 and 1945. It might help if he could tell us how many hospital beds we had in 1938 and how many in 1945. He put it in another way. He said that we had 58 hospital patients per 1,000 of population in 1932 and 110 patients per 1,000 of population in 1944. In other words, from those figures it looks as though we were losing ground in this health race. I took that from the answers which the minister gave. I have not had the opportunity of calculating the percentage by which the thing is overcoming us. The figures are even more startling than I thought they might be. Therefore at some time before this matter is finally dealt with, I wonder whether the minister could give us the number of beds for the years in which he has hospital beds.

Mr. MARTIN: As the hon. gentleman knows, the program announced by the Prime Minister includes grants for assistance to hospital construction. When we come to deal with that I intend to review the matter in greater detail than under the circumstances I think should be done now. I will give an answer specifically to the question, indicating the estimated shortage now, based upon two national surveys and our proposed expectancy of the result, in terms of cutting down the bed shortage, by the new program.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I also want the minister's view as to whether or not the suggestion I make is correct that we are losing out in the health race. In other words, is illness beating us? Is it on the increase as compared with the increase of population in the country? I think the minister understands what I have in mind. I realize fully that in these days more people are using the hospitals than they did formerly. For instance, many years ago babies were born at home and mothers were not hospitalized. That day has gone, and was gone prior to the year the minister gave me. I know that many mothers go to the hospital; my own wife, for example. I have a child thirty-five years of age. She is not exactly a child, but she was once. My children were born at home. I was opposed to the idea but naturally I did not count in that picture.

Take mining camps. This is where the doctors are bright. In a mining camp you usually have a hospital which is owned by the miners themselves. This is the way it operates in the part of the country from which I come. I do not see many doctors in the house at the moment. There are two here. Instead of going to the miner's home, the doctors found that it was much simpler to send him to the hospital. They had a contract with the hospital, and they can take care of half a dozen men in the hospital at one time instead of calling at half a dozen homes. I am not saying this in criticism. Were I a doctor I would do the same thing and perhaps do a great deal more of it and thereby save time for other people.

I pass along to one remark the minister made which I should like him to clarify. He said that the white population, contiguous to Indian reservations or to Eskimo people, were more subject to tuberculosis than other whites in Canada. I should like to ask whether or not the minister thinks active operation of tuberculosis among Indians and Eskimos can possibly have anything to do with that? In other words, is not the cause of tuberculosis among these people largely the conditions under which the patient, as he becomes later, is living? Does the minister really think the white population are infected with tuberculosis because they are living alongside Indians?

Mr. MARTIN: I was only quoting, without naming him, the work of Doctor Tisdall, who made perhaps the most extensive survey ever made among the Indian population. I am referring particularly to the great survey he made among the Indians in the James bay district.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is down east. I am quite unfamiliar with James bay. Only in the last two weeks I read of the wonderful job Doctor Tisdall had done, for which I am sure the people of Canada should be very grateful, even though many of us may not have read it.

I now turn to what I began with, namely arthritis. Do I summarize the position correctly when I say this? May I say, Mr. Chairman, that I say this without even a thought of blaming the minister, the department or anyone else. Is this not the present position with respect to arthritis? No one in the world today knows the cause of it. I think that is a fair statement. In January I myself spent a couple of weeks at perhaps the most famous institution of its kind in the world, and I certainly got that impression from the place in which I was. The minister said he hoped that, following this war, we would get the impetus that the investigation of tuberculosis received after the first great war. All of us will, I am sure, join the minister in that hope. But does it not resolve itself to this? By research, and particularly by treatment, because treatment is research—I mean a doctor has a dozen cases—a doctor learns something. An institution has a dozen cases. The doctor is in a much better position to make comparisons and therefore come to a conclusion which is more likely to be right than the conclusion of a person who has only a few cases.

I want to say just a word about an institution at Banff.

Mr. MARTIN: I know it very well.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am not for a moment saying it is successful or unsuccessful.

Mr. MARTIN: They have done good work.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): In this House of Commons we must not mention names or do anything of that kind. But is it not more likely that, by segregating these people in a place where many observations can be made by competent medical people, we shall more quickly arrive at a conclusion as to the origin of the disease and its treatment? Today, as I understand it, all we can do is to ease the pain. At the moment we know nothing as to the origin of the disease or as to its eradication. The only thing we can do at the moment is to ease the suffering of these people.

[Mr. Martin.]

The minister gave some figures which are even higher than I thought they were. We in Canada have a population of around twelve million people. The minister mentioned that a hundred thousand people were suffering severely. From that, I gather that the people to whom he referred were crippled by this disease. He then said that possibly 700,000—

Mr. MARTIN: Between 700,000 and 800,000. That is based upon a survey of 1938.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What does that mean? We are a population of twelve million people. Of that number 800,000 or 900,000 are suffering the pains of arthritis. I speak with some knowledge. I have just a little idea of what they are going through. I am one of those fortunate people in whom the disease was arrested. My good friend, the hon. member for Lanark, told me that sometimes the disease did arrest itself. I happened to be one of the hundreds to whom that happened. When it will start again I have no idea. But when we admit that 800,000 or 900,000 people out of 12,000,000—and it affects people of all ages—one-thirteenth or one-fourteenth of our total population are suffering and are apt to be crippled by this illness, then it seems to me that we have never known a greater national emergency.

Let us put it in this way. For the moment leave out the faculty of human suffering. Let us accept it on the basis of our economy. You take 800,000 out of 12,000,000 and you have cut down your working force, your earning force, your producing force. You have taken that number from our economy, because the minister will admit that the incidence below manhood and womanhood is not large. It does strike down young people, it is true, but I do not think the incidence among children is nearly so heavy as it is among those who have gone on to manhood and womanhood.

I give the minister credit; I honour him, for the conferences which he has called. I say to the members of this committee that no war has ever removed from our working forces that number of people, and one hesitates to contemplate the mass suffering which goes on among 800,000 people. If that is not a national emergency I never knew one.

As far as I am concerned, and I am sure I speak for all members of the committee, I will uphold the minister's hands in every way I can. Let us regard it from the economic side, if you like, a matter of money. But let us not do that. Let us rather be humanitarian and save these poor people from suffering, which is unnecessary if we can only find the remedy. Why have we not found it?

I have consulted many physicians, and they have given me the same answer. I say, "Why is it that there are so many people suffering from rheumatism?" I am told by competent X-ray people that I have enough rheumatism in my back to cripple me, but still I can dance a jig the odd time if I have sufficient fortification from the hon. member for Davenport. However, they all tell me that the reason we have not advanced further is that, while it is chronic, it is not fatal. That is true, and it is a statement which reflects no credit on the people of Canada or on the House of Commons.

Once more I assure, indeed I reassure, the minister that I will support him to the limit, as I am sure the house will, in any measures he can reasonably take to eliminate this scourge of all scourges, speaking of pain, from our midst.

Mr. McIVOR: I have just a word to say. The minister visited the lakehead during the past three sessions and spent weeks with the Indian agent, going through the Indian reserves, and, like a doctor, he was diagnosing the cases, finding out the needs of the Indians throughout the community in northwestern Ontario. Then he came back to the head of the lakes and visited the sanatorium. He visited men, women and children there, and I was surprised at the great kindness he showed to children who were ill. After that, the sanatorium board called him into conference and he got an earful. The result was that he backed up a former promise that a grant would be made by the dominion government to build an extension to our sanatorium. The report I received yesterday was that this extension has been made possible by this grant. On behalf of the board, I express our appreciation to the minister and his workers.

One other thing. During the past year, or more nearly two years, a new treatment has been introduced for tuberculosis. It is known as streptomycin. It is injected, and I can assure the committee that it works. But it costs a great deal. When it first came out it cost $3,000, and then it was cut down to nearly half. I have a close friend who took the treatment. At Christmas he collapsed, and now he is being discharged from the hospital by the first of July as cured. I hope this treatment can be made available to people who cannot pay $1,400 or more. Once more I express, on behalf of the sanatorium board, appreciation of the work of the minister and the splendid results that have followed.

Mr. BLAIR: I had not expected to speak on this subject again because, as I stated before the dinner recess, I wished to reserve my talk on matters of health until the introduction of the supplementary estimates, but the hon. member for Calgary West has introduced the question of arthritis. I have never missed a chance to say something about arthritis. It seems to be a hopeless disease and in the past it has been regarded in that light. When I say it is hopeless, I mean we have not yet found a cure for it. Research has been carried on, but we have not found a cure.

A situation has arisen where, in the public hospitals, in the small hospitals in the towns, and the city hospitals, the main public wards are filled with these people. Many of them have spent valuable resources in trying to get better. They get into the public wards and there they fill beds which are required for acute cases.

The hon. member mentioned 600,000 cases of chronic arthritis, but there are 125,000 acutely suffering. The point I make, however, is this. I was interested in the minister's account of what is being done at Sunnybrook. I have criticized that program before and I intend to criticize it again, because I do not feel that it is reaching the general medical practitioner. It is not reaching the man who has to do with cases. It is not reaching the medical schools, and nothing is being done in that way. While Sunnybrook can do research, and we are glad it is helping returned soldiers, it is not reaching the mass of the population.

It is all very well to carry on there, but I have seen patients in the public wards because there was nowhere else for them to go. The main thing is that if we are to deal with this problem we must start at the root of things.

Mention is made of specialists in arthritis. I do not know where they are, because you cannot specialize in something when you do not know the answer. I will say, however, that there are pseudospecialists who are taking advantage of these people by offering certain cures and taking their money, while little result is shown. We can, however, do something with this disease in the way of stopping some of these people from becoming hopeless cripples, and that requires, as has been suggested, some special apparatus. Some of this material is not available to general practitioners who come into contact with the greater number of patients.

Physiotherapy can do a great deal, and bed rest, complete rest. The hon. member for Calgary West mentioned hospitalization, and so did the minister later. This also comes into the question of arthritis. People are going into the hospital now for the reason that there is a shortage of trained nurses in Canada. You cannot get a trained nurse any place. The other thing is the shortage of help in the home. Industrial plants have bought industrial health insurance for their people. People are afraid of the high cost of sickness. They just cannot afford to be sick.

But to get back to the people who are suffering from arthritis, in spite of the fact that I do not pose as a specialist, I have had practical experience in seeing these poor people who suffer. I cannot feel that a start in coping with this disease has been accomplished at Sunnybrook. You are only dealing with a specialized bunch of people.

Mr. MARTIN: That is only part of what we are doing.

Mr. BLAIR: That is quite right. But the minister mentioned the impetus which will be given. It will take more than a few cases in Sunnybrook to give an impetus to this treatment of arthritis. This subject is poorly taught in the medical schools. There should be specialized lectures, not only on the cases of arthritis but on the differential diagnosis of the various types of arthritis. I myself found something like fifty or seventy different types of diagnosis in arthritis. Various cures were presented for various forms of arthritis. I actually found seventy different types of rheumatic diseases.

Mr. MARTIN: There are two hundred.

Mr. BLAIR: You have done better than I did.

Mr. MARTIN: You know more about it. But I am told that there are about two hundred.

Mr. BLAIR: The point I am trying to make is that you must get at the root of the matter. Doctors going out of the medical schools, before they start to intern, should be taught more about whatever causes we know could produce this condition. They should be taught differential diagnosis. Failing a cure at the present time, they should be taught some treatment to stop these people from becoming cripples; because once these joints are ankylosed, there is no chance of doing anything whatever for them. Then, when these doctors go out as new practitioners they will know something about it, and they will have some experience when they go into practice. There are few known arthritis clinics in the world any place, although there are a few. The government could give a grant in the form of travelling scholarships to students, our graduate young doctors who are interested, and let them get some specialization.

[Mr. Blair.]

Mr. MARTIN: Our new program will do that.

Mr. BLAIR: That is the idea; get some specialists in the profession who know something about the disease. Then we could help the general practitioners and we could help out some of these general hospitals. Possibly the number of beds for chronic cases may take care of some of that, but treatment must be given. The average small general hospital has not the facilities that are available at Sunnybrook, nor has the average doctor those facilities.

Mr. MARTIN: May I point out that is why we have given more for the chronic beds than for the acute ones.

Mr. BLAIR: Yes. But let me point out to the minister that this program for chronic beds has been in operation in Ontario for some time before he introduced it.

Mr. MARTIN: I am not saying that we are novel in this matter. I am just indicating the fact.

Mr. BLAIR: To get back to the matter of beds the minister must remember this. Hospital beds may now cost, let us say, $9,000 to $10,000 a bed; the figure has run beyond all bounds; and even with what the government adds to the amount given by the province of Ontario, nevertheless beds will cost about $2,500 more than they did prior to the war. So you are still going to have difficulty in getting beds. I refer particularly to beds for those people afflicted with a chronic disease. So we must get back to the basis of things. We must teach this subject in the medical schools. We must provide equipment whereby the people can be helped. We must have an educational campaign, not for the public alone but for the doctors. It should be a campaign to make people not regard this disease as being hopeless. It should be a campaign to save the poor people from having crippled joints. We can put into operation certain knowledge we have. If we do not know how to cure this disease, we can at least do something to stop this horrible suffering.

Mr. MARTIN: That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. HANSELL: I notice that it is one minute to eleven, Mr. Chairman; and since I have about a ten-minute speech, and since it is too valuable to split off after introducing it, I would suggest that you call it eleven o'clock.

Mr. FLEMING: Would the hon. member allow me to take up that minute of time for the purpose of asking some questions?

Mr. HANSELL: Go ahead.

Mr. FLEMING: There are several points as to which I asked for information which the minister has not yet given. The first was with regard to family allowances. I ask him if he would put the tables on the record now, so that we can have them in advance before we reach that point in the estimates. Would he please do that?

Mr. MARTIN: I will do that. I thought I had it here. It is ready. I will see that it gets on the record.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. FLEMING: Just a minute, Mr. Chairman. The minister will put that on the record so that we will have it, will he?

Mr. MARTIN: I will do that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. MARTIN: I am now producing table of family allowances comparable with the table shown at pages 4465 to 4467 of Hansard of last year. I hereby attach the tables to date.

The CHAIRMAN: Has the minister permission to table these documents?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. FLEMING: They will be printed in Hansard?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. MacINNIS: Just a minute. Where do these tables come from?

Mr. MARTIN: From the department. They are the family allowances statistics. We table them every year.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is all right.

Mr. FLEMING: We have had similar tables in previous sessions. It is just in order to get them on the record.

Mr. MARTIN: The tables are as follows:

Mr. FLEMING: There are two other questions.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. FLEMING: Might I just get this on the record, Mr. Chairman? It may save some time later on. I asked the minister if he would give the total expenditures last year on travelling expenses on all items. Can he please give us that?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. The figure is $448,766.06, plus commitments in the amount of $34,918.35. With regard to this, may I say that I believe the way for our officials to help in the co-ordination of national health is not to stick at their desks in Ottawa, but to get out in the field as frequenly as possible.

Mr. FLEMING: The other question was as to the actual expenditures on the items. The minister indicated to me that he preferred not to give that information in advance.

Mr. MARTIN: I will deal with the matter item by item, as we did last year.

Mr. FLEMING: That will take a great deal of time.

Mr. MARTIN: I think it is the most satisfactory way by which to deal with the matter.

Mr. FLEMING: I venture to disagree with the minister. It means that we must ask the question on every item. If the minister will put the figures on the record, it will save a great deal of time which will be taken in asking questions.

Mr. MARTIN: As we come to each item, I shall be glad to give that information without being prompted.

Mr. FLEMING: Very well. Will the minister give the total?

Mr. MARTIN: I will give my hon. friend anything he asks for.

Mr. FLEMING: Will he give us the total of expenses now?

Mr. MARTIN: When we come to each item I shall be glad to give the information on it.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister is talking about giving it on each item.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: I am talking about giving the total now.

Mr. MARTIN: I shall be glad to give the information with regard to each item as we come to it. My hon. friend and I had the same argument last year. I intend to give him the information he wants, but not in the form in which he wants it, because I do not think it is the most practical way of doing it.

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. FLEMING: When shall we get the total of expenditures, not the figures segregated into items?

Mr. MARTIN: After the last item.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacNICOL: What will be the business on Monday?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): If the Minister of Finance is here, we shall consider the two resolutions standing in his name, the one concerning the Tariff Board Act and the other to authorize the Canadian National Railways to issue securities to meet capital expenditures or capital indebtedness. Then we shall proceed with the following bills: No. 334, to amend the Land Titles Act; No. 340, respecting the supplying of electrical power in the Northwest Territories; No. 341, to amend the Yukon Act; No. 337, to amend the criminal code.

When these have been considered we shall move to go into supply, and call one new department. Then we shall proceed with the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare, Trade and Commerce, Reconstruction and Supply; but I cannot say in which order we shall take these different matters.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the minister mean merely that he does not know in what order the departments in supply will be taken, but that the other matters will be taken in the order indicated?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I am not sure whether we can proceed first with the resolutions or the bills. Three bills are in the name of the Minister of Mines and Resources, and one is in the name of the Minister of Justice. I cannot say exactly the order in which they will be taken. However we shall try to take them some time during the day.

Mr. ADAMSON: Which new department will be taken?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The Prime Minister's office.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, June 14, 1948

The house met at eleven o'clock.

LORD'S DAY ACT

AMENDMENTS AS TO LEAVE TO PROSECUTE—REPEAL OF ONTARIO PRE-CONFEDERATION STATUTE

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 344, to amend the Lord's Day Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, this bill consists of two sections only. The first section provides that the consent for prosecution may be given, not only by the attorney general but by the deputy attorney general. The second section provides for the repeal of Ontario's pre-confederation statute respecting the observance of the Lord's Day, thereby placing the matter in Ontario entirely under the Lord's Day Act.

Mr. CHURCH: Is this a transfer to the provinces of the jurisdiction under the Lord's Day Act?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is just the reverse so far as Ontario is concerned.

Mr. CHURCH: In the past, the enforcement of this act has always been a matter for the provinces.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

OCCUPATIONAL DISEASES

Mr. BAKER:

1. What is being done by the Department of National Health and Welfare in combating occupational diseases such as silicosis among Canadian industrial workers?

2. Is any educational work being done to raise the level of industrial health in Canada?

Mr. MAYBANK:

1. The industrial health division of the Department of National Health and Welfare is co-operating with the departments of health of the provinces of Nova Scotia and Alberta in specific studies of silicosis, lead poisoning and carbon monoxide poisoning as these diseases occur in the groups of establishments surveyed. The federal department has assigned specially trained personnel and has carried out field and laboratory estimations on the air contamination responsible for the diseases under study. This co-ordination of federal and provincial facilities has already resulted in one province creating a permanent industrial health agency.

During the past year, the industrial health division provided information to various industries and provincial governments in regard to the following matters: expansion of the occupational disease schedule under workmen's compensation acts, effectiveness of ultra-violet light and glycol sprays in the control of airborne infections, assessment and control of carbon tetrachloride hazard, the control of dermatitis in several industrial processes, and the status of ozone in the control of carbon monoxide poisoning.

In co-operation with the industrial hygiene division of Ontario, the division has just completed the preparation of a manual on the diagnosis of occupational diseases which will serve as a reference guide for general medical practitioners.

2. Yes. During the past year, the division distributed to industry over 150,000 posters and pamphlets dealing with various aspects of industrial health. The usefulness and practical nature of the division's educational material is demonstrated by the fact that industries across Canada have requested over 25,000 copies of the recently issued pamphlet "Skin Diseases in Industry". The division also issues a monthly industrial health bulletin to 25,000 English and 10,000 French industrial subscribers. The interest in this bulletin has been considerable, and increasing requests for copies are being received from Canadian firms as well as from many foreign countries.

PUGWASH, N.S., HARBOUR—DREDGING

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

What has been the yearly and total expenditures for dredging the entrance to and the harbour of the port of Pugwash, Nova Scotia, since confederation, not including wharf construction?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No record of any expenditure for dredging entrance to and the harbour of the port of Pugwash, N.S., since confederation.

COST OF PRESENT SESSION OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. CARDIFF:

Not including members' salaries, what was the total cost of this session of parliament from December 5, 1947 to January 25, 1948, inclusive?

Mr. BELZILE:

House of Commons	$102,030.54
Senate	16,565.98
	$118,596.52

This amount includes cost of sessional staff, printing and travelling expenses for Christmas recess, but does not include salaries for permanent and continuous temporary staff employed the year round.

INDIANS—SASKATCHEWAN—MEDICAL SERVICES

Mr. MUTCH:

What steps have been taken to improve the medical services for Indians in northern Saskatchewan?

Mr. MAYBANK:

Prince Albert—A health unit has been established at Prince Albert which is supplying health services to approximately 3,000 Indians. It is staffed by a surgeon, a medical doctor and a public health nurse.

Lac la Ronge—A nursing station will be in operation at Lac la Ronge very shortly. A residence has been purchased by the directorate of Indian health services from the Anglican mission and renovated to accommodate six patients and necessary staff. It will supply emergency and nursing services and the usual dispensing and public health services to the area around Lac la Ronge, including Fort Stanley.

Arrangements have been made with the Saskatchewan department of health whereby, in certain remote areas where the non-Indian or half-breed population is substantial, nursing stations are being built by the province at which Indians will be cared for. A reciprocal arrangement is being put into effect at Lac la Ronge whereby the directorate of Indian health services will give to the extent possible necessary health services to the non-Indian population there. This eliminates duplication. A doctor from the Prince Albert health unit is making regular trips to Lac la Ronge, which is about two hundred miles north of Prince Albert.

North Battleford—The former R.C.A.F. hospital at North Battleford and several other buildings have been acquired by the directorate of Indian health services. The renovation of the building is complete and it will be ready for the admission of patients this summer. Capacity—about 60 patients. A public health nurse will be included in the establishment of this hospital, who will be responsible for visiting reserves in the area.

Onion Lake area—The Indian affairs branch of the Department of Mines and Resources has agreed to transfer to the directorate of Indian health services of the Department of National Health and Welfare the Indian agent's house in the Onion Lake area for use as a nursing station. The necessary alterations will be proceeded with within the next few months and an arrangement similar to that in effect at Lac la Ronge will be made. The nursing station will accommodate about four patients, a public health nurse and necessary staff.

EMBARGO ON CANADIAN CATTLE TO UNITED STATES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has any action been taken as announced by the Minister of Agriculture last week in south Ontario that the cattle embargo is soon to be removed to allow Canadian cattle to enter the United States?

2. If so, will such action increase the cost of meat to citizens for home consumption in Canada?

3. Has any action been taken by order in council?

Mr. McCUBBIN:

1. No action yet taken.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

*RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Mr. HAZEN:

When does the chairman of the standing committee on railways and shipping, owned, operated and controlled by the government, intend to present the report of the committee to the house?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Perhaps I can reply to this orally. I have been in communication with the chairman of the standing committee on railways and shipping, and he assures me that the report is now in the course of preparation and should be ready soon.

AMMONIUM NITRATE

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. What quantity of ammonium nitrate was exported from Canada and to what countries for the period from January 1, 1947, up to and including April 1, 1948?

2. What was the value per ton of the above exports?

Mr. McILRAITH: Mr. Speaker, it is not possible to get the information asked for in this question, because ammonium nitrate is not classified separately in external trade statistics.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. LENNARD: Stand.

An hon. MEMBER: Answered.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

HOUSING—ONTARIO

Mr. BENIDICKSON:

1. By years and municipalities, how many wartime houses have been constructed in Ontario and what has been the outlay of the federal government on each project?

2. By municipalities, how many houses are under construction in Ontario by Wartime Housing Limited?

Mr. McILRAITH: Return tabled.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

MCCANN COMMISSION

Mr. LOW:

For a copy of the evidence and proceedings of the McCann commission, appointed under the authority of P.C. 4980.

Mr. GREGG: It is not possible to comply with this order, because the interviews held by the McCann commission with witnesses took the form of discussions rather than formal evidence and no written record was maintained. The witnesses were not sworn, and as a result they gave evidence over and above that which would have been required had they been informed that they were proceeding on a formal basis under oath. Some of the discussions at Vancouver were recorded on sound recording discs in order to assist the commissioner in writing his report on that phase of the hearing.

The report of the McCann commission was tabled in the House of Commons on March 9, 1948, and it set forth the number of commission sittings, inspections and observations, a list of the cases considered, a list of the persons interviewed and the commission's findings.

I ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. LOW: There are a number of important cases which my colleagues, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), have been attempting to place before the house. In order to do that as they wish to do it, they would have to have the relevant parts of the evidence taken by the McCann commission. I would ask the minister to reconsider his decision and see if it would not be possible to give us a transcription of the relevant parts of the evidence taken by that commission. We feel that that should be before the house.

Mr. POULIOT: If the present Minister of Veterans Affairs had been in charge of the department at the time, that commission would not have been necessary. It is because of what was said by the minister, what was said falsely by the previous minister of veterans affairs—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: —that the commission was made necessary.

Mr. GREGG: I wanted to give the explanation I have given to make it clear that the evidence was not written and preserved. I shall look into the matter further and comply with the request as far as it is possible.

Mr. LOW: Thank you very much.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motion as amended agreed to.

TRANSPORT BOARD

JUDGE OF EXCHEQUER COURT TO BE CHIEF COMMISSIONER

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Railway Act, the Exchequer Court Act and the Judges Act, 1946, to authorize a judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada to hold the office of chief commissioner of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada at a salary of fifteen thousand dollars per annum less any salary received by him as a judge of the exchequer court; and to provide further that the exchequer court shall consist of the president and four puisne judges (in lieu of three), the salary of the puisne judges being twelve thousand dollars per annum.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

REVISED STATUTES

PROVISION FOR COMMISSION TO EFFECT REVISION

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure respecting the Revised Statutes of Canada, to thereby establish a commission to effect such revision and to authorize remuneration to be paid the members of the commission, assistants, officers, clerks and employees.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether it will be a commission of judges, and how long the revision is expected to take?

Mr. ILSLEY: That question should be left for discussion on the bill.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO ACCIDENT IN TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I would call the attention of the government to a serious accident which occurred in my constituency yesterday morning, Sunday the 13th, about 9.15 o'clock, when an eighty-two car westbound freight train pulled by two diesel engines collided with a twenty-four car freight train with steam locomotive, and two livestock cars were hurled into the back yard of Doctor Hastings, 791 Queen street east, tearing hydroelectric overhead structures, poles and wires. A brakeman was killed. Four cars contained animals, which roamed around, and a women was gored by a mad bull. Had this accident happened a few seconds before, these freight cars would have been hurled into the subway where crowded streetcars pass, and where church services were being held a hundred feet away at Woodgreen United Church.

My question is this. Under the Railway Act will the government request the board of transport commissioners, who are to meet in Toronto a week from tomorrow, on Tuesday the 22nd instant, to hold an inquiry (a) into this terrible disaster and the causes of it, and the need for increased safety precautions at this place; (b) into the reopening of the Riverdale station of the Canadian National Railways; and (c) into the whole railway signal system in this section of Toronto, together with an inspection of the viaduct at this site in ward 1, as to its structure and the desirability of slowing the speed of trains using the Toronto viaduct.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is the practice of the board of transport commissioners, when a serious accident of this kind takes place, to hold first of all a preliminary investigation, which I presume they are doing now. Upon the report of that investigation they decide whether or not there should be a formal inquiry, and I presume, from what I know and have read of the accident, that there will be a formal investigation. I shall ask the board of transport commissioners to give consideration to the request of my hon. friend. There is no doubt that the request in the first part of my hon. friend's question will be met. His other two requests go somewhat beyond the scope of a board investigation, but I shall be glad to discuss the matter with the board.

COST OF LIVING

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENTAL ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Finance? It is brief and to the point, and can be answered by yes or no. Does the government intend to take any action to curb the still rising cost of living?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): It is possible that the question could be answered by yes or no, Mr. Speaker, but it is not going to be answered in that way. My answer is that I have nothing to add to what I have said on previous occasions, particularly when the whole question of rising costs was discussed. The government is not going to establish an over-all price ceiling policy or an over-all control of wages. As I said in my budget speech, it has neither the constitutional power nor an electoral mandate to do so.

Mr. KNOWLES: In other words, the answer is no.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, it is not.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of an answer he gave a moment or two ago. Will the government welcome a report from the prices committee this session, and will it provide an opportunity for a discussion of such before the conclusion of the session?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that that is not a question that should be directed to me; it should be directed to the leader of the government.

An hon. MEMBER: Where is he?

Mr. IRVINE: I should like to ask another supplementary question. The minister, in answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), said that the government had no intention of going back to price control.

Mr. ABBOTT: Over-all wage and price control.

Mr. IRVINE: Will the minister kindly state to what the government proposes to go forward?

Mr. ABBOTT: What is my hon. friend's question? In my answer I went on to say that the dominion government had neither the constitutional power nor the parliamentary mandate to impose over-all wage and price control. That is perfectly clear. The National Emergency Transitional Powers Act has been extended to March 31. The government's position was made perfectly clear. It was made clear before the 1945 election. Whether or not the country sees fit to approve the constitutional amendment is another matter. They have turned it down in Australia.

Mr. KNOWLES: But the wartime prices and trade board is still in existence and could restore price controls.

Mr. IRVINE: I think the minister misunderstood my question. I did not wish to inquire as to the constitutional attitude. What I wanted to know was this. Since there is a constitution, and since the government cannot go back, and has no intention of going back, to what is it going forward? What is the program?

Mr. SPEAKER: The question the hon. member has put to the government is not one which should be asked on the orders of the day.

Mr. FLEMING: The Minister of Finance indicated that my question should be directed to the leader of the government. I presume the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) is acting as leader of the government; therefore I should like to direct my question to him. Will the government welcome a report from the prices committee, and if so, will it provide ample time for a discussion of such report before the conclusion of the present session of parliament?

Mr. ILSLEY: I will bring my hon. friend's question to the attention of the leader of the government.

RADIO BROADCASTING

INQUIRY AS TO PURCHASE OF FORD HOTEL BUILDING, MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. It is another brief question which can be answered by yes or no. Is the C.B.C. now taking over or about to take over the Ford hotel building in Montreal for occupancy purposes?

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, it is not a question that can be answered by yes or no, but I shall be glad to state the present position. The government propose, and have already entered into negotiations to that end, to purchase by agreement of sale the Ford hotel for the international short-wave service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Negotiations are being carried on by the C.B.C., and when the deal goes through, the corporation will become the tenants of the building.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If I may ask a further question, has the price been determined upon, and if so, what is it?

