CANADA

HOUSE OF COMMONS DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

THIRD SESSION—TWENTY-EIGHTH PARLIAMENT

20 Elizabeth II

VOLUME VIII, 1971

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE THIRTEENTH DAY OF SEPTEMBER, 1971, TO THE NINETEENTH DAY OF OCTOBER, 1971, INCLUSIVE

INDEX ISSUED IN A SEPARATE VOLUME

Published under the authority of the Speaker of the House of Commons by the Queen's Printer for Canada

Available from Information Canada, Ottawa, Canada

24319—1½

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, September 13, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES (WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE)—
WITHHOLDING BY GOVERNMENT OF PAYMENTS UNDER TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES ACT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, having given Your Honour notice under the terms of Standing Order 17(2). The basis of my question of privilege is to be found, in the first place, in two answers to written questions given by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board last Wednesday and appearing in the Hansard we received on Thursday. My question of privilege arises also out of answers to oral questions given on Thursday on the same subject. It might be suggested that the appropriate time to have raised this question of privilege would have been on Friday, but as a matter of fact neither the minister in charge of the Wheat Board nor the Minister of Finance, who is also involved, were scheduled to be in the House on Friday, so it seems to me that under the provisions of citation 104(3) of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition this is the earliest opportunity for me to raise the matter.

The answers which were given on Wednesday, September 8, should, I think, be placed on record at this point. The first one appears in Hansard at page 7596 in response to a question by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg). The question was as follows:

• (2:10 p.m.)

Are payments being made on a monthly basis to the Canadian Wheat Board under the provisions of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act and (a), if so, are the payments still being made; (b), if not, for what reason?

The reply of the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board was as follows:

Payments are not being made to the Canadian Wheat Board under the provisions of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act on a monthly basis because the government has a bill before the House to rescind that act effective August 1, 1970.

A similar question and answer are to be found at page 7609, the questioner in this case being the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton). The written answer, which is the important part of the exchange, is as follows:

Although funds were appropriated in the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1972, expenditures have not been authorized because the government has a bill before the House to rescind the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act effective August 1, 1970.

There were oral questions and answers on this matter on that day, and further questions were put on Thursday, including a question asked by the hon. member for Regina East of the Minister of Finance and to be found at page 7660 of Hansard. Part of the question was:

... has the Minister of Finance ... asked the Minister of Justice for a legal opinion on the validity of the action or lack of action by the Minister of Finance and has a legal opinion been given?

To which the Minister of Finance replied:

Not to me, no, Mr. Speaker.

If I may state my question of privilege—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —as succinctly and narrowly as I can, it is this. My question of privilege relates to the non-payment of moneys which it is specified in the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act are to be paid by the Minister of Finance to the Canadian Wheat Board; and, more particularly, the action of the government in telling this House that the reason it is not carrying out the provisions of the law is that it has a bill on the order paper.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend suggests that this is not a question of privilege. I submit that anything which in a court would be regarded as contempt can be regarded as privilege in this House. I further suggest that when the government admits to Parliament that it is not carrying out the law and tells Parliament the reason it is not carrying out the law is that it has a bill on the order paper to rescind that law, a bill which has not yet been passed, then the rights and privileges of Parliament are being affronted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My case today has, of course, to be made not to those opposite but to Your Honour. I would point out that there are certain things that a question of privilege must not do—and I think I am avoiding those things. In the first place a question of privilege must not be a dispute over facts. We must not ask Your Honour to judge as between the opinions of members regarding certain facts. I think it will be clear as I develop my case that there is no dispute over the facts. My authority for saying that I must not ask Your Honour to judge as to facts is, of course, citation 104(2) of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition.

It is also a clear provision of the procedural citations about privilege that one must not ask Your Honour for a legal opinion. I must not ask you to state whether the government is right or wrong in not carrying out the provisions of the act. But I do suggest that when the government says to Parliament that the reason it is not carrying out the clear provisions of the statute is that it has before Parliament an unpassed bill which would rescind that statute a serious question of privilege is raised. Does the government have the right to give us that excuse for not carrying out the law?

As I shall say when I come to the latter part of my case, it seems to me I should not ask you to rule that the government is in the wrong, but neither should you rule that the government is in the right. I submit there is a big enough question, a big enough issue, in this matter that there is a prima facie case of privilege, that it meets the requirements of the procedural citations about privilege and that Your Honour ought to let the House decide. I do not ask you to make a decision that there is an absolute case of privilege. I ask Your Honour to find that there is a prima facie case of privilege and then to let the House decide.

I said, Mr. Speaker, that I am not asking you to judge with regard to the facts. I submit that the facts are not in dispute. In the first place there is on the statute books chapter 2 of the Statutes of 1956 entitled the "Temporary Wheat Reserves Act". It is only a two-page statute but it is a very important one and some of us who are here today were here when that bill was adopted and made law.

Section 4 of chapter 2 of the Statutes of 1965 says:

The moneys payable to the Board—

To the Wheat Board.

—by the Minister of Finance under this Act shall be paid as follows:

There is nothing permissive; there is no use of the word "may". The moneys shall be paid. Then there are two subparagraphs of section 4. The (a) part need not be read because it describes how payment was to be made in the crop year 1955-56. Paragraph (b) of section 4 is the one that is still in effect. Let me read section 4 from the preamble into paragraph (b) in order that it will be complete. This is what it says:

4. The moneys payable to the Board by the Minister of Finance under this Act shall be paid as follows: . . .

(b) in respect of any subsequent crop year, the total amount payable for the crop year shall be paid in equal monthly payments within such crop year.

There is no dispute over that. It is in the statutes and the government does not deny its existence.

The second point that is not in dispute is the fact that the payments have not been made since the end of July, 1970. This has been brought out at meetings of the Standing Committee of Agriculture, and in his answers last week the minister admitted that payments have not been made since the end of July or since August 1, 1970.

The third point that is not in dispute is that the reason given by the government is very simple and straightforward, namely, that Bill C-244 is the reason for not making these payments. Bill C-244 has not yet been passed by the House. It has in it clause 33 which says:

The Temporary Wheat Reserves Act is repealed, effective July 31, 1970.

The explanatory note opposite clause 33 reads:

The repeal of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act is consequential on the enactment of the stabilization program set out in this Act.

That makes it clear that the government knows that clause 33 does not come into effect until the act as a whole has been passed.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

• (2:20 p.m.)

One other point I cite in the list of facts is that Bill C-244 has not been passed and therefore authority to act on that basis has not been established by Parliament.

In my view the privileges of Parliament have been attacked by this action of the government. As I said earlier, I am one of those who were here in 1956. The record shows I took at least some part in that debate and agreed to the passing of the bill. As a matter of fact, it was supported unanimously. The Right Hon. C. D. Howe, who piloted the bill, gave the House the assurance that the payments would be made monthly as long as that act was in effect.

Some questions were asked. The present member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness) wanted the payments to be made in a lump sum at the beginning of the year. There are five or six pages of debate in the 1956 Hansard on this matter. Mr. Howe did not agree but did make clear that the payments would be made monthly in advance beginning with the first month of the crop year which in every case is the month of August. Because that has not been carried out, I submit we have a point of privilege. Even more directly, however, I suggest it is an affront to the rights of members of the House for the government to give as an excuse the fact that there is a bill on the order paper which has not yet been passed.

You might say, Sir, that this is a legal matter to be dealt with in the courts. There is, of course, a provision in the Criminal Code, section 115, which reads as follows:

Every one who, without lawful excuse, contravenes an Act of the Parliament of Canada by wilfully doing anything that it forbids or by wilfully omitting to do anything that it requires to be done is, unless some penalty or punishment is expressly provided by law, quilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

An hon. Member: There goes John Turner.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No. It is the Minister of Finance we will miss because the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act says that the Minister of Finance shall make these payments on a monthly basis at the beginning of the crop year. An answer to that might be forthcoming in the sections in Beauchesne regarding privilege which point out that we provide certain defences against arrest or against people interfering with Members of Parliament in the discharge of their duties. In other words, there might be trouble if someone tried to lay an information against the Minister of Finance. We might have to defend him and keep him here. That remains to be seen.

