OUR PHILADELPHIA LETTER.

(From our regular Correspondent.) PHILADELPHIA, June 17, 1876. The attendance at the Exposition has been larger this week than last, and seems to be steadily, though slowly increasing. It would be curious to know just what proportion are from the city, the transient pulation, and the country. The AVERAGE DALLY ATTENDANCE, cxclusive of exhibitors, attendants, news.

AVERAGE DALLY ATTENDANCE, 20,000 ; many of these are permanent residents of the city, many come from the country, and surrounding villages, and the remainder are the transient population from whom the hotels expect so much, for whom immense caravar built, and for whom private residences, which look like the entrance to a cave.

The high prices away, but look in here, it shall cost you however, for eligible rooms, are stiffly nothing and never fear; this is the place maintained. They argue that the crowd where I cook the ones, who never pay their will be greater in a few days, that the subscription sums, for though in life they Western and Southern travel has not yet may escape, they will find, when dead, it set in, and that Europe has not yet crossed the Atlantic. A better knowledge of their country and the times would tell them, that the entire visitation from the impoverished South, during the entire and if of refreshments they only think, time, will not be larger than the present there's boiling water for them to drink; average daily attendance, multiplied by two; that the West laboring under finan-down his nose, and red-hot rings to wear cial and industrial depression will not travel as much as usual this summer; and like fire, I'll sew up their mouths that it is no easy, in short, no feasible with red-hot wire; and then, dear sir, your

No risitor can enjoy the advantages afforded in such an almost infinite museum as this in one day, and every day that he remains will add to his expense; by reducing the expenses, the management an the hotels will increase their own profits, by inducing the visitor to prolong his stay, and thus promote the only object that the

What we claim is this. The Fumer and the Opposition by a fearless expoure of the financial condition of this Province, have compelled the Government to acknowledge that their Railway Scheme was impracticable. If "a reckless spirit" in respect to Railway expenditure, existed in this Province, the existence was due to the Government which the ADVANCE supports with such unwavering servility. No one asked for the Subsidy Act of 1874 was the offspring of the Government be thrust upon any one else.

"Do you wish, then, to be arrested as his accomplice?"

Passepartout dropped his head in his heads. He could no longer be recognised. He did not look at the detective.

It was then eight o'clock, and high tide, of which the Carnatic was to take advantage to go out through the passes, was put down at half-past nine.

When the palanquim arrived at the door of the hotel, Mr. Fogg and Mrs.

Aouda got into the comfortable vehicle, and their baggage followed them on a wheelbarrow.

Half an hour later the travelers dismounted on the wharf, and there Mr. Fogg learned that the Carnatic had left expected then to leave by that steamer!"

"Yes, Sir." "I too, madame, and I am much disappointed. The Carnatic, having com-pleted her repairs, left Hong Kong twelve hours sooner without warning any one, and we must now wait a week for another steamer!"

Fix felt his heart jump with joy in pronouncing these words, "a week."

A week! Fogg detained a week at Hong Kong! There would be time to receive the warrant of arrest. Chance would at last declare for the representatives of the law.

tives of the law. It may be judged then what a stunning blow he received, when he heard Phileas Fogg say in his calm voice:— "But there are other vessels than the Carnatic, it seems to me, in the port of Hong Kong."

And Mr. Fogg, offering his arm to Mrs. Aouda, turned towards the docks in search of a vessel leaving.

Fix, stupefied, followed. It might have been said that a thread attached him to this man.

However, chance seemed really to abandon him whom it had served so well "Listen. The 28th of September, altimo, a robbery of fifty-five thousand pounds was committed at the Bank of England by an individual whose description they were able to obtain. Now look at this description, and it is feature for feature that of Mr. Fogg."

abandon him whom it had served so well up to that time. Phileas Fogg, for three hours, traversed the port in every direction, decided if it was necessary, to charter a vessel to take him to Yoko-hama; but he saw only vessels loading or unloading, and which consequently could not set sail. Fix began to hope again.

But Mr. Fogg was not disconcerted, and he was going to continue his search.

"But this poor fellow—" said Mrs. Asouda, whom Passepartout's disappearance worried very much.
"I am going to do all I can to find him, "replied Philear Fogg.
And while Fix, nervous, feverish, angry, repaired to the pilot-boat, the two others went to the police station at Hong Kong. Phileas Fogg gave there Passepartout's description, and left a sufficient sum to find him. The same formality was carried out at the French consular agent's, and the palanquin having stopped at the hotel where the baggage had been taken, took the travelers back to the outer pier.

At this moment a person who had been watching him closely came up to him. It was the detective, Fix, who turned to him and said:—

"Surely," he thought, "he is a very polite rogue, but he is a rogue!"

At ten minutes after three the sails were hoisted. The English flag was "Eut us not speak of plied Mr. Fogg. "But, if I insist—" were hoisted. The English mag was flying at the gaff of the schooner. The passengers were seated on deck. Mr. Fogg and Mrs. Aouda cast a last look which did not admit of reply. "That will enter into the general expenses."

Fix bowed; he had a stifling feeling fix bowed; he had a stifling feeling the forward of the lay down, and

Fix was not without apprehension, for chance might have brought to this place the unfortunate young man whom he had so indignantly treated, and then an explanation would have taken place, from which the detective would not have got out to advantage. But the Frenchman did not show himself, and doubtless the stupefying narcotic still held him under its influence.

Finally, Master John Bunsby ordered to start, and the Tankadere, taking the wind under her brigantine, foresail, and standing jib, flew out in the sea bounding.