Mr. McCANN: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Although the agreement has not been consummated, the offer which has been made by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on behalf of the crown for the purchase of the Ford hotel is $2,050,000.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If I may ask a supplementary question, has the government given full consideration to the very strong feelings in various quarters in Montreal against this proceeding?

Mr. McCANN: Every consideration has been given to that. There has been no such great protest as has been indicated by my hon. friend that we know of.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SEAMEN'S STRIKE ON INLAND WATERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is he prepared to make a report on the strike of seamen on certain steamships on inland waters in Canada, with particular reference to the basic cause of this strike?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I can make a report. I think my hon. friend knows the basic cause. It is a jurisdictional scrap, to begin with.

Mr. MacINNIS: No.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know whereof I speak.

Mr. MacINNIS: I know what the commissioner reported.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know whereof I speak. Second, the position is taken by some of the companies that they will not deal with an organization led by communists. There are three parties in this dispute: Pat Sullivan, who used to be a communist, and then there is the other organization which is admittedly communist-led; and according to this morning's papers the American Federation of Labor is coming into the picture. I know something about the tactics of these people. We have just had a provincial election, and is it not passing strange that the only political meetings that it was attempted to break up were Progressive Conservative and Liberal meetings? I would say this to my hon. friend, that people who talk so much about freedom of speech and the right to express their opinions are the very first to deny that freedom to other people.

TOURIST INDUSTRY

QUESTIONING OF UNITED STATES CITIZENS AS TO EXPENDITURES DURING VISITS TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to ask which I think should properly be addressed to the Minister of National Revenue. Is it a fact that Canadian officials at the border are instructed to question United States tourist returning to their own country, and to ask them how much money they have spent in Canada and what kind of money it has been? If that is the practice, does the minister consider it wise?

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): I know of no such instructions at the present time, but if it were the practice I would see no great objection to it.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the minister give definite information later as to whether or not it is the practice?

Mr. McCANN: I will find out whether or not it is the practice. If it is the practice it is for the purpose of securing statistics with reference to the tourist trade.

Mr. JACKMAN: Bad business!

COARSE GRAINS

REMOVAL OF PRICE CEILINGS—QUESTION AS TO ADDITIONAL PAYMENTS TO FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the session is almost over, is he in a position to say whether or not legislation will be introduced to provide that farmers who disposed of coarse grains prior to the removal of price ceilings last October 21 shall receive payments in addition to the adjustments made by elevator companies and purchasers?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The matter is still under consideration. I hope to make an announcement before the session is closed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The reason I ask the question is that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has announced out in Saskatchewan—outside of parliament—that something is forthcoming. I thought the minister might be in a position to confirm the statement of the Minister of Agriculture.

CATTLE

EMBARGO ON SHIPMENT TO THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): In view of reports appearing in the press, will the Minister of Finance or the Acting Minister of Agriculture indicate to the house whether the government has arrived at a policy with respect to the removal of the embargo on cattle shipments to the United States?

Mr. MARTIN: It was discussed here two weeks ago.

Mr. FLEMING: It concerns the consumers who are paying high prices for beef.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): This is a matter which does not concern the Department of Finance.

Mr. FLEMING: I directed my question either to the Minister of Finance or to the acting Minister of Agriculture. The Minister of Finance has indicated that it does not come within his department; therefore I direct my question to the acting Minister of Agriculture, whoever he may be.

Mr. ABBOTT: He is not in the house, but I will see that the question is brought to his attention.

TARIFF BOARD ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO TENURE OF OFFICE, APPOINTMENT, ETC.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Tariff Board Act in respect to the tenure of office of and appointment of members of the tariff board to serve in a temporary capacity; to bring the staff of the board under the Civil Service Act and the Civil Service Superannuation Act; to repeal obsolete provisions; and to increase the salary of the chairman of the board from twelve thousand to fifteen thousand dollars annually.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, this resolution is of great importance, because for a long time the only difference between the Liberal party and the then Conservative party was the tariff question. I remember the time when Mr. Bennett rose in glory to say that with a higher tariff the price of butter would be higher. He imposed this high tariff and the price of butter fell down to rock bottom of seventeen cents. When he first enunciated that policy I was sitting in the part of the house where the hon. member for Macleod is, and I rose to say "on division." I was the only one of the Liberal party who protested against this high tariff policy, because I was not impressed by Mr. Bennett's victory. I knew that he would not be longer in office than the time prescribed by the constitution.

Later Mr. Bennett established this tariff board, consisting of three men of his choice. They stayed in office the whole time the Liberal party was in power, until the war—all Tories making up the Liberal policy, being the advisers of the government on tariff policy. One or two of them are still there; one has been promoted to the office of minister to Cuba. I cannot understand, sir, how it is that Tories are making up Liberal tariff policy as advisers to the government. I want them to be fired. One is now gone. I do not know where the second one is; the third is still there. We are asked to raise his salary from $12,000 to $15,000 a year. They are wizards. I remember the time when we had new tariff rates with the United States after the election of 1936. It was done in a very short time. These people do not seem to realize how important it is to be careful about changing any tariff item. If the tariff is to work clocklike, one must not forget a single wheel in the mechanism. It takes a long time to make adjustments. The tariff may be a dangerous weapon. It was used by President Hoover when he came to power, and it had a disastrous effect on American trade.

We cannot be too careful, and I cannot conceive how it was that there was a complete change in the tariff with the United States immediately after this party came to power. Just a few months after the election of 1935 we had a new tariff made by these experts—Tory experts—to change trade conditions in relation to the United States; to improve them. In one sense it was a good thing, because it showed that Canada was willing to trade with the United States and with all countries of the world. In that theoretical sense the tariff may have been acceptable, but it is so delicate a matter, and so difficult to size up the importance of each item, that I cannot conceive how those experts could produce it with a snap of the finger.

They are still there, still enjoying the confidence of the department, and making new tariffs. We have the tariff board, and they are supreme. When they decide something, it is most difficult to have it changed. What can they do with the multilateral agreements that we have with all the countries of the world? What did they do when they were at Geneva? What did they do in Havana? What did they do about the 800 amendments that were submitted in connection with the multilateral pact at Geneva?

This is an important question. We should not say yes to an increase in the salaries of these experts until we know more about the kind of work they are doing. I want to know also whether their advice is accepted freely by the cabinet, or with a grain of salt. These men who sit behind desks in their offices and look at the statistics compiled by other bureaucrats have not the knowledge of trade that some captains of industry have, and at times they ruin Canadian trade.

Why is it impossible to get some of the material that we should have from other countries? My idea is that Canada should not be tied up to agreements that may profitably affect other countries. We should make our own agreements with each one of the other countries, so that we may get from other countries the things that are not produced here. There should be an exchange in accordance with the intentions of Providence, which has given to this world different climates and different compositions of soil in order that people throughout the world should be able to trade together.

This is one of the most important questions we have before us. I would ask the leader of the opposition this question: What is the difference between the program of his party and the program of the Liberal party concerning the tariff? Will he tell me that if his party comes into power he will fire the present staff of the tariff board? I put the same question to the C.C.F. members. I put the same question to the members of the Social Credit group.

We should have reform, and it should start now. We should not wait until after the Liberal convention to have promise of reform. We should have it now, and I do not believe that Canadian trade should be kept in a strait jacket by the tariff board, by men who have no actual knowledge of that trade, men who ruined the trade of Canada in the years of Bennett and who have been a handicap to Canadian trade since they have been there. Personally I have nothing against them; they may be good citizens; but I believe that too much power is vested in them. I do not see why they should have supreme authority over tariff matters, which formed the only line of division between the two old parties before there were new parties in Canada.

I remember reading the speeches of Sir Richard Cartwright and Sir George Foster when they discussed trade matters. The Tory party was a protectionist party; the Liberal party was a free trade party. But at the time the policies were made they were made by the party itself. The Conservative party, alias Tory party, had chosen to make its own policies; the Liberal party had its own policies as to trade. We must deal with efficiency and friendliness with other nations, but we must make our own separate trade agreements, and those trade agreements should be discussed by the party itself before they are decided by these supreme wizards.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Does the minister propose to make a statement at this stage?

Mr. ABBOTT: The bill which will be founded on the resolution is neither long nor complicated. It provides for certain amendments to the Tariff Board Act of 1931 that are desirable before steps are taken to reconstitute the board which, owing to unavoidable circumstances, is at present unable to carry out its duties.

There is only one member, the chairman, Mr. Hector B. McKinnon. The original board, appointed in 1933, consisted of the Hon. G. H. Sedgewick, chairman, Mr. M. N. Campbell, vice-chairman; and Mr. C. P. Hebert. On Mr. Sedgewick's death, Mr. H. B. McKinnon, who had previously been commissioner of tariff, was appointed chairman. In 1943, the ten-year term of Messrs. Campbell and Hebert expired. The former retired that year on pension, and the latter, whose pension rights had accrued, was on overseas service and has since entered the diplomatic service of Canada.

There are a number of appeals from decisions of various administrative authorities which have been awaiting hearing for some months, and it is important that the legislation be proceeded with at this session. Certain of the proposed amendments are consequential on other legislation approved at the last session.

As hon. members are aware, the act of 1931 laid upon the tariff board two main duties; first, to conduct inquiries in respect of tariff problems specifically referred to it by the Minister of Finance and to report thereon to him and to parliament; and second, to replace the then existing board of customs, which was a departmental body, as a board of appeal from decisions of the administrative authorities in respect of the provisions of the Customs Act, the Excise Tax Act, and the Excise Act.

During the war, there were no references by the minister on tariff matters. Since the war, tariff negotiations on an international basis have fully occupied the time of the sole member of the board. But in the second sphere of the board's duties, that of a court of appeal from rulings of the administrative authorities, appeals have continued to be lodged which cannot be heard because, in respect of this section of the act, one member does not constitute a quorum, nor does the act provide for the creation of temporary members except in the case of incapacity of existing members.

There are now awaiting hearing ten or twelve appeals by Canadian interests, and the Minister of National Revenue is as anxious to see these disposed of by the board as are the appellants themselves. The house will recall that under Bill No. 229, which is still under discussion, much wider facility for appeal to the tariff board is being granted under the provisions of the Customs Act, with provision for further appeal either by the public or by the departments, to the exchequer court, and, indeed, to the Supreme Court of Canada.

For the information of members, I might state that it is most unusual for a decision of the tariff board to be further appealed, even though in the past there has been limited provision for appeal in respect of rulings under various sections of the Customs Act. The hearings of the board in these matters are open to the public; they lack the formality of court proceedings; they are participated in by men, whether government officials or otherwise, who have a practical knowledge of the subject matter and whose sole objective is the ascertainment of fact; they entail no cost whatsoever to any litigant, and within my memory at least there has never been a suggestion as to further appeal. However, as I stated a moment ago, the Minister of National Revenue is now making specific provision, in both the Customs Act and the Excise Tax Act, for appeal to the courts from decisions of the tariff board, having in mind the greatly widened area of appeal to the tariff board which others of his proposals will make possible.

I suppose it would be more appropriate for me to outline when we come to second reading the provisions of the bill which will be founded on this resolution. As I say, they are comparatively simple.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. McKinnon was a Bennett appointee, was he not?

Mr. ABBOTT: He was a civil servant. I understand he had been a newspaperman on the old Toronto Globe. He was appointed commissioner of tariffs, and in 1940 when he was commissioner of tariffs he was appointed chairman of the tariff board. He functioned, of course, during the war as chairman of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, and I should say that the greater part of his time was devoted to that function, since the tariff board was comparatively inactive.

Mr. POULIOT: He was appointed secretary of the tariff board by Mr. Bennett.

Mr. GOLDING: Not McKinnon.

Mr. POULIOT: He was a Bennett appointee. I do not know the job he was appointed to, but he was a Bennett appointee.

Mr. ABBOTT: I could not say for sure.

Mr. CHURCH: This is the third board within a week concerning which the government has introduced legislation. The resolution has to do with the organization, functions and powers of the board under the Tariff Board Act, and many other matters, such as increases of salary and repeal of obsolete provisions. The chairman of the board, Mr. McKinnon, is a good man, but the board was obsolete from the time of the Geneva meetings last year right down to November when the Geneva pact was announced. The intention is to place the board under the Civil Service Act. If that is done, it simply means that there will be political interference with the functions and powers of the board. I am opposed to the whole way the board has been carrying on. For eight months last year the board ceased to function as such but performed government functions both at Geneva and in Cuba, when some of the officers down there, over the head of parliament, upset the whole economic policy which has been followed in this country since confederation.

I am opposed to the policy of bringing down at this late date, the 105th day of the session, legislation which will result in interference and expense, the amount of which we do not know. As for the civil service commission and the way they are functioning at the present time, they will be the next board with respect to which a bill will be introduced increasing their powers and salaries.

Mr. FLEMING: If the minister would give to the committee, not necessarily a detailed review, but a brief outline of the provisions of the bill, it might save some questions.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be glad to do that. Briefly, the provisions of the bill are as follows. First, provision is made that future appointments to the staff of the board shall be made through the civil service commission rather than as heretofore by order in council.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Does that include the chairman?

Mr. ABBOTT: That does not include the chairman and the members of the board, no. I am speaking of the staff of the board only. Second, there is provision for the blanketing-in of the board's present employees, some ten in number, as civil servants. That is a necessary provision and consequential upon the first one. Third, provision is made, under prescribed circumstances, for the appointment of temporary members of the board, to meet situations created by absence or illness. It has been found inconvenient in recent months that it was not possible to make a temporary appointment in the case of illness or absence. Fourth, provision is made for cancellation for the future of the non-contributory pension provision for members of the board. It has been put on a contributory basis. Originally the act provided for payment of a non-contributory pension, which I think most members of the committee will agree is not a desirable general principle. Finally, provision is made for the restoration of the salary of the chairman of the board to the amount fixed in the act at the time of its adoption.

Those are the main provisions. The detailed discussion we could have when the bill is before the committee. As hon. members will see it, it is a comparatively simple bill.

Mr. FLEMING: These appointments to meet a temporary situation, I presume, are to be simply ad hoc appointments for designated purposes?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. FLEMING: Is it the intention that existing vacancies on the board shall be filled?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. It is the intention that at the earliest possible day the board will be reconstituted with three members as provided by the statute.

Mr. FLEMING: There is no change at all in the present powers or functions of the board?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I should not like the committee to proceed from the resolution stage without saying a word or two concerning the remarks made by the hon. member for Temiscouata. I think perhaps he knows, as do the rest of hon. members in this chamber, that those who have served on this necessary institution in our economy, the tariff board, are recognized, not only in Canada and Washington but the world over, as most outstanding men in their particular line of work and outstanding civil servants.

The men who have had charge of tariff legislation for Canada are recognized everywhere as eminent and capable officers of that particular department. When the hon. member for Temiscouata rises in his place and says they should be fired, and when he talks about their being Tory appointments and what not, I say to him, with all due respect for his seniority rights in this chamber, that he is not stating facts. I am sorry that he should feel disposed to malign those who have served so faithfully and who are recognized throughout the whole commercial world as some of the most outstanding, impartial and capable servants of Canada in this difficult field of tariff legislation.

Mr. CHURCH: One of the functions of the board was to promote trade. Now the whole policy is to be changed. A week ago a bill was brought in with respect to another board, namely, the railway board. One of the duties of this board while over at Geneva was to promote preferential trade. They did not do that. In fact, all empire trade under that board has been practically abolished at a time when empire trade means more to the empire and the world than it ever meant before.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know whether I made it clear that no changes are to be made in the powers and duties of the board. It is probably not necessary for me to say in this committee anything about the outstanding record of public service the present chairman, Mr. Hector McKinnon, rendered both prior to and throughout the war. Since I have been Minister of Finance I have placed the greatest confidence in his knowledge and judgment with regard to tariff matters. I have constantly used the provisions of the Tariff Board Act which say that the Minister of Finance may ask the tariff board to make inquiries. I have asked the chairman of the tariff board to advise me, as Minister of Finance, about tariff matters. I doubt if there is in Canada today a man with wider knowledge of Canadian tariffs than the present chairman of the tariff board. I have no idea as to what his political affiliations may be, or what they formerly were.

Mr. POULIOT: I have a question to ask my genial colleague, the hon. member for Danforth. Did he answer my question on his own behalf or on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Chairman, I do not think I have to sit and take that, even from the hon. member for Temiscouata. Never yet on my own behalf have I advanced any particular interests, speaking individually; and as a member of the party I am not authorized to speak on behalf of it. I have been here long enough, and I know enough about the matter now under consideration, at least to get up and to make some observations in which I have repudiated some of the remarks of the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: If the hon. member had spoken on behalf of his party, I would have asked him to read his power of attorney.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Does the hon. member for Temiscouata speak on behalf of his party?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the resolution?

Mr. FLEMING: I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but I do suggest to the government that the next time it wishes to conduct an inquiry into prices or the reasons for price increases, instead of appointing a parliamentary committee for the purpose, and taking up a lot of time in that committee, and keeping discussions off the floor of the house—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. FLEMING: —that it use the provisions of the Tariff Board Act for that purpose. I say that because this act clothes the board with power to do these things. I draw the attention of the committee to sections 4 and 5 of the Tariff Board Act of 1931, chapter 55 of the statutes of that year.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I doubt if the hon. member's observations are in order at the present moment.

Mr. FLEMING: I am simply drawing the attention of the minister to the powers of the board under the present act, and the provisions set out in the resolution now before the committee. I shall be brief.

The resolution is designed to enlarge the board, and to permit it to function hereafter. The minister has indicated it could not function during the past year.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not for purposes of appeals.

Mr. FLEMING: Because they have not had a quorum available. I am simply drawing the attention of the minister and the committee to some of the powers which are given to the board under sections 4 and 5 of the act. Section 4 states:

4. (1) In respect of goods produced in or imported into Canada the board shall, at the request of the minister, make inquiry as to—

(a) the price and cost of raw materials in Canada and elsewhere, and the cost of transportation thereof from the place of production to the place of use or consumption;

(b) the cost of efficient production in Canada and elsewhere, and what increases or decreases in rates of duty are required to equalize differences in the cost of efficient production; . . .

(d) The prices received by producers, manufacturers, wholesale dealers, retailers and other distributors in Canada and elsewhere;

(e) all conditions and factors which affect or enter into the cost of production and the price to the consumers in Canada;

(f) generally, all the conditions affecting production, manufacture, cost and price in Canada as compared with other countries; and report to the minister.

Under subsection 3 the board may be empowered by the governor in council to hold an inquiry under the customs tariff; and under subsection 4—

The governor in council may empower the board to make any investigation or hold any inquiry authorized by the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act, or of a relative nature,—

Under section 5 of the act the board has full power to summons witnesses, to administer oaths and to conduct hearings and inquiries. I suggest to the minister that any time he wishes to have a further inquiry made into matters such as I have referred to, this would be a useful vehicle, instead of appointing a useless parliamentary committee for the purpose.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 345, to amend the Tariff Board Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a second time?

Mr. KNOWLES: Now.

Mr. ABBOTT: Now.

Mr. ABBOTT moved the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Abbott moves that I do leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee on said bill.

Mr. BRACKEN: We have not seen this bill. We surely should not be asked to give second reading to a bill we have not seen.

Mr. ABBOTT: It can be done only with unanimous consent of the house. I do not press it at all.

Mr. BRACKEN: I think there is no disposition to hold it up; but I suggest it is bad practice to proceed with second reading of a bill before we have seen the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the house prefer to have second reading at the next sitting?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is a routine bill. We have had a full discussion.

Mr. POULIOT: If the leader of the opposition agreed with the hon. member for Danforth, he could swallow the bill in a gulp.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then we shall proceed with committee of the whole at the next sitting.

An hon. MEMBER: Second reading?

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion for second reading has been carried.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Mr. GLEASON BELZILE (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to issue securities not exceeding $85,882,-

200 in principal amount to provide the moneys necessary to meet capital expenditures made or capital indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1948; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the making of temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $85,882,200 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and indebtedness; with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system and to authorize the Minister of Finance to place at the disposal of the national company or the Trans-Canada Air Lines, such amounts as may be necessary to enable them to pay operating and income charges if at any time in any year the available revenues of the national railway system or the Trans-Canada Air Lines and subsidiaries, respectively, are not sufficient to pay such charges: Provided that all such amounts shall be reimbursed to the minister from the recipients' annual revenues in so far as such revenues are sufficient, any insufficiency to be provided for by subsequent deficit appropriation by parliament.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the parliamentary assistant give a word of explanation?

Mr. BELZILE: Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the house is long but I believe it is clear. By way of explanation I would say that the bill to be based on the resolution is to provide authority for the financing of capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways, and the retirement of miscellaneous maturing obligations, either by way of loans from the government or by the issue to the public of securities of the company guaranteed by the government.

As stated in the resolution, the total amount to be provided for the purpose is $85,882,200. This amount is to be divided among six different items, of which I can give the details in committee. Those items comprise the capital budget of the Canadian National railway system which was submitted to and considered by the sessional committee on railways and shipping on April 20 of this year.

The procedure to be followed is that the loans and advances will be made according to the bill to be introduced.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I suggest that the parliamentary assistant put the main items on the record, what the expenditures are intended for.

Mr. BELZILE: I have some additional information which I could give in committee.

[Mr. Belzile.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I suggest that if hon. members have any questions they wait until we reach the committee stage.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. BELZILE: The hon. member for Cumberland asked for a breakdown of the $85,882,200. As submitted to the committee on railways, the breakdown is as follows:

Additions and betterments (less retirements)	$20,250,000
New equipment	59,000,000
Barraute branch line	1,440,000
Acquisition of securities and retirement of capital obligations	1,007,200
Additional working capital	20,000,000

Those items total $101,697,200. From that amount should be deducted the amount available from reserves for depreciation and debt discount amortization, $15,815,000. That gives a balance of the amount mentioned in the resolution, $85,882,200.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Where will the amount for additions and betterments be expended?

Mr. BELZILE: The breakdown of that item is as follows:

Atlantic region	$1,909,665
Central region	9,916,680
Western region	4,882,085
Grand Trunk Western	3,684,877
Central Vermont	386,670
Subsidiary companies	1,376,503
Express, telegraph and other departments	2,588,590
Additions and betterments to equipment (Canada)	3,240,595
Equipment retirement credit	2,735,665

These items give an amount of $25,250,000. To be deducted from that is a portion of projects included in the above requirements which will not be physically completed before December 31, 1948, estimated at $5,000,000. This leaves a balance of $20,250,000.

Mr. JACKMAN: As usual this resolution is one sentence only, although it takes nearly twenty lines. After it gets through with the $85,882,200 for new securities it goes on to say:

—with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system and to authorize the Minister of Finance to place at the disposal of the national company or the Trans-Canada Air Lines, such amounts as may be necessary—

Is that in addition to the $85,000,000?

Mr. BELZILE: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: Then this resolution and the bill to be founded thereon constitute an unlimited incursion upon the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. BELZILE: A similar bill was passed last year, but this year it was deemed advisable to add this provision. The bill to be introduced will give authority to the Minister of Finance to advance to the railroad the money mentioned by the hon. member for Rosedale to enable it to meet its charges if at any time the revenue should be insufficient to cover those outlays. That was not provided for last year, and this year the authority is also being extended to the Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): From what the minister has told us, it would appear that only $1,909,665, out of a total of $20,250,000, is to be expended upon additions and betterments in the Atlantic region. It would be interesting to have a breakdown of the Atlantic region figure, but I shall not delay the committee. This would appear to me to be most inadequate if there is to be a fair distribution of moneys under this heading.

The question of the railway line from Moncton to Sydney has been before the house on many occasions. It was referred to a few days ago by the Minister of Transport when his estimates were before us. This line, which was built sixty or seventy years ago, carries heavy traffic. The grades are quite steep and it is probably about the worst railroad line in the country, having regard to the traffic it carries. Is there any appropriation for the improvement of this line from Moncton to Sydney?

Mr. BELZILE: The hon. member understands, of course, that many of the questions he raised should be directed to the Minister of Transport. I am informed that there is no special appropriation for the Moncton to Sydney section.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): No appropriation even for surveys?

Mr. BELZILE: No; I see none here for that purpose.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like information on another point. In the appropriation for new equipment I notice quite a number of very heavy diesel locomotives, also smaller diesel locomotives. Are any such locomotives being provided for the Atlantic division? If so, I would point out that diesel locomotives would replace locomotives driven by coal produced in the maritime provinces. Over the years this has been one of our best local markets for the output of the coal mines of Nova Scotia. Would the minister say whether any of these diesel locomotives are being provided for the Atlantic division of the maritime provinces?

Mr. BELZILE: I cannot answer that question, because there is no reference to it in the C.N.R. budget.

Mr. ISNOR: I should like to follow up the thought expressed by the member for Cumberland. It is all very well for the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance to say that this is a matter for the Minister of Transport, but the parliamentary assistant is sponsoring this bill, and he has mentioned certain items, one of which was quoted by the member for Cumberland, in reference to expenditures in the Atlantic region amounting to over $1,000,000. The member for Cumberland very properly asks how that amount is to be expended, and I too am interested in the answer. I wish the parliamentary assistant would pursue the matter a little further and give us a breakdown of that $1,000,000. I would also ask him to enlarge on expenditures to be made in the United States, particularly Grand Trunk extensions of over $3,500,000 and expenditures on the Central Vermont. I am particularly interested in the operation of these roads because of their effect in diverting traffic from our Atlantic ports to United States ports.

I would also draw attention to the part of the resolution which says:

> . . . if at any time in any year the available revenues of the national railway system or the Trans-Canada Air Lines and subsidiaries, respectively, are not sufficient to pay such charges . . .

This really amounts to a perpetual undertaking to make good the deficits. Would the parliamentary assistant enlarge on that? Today trust companies and banking institutions limit their proxies to a particular meeting or to one year. I think the same principle should apply here and that deficits on the year's operations should be placed before parliament. We are unable to get from the Department of Transport all the information we require on the operations of the C.N.R., and I think it is poor business to give this more or less perpetual guarantee so far as deficits are concerned.

I should like to refer to a publication of the C.N.R., the Canadian National Magazine, which in its May issue says:

> As a public enterprise, the Canadian National system is accountable to the people of Canada. Every spring we report to our owners, telling them of the work we did for them the year before, the loads of freight we carried, the number of passengers, the money we took in and the money we spent.

They give the complete story of their operations, but when we ask for information we cannot get it in the form in which we want it, either from the Department of Transport or at the present time from the Department of Finance. If the Canadian National Railways are to come before parliament from time to time to ask for further financial aid, they should be prepared to give us a breakdown of their expenditures. I have particularly in mind at the moment the expenditure in the Atlantic region and its application to the rest of Canada. That is related, Mr. Chairman, to the argument we made on the floor of this house concerning the 21 per cent increase in freight rates. I do not propose to go into that now, because I would likely be ruled out of order. But in connection with the operations of the C.N.R. as covered by this resolution I would ask the parliamentary assistant to be good enough to explain why the whole financial operations of the railway are not taken into consideration when arriving at a decision on an application for an increase with respect to any particular branch of its operations, such as freight. Why are the operations of only one particular branch of the railway taken into account? The large chain stores always take into account the over-all receipts of all their branches and pay income tax on their net profits.

Mr. BELZILE: I have a breakdown of the expenditures for 1948 on additions and betterments. It is divided between the Atlantic region, the Central region, the Western region, Grand Trunk Western lines, Central Vermont and subsidiaries. It shows the expenditures on rails, tie plates, ballast and so forth, and I would ask the permission of the committee to put it on Hansard.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Has the parliamentary assistant permission to put this document on Hansard?

Mr. JACKMAN: The information is already available in the proceedings of the railway committee, and I see no use in putting on Hansard three or four extra pages of fine print. I object to putting it on, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ISNOR: I understand that if any one member raises an objection, it cannot be included in our proceedings. I should have thought that the hon. member who raised the objection, and who is so much interested in the operations of the railways, would have welcomed the opportunity of having this information produced.

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not think the senior hon. member for Halifax understands the point I made.

Mr. ISNOR: I would have thought the hon. member would welcome the opportunity of having the information placed on Hansard so that it could receive wider distribution than the report of the special committee on railways. That is my point.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I agree with the senior member for Halifax. If the hon. member for Rosedale will permit me, may I say that it is well for us to have as many particulars as we can possibly get on the subject under discussion. We have not all at hand the evidence given before the special railway committee.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. Unless the parliamentary assistant to the minister has unanimous consent, he may not put the table on Hansard.

Mr. JACKMAN: Although I am trying to save every dollar I can of the taxpayers' money, I withdraw the objection I took to this table going on the record.

The table follows:

Mr. BELZILE: On the second point raised by the senior member for Halifax I wish to state that the resolution reads:

. . . to authorize the Minister of Finance to place at the disposal of the national company or the Trans-Canada Air Lines, such amounts as may be necessary to enable them to pay operating and income charges if at any time in any year the available revenues of the national railway system or the Trans-Canada Air Lines and subsidiaries, respectively, are not sufficient to pay such charges: Provided that all such amounts shall be reimbursed to the minister from the recipients' annual revenues in so far as such revenues are sufficient, any insufficiency to be provided for by subsequent deficit appropriation by parliament.

Therefore if the companies have sufficient revenue they will meet their own expenditures, and they will reimburse the government for the moneys advanced to them. If these companies suffer a deficit they will have to come back to parliament and ask for a special appropriation to cover the deficit. Therefore parliament will keep its jurisdiction over the deficit expenditures of the company.

Mr. ISNOR: I am pleased to have that information. So long as we have that understanding we can raise no objection. So long as they have sufficient revenue there are no deficits. It is only when they have a deficit that they come to parliament for the money. In view of the answer given by the parliamentary assistant, I do not see that I can raise any further objection.

Mr. CHURCH: The discussion here this morning shows the difficulty of running the road from the commercial aspect. The matters raised here this morning have been placed in the hands of the board of transport commissioners for Canada—traffic, cars, and all these other matters, under the Railway Act. I want to point out the great mistake. I am not going to repeat what I said when this motion was up some months ago.