The point I am making is that the place for us to deal with a matter like this and what has been done to us is here on the floor of Parliament. What has been done to us is that we have been told that, although we have passed a law and although it is there and is clear, the government feels it does not have to carry it out because of this other provision, an unpassed bill which it has on the order paper. This I find strange today after a statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on Friday in another context when he was Acting Prime Minister. His words were clear and are found at page 7702 of Hansard for Friday September 10. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said:

Everyone in this country knows that the Canadian Parliament makes the laws in this country and that these are the laws to be observed.

Here we have a law which Parliament made. The government admits it is not carrying out the law and gives us the excuse that it is asking Parliament to rescind that law. I am just about through with my presentation, Sir.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I knew that at least that statement would get applause from the other side. I make the point again, Sir—it is to Your Honour I am addressing myself and not the other side; we will take them on when we get into debate on the motion if it takes place—that I am not asking you to make a decision regarding the facts. There is no dispute between us about the facts. I am not asking you to make a decision whether the government is right or wrong, but I ask you not to say that the government is right by saying that there is no wrong.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do ask that the provisions in Beauchesne be observed, namely, that if there is a prima facie case of privilege Your Honour will leave it to the House to decide. If Your Honour does make that decision and if you permit a motion, may I simply read the motion I would make. I know quite well that I cannot make the motion at this time, but I think it should be on the record. If Your Honour finds that I have a prima facie case of privilege, I would make the following motion:

That the matter of the non-payment by the Minister of Finance to the Canadian Wheat Board, since August 1, 1970, of certain moneys payment of which is specified in the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, being chapter 2 of the Statutes of Canada for 1956, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for consideration and report.

I ask Your Honour to note that in that motion, as in my statement, I have avoided alleging anything that is in dispute. I do not try to settle the issue; I simply ask that Parliament be given the chance to refer this matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections so that that committee can consider the matter and make its report on this very important issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I see that the minister seeks the floor. I should like to suggest to hon. members that while I do not want to prevent a minister from replying on behalf of the government, the suggestion which has been made and the practice followed over the years is that only in instances where a minister's conduct is involved do we allow that minister to reply to a question of privilege. I doubt very much if any point would be served or any advantage achieved by allowing the minister to reply at this time. Again, I want to be fair and I do not want him to feel aggrieved in any way by not being allowed to reply at some length or briefly, as he might wish, to the presentation by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

I do feel that on questions of privilege hon. members have to rely pretty well on the judgment of the Chair as to whether there is a prima facie case, and if it were the decision at any time that there was a prima facie case, then hon. members on behalf of the government and other hon. members on behalf of the opposition would have an opportunity to take part in a full-fledged debate on whether the matter should be referred to a committee as suggested by the motion proposed by the hon. member who has raised the question of privilege. So at this point I really have to ask the indulgence of hon. members to allow the Chair to make the decision now.

I might say that I am in a particularly good position in this instance to make a decision now because of the terms of the notice given by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre under the provisions of Standing Order 17, subsection (2). The hon. member was kind enough to indicate at some length what the points were that he proposed for the consideration of the House and of the Chair. This was to my advantage, and I am grateful to the hon. member. I am not sure whether it was to his advantage also. Certainly it gave me an opportunity to look at precedents and to reflect for some hours on this very important issue.

• (2:30 p.m.)

I want to tell hon. members that I am not in any way belittling the importance of the matter which has been brought once again to the attention of the House. I might say that many of the points made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre have been made already in the course of debate and in questions put by the hon. member for Vegreville and the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, both of whom suggested last week that the regular debates of the House be adjourned under the dispositions of Standing Order 26 for the purpose of considering this important matter. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggested that this matter is so large and so big that it should impress the Chair that it should be considered by way of a question of privilege. I cannot agree at all with this argument. I would think some questions would be so immense or at least would be so considerable in terms of national importance and national interest that the Chair would not be justified in suggesting that they be considered by the House by way of a question of privilege.

Again I thank the hon. member for the notice he has given me under the terms of the Standing Order and for the fact he has gone so generously into some detail in explaining . . .

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I am referring to the notice which was given to the Chair and which explained so generously for the guidance of the Chair what the points were that the hon. member proposed to put to the House.

On numerous occasions, as hon. members know, the Chair has cited the definition of parliamentary privilege as "the sum of the fundamental rights of the House and of its individual members as against the prerogatives of the Crown, the authority of the ordinary courts of law and the special rights of the House of Lords". This definition, of course, is taken from May's work. It is a long-standing definition which has never been contradicted, and although we might change the citation because, this being a British citation, it refers to the House of Lords, it applies, generally speaking, to our own proceedings.

This definition is further expounded by Sir Erskine May at page 42 of the seventeenth edition of his work on parliamentary practice:

> The privileges of Parliament are rights which are "absolutely necessary for the due execution of its powers". They are enjoyed by individual members, because the House cannot perform its functions without unimpeded use of the services of its members; and by each House for the protection of its members and the vindication of its own authority and dignity.

At page 43 the learned author states as follows:

> When any of these rights and immunities, both of the members, individually, and of the assembly in its collective capacity, which are known by the general name of privileges, are disregarded or attacked by any individual or authority, the offence is called a breach of privilege, and is punishable under the law of Parliament.

The duty of the Chair in the present circumstances is to determine whether there is a prima facie case of breach of privilege. That is a point that was made very ably by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The Chair is not authorized to say whether there is a question of privilege or a breach of privilege but whether the circumstances are such as to justify a judgment by the Chair that there is at least a prima facie case.

The facts are simple. Again, as the hon. member said, they do not appear to be in dispute. The dispositions of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act are a matter of record well known to hon. members on both sides of the House. The fact that there is before the House legislation which in some way relates to the dispositions of the existing statute is also well known to hon. members.

Whether the government has an obligation under the terms of the existing law to make certain payments is not a question for the Chair to decide. The hon. member, in making his submission, has also pointed out that the Chair is not required to make a determination as to the law. This is a matter of judicial interpretation and is far beyond the jurisdiction and certainly far beyond the competence of the Chair.

In reply to certain questions members of the government have given their interpretation of the facts of the case. Whatever this interpretation may be, I again suggest that this cannot be the basis for a question of privilege.

The crux of the whole matter, as I understand it, is that the government is withholding payments authorized by an existing statute until a new statute has been adopted. Either what the government is doing is or is not contemplated, or anticipated, or authorized by the existing statute. Its action may well be subject to censure, but that would be a decision for the House to take on the basis of a non-confidence or censure motion.

Whether it is in order to use this method to induce the adoption of alternative government legislation can again be the subject of debate, but I suggest that this should not be done within the framework of a debate on a question of privilege.

Some time last week the hon. member for Vegreville and the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar sought the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of debating what was termed then "the failure of the government to carry out the explicit instructions of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act". The reasons which were given by the Chair to suggest that such a debate should not be initiated under Standing Order 26 would apply to the suggestion by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that a debate on this contentious issue should be launched by way of breach of privilege.

While the Chair recognizes the importance and urgency of the situation, and also the anxiety of many hon. members to initiate a debate on the subject, I cannot agree that there has been a prima facie breach of parliamentary privilege, at least on the basis of my understanding of parliamentary privilege.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

GRAIN

WITHHOLDING BY GOVERNMENT OF PAYMENTS UNDER TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES ACT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I would like to move a motion, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

> That the matter of the failure of the government to observe the law with respect to the provisions of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act be referred to the courts for immediate consideration.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Vegreville. I do not have before me a copy of the motion in writing. I assume the hon. member has one before him. But in any event if there is unanimous consent—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: —the hon. member can provide the Chair with a written copy of the motion. Is there unanimous consent for the motion proposed by the hon. member for Vegreville?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has heard, as I have, that there is not unanimity and consequently the motion he has proposed cannot be put at this time.

* * *

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY PLAN

MEASURE TO PROVIDE BENEFITS IN RESPECT OF CHILDREN

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-264, to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

LOCKHEED JETSTAR AIRCRAFT

Question No. 1,378—Mr. McCutcheon:

1. Has the Department of Transport recently purchased a used Lockheed Jetstar aircraft?

2. From whom was it purchased and at what price?

3. What was the cost of the aircraft when new?

4. How many hours of use remained on its engines and its airframe before requiring a mandatory overhaul when the government purchased it?

5. Were any spare parts included in the selling price and, if so, what was their value?

6. Has the government had to spend any money on the aircraft to bring it up to operational standards and, if so, how much?

7. How many hours has it been flown since its purchase by the government?

8. How many Jetstars are now in government service?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Yes.

2. T. Eaton Company Limited, $1,200,000.

3. $2,500,000.

