June Butter Members of the human family are supposed to be governed or controlled by reason, whilst other animals are said to be governed by instinct. What is meant by instinct? It has many definitions. A fair one may be an unreasoning impulse to do certain actions. The infant acts from this impulse. It seeks its food instinctively that the hawk has a natural impulse to do them harm. Instinct compels a bird to harm. Instinct compels a bird to from it. We know, too, that when build a nest without knowing in what cold weather is upon us and the cows build a nest without knowing in what its usefulness consists.

Instinct is a force that nature has placed in every animal, however, large or small. It is a living force that aids in seeking and obtaining the means of growth. Instinct is a blind impulse that controls every animal in many ways. It acts, it knows not why. Animals may reason to some extent, but instinct supson to some extent, but instinct supplies the place of reason. Some years color—whether it is the sunshine, the sunshine, the sunshine the sunshine

THE NEW GOVERNESS. ant tre, and then, feeling unble to sleep, under the pressure of anxieies, she went to the window and amused realf by looking out into the street, see a few early risers were to be seen But soon this occupation palled her, and she consulted her watch, ed the contents of her purse, made penage, for day at the hotel, by aid of a printed list of regulations upon the door, rang her bell, ordering her breakfast to be served up to her without Papers.

The brenkfast was in due course of time served up in her little sitting-room, in front of the cozy fire, and here she carefully looked over the Times, cutting out ness or companion, and putting them into her purse.

This task completed, she read the news, and then, unpacking her traveling-bag, proceeded to array herself at hisely as pos-sible for her proposed expedition. She was soon attired in a neat mourning garb, but with a Cashmere shawl, and after giv-ing her bornet a lew touches with her skullful finesses much to the leaves of the leaves.

"It is after ten o'clock now, and I shall surely find these ladies who have adver-tised dressed and expecting answers." stairs and out of the house, after a ords to the waiter; and a cab havthe situation had been secured by a young woman had an hour before. It.

There yere several other advertisers, nowever, and to them Amber severally

The first of these wanted a young person as companion to a "mental invalid" and thought that the applicant had not the requisite knowledge, especially as the einvalid" had frequent fits of thysteris, that were described as appalling. The closed behind her, Lady Moreland turned to her husband, and said, with an impressive was too young to be a government sive air:

Street door she saw several applicants in the reception room. Her own heart was strangely light and movement, as she swept past him. The fact is, I intend to. As you say, I'm tired of roving so pick me out a wife as soon as you please."

Lady Moreland looked gratified, and to her husband, and said, with an impression was too young to be a government sive air:

She must be rich and a beauty, as well as noble, although you will have the library, where she knocked in the down to the library, where she knocked in the first of the library, where she knocked in the strain of the library, where she knocked in the first of the library, where she knocked in the first of the library, where she knocked in the strain of the library, where she knocked in the strain of the library in the fact is, I intend to. As you say, I'm tired of roving so pick me out a wife as soon as you please."

Lady Moreland looked gratified, and the properties of the was graver and sterner than of old, and the rare smile that the applicant had not the library in the down to the library, where she knocked in the strain of the library in the down to the library in the down to the library in the strain of the strain of the library in the strain of the strain of the library in the strai second and third declared that the appli-cant was too young to be a government. The fourth objected to Amber's shawl, deeming it unsuitable for a young woman in her position; and the fifth declared that she looked too "uppish."

The list was finally gone through with, and nothing but discouragement resulted know she loves me tenderly, and I do not like to leave my fate unknown to her, or even let her hear of me through Blanche—dear as the is."

She wrote a letter, therefore, to Mrs. George, giving in part her reasons for leaving the Hall, making no mention of Blanche, and saying that in Jasper Longley she had found a true and faithful friend, "In sonclusion, she said that she friend, in wonclusion, she said that she was going to earn her living, as soon as she could get something suitable to do, but that her address had better remain unknown to her friend, as she wished to from that moment dead to Sir Ralph. at Courtney Hall.

The day dragged away the night passed another morning found her at her little breakfast table, conning the papers.

There were only three advertisements that seemed eligible, and these three she hastened to answer at a suitable hour, the morning being clear and pleasant.

The first wanted a nursery maid, governess, and a needle woman combined, and this commend of eithertone Ambala.

"I shall do nothing here," she thought.
"They will want perfection in their governess. I am corry I came here." The door opened at this juncture, and Amber, in her well-bred, lady like man-ner, stated her business to the hverled footman, who ushered her into a recep-tion room, and took her card, with which Amber sank into a chair, and was silent until her ladyship's keen survey of her had been completed.

"What are your qualifications?" demanded the lady after a pause.

Amber medically stated her acquire-mental."

Inces was her lace, so clear in complexion, so faultless in features, shaded by glossy, perfumed hair swept away from her temples, lit up and glorified by her brilliant eyes, so full of soul and intellect, and made tender by the sweet and winning mouth, that looked like a cleft pomigranate.

Perhaps a faint sadness lingered in the average of her average of you the child poor Lady Courtney used to dote upon so? How singular! But did not Sir John leave you provided for on

As his lordship remarked, our children are young, the elder being ten and the young or eight, and, with the assistance of masters. I have no doubt you could do as well as any one. What do you think, my lord to she added, addressing her husband.

I husband.

Very well, then, Miss Courtney; consider yourself engaged for the year, and and longer, if we are mutually pleased you will have no menial duties. Your will have no menial duties. You will have no menial duties. You will have regular hours for mattracting my daughters in the various branches, and will have regular hours for mattracting my daughters in the various branches, and will remain with them while they are receiving instruction from their masters. You will eat with them while they are request. "By Jovel What looking maid, "Sir Ralph onme?" responded the prim looking maid, "Sir Ralph has come."

"Sir Ralph onme?" respected Blanche, what would you do!"

"I'd ask you to open your town house and take me there, and take daughters in the various branches, and will remain with them while they are receiving instruction from their masters. You will east with them, and instruct them in regard to their behaviour. You will have a room to yourself, and the ingerimson and her eyes sparkling with indignation. I beg you let me pass.