Because of the disaster which overtook the railways in 1916 and 1917, this national system was taken over five years later, and it had been predicted that unless the government ran the national railways from the commercial aspect, and stuck to its function, this disaster would happen. What are we doing here by this bill? It is contrary to the advice given by the royal commission which was appointed in 1917 that no capital structure or applications for additional capital or sale of securities could be granted unless they were recommended by the board of railway commissioners, now the transport board. The commission which conducted this survey of Canada's railways in 1917 consisted of able men. Mr. A. H. Smith was president of the New York Central. Mr. Acworth had made a great success of the British railways. Sir Henry Drayton was chairman of the board of railway commissioners. What did the report recommend to this house? That no capital structure shall be placed on that road without the railway commission of Canada reporting on it first to the government. The government has torn up that splendid report of 1917 and is not running the road from the commercial aspect.

Take this $85,000,000 deficit. Wait until you see the deficit next year. They have a board of directors which does not direct. Some of them were never connected with railways to start with. If we want a political rate structure it is all hidden in this resolution, instead of this public utility being run from the commercial aspect.

In the resolution there is a large amount of money for the subsidiaries. In fact the great proportion of the moneys is for that purpose. I think it was announced away back last March that the deficits would continue to increase. Some of that money is going into rolling stock and equipment for the subsidiaries of the Central Vermont and other subsidiaries in the United States. What is the result in Ontario—the Niagara district, for instance. The railway facilities all through western Ontario are not being improved to the extent that they are in the subsidiaries of the system in the United States. They cannot get any of this fine rolling stock in Ontario, and that is the province in which the old Grand Trunk made all its money. It is time the Auditor General of Canada got control over this system and that we did away with the haphazard system of appointing outside auditors. Some of them are just duplicating work. The auditors do not give any recommendation to parliament to guide us in seeing that the money is well spent. Now they have added a whole lot of other things to it. We never intended to have a national railway duplicating the hotel systems and duplicating everything else all over the country. Now they are tacking on to it the deficits, the equipment, and all that kind of thing, of the T.C.A. With all that kind of thing going on it is no wonder that they are going behind.

What is the board of transport commissioners for? It has now been organized into a board of seven with other functions. You might just as well abolish any control by the transport board, especially when one takes into consideration the reply I got this morning about the disaster in Toronto. There is no control over this railway at all except political control. Are we going to continue this state of affairs in this public ownership venture? I do not know of any public ownership venture that could be run in the way that this business has been run. The directors do not direct, and there is no proper audit of the system, no report from any financial people about it.

I am surprised at the action of the government. The road has not had a chance to function properly, because it is in politics, first, last and always. We have seen it under a political rate structure. No system can function under such conditions. In Ontario we have made a success of great public utilities. This is a great public utility, the greatest venture we ever had in public ownership in this country. It is failing day by day as a result of the interference of this parliament in its operation. We do nothing to regulate the road at all. It is no doubt necessary for them to come to parliament to have their deficits met, forsooth, but I believe the day is coming when we as a parliament should strengthen the government's hands and see that this great railroad, which has done a magnificent job, is run from the commercial aspect.

Mr. LOCKHART: It seems rather strange to me that a resolution calling for an expenditure of $85,000,000, and with other hidden possibilities that might turn out to be a blank cheque before we are through, occasions so little objection, but when we come to the small expenditure which has been mentioned by the hon. member for Broadview and myself, and which requires no elaborate equipment—I am speaking of the connecting link between the Niagara peninsula and Toronto by rail and water—objection is raised immediately. When it is suggested that old and unsafe equipment should be replaced, we are just given a deliberate brush-off; the answer is no; yet with the obligations that may arise in connection with this resolution it may cost us $188 million before we get through with it.

While it is desirable perhaps to deal with the separate divisions across the country, I think some of these smaller details should be looked into, seeing that they provide for the comfort of the travelling public, particularly a great many people who come from the United States, by way of Niagara Falls and Fort Erie borders, on their way to the great metropolitan city of Toronto. These people like to travel part of the way by water, and I do not think we should pass a resolution of this kind in such a way as to give them the brush-off and to intimate that we cannot have safe and proper equipment and adequate water transportation on lake Ontario. It is a little hard to understand. I make this protest again, as I have done in the past, and I intend to continue protesting until there is proper consideration of this particular branch.

Mr. JACKMAN: Before the resolution passes I think I should point out to the committee the dilemma in which it finds itself; and I do so particularly because last year the Canadian National system passed from the stage of operating surpluses to an operating deficit of $15,000,000 odd, while this year it is budgeting for a deficit of $23,400,000, and we do not know what the actual results will be.

On the basis of that deficit and of certain capital expenditures, plus an addition to working capital of $20,000,000, the government asks for authorization of $85,000,000 in new securities plus a blank cheque for any operating deficits that may occur, not only in connection with the railway and the steamship lines but also now in connection with Trans-Canada Air Lines, which has got into the deficit class. Apparently all these publicly owned enterprises in railways and steamships, and in the T.C.A., are now going to be deficit producers and a burden once more on the back of the taxpayer. In view of that, I think I should point out what we are doing and how little meaning there is to it.

We pass a resolution authorizing certain financial commitments up to $85,000,000, plus a blank cheque. This budget on which we are working was brought down before March 30, when an increase in rates was given; obviously it is meaningless, and of course the budget to some extent must be without strict meaning because your costs, wages, materials and supplies may go up or down during the year. They are much more likely in 1948 to go up. Consequently your budget means nothing. It is a bare approximation drawn out of thin air.

I am not going to make any contrast between public and private enterprises, but if these undertakings were under private ownership they would have to go to a banker, and if they had a deficit they would have to show that banker that they had good reason for getting an overdraft or a further extension of credit. They would have to prove that the service they were rendering was necessary and was being conducted in an efficient manner. Under the system by which these enterprises are operating, the companies, such as they are, come to parliament and, on the basis of a budget which is meaningless, no revision having been made since the increase in freight rates of March 30, they get a blank cheque for future operating deficits. How unlike this is to the ordinary system where a company is privately owned and has to go to a banker and convince him before he will advance his depositors' savings for its corporate purposes.

I merely want to point out to the committee that we are doing something we know little about, but under the system there is no alternative, and when we pass this resolution we are handing to the Canadian National, the West Indies steamships and the T.C.A. a blank cheque to carry on their operations as they see fit. We shall pay the bill, and next year they will come before us for authorization of a deficit already incurred.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to say just a word or two along the lines followed by the hon. member for Rosedale. As he has pointed out, what we are doing here really commits us to an approval of Trans-Canada Air Lines accounts, whatever they are. We have a statement of T.C.A. for 1947, and it raises certain important questions as to the method of accounting of that enterprise. I should like to know whether this is the proper place to ask to have that gone into—because unless there is some other place, I think the matter should be gone into here. I do not think we should just take these accounts without questions of any kind. I am asking now whether this is the proper time, in view of the fact, as the member for Rosedale points out, that what we do here really approves the operation of T.C.A., whatever it may be. Is this the proper place, as perhaps it is the only time we shall have to ask questions of importance about the operations of T.C.A.?

It is suggested that the matter may be discussed under the estimates of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, but I am not sure about that. I do not remember its coming up in the transport estimates, and it is certainly before us now. I do not want to relinquish an opportunity of asking questions here unless it is quite clear that the opportunity will present itself elsewhere.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: This resolution, of course, deals only with financial obligations. I do not think the operations of the railways would be considered under the Minister of Finance.

Mr. KNOWLES: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that it might be done under the estimates of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. I make that suggestion partly because I believe it would be more in order at that time, and also because it might be more satisfactory to discuss the phases of the matter brought up by the hon. member when we have that minister before us rather than the minister or assistant in charge of the Department of Finance. It is true there is no specific item in the estimates relating to Trans-Canada Air Lines, but it is also clear by the order in council that was tabled that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, or the Minister of Trade and Commerce—the same gentleman in either case—is the minister in charge of Trans-Canada Air Lines and responsible on its behalf to parliament. I suggest that either on the item for general administration of trade and commerce, or on the item for general administration of reconstruction and supply, it would be in order, and it would be more satisfactory, because the appropriate minister would be then before us.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member is correct in his suggestion.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that it would be more convenient then, but I want to be sure that we shall not be told eventually that we have missed the bus.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario).]

Mr. LENNARD: This resolution seeks authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the national system. Apart from the Canadian National Steamships, not mentioned here, what companies are there?

Mr. BELZILE: In the 1947 annual report of the Canadian National Railways on pages 22 and 23, there is a long list of the companies that are owned by the Canadian National Railway system.

Mr. LENNARD: I think that list should be on the record.

Mr. BELZILE: It is always available to the public.

Mr. LENNARD: But it is not read. It should be in Hansard.

Mr. BRACKEN: Mr. Chairman, in the middle of this resolution there appear the following words:

> . . . with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system and to authorize the Minister of Finance to place at the disposal of the national company or the Trans-Canada Air Lines, such amounts as may be necessary to enable them to pay operating and income charges if at any time in any year the available revenues of the national railway system or the Trans-Canada Air Lines and subsidiaries, respectively, are not sufficient to pay such charges.

What that means is that we are giving power to the government to pay the deficits of these institutions. The point I wish to make is that this clause gives the power to pay these deficits "if at any time in any year" there are deficits. I submit that this committee ought not to pass a measure with the latter part of that clause in it. If the government, by a blank cheque method, is to guarantee the deficits of these institutions, as it will probably have to do, I submit that the accounts of those institutions ought to come before parliament every year. I submit that the matter should not just come before us in some general way under some minister's estimates where there is no specific item dealing with it. The government ought to have no long-term powers in this form. It may be that the time to deal with this matter is when we get to the bill, although I am wondering if we ought not to move in this committee that those words "in any year" be deleted. I do not like to propose amendments without careful consideration, but if we do not do it here I propose to have it done later on.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Perhaps the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance will repeat what he said with regard to these deficits and their having to come before parliament.

Mr. BELZILE: As I understand the procedure in this matter, either the companies will have sufficient revenues with which to meet the loans and reimburse the government or they will not. If they have not such revenues to a sufficient amount, they will have to come back before parliament; that is, the government will have to come before parliament and say that last year such and such a company—for instance, the Canadian National Railway system—incurred such and such an amount of deficit. Then we shall have to pass a bill appropriating money to pay that deficit, and shall have to appropriate special money for that. That is exactly what is covered by the proviso contained in the three last lines.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Following what my leader has said with regard to the words "at any time in any year", it would seem to me that the whole of the wording throughout the rest of the resolution is "during the calendar year 1948." Surely that is what is contemplated. I still think that the leader of the opposition is right in saying that the words "at any time in any year" seem to have crept in by mistake.

Mr. BELZILE: The intention on this particular point is to have continuous authority to make the necessary advance.

Mr. BRACKEN: May I ask the parliamentary assistant if those words "at any time in any year" have been used in any previous year. It looks to me now as though we are legislating for all future years. In a matter dealing with deficits I think that opportunity for consideration ought to come before parliament every year.

Mr. BELZILE: A somewhat comparable provision was in the 1941 act. But last year we passed chapter 29, and this provision is, as is mentioned, entirely new.

Mr. ISNOR: I should like the parliamentary assistant to give one further interpretation. It relates to the words "to pay operating and income charges." As I understand it, it is based on the words "capital expenditure." If this $85,882,200 is for capital expenditures—

Mr. KIRK: For the year 1948.

Mr. ISNOR: Yes, for the year 1948—how is it possible to pay out of that amount a balance toward operating and income charges? Will the parliamentary assistant be good enough to explain the term "operating and income charges" so that we can understand whether or not they come within our understanding of the meaning of the word "capital"?

Mr. BELZILE: The provision to which the senior member for Halifax refers is in addition to the $85,000,000.

Mr. ISNOR: Then there is a further amount?

Mr. BELZILE: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is right—an unknown amount.

Mr. BELZILE: An amount which we cannot determine now. The C.N.R. makes a budget. Of course a budget is to provide for the future. They do not know what deficit they will incur, whether scarcity of materials will raise prices substantially, whether wages will increase, and so on. If they incur any deficit, they will have to come back next year before the government, explain that deficit and give the reason for it.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Let me read the first part of the resolution:

> That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to issue securities not exceeding $85,882,200 in principal amount to provide the moneys necessary to meet capital expenditures made or capital indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1948 . . .

Then lower down on the page the resolution reads:

> —and to authorize the Minister of Finance to place at the disposal of the national company or the Trans-Canada Air Lines, such amounts as may be necessary to enable them to pay operating and income charges if—

And I suggest the wording should be "during the calendar year 1948."

> —the available revenues of the national railway system or the Trans-Canada Air Lines and subsidiaries, respectively, are not sufficient to pay such charges:

Surely it is the same period we are talking about. I suggest that would meet the situation, unless there is some point which has not yet been brought out.

Mr. LENNARD: Then bring it out.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. LENNARD: No, it is not carried.

Mr. BELZILE: It is the government's policy to have authority to make these advances as required so that the company will meet its operating and income charges as they come due.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Does the parliamentary assistant suggest that we are now being asked to vote something which goes beyond the year 1948?

Mr. BELZILE: That is right.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I still doubt that. I still cannot see why it is necessary.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just on the point of what we are doing, and for the moment not commenting on whether it is right or wrong, does this not mean that we would be laying down the policy that year by year the government would have the authority to pay over such moneys as the railway or the air line might need, without waiting in that year until parliament had actually appropriated the money?

Mr. JACKMAN: That is right.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then having done that, the government would come before parliament some time during the year, either with a bill or an item in the estimates and ask parliament to vote the specific amount which the government had already turned over to the railways. Would we not as a parliament still have the right to refuse to vote that money in any year, if the majority of the house felt so inclined?

Mr. LOCKHART: It may have been paid.

Mr. BELZILE: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has put it clearly. That is a correct interpretation of the clause.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the resolution?

Mr. BRACKEN: No. Are you sure, Mr. Chairman, that the resolution has been passed?

The CHAIRMAN: I should report it.

Mr. BRACKEN: Unless you have declared it passed, Mr. Chairman, I would urge that, since it is almost one o'clock, the parliamentary assistant take the noon hour to give the matter further consideration. I do not feel disposed at the moment to accept this new policy, where we would say for all time to come we give power to the government to provide for deficits of these railways and subsidiary enterprises. Obviously that situation will be met, and probably will be cared for in this way. I do object however to the tying of parliament's hands for years to come by action we would take now. It does not need to be done in that way. Action can be taken each year, at which time the activities of the different organizations can be brought before parliament and discussed in the house.

I suggest that the parliamentary assistant give further consideration to this matter, particularly the expression "if at any time in any year". That is the phraseology to which objection has been taken.

[Mr. Belzile.]

Mr. BELZILE: I can only repeat what I said earlier, that provision is made in the resolution whereby, if there is a deficit, the government will have to come back to parliament, explain the situation, and have a special appropriation put through to finance such deficit.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I hope the parliamentary assistant will accept the suggestion of my leader, because I still feel that it is merely a mistake, and that it would be inconsistent with the rest of the provisions.

I should like to turn back to the Trans-Canada Air Lines and ask two or three questions with respect to that organization. I believe however it would be somewhat unfair to ask the parliamentary assistant, because I do not imagine he is familiar with the details. I wish to know about rentals, and various other expenditures. I should like to have the entire picture of expenses of Trans-Canada Air Lines, so that I might know whether the deficit which is shown is in any sense a real deficit. Perhaps I might go ahead and ask my questions now, or it may be that I should ask them of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Meantime my first question would be this —and I shall put the others later: I wish to know in particular what rentals they pay for the various airports. Then, in general, I wish to know what expenditures of Trans-Canada Air Lines either directly or indirectly are paid by the use of other government money.

Mr. BELZILE: I do not believe the hon. member's question would come under this resolution. Perhaps I might point out that the deficit of Trans-Canada Air Lines was placed before the house in March of this year.

The CHAIRMAN: It does occur to me that the financial arrangements in connection with the operations of Trans-Canada Air Lines might more properly come under the Depart ment of Transport. That has already been submitted to the committee. I doubt if it is in order to discuss those details at this time.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, when your assistant was in the chair a while ago some of us pointed out that although civil aviation matters come under the Department of Transport, the responsibility for Trans-Canada Air Lines by order in council is still under the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The two relevant items in each of those departments, those of general administration, have yet to be passed. My suggestion, in which there was general concurrence, was that the balance sheet of Trans-Canada Air Lines could be discussed at that time.

Mr. ISNOR: I am in accord with the general principle expressed by the leader of the opposition. In addition to this sum of more than $85,000,000 we should not grant a further unknown amount. However this is only the resolution stage, and in virtue of the explanation given by the parliamentary assistant, that every year the Canadian National Railways must return to parliament for an amount to cover their deficits, we might pass the resolution. When we have the bill before us we shall be in a better position to make any required amendments or suggestions as to the period of time involved.

Mr. BELZILE: For that reason I am suggesting that we pass the resolution and proceed to a discussion of the bill.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Under this appropriation of $85,882,200 is an amount of $23,400,000: In this appropriation is there any provision for the deficit of Trans-Canada Air Lines?

Mr. JACKMAN: Yes.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to know how much it is.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): This seems to be a peculiar way of proceeding. I think back to the time when the estimates of the Minister of Transport were before the committee. He told me then that so far as subsidies on the Pacific coast were concerned, the Canadian Pacific railway and the Union Steamship company were both granted subsidies of about $400,000. This made up for the fact that they were not charging economic fares. He said the Canadian National Railways were excluded from the payment of those subsidies. It seems to me that if we give authority in this way, the Canadian National never has to be concerned about subsidies. It never has to be concerned about economic fares. An important principle is involved here, if we are going to say that anything owned by the government can always come back to parliament and does not need to consider costs of operation. It does not seem to be a sound principle.

When we ask United States tourists to come to this country to view the glories of the Alaska trip, we give them, and also our Canadian tourists, a $200 trip and we charge them $120 for it. If United States funds are that valuable to us, it seems to me there should be a cheaper way of getting them. Just to tell our nationally owned lines that they can always come back here and get any sum they require to meet their operating deficits does not seem to me to be sound business.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No:

Some hon. MEMBERS: One o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. ABBOTT: My parliamentary assistant explained to me that there was a discussion this morning concerning the provision under which the Minister of Finance may make temporary advances to the railway company to pay operating and income charges of the system. As hon. members of the committee will appreciate, that provision is to provide a form of revolving fund without fixing the top limit. It is logical to do that in the case of a publicly-owned corporation such as this, because surpluses in any year have to be turned into the consolidated revenue fund. If at the end of the year it develops that the advances have not been repaid out of revenue, under the terms of the bill which will be founded on this resolution they will have to be voted by an item in either the main or the supplementary estimates.

That seems the businesslike way to proceed. There is no intention or desire to flout parliament in any way. If it is preferred, when we come to the bill I am quite ready to provide by amendment that there will be a time limit as of March 31, 1949. Frankly I think parliament retains just as much control under the section of the bill which hon. members will see when the resolution is passed; but if the other method is preferred I would have no hesitation at all in putting in a date limit. I want to make it perfectly clear that the provision as it now stands does not take away from parliament any of its control over voting deficits of the Canadian National Railways and Trans-Canada Air Lines; it was simply to provide what seemed a practical and businesslike way of taking care of these temporary advances and their subsequent voting by an item either in the main or the supplementary estimates.

If the committee would permit the resolution to pass I give the undertaking now that if it is still the feeling that there should be an annual time limit I will have one of my colleagues move an amendment when the proper section of the bill is reached in committee.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am willing that the resolution be allowed to pass, but I do suggest that that amendment should be made; otherwise it looks as though we are saying that for all time they can make all the losses they choose and those losses will be met by parliament. I expect that they will be met, but if things run wild some time in the future and the government has to come to parliament, with the amendment the minister is now suggesting we shall have an opportunity to examine and deal with it. I thank the minister for acceding to that suggestion.

Mr. ABBOTT: Like my hon. friend, I would be the last to suggest that parliament should not have an opportunity to deal promptly with any deficit of any of these publicly owned corporations. I am satisfied that parliament would have such an opportunity under the section provided in the bill to be distributed shortly, but I repeat that if any hon. member feels that there is any doubt I shall gladly agree to an amendment to make it perfectly clear.

Mr. BRACKEN: Is the bill available for distribution?

Mr. ABBOTT: It probably has not a number yet, but I have a copy here. Perhaps we could introduce the bill and it could be looked at, as was the case with the Tariff Board Act, between now and tomorrow, and we can settle that question when the bill comes up for second reading.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I observe that that part of the resolution which we are querying is new.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): While we all appreciate what the minister says with regard to the rights of parliament being maintained by the last two lines of the resolution, it seems to us that the new wording is discordant with the rest of the section.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is section 9 of the bill. If I could have the bill introduced, I should be glad to discuss an amendment to that section tomorrow if it is thought necessary.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 346, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures made and capital indebtedness incurred by the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1948, and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

ELECTRIC POWER PLANTS—PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF POWER COMMISSION

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 340, respecting the supplying of electrical power in the Northwest Territories.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MacKINNON: Mr. Chairman, I think it proper that I should make a fairly full statement at this time. I am making this statement more extensive than I ordinarily would in order to anticipate questions that might be asked.

It will be recalled that in recent years very promising mineral deposits have been discovered in the Yellowknife district north of Great Slave lake, Northwest Territories, and several mines are now producing. Many other mining claims have been staked and are in the process of development.

Among the mines that have gone beyond the preliminary development stages and are now underground are the following:

Con-Rycon Mines, operated by Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company
Negus Mines Limited
Giant Yellowknife Gold Mines Limited
Thompson Lundmark Gold Mines Limited
Beaulieu Yellowknife Mines Limited
Discovery Yellowknife Mines Limited
North Inca Mines Limited
Diversified Mining Interests
Viking Yellowknife Mines Limited
Ptarmigan Mines Limited
Akaitcho Mines Limited

Of these the Con-Rycon Mines are milling 270 tons daily, and expect to increase this to 300 tons daily during 1948, as well as improving their plant. Negus Mines Limited, another gold producer, milled an average of 65 tons daily during 1947, besides other improvements, and an addition to their mill will increase its daily capacity to 160 tons. Giant Yellowknife Gold Mines Limited have done considerable work both at their surface plant and underground, and will soon begin operations on a 200 ton basis. They anticipate increasing this tonnage substantially as soon as hydroelectric power is available. Thompson Lundmark Gold Mines Limited resumed production in September, 1947, and are milling approximately 100 tons per day.

Underground development work to various stages has been carried on by the other companies referred to above. In addition to these, Akaitcho Mines will begin a shaft-sinking program in the summer of 1948.

One of the great needs for the successful operation of mines, whether in the development or the productive stage, is electric power. Because of the high cost of fuel in this northern area, the hydroelectric power will probably be the main source of energy, and will undoubtedly be used in preference to diesel or steam-generated power.

In 1946 the dominion government decided to undertake the construction of a hydroelectric power development plant on the Snare river, and of the transmission line necessary to bring the power to the Yellowknife mining field and to the townsite. The work was begun in 1946 on the Snare river storage and power project, ninety-four miles northwest of Yellowknife settlement, with the object of developing an initial capacity of 8,000 horsepower. An agreement for the sale of approximately 4,000 horsepower has already been made, and it is expected that other agreements will be made in the near future. The characteristics of this project will permit further development as required up to 28,000 or 30,000 horse power.

The dominion's policy as indicated in this bill is to establish a Northwest Territories power commission to develop, operate, and administer electric power in the territories, and which will plan and correlate as much as possible power needs in the mineral area. Power will be transmitted from the Snare river project to those mines and settlements requiring it within economic power transmitting distance, under present circumstances considered to be about one hundred miles, and where demands are established in other areas additional hydroelectric plants will be planned.

The objective is to supply ample power at a low cost and thus assist substantially in the development of the mineral industries in the territories. At present gold is the chief mineral being recovered in the Yellowknife district.

Practically all the mines that have been mentioned are within economical transmission distance of the Snare river development, and it is expected that many other mines will be developed within the same radius.

I shall not go into detailed explanation of the various sections of the bill, because these are covered in the explanatory notes printed with the bill, or by the sections themselves.

Briefly the bill provides for the construction and operation of power plants in the Northwest Territories to sell electrical power at as low cost as possible, subject to the plants being self-sustaining. The proposed Northwest Territories power commission will take over and operate the hydroelectric development under construction on the Snare river, and in addition will develop, operate and administer other power plants needed in the territories. The commission will have authority to sell power generated by its plants in large blocks to mining companies. The commission may also sell power on a retail basis to consumers in any district or area.

Climatic hazards and the short seasons when certain types of construction work or hauling of supplies must be undertaken, make it advisable to invest the power commission with certain authority to make capital expenditure for such things as branch transmission lines, substations, additional installations or works to increase power output of existing plants. If it were necessary to wait for the voting of funds at the next session of parliament, considerable time might be lost and beneficial projects could be delayed a year or more. Every advantage has to be taken of the seasons and limited facilities in the territories. Section 17 of the bill, which is implicit in itself, covers this authority.

With the approval of the governor in council, the commission shall establish schedules or ranges of rates for the power it supplies on the basis of not less than cost, which will include interest on the principal amount made or deemed to have been made to the commission in respect of the plant supplying the power, and all costs of operation and maintenance of the plant lines and other structures, together with costs of administration and salaries. Charges will also cover the establishment and maintenance of a contingency reserve fund. Rates are to be reviewed annually by the commission.

At the request of the commissioner of the Northwest Territories the commission may investigate the supplying of power to any local administrative district, company or other person in the Northwest Territories and advise the commissioner of areas that might be served, the capital cost, and the rates necessary to cover the cost of supplying the power.

It is believed that this bill represents an important advance for assistance in the development of the great natural wealth which lies in the Northwest Territories. Numerous mining and other enterprises can and will be stimulated if power is made available at low cost.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, I wish to support this program of a commission for the governmental production of electricity in the Northwest Territories. I have always felt that the power should belong to the people in those territories, and this is a step in that direction. I hope that the personnel of the commission will include at least one engineer, preferably one who is thoroughly conversant with power production. There are to be three commissioners, I understand.

Mr. MacKINNON: Provision is made for three, but one is to be appointed to start with.

Mr. MacNICOL: I hope that the commission when it is set up will make a survey of all the Northwest Territories with a view to ascertaining the possible power developments in the area. The minister spoke of the Snare river area, where just one power development is to be made.

Mr. MacKINNON: To start with.

Mr. MacNICOL: There are two or three more possible power developments on the Snare river, the power potential of which is about 35,000 horsepower, of which the present development will produce 8,000 horsepower, to be transmitted by wires principally to the Yellowknife area where the mines are in operation.

I should like to see the commission make a survey of the east end of Great Slave lake and Lockhart river. That may be called after the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart); if it is not, it could well be, since the name is the same. The Lockhart river drains Artillery lake, and, after a series of rapids and falls, finally falls into Great Slave lake. That river has a potential, I believe, of 150,000 horsepower, which can be developed at three heads, each of which is capable of developing a substantial block of power. The potential power there will be under the commission, will it not?

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Likewise on the Thelon river there is the possibility of developing power. I hope the commission will survey these possibilities and then consider the territory north of the Yellowknife, to the east of Great Bear lake, on the Coppermine river at what is known as Bloody falls—a very beautiful falls, of which I have a picture. There is a natural power site. The river turns around like a hook before it goes over the falls.

In the far north country I imagine that the question of precipitation would be important, because the land there is dry, and the flow of the river would have to be carefully surveyed before any attempt was made to develop power from that water. But away to the west, over on the Mackenzie river, I saw what I thought was an excellent power site at Sans Sault, north of Norman Wells, and before you come to Fort Good Hope. The river, which is two or three miles wide above that, is reduced to about 1,500 feet where it bursts through the mountains. Previously the mountains are on the right side of the river as you go north but they cross the river at Sans Sault. In my opinion a gigantic power plant could be built on that site if the time ever came for it to be constructed. I am anxious that the government should have possession of the power facilities at Sans Sault, which in my opinion would amount to not less than half a million horsepower.

In a word, I for one am pleased to see the government taking control of all the power potentialities of the Northwest Territories for future public development. If they follow the same program that has been followed by the hydroelectric commission of Ontario, and keep the cost down, they will be able to sell power to the miners in that country at a reasonable rate. Nothing will develop a country more rapidly than cheap power. It has to be produced by one of four methods: water, coal, oil, or gas. That country has so much water power on hand that it will produce electric power for a long time to come.

I do not need to say anything further. I am supporting the bill, and wish the commission that is to be appointed every success in developing that great country which is overflowing with incomparable resources, minerals of every description. With other power plants east, west and north to supplement this one, perhaps before many years Canada will learn that in these so-called barren lands to the far north there lie minerals out of which we will reap a harvest such as no other country possesses. With that power will come an influx of population such as has not been dreamed of. There is nothing like electricity to make life worth living. I for one support the bill.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I have listended as carefully as I could to the minister's remarks. As I understood him, there was a reference to rates. There was a bit of noise in the chamber at the time and I may not have caught him correctly. I understood him to say that these rates were to be such as to take care of the carrying charges of the plants.

Am I correct in assuming from that that the project is not to be self-liquidating?

Mr. MacKINNON: The project is to be self-liquidating.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Perhaps I was not clear as to what the minister said. I thought he referred only to carrying charges.

Mr. MacKINNON: All charges.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I am in favour of this measure, and I hope that when the commission begins to operate it will see that equitable rates are charged to the citizens of Yellowknife. I had the pleasure of visiting Dawson City in the Yukon last year. The company there had its own electric plants to operate the dredges, but it is taking the citizens of Dawson City to the cleaners through the high rates it is charging. I should like to see the government hook up the Yukon with the Northwest Territories. I wish they would extend the commission in there so that the city of Dawson could get equitable rates for its citizens.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I ask one or two questions on this project? First of all I should like to pay a tribute to the enterprising investors, miners and others who have developed this section of our great country to the extent that they have. It is far removed from some of our largest centres, and was distinctly one of the greatest pioneering projects in Canada. Fortunately this development has been crowned with a certain measure of success, which promises well for the future. The questions I should like to ask the minister are these. I understand that the first development of this power project is one of 8,000 horsepower. The firm contracts which are in hand now for certain mining companies will include 4,000 horsepower.

Mr. MacKINNON: We have contracts now for approximately 4,000 horsepower from one mining company.