4. 1—Engine, 1,730 hours; 2—Engine, 375 hours; 3—Engine, 620 hours; 4—Engine, 1,657 hours. Airframe, eight months remaining to a normal Annual Inspection.

5. Yes, $280,000 ($130,000 spare parts and $150,000 for overhauled power plant).

6. No. Normal Annual Inspection.

7. 584:00 Air time to June 3, 1971.

8. Three.

COST OF CENSUS FORMS AND PENCILS

Question No. 1,549—Mr. Downey:

1. What was the cost to the government of pencils provided with census forms?

2. Did the above cost include the cost of sharpening each pencil and the cost of the printing on them and, if not, what was the cost for each?

3. Were tenders called for the purchase of these pencils?

4. How many companies tendered and who submitted the accepted tender?

5. Is the company which submitted the accepted tender a Canadian company?

6. What was the highest bid submitted and what was the lowest?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by Statistics Canada (Dominion Bureau of Statistics) and the Department of Supply and Services as follows: 1. The pencils provided with the 1971 Census forms cost the government $151,939.01, (unit cost of $0.0185 each).

2. Yes; this amount includes the cost of sharpening the pencils and the printing on them.

3. Two tenders were invited, one for 6,500,000 and the other for 2,000,000 pencils.

4. (a) 6,500,000 pencils—Tender April 28, 1970, five (5) companies tendered. The contract was awarded to Eagle Northrite, Division of Verol Corporation, Montreal, Que., who submitted the lowest tender. (b) 2,000,000 pencils—Tender September 17, 1970, four (4) companies tendered. The contract was awarded to Empire Pencil Company, Longueuil, Quebec, who submitted the lowest tender.

5. Of the two companies which received contracts for the pencils, Statistics Canada has no information on company ownership for the Empire Pencil Company of Longueuil, Quebec. This information is not available as this Corporation is not required to report, at present, under any Act of Parliament. In so far as Eagle Northrite, Division of Berol Corporation of Canada Ltd is concerned, Statistics Canada informs that, as of December 31, 1969, 100 per cent of its voting stock was held by non-residents of which 99.9 per cent was owned by Berol Corporation (a United States firm).

6. (a) 6,500,000 pencils. Highest—$185,069.30. Lowest—$115,050. (b) 2,500,000 pencils. Highest—$48,880. Lowest—$33,860.

DEFINITION OF "LABOUR FORCE"

Question No. 1,603—Mr. Reid:

1. What is the definition of "Labour Force" used in computing employment and unemployment rates in Canada and how was this definition conceived?

2. To the knowledge of the government, what is the definition of "Labour Force" used in the following countries (a) United States (b) United Kingdom (c) France (d) Germany (e) Japan?

3. In what ways does the definition of "Labour Force" in Canada differ from those of the (a) United States (b) United Kingdom (c) France (d) Germany (e) Japan?

4. Over the past 5 years, what were the actual and seasonally adjusted annual rates of employment and unemployment in Canada using the definition of "Labour Force" in the (a) United States (b) United Kingdom (c) France (d) Germany (e) Japan?

5. Over the past five years, what were the actual employment and unemployment rates in Canada, using the Canadian definition of "Labour Force"?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: 1. The labour force in Canada is composed of that portion of the civilian non-institutional population 14 years of age and over who, during the reference week, were employed or unemployed. The Yukon and Northwest Territories and Indian reservations are excluded. The employed includes all persons who, during the reference week: (a) did any work for pay or profit; (b) did any work which contributed to the running of a farm or business operated by a related number of the household; or (c) had a job, but were not at work, because of bad weather, illness, etc.

Persons who had jobs but did not work during the reference week and who also looked for work are included in the unemployed. The unemployed include all persons who, through the reference week: (a) were without work and seeking work, or would have been looking for work except that they were temporarily ill, were on indefinite or prolonged layoff, or believed no suitable work was available in the community; or (b) were temporarily laid off for the full week, i.e., were waiting to be called back to a job from which they had been laid off for less than 30 days.

The above concepts were developed in the late 1930's mainly in the United States and received international support during the 1940's and subsequently. The first Canadian survey was in 1945.

2 and 3. (a)United States—The definitions are similar to those of Canada except that the lower age for inclusion in the survey is 16; the reference period for looking for work is four weeks and some specific job seeking activities must have been undertaken in that period; and persons with jobs but not at work and looking for work are counted as employed. (b) United Kingdom—The British statistics are based on administrative data from employment offices. Differences from Canada that affect unemployment data include: The British compute the unemployment rate by expressing the number of unemployed as a percentage of the wage and salary labour force (excluding the self-employed); The lower age limit is 15; Persons registered as unemployed for only one day are counted as unemployed; Persons temporarily ill are excluded from the unemployed; There is an under-registration of married women, new entrants to the labour force, teenagers, persons voluntarily changing jobs, retired workers, persons delaying in registering. (c) France—The French statistics are based, like the British, on registrants for jobs and similar comments regarding under-registration apply. (d) West Germany—The German statistics are based on administrative data but are close to the coverage used in Canada. The German data include the military. (e) Japan—The Japanese have a labour force survey similar to that used in Canada. Differences are the exclusion from the unemployed of persons on temporary layoff, persons not seeking work because of illness or because of belief no work was available.

4. Statistics Canada does not have sufficient information to make these calculations.

5. Rates of Unemployment and Employment for Canada

Annual Averages
1966-1970

Year	Unemployment	Employment
1966	3.6	96.4
1967	4.1	95.9
1968	4.8	95.2
1969	4.7	95.3
1970	5.9	94.1

*GRANTS TO ORGANIZATIONS WITH HEADQUARTERS AT ROCHDALE COLLEGE

Question No. 1,606—Mr. Ryan:

Have any organizations whose headquarters are at Rochdale College been given government grants and, if so (a) what organization (b) in what amounts?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is rather lengthy and I would ask the permission of the House that it be tabled and reported in Hansard as though it had been read.

[Mr. Pepin.]

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: The answer above referred to is as follows:]

I am informed by the Citizenship Branch of the Department of the Secretary of State as Follows: Four grants totalling $6,810 have been made to Rochdale College, and projects within the College: June, 1967—$5,000. During its early stage, Rochdale was of interest to the Citizenship Branch as a Canadian experiment in social organization and youth participation and its development was thus assisted. May, 1968—$110.—to assist a spin-off project of Rochdale, the Indian Institute, in its attempt to develop a better understanding of Canadian-Indian culture. For the first Cross-Cultural Workshop, the Citizenship Branch provided $110. December, 1968—$1,500—to Rochdale College, in support of its experiments to develop new, participatory approaches to learning. On this occasion Rochdale experimented with a project to involve the community in the appreciation of dance and art forms. December, 1969—$200—to Rochdale College, for a task-force of the College engaged in the production of a handbook on legal rights. Under the Opportunities for Youth Program of the Department of the Secretary of State, the Rochdale Free Clinic was given a grant of $13,075 to extend the Clinic into a 24 hours a day medical and crisis intervention service.

* * *

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

1971 CENSUS—BEAUCE CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 1,599—Mr. Rodrigue:

1. What are the names and addresses of the census officials and census commissioners hired by the government for the 1971 Census in the constituency of Beauce?

2. What salary does each receive?

Return tabled.

• (2:40 p.m.)

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

EMPLOYMENT SUPPORT BILL—POSSIBLE IMPOSITION BY UNITED STATES OF SPECIAL IMPORT TAXES—ADDITIONAL GOVERNMENT CONTINGENCY PLANS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the statement this morning by the American Undersecretary of the Treasury that the United States is studying Bill C-262 and would feel free to apply special import taxes under the U.S. countervailing duty law, is the government now reviewing its position and can the Prime Minister indicate if additional alternative contingency plans are now being considered?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): On the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, the government is aware, of course, that the United States is free to act as it best sees fit. We have always felt that in this particular case it would not take that decision. There is no indication that it will take the decision to use countervailing duties on this particular bill. It is just a freedom of action reserved to itself by the United States government and we cannot quarrel with that. If the worst does happen and the hypothesis is realized—for the time being it is a hypothetical question, Mr. Speaker, but I did tell the opposition the other day that we have indeed contingency plans if the worst should happen.

Mr. Baldwin: As a statement to this effect was made by a senior American official this morning, does the Prime Minister not feel that it is no longer hypothetical and that this government should give some serious consideration to various alternatives?