Mr. JACKMAN: What I am interested in finding out, Mr. Chairman, is just how these rates are to be assessed against the whole development and applied to the first people who come into the use of this power. For example, if the total project is for 28,000 to 30,000 horsepower, I presume there will be certain dams and water hold-backs constructed which will enable the whole development to be made use of in the most economical way possible. If the first instalment is for 8,000 horsepower, it is obvious that the government cannot expect to get back all the cost of the storage dams, and so forth, by assessing the costs against the small amount of initial production. Therefore I think the committee should be given some information as to the method of fixing the rates which will be applicable from the very start, because if the rate is too high for an individual mine it may be found that the cost of production of gold, or whatever metal is being mined, will be so great as to discourage any future development in that country. If the minister will let us know exactly what factors are to be taken into consideration when the rates are determined, it will be enlightening.

As I understand the bill, not only the costs of operating the power plant and distribution will be part of the schedule, but also the amortization of the whole project, of which just a small part is being developed now. Perhaps the minister will include with his answer his own opinion, backed by that of his officials, as to the extent of the ore resources of the mines which will make these contracts, because the committee will be interested to know whether or not there is a likelihood of the mines being able to use the power over a long period so that they will be in a position to honour their contracts during their lifetime.

Perhaps the minister will tell us how long the present contract for 4,000 horsepower is to run and whether or not there have been any other applications from adjacent mines, and for what periods of time they want to take power.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I wonder whether the committee would agree to deal with the clauses as we come to them. Clause 6 deals with power. What we are dealing with at the moment is just the short title, which reads:

This act may be cited as the Northwest Territories Power Commission Act.

Mr. CHURCH: I am glad to see the minister take the action he has in connection with this bill. I wish to commend it to the wisdom and judgment not only of the house but of the country. The Northwest Territories are rich in natural resources of many kinds lying yet undiscovered. As a pioneer in cheap light and power movement in our own province—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I wonder if the hon. member would deal with the short title. We shall reach the different clauses later.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not wish to delay the proceedings, but I wish to commend the bill to the house. I know the minister is taking the right attitude if he gets the right men on the commission to develop it. The various definition and interpretation clauses are all right so far as I have seen them. I have read the bill over two or three times. The interpretation clauses of the bill are most important, because the principle is very largely wrapped up in them. As you know, Mr. Chairman, you were in this movement yourself, in the early days of power development in our own province. The high cost of developing a mine is due largely to the lack of cheap light and power. I hope the minister will see to it that this commission is operated on a strictly commercial basis and that this great district will receive the justice that has long been denied it. It is entitled to cheap light and power. We have a potential of 44,000,000 horsepower in this country, of which only one-sixth is developed, and that in part is seasonal.

I commend the bill and I should like to see the minister undertake eventually a national hydroelectric system for the entire dominion, so that no part of Canada will be without this great heritage, which has been a boon and a blessing not only to those in the cities but to the people in the suburban areas and on the farms. What we need in Canada is development from one end of the country to the other, and the provision of cheap light and power is the first essential.

Mr. MacINNIS: A word on the point you raised, Mr. Chairman. I agree that it is the proper way to deal with the matter, but the minister made his explanation on the short title. True, the explanation is largely on the opposite page, but if the minister is to be allowed to make a statement such as we have heard, I think other hon. members will claim the right to do the same, and they should be in order.

Mr. CASE: The questions I have to ask come under the short title. I wish to know whether there is anything in the bill to prevent private interests, mining companies, from developing their own power. Is it the intention of the crown to develop all the power for this area? What limitations and restrictions are imposed, and what privilege will be left to the mining interests to claim rights to certain water-power resources?

Mr. MacKINNON: In a general way, it is intended that the commission shall sell power to all users. It is quite possible that in some isolated districts permission may be given to a company to produce its own power, but that is not under consideration at the present time.

Mr. COCKERAM: What about the developments that existed prior to the functioning of the commission?

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. MacKINNON: There is only one case I know of, and that is the power developed by the Con mine, as it is familarly known. They will still use that plant. As a matter of fact, the Con mine is now supplying power to other mining developments in that neighbourhood.

Mr. CASE: Where risk capital is used in seeking to discover mines and to develop a territory, will private enterprise have a reasonable assurance that the commission will supply them with power? Suppose there is a development that they can undertake, will there be restrictions prohibiting them from going ahead? In other words, what guarantee have they that the commission will deliver power to them? Will the commission restrict or resist the development of the territory?

Mr. MacKINNON: The whole purpose of the legislation is to enlarge the development of the district. There are, as I am sure the hon. member is aware, bright prospects in large numbers in this same territory, and it is with the object of getting power as cheaply as possible for the use of the present mining companies and other companies developing further discoveries.

Mr. COCKERAM: Does the department intend to carry the power to some of the new sections 90 and 100 miles further north? I am thinking of Crestaurum and North Inca. What assistance will be given in completing the power line, or will the company build the line?

Mr. MacKINNON: It is intended to use this development to provide power in the districts indicated by my hon. friend.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I did not quite understand the minister. Did he say that when this commission takes over it will enjoy a monopoly privilege in the production and distribution of power within the territories? Is that the general plan in view?

Mr. MacKINNON: It is not a monopoly of power. It is the wish of the commission and of the government to supply power to the mining companies at a rate which will make it profitable and reasonably satisfactory to them. In the district at present there is a private corporation, the Con mine, which has its own power, and that development is continuing. In the legislation we could take over that plant if it is found advisable, but there is no present intention of exercising that power.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That still does not meet the situation. When this commission is set up and begins the production of power, will this body be exclusively the agency for the production of power within the Northwest Territories?

Mr. MacKINNON: We expect that the mining companies will be very glad to buy power from the commission, because we hope they will be able to get it more cheaply from the commission than they can produce it themselves. Special circumstances might arise that would necessitate further consideration of a particular project, but in general the commission expects to serve all users with power.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I wonder if the committee would deal with the clauses as we reach them. What we are considering now is simply the short title.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): On the introduction of the bill the minister read the short title and went generally into the purposes of the bill. He gave an explanatory statement. Surely members can deal with it in the same manner. I suggest that the committee would make better progress that way.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I do not wish to press the point. After all, I am in the hands of the committee, but my own opinion is that we would make better progress if we dealt with the clauses as we reached them.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: "This act may be cited as the Northwest Territories Power Commission Act," and with the greatest respect to you, sir, I submit that the scheme followed in the past has always been to permit general discussion on the short title in order to determine the question. We are trying to co-operate so as to get this through.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I hope the hon. member will not spend time arguing that point, because if the committee wishes to carry on as it is doing, I raise no further objection.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Thank you, sir. I come back to this matter because the minister takes so many words to answer a simple question. Is it the intention of the Northwest Territories power commission to be the exclusive producer and distributor of power within the Northwest Territories, subject to the existence of one company which at the present time generates power there?

Mr. MacKINNON: I might give the hon. member for Lake Centre an answer by stating that at the present time mining companies may develop individual power sites under the Dominion Water Power Act—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. MacKINNON: —but the smaller mining companies are often unable to finance a hydroelectric power development. There is also the tendency to have scattered water power plants in a mineral area rather than a larger development which would serve the whole area at a cheaper rate. The bill reduces the danger of smaller power plants prejudicing the development of a large plant on the same river.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Sometimes in a multiplicity of words there is wisdom, Mr. Chairman, but not always clarity. Surely it would be a simple matter to say whether or not the government intends, regardless of price or other considerations, to be, under this commission, the exclusive producer of power in the Northwest Territories. If it does, let us know it. If it does not, let the minister say that it has not that intention. I do not like the use of many words to answer a simple question. I am not at the moment critical of whatever the answer will be, but I should like to know what it is.

Mr. MacKINNON: I think it is essential at times to add something to the answer rather than to say merely yes or no. But in this particular case, answering briefly, I would say that it is not the intention of the government or the commission to do what is suggested by the hon. member.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: To have a monopoly?

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes.

Mr. COCKERAM: I should like the minister to clarify the question of these power lines. I have in mind a mine a hundred or so miles farther north which has had considerabe correspondence with the department and which for months was unable to get an answer to their letter asking whether power would be brought up to the north from the Snare river. If it is the intention that it should be brought up, who is to pay for the power line? Is it to be paid for on the basis of fifty per cent by the mining company and fifty per cent by the power company? I think this is a necessary investment in the Northwest Territories, but I believe there must be greater co-operation than has been shown up to the present with regard to these outlying places.

Mr. MacKINNON: I have already stated that it was the intention of the commission to consider favourably any application for power in the district mentioned by the hon. member. I should also like to add that these are matters of negotiation and arrangement between the prospective user of power and the commission. If there is a reasonable necessity for the extension of the transmission line to the area, the circumstances surrounding the application will have to be considered. Under certain circumstances I would think that the entire cost of the transmission line would be borne by the commission and covered by the power rates. In other cases it might be a matter subject to negotiation.

Mr. COCKERAM: I raised this point because I realize that one must know the ore position and everything else before those decisions are made. But when a company comes to the department, as several companies have, with fairly well estimated ore reserves and has been more or less given the run-around—when for months it has received no reply to its letters—I think there is evidence of a situation that we should guard against.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Can the minister tell us how many power plants will be established?

Mr. MacKINNON: Will the hon. member repeat the question?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Can he tell us whether power will be sold at cost or under cost? In the explanatory notes I find this paragraph:

> At the present time mining companies may develop individual power sites under the Dominion Water Power Act but the smaller mining companies are often unable to finance a hydro-electric power development. There is also the tendency to have scattered water-power plants in a mineral area rather than a larger development which would serve the whole area at a cheaper rate.

I should like to know how many plants the government proposes to put in, and how many of those scattered plants are operating now, if any. Or is it just an idea that they might be established? The paragraph goes on to say:

> The bill reduces the danger of smaller power plants prejudicing the development of a large plant on the same river.

It looks to me as if the smaller plants are to be shut out—

Mr. MacKINNON: Oh, no.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): —even though they have the money with which to build. Has the minister ever considered the advisability of the government going into the power business in the Yukon territory? He and his staff administer that territory, as they do the Northwest Territories, except that Yukon has, or thinks it has, some local government which on analysis does not amount to much. Yukon has been developing her natural resources in that territory for over half a century. The natural resources of the Northwest Territories turned out to be of some value only within the past few years. Now the government expects to put millions of dollars of public money in there to help these people develop their resources. Why not put some money into Yukon? There is a crying need for power development up there. Two individual plants are operating in that area, and the rates charged to the consumer are 25 cents and 20 cents per kilowatt hour respectively. You cannot operate on that. Will these plants in the Northwest Territories, apart from overhead and operating expenses, be developed to give the people cheap power? Has that been estimated scientifically? Is there any probability of the government's doing the same thing in Yukon as is proposed here?

Mr. MacKINNON: At the present time the government has not in prospect the establishment of a similar commission in the Yukon, nor does it suggest that this commission should at the present time consider extension to the Yukon. The hon. member for Yukon asked about the establishment of different plants. At the present time there is just the one unit being established. There are other sites on the same river, and it is quite possible they will be developed by this commission as the demand for power increases.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Where will the head office of the commission be?

Mr. MacKINNON: In Ottawa.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): And the government of the Northwest Territories has its head office in Ottawa?

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The government of the Northwest Territories consists of a committee of civil servants, with the exception of one member who is not a civil servant, and so far as I know he has not bothered to attend a meeting of the commission yet; at any rate he has not attended more than one. It seems to me that the head office of the commission which is to be created should be in the Northwest Territories where the work is being done and where the power is developed, not here in Ottawa.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I want to say first that I think this legislation is a slow and hesitant step in the right direction. What we need is public development of our power sites throughout this country. I deplore the fact that we have had, since I have come into the house, nothing more than piecemeal attitudes and policies in this regard. Sometimes I listen to my free-enterprise friends, and it seems to me they would ask that public money be spent—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CASE: Private enterprise has done a pretty fair job of development.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): —on such developments as this Northwest Territories power commission. I think the time will come when they will not want to take any responsibility greater than the bookkeeping and the collecting of the profits. I take exception to their attitude, in that it applies solely to a section of Canada the chief industry of which is mining.

We have in the province from whence I come some large power projects which could raise the standard of living of our people. I think the time has come when we must have more public development.

Mr. JACKMAN: What is the matter with your provincial government?

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Let me tell the hon. member that in the four years the present government of Saskatchewan has been in office we have reduced our power commission rates by forty-five per cent.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. JACKMAN: How much power have you developed?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. The bill before the committee is the Northwest Territories Power Commission Act, dealing with the subject of electric power in the Northwest Territories. I hope the hon. member will confine his remarks to the bill, and if possible to the short title.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. If my hon. friends to the right will not try to provoke me into saying other things, I shall keep to the bill.

I was saying it is deplorable that we should be using public money for a certain type of public development, namely, to dig up gold in the Northwest Territories only to have it buried down in Kentucky, when we have so many other fields in which development could be made.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not wish to follow the remarks made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, because the record of development by the government to which he referred in opening up northern Saskatchewan has been distinguished by its absence. I had in mind the fact that nothing particular is being done in northern Saskatchewan, and we have vast mineral potentialities there.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am coming to the point. There is a provision right in the bill which deals with my point. I refer to section 6.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I suggest that the hon. member wait until that section is called. We are discussing the short title.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am trying to ask a question, and I find it difficult to do so without letting the minister know the purpose of my question. Anyway, to put the question simply, suppose in northern Saskatchewan mineral resources are available for development, will this power company in the Northwest Territories sell the power necessary for such development to such mining companies in order to assist them in developing their fields? I ask my question because in paragraph (i) provision is made for the purchase or lease of power from, or the sale of power to, any person who operates a power plant within or outside the Northwest Territories. In view of that provision, is the commission to be charged, not only with the sale of power within the territories, but also with the assistance of worthy projects in northern Saskatchewan which today are not being developed because of the lack of power?

Mr. MacKINNON: The commission has power to sell outside the territories.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Fine.

Mr. MacKINNON: I am familiar with the development in northern Saskatchewan at Goldfields, where there was a power development serving a mine which was in production for a while, but which I am informed has shut down because of the low quality of the ore deposits. But the power development for which this bill makes provision is to serve an entirely different area, one very much to the northwest and in the centre of a proven highly mineralized area. If there were mining ventures in northern Saskatchewan and elsewhere which required power, I think it would be impacticable to get it from this particular development. It might be possible however, to get the required power from other rivers, including the Lockhart river.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Is this power commission being set up mainly because of the requests of interested mining operators in the area?

Mr. MacKINNON: The setting up of this commission is a governmental endeavour to provide as cheap power as possible for the development of mineral areas served by the commission, and not as a result of particular pressure of any individual or group of individuals.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Agent of His Majesty.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This is one of the sections to which I take exception, because it places the commission in a position of being agent of His Majesty. Is it true that under this section, before any individual whose rights have been interfered with may proceed against the commission, in view of the fact that the commission is an agent of His Majesty the consent of the crown will be necessary before action can be taken?

Mr. MacKINNON: I am informed that the commission can sue and be sued. I believe that answers my hon. friend's question.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Provision is made for that in section 3. However, that does not answer my question. Can the commission be sued without the grant of a fiat on the part of the crown? Here is another example of the state going into business. Unless provision is made whereby the state, in going into business, may be sued as can any ordinary person in business an advantage accrues to the state, one which has no place in modern development.

Petition of right was a proper procedure when the principle was accepted that the king can do no wrong. Today His Majesty, in the person of a commission such as this, goes into business and, on occasions, operates to the detriment of private individuals who are denied the right to take proceedings unless petition of right has been granted.

In Great Britain the same condition prevailed until January 1, 1948, when for the first time the crown placed itself in a position of equality with the subject, and the subject may proceed against the crown without the issue of a fiat or without an application through a petition of right. Having regard to the fact that the state today in Canada is in business on every hand—I shall not go over all the types of business in which it is engaged; it is a long record—the day is past when the crown should be allowed to stand in a position of advantage as against the subject in His Majesty's courts.

Mr. MacKINNON: I would refer the hon. member to subsection 3 of section 4. I am informed that a fiat would not be necessary.

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

On section 6—Powers.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are there any other power developments in operation in the Northwest Territories outside the one now being constructed on the Snare river?

Mr. MacKINNON: I know of none except the Con mine development.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is a nice little plant northeast of Yellowknife and, if I remember correctly, it develops about 10,000 horsepower, or it may be only 5,000.

Mr. MacKINNON: Four thousand, seven hundred.

Mr. MacNICOL: As I understand it, every other potential power site in the Northwest Territories belongs to the crown?

Mr. MacKINNON: Any development by the commission will belong to the crown.

Mr. MacNICOL: From now on, every power development in the Northwest Territories outside the one operated by Consolidated Mining will be under the direction of this commission?

Mr. MacKINNON: While the hon. member was out of the house for a few moments I answered other questions, and I think my replies on Hansard will fully answer the hon. member.

Section agreed to.

Section 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Release of former owner.

Mr. JACKMAN: Does this mean that the crown can take over a property by agreement, by expropriation or otherwise? Is there any tribunal which will reconcile an honest difference as to value?

Mr. MacKINNON: I think section 7 fully explains it.

Mr. CASE: This relieves the owner of a property that is expropriated from any obligation to deliver power; but, as far as I read it, it does not carry any obligation on the part of the commission to deliver power in the place of the party whose property has been expropriated.

Mr. MacKINNON: I do not think there will be any question about the commission serving the mining interests.

Mr. MacNICOL: This section reads:

Where any power plant is acquired by the commission with or without the consent of the owner, the commission may by order release the owner from all his obligations relating to the generation, purchase or supply of power from the plant so acquired and the order is binding on all persons.

The only power plant now operating in the Northwest Territories is the privately owned one operated by the Con mine?

Mr. MacKINNON: That is corrcet.

Mr. MacNICOL: That would be the only one which could be purchased by the commission?

Mr. MacKINNON: At the present time that is the only one which would be subject to expropriation.

Mr. MacNICOL: From what I saw I believe that particular power plant could be increased in size. I do not think it would be out of place for the commission to buy that plant and couple it up with the wires they are going to run from the Snare river down to Yellowknife.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Snare river project transferred to commission.

Mr. CASE: To what extent has the crown or the commission or any other authority developed power resources in this territory up to the present time?

Mr. MacKINNON: Any development that has proceeded has been under the Department of Mines and Resources annual votes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 10 and 11 agreed to.

On section 12—Power rates.

Mr. JACKMAN: On the title I asked the minister some questions which related to power rates, and I wonder if he can give an answer now.

Mr. MacKINNON: The initial rates that will be charged for power are based on the sale of 4,000 horsepower, but it is well known by all who know the district that the 4,000 horsepower will be used quickly and that additional power will be required. As additional power is furnished, the rates will be reviewed and obviously the commission will be able to sell power more cheaply than at the initial stage.

The total charges, including maintenance of the generating or power plant and the main transmission line, which must be covered by the rates charged the consumers in the Yellowknife district and which provide for a minimum fifteen-year amortization charge, will be $451,449. On the basis of a 4,000 horsepower load, this works out to a cost of approximately $112.86 per horsepower, or 1·73 cents per kilowatt hour.

To gain a true picture of the benefits of hydroelectric power for the Yellowknife district, even at this apparently high rate, a comparison must be made with other sources of power. There is only one alternative to hydroelectric power and that is the generating of power by the use of fuel oil. Our consulting engineers estimate, and this is borne out by prices in the Yellowknife area, that the price of fuel oil alone would be three cents per kilowatt hour, and overhead and amortization charges on a fuel oil plant would create a total cost of power of five cents per kilowatt hour. This would be over two and a half times the rate that will be possible from the Snare river plant. It would appear that at the present time hydroelectric power is the only practical solution for the furnishing of power in the district. I do not think there are any extensive coal deposits sufficiently close to this district to provide for development.

Mr. JACKMAN: If on the basis of 4,000 horsepower you can amortize the costs of the initial development by charging $112.86 per horsepower, if you produced and sold 8,000 horsepower your costs would go down substantially; that must follow?

Mr. MacKINNON: That is right.

Mr. JACKMAN: Have you obligations for more power than the 4,000 horsepower contract?

Mr. MacKINNON: They are not concluded, but we believe that there will be further commitments for power.

Mr. JACKMAN: The whole 28,000 horsepower potential development is from the one site on the Snare river?

Mr. MacKINNON: The one unit now being constructed will provide 8,000 horsepower. There are on the same river other sites which can be developed to yield an estimated production of from 28,000 to 35,000 horsepower.

Mr. JACKMAN: But 8,000 is the total development of this one unit?

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes.

Mr. CASE: Section 12(c) provides for:

(c) the establishment and maintenance of a contingency reserve fund in the amount considered necessary by the commission to meet unforeseen or emergency expenditures.

I happen to know that the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission have found it necessary to set up substantial reserve funds; in fact I sometimes think they have too many. Nevertheless I doubt whether one contingency reserve fund will be sufficient for your purpose here.

Mr. MacKINNON: I think the singular includes the plural.

Section agreed to.

Sections 13 to 16 inclusive agreed to.

On section 17—Advances for capital expenditures out of moneys appropriated.

Mr. SINNOTT: I am interested in this section, and I want to commend the government for taking this action to help out the people in that mining district. How much money will be required to complete this project?

Mr. MacKINNON: The total estimated expenditure for this 8,000 horsepower unit is $4,500,000.

Mr. CASE: This section reads:

> The Minister of Finance may, on such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council, make advances to the commission . . .

I do not like that provision. Why not treat the commission as a crown company? If the money is to be taken out of consolidated revenue fund you will never know where you stand. Why not sell bonds as the Canadian National Railways do? The bonds could be guaranteed by the government and earmarked for the development of power.

Mr. MacKINNON: The government is in a position to supply money at a lower rate of interest for this project than could be got by the sale of bonds.

Mr. JACKMAN: First of all, there is to be an appropriation by parliament to cover the capital cost. Will that come before the house later?

Mr. MacKINNON: That is correct. The project has been under construction for a period of two years out of appropriations voted by parliament, which are being continued.

Mr. JACKMAN: That vote was passed two or three years ago.

Mr. MacKINNON: The money has been voted from year to year.

Mr. JACKMAN: So that the only amount which has not been approved by parliament is this $1,000,000 for current expenses, I take it, which will be approved subsequently.

Mr. MacKINNON: When the estimates are approved.

YUKON ACT

AMENDMENTS RELATING TO THE GOVERNMENT OF YUKON TERRITORY

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 341, to amend the Yukon Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Commissioner.

Mr. MacKINNON: Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the committee it might be convenient for me to make a statement at this time.

The explanatory notes covering the bill are quite explicit; however, I should like to elaborate on some of the amendments. It is proposed to re-establish the position of commissioner of the Yukon Territory in place of the present position of controller. The position of administrator, who acts in the absence of the commissioner, is also being re-established. The positions of commissioner and administrator were abolished in 1918 and their powers are now vested in the controller. The change in the title of the chief executive officer to that of commissioner will bring it back to what it was before, and this position will now have the same title as is given to the similar position in the Northwest Territories.

The bill also proposes to change section 20 of the act to permit an increase being made in the indemnity of members of the Yukon territorial council and as well to provide for their living expenses while the council is in session. There are three members of the Yukon territorial council who are elected for a three-year term to represent the Dawson, Mayo, and Whitehorse districts respectively.

The members of the present council are: R. Gordon Lee, Whitehorse district; Ernest J. Corp, Mayo district; and John R. Fraser, Dawson district.

During recent years the length of the sessions and the amount of legislation which they must consider have greatly increased. In view of this and of the increased cost of living while the councillors are away from home, it is considered reasonable to provide for an increased indemnity to the councillors and for living expenses while the council is in session.

It is proposed to amend section 23 of the act to permit the appointment of a suitable person as public administrator, being a barrister or advocate at the bar of any of the provinces, but who has not necessarily had at least five years' standing at the bar of a province. The law now requires five years standing at the bar. It has been found extremely difficult in recent years to find a suitable and competent person, a barrister or advocate, particularly one with five years' standing at the bar of any of the provinces of Canada, who would be willing to accept the appointment of public administrator. The few barristers or advocates practising their profession in the Yukon Territory are, for one reason or another, unable to undertake the responsibility of acting as public administrator, and it has become necessary to recruit a barrister.

There is at present no authority in the Yukon Act for the acceptance of holograph wills and, under some of the isolated conditions prevailing in Yukon, this is about the only evidence that certain people can leave of their desires. The acceptance of a holograph will is not provided for in the Yukon Act, but it is in the Northwest Territories Act. It is desired to make the practice uniform, and the bill provides for this.

At present the controller of the Yukon Territory is authorized to administer the oath of office to a stipendiary magistrate. Since the amendments proposed in this bill change the title of the chief executive officer to "commissioner", this power will be exercised by the commissioner and an amendment to the act is provided for this purpose.

The legal officers advise that there is apparent conflict between the terms of the Yukon Act and the criminal code. It is therefore proposed to repeal section 118 of the Yukon Act, because this section has created a conflict in interpretation as to whether, for the purpose of the criminal code in the Yukon Territory, the court of appeal is the Supreme Court of Canada or the court of appeal for British Columbia. It is desired to make it clear that an appeal shall lie, as provided for in the code, to the court of appeal for British Columbia.

It is also proposed that section 129 of the Yukon Act be repealed and a new section substituted. This section refers to the sale of liquor and provides for its importation or manufacture only with the permission of the governor in council. In order to facilitate the administration, it is proposed to give this authority to the commissioner. In the case of the Northwest Territories, this authority is exercised by the commissioner; thus the two acts will be consistent.

Mr. CASE: The minister left the impression that he is reverting to the title which was used some time ago. When was the change made in the title to which he is reverting, and what was the reason for the change?

Mr. MacKINNON: By order in council P.C. 745 of March 28, 1918, the positions of commissioner and administrator were abolished, and it transferred the duties and powers vested in the commissioner and the administrator to the gold commissioner of the Yukon Territory under the authority of the War Measures Act. The next order in council is P.C. 2152 of October 18, 1919. In the meantime the Yukon Act had been amended by the inclusion of section 132, chaper 50 of the 1918 statutes, and this order in council confirmed the abolishment of the two positions and the vesting of their powers and duties in the gold commissioner of the territory.

Order in council P.C. 1481 of June 30, 1932, ordered as follows:

> All the powers and duties vested in the gold commissioner under the provisions of the Yukon Act or any other act respecting Yukon Territory be and are hereby transferred to and vested in Mr. George Allan Jeckell, comptroller of the Yukon Territory under the authority of section 132 of the Yukon Act.

Section 132 of the Yukon Act reads as follows:

> The governor in council may abolish any position or office authorized or created under the provisions of this act, and may transfer to any officer of the crown any or all of the duties or functions of the position or office so abolished, whether any of such duties or functions are defined in this act, or in any other act, or in any regulations made under the authority of this act or any other act applying to the Yukon Territory.

Order in Council P.C. 35/343 of the 20th February, 1934, deals with the superannuation of George Ian MacLean, gold commissioner, and goes on to recommend that the abovementioned position of gold commissioner be abolished with effect from March 26, 1933.

Order in council P.C. 3072 of December 3, 1936, amends P.C. 1481, changing the designation of George Allan Jeckell to controller of Yukon Territory with effect from December 1, 1936.

On section 3—Sessional indemnity and expenses of councillors.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Section 3, which substitutes a new section 20 in the Yukon Act, gives to the members of the elected Yukon council an indemnity of $1,000 a year. Prior to now they have been paid $400, which was very much less than their services entitled them to. I am indeed glad to see that the department and the minister have adopted my suggestion that the indemnity be increased to $1,000. The present minister's predecessor replied to my letter suggesting $1,000, and asked me why I suggested that amount. My reply was that I considered it an appropriate amount, and that ended the correspondence. I am glad to see that the minister has taken the suggestion and put it in the act.

Mr. COCKERAM: Paragraph (c) of subsection 1 of section 3 provides for a living allowance of $5 a day. That certainly is not enough for that district. It should be increased.

Mr. MacKINNON: My understanding is that that $5 a day is not subject to taxation. If it were subject to taxation, in order to give them a sum equal to $5 a day it would have to be considerably higher than that.

Mr. CASE: Very few expense accounts are subject to taxation. If a living allowance of $5 is not sufficient, taxes should not enter into it at all. It should be sufficient to maintain the councillors in that district. It should be doubled.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I must admit that I had overlooked paragraph (c), which reads:

An allowance for living expenses, not exceeding five dollars for each day in which the council is in session, but the amount that is paid to any member of the council pursuant to this paragraph shall not exceed one hundred dollars in respect of any one session.

Usually the meetings of the council do not take more than two weeks, sometimes three. A man cannot live on $5 a day expenses in the city of Dawson where the council meets. It is out of the question. If you gave him $10 he would be put to it to live on that, even if he were living in a modest way. No private member can suggest an amendment, because it would be a tax on publice revenue. In fairness to these councillors, I would ask the minister to make a more appropriate amendment to the act by increasing the $5 to $10 or $15.

Mr. MacKINNON: When this matter came before me I immediately asked questions about this item of $5 a day. I know something about the cost of living in Yukon and in the Northwest Territories. I thought it was a ridiculously low amount, but I was informed that that was the amount recommended by the controller on, I believe, the advice of the council. I have allowed it to stand. I am quite ready to have one of my colleagues on this side move that the amount be made $10.

Mr. JEAN: I so move.

[Mr. Black (Yukon).]

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Appointment of public administrator and official guardian.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): It may be that in the war years and in the immediate past the government experienced some difficulty in finding a barrister or an advocate of at least five years' standing at the bar of the province who would take the position of public administrator in the Yukon, but that time has gone by. At any rate, the territory now has a first-class barrister as public administrator. He has been carrying on well and has been for much more than five years a member of the bar of the province of Manitoba. However, if the minister wishes to have this clause go through I do not raise any great objection. I do not think it is necessary.

On section 7—Section repealed.

Mr. FULTON: Perhaps I should know; but since I do not, would the minister be kind enough to say what has been the practice until the present time? Do appeals from the Yukon go to the Supreme Court of Canada, or have they been going to the supreme court of British Columbia?

Mr. MacKINNON: I inquired regarding this matter, because I thought they might very well go to the supreme court of Alberta, seeing how closely Alberta is connected with the administration of Yukon. However, in direct answer to the hon. member's question, I may say that, in the past, cases have been going to the British Columbia court.

Mr. FULTON: This will not change the practice that has been followed in the past?

Mr. MacKINNON: No.