Mr. Trudeau: That is exactly the point, Mr. Speaker. I told the Leader of the Opposition last week that we were giving serious consideration to eventual action if this precise method, or the length of operation of the surtax, called for additional measures.

Mr. Baldwin: Is the government aware of the report of the presidential commission headed by Mr. Tresizca delivered today—Mr. Tresizca is Undersecretary of State for Economic Affairs—that special arrangements with Canada with regard to such things as the auto trade pact and other matters should be reviewed and in many cases rescinded and that the whole issue of trade and economic affairs with Canada should be the subject of multilateral rather than bilateral arrangements, and does the government now feel that it should reassess its whole position in this regard?

Mr. Trudeau: The same answer, Mr. Speaker. We are assessing our whole position. We realize the grave consequences which might follow from the United States action if they embarked on a protectionist course permanently, but I repeat that these pronouncements are not government policy. We are reacting to the policy that has been established by the President of the United States and not to hypothetical suppositions by various people in that government.

EMPLOYMENT SUPPORT BILL—FORMAL NOTIFICATION BY UNITED STATES OF POSSIBLE IMPOSITION OF SPECIAL IMPORT TAXES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the Prime Minister's answer may I ask him whether the government of Canada was informed officially of the statement of the Undersecretary of the Treasury in Washington? Has the government had any formal information from Washington as to their approval or disapproval or of any action they intend to take with regard to Bill C-262?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I could not say, Mr. Speaker. As hon. members know, the two ministers mainly responsible are in Toronto meeting with the Japan-Canada ministerial mission. I was not around here on Friday and Saturday because I was touring certain parts of Ontario, so I cannot answer for the ministers. I am sure they will be in a position to give an answer tomorrow.

* * *

LABOUR RELATIONS

IMPLEMENTATION OF UNITED STATES WAGE FREEZE BY UNITED STATES-OWNED CANADIAN CORPORATIONS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question in the same area but on a different aspect. In view of the fact that there is also a report from Washington that the importation of the United States wage freeze into Canada by Douglas aircraft and Chrysler Corporation was made without the support or sanction of the American authorities and in view of the fact that there has been a strike vote at Douglas supported by some 6,000 employees, or an overwhelming majority, would the Prime Minister inform the House whether the government has made representations to those two companies to abandon their present position with regard to the wage freeze and, if not, something will be done without delay?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Possibly I can answer this question because of the labour implications, Mr. Speaker. I go pretty well from press reports, but at first indication I see no federal law that has been contravened by the actions of these two companies. In the case of Douglas Aircraft, where they are now in the process of collective bargaining, if the company is not bargaining in good faith on the basis of its ability to pay there are provisions in the Ontario Labour Code under which the union can claim that the company is not bargaining in good faith. In the case of the auto workers, I do not know whether they are covered by collective bargaining. In any event, I think both the Acting Prime Minister on Friday and the government of the United States made it very clear that they take a very dim view of the policy of these companies.

Mr. Lewis: I know, of course, about the law in Ontario, and the Chrysler employees concerned are not covered by a collective agreement. As the Minister of Labour ought to know if he does not, they are administrative and managerial staff. I am asking whether the minister or some other member of the government will convey to these companies the federal government's disapproval of the importation into Canada of foreign policies and foreign laws?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister did precisely that on Friday in his well publicized statements both in the House and outside the House that we take a dim view of this position if it is based on President Nixon's directive and not on the normal forces at play in free collective bargaining.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton West on a supplementary question.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): It is not supplementary to this series of questions, Mr. Speaker. I want to go back to those asked by the hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the point being made indirectly by the hon. member for Edmonton West. It is sometimes difficult for the Chair to determine, when a supplementary question is asked, whether it is a genuine supplementary. Even when I have doubts about it, sometimes it is easier to allow the question to be asked. Without further comment, I recognize the hon. member for Edmonton West.

* * *

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PROPOSED UNITED STATES DISC PROGRAM—FORMAL PROTEST CONCERNING LEGALITY IN RELATION TO GATT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is directed to the Prime Minister and relates to the legality or alleged illegality of the employment support bill and whether the Canadian government has examined the DISC program to see whether it contravenes the GATT undertakings. If so, what conclusion has the government reached concerning this proposal and what does it intend to do about it? Is there to be any formal protest by the Canadian government regarding the illegality of the DISC program under GATT?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Our position on the surtax was made in the GATT forum but our position cannot be made on a United States program which is not law yet but is just something that is being talked about. This House knows that an item does not become law the day it is introduced by the government.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Does the Prime Minister anticipate that it will be easier to get changes once Congress has taken the necessary action to implement the DISC program or does he feel that the government of Canada should make its views known now with regard to that program? Has the Minister of Finance been instructed to put forward the views of the government in contacts with the appropriate American government officials whom he will meet during the course of the conference in the next two weeks?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is apparent to the country that on the totality of the President's announcement in August representations were made by the ministerial mission which went from Canada to Washington and subsequently in meetings at official levels. We are not making any representations in international forums at the GATT level on something which has not yet become a matter of law or policy of the United States government but we have talked at some great length, as the House knows, although not always with the approval of the members of the opposition, to the people in Washington.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A further supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. the hon. member has had two supplementaries.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Others had three.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Annapolis Valley and the hon. member for Témiscamingue and return to the hon. member for Edmonton West and other hon. members with further supplementaries, including the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

PROPOSED UNITED STATES DISC PROGRAM—CANADIAN PROPOSAL TO GROUP OF TEN RESPECTING CO-ORDINATED REPRESENTATIONS TO IMF MEETING

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): My supplementary is also directed to the Prime Minister. Can we assume from his earlier answer, Mr. Speaker, that, whatever the contingency plan is, Canada has no firm proposal for the meeting of the Group of Ten to combine the other nations of the Group of Ten in a co-ordinated strategy against the DISC proposal so that representations in a co-ordinated, collective way can be made when the International Monetary Fund meets a week later?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Témiscaminque.

Mr. Nowlan: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: As I suggested to hon. members, at this point the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue subject to returning to the hon. member in a moment.

* * *

• (2:50 p.m.)

[Translation]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REFUSAL TO PAY BENEFITS TO EMPLOYEES LAID OFF BY QUÉMONT MINE

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour.

Has he received representations from the municipal authorities of Rouyn concerning miners laid off at the Québec mine in view of the Unemployment Insurance Commission's refusal to pay them benefits on grounds that the mine is paying them a severance allowance for their 20-odd years of service?

Can the minister tell us whether unemployment insurance benefits will be paid to those miners?

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check with the Unemployment Insurance Commission to see precisely whether the $750 that some of these miners have received in the form of severance pay is considered in relation to income. Usually what happens is that the moneys are considered as wages or deferred wages and these people become eligible for unemployment insurance only after the moneys received as severance pay or holiday pay have been apportioned over so many weeks. In any event, I will make representations this afternoon to the Unemployment Insurance Commission on this problem.

* * *

NATIONAL DEFENCE

USE OF SUFFIELD MILITARY RESERVE BY BRITISH ARMY—SUBMISSION OF AGREEMENT TO COMMITTEE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Before doing so, may I take this opportunity to welcome him back after his foray on the weekend into certain ridings in Ontario which was made to promote the interests of those who will be running as Liberal candidates in the next election—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: —and made possible by the use of several military aircraft—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hees: —at considerable cost to the taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member was recognized for the purpose of asking a question. He has attempted to make a speech. That is not the purpose of the question period.

Mr. Hees: I was trying to be polite and welcome back the Prime Minister and cheer him up. He looks a little disconsolate because of the reception he received there. Is it the intention of the government to accede to the request of the National and Provincial Parks Association, in a recent letter to the Prime Minister, that the agreement which was signed recently by the Canadian and British governments for the use of Suffield military reserve in Alberta by the British army by submitted to the appropriate committee of Parliament for study and recommendation? Does the government intend to accede to that request&

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not remember reading such a letter. It may have been addressed to another minister. I will look into the matter and see if an answer has been given.

Mr. Hees: I will send it across to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We will return to the supplementaries that were interrupted a few moments ago.

* * *

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT OF POSSIBLE RETURN TO UNITED STATES OF AMERICAN SUBSIDIARY COMPANIES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is for the Prime Minister. In light of the apprehension of the Minister of Finance disclosed yesterday that thousands upon thousands of Canadian jobs will be lost if American subsidiaries in Canada were called back to the United States by American parent companies, can the Prime Minister tell us whether the government intends to take action now in light of the apprehension of the Minister of Finance, perhaps in the same way it took action in another case of apprehension?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is really the same question in another form. I have repeatedly told the House that the government is studying contingency plans in the eventuality that this particular action of the government was not enough, but I am not in a position to announce what we would do if these events developed as apprehended.

PROPOSED UNITED STATES DISC PROGRAM—CANADIAN PROPOSAL TO GROUP OF TEN RESPECTING CO-ORDINATED REPRESENTIONS TO IMF

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): In order to try to clarify the position of the government and without playing any cat and mouse game, is it fair to assume from the answers of the Prime Minister today that as part of the contingency plans the Minister of Finance has a firm proposal he is trying to develop before the Group of Ten so that these countries can react if the DISC proposal becomes law in the United States, especially in view of the fact that the Group of Ten is meeting just a week before the IMF meeting which will determine the whole state of the currency and imbalance-balance problem of the United States and the world?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Generally speaking, I suppose it is fair to assume that. I can say that the Minister of Finance is going to the meeting of the Group of Ten with specific things he wants to say to all the other members at that meeting. In that sense we are making specific proposals, but we do not guarantee anything as to the way in which they will be received or as to what will be done by the other members of the Group of Ten, of course. For that reason we see no advantage in being more precise about the type of thing the Minister of Finance is going to be saying in Europe.

PROPOSED UNITED STATES DISC PROGRAM—MAINTENANCE OF EXISTING SAFEGUARDS UNDER AUTOMOTIVE AGREEMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Following the unclear answer by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce last week and the announcement over the weekend of the introduction again of the DISC proposal before the American congress, will the Prime Minister now assure the House that in any subsequent or continuing negotiations with the Americans the Canadian government will insist on the maintenance of the existing safeguards in the Canada-United States automotive agreement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I really do not have anything to add to what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who is responsible for the application of this act, said to the House last week.

[Later:]

Mr. Broadbent: Following his answer, will the Prime Minister inform the House if my interpretation is correct? Is the Prime Minister saying to the House—that the government is not willing to commit itself to the maintenance of the safeguards that currently exist in the Canada-U.S. auto agreement?

Mr. Trudeau: As in all negotiations, Mr. Speaker, there are some important issues and some which are less important. I will not say that the Canadian government is not at all times prepared to discuss with the United States the application of the auto pact as the pact provides. As far as it is concerned, the federal government has no intention to draw away from any of the benefits which have been so great under the auto pact initiated by a previous Liberal government.

UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX—REPEGGING OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the statement made by the Undersecretary of the Treasury to the Senate committee this morning in Washington that certain fundamental conditions will have to be met before the import surtax is removed, has it been made known to the Canadian government that the repegging of the Canadian dollar at a rate satisfactory to the IMF or the United States government is one of those fundamental conditions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): This question was asked last week, Mr. Speaker, and answered in the negative by the Minister of Finance.

CANADIAN EXPORT ASSOCIATION REQUEST FOR DOMESTIC EXPORT CORPORATION AND TAX REDUCTIONS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Is the government going to accept the request of the Canadian Export Association of Montreal that the government establish a domestic export corporation of its own and immediately reduce personal, corporate and sales taxes to improve the export price of our products and stimulate domestic demand as well?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have not seen that suggestion, but if the proposal is that we do so even before the United States acts the answer of the government would obviously be no. At the very outset of this whole affair we said that we were not prepared to embark upon a trade war, and certainly we would not want to start one by the establishment of such a proposal. The government cannot regret the setting up of such an institution by other countries and then proceed to do the same itself.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

MEASURE TO ASSIST INDUSTRIES AFFECTED BY CANADIAN DOLLAR APPRECIATION AND UNITED STATES TAX CREDIT MEASURE

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): As suggested by the general manager of the Canadian Electrical Manufacturers Association, is the government considering measures to assist industries that have been damaged by the 8 per cent appreciation of the Canadian dollar and the 10 per cent disadvantage caused by the United States tax credit measure and, if so, when will an announcement be made?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The answer to the first part is no, Mr. Speaker. With regard to the second part, the hon. member knows there is a bill before the House, now in committee, which is the government's answer to that.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are six or seven members seeking supplementaries. If we are going to consider other subjects, I suggest to hon. members that for a few moments we might try to touch on other matters of interest to hon. members and attempt to return to this subject later. For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for St. John's East.

EMPLOYMENT SUPPORT BILL—EQUITABLE DISTRIBUTION OF FUNDS AMONG PROVINCES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): My question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact the House has given approval in principle to Bill C-262, can the Prime Minister assure the House that an equitable method of distribution will be figured out for the money available under Bill C-262? I am thinking now of the statement made over the weekend by Premier Bourassa in which he predicted that the province of Quebec would be receiving approximately one-third of the funds under this bill.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McGrath: Does the Prime Minister or does the Minister of Finance intend to sit down with the heads of governments in Canada, particularly with the Atlantic premiers and the premiers of the western provinces, to discuss an equitable distribution of these funds so they can plan accordingly?

Mr. Trudeau: There has been a great deal of consultation, particularly with those responsible for the industries concerned. As was said earlier this session, I have talked with some of the premiers about the provisions of the bill and I am sure that various ministers have also talked with their opposite numbers. There has been any amount of consultation at the request of the parties involved. I do not know whether the hon. member is suggesting particular meetings in addition to those which have already taken place.

Mr. McGrath: A further supplementary question, if I may. Can the Prime Minister assure the House that other parts of the country in addition to Quebec and Ontario will receive just consideration in connection with this bill?

IMMIGRATION

ILLEGAL ENTRY BY RUSSIAN SAILOR—REASON FOR TRANSFER FROM VANCOUVER TO QUEBEC CITY

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. May I preface it by saying that the young Russian who swam ashore on the British Columbia coast has been transferred from Vancouver to Quebec City detention cells on the excuse, according to a Vancouver immigration officer, that better accommodation is available to him there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Winch: Will the minister assure the concerned citizens of Vancouver that this sailor has not been moved from an area where his case is well known to a city more than 3,000 miles away so he can be quietly deported and not be an embarrassment when Premier Kosygin visits Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): My information also, I am sorry to tell the hon. member, is that the accommodation is better in Quebec City than it is in Vancouver, and this is the reason for the transfer. I should like to assure him that the board of inquiry, should it be reconvened, would almost certainly sit in Vancouver, so there would be no problem in connection with representation. I can also say that at the present time I am fairly confident that a variety of problems associated with this young gentleman's stay in Canada may be settled and it may not be long before he has legal status here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Winch: May I say we greatly appreciate the information as to the question of legal status. In view of the answer the minister gave to the first part of my question, may I ask him when he intends to improve the detention cells in Vancouver?

ILLEGAL ENTRY BY RUSSIAN SAILOR—DETENTION PENDING DISPOSITION OF CASE

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I have a supplementary question to ask concerning the holding of Mr. Kourdakov in jail. Was this the consequence of a decision by the minister? Further, may we expect the sailor to be released pending disposition of the hearing?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): In the first instance the detention of the Russian sailor was simply a routine procedure reflecting the manner of his arrival in the country. At the present time discussions are going on concerning his various applications. He is being maintained in what are now fairly comfortable quarters. I hope this matter can be settled satisfactorily fairly soon.

Mr. Fairweather: Is this Russian sailor able to leave these comfortable quarters, be they in Vancouver or in Quebec City, or is he under detention?

Mr. Lang: I am not sure the question has arisen in terms of any request to go anywhere other than where he is. He is comfortably housed at the moment.

Mr. Woolliams: Is he in custody? Of course he is.

* * *

MUSIC

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO BUGLE AND OTHER BANDS TO VISIT FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): I have a question for the Secretary of State. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the fact that over the weekend the National Bugle Corps championships were held in Ottawa? I am particularly interested because for the second year in a row the Durham Bugle Band won the national drum corps junior standstill title. My reason for asking this question is not only to pay tribute to this band but to point out that when the world's fair was held in Japan there was great difficulty in getting assistance from the Department of the Secretary of State for bugle bands of this type which would have been wonderful ambassadors for Canada with their bright, shining faces—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Howe: I ask the Secretary of State whether he will give consideration—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the Chair will need a bugle band for assistance in maintaining order at times.