LAND TITLES ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO CERTIFICATES OF TITLE, ET CETERA

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 334, to amend the Land Titles Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Registration where change of name by marriage.

Mr. FULTON: Will the minister explain this?

Mr. MacKINNON: I may say that the explanatory notes included in this bill are extensive and complete. The eight proposed amendments are of a technical nature. They deal with such matters affecting titles to property as registration of land transfers, lapse of caveats, and limitations on the amounts of land to be included in a certificate of title. New forms are also provided.

The justification and intention of this legislation is to bring the forms and practices concerning land titles in the Yukon and Northwest Territories into conformity with similar legislation in the western provinces. The only new provision in the bill is that restricting the number of lots to be included in one certificate of title. This change is entirely due to the fact that otherwise there would be so many entries on some certificates as to make them unreadable.

The bill also provides that where a woman holding property marries and desires to have the record of her marriage incorporated into the new certificate of title, the registrar is given discretion to decide what evidence he requires in order to grant such a certificate.

The most important provision relates to caveats. Under the present act, a caveat will automatically lapse at the end of three months unless proceedings are under way. By the proposed amendment, the registrar can determine whether a caveat shall be discharged or continued for a definite period.

The changes are suggested in order to simplify the act, assist in its administration and bring its provisions more into line with the practice in the western provinces.

Mr. CASE: I did not quite hear what the minister said in regard to a provision in the bill for the protection of married women.

Mr. MacKINNON: It refers only to the case where a married woman desires to have her name incorporated into the new certificate of title.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO DEFAMATORY LIBEL, CULPABLE HOMICIDE, ET CETERA

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 337, to amend the criminal code.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Military law.

Mr. POULIOT: Military law may be all sorts of things. It may be the king's regulations and orders. During the war we had the mobilization regulations which were part of the military law and which were concocted by the notorious Brock Chisholm, a Quebec lawyer and a former deputy minister who is no longer in the government. Those regulations were iniquitous and they could not properly be called the law. I protest against that kind of legislation. I hope that we shall be at peace for a long time, but if we are at war in the remote future—and God forbid that we should be—I hope that such hybrid legislation will not again be adopted.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—What shall be prima facie evidence of neglect to supply necessaries.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Possibly the minister might explain the purpose of this amendment. I appreciate what it says, but did some case arise which made this amendment necessary? If so, what was the case and what was the nature of the decision?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not able to answer the hon. member's question. I am under the impression that this was recommended by the commissioners on uniformity. The section as it stands at the present time without amendment is defective, in that the presumption is rebutted by support for the first month by the man who leaves his wife. If hon. members will look at the explanatory notes they will find they read as follows:

> Paragraph (c) of subsection four of section two hundred and forty-two of the criminal code reads as follows:
> "(c) evidence that a man has, without lawful cause or excuse, left his wife without making provision for her maintenance for a period of at least one month from the date of his so leaving, or for the maintenance for the same period of any child of his under the age of sixteen years, shall be prima facie evidence of neglect to provide necessaries under this section."

If support is provided for the first month and never provided again, no presumption is raised by the failure to provide for subsequent months. Therefore the new paragraph reads as follows:

> (c) evidence that a man has left his wife, and has failed, for a period of any one month subsequent to the date of his so leaving, to make provision for her maintenance or for the maintenance of any child of his under the age of sixteen years, shall be prima facie evidence that he has omitted or neglected or refused without lawful excuse to provide necessaries.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, I understand.

Section 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Manslaughter—infanticide defined.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Experience has shown, of course, the necessity for a clause such as this; for in a great number of cases in which a woman finds herself in the position of having on her hands a newborn child, loses her power of control and the child dies in consequence of some act on her part, over and over again juries have refused to convict, regardless of the evidence. I presume that the reason for the amendment is to make it easier to get a conviction for the offence of homicide short of murder or manslaughter. This gives me an opportunity to ask the minister whether or not any study has been made by any of the officials of the crown as to the deterrent value of the death sentence in the case of murder. Has there been any investigation along that line dealing with the general problem?

Recently in England when the death sentence was abrogated by a majority of the House of Commons, it was only to find that action reversed in the House of Lords; and the person holding a position equivalent to that of the Minister of Justice in Canada was left in a difficult position in consequence. Consideration is now being given in England to a compromise between the commons and the lords, whereby the death penalty for murder will be imposed only in certain cases; that is, where the murder is premeditated or is of a particularly gross nature, as, for instance, in the case of murder by poisoning, or homicide arising out of the killing of a policeman while in the execution of his duty. In view of the fact that something is being done to amend the criminal code by sections, I ask the minister if any consideration has been given to this matter. I have the feeling that taking the code in this manner, and having a kind of selective amendment of it, may cause some difficulties in the future which I think are fairly obvious. But if the decision has been made to follow this course in order to meet certain ad hoc matters which have arisen in the last year, and if it is thought that this is the best way of doing so short of a complete revision, naturally I support it. However I feel that a statement by the minister in regard to the matter I have raised would be of some interest.

Mr. ILSLEY: Naturally the Department of Justice took some interest in the recent legislation in Great Britain, but I must frankly say that no investigation has been instituted as to the value of capital punishment as a deterrent. The issue of capital punishment has been debated a great deal. It is always a favourite topic of debating societies. College debates, inter-class debates and inter-collegiate debates have taken place on the subject, and there is an immense amount of literature on it. From statistics I do not think it is possible to come to any conclusion about the matter. Conditions vary from place to place; and I felt that there being, so far as one could ascertain, little demand in Canada for any alteration of the present system, it was clearly not incumbent upon the government to institute a statistical investigation. I felt, as I say, that it would not be possible to arrive at any conclusive results if such an investigation were instituted. So I am not proposing any change in the system of capital punishment in Canada.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Where the death penalty is imposed, to what degree is there any investigation subsequently by officers of the crown relative to the rightness of the conclusion of the jury, and as to the advisability or inadvisability of granting a commutation of sentence?

Mr. ILSLEY: One of the most careful—one might say exhaustive—investigations is instituted after a person is sentenced to be hanged, because the governor in council has to pass on every single case, as the hon. member knows. Officials of the Department of Justice read all the evidence and communicate with various sources to find out whether there are any circumstances which would justify clemency. Then the matter is taken to council, with the recommendation one way or the other of the Minister of Justice; and it is then dealt with by council.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: On any occasion where a trial judge in his personal report recommends that the sentence of death be carried out, does the Minister of Justice ever recommend commutation to the governor in council?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not believe any general statement can be made on that point. More often the trial judge makes no recommendation one way or the other. Sometimes he makes a recommendation for mercy. I am not prepared to say that in every case that recommendation of the trial judge is accepted by the governor in council. Certainly I am not prepared to say that, in every case where a jury makes a recommendation for mercy, that recommendation is accepted by the governor in council.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is, a recommendation for mercy.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I know of a case where it was not accepted.

Mr. ILSLEY: Sometimes where there is no recommendation from anyone, judge or jury, there are commutations.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I wish to leave no doubt in anyone's mind, not only that I am in favour of capital punishment for murder, but that I am in favour of capital punishment by way of hanging. It is the greatest deterrent I know of, after some experience in criminal matters.

Then, I should like to ask a question about this definition of the crime of infanticide. What is the reason for it? The minister may have made a previous statement with respect to it. I gather from the section that it applies where there is some doubt about the sanity of the mother who does away with the child. Does it apply only to the mother? Might it not also apply to other relatives? I have in mind a case of infanticide of some years ago where two people were charged with murder. They lived in a district far removed from towns or cities. Apparently this child was conceived prior to wedlock; and these two people, because of fear, distress and talk of the neighbours, did away with the child. In other words, could it not be that the father of the child might be included, or does this apply to the mental derangement of the mother through suffering? Then, is there much of this type of crime? What is the reason for the section? Have we been allowing parents guilty of infanticide to go free? The minister will understand that there is some interference here with the law with regard to insanity, or the rules thereto.

Mr. ILSLEY: My information is that there are cases where the mother kills her newborn child, and that in the normal case of that kind it is useless to lay a charge of murder against the woman, because invariably juries will not bring in a verdict of guilty. They have sympathy with the mother because of the situation in which she has found herself. Therefore crown prosecutors, and those who lay charges, if they are to obtain convictions lay charges of concealment of birth; or a charge that is equal to concealment of birth. Anyone who looks at the section will see that it is really not concealment of birth, but rather concealment of the body. However, this charge is known as concealment of birth. Sentences of a few months, or even shorter than that, are imposed. To a minor extent that brings the law into disrepute, because the offence is murder; that is, unless the woman is insane.

Many years ago in England the crime of infanticide was created by statute. It applies to cases where there is not the degree of mental derangement amounting to insanity.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The minister has in mind Macnaughton's case.

Mr. ILSLEY: It does not go as far as the rule in Macnaughton's case. Those rules were laid down in 1842, or the early part of the nineteenth century.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): And never been changed.

Mr. ILSLEY: We have taken the wording of the English statute. Those words are found in section 7, and there are English cases on this section. Therefore we are not without precedent to guide judges and juries in determining the circumstances in which a charge of infanticide is proper. We have placed the penalty at three years. It is purely a matter of judgment; the time may be too short, or it may be too long. I am told, however, that even in cases where manslaughter has been charged and convictions obtained—and I should think obtained quite improperly, because I cannot think how a charge of that kind would have any of the elements of manslaughter—sentences have been rarely more than two years.

Therefore we have set three years as the maximum imprisonment for a conviction on a charge of infanticide. I believe it is correct to say that in that respect the law of Great Britain is different; their law places it on an equal footing with manslaughter. The information we obtained is that, under these particular circumstances where the child is newly born and where the mother has not fully recovered from the effects of giving birth to the child and by reason thereof the balance of her mind is disturbed—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is a big word.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. In view of that, the sentence is never more than a few months, or one or two years, and we think three years would be the proper term of imprisonment for infanticide.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Three years certain?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; three years maximum.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not wish to prolong what the Minister of Justice has referred to as a high-school debate, but I think there is more interest by Canadians in this question of the possible abolition of capital punishment than the minister realizes. In that connection I should like to support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lake Centre that an investigation, statistical and otherwise, might well be made by the department. I realize that there are arguments on both sides as to what is the most effective deterrent, along with arguments as to whether or not the present practice is civilized. I think the suggestion that the matter should be studied further is a good one, and I hope the minister will follow it up.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): With a Gallup poll?

Mr. CHURCH: Is this the only amendment proposed in connection with murder and manslaughter? The other day I referred to peace officers or policemen who might see a man fleeing on the street after committing probably a minor offence. Such an officer might shoot first over his head, but after that he fires and hits the man. Has the minister considered an amendment which would set out how far a peace officer can go when he kills a man who is fleeing after committing what may be only a minor offence and the police are thus the judge and jury all combined?

I know that some of these officers, many of whom are returned soldiers, are doing fine work. They have to face desperadoes at all times. Some of the police have been sued in the civil courts, and all phases of this matter should be considered and clarified. That is why there should be an amendment made to the code to clear up any misunderstanding. Judges cannot tell what the law is, and some of them differ also about "voluntary statements" in connection with murder and manslaughter. There was the recent case in Hamilton where this point came up. The court of appeal in Ontario has doubts about this matter, as have other judges throughout the country.

Mr. ILSLEY: The law with respect to murder is not being changed by this bill except as it applies to infanticide. I am not sure that I understand clearly the suggestion the hon. member is making with regard to peace officers.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. CHURCH: Is this the only amendment that it is proposed to bring down this session in connection with murder and manslaughter?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CHURCH: A peace officer can kill someone who is fleeing; he automatically shoots, no matter what offence the man has committed. First he fires his gun in the air and then he fires at the man and may kill him, although he may be running away after committing just a minor offence. This amendment to add "or infanticide" may or may not be all right, but there seems to be no effort to clear up the other matter I have raised. The court of appeal of Ontario is wondering what is a voluntary statement made by a prisoner charged with murder or manslaughter, and law courts all over the country differ as well. I think that ought to be cleared up.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): If the department is looking into the matter of punishment for the crime of murder, it might well consider the suggestion that a judge be permitted to impose an alternative sentence; I mean that the sentence should be life imprisonment, and nothing less. We know that some murderers are extremely vicious, while others may be closer to the line. I am not suggesting an amendment; but in their deliberations I think they might take that into account.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall take note of what the hon. gentleman says. Sir James Stephen, in his commentaries on the criminal law, advocates vesting discretion in judges, but it has not been done in Great Britain or here. It places a frightful responsibility on the judge.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I know they do not want it.

Mr. ILSLEY: They do not require that. At the present time the responsibility is assumed by the governor in council.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The Minister of Justice.

Mr. FULTON: After what the minister said about changing the law with respect to infanticide, I hesitate to say anything, but I wonder if he would not give consideration to the suggestion that what is actually being done is to change the law in order to permit convictions being made. From what the minister said I take it the feeling is that the present penalty is such that juries do not convict and that, therefore, the crime is being made subject to a little less severe penalty in the hope that juries will convict. I wonder if perhaps that is not the wrong principle to follow in amending the criminal code? What you are actually doing is making a crime, which is most shocking if committed, subject to a less heavy penalty. Would it not be better to leave the crime as serious and with as great penalty as at present in the code, and simply let public opinion be the factor which will determine whether juries convict or do not convict?

In other words, why make it a lesser penalty and thus run the risk of encouraging persons to commit the crime? So long as they might be convicted of murder, they would be less inclined to commit the crime, but if they knew they could get a maximum of only three years, those who might be tempted might yield to the temptation to commit the crime. Leave the crime subject to the same penalty as formerly, and then let public opinion, as reflected in the mind and action of the jury, be the factor which determines whether you will have convictions or not.

Mr. ILSLEY: This change in the law was recommended by the uniformity commissioners, which means by the departments of the attorneys general, and the reason they recommended it is obvious. They do not like to have to prefer a charge that does not charge a crime, and that is what they have to do right along. Otherwise nothing happens. They make charges once in a while of manslaughter, but generally a charge of what is called concealment of birth because that is a charge on which they can get a conviction. It is a most undesirable situation that our law should be such that nobody will apply it properly. We are meeting not only public opinion as shown by the indisposition of juries to convict, but also the wishes of experienced prosecuting departments who want a law that is susceptible of application. I do not think there is anything in the suggestion that a slightly deranged, distressed mother will be any more likely to do away with her child because the penalty is three years instead of a greater penalty.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If the certainty of punishment or the nature of the punishment were a deterrent there would have been few murders during the middle ages or even up to 1834. In many cases there were varieties of executions. I read the other day of a member of the nobility who was found guilty of murder and sentenced to hang by the neck until he was dead. He thought that was ignominious, so this noble was granted the unusual dispensation by the court of being hanged until he was only partly dead and then cut down so that he could view his own disembowelment.

In cases of infanticide, everyone who has appeared for the defence realizes the fact that the jury, knowing the penalty and realizing that the sentence will ultimately be commuted, do not want to leave an unfortunate woman, who has made a misstep and whose mind is partly deranged, in the position of having to live within the shadow of the gallows until commutation takes place. Any counsel for the defence knows that juries, realizing that the woman suffers and the man escapes, will acquit in most cases, however strong the evidence may be.

Mr. FULTON: Then you should make it no crime at all.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The law will either make it punishable with some penalty, or almost every person committing this crime will escape. That I believe is what impelled the minister to introduce this amendment. It is not the best course to be followed; but when the hon. member for Kamloops suggests that a woman in that position, having just given birth to a child, will give consideration first to what the penalty will be—

Mr. FULTON: That is not what my argument was.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My hon. friend corrects me, but I took it from what he said that a person in that position would contemplate the penalty. I say that a woman in the condition in which she must be, alone in the world and fearful of the consequences of going out into society with a stigma upon her, does not realize the gravity of her offence until after it is committed. The practice is that, after the jury has made its finding on the murder or manslaughter charge, the woman is brought before the judge and asked whether she pleads guilty to concealment, which usually carries a penalty of six months or a couple of years, and in that way justice is done to some extent.

Mr. CHURCH: This section repeals section 252 of the criminal code. What about hit-and-run drivers committing murder on the highways? I find no provision in this bill to deal with them. Yet it is a straight case of murder. A child is killed on the highway by a car and the driver runs away. It is the most cowardly kind of murder. I have had letters from my constituents and many letters from the public about this crime of killing infants and children on the highway by misuse of the motorcar, often by drunken drivers. If we are going to open up this section, which deals with murder and manslaughter, we should introduce a proviso leaving it to the jury to decide as to hit-and-run drivers, whether that is not a form of murder or manslaughter. It does not matter whether the child is killed by a pistol or a car; the child dies anyway and the parents have no redress. The driver gets away with it. I know the minister is very busy, but I was hopeful that he would introduce an amendment this session to punish what I consider the most cowardly form of murder or manslaughter by hit-and-run drivers.

Mr. ILSLEY: The penalties for hit-and-run drivers were increased in the criminal code amendments last year. Full consideration was given to that at that time. My hon. friend says it is murder. It is not murder; it is manslaughter, and the punishment is for that if there has been negligence, which in most cases there has been.

Mr. CHURCH: Whether the law covers it or not, it is the most cowardly form of murder.

On section 10—Penalty.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This is the post office theft section. Originally it was subject to a minimum of three years.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then the minimum was removed. We have had two years' experience with that. The minister now asks to have a minimum of one year for these offences of stealing from the mail.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: From his experience, has the minister found that thefts from the mail have increased as a result of the deletion of the minimum sentence of three years?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not the figures as to the increase or possible decrease of thefts from the mails, but the most ridiculous sentences are being imposed. I had the whole schedule before me the other night when I was going over these amendments to the criminal code. Some of them were as low as two hours, and others were eight days. Sentences of that kind are common. This experiment of removing the minimum was not a success. The Post Office Department has now come to the conclusion that they want the minimum restored, but not as high as three years. I think myself it might not have been a bad idea to leave the three years in the code. The trouble was, there was a case, or perhaps a few cases, where persons obviously and manifestly guilty were acquitted.

[Mr. Church.]

The Post Office Department said, "That won't do; take that minimum out." We took the minimum out, and we began to get these ridiculous sentences of a few days.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is that not a pretty good argument for an appeal of these cases by the crown in order to secure a degree of uniformity across the country? When the minimum was removed the magistrates trying the cases had no standard basis upon which to operate. The minister mentioned a sentence of two hours. Was that case taken to the court of appeal?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know; I cannot give the hon. gentleman that information.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Somebody on behalf of the crown slipped up in not appealing a sentence that was so ridiculous as to shock the public conscience in a direction opposite to that which a sentence of three years for the theft of one letter had shocked it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know that it does. When I went to law school I was taught that there was one thing which was a very serious crime, namely, theft from the mails. I think it is, whether it is one letter or ten letters, or whether it is money or whatever it is. As I say, I have doubts as to whether it was not a mistake to take that three-year minimum out, because the mails must be left alone. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is right.

Mr. ILSLEY: We tried taking it out, and it did not work. We got these sentences. My hon. friend says, "Appeal the sentences." People cannot be appealing all the time. You do not get any consistency in the appeals. The appeal courts may say what I am saying now. It is a serious matter. It does not mean that the courts which try the cases always do what the appeal court says. They will do it now.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I know of one particular case in the part of the country from which I come. Over a period of time the postmistress pleaded guilty to six different offences from the mails and got a mild reprimand. She did not get any sentence at all. I am in favour of restoring some minimum so that our mails can be safe. I consider it wise to leave the three years in. Let us start with one year. A year from now some of us should be back here. If we find an experience similar to that which the department has had recently, then I for one will be here ready and anxious to increase the minimum.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to call the minister's attention to section 10. I am referring to the part of it which deals with the post office, stealing from the mails and so forth. I remember a few years ago when the former postmaster general, Mr. Mulock, was a member of the house. I brought to his attention a report issued in regard to the post office, which showed that only about one-eighth of one per cent of those officials, notwithstanding the tremendous volume of business which the post office carries on, did not carry out the law, and stole a few cents out of a letter.

Since the code was established the maximum had been three years, and no minimum was allowed to the magistrate at all. The sentence was automatic. The state did nothing to look after the wife and children of the person who was sentenced to jail. They were left to charity. The minister at that time brought in an amendment which received the support of the late minister of justice. There has been a conflict of decisions by magistrates on what the amended section meant. Some of them gave only thirty days in connection with a theft of a few cents from a letter.

The penalty of a year is altogether too long for a man who steals such a small amount. Out of $15,500,000 which the department gets out of the Toronto post office, it is only a very small amount which comes from the department stores, as I said the other night. You have to think of the family as well. The state should look after the children and also the wife. Very few men are involved in this section. They are automatically liable to a sentence of a year in jail. The sentence should be thirty days or sixty days. There should not be a minimum any more than there is a maximum. Some discretion should be given to the magistrate. He hears all the evidence and has all the facts before him. Most of the sums involved are very small. I am sorry to see men who are employed in a great public utility such as the post office being treated in this way. They have a hard time. They go out in all kinds of weather, winter and summer. No section of the public service is more popular with the working classes than the men who work for the post office. I do not think it is right automatically to send a person down for a year.

It will be noticed that the change in the code does not name the place of confinement. These people have largely been confined in federal institutions instead of near their homes, and the women and children are left to suffer. I thought that at this session the minister would leave it to the discretion of the magistrate, make the minimum thirty to sixty days, and bring in a maximum of a year. Usually, in interference with the mails, small amounts of money are involved. I think the amendment I suggested would be much better. It will help the public service more than a long term like a year, which is a very long time. A man may escape and get two more years added to it. The penalty goes a little too far.

I may say that, after a long fight in the House of Commons, the late postmaster general a few years ago did accept an amendment to the code to that effect.

Sections 11 and 12 agreed to.

On section 13—Defrauding the public.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will the minister explain this section?

Mr. ILSLEY: Sections 12, 13 and 14 are being enacted at the request of the province of Ontario. They are very important sections. In fact they were requested in the past, but it was felt that the abuse that they were directed to possibly did not justify the changes in the criminal law. But the conclusion has been arrived at that now they do. These sections will have to be taken as a group. Section 12 speaks for itself. Section 13 requires explanation.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What does the minister think about the words "written or oral" in section 12? Will that not make it tremendously wide? Somebody will be made responsible for a remark that a taxi driver makes or anybody who is with him. Is that not pretty wide?

Mr. ILSLEY: It may be wide, but I do not think there is much wrong with it. I would draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the explanatory note, which reads:

> This amendment arises out of a judgment in the case of Rex vs. Morgan and Dempsey, 1947 O.L.R. 805, in which it was held that if the statements referred to in the said section were made orally they did not constitute an offence thereunder.

Previously, it would appear, the prosecuting authorities were of the view that the section included oral fraudulent statements, but the courts decided against them and it is considered desirable to amend the section.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Limiting it to these various officers would, I suppose, take care of what I had in mind.

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 13 requires some explanation. It was an essential ingredient of the offence that there be conspiracy. Now there does not need to be conspiracy. The conspiracy sections in the code, elsewhere provided, will, of course, take effect if there is conspiracy. Now there does not need to be conspiracy. Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment who, by deceit or falsehood or other fraudulent means, defrauds the public or any person, ascertained or unascertained, or affects the public market price of stocks, shares, merchandise, or anything else publicly sold, whether such deceit or falsehood or other fraudulent means would or would not amount to a false pretence as hereinbefore defined.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Why would not the ordinary provisions respecting false pretences cover what the minister has in mind?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am afraid I cannot answer that question, but I would assume that fraudulent statements could be made for the purpose of affecting the market price of shares, which would not amount to the offence of obtaining goods or money under false pretences. That probably would be the case. There is also a special penalty of five years here, while the penalty for false pretences is only three years.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I do not wish to hold up this section, but I am still concerned as to whether or not it is an addition to or a restatement of the law as it is.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. The main part of the section is to do away with the necessity of proving conspiracy. That is the purpose of the section. The wording has all been in the code before, but heretofore the words were "conspires with any other person" to do it. No conspiracy is now necessary in order to obtain a conviction under the section.

The next section, 14, which is part of this group of three sections, is a very important one. It deals with fraudulent manipulations of the stock exchange. It is designed to prevent fraudulent manipulations of transactions on the stock exchanges and will make quite a number of "wash" sales criminal.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I gather that this is also asked for by the province of Ontario.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I believe there is a stock market in every province. There is one in Toronto. That is the city with the new look. Do they really want to go to such a length?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): They have never failed in any province to obtain convictions under the conspiracy sections with respect to the very things that are dealt with here. I have never yet known the conspiracy sections of the code to fail. If, by a "wash" sale, the minister means that the transaction did not go through at all—and I gather that is what he means—I think that is already amply covered by the criminal code as we have it today. Certain famous cases that went across the country, which I had the honour of instituting out west, were successful, and they were in connection with stock market operations. I am not objecting to tightening up the law, but I am wondering whether we are doing a great deal. I do not think there is anything new in the whole section. We have always found when prosecuting that we had greater latitude under the conspiracy sections than will be afforded under this, as far as bringing in evidence is concerned.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have always found that when the crown did not have a strong case and wished to introduce a lot of hearsay evidence of discussions that took place among individuals, whether joined together at the moment or not, it invariably charged conspiracy. When conspiracy is charged, statements made by one alleged conspirator in the absence of another are admissible, and the result is that often it is difficult to defend, however good the defence might be, when the charge is conspiracy. I am wondering why the necessity of establishing conspiracy, which, after all, is not a very difficult matter in any case, is being deleted, and an overt act of deceit or falsehood is substituted without the necessity of establishing conspiracy.

Mr. ILSLEY: The conspiracy section can still be used. The fact that you take conspiracy out of this section does not mean that it is not an offence to conspire. That is constituted by the conspiracy sections.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I appreciate that.

Mr. ILSLEY: This stiffens the section and renders it unnecessary to prove conspiracy, which it might be impossible sometimes to prove.

Mr. LENNARD: I should like to know whether section 13 is broad enough to take under its wing a member of the cabinet who, at a by-election, makes a statement which affects the public market price of merchandise or anything else sold.

On section 15—By threats.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I think this is a worthwhile section. Some weeks ago I brought up the question of intimidation of people in Canada by threats or suggestions of threats, through the intimation that wrong would be done to or harm perpetrated upon the relatives of such people in the countries in which those relatives reside. This section, whereby the threat that in Canada or elsewhere violence will be done to any person is made an offence, is one that will go a long way toward strengthening the hands of the enforcement officers. Persons in this country are sometimes subjected to the threat that, unless they give support to communist works or to communist funds, or in any other way assist in the spread of communism, harm will be done to their relatives. This section will cover such a situation. I am glad also to say that the addition of the words "or attempts to intimidate", placing it in the same position as though the full and complete offence of intimidation were perpetrated, will be of great assistance and will uphold the arm of the law in a great many cases throughout this country.

On section 17—Search in gaming houses.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will the minister explain section 17? I notice that the explanatory note reads:

17. This section is amended by striking out the words "as defined by section two hundred and twenty-nine" because the definition of "disorderly house" is moved to the definition section.

Is this merely a matter of mechanics, leaving the substance of the law as it is?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; that is it.

On section 24—Information not objectionable on certain grounds.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is this supposed to cover objections which have been taken from time to time that the information contains a duality of offences or where the offence has been stated in the alternative and the information has been declared defective because of that fact?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no change whatever in the law. I debated with myself whether I would introduce this amendment. It leaves out the explanatory matter found in the present section. If the hon. gentleman will look at the present section 725, which is set out in the explanatory notes, he will see that in it a most unusual thing is done. An explanation is given, beginning with the words "for example, in charging an offence under section 553 it may be alleged" and so on. The commissioners of uniformity thought that was bad draftsmanship and that it was better to leave those words out. They just clutter up the statute book.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It must not restrict the generality of the foregoing words?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

On section 26—Dismissal of complaint for assault.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What is the purpose of the words "if requested so to do", in the fourth line from the bottom of the page?

Mr. ILSLEY: The justice does not have to force a certificate on a person who does not want it; that is all.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What is the object of the certificate in the first place? I suppose that has to do with civil proceedings or something of that sort. There is some general law to the effect that if I go into a police court and charge somebody with assault, I may take away my civil rights by so doing.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. Only the words "if

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I was wondering if there was any substantial change there.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. Only the words "if requested so to do" were added.

Sections 27 and 28 agreed to.

On section 29—Complainant may be bound over.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: With regard to breach of the peace or threatened breach of the peace, up to the present time the procedure has been for the charge to be laid by the complainant. Then, if the charge is well founded, the defendant is bound over to keep the peace. Now a new section is introduced whereby the person who complains that he has been interfered with, and that threats have been made to him, finds that when he comes to court he stands in danger of himself being bound over by the magistrate. This is the first time that the complainant, the person who sets in motion the wheels of the law, finds himself in jeopardy as a result of his own act.

This is a section that will require a bit of explanation. I should like to know the background of it. What it actually does in effect is this. It places a person who is threatened—who has had an argument with his neighbour, we will say—in a position in which he may well be fearful of setting in motion the wheels of the law in order to prevent possible further and greater breach of the peace, because, if he does that, he may end up by having registered against himself an order of the court binding him over to keep the peace.

Mr. KNOWLES: For twelve months.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This is the most unusual amendment that has been brought before the committee in years. I should like to have an explanation of it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I join with the hon. member for Lake Centre in asking the minister to drop this. I know whence it comes; because this has to do, as a general rule, with backyard quarrels—

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): —between women whose children throw things at one another's windows and that sort of thing.

Mr. KNOWLES: I thought it was to stop the hon. member and me from quarreling here in this house.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): No. That is one of my great pleasures in being here. If the hon. member went home, I would go home with him. I know we all want to do something with regard to the thing I am talking about. On the other hand, with great respect I submit that we should not reverse the traditional procedure, and that the complainant should not be bound over to keep the peace. It must be remembered that, in various parts of this country which are thinly settled, we necessarily have justices of the peace who are not experienced in matters of this kind.

I remember that I once worked for the Saskatchewan government. I was adviser to the justices of the peace of the province, and they never had a worse adviser. But I know some of them were simply terrible, solely because of lack of experience. I really do not think we should take this risk. It might be one of ourselves who was set on by somebody else, and when we came to court we might find that the justice bound both of us over.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Because we went over and complained that somebody kicked our teeth in, I do not think we should be bound over to keep the peace. This is one amendment that might well be dropped. I do not think it is so serious that it should remain.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not press this. I take the view of experienced members of the bar in the committee. I questioned this amendment myself, but I was told that in many cases a fight or quarrel of some kind takes place between neighbours, and one rushes off to the courts to have the other one bound over to keep the peace. The magistrate sees that the fault is about equally divided, and he says to the one, "Yes, I will bind your neighbour over to keep the peace, but you will also be bound over to keep the peace, and you will both stop it." It will, I think, put an end to a great many unjustified applications to the magistrates. But, as both hon. gentlemen seem to think, it may put too much of a curb on justified applications. If that is the feeling about it, then I am content to drop it. It was recommended by these commissioners as a salutary sort of thing to do.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Both these women may lay charges against each other, so that a magistrate can usually bind them both over, if he so wishes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then, I shall withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the consent of the committee that section 29(2) be withdrawn?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Section 29(2) withdrawn.

Section 29 as amended agreed to.

Section 30 agreed to.

On section 31—Appellant remains in custody or gives recognizance or makes deposit in court.

Mr. CHURCH: It seems to me the government is going very far afield in this section. Apparently the amendment provides for a case where an order has been issued for suspended sentence under section 1081. The headnote of section 31 states, "Appellant remains in custody or gives recognizance or makes deposit in court". Many of these are poor people, industrial workers and others who have no money.

The newspapers have been talking about the remand type of magistrates who wish to have time to make up their minds, and then they depend upon some report, for which I can find no provision in any section of the criminal code. Such a code amendment will burden the present jail accommodation provided by the municipalities, because it must be remembered that the federal government does not enforce its own law. That is left to the provinces; and the provinces in turn charge it up to the municipalities. It seems to me that we are going very far afield when we take this action in respect of a person who is in custody and who is subject to a suspended sentence under section 1081. Such a person might not have the necessary deposit money with him, or it might not be in the hands of his family.

In England they have what is known as the summary offenders act, where time is given to pay a fine. As a result, half the prisons there have been closed. I can find no reference to that in this or any other section of this bill. I must repeat, however, that the minister is going far afield in this instance.

Section agreed to.

On section 32—Judgment on appeal final.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER. What is the object of the addition of the words underlined in this section? Has not a court at all times been in the position of being the absolute judge of the facts?

Mr. ILSLEY: It means the final judge. The law in the past has been that the court appealed to was the final judge of the facts and law. Last year we provided for an appeal on a question of law from a county or district court judge to the court of appeal for a province. However we forgot to amend this section. We had an appeal on a question of law to the appeal court, and we left in the provision that the court of appeal was the absolute judge of the law.

Sections 33, 34 and 35 agreed to.

On section 36—Part XVI.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Section 36 covers amendments in sections 771 to 784 inclusive. Over the years there have been large numbers of cases dealing with technical objections to the various sections existing in the code. It was just like adding annexes to the law; the point was finally reached where those sections had no uniformity and no certainty, and indeed they were an incongruous mess.

Was a complete study made of those authorities before these sections were evolved in their present form? It would be quite impossible to deal with these sections and to know whether or not some uniformity had been brought out of the practice which prevailed regarding these sections in the several provinces. Does this restore a degree of uniformity based upon decisions throughout the country?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what decisions the hon. member has reference to. This is, of course, an important procedural change. It adds immensely to the responsibilities of magistrates. This section should not be brought into force unless the magistracy is of a pretty high order in the various provinces of Canada.

In the event that the provincial governments wish to improve their magistrates, they are being given time to do so, because this does not come into force until October, 1949. At the present time offenders may be tried for many offences, whether they consent or not. That includes several indictable offences; and they may be tried by magistrates without their consent. The principle of this amendment is that those offenders must consent. I believe it is true to say that these magistrates may hereafter try the same offences that can be tried by superior, county and district court judges under the speedy trials provisions.

Of course there will be a certain number of important cases which can be tried only by juries. However, there will be some offences here now which may be tried in three ways—that is, by magistrate; by a county, district or superior judge under the speedy trials provisions, or by a judge and jury. So that this streamlines the section. It certainly changes this part of the criminal code in a very important way.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What are those important changes?

Mr. ILSLEY: Those are the important changes. In part XVI, at the present time magistrates in towns of over 2,500 population have jurisdiction that magistrates in towns under 2,500 do not have. Then, there are some provisions for cities of 25,000. At the present time the provisions are very complicated indeed. Continual complaints are made about the necessity to ascertain population of a town or city, and complaints about magistrates having jurisdiction in certain municipalities. The important change is that under part XVI at the present time there are indictable offences for which an accused person may be tried by a magistrate, whether he consents or not. He does not have the option of trial by jury. If this amendment is passed, then he could not be tried by a magistrate without his consent. That is an important change.

Then again, these offences, instead of being listed as they are in the present part XVI, are all offences except those which must tried by a jury. Therefore these magistrates will have jurisdiction comparable with that possessed by county court, district court and superior court judges, the latter in Quebec, under the speedy trials provision. It does two things, one is to restore or provide for the right to trial by jury for all indictable offences, and the other is to extend considerably the jurisdiction of these magistrates, of course by consent.

Mr. FULTON: Does the minister anticipate that more magistrates will have to be appointed?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. I do not know whether it will work that way; it may work just the other way. Prisoners accused of crimes may elect to be tried by juries, instead of being taken before magistrates whether they consent or not, as at the present time.

Section 37 agreed to.

On section 38—Prosecuting officer to be notified to act where judge does not reside in county.

Mr. CHURCH: It seems to me we are practically abolishing the jury system altogether for many of these offences. The explanatory note says:

> This amendment arises out of an amendment to section eight hundred and twenty-seven by section twenty-eight of chapter fifty-five of the statutes of 1947 wherein the words "having first obtained the depositions on which the prisoner was so committed, if any" were repealed.

I fail to see why the prosecuting officer should be asked to assume such duties as this. There are no institutions available at the present time in the province of Ontario. Some of our prisons were built at the time of confederation. If this is all the law reform we have here, it does not amount to very much. The onus is on the prisoner and on the industrial worker, who have very little funds at the present moment. I fail to see why it is necessary to put the prosecuting officer in charge instead of a county court judge.

Section agreed to.

Section 39 agreed to.

On section 40—When juror dies or is discharged for illness or other cause.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This clause represents an endeavour on the part of the Department of Justice to meet a situation which occurs quite frequently when, through illness or death of one or more of the jurymen, trials have been abortive. This section provides that where any member of a jury is, through illness or other cause, unable to discharge his responsibilities as a juryman, the trial may proceed with a reduced number of jurymen, not less than ten in eight of the provinces and not less than five in Alberta.

With the greatest of respect, I cannot see that this section covers the situation at all. First, it merely provides a means whereby in certain cases the trial shall not be declared abortive and the jury be discharged. It requires the consent of the crown and of the defence. If this section is to be worth anything I cannot understand why the consent of the crown and the defence should be necessary. The crown has been able to pick the members it wants on the jury, first by standing-asides, and, secondly, by challenges, either peremptory or challenges for cause, so the twelve men on that jury represent a group, each and every one of whom has been accepted by the crown. The defence is limited sometimes in the case of lesser offences in the number of challenges it may use; four, twelve, and in serious offences twenty challenges. With only four challenged, the jury chosen is sometimes not exactly the jury that counsel would have chosen. But once the jury is chosen, every one of its members has been accepted by the crown and the defence.

My first suggestion is that we delete the words "subject to consent being given in writing by or on behalf of both the crown and the accused." Alternatively I again place before the committee the suggestion I made some time ago, that supernumerary jurors be sworn in; that over and above the twelve jurors in the eight provinces and six jurors in the province of Alberta, fourteen and eight jurors be sworn in respectively, and that, in case of illness of any one of the jurors, one of the extra men becomes a juryman. In that way a number of trials which have been declared abortive during the past year would have been continued to a verdict by the jury. I ask the minister whether he has given consideration to the latter suggestion, and if he has not and does not want to give consideration to it, then let us make this section worthy of parliament so that it will work.

Here is the practical position as I see it. After a trial has been under way for two or three days, counsel for the crown has some idea of the attitude of the jury, and counsel for the defence sometimes has the same idea, although they are never quite so astute as crown counsel in that regard. Suppose that crown counsel has concluded that the jury's attitude is one of disregarding the cogent parts of the crown's case; is he going to consent? Take the other side. When the defence has seen the attitude of the jury and the attitude has been one not indicating the interest in his case which the defence counsel would like to have seen, will the defence consent in writing if he sees that the jury is against him? Either way I think this section will be just one more section in the code that will not work. If we are not going to make it work I suggest that we delete the requirement that both crown and defence shall consent.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think highly of the plan that my hon. friend suggested of having supernumeraries because these extra jurors would be sitting there, devoting some attention to the case; but the chances are a hundred to one, perhaps one thousand to one, that they would not be called upon, and so they would not assume the responsibility they should. I think that proposal should not be favourably considered. The amendment before us is based on the rule that an accused is entitled to be tried by twelve of his peers unless he waives that right. In Alberta the number is, of course, only six. I am told that the section is similar to one in Great Britain and to one in Australia. I am sorry I cannot give any information as to the extent to which this section has been used in those countries. But the fear that my hon. friend has that it will not work because either counsel for the crown or counsel for the accused or both will have some idea of how the jury feels about the case is somewhat surprising. I never knew, or seldom knew, what a jury would do about a case until it did it. I doubt whether most counsel do. I should think that perhaps this will work all right and that we had better give it a try anyway before we take away the many centuries old historic right of man to be tried by twelve of his peers.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If what my hon. friend says is correct, that the accused is entitled to a trial by twelve jurors—and by the way, we changed that a few years ago—

Mr. ILSLEY: In Alberta.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: —we still have six in Alberta; we had six in Saskatchewan—why the necessity of consent on the part of the crown? If it is looking after the interests of the accused and assuring him of a trial by twelve good men and true, why should it be necessary to have the consent of the crown before the lesser jury, or a jury of the remaining members, if illness has struck down one or two? Why the necessity of consent by the crown? What year was an amendment similar to this adopted in Great Britain?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am quite interested in that, because I could not find that among the criminal law amendments in Great Britain. I should like to know the year that it was passed.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to try to get that information. I do not know the year myself. I do not know exactly how to answer the first question except, I suppose, that the crown is entitled to have the case tried by twelve, as well as the accused. The system is the judgment of twelve jurors. I do not know that it would be altogether fitting just to make that concession to the accused without giving the same right to the crown. At any rate, that is the kind of legislation they have on it elsewhere.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What year was it passed in Great Britain?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall try to get the information before we cover the remaining sections.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: A person cannot keep up with this issue. The minister stands firmly that he is going to insist on the amendment to section 40 as it appears in the bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I would not feel like changing it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The section stands until we ascertain the year in which Great Britain passed a similar amendment.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Section stands.

Sections 41, 42 and 43 agreed to.

On section 44—Criminal sexual psychopaths.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This is the section dealing with sexual psychopaths. I should like to ask the minister a number of questions in connection with this matter. Why is it that, before any evidence may be submitted to the court that the accused is a sexual psychopath, the consent of the attorney general of the province to such procedure is required? I can see no reason why that consent need be given. This is an endeavour by the Department of Justice to meet a class of offence which is becoming very general. Various suggestions have been made on how to meet it. One is by lengthy imprisonment, which does not reform, and on discharge the offence is re-committed. The other is by psychopathic treatment during incarceration, resulting in a change in the character of the individual or of his propensity for sexual crimes. But, as the section now stands, no matter whether a person is or is not a sexual pervert, he cannot lead evidence without the consent of the attorney general. The provision that seven days' notice be given is a good and proper one, because, if it were otherwise, evidence might be led that would take the crown by surprise. Let me read the material portions of the section:

When any person is convicted of an offence under . . .

The sections are named.

. . . the court, before passing sentence, may hear evidence as to whether the offender is a criminal sexual psychopath.

Such evidence shall be given by at least two psychiatrists . . . duly qualified.

The court may hear such other evidence as it may deem necessary.

Subsection 4 reads:

Such evidence shall not be submitted . . .

That must refer back to subsection 2.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, it does, although it is not too clear.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The way it is worded it is not as clear as it might be. I continue:

Such evidence shall not be submitted unless:

(a) the attorney general of the province in which the accused is to be tried consents thereto.

How does the attorney general of the province know what evidence is to be advanced, what the psychiatrists are to say, what the evidence is to be? Before they give the evidence, before they indicate what the evidence will be, the attorney general has to consent to the accused advancing the evidence by which he will endeavour to establish that he is, in fact, a psychopathic sexual offender. I suggest, first, that the attorney general's consent be not required. That in itself might well defeat the purpose for which this is intended. If the attorney general gets seven days' notice, surely that is enough. The accused is convicted of a serious crime. After his conviction, he comes up for sentence. On his behalf a representation is made that he is a pervert and should receive such remedial treatment as is provided for. I say that man should not have to convince the attorney general that he is what he says he is, or his counsel says on his behalf. Those who are to be convinced are the judicial officers. Once the notice is given to the attorney general that evidence will be led, he is in a position to meet it. If you are to require, first, that the sexual pervert has to prove to the attorney general that he is that kind of individual, and convince him before he convinces the court, you may very well defeat the purpose of this legislation.

I think, too, that the definition of criminal sexual psychopath is rather too confined. It is necessary to define what such a person is, in order to establish some line at which treatment may be given the offender. In my opinion the use of the words "uncontrollable desires" widens the scope to such an extent as practically to defeat the purpose for which this legislation is intended. If the criminal sexual psychopath were defined as a person who, by a course of misconduct in sexual matters, has evidenced a lack of power to control his sexual impulses and who, as a result, is likely to attack or otherwise inflict injury, loss, pain or other evil—stopping there—the definition would be wide enough, without the addition of the words, which are unnecessary, "on the object of his uncontrollable desires".

In my opinion, this provision represents the first action on the part of the parliament of Canada to meet a type of offence that is becoming general, a type of offence that creates fear in the minds of mothers and fathers of children who, by reason of residence in cities, are brought into close contact with strangers. Out of this legislation, with psychiatrists receiving training, ultimately I believe this section will have the effect of punishing wrongdoers and protecting the public at large, and I also believe that eventually it will restore many of these wrongdoers, after treatment, to a place in society wherein they may contribute something to the welfare of the country, instead of being chronic recidivists whose crime ends only with their lives.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am inclined to ask that this section stand until a little more thought has been given to the wording of it. The fact that the section has given rise to some of the observations which the hon. member has made indicates that it is not as clearly drawn as it should be. The scheme of the section was simply this. In the first place, there is prepared a list of offences which are named. The section provides that evidence may be given, on the trial of one or more of these offences, that the offender is a criminal sexual psychopath, and the term "criminal sexual psychopath" is defined. If the court finds that the accused is a criminal sexual psychopath the consequences are serious indeed so far as deprivation of liberty is concerned. It is serious in two ways. In the first place, the minimum sentence is two years, and in the second place, the sentence is indeterminate, which means that the accused, if convicted, may be kept in custody indefinitely.

The section was modelled largely on the sections relating to habitual offenders last year.

The consequences being so serious so far as deprivation of liberty is concerned, it was felt that the attorney general, who is responsible for the maintenance of order and the enforcement of law in the province, should consent to action against a person in that way and to the production of these psychiatrists, one nominated by the Minister of Justice, with a view to getting a finding that might land the accused in custody for a great many years.

It was thought that the attorney general of the province should give his consent to that. It was never intended that the consent of the attorney general should be required for other evidence, or specifically for the kind of evidence which the psychiatrist gives. It was merely desired that his consent be obtained to the putting forward of that claim by the prosecuting authorities and the production of psychiatrists who attempt to prove that the accused is a criminal sexual psychopath.

Looking at the section, I think there is enough in the criticisms of my hon. friend to justify a little redrafting, and despite the fact that I should like to get it through tonight, I shall have to give the drafting of it a little more consideration.

The other point which the hon. member has raised, as to the definition of "criminal sexual psychopath", I am willing also to reconsider. My hon. friend thinks it is too confined. Legislation similar to this exists in eight states of the American union, and while the definitions vary somewhat, this is the one which was regarded as probably the most suitable.

Naturally, with regard to this entire method of trying to meet this problem, the important factor which we have not discussed much here is the lack of facilities for curative or remedial treatment. I think the legislation has to precede the establishment of such facilities, and I would hope that the authorities might in some way or another try this out to see whether they get anywhere with it. I am told that the results in the United States are not the least bit conclusive. My hon. friend the other day seemed to think they were.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I said, in New York.

Mr. ILSLEY: I listened carefully, and I understood him to say that only nine per cent of those who were released proved to be recidivists. A statement like that does not mean very much under a law whereby you need not release anybody. If you released one person and he was not a recidivist your figure would be 100 per cent. None of them should be a recidivist. They are not supposed to be let out until they are cured.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There were over 500.

Mr. ILSLEY: The fact that only nine per cent are recidivists does not mean anything, unless you know a great many other facts, and I am told that the results are not conclusive as to the advantage of this way of proceeding. The problem is, however, of sufficient importance to justify some experimentation here.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Where does the minister get the definition of "criminal sexual psychopath"?

Mr. ILSLEY: From Massachusetts.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Governor Dewey vetoed the bill in which the definition was very wide.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think it was on account of the definition that he vetoed it. In any event, we do not get much help from the experience in the United States. It is at a very early stage. Claims are made for certain methods of treatment and so on, and nothing can be proved. What I thought about this legislation was that it enables certain of these persons to be taken out of circulation at any rate and to be given curative treatment which will lead to their release without their being a menace to society. That is the reason I am bringing the legislation forward. A great deal of thought was given to this matter, and this amendment was the best we could do. But in the light of criticisms tonight, I will take another look at the evidence, and I will take another look at the necessity of getting the attorney general's consent to all the evidence which appears to be necessary under this section. It may be entirely impracticable.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall section 44 stand?

Mr. KNOWLES: I wish to ask the minister one question with respect to subsection 6. Do the words "such disciplinary and reformative treatment as may be prescribed by penitentiary regulations" refer to any penitentiary regulations or arrangements now in effect, or do they refer to something that might be brought into effect?

Mr. ILSLEY: Such as will be made; such as may be brought into effect.

Mr. KNOWLES: In other words, there has been no experimentation along that line yet in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; not that I know of.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I wish to say one word before the section stands, and I hope that the part dealing with the consent of the attorney general will stand forever. It seems to me that if, as has always been the case, insanity has been a defence in criminal matters and we can find a verdict of not guilty on the ground of insanity, that provision should be extended, and it should be equally possible to find a verdict of not guilty on the ground of psychopathic impulse or something in these sexual matters. I am sure the minister has been impressed, as have been all the rest of us who have to do with these matters, by the great increase in crimes of this kind, and by the brutality and the bestiality of them. In my own little local area it has come to the point where mothers, for example, are confining their children even in daylight hours, to the homes or the home grounds, if I may use that expression. Therefore I am not for a moment opposing in principle what the Minister of Justice is trying to do. I am all for it, but I am saying that if that right is given to the attorney general to consent, then it is of equal or greater importance that the right be given to the person accused who perhaps is up before the court for the second time. If you talk to them, as the hon. member for Lake Centre has done, I am sure you will find that there is this urge. In other words, I am trying to go to insanity, if you like. I think of the rule that was made in 1842 in the Macnaughton case. At that time we almost thought the world had gone mad.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has, I am sure, if not an intimate knowledge, at least a better knowledge than have most of us of these things which we have now discovered are largely mental. It is not so long ago since an insane person was chained to a post and thrown raw fish to eat. We have learned a good deal since then, and we have these institutions. It seems to me that sex perverts, or people who are born that way, should have this right. As I understand the matter, there is the homosexual who is just that way anyway. But the pervert, if I understand the definition correctly, is a person who was born properly, who had the natural instincts but who, because of his own fault perhaps, went in that other direction.

I acted for attorneys general for fourteen years in the province from which I come. They are all grand people and all of that, but it seems to me that the accused man should have the right to go out and bring in evidence as to what his mentality is in sexual matters. I think it is a mistake to confine our bill to the consent of an attorney general—who does what? He consults persons who are within his employment. He reads the evidence of the offence. It seems to me that it is rather too much to put up to one man, who is the deputy attorney general in practically all cases, to say whether or not he, an individual, consents to this being done. I think it should be open to both sides to bring in evidence of that kind.

I am not trying to speak so much from personal experience, but I know of people who have been charged with murder, found guilty and hanged, and who, it occurred to me, were under an impulse, an urge or something of that kind which they were quite unable to resist. They were not mentally weak as you would see if you were in ordinary conversation with them. I am glad the minister is having this section stand. Particularly that feature of it should be given further consideration.

May I go a step further along the line the hon. member for Lake Centre discussed the other day? I think the doctors in the house—and I can see two or three of them—will probably agree that we have not gone far enough in psychiatry to delimit those sex impulses which we now know, through practical experience, some people have. If it were possible that curative measures would restore those persons to health as normal human beings, then I would be all in favour of that. But I doubt, as the minister has said, if the evidence today goes far enough to establish that as a fact.

I am anxious that the minister follow up what he said and let this matter stand. We know of no greater problem in crime than this one. Since we have been here, I read about some crime on a lake shore with regard to a man and his wife, where a woman was found in water. No solution has yet been found. It is obviously one of those sex crimes about which we understand so little.

Let us place first the curative idea. On the other hand, let us not leave it to any individual to say whether or not psychiatrists may be called to prove a given state of mind. It will be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that in our criminal courts today a man can be found not guilty on the ground of insanity, without a single psychiatrist being called. I myself have proved that. We all are beginning to think we need expert evidence on that, but we do not. We can get the general opinion of a jury as to whether a person is insane or not. I am thinking more of the curative aspect and of the fairness of the procedure of permitting the accused person to call such evidence, without the consent of the attorney general in a given province.

Mr. ILSLEY: That was the intention of the section.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I agree. I was not being critical at all.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall section 44 stand?

Mr. POULIOT: Before this section stands, let me say I do not see why we have such compassion for people who are unworthy of it. So long as the death penalty exists, I do not see why we should have compassion for these men who act like brutes, who attack young children and who kill them. Why should there be such compassion for them? Is it by virtue of human rights? Why did the hon. member for Lake Centre quote what happened at Westminster recently with regard to death penalties? Death penalties existed in England when England was considered a civilized country.

The hon. member reminds me of a former member from Montreal whose name started with B. That is the only thing I remember about him. Some years ago all he was interested in was the suppression of the death penalty. Every session he placed on the order paper a motion to suppress the death penalty. That member died; the death penalty is still here.

In my view the death penalty is a rampart against crime. I was surprised when I read the bill and saw in it the section giving powers to justices of the peace in respect of cases where persons are about to commit crimes. Does the hon. member for Lake Centre or the hon. member for Calgary West know a justice of the peace who is a mind reader?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I do not; I will answer right now.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not know anyone of that kind. I remember when Senator Roebuck was attorney general of Ontario, and he dismissed ten thousand of them with a stroke of the pen. I say he deserved the thanks of the country for that. It is dangerous to give big powers to persons with no legal information; and when I refer to legal information I do not mean lectures given at universities. I mean contact with men, and an understanding of the men with whom one has contact.

At the present time we treat these criminals just the same as those who suffer accidents when they fall on the street, from a window or from a roof, men who suffer civil damage. These men are a menace to society; why should they be handled with white gloves? They are monsters whom society cannot endure.

I can understand a man who has a quarrel with someone else. That quarrel becomes worse and worse, and finally one man kills the other. That is something which has been understood since the time of Cain and Abel. But to think that one who is supposed to have attained the age of reason would attack a young boy or a young girl and kill him or kill her—why, that is something which reminds one of barbarism, of the barbaric ages. It is worse than what happened in the stone age.

Then we would hear some stand up and be lenient—"Oh, that poor fellow; he is not well!" Or they will say, "He has human rights we must respect." The question of human rights makes some people crazy. "He has human rights; we must respect his human rights!" That man is dangerous to society. Does not the child who is bestially attacked by a much older person have human rights? That child has had human rights since he was born. What about the parents of the child; have they no human rights? But no, we pay no attention to them; we pay attention only to the human rights of the criminal, the bestial criminal offender.

I am surprised that the Minister of Justice, with his sense of justice, has allowed such provisions to enter this draft bill; and I urge upon him the necessity of withdrawing them as soon as he can.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, just let me disabuse the mind of the hon. member for Temiscouata of any idea that anything is to be relaxed here. The hon. member seems to think some relaxation is provided in this section. On the contrary, a minimum sentence of two years, which does not exist with respect to any of these offences, is provided now by this section. In addition there is provision for an indeterminate sentence which may last for life. There is the provision that the Minister of Justice will review the case every three years.

My hon. friend may rest assured that there is no sentimentality and no relaxation whatever in this section. I want to make that clear to all members of the house. But it would be contemplated that if some course of treatment could be given that would be of benefit to these persons, they should receive it. I do not think there in anything wrong with that.

Mr. COCKERAM: Anybody who is human would do that.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not familiar with streamlined modern law. But according to the law I read when I was a student at law, rape was classed with murder.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend has a point there, but in an earlier section which was scarcely noticed the punishment for rape has been made life imprisonment instead of death. But why not? Did my hon. friend ever hear of a capital sentence being imposed in a rape case?

Mr. CROLL: Yes, in Chatham, Ontario, last year.

Mr. POULIOT: Often both offences are committed at the same time.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then the conviction is for murder. However, if we would just let section 44 stand I believe I could produce a draft which would meet the objections and still carry out the original intention of the draftsmen.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Does the section stand, then?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Section stands.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let us go back to section 40, which was permitted to stand earlier.

On section 40—When juror dies or is discharged for illness or other cause.

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to section 40, the English provision is contained in the Criminal Justice Act of 1925, section 15 of which states:

> Where in the course of a criminal trial any member of the jury dies or is discharged by the court as being through illness incapable of continuing to act, or for any other reasons, the jury shall nevertheless, subject to assent being given in writing by or on behalf of both the prosecutor and the accused and so long as the number of its members is not reduced below ten, be considered as remaining for all the purposes of that trial properly constituted, and the trial shall proceed and a verdict may be given accordingly.

Our section is based upon that. I suggest that we should try it.

Section 40 agreed to.

On section 45—Coming into force.

Mr. FULTON: Before section 45 carries, I should like to ask the minister whether he has completed the consideration he promised to give to the question of the suppression of the circulation of crime comics. On June 9 the minister said he would consider the matter and would introduce legislation by way of amendment to the criminal code when this bill was before the house; or that, should he decide that that would not be the proper procedure, he would give his reasons at the time this bill was being considered in committee. To what decision has the minister come?

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, naturally I expected to deal with that, and to deal with it fully, before the discussion on this bill was completed. The other night the hon. member produced a magazine called Crime or Crime Does Not Pay. I still say that I regard the publication of that particular magazine as a shocking abuse of the freedom of the press. My hon. friend asks that we legislate against that kind of publication. I told him that I was drafting legislation with a view to discussing it with council and that if it was decided to introduce it I would do so when the criminal code was up for amendment. If it was decided not to do so I would give reasons. I should like to read to the committee the section which was drafted for consideration and which is the best the Department of Justice can do in meeting this situation. I want to say that I am not going to introduce it, but I shall give my reasons. For the purpose of discussion and as I assume there is some public interest in the matter, perhaps it should be placed before the committee. The section that was drafted for consideration reads:

> Subsection 1 of section 207 of the said act is amended by adding thereto the following:
> "(d) prints, publishes, sells or distributes any magazine, periodical or book which exclusively or substantially comprises matter depicting pictorially the commission of crimes, real or fictitious, and thereby tending or likely to induce or influence youthful persons to violate the law or to corrupt the morals of such persons."

My hon. friend suggested that the Juvenile Delinquents Act be amended, but it would be out of keeping with the generality of that act to select one particular and specific set of circumstances and try to answer them in the midst of that general language. I am advised that this is the proper place to make an amendment if an amendment is to be made. It will be seen that if that section were to be passed, and I cannot think of any other kind of section that would be suitable, there would be several objections to it.

In the first place, it is somewhat uncertain. It would be difficult for any person to know when he published a magazine whether he was violating the law. In the second place, there would be considerable possibility of evasion under that section, because it provides for a publication which is exclusively or substantially devoted to the pictorial depiction of the commission of crime. There is no escape from the necessity that it be exclusively or substantially devoted to the depiction of crime, because otherwise you would be making it impossible for the odd picture of the commission of crime to appear in a book or newspaper. I have seen pictures depicting the murder of Darnley or the murder of Rizzio or the assassination of Thomas à Becket or something like that. It would be ridiculous to legislate against pictures of that kind, so you have to say "wholly" or "exclusively". The moment you do that, you open up the possibility of evasion, because there could be a magazine, the half of which was devoted to this and the other half to real comics or something of the kind. There would certainly be charges of discrimination. It would be said that we are preventing the publication of this, while we do not prevent the showing of horror features in moving pictures and that sort of thing.

I am merely pointing out the difficulties of drafting effective legislation. I am not making a strong case against the principle of the legislation itself, but I wanted to find out whether it was thought these crime comics actually induced the commission of crime. The representations that we have received in the Department of Justice were practically confined to one province, British Columbia. If we put this legislation on the statute books it will be the responsibility of the attorneys general of the other provinces to enforce it. We shall have to give them a little more time.

The discussion brought up in the House of Commons by the hon. member for Kamloops has brought the matter before the public and there will be some discussion in the other provinces. However I am not satisfied that the matter is at the stage that would justify legislation at the present time particularly, because many persons interested in this matter say there is no evidence, or practically no evidence that the publication of this material does induce the commission of crime.

We communicated with Doctor W. Line, director of the division on research, national committee for mental hygiene, and he sent the following wire under date of June 11, 1948. This was addressed to the commissioner of penitentiaries, because I had asked him to make this inquiry. The wire reads:

> Confirming telephone conversation McCulley-Line this date. To handle this problem at the level of legal banning would be to confess that parents educators and others are unable so to raise the child as to make this kind of material from the child's point of view unnecessary and undesirable. Banning serves rather to distract attention from the real problem of how we educate children in our culture. Organized voluntary action contributing to public education is preferable both operationally and ethically to legislative banning.

Doctor Line also enclosed a quotation from Doctor C. M. Hincks, general director, national committee for mental hygiene, who said:

> It has never been scientifically established that crime or thrill stories either in movies, radio or comics have contributed to delinquency. Prohibiting publication is an admission of failure on the part of the family and the educational system in encouraging the development of wholesome and healthy interests.