Mr. Howe: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, many members will recall that we have a number of excellent school bands who at the time of the world's fair needed assistance to go to Japan. They had been invited to go but there was no assistance available—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That, of course, is hardly a question of privilege.

* * *

GRAIN

WITHHOLDING BY GOVERNMENT OF PAYMENTS UNDER TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES ACT—LEGAL POSITION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): My question is directed to the Minister of Justice, Mr. Speaker. Have he or officials of his department undertaken to determine whether the provisions of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act are being contravened by the government's failure to pay to the Canadian Wheat Board some $61 million for the crop year 1970-71 plus a further $26 million, approximately, for the crop year 1971-72?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): We are apprised of the matter.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): The Minister of Justice may be apprised of the situation but will he now refer the matter to the legal officers of the Department of Justice to determine whether the executive of this country can usurp the law?

Mr. Baldwin: And advise the minister of the penalty for doing so. He may be in that jail in Saskatoon yet.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): A supplementary to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Since the government is following a course of action which assumes that clause 33 of Bill C-244 providing for the repeal of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act is now in effect, is the government considering following the same course of action with respect to clause 32 of that bill by paying out the $100 million provided for transitional payments in that bill?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Until the money has actually been appropriated by Parliament it would be impossible to pay the $100 million. The position with regard to clause 33 and the $60 million is that if this amount had been paid to the Wheat Board it would have been necessary for them to hold it in trust pending the passage of the bill; it would have been strictly a bookkeeping entry.

Mr. Burton: Since the minister is responsible to Parliament for the actions of the board, may I inquire whether he has taken any steps to ask the Minister of Justice for a legal opinion as to the propriety of the government's failure to pay out these funds, in other words, respecting the failure of the Minister of Finance to pay them out? I ask this in view of the fact that the Wheat Board itself submitted a requisition to the government for the funds in question.

Mr. Lang: We have obtained an opinion on the question of the requirement to repay the money should it have been paid and should Bill C-244 subsequently be passed.

Mr. Woolliams: In view of the fact that the Minister of Justice, who is charged with the administration of justice, remains silent on such an important matter, may I ask him whether he intends to permit the executive to usurp the law of Canada or whether he is prepared to recommend to the cabinet that it be carried out?

* * *

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—MAJOR WINTER CONTINGENCY PLAN TO ALLEVIATE PROBLEM—PROJECTED LEVELS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I have a question for the Prime Minister arising from the domestic unemployment problem in Canada. Can the right hon. gentleman indicate whether there is any major contingency plan in the hands of the government to fight the unemployment expected this winter, and whether such plan will be made public?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As in other matters, if there is any policy announcement to be made I will make it in due course.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Lundrigan: Can the Prime Minister indicate whether the government has made any projections of expected unemployment levels in Canada this year? Can he indicate whether the projections are expected to exceed one million Canadians, whether the government has set any goals for expected levels of unemployment and whether they will be made public?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot answer these statistical questions.

Mr. Lundrigan: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Lundrigan: Perhaps the Prime Minister did not understand my question. I asked him whether the government had made any projections and set any goals. That is not a very statistical question. Can the House and the country be made aware of the expected projections and goals?

CORNWALL—GOVERNMENT PLAN TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did the Prime Minister advise the people of Cornwall when he spoke there Saturday night of any plan that the government had to overcome the 20 per cent unemployment that now exists in that city? If so, would he outline what the plan is?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will try to see if a transcript of my remarks can be handed over to the hon. member.

Mr. Hees: I have seen the transcript and there is nothing there. I wondered whether I had missed something.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time. Perhaps the Chair might recognize the hon. member for Edmonton Centre who has been trying to ask a question for a little while.

* * *

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

DESIGNATION OF MINISTER OF STATE TO ORGANIZE ECONOMIC SECRETARIAT

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Is the government considering designating a minister of state to organize an economic secretariat to co-ordinate all government departments affecting the the economy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Paproski: A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member again, but I have been attempting to give other hon. members a chance to ask questions on other subjects. We have had so many supplementaries on this subject that we will soon be running short of time, but since the hon. member has been very patient I will recognize him for the purpose of asking a supplementary.

Mr. Paproski: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Is the Prime Minister satisfied, as was once intimated by the former minister of communications, that the date of the next federal election is a sufficient instrument to co-ordinate this government's economic policies?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

* * *

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the very chummy behaviour of the Progressive Conservative member for Prince Edward-Hastings toward the Prime Minister on his visit to Picton fair last Saturday, does the Prime Minister have any other indication that the hon. member wishes to change his party allegiance to the Liberals?

Some hon. Members: Oh, Oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question is, of course, not in order.

Mr. Hees: A question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I gather that the hon. member is seeking the floor on a question of privilege.

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker. When the Prime Minister arrived in my riding he looked so downcast that I felt somebody had to cheer him up, so I did my very best.

* * *

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNITED STATES ECONOMIC MEASURES—DISCUSSION WITH JAPANESE OF JOINT APPROACH TO EASE IMPACT

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Will the Canadian representatives discuss today with the Japanese the possibility of a joint approach to soften up the impact of the United States import surtax and other U.S. economic steps designed to restrict imports into that country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am rather certain that this matter will come up in the discussion, Mr. Speaker.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EAST PAKISTAN REFUGEES AND FAMINE—CANADIAN INITIATIVE AT UNITED NATIONS FOR ACTION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in reference to the plight of East Pakistan refugees in India and the ominous portents of famine in East Pakistan. Can the Prime Minister advise whether the Canadian delegation to the United Nations General Assembly has been instructed to take any initiative in bringing about major and concerted United Nations action in regard to this very tragic situation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member to the extent that this very tragic circumstance can only be handled if there is a great deal of international co-operation. I cannot at this time talk of any special initiative to be taken by the Canadian delegation but it is something that we will consider.

* * *

FISHERIES

REPORT ON SAFETY OF CONTAMINATED FISH FOR ANIMAL FOOD

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of the Environment. Will the minister report to the House on the results of the research done on mercury contaminated fish in respect of their availability as safe animal food?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): I will, Mr. Speaker.

* * *

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

QUEBEC—REASONS FOR EXTENSION OF FORMER AGREEMENT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON RESULTS ACHIEVED

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the signing last Friday of a federal-provincial agreement between the government of Quebec and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, can the minister inform the House of the reasons for extending the former agreement with the Quebec government, and will he undertake to make a statement on motions in the near future on the results achieved under the first agreement?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe both parts of this question ought normally to be answered by a statement on motions.

[Translation]

Unless the minister wants to answer the question briefly.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the agreement was extended because, for reasons which it would take too long to explain, we were unable to bring the first agreement into operation.

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: In view of reports that the first agreement was of little direct help to the people of the Gaspé, can the minister inform the House what steps he intends to take to ensure that the additional federal funds provided will be spent for the direct benefit of the people of that area?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member only has to read both agreements in order to see the difference between the two.

[English]

RENEGOTIATION OF AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES OTHER THAN QUEBEC

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the fact that existing agreements with other provinces have failed to meet their objective of creating jobs, may I ask the minister whether he intends to renegotiate existing agreements with other provinces with a view to making an agreement similar to the new agreement signed with Quebec?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will recognize that his question was prefaced by a statement of fact or alleged fact. Questions really should not be asked on this basis, but the question having been asked the minister might be allowed to reply to it.

Mr. McGrath: Then may I rephrase my question since the minister does not appear willing to reply to that particular question. Does the minister now intend to renegotiate agreements with other provinces in view of the failure of those agreements to create employment?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I humbly submit to the House that this is not true. The agreements we signed did not serve their purpose.

* * *

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

BREATHALYZER TEST—PROCUREMENT OF SUITABLE CONTAINER TO PROVIDE ACCUSED WITH SAMPLE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Can he tell the House whether there are any new developments with regard to the procurement of a suitable and practical container to enable a person charged under the so-called breathalyzer section of the Criminal Code to have a sample of his breath for his own private analysis?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Again I think this type of question ought normally to be asked in writing but, since there are a few minutes left before the end of the question period, with the consent of the House the minister might be allowed to reply.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are, shall I say, field testing some sample containers.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

POLLUTION

DISCUSSION WITH UNITED STATES OF POLICY AND CLEAN-UP STANDARDS FOR GREAT LAKES—PROPOSED TAPS TANKER ROUTE

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. During the visit of the minister to Washington last week, were discussions held on policy and standards to be set for the cleaning up of pollution in the Great Lakes? If so, would the minister inform the House of the progress made?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, this was discussed among other matters. As the hon. member knows, the standards and objectives for the Great Lakes for 1975 have already been agreed upon. Our main consideration was to extend agreements of that type to other parts of North America.