Some juvenile court judges and some police officers were consulted.

Ex-Deputy Commissioner Meade and Inspector Regan of the R.C.M.P. are both of opinion that crime comics do not contribute to any appreciable extent to the commission of crimes by youthful offenders. They advise me that they have consulted such leading psychiatrists as Doctor Line of Toronto university who is also of the same opinion.

Judge Harley Mott of the juvenile court, Toronto, says he has no evidence that crime comics are contributing appreciably toward the commission of crime. He says he has no doubt, however, that they have a bad effect, but he thinks it is with the class of boy over sixteen, and he is mainly concerned with boys sixteen and under.

Judge Nicholson and Judge Laramee of the juvenile court in Montreal advise me that they have no evidence that crime comics contribute appreciably toward the commission of crime amongst juvenile offenders. They feel, however, that they have a bad effect, and they are in complete agreement with any measures which would be taken to have them banned.

In talking to some of my friends about this matter, they say: "Yes, ban them, they do not do any good". But I, as Minister of Justice, cannot lightly consider introducing amendments to the criminal code on the ground that a certain thing does not do any good and may do some harm. That would not be a responsible course to follow.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Do not ban my blood spitters; I love them.

Mr. ILSLEY: On the other hand, I have some other letters here which I have not had time to go over. It must be said that very strong resolutions have come in on the other side. I have just received one dated June 7, 1948, from the parents-teachers' association of Victoria, British Columbia, which recites the evils of crime comics and certain other publications dealing with crime, sex, and so forth, and which ends with this:

> Therefore be it resolved that we approach the civic, provincial and national authorities of Canada to do all in their power to enforce legislation to stop the publication and distribution of such publications.

The conclusion I come to, in the division of expert opinion and because of the great difficulty of drafting legislation that would not be open to serious objections, is that we should not try to deal with this matter this session. I would not feel like sponsoring any such legislation now. I should like to see it given further consideration between now and next session. If it can be established that crime comics are having the effect of an inducement to crime and are causing young people to set fires, stab and shoot and grow up into criminals, they ought to be banned entirely, and I would be fully justified in adding such a provision to the present sections of the criminal code, but in the absence of some agreement among those who have had an opportunity of judging this matter I do not consider that I would be justified in introducing legislation.

Mr. FULTON: I am certain that everyone who is interested in this matter will appreciate the obviously careful and full consideration which the minister and his officials have given to it, but as he has expressed it as his considered opinion that we should not proceed with direct legislation on the matter at this session, I must express my disappointment that it has not been found possible to draft some amendment to the code to deal with this problem. Since the minister has said that he thinks further consideration should be given to the question, there occurred to me, while he was making his statement, one or two thoughts which I think ought to be before the committee and before the country to help determine a proper course of action.

One of the difficulties which the minister said occurred to him in dealing with this matter by way of legislation was a thought advanced to him—I am not certain whether he said it was by a Royal Canadian Mounted Police official or a psychiatrist—that it would amount to a confession of failure on the part of parents and our educational system to cope with the problem. That may be true, but from all those who have spoken to me and from articles I have read I know that parents and teachers are literally at their wits' end to find a solution. They cannot suggest any way of dealing with it and have found no way of dealing with it, to check the growing tendency toward complete absorption in crime stories on the part of many children. They are powerless to prevent the tremendous circulation of these crime comics and think we should have some legislative means of preventing it in Canada, and we should take appropriate action.

The minister dealt also with the difficulty of drafting legislation which would be sufficiently specific to make prosecution possible and yet not be so wide as to include quite harmless publications. That, I think, could be solved by making the question of whether the publication is exclusively or substantially devoted to the portrayal of crime a question of fact to be determined by a jury. Make it an offence to devote a publication exclusively or substantially to the portrayal of crime, and then leave it to a jury of citizens of Canada to determine whether in fact the publication does come within the definition laid down in the section. In that way I think the difficulty which the minister had in mind would largely be resolved.

The minister also dealt with the question of enacting legislation which would be applicable to every province in Canada when the majority of requests for such legislation have come from only one province. But it would be open to the attorneys general of the various provinces to determine whether they should take definite steps under the legislation. If there was a province in which public opinion felt that action should be taken, presumably the attorney general of that province would see to it that certain prosecutions were laid under the section as amended, and if in another province that was not the state of public opinion there would be no necessity for the attorney general of that province to proceed. The legislation would be available for those provinces that wanted it and those that did not, need not use it.

One other point should be before the committee and the country. The minister dealt with the question whether it was a fact that such publications do conduce to juvenile delinquency and criminal offences on the part of young persons. The minister said he had had referred to him an article by Doctor Wertham printed in the Journal. It is certainly an authoritative article, and cited instances of groups of children who had re-enacted in their homes or on the streets scenes which they had seen portrayed in these crime comics. That is a substantial proof that children do try to do the same things they have seen pictured in these crime comics. I would refer the minister to another article in a recent issue of Collier's; I have not the date of the issue at the moment, but I will supply it to the minister after this discussion is concluded.

After all, this consideration should be borne in mind: we do not hesitate to make it a criminal offence to publish pornographic or obscene literature; yet we do not define specifically in the code what is pornography or obscenity. We leave that to the criminal courts and to the jury. Therefore all we have to do is to make it a criminal offence to publish magazines which, as the minister suggested in his draft, are "substantially or exclusively devoted" to the portrayal of crime, and then leave it to the criminal courts and the jury to determine whether the publication fits that description.

In concluding his remarks the minister expressed the belief that it would be necessary to have further discussions and further representations before finally proceeding to draft and enact legislation dealing with this matter. I certainly hope that the discussion which has taken place in this house tonight and on previous occasions when the matter has been mentioned, will have the result that many representations will be received by the minister, because I am quite certain that when they are received and when the facts which I know will be brought forward by those interested in this matter come to his attention, he will be convinced that it is high time that we did take legislative action to deal with this question.

Section agreed to.

On section 44—Criminal sexual psychopath.

Mr. ILSLEY: I suggest two changes in this section and invite members of the committee who are interested in the section to follow this change. I suggest that subsection 4 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

> The evidence as to whether the offender is a criminal sexual psychopath shall not be submitted unless at least seven days' notice has been given by the proper officer of the court to the offender that such evidence will be submitted.

That, I think, completely meets the objections which were raised.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: That does away with any consent of the attorney general. It makes it clear that the only evidence the notice must cover is evidence that the accused is a criminal sexual psychopath. It does not leave open any question as to the particularity of the notice; it does not leave it that the notice may cover every statement that has to be made in the evidence or anything like that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Before the minister goes on, will he read the amendment?

Mr. ILSLEY:

> . . . unless at least seven days' notice has been given by the proper officer of the court to the offender that such evidence will be submitted.

If that is satisfactory I shall have somebody move the amendment.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just to be quite clear, the evidence referred to in subsection 4 that the minister is now proposing can be given only by at least two psychiatrists, as set out in subsection 2?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is the sole purpose?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, at least two psychiatrists. The other change in the section is in subsection 8. I suggest that the words "the object of his uncontrollable desires" in lines 15 and 16 be struck out, and the words "any person" substituted therefor.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How would the section then read?

Mr. ILSLEY: It would read as follows:

> (8) In this section "criminal sexual psychopath" means a person who by a course of misconduct in sexual matters has evidenced a lack of power to control his sexual impulses and who as a result is likely to attack or otherwise inflict injury, loss, pain or other evil on any person.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That makes it male and female, anyway. I think it is a good addition.

Mr. ILSLEY: I ask my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, to move the two proposed amendments.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I move accordingly.

SUPPLY

FRASER RIVER, B.C. FLOODS—HOUSING ACCOMMODATION FOR MEMBERS DURING SESSION

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I think this is the proper time for me to make a few remarks on a matter which is of great importance not only to the province of British Columbia but to this country of Canada, namely, the Fraser river floods. There seems to be a fair amount of misunderstanding in this house and across the country about the nature of the floods, to begin with. High water on all British Columbia streams is an annual occurrence, caused by our heavy snowfall and the ordinary run-off in the spring. As a consequence of that, we have flooding in all our major streams every spring.

That very occurrence of flooding, which causes a rich alluvial deposit, has made the bottom lands and the delta lands extremely valuable farm lands. Therefore we find that the farmers, despite that flooding, have chosen these great lowland areas, and to protect themselves against these floods, have constructed dikes. These dikes are mainly of local construction, either constructed privately, by municipalities or by the province. Such ordinary floods, therefore, cannot be classed as any concern of the federal government. They are matters of local concern.

The Fraser river flood this year, however, is a very different matter. There are three factors which have combined to make the flooding of the Fraser river and its system a catastrophe almost unequalled in the history of British Columbia. On all our four principal mountain ranges, the coast range, the Cascades, the Selkirks and the Rockies we had an unusually heavy snowfall. That in itself would have resulted in a very substantial run-off. Secondly, this year we had a very cool slow spring. There was very little warm weather to begin the process of melting snow, so that the river could take an ordinary run-off of this water. Thirdly, three or four weeks ago we had an unusually hot spell of weather, the temperature going to 80, 90 and almost 100 degrees in the interior of British Columbia. Any of these three factors would not have resulted in the floods we have had; but all three of them coming together have resulted in a situation which has not been equalled since 1894. As a consequence of this combination of circumstances, we find that almost the entire Fraser valley, and large portions of the delta area in the riding of New Westminster, are under three, four and five feet of water.

Attempts have been made to apportion the blame around. I do not think blame can be laid to anyone. If ever there was an act of God it is the combination of these three factors happening at one time. It is quite true that if the dikes on the Fraser river had been bigger more land could have been saved. But I am quite sure that if two or three years ago either the local diking commission, the municipalities affected, or the provincial government had told the farmers that they were going to build another six feet upon the present dikes the farmers would have protested most strongly. They would have said it was unwarranted, that the present diking taxes were too high anyhow, and they could have asked where the extra money was to come from. The old-timers, who have been there for fifty years, would have said the new height was unnecessary because they had never seen the water that high, which would have been true.

There has been the charge, too, that this unusual run-off was the result of heavy logging. I do not think that can be borne out. On the coast of British Columbia itself many of our smaller streams do have a very fast run-off in the spring because the mountain sides have been denuded of trees by heavy logging, but that is not true of the great inland tributaries of the Fraser where there has been little logging.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank)—he is out in the Fraser valley—in his eight years in parliament has repeatedly drawn attention to two or three factors where the federal government has some responsibility as far as the Fraser river is concerned. In the first place, he has repeatedly called the attention of the house and especially of the Minister of Public Works, to the necessity of a large-scale program of dredging in the lower stretches of the Fraser river. The Fraser river is an exceedingly long stream. It is 800 miles long, with thousands of miles of tributaries, but it is only in the last 100 miles that it is navigable in the ordinary sense, where it pours through the Fraser river canyon at Hope and suddenly opens out into the Fraser valley, and further down into the delta of the Fraser river.

The river in the olden days was navigable as far as Yale, but in recent years what little dredging has been done by the federal government has been done only in the lower stretch between the sea and the city of New Westminster. The upper fifty miles, where the flooding is so bad, has been almost untouched by dredges.

The Fraser river is fed by glacial streams. The glaciers grind off a fine rock powder which forms glacial mud in the streams, and this is carried down the river. When the speed of the river slackens in the lower valley this silt or sand begins depositing on the river bottom. The dikes so far have been built by using earth off the farms, and the same situation has been developing there as has developed in the Mississippi valley.

The dikes on land are built higher and higher; the river keeps piling up silt on the river bottom, and finally we get a situation where the river is higher than the surrounding land.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley has pointed out on several occasions that the obvious way to build dikes is not to use land from farm lands but to send a dredge up the centre of the river channel, deepening the channel and using that material to build dikes on the sides. Certainly I would suggest that any program of rehabilitation of the lower stretch of the Fraser river must include such work.

I can tell the minister that if the Fraser river had the same amount of money spent on dredging it as has been spent on the St. Lawrence, I am quite sure that the people out there would rest more easily at night. The channel being deepened and the material dredged being piled on the sides, the dikes could be constructed without the use of earth from farm lands.

Two years ago the hon. member for Fraser Valley raised another point with reference to the Canadian Pacific railway. There is a railway bridge crossing the river at the town of Mission, and he charged that the Canadian Pacific were dumping stones over the bridge to protect the abutments and the bridge piers against spring flooding. The hon. member for Fraser Valley pointed out, as did the engineers, that such a course was wrong, because any additional obstruction in the river, such as these rocks, meant a backing up of water and the additional silting of the stream, with a resultant increase in deposit in the river bed.

The wise thing was to dredge the centre channel deeper to let the river run there rather than to build up obstructions which aggravated the conditions, and how right the hon. member was has been proved by the fact that the bridge was carried away and that the worst of the flooding occurred just above the Mission bridge, in the Matsqui and Hatzic areas.

A third point the hon. member raised about four weeks ago in this house was the matter of the two railways escaping their rightful responsibility as far as these dikes were concerned. The dikes are paid for by a substantial tax levied on all farmers who are protected by these dikes, but both the Canadian National Railways—our railway—and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have avoided the payment of the tax. They have declined to pay any diking tax despite the fact that their lines run behind the dikes.

Both railways claimed that their lines were above the flood level. Today, however, we see that both railways are cut off, and the current estimate is that it will cost the Canadian National Railways $7,000,000 to replace their line of railway through the flooded area, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is faced with an expenditure of at least $1,000,000. If any evidence were needed as to whether these lines are above or below the flood level, hon. members need only go into the reading room in this house and look at the Vancouver newspapers, and they will see many pictures of railway lines in the flooded area that will convince them.

The government has a responsibility henceforth, at least so far as the Canadian National Railways are concerned, to see that our railway system pays its fair share of the diking tax.

Having said these things, I wish, on behalf of the people of British Columbia, to say a word of strong commendation of the very fine way in which the federal agencies in British Columbia pitched into the battle. The army, the air force and the navy, all three services, have done a magnificent job which has won the admiration of all the people of British Columbia. Each has been excellent in its own way. It shows clearly to some people, who were very much against military establishments, the value to a country, even in peacetime, of having a well disciplined, well organized establishment, with first-class machinery at its command.

The way in which the navy, from Esquimalt, went up the river with all ships it could muster for the relief of the people, to remove them and their livestock, and to help in building up the dikes; the way in which the army and the reserve army did their bit; the contribution which the air force made in flying sandbags and relief supplies for the people of the flooded areas, have filled the people of British Columbia with admiration. They are extremely proud of our armed services, and I am quite sure that, in the years which lie ahead, many people, remembering this, will advocate the maintenance of such services for internal emergencies as well as in any external crisis which may arise during war.

The public works engineers centred in New Westminster, under the district engineer, Mr. Morton, have rendered an exceptional service. They had the engineering know-how, and, more than that, they have had fortunately a fair amount of equipment. The hon. member for New Westminster mentioned the great services rendered by the civilians. There were some days during which 25,000 civilians from Vancouver were on the scene doing all they could, filling sandbags, and doing their best to help their farmer neighbours who were in such distress.

The people of British Columbia have been exceedingly pleased with the immediate offer of assistance made by the government through the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). The offer to share in immediate relief costs, 50 per cent by the federal government and 50 per cent by the provincial government, was most gratifying. Better still was the offer of 75 per cent federal to 25 per cent provincial in the building of new and proper dikes and pumping systems.

This flood has taught the people of British Columbia one lesson, namely, that the only good dikes are dikes of the type built in Holland—a broad dike with a double roadbed on top. These are the British Columbia dikes that held best because, when the breaks occurred, trucks loaded with rock and sandbags can cross in a never-ending stream, whereas, in the case of dikes constructed with a single roadbed, traffic is impeded and cannot flow over in the same way. On the small dikes it was necessary to employ a system somewhat after the fashion of the Chinese coolie method, whereby individual men carried sandbags on their backs.

In the end, it will be necessary, so far as the 200 miles of dikes are concerned, to construct broad dikes with a gravel roadbed on top.

The next part of this question to which I wish now to call the attention of the house refers to the statements which the Prime Minister made on June 9, in which there appear these words:

> The costs of rehabilitating the areas affected by the floods to be settled by subsequent agreement between the two governments . . .

The peak of the flood is over and the question of temporary repairs will soon be settled. The question of long-range planning of new dikes and controls and building them need only be finished by flood time next year, but the third point is an important one, that is to say, the point of re-establishing on the farms of the Fraser valley as soon as possible those farmers who have been displaced by the flood.

Immediate announcement of such a program would do a great deal for the morale of the farmers. Most of the farms were established by the present owners or by their fathers or grandfathers as a result of great effort. The land in British Columbia is not easily cleared, and in two or three nights the farmers there saw the work of thirty, forty or fifty years swept away. They are now housed in quarters provided by the Red Cross in New Westminster and Vancouver, and they are wondering how and when they will get back to their farms and, above all, how in the world they will face the coming year.

At the moment the estimate of the loss in crop this year is $25,000,000. The main crops—strawberries and raspberries, about which this house has so often heard from the hon. member for Fraser Valley—are almost completely lost. Hay and grain, vegetable crops are destroyed, and livestock have been lost or dispersed. Valuable equipment including barns, machinery, houses and so on, have been completely ruined by the flood.

Some program must be worked out eventually, and it would be well if an announcement could be made without delay as to what the farmers can expect in immediate financial and material aid. There must be planning in order to get the farmers back on the land; what crops are still possible this year. There must be assistance to the farmers so far as their cattle are concerned, because the Fraser valley, as well as being the great berry district of British Columbia, is also a great dairy section.

Provision should also be made for feed grain for their cattle and poultry over the winter. I think an immediate announcement of such a program would do a great deal to restore the morale of the farmers. I also think the implementation of such a program will save us a great deal of money in the end, because if we can put these farmers back immediately with enough financial assistance to carry themselves with one crop for this winter, they will be that much more ahead, and then our program of relief for the wintertime will be so much less.

The question of the control of the river by dams is, I believe, one that has been mentioned in the house. In this connection it is interesting to notice the effect of dams on the Columbia river. As most hon. members know, the Columbia river starts in British Columbia, goes around the big bend and then winds up in the United States, flowing between the states of Washington and Oregon. Two of the three biggest dams in the world are on the United States part of the Columbia system, namely, the Grand Coulee dam and the Bonneville dam. Yet, despite those tremendous dams, it was impossible in any way to check this tremendous flood down the Columbia river. Actually the losses on the lower part of the Columbia river were even greater than they were on the lower part of the Fraser river. It is perhaps questionable whether any effective system of flood control in the Fraser river watershed could be devised which would completely control such an unusual combination of circumstances as were met with this year. Undoubtedly such a system of dams would help a great deal in relieving the effect of ordinary spring freshets which we have every year, and in reducing even our present flood damage to a minimum.

This country has done so much for the distressed people of Europe that I think the people of Canada expect the federal government and the government of British Columbia to do just as much, if not more, for these Canadian farmers who have had such devastation wreaked on them so quickly. I would suggest to the government that this third part of the program announced by the Prime Minister, the actual financial details of what aid is to be provided and how it is to be provided, should be announced as quickly as possible. I say that should be done, not only to reassure the farmers of the Fraser valley but also to reassure the people of Canada.

In this afternoon's mail I had an interesting example of just what this means to those people of Canada who are outside the flood area. I have a pulp and paper town in my riding, Powell River, 100 miles north of the Fraser valley, whose people are as far removed from the farmers of the Fraser valley in every way as any city dwellers. Nevertheless the union there, 1,500 strong, had a meeting; and at that meeting they, first of all, put their own house in order by voting one day's pay from every man to the Red Cross for relief. That is a substantial sum, running from $8 to $20 a man. Having thus established their right to speak about financial aid, they put themselves right behind this threefold program. First of all, they said, the important thing is to re-establish the farmers. Second, they have a suggestion, which the income tax department can review, that the farmers' income tax for this year be waived. They say they have enough troubles without being bedevilled by the income tax people. However, I imagine most of them have already paid their income taxes. Third, they ask for this long-range program of proper diking and flood control.

Hon. members, too, have shown the greatest interest. I am sure that every British Columbia member—and I know at times we are rather obstreperous about our problems—has been very grateful of the way in which hon. members from every part of Canada have evidenced great interest in this unusual disaster which has befallen the richest and most lush farm land in British Columbia.

So I will close by again urging that the third part of the program announced by the Prime Minister on June 9 be immediately implemented and the farmers of the country be told quite clearly what program of re-establishment and rehabilitation is to be commenced by the two governments.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): I know, Mr. Speaker, that the house has listened with the greatest of interest and appreciation to the illuminating and constructive address just given by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair). It was illuminating in that it dealt with the circumstances of the flood this year, and it was constructive in the steps which he has suggested to the government that they might well take to re-establish the farmers of British Columbia and of the Fraser valley area.

However, certain matters were not covered by him. In addition to the points mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver North, there are certain questions on which I think the people of that province would like to hear a statement from the government. First, they would like to know whether the relief to be afforded by the federal government will be extended to the portions of the province which have been seriously damaged, but which do not lie in the Fraser river delta. This question was not covered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the statement which he made on June 9, which was referred to by the hon. member who has just spoken. The Prime Minister's statement covered exclusively relief and rehabilitation in the Fraser river valley. When I asked him whether the same principles would apply to the rest of the province at the other points which have been damaged he said, as reported at page 4936 of Hansard:

> My statement relates to floods in the Fraser river valley only.

Then I asked him whether discussions were under way or whether they had been held with respect to damage occasioned in other areas. He replied that other areas had been considered and that "matters with respect to them are still open." So that the people in the interior of the province, from my own constituency in the valleys of the Thompson rivers, in the Nicola valley, at Lillooet on the upper Fraser as well as in the Kootenay districts and the towns of Kimberley and Trail and to some extent also at Revelstoke where damage has been occasioned or is imminent, would very much like to know immediately whether the same terms for the prevention of floods or damage in the immediate future, the rehabilitation of the flood works and especially relief and compensation for damage suffered will be extended to those other areas of the province as are now being applied in the Fraser river valley. I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. member who has just spoken when he says that point three of the Prime Minister's statement, the relief and compensation to be provided, should be the subject of an announcement in the immediate future. But I urge that the rest of the province is entitled to this same full consideration and is entitled to know the details of that consideration in the same measure as received by those in the Fraser river delta.

The other point on which the people of our province would like to have some assurance relates to what is, as the hon. member for Vancouver North pointed out, a less immediate problem, but it is still one of some urgency. They would like to know what steps the federal government will take in conjunction with the provincial authorities to prevent the repetition of such disasters in the future. The hon. member for Vancouver North has, I will not say belittled the construction of dams, but he has said that their construction would not prevent floods, and he has cited the two dams on the Columbia river. I agree with him that the construction of dams alone, well down on the river's course as those dams are, certainly will not prevent such unusual floods as we have had this year. But I suggest that a program of construction of dams back at the head waters of the rivers, many of which rise in lakes where the raising of the level of the water by only a few feet would dam off a vast body of water, would go a long way toward preventing this sudden run-off with its disastrous consequences, such as we have had this year. I think some such program must be undertaken in British Columbia. I would call to the attention of the house the fact that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is reported in today's press to have spoken in Saskatchewan in glowing terms of the enormous dam which is to be constructed with federal funds on the Saskatchewan river. We in British Columbia for some years now have been asking that the same terms and the same treatment be extended to our province as is given to the prairies by the federal government under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act or any other agency and as is now being given in a slightly different manner, but in the same general program, to the maritime provinces. We would like to have the assurance which the minister has just given to the people of Saskatchewan that federal funds will be provided for flood control and similar projects in our province and on the same scale as they are being given there.

I say those two points, in addition to the point covered by the hon. member for Vancouver North, should be included in any statement which is made by the government and which, with him, I hope will be made in the very near future.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to discuss the subject which has been raised, except to say that I could not agree more with anyone than I do with the two British Columbia members who have just preceded me this evening. I am not even going to make a plea for the town of Drumheller in Alberta, which was flooded out, or the town of Emerson, Manitoba. What has happened in British Columbia has assumed the proportions of a national disaster, and Canada must take its full responsibility, having regard to the proportions to which that disaster has attained.

I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that in what I am now about to say I shall not waste the time of the house. I had intended saying this when the estimates of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) were before the committee. However I have decided not to wait until that time, first, because I do not know when those estimates will be before the committee, and for the additional reason that the minister is now in the house.

I intend to discuss the problem of housing —and I do not want you, sir, to be shocked for one moment. I am not going to talk about any general policy of housing in Canada. Rather I am going to talk about the matter of housing for members of parliament who do not live in Ottawa. Some of us come from quite some distance. I know my own personal experience has been that for two years my wife and I lived in a hotel bedroom. Even with your wife, there is not much room to circulate when you have only one room. I did not have two rooms, because I could not pay for two.

Last year I was in an apartment block. We paid $165 a month for two bedrooms and a sitting room, without a kitchen. This year, after much chasing about, and after my having paid $50 for breach of contract with respect to one place which—

Mr. BRYCE: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. member is speaking on a subject not related to flooding. If anyone now attempts to speak about the flood conditions will Your Honour rule that he has no right to speak on that subject, now that a new subject has been introduced?

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call the attention of the house to citation 345 in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, which states:

> Members may discuss various matters on the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair, without any amendment being proposed, but once—

And I call the attention of hon. members to this:

> —debate is stopped on one matter, and another matter intervenes, members cannot again discuss the former.

That is the rule.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I do what I can to rectify the matter, so as to permit the hon. member to proceed?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Go on.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I did not mean to hold anyone back.

Mr. BRYCE: I am only protecting any hon. member who might wish to speak about the flood conditions, because I know from reading Beauchesne that under the rules they would not have the right to speak.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member has unanimous consent, then, of course, he can be permitted to go ahead.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then I shall detain the house for only a very few minutes longer. I am not suggesting for one moment the expenditure of money of the Dominion of Canada for the financial benefit of members of the House of Commons. What I am proposing is this, that the scheme should be completely self-liquidating. My suggestion is —it is definitely and seriously made; and it may not help some of us older fellows; that is perfectly true—that we should have some housing, without all this nonsense which we have to go through when we come here to Ottawa. We should be charged rentals sufficient to carry the thing, and to liquidate it over a period of years.

I know this cannot be done at once. My thought is this: why can we not begin with one block of flats? For example, a man and his wife would want two bedrooms, a kitchenette and a living room, and that is all. Let us pay for it for the months we are not here, if necessary. But sir, with the greatest respect I do say that those of us who come from distances and who bring our wives with us require accommodation. For example, this year with a stroke of good luck I have a small house. I should say the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) got it, and our two families are sharing it. I admit I could not have better joint tenants in the world than these two people.

But to my mind it is just complete nonsense to ask us to come here without accommodation—and, of course, nobody asked us. We ran elections, and then we had to come. I do not mind admitting that before I came here in January I sold the house in which I had lived for something more than twenty years. I had to do that. Why? I could not close it up; if I had, the newspapers would have been full of letters saying that, in view of the housing shortage, for closing my house I should be hanged, drawn and quartered at dawn. And probably that would be right.

I had rented the house. But, even in the case of renting it to friends, those friends had children, and some of the furniture which probably we were proud of—well, it came out second best in the struggle.

I do not want this laughed off, because it is a suggestion well worth consideration. We could experiment, anyway. Let us, for example, consider some of the members whose wives are not here. Why not give them a place where they could have single rooms, baths and kitchenettes. Make them pay for that accommodation. But let us have a place here where we can anchor.

Has anyone ever thought about those of us who come from distances; have they thought about what we have to do? We have to move all sorts of truck back and forth. There is no place where we can store it—unless we place it in storage. Sometimes we do that. I am not talking about the money angle of the matter; I am talking about the bother.

We are now sitting in Ottawa for about six months each year. We are now all rushing to see if we can get accommodation on the trains to go home. I have tried to get accommodation for the 23rd, 24th, 25th, 26th and 27th—accommodation for myself on the main line trains.

Mr. HOWE: Try the air lines.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am unlike the minister, because I hate flying. He loves it, because he gets a degree at the end of every trip he takes. So he ought to love it. But, so far as flying is concerned, with me flying is out. I came east twice on big planes. But I started that too late in life, because when the plane went down I lifted it up; when it rolled this way I pushed it back that way. I was never so busy in my life, never worked so hard—and I had to cancel all my appointments next day.

I admit I am a coward—but I am through with flying. I will not do it any more. It is all right for young fellows like the minister—particularly with the rewards he gets at the end of each trip. So, that will do, so far as the flying part of it is concerned.

I now close with this simple statement. I think there are many hon. members who come short distances who would like single rooms where they could leave their baggage if there was an Easter holiday. Then they would not have to give up their rooms in the hotels. But certainly those of us who come from long distances are entitled to something which would not cost the people of Canada a cent. Every time we get a little raise in pay, which incidentally does not even compare with the rise in the cost of living; every time we get anything of that sort there is a holler. So far as I am concerned, let them holler. But they would have no holler, because I would charge sufficient money that there would not be a burden of one five-cent piece upon the treasury of the Dominion of Canada.

I do not suggest that the minister can do a great deal this year, but he can give my suggestion consideration and let us have his well considered views when his estimates come up. If he does not do that when he comes to bat before this House of Commons I am going to start recruiting around here to see what we can do to give him a rough ride.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I was quite surprised at this new idea advanced by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith).

Mr. SINCLAIR: They do it in Washington.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): They may. There is something in what the hon. gentleman says about the government providing housing for members of parliament. The hon. gentleman says that when he comes from afar to Ottawa he has trouble in finding a flat or an apartment or a house. That condition exists all over the country, not only for members of parliament. There are a lot of other people who complain, and perhaps with reason.

Why the hon. member undertook to ask me to put up houses for members of parliament I do not know. We have never had any such problem to handle in my department. Perhaps it is a question that could be studied by the architects in the department, and then perhaps we could get a consensus of the members of the House of Commons to see how many would agree to that suggestion. I do not know whether a majority would want to be directed to lodgings when they come to Ottawa. They would hardly have a choice if it was to be a compulsory system. If it is to be on a voluntary basis, then we would want to know whether we could rent these houses to other people or whether the members of parliament would be segregated. We would have to make quite a study of this new idea.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I was referring to flats, not houses.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Apartments or flats. However I was drawn into the discussion and I shall consider it. The hon. member has directed his suggestion to the Minister of Public Works and has said that if it is not considered seriously my estimates will get a ride. I am always ready to be ridden, if that is what he means.