Mr. Harding: Did the minister discuss with the United States authorities Canada's opposition to the proposed oil tanker route down the west coast of British Columbia and, if so, what was the result of such discussion?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, the main purpose of our discussing environmental problems with the officers of the Council of Environmental Quality and the Environmental Protection Agency was essentially administrative in character. We were talking about long-term policy alternatives and administrative procedures. We did, however, brush on several important matters, including our opposition to tanker movement of oil into Juan de Fuca Strait and the Strait of Georgia on the west coast.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

• (3:20 p.m.)

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Herb Gray (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, and I believe the minister may have had an indication from his colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) that I would be rising on a point of order at this time. Frankly, I do not know how this has come about, but if we follow the steps which have taken place since June 18 we will see where we are with Bill C-259 at this time.

The burden of my argument is that Bill C-259 contravenes an order of the House made on June 30, and in effect also violates Standing Order 69 in that there was purported to be brought forward an imperfect bill. On June 18, 1971, the Minister of Finance laid upon the table, pursuant to Standing Order 60(1), four Notices of Motions in respect of ways and means budget resolutions. I am only concerned with those dealing with the Income Tax Act. If I may read them, they are as follows:

An act to amend the Income Tax Act and other acts that it is expedient to introduce a measure to: (a) amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations to the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act in accordance with Schedule "A" (printed separately), (b) amend the Income Tax Act to provide certain transitional rules related to or consequential upon the amendments described in paragraph (a) in accordance with Schedule "B" attached hereto, and (c) amend the Income Tax Act to provide certain tax changes to become effective in 1971 in accordance with Schedule "C" attached hereto.

I am only concerned with paragraph (a). There is no complaint about paragraph (b), and paragraph (c) has no relationship at all to the argument this afternoon.

It will be observed that under paragraph (a), the amendments to the Income Tax and the changes in the related and consequential statute law are restricted by the limitation "in accordance with Schedule A". It follows that the legislative measure incorporated in these amendments and changes, other than those under paragraphs (b) and (c), must literally follow the contents of Schedule "A". If we look at Schedule "A" this is confirmed, because the proposed amendments and alterations are not put forward in a general way but in an ultimate, literal and legally finished form. There is the document and it is in bill form, complete as to citation of the regnal year and parliamentary session, with marginal and explanatory notes. It could not be a better example of a bill.

During the debate that followed June 18, the House was given an opportunity to debate and then vote upon the amendments and other changes proposed in the Income Tax Act as set out in Schedule "A". On June 30, following upon the budget debate and pursuant to Standing Order 60(10), the order was read for consideration of the ways and means motion referred to earlier. The Minister of Finance moved for concurrence and the question being put, the motion was agreed to by the House on division.

In accordance with the rules, there was neither debate nor amendment of the motion due to the prohibition of debate or amendment under Standing Order 60(10). The House can only adopt or repudiate the motion. The House adopted the motion.

Here I come to a point I have raised with Your Honour before. I have in mind whether Your Honour is able to accept motions in the same form twice in the same session. As we know, under the ancient and consistently enforced parliamentary rule, any reference to a matter already before the House in the same session is forbidden. That decision by the House stands for the remainder of the present session.

Standing Order 60(11) then provides that:

That the adoption of any ways and means motion shall be an order to bring in the bill or bills based on the provisions of any such motion.

A motion was brought in and the bill must be based upon the provisions of the ways and means motion in accordance with Schedule "A". Quite frankly, we must look at Bill C-259 because it is not in accordance with Schedule "A". If Your Honour will look at this monumental bill you will see there is attached to it a fly-leaf containing three pages of noted changes. I have gone through a number of these changes and find that some of them are of a very minor editorial nature, but others are changes in substance.

Regardless of what good intentions there may have been, what has happened here is that we have had an order from this House directing the minister to bring in a bill according to a certain schedule which ultimately became available, but when the bill was printed, or between the presentation and tabling of Schedule "A" and the printing of the bill, the drafters were still at work. Finally, the bill was brought in in an amended form. I do not know whether it is the same bill.

Either the government has the right to bring in amendments through a ways and means motion which has been adopted or it does not. I put it to you, Your Honour, that if the government has this method open to it then so have private members. We do not know whether the government, during the course of committee meetings, or between now and the time the committee has completed its study, will bring in further amendments, but it is my understanding that amendments of substance are going to be introduced.

I suggest there are two questions to be answered. We should require some form of motion to correct the difficulties which have arisen since June 30 in order to regularize Bill C-259, and I think the House would be quite prepared to agree with that. It seems to me that has to be done. If that cannot be done, then I put it to you that the bill would have to be withdrawn. I am not asking for that, but those are the alternatives open to the House in this regard.

• (3:30 p.m.)

The other point—and this one is even more interesting—is that the government adopted the procedure it did in tacking on all those provisions dealing with the form of tax reform or tax changes in the Estate Tax Act or Income Tax Act and, having tacked on all those budgetary provisions and having had those budgetary provisions agreed upon in general by this House and bearing in mind we cannot come back to a decision taken by this House in this session, is it open to anyone, either the government or any private member be he in the opposition or on the government side, to make any amendment which might disturb the ways and means? Further, it might not disturb the totality of ways and means. We must bear in mind Your Honour's decision—and this is where I think Your Honour may have to rethink the position—taken on a previous occasion with regard to the airline ticket tax proposal at which time Your Honour disallowed an amendment I had put forward which would not have disturbed the ways and means but would merely disturb the incidence of the tax. Your Honour based his decision on some citation in May's. With the greatest respect I suggest that May's was in error. This eminent work is misleading in that it is a misreading of the decisions of two different deputy chairmen in the British House at the time of World War I.

Therefore we come to this final point. Even if it is impossible to change the ways and means because the ways and means has been adopted in this House, is it possible to bring forward any amendments to this bill in committee? I pose those three questions. I am afraid we will have to have answers. I would be quite prepared, with regard to the first point, to get to work to devise some form of motion which would regularize, shall we say, the purpose of Bill C-259 in the form in which it is before us as against the form it is in Schedule "A". I am speaking only of the first 11 clauses of Bill C-259; that is, the first 602 pages because clauses 12 to 76, which represent another 100 or so pages, are the transitional rule under Schedule "B". I put the point before Your Honour, and although there is no complaint about that portion, I would hope the government could give us an answer on this particular point. Perhaps Your Honour would like to mull over the points I have made with regard to the remainder, because I put it to you that the government has outsmarted or outfoxed itself in the way it handled the budget and the tax proposals.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on behalf of the House leader, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) in order to address the government's argument to the points just raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) on behalf of the official opposition. First of all, I submit to Your Honour that there can be no question that the pith and substance of a tax bill must not differ from the terms defined by the original notice of ways and means. That of course we concede, and it is found in citation 276, paragraph 5, Beauchesne's Fourth Edition at page 225. With the indulgence of Your Honour I should like to read this to you:

> Debate and amendment on the stages of the Finance Bill or other Bills imposing taxes are governed by the ordinary rules of relevancy and, if any of the provisions of the Bill should be found to go beyond the resolutions of the Committee of Ways and Means or other committee of the whole House, as agreed to by the House on report upon which the Bill is founded, a further resolution must be passed by the Committee of Ways and Means or other committee of the whole House, and agreed to by the House before those provisions are considered in Committee on the Bill, or the Bill must be amended so as to conform to the resolutions to which the House has agreed.

Of course, the Committee of Ways and Means to which the citation of Beauchesne refers has been abolished and the original resolutions have been replaced by concurrence in notices of ways and means as found in Standing Order 60 to which the hon. member referred. In other instances, Your Honour, we have had occasion to address ourselves to the current effect of a notice of ways and means or in other instances of a recommendation from the Governor General in limiting the ultimate scope of a bill introduced either pursuant to the recommendation or to a notice of ways and means. The purpose as I understand it, and as I submit to Your Honour, of the old Committee of Ways and Means and the resolutions passed by that committee, was to provide guidelines to the draftsmen of a tax bill as to the substance of the bill. I suppose historically the purpose of both the recommendation of the Governor General or of the Crown and the resolutions in committee of ways and means was to force the Crown to come first to Parliament for the authority to incur expenditure or to set the terms under which expenditure might be incurred on the one hand, or the tax imposed on the other hand against the people of the country.