I do not know whether he has addressed his remarks to the right minister. There has been a lot of housing under government control since the war and I have not touched any of it. Perhaps the suggestion should have been addressed to another minister, but it may be that the hon. member has made so many suggestions to that minister that he feels it is time for a change. However I am going to consider his suggestion, and anything he wishes to ask me when my estimates are up I shall do my best to answer.

Mr. ROWE: He thinks you may be able to build better houses than the other minister.

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): He has been building some pretty good houses.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You are acquainted with him and I hope you will let him know about what you and I have said.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I never thought the hon. member was so bashful.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish briefly to express my support of the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) in connection with the flood disasters in certain parts of British Columbia. I agree with his suggestion in respect to the necessity for immediate relief and also for long-range planning to remedy this situation in the future. The hon. member described most accurately the causes of this flooding in British Columbia. The same causes have produced previous floods on the Columbia river. In 1894 we had a flood identical with the one this year and from the same causes. In that year there existed at the headwaters of the Fraser and Columbia the same causes as exist today, heavy snowfalls and sudden hot weather.

We have been more fortunate in my constituency up to date than they have in the Fraser valley, but considerable damage has been done with farm lands and industrial sites flooded. The main point of danger has been the lower portion of the city of Trail and East Trail, where several blocks in the business area have been flooded and where a number of houses in the area along the riverbank have been flooded. Through the excellent co-operation between the city of Trail, the reserve army and other organizations in the community, along with that of all the people, young, middle-aged and old, they have been successful in building sandbag dikes to hold the river back and prevent a major catastrophe.

In this connection the people of my constituency, particularly the people of Trail, wish me to express their appreciation of the assistance that has been given to date by various federal agencies, other communities and particularly the Royal Canadian Air Force which flew in urgently needed sand bags. I rise at this time to make two points. I agree with the necessity for immediate federal and provincial assistance to those who have suffered in the Fraser river area.

The point I wish to make is this. As a result of the announced policy of the government to consider the Fraser valley disaster a national disaster, there may be a tendency in some quarters to run to the federal government to ask for assistance for every small unfortunate happening throughout Canada. We should try to keep our perspective. We should formulate and support a policy that defines a national disaster as a disaster which is beyond the capacity of the province concerned to meet adequately in so far as the expenses of immediate assistance are concerned.

I support the action of the federal government in declaring the Fraser valley floods to be a national disaster, but I do hope that, as a result of that declaration, every village or community will not be pressing upon this government their difficulties as a national disaster. I know our people have enough spirit; I certainly know they have in the riding I have the honour to represent, to meet minor difficulties. I have received letters pointing out the co-operation by all classes and ages and elements in the community. I am informed it has been an inspiration to watch these people fighting together a common danger, the rising waters of the Columbia river.

I am sure that, where difficulties arise on a lesser scale than what should be considered a national disaster, our people have enough spirit, enough spunk and enough local cohesion to mend their own fences. Now that the federal government has declared the Fraser valley disaster a national disaster, I hope that every isolated farm which is flooded will not be brought to the attention of the federal government as a national disaster. That is all I have to say with regard to immediate assistance.

Long-range planning of the type mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver North to control these floods and to provide for the conservation of these waters is, I think, a matter that comes under federal jurisdiction to the extent that the federal government and the provinces must combine to work out a long-range solution for the control of these flood waters. So far as the Columbia is concerned, as the hon. member for Vancouver North has mentioned there are two of the largest dams in the world on that river. At the present time a joint board of engineers working under the direction of the joint international commission is making a survey of the river, both in the United States and in Canada, both in the United States section and in the Canadian section there is a survey of that river proceeding with regard to building secondary dams to hold back the flood waters in the mountains, and major dams on the main portion of the river for the purpose of conserving those waters both for the development of power and for irrigation. In that respect the problem is to a great extent a national problem.

I do think, Mr. Speaker, that out of this flood disaster on the Fraser river and the near disaster on the Columbia river we can derive some inspiration to work together and solve this problem jointly as between federal and provincial governments; federal, provincial and local authorities co-operating together to harness the powers of nature, so that they will not in future be a menace but will serve mankind to great advantage.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) for bringing up this subject tonight and for the able manner in which he laid the whole picture before the house. As one who was out in British Columbia during the flood and flew over the district three times at a low altitude, I can say it has to be seen to be realized how great the catastrophe is. I thought, after the speech by the hon. member for Vancouver North, we might have had some statement from one of the ministers regarding what is going to be done. The waters are beginning to recede, it is true, but the great task of rehabilitation lies before that whole country, and as one coming from that country I would like the ministry to be good enough to tell the house what steps are being taken by the dominion government, in co-operation with the provincial government, in the matter of rehabilitation.

I know that many statements were made during the flood, and many wild statements, too, as to the reasons for the disaster. Perhaps I can give the house an idea of the seriousness of the situation by describing what took place at Hell's Gate canyon. That is where the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries built their fisheries. Three weeks ago the floor of it was dry. The fisheries are sixty feet high. Inside of eleven days the water rose 128 feet in the canyon and swept away the suspension bridge and all the little buildings around it. When one listened to the suggestions made to keep the flood waters back one realized that those who made those suggestions had no conception whatsoever of the great and sudden rise that had taken place in the Fraser river waters.

Hundreds of people have been driven from their homes and, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver North, they are wondering what is to be done. Many of them will not be able to go back to their places for months. It will take time for the waters to recede, and there are districts where the water will have to be pumped out back into the Fraser river.

I was hoping that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) or some other minister would tell the house and the country what governmental committees have been set up. There have been many volunteer committees set up, and I want to commend the wonderful spirit shown by thousands of our citizens who not only gave of their time and labour but contributed to their utmost as well.

We look to the future and ask what is to be done. I am one of those who believe it might be advisable to set up a large committee consisting of dominion and provincial representatives, and that an office should be built somewhere in the valley where those who have been flooded out and lost their all can go and find out just what will be done for them. The task is a gigantic one, but a great deal can be done to pacify the people there if definite rather than vague statements are made as to what will be done. I appeal to the Minister of Public Works or some other minister to tell the house and the country what steps have already been taken. We know that one or two officials are in charge, but we are in the dark as to what plan has been formulated, not for the construction of dikes for that will come later, but as to the setting up of a strong committee and the announcement of a plan as to what those who have lost their all may expect in the way of rehabilitation.

May I indicate to the house what may happen and has happened without proper direction. In one part of the valley where the water started to recede one farmer said, "I want seed. I have no money and I have nothing in the bank." He was told, "We have no money for seed but we have for feed." And they haggled for several days over whether he should have feed or seed. Things like that cause a great deal of unrest and discontent, when we have hundreds of people who have lost everything they have. We should stop haggling with a man as to whether he should have feed or seed. The thing to do is to rehabilitate him in the best manner possible.

I trust that the government, if not tonight, will make an announcement shortly, so that many hundreds who have lost their all will have new courage given to them, knowing they are to be helped to re-establish themselves on their property and in the homes in which they have lived for many long years.

Mr. J. H. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I have no thought of prolonging this debate, but, as a member from British Columbia and speaking on behalf of the C.C.F. group with which I am associated, I wish to say I concur in everything that has been said by hon. members from British Columbia with regard to the flood conditions in that province. When this matter was first brought before the house by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), the country generally had no conception of the magnitude to which this disaster would grow. It was bad enough at the very beginning, but, as the days have followed one after the other, the disaster has assumed staggering proportions.

I for one feel that the debate which has gone on in the house during this session in regard to flood conditions in British Columbia has had a tremendously good effect upon the country. It has brought us a sense of national unity, indicating that we are not just a few provinces set apart from each other, but are closely united. Our interests are common interests. Secondly, the people of the east, are, I know, sympathetic in their hearts. They are just as anxious that the government shall do something for the flood victims of British Columbia as we from the west are ourselves.

I want to concur in what was said by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), that we who represent interior constituencies are deeply concerned at the differentiation which has been made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). The commission which has been set up has been named the Fraser river rehabilitation commission. In response to a specific question, the Prime Minister gave a specific answer that the measures and the agreement entered into so far with the province referred to that particular area only.

Since I spoke last in the house on this question, another large area of my constituency has been heavily inundated. I refer to what is known as the Creston flats. Where the Kootenay river flows into and forms the Kootenay lakes, many thousands of acres have been inundated and are still inundated tonight owing to the collapse of the dikes in that area. While I agree in the main with what was said by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), that the line will have to be drawn somewhere—certainly we do not think that when any farmer's backyard happens to be flooded he should fly to the federal government and seek aid—in areas such as this where dikes have gone, where people have lost homes and crops, where they have lost their living, even when the waters have receded many of them will be too poor to go back. They have nothing to which they can go back. Therefore I for one concur in the remarks which have been made that the time is now ripe for the government to make some statement which will bring relief and some peace to the anxious minds of the people who are homeless and who have lost their all.

It is true that the Fraser valley area is of tremendous importance to the economy of British Columbia. When one visits the great city of Vancouver and realizes how it relies for its food, for its milk, for its butter, for its eggs, and for its poultry upon that great area of the Fraser valley, he knows that these people have received a tremendous blow from which it will take them a long time to recover. What we are chiefly concerned about is not so much what has happened but what will be done in the future to prevent at any time a repetition of this disaster, because one never knows what nature will do in the mountainous areas of British Columbia. And given conditions such as we have had this spring, unless adequate steps are taken to prevent it, we can have just such a disaster again in the course of a very few years. That is the one thing we are anxious to avoid.

If a national survey had been taken in previous years, and a policy of flood control had been put into operation, it would not have cost anything near the same amount of money that this will cost the Dominion of Canada, whether provincially or federally. Therefore we are most anxious to see, not only that the damage shall be repaired just as soon as possible and the people rehabilitated, but that the government shall take a long-range view of the needs of that whole area in British Columbia to ensure that the best engineering minds are brought into the question and that adequate steps are taken to prevent a repetition of these events.

There are several other members from British Columbia whose constituencies have suffered considerably from flood damage. They may not all feel like speaking tonight and participating in this debate, but they, too, are wondering what will happen to their people.

I want to commend once again, as I have already done in the house, the action of the government and especially the Department of National Defence in the splendid efforts that have been put forth by all branches of the service. We also appreciate to the full what the civilian population has done. They have not just sat idly by and expected someone else to do the job for them. Many of them have toiled unceasingly to save not only their own homes but the homes of others. Mention has been made in the house tonight in appreciative terms of what the civilian population has done; but we do hope that in the very near future the Prime Minister will make a statement that will bring relief to the minds of those who are so bitterly distressed while we are gathered here discussing this matter, a statement of what the government is prepared to do by way of immediate rehabilitation.

SEAMEN'S STRIKE ON INLAND WATERS—REQUEST FOR ABOLITION OF TOLLS ON VICTORIA AND JACQUES CARTIER BRIDGES

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I am not going to try to add to the excellent statements which have been made by hon. members of all parties in regard to the disaster that has befallen British Columbia. There is complete unanimity among the members as to the extent of the damage and what should be done both in the short-term and long-term program. I did not rise until now, because I want to speak on another subject. I have made sure that no other member from British Columbia is anxious to speak on the flood situation.

This morning on the orders of the day I asked a question of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) in regard to a serious labour dispute which exists close to this city, and which has been going on for some considerable time. I refer to the seamen's strike in which the Minister of Labour and his department have done some very active work. He brushed my question aside in a most frivolous manner. I gather from what the Minister of Labour said this morning that if certain employers and the Minister of Labour do not like the political affiliations of members of a trade union they are not going to receive the advantages which they should receive and which are available, by the law of the land, to all other organized workers when engaged in labour disputes. Certain employers' organizations can ignore and defy these laws if they do it on the basis of the political affiliations of the labour organizations they are dealing with. If they do it on that basis, then it is all right as far as the Minister of Labour is concerned. I think that is a dangerous position to take. What is required in the seamen's strike is that publicity be given to the facts. Let the people know exactly what is the cause of the strike, and that is what I am going to do tonight. In doing so, I shall use government documents to show what the situation really is.

Speaking during the Ontario election campaign in the constituency of Welland, the Minister of Labour said, as reported in the Toronto Daily Star:

> I am a great believer in conciliation and I don't believe you can settle labour disputes by putting people in jail.

But that is exactly the way in which this particular labour dispute is being settled.

In the matter of the dispute between the seamen's union and Colonial Steamships Limited and Sarnia Steamships Limited, the Minister of Labour appointed a conciliator. The conciliator was not able to do anything, because the company completely ignored him. Then a commission was appointed, consisting of J. D. McNish and Leonard W. Brockington. Mr. Brockington is a particularly outstanding conciliator who has been used by the Department of Labour on various occasions. Indeed, when the standing parliamentary committee on industrial relations wanted someone to conciliate the steel strike in 1946, Mr. Brockington was asked to do it. I have the report submitted by the commissioners to the Minister of Labour and dated April 15, 1948. I shall read from it as briefly as I can. I quote:

The conciliation board has sent a number of notices advising the parties of meetings in Toronto on the 22nd of March and on the 30th of March.

Therefore you see, Mr. Speaker, this is a long-standing dispute. I continue:

Although representatives of the employees attended the meetings so arranged, the board's invitation to the employers received neither the courtesy of an acknowledment nor the co-operation of an attendance.

In order to try to get over the objection of the owners to the officials of the union because of their alleged communist affiliation, the commissioners urged the officers of the union to allow other parties to negotiate the agreement and become responsible for the signing and the carrying out of the agreement. The union officials agreed, but, as can well be understood, with misgivings, because they wanted an agreement.

The following special negotiating committee was appointed: Percy R. Bengough, president of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada; William Jenovese, vice-president of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, and president of the Toronto district trades and labour council; John W. Buckley, secretary of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada.

The companies were then advised that these well known labour leaders were willing to negotiate any agreement on behalf of the seamen's union. Mr. Bengough, it was found later on, could not attend, and Mr. Russell Harvey, who, I believe, is a member of the typographical union, or some union associated with the typographical union in Toronto, took his place. The commissioners say:

Your commissioners called a meeting of the interested parties in Toronto on Monday, April 12. It was attended by representatives of the seamen's union and by Mr. Frank Wilkinson, K.C., and one of his legal associates on behalf of the companies. The companies' representatives were without instructions. At the request of the board they communicated with their clients. The chairman of the board was advised by Mr. Wilkinson that the attitude of the companies towards your commissioners was the same as their attitude towards the conciliation board.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

That is, they ignored the commissioners in the same way as they ignored the conciliation board. The report then goes on:

In the year 1947 a number of disputes arose between these companies and the union.

That is, between the shipping companies.

A board of arbitration was set up in accordance with the provisions of the agreement of 1946. The award of the board was not accepted by the companies after the companies had failed to appoint an arbitrator in accordance with their agreement.

Then further on:

After the government's intervention, and as a part of the settlement publicly announced, the companies made a promise that if a vote were taken amongst their employees and found to be favourable to the Canadian seamen's union the companies would negotiate an agreement for the year 1948.

Then steps were taken to take a vote, as required by the labour laws of Canada. This is the result of the vote. The ballot read:

Do you desire the Canadian seamen's union to act as your representative for the purpose of negotiating a collective agreement with your employer for the 1948 navigation season?

This is the result of the vote for the employees of the two companies, the Sarnia Steamship company first, and Colonial Steamships second:

	Sarnia Steamships	Colonial Steamships
Number of eligible voters..	170	178
Number of votes cast	159	169
Number of voting "yes"	143	154
Number of voting "no"	9	13
Number of spoiled ballots ..	7	2

It will appear from this that the Canadian seamen's union was accepted by the employees on a government-supervised vote, on the part of the Sarnia Steamship company, of 143 for and 9 against, and on the part of the Colonial Steamship company, of 154 for and 13 against.

Surely a vote of that kind is sufficient indication of what the employees wanted. After that, the companies, which had promised that if the vote were taken and if it favoured the seamen's union they would accept it, as soon as the vote was taken refused to accept it. This is what the commissioners have to say in that regard:

It is apparent that the companies have ignored the meetings of the conciliation board appointed this year and have declined either to meet their men or to attempt conciliation and negotiate by using the services of the former board or of the present commissioners. Such conduct is an open breach of their agreement with the union dated September, 1946,—

Note this:

—of the provisions of P.C. 1003, and of their undertaking made with the government of September, 1947. By their action and inaction the companies have also broken the admirable, long established, and beneficial practice by which Canadian employees and employers sit down together around a table in an attempt to settle their difficulties.

Surely there never was a greater condemnation of a company than you have here by two responsible commissioners appointed by the government. Yet the Minister of Labour, when the unco-operative attitude of the employers is drawn to his attention, brushes it aside, because he happened to be heckled at a meeting, and will not have anything to do with it.

If there is anything more disgraceful than the action of the companies it is the action of the Minister of Labour. I am not quite through with what this report has to say. I quote:

Your commissioners also have reason to believe that the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada would be willing to adopt the somewhat unusual procedure of entering into an agreement with the companies on behalf of this union, which is chartered to the trades and labour congress, it being understood of course, that if the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada did so sign an agreement on their behalf the union's bargaining rights would be specifically preserved.

While the companies admit that they have signed an agreement with a rival union—

This is the rival union, a union that has no standing whatsoever according to the labour legislation of Canada.

—no copy of such an agreement has been filed with the department, and no bargaining rights have been granted by the national labour relations board to any organization other than the Canadian seamen's union.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I notice that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) is not in the house. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) a minute ago used the word "disgraceful." I would refer him to Beauchesne, second edition—

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, might I intervene? If you object, I withdraw the word.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I felt that I should intervene because the minister is not here.

Mr. MacINNIS: I agree, Mr. Speaker. I was pointing out that the Canadian seamen's union is the bargaining agency according to the laws of the Dominion of Canada as administered by the Department of Labour.

The report goes on:

In view of the intransigeant attitude of the companies, your commissioners have not considered that any further legal procedure on their part would serve any useful purpose. We are unanimous in stating our belief that the defiance of the existing law, the breach of the existing agreement, and the failure to fulfil the promise made by these companies to the government are a serious threat to the recognized practice of labour conciliation, and are moreover, the worst possible weapons any employer could use in a dispute with the legally constituted bargaining representatives of his employees.

We in this country are opposed to communism. I cannot conceive of anything that is more likely to breed communists than the attitude of these employers. I will finish this report with one other paragraph:

We have reason to believe also that this conduct which goes to the root of labour relations in this country, raises far wider issues than the isolated dispute with the Canadian seamen's union and that there is grave danger that the discord will not be restricted merely to relations between this union and these companies.

That is the seriousness of this situation. If hon. members would take the trouble to read the report made by the national war labour board in 1943 they would find there the opinion of Hon. C. P. McTague, chairman of the board, and Leon Lalande who signed the majority report. I should like to read just one paragraph from the finding of that labour inquiry:

The most serious question involved at the present time is that of the right of collective bargaining. It must be kept in mind that this is a right which in a practical way has been recognized in Canada for a period of half a century. By far the majority of employers have resisted it over the period.

That is, over the fifty years. To continue:

Generally speaking, the great mass of employers, until comparatively recent years have employed all weapons in their power to resist and discourage the trade union movement. There have been exceptions, of course.

When it is remembered, however, that the international trade unions represent but approximately 20 per cent of Canadian labour generally it is apparent on a comparison with other countries such as England, Sweden and Australia that Canada's trade union movement has been very, very slow indeed. Until comparatively recent years we have been in the main an agricultural country. That factor, together with resistance to the movement by reactionary industrial employers, induced by the fear motive or other even more selfish motives, has served to hold in check any widespread advance in the movement of trade unionism for quite a period of years.

That constitutes the findings of two capable men after an exhaustive inquiry. I do not intend to take the time to read it all. Hon. members who want to read it will see what those men found that certain employer attitude develops a certain kind of labour leader. The war being over, we are now getting back to the same state of affairs that Mr. McTague and Mr. Lalande found in their investigations in 1943.

I will conclude by pointing out now that this is not an unimportant matter that I am raising. I know that fault will be found with me. I know that maybe this is not a particularly popular issue. But anyone who thinks he will scare me off by raising that sort of issue is wasting his time. I have taken up unpopular issues before now. If those who do not agree with me would read an editorial on this subject which appeared in the Globe and Mail of Friday, June 11, they would find that the editors agree largely with what I have pointed out in this house tonight. As a matter of fact, I am basing my case wholly on the report made by the commissioners to the Minister of Labour. The first paragraph in the Globe and Mail editorial reads as follows:

> Canada is again in the throes of a lake seamen's strike. The issues are not the customary disputes over hours, wages and working conditions, but over the fact that five shipping companies have illegally refused to bargain with the accredited representatives of the Canadian seamen's union.

I can almost hear the statements that would be made in this house if—as I have heard them so many times before—if the trade unions had taken illegal action at this time. So let us now tell the people of Canada who are preventing a peaceful settlement of this dispute and who are the real culprits in the trouble and the rioting that have developed in this situation.

Mr. ALCIDE COTE (St. Johns-Iberville-Napierville): While the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) is in his seat, Mr. Speaker, I wish to clear up a point.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I have made representations last year, in connection with the Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges, in the province of Quebec. I had the support, at that time, of the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard). The government of the province of Quebec is wholly responsible for its highways and, of course, has to pay for the cost of building and maintaining the bridges that are extensions of such highways. However, the Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges were built and paid for by the federal government. When the toll system was applied generally to all main bridges in the province, whether they were considered provincial or federal bridges, the whole population was being treated equally. When in 1942 the Quebec government ruled to abolish the toll system in fairness to all provincial taxpayers, it should have eliminated the toll also on Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges. Otherwise, there was this unfairness that one important region of the province kept on paying tolls whilst all others benefited from the abolition of the toll on the other bridges. That is why, as far back as 1942, the hon. Adélard Godbout, then premier of the province of Quebec, said he was ready to reimburse the federal government a reasonable amount if the toll was abolished on Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges, the same as on other bridges of the province. However, after the negotiations were started, a new administration came to power and they were never resumed.

We must at this time take cognizance of the injustice of which I have just spoken, which consists in imposing double taxation upon one section of the population, to the other section's benefit, an injustice which has lasted from 1942 to this day.

Since then, the union of municipalities of the province of Quebec, of which I am a director, has expressly requested Premier Duplessis to meet the federal authorities with a view to solving this problem once and for all.

I am told, on the other hand, that the Quebec government have obtained permission from the federal authorities to use one of the two railway lines across the Quebec bridge for the purpose of widening the motor thoroughfare.

Last year, following representations made by myself and by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville, the Minister of Transport declared himself willing to meet the representatives of the province of Quebec at any time to study the possibility of abolishing toll charges on Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges. Unfortunately we are still at the same point today and this injustice has not yet been done away with.

That is why I am now asking the Minister of Transport the following questions:

First, since July 2, 1947, after my colleague and I had made representations to the hon. minister, and as a result of the latter's statement, has the government of the province of Quebec, through its premier, Mr. Duplessis, or a representative appointed by him, taken any action with a view to meeting the dominion government about the toll problem in connection with the Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges?

Second, is the dominion government or the Minister of Transport always ready to meet the representatives of the Quebec government with a view to considering and eventually solving the toll problem as regards the Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges?

Finally, is it true that the provincial government has secured from the dominion authorities or the Minister of Transport permission to use one of the two railroad tracks on the Quebec bridge for the widening of the vehicular traffic lane?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have listened carefully to the remarks of the hon. member regarding toll charges on Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges. He asked three questions. I will reply to his last one first. He wanted to know whether it was true that the dominion government had, directly or through the C.N.R., entered into negotiations with the Quebec government with a view to building a driveway on the Quebec bridge. The answer is yes. I must say to the hon. member that although the agreement has not yet been signed between the dominion and provincial governments, negotiations are now concluded and it has been agreed that a paved highway will be built on the Quebec bridge. As the details of this matter are rather complicated, I shall not deal with them tonight. However, it is true that negotiations have been brought to a conclusion. The province of Quebec undertakes to vote the money required to open up this new lane to vehicular traffic.

In his first question, the hon. member asked whether the Quebec government or some other provincial agency had made representations to the dominion government with reference to the elimination of toll charges on Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges. In answer, I must say that, to my knowledge, no such representations have been made. Further, had any been put forth, I would have been aware of them. I must say that certainly no representations similar to those made by the provincial authorities in connection with the new highway on the Quebec bridge have been made with regard to the Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges.

May I ask the hon. member to repeat his second question?

Mr. COTE (St. Johns-Iberville-Napierville): Is the Minister of Transport still willing to meet the representatives of the province of Quebec in order to consider their arguments and to see whether toll charges can be eliminated on these bridges?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It goes without saying, Mr. Speaker, that I am entirely agreeable to hearing the representations of the province of Quebec or of any one of its agencies and, if need be, even those of the minister of public works with reference to the removal of toll charges on Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges.

Mr. PAUL E. COTE (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I was not in the house when the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) made the first part of his observations respecting the particular subject he mentioned tonight. I suggest that it would have been more appropriate for him to have taken advantage of one or other of the two opportunities the house will have to discuss labour problems. I refer to the examination by committee of the whole of Bill 195, to provide for the investigation, conciliation and settlement of industrial disputes. We expect that will be submitted to this chamber very shortly. In the second place, the estimates for the Department of Labour are expected to be introduced soon.

I have not any intimate knowledge of the problem mentioned by the hon. member which would allow me to follow satisfactorily the remarks he has made tonight. I would point out, however, that on several occasions recently the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) has dealt with this matter. He has expressed his views in answer to questions put by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) and others, and I am sure that at the proper time he will make, on this particular matter, any further statement that he deems appropriate.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I, in reply to the parliamentary assistant, say that the situation is critical, and I do not think we can wait for the estimates, or for some other time. People are being shot at; people are going to jail; all kinds of things are happening. I do not think we can wait at a time like this.

I asked the Minister of Labour a question this morning. Had he made any attempt to give me a reasonable answer I would not have had to raise the matter at this time.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

316. Salaries of staff and other pay-list items, $93,972.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We were considering item 245 of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

245. Departmental administration, $623,428.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Chairman, I am in almost the same position I was in last night, or the other night, in that I have an important speech to deliver and only six minutes in which to deliver it. I shall try to make my speech in those six minutes—or even less. That is difficult for me to do; my congregations always complain because they say I am a long-winded preacher.

There are two phases of the work of the Department of National Health and Welfare I should like to dwell upon for a moment. I wish to bring to the attention of the minister these two matters. I am sure we are all glad that the present government is contemplating some advance with respect to the health services of Canada. The other day we listened to the Prime Minister's announcement, which I think has been quite acceptable, generally speaking, to the people of Canada.

But there is in Canada today one class of people who have been entirely neglected in any health legislation that has been passed either in this house or in any provincial legislature. I refer to incurable cripples, wheel-chair cases, bedridden cases. The medical profession have gone as far as they can with these cases and have pronounced them incurable. I have in mind those who have been crippled as a result of poliomyelitis or those who were born crippled or the epileptic cases. If I were a medical man I could put on Hansard the names of many other maladies which I do not now know. All these people are beyond the aid of medicine or of the medical profession. What is being done for them?

The question might be asked, what can be done for them? In a medical sense, nothing, but they must be cared for. Most of them are unable to earn a living or to engage in gainful employment. The result is that they are thrown upon the mercies of relatives or friends or charitable institutions. If they have not those to turn to, they must beg the relief authorities for a handout. This class of incurable citizen has been entirely neglected and forgotten.

They are not great in number; I do not know how many there would be in Canada. They are scattered from coast to coast and are unable to get out or send people around to organize for them as unions and other organizations have done in order to bring pressure upon the proper authorities. A little over a year ago, an organization was set up by a young woman in Calgary named Miss Eva Warden. At nineteen years of age she took poliomyelitis and is today a wheel-chair case. Her mother is a widow. You tell me what she can do.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

She started this organization and has had a flood of requests for information from all over Canada. She is doing her best to keep this organization going, in order to focus public attention upon their needs. I do not know whether the minister will suggest that this matter should come under the Department of Finance, but I do ask him to take it into consideration and, if possible, to put on the statute books, or aid the provinces in putting on their staute books some form of legislation that will prevent these unfortunate people from being cast upon public charity.

Perhaps mine is the small voice crying in the wilderness, but I think I have the unanimous support of this entire house and of the legislatures when I ask that something be done. This is not a party platform; we do not have these things pegged into our party platforms; it is a humanitarian thing. I believe all should lend their support to something of this kind. Will the minister not take this into his deepest consideration?

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): May I assure my hon. friend that I am doing that very thing.

Mr. POULIOT: I fully agree with what the hon. member for Macleod has said in his fine speech. Once again I congratulate him wholeheartedly. Last year I took up the same question. I do not understand why there should be this gap in connection with those who suffer from infirmities. The old people have something and the needy mothers receive help from the provincial governments, but no help is given to those who suffer from infirmity, who are poor and who cannot subscribe to any form of contributory insurance.

I have made a survey which I shall speak about at another time, but tonight I appeal to the minister. I know his big heart and I know he plays no politics in connection with health. I know he places that as being of the greatest importance to the state. He understands these problems. I remember, when his predecessor sat there two or three years ago, he said, in answer to a resolution moved either by the hon. member for Compton or the hon. member for Terrebonne—I see it is eleven o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Tomorrow we shall take up the two resolutions in the name of the Minister of Justice, one being a measure to amend the Railway Act, the Exchequer Court Act and the Judges Act and the second being a measure with respect to the Revised Statutes of Canada. Then we shall take up Bill No. 345, to amend the Tariff Board Act; Bill No. 346, being the Canadian National Railways Financial Guarantee Act, 1948; Bill No. 60, to amend the Veterans Insurance Act; Bill No. 196, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, and Bill No. 200, to amend the Veterans Rehabilitation Act. When we are through with the war veterans bills, we shall take up Bill No. 198, to amend the Dominion Elections Act. If we complete those bills we shall go into supply and take up national health and welfare, trade and commerce, and veterans affairs.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the minister a question with respect to the three bills in the name of the Minister of Veterans Affairs? Each of these bills has been amended in committee. Does the minister know whether reprinted copies of the bills as amended will be available to us tomorrow?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I do not know, but I shall inquire and do my best to have the bills with the amendments in the hands of the members tomorrow before we start to study them. I will do the best I can.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is good. Thank you.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.