Now that responsible government operates through an executive responsible to Parliament and that executive depends for its continuing mandate upon the authority and support of Parliament, it would appear today that gradually we are seeing an elimination of the relevancy of the recommendation on the one hand, or even the concept of the limiting function of ways and means on the other. In any event there is no question that the taxation provisions of a tax bill must be explicitly founded upon a ways and means motion. However, I take issue with the learned member for Edmonton West because there is no ground whatsoever upon which one can claim that the precise verbal formulations or the precise words adopted by the draftsmen of the bill cannot differ from those used in the ways and means motion. My submission to Your Honour is that we are dealing with the pith and substance of those resolutions as compared to the pith, substance and purpose of the bill. Certainly, the substance must be the same, but there is no other limitation on the form.

Bill C-259 was based upon a notice of ways and means tabled by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) on June 18 this year. The active part of that notice of ways and means read to the effect that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and other acts in accordance with Schedules "A", "B" and "C" which were annexed to the notice. The schedules contained a comparatively detailed description of the substance of the bill that was to be introduced upon the concurrence by the House in the notice of ways and means. Between June 18 and June 30, the day ordered for consideration of the notice of ways and means, the drafting of the actual bill was of course completed. The drafters were guided by the terms of the notice of ways and means and produced a bill based on those terms, the provisions of which in my submission to Your Honour are in accordance with the schedules to the notice of ways and means.

In the process of drafting, needless to say, the draftsmen found it necessary to make alterations in the verbal formulations used in the schedules. My learned friend referred to a glossary of changes which accompanied the bill when it was distributed to members of the House. I submit that these changes are primarily technical, but even if some of them were to amount to changes of a more substantial nature I would submit that does not disturb the ways and means but merely the incidence of the tax within the general umbrella of ways and means.

• (3:40 p.m.)

No doubt when the committee of the whole examines Bill C-259, it too will see fit in certain instances to make alterations or amendments in the verbal formulation of the bill, but these alterations will be subject to precisely the same limitations imposed upon and followed by the drafters of the bill when they completed the drafting, namely, that the bill must always remain in accordance with the ways and means motion.

The crux of the argument is: what do the words "in accordance with" mean? I submit that those words do not mean "precisely the same as". No student of language and surely no dictionary can support that claim. Indeed, the Oxford English dictionary gives the definition of the phrase "in accordance with" as "in agreement or in harmony with". As an illustration of this point, Schedule C to the notice of ways and means might well be considered. Unlike Schedule A, which was in a semi-bill form, Schedule C was in the traditional narrative form attached to most budget bills or income tax bills. In Bill C-259, the provisions of Schedule C are worded in the legal language of a bill. These provisions or descriptive words of Schedule C necessarily had to be converted into the more precise legal terminology suitable to a bill and suitable to legal interpretation. These provisions are not worded precisely the same as the ways and means provisions, but they are in agreement or in harmony with, that is, in accordance with the ways and means motion.

Surely, if Bill C-259 is to be held out of order because it is not precisely the same as Schedule A of the ways and means motion, it also would have to be out of order because it is not precisely in the same form as Schedule C of the ways and means resolution. But this formulation in Schedule C is in the traditional form that has received hallowed approval by this House over many years and has unquestionably been held in order. In other words, the transference from the traditional descriptive language of a ways and means resolution, the narrative or descriptive form, to the precise wording of the bill, with all the necessary alterations that the transfer from narrative to legal precision may mean, have always been held in order by the Speaker and by the House. Indeed, I submit to Your Honour that it has been accepted for the entire history of the Canadian Parliament as correct procedure that a tax bill, while being in accordance with the ways and means resolution, need not be precisely the same as the verbal formulation of the ways and means motion.

Let us consider the situation in which the House of Commons or the committee of the whole would find itself if it were to be restricted in the fashion implied by the learned member for Edmonton West. It would mean really that the ways and means resolution, if we were to follow his argument to its ultimate conclusion, would be so binding on the formulation of a bill that amendments put to the committee of the whole could not be allowed if they strayed from the precise terms of that resolution. Of course that cannot be so because it would hamstring the operation of the committee and, through the committee, of the House.

I submit to Your Honour that what we are dealing with here is something that is in general harmony and agreement with the resolutions. I submit to Your Honour that the bill qualifies under that description and, moreover, that we are dealing less with ways and means than with variations in the incidence of tax within the general umbrella of ways and means. For both these reasons I submit to Your Honour, when you take it under deliberation, if that is the way you wish to deal with it, that these arguments confirm the procedural validity of the bill.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) raised three points of order. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) dealt with only one of them. I suppose that that was appropriate because only one of the points of order is really before us at this moment. I think my friend, the hon. member for Edmonton West, would admit that the other two are hypothetical, but at some point they will have to be faced.

I would like to say a few words about the point that is actually before us at this moment, namely, the variations between the ways and means resolution and the bill. In plain talk this boils down to variations between Schedule A to the notice of ways and means resolution and Bill C-259. Let me say quite openly that the suggestion was placed before the House leaders that instead of the government being asked to prepare a ways and means resolution that was in paragraph style and that would take 1,000 or 2,000 pages to draft, it would be just as appropriate to submit as a ways and means resolution Schedule A which, in effect, would be an advance printing of the bill.

We, the House leaders, are reasonable, sensible people and since this suggestion made common sense we agreed to it. Now, we are not going to turn around and say that because we agreed to it we are going to insist that the precise wording of Schedule A must not be altered in any respect in Bill C-259. After all, we have to treat Schedule A as a resolution, as laying down the general lines that Bill C-259 must follow. I am afraid we are imposing a rather monumental task on the Chair and the table. I hope you have some spare time to go through these volumes, and you will need some extra staff to carry them around with you as well. However, I do think that each of the changes will have to be looked at to see whether Bill C-259 does carry out the terms that were prescribed in Schedule A. I will not quarrel for one moment with changes that were corrections of errors or changes that are improvements in language, but I submit that there are at least a few examples where there are important changes in substance. When that happens, it seems to me that if our rules apply at all a way will have to be found to validate such changes.

Let me quote just one example to support my contention that there are changes that are matters of substance. Clause 123 in Schedule A reads as follows:

> The tax payable by a corporation under this Part upon its taxable income or taxable income earned in Canada, as the case may be (in this section referred to as "the amount taxable") for a taxation year is, except where otherwise provided, 50% of the amount taxable.

It is as clear as can be that the corporation tax for a taxation year—and I think that means any taxation year after this clause comes into effect—is 50 per cent of the amount taxable. But when I pick up Bill C-259 and look at clause 123, this is what I find:

• (3:50 p.m.)

> The tax payable by a corporation under this Part upon its taxable income or taxable income earned in Canada, as the case may be, (in this section referred to as the "amount taxable") is, except where otherwise provided,
>
> (a) for the 1972 taxation year, 50%,
>
> (b) for the 1973 taxation year, 49%,
>
> (c) for the 1974 taxation year, 48%,
>
> (d) for the 1975 taxation year, 47%, and
>
> (e) for the 1976 and subsequent taxation years, 46%, of the amount taxable.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is no mere correction of an error; that is no mere refinement of what was intended in clause 123 of Schedule A, but is a change from a proposal that the corporation tax be set at 50 per cent so long as this law is in effect, to a proposal that it be 50 per cent in 1972 and then graded down during the next several years.

If the government has the right to make that kind of change between Schedule A and Bill C-259, I claim the right to make the opposite kind of change, and suggest that the corporation tax should be 50 per cent in 1972, 51 per cent in 1973, 52 per cent in 1974, 53 per cent in 1975, and 55 per cent in 1976.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Carried already.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You are carried away.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I know that if I try that I won't get anywhere. I will be told about the balance of ways and means, and the limitations that apply to private members moving things that cost money or affect the balance of ways and means. But if that rule is going to apply to us, then I suggest that the rule that the Minister of Justice accepts, namely, that the bill must carry out the general principles of the ways and means resolution, must apply to the government. I repeat that I have no interest in quarreling over changes in wording, over improvements in language, over making things more precise, but where there is a change in substance I submit that something has to be done to validate it or we are just going to be in trouble from here on down the line.

We are in a new ball game with this new way of doing things. We are taking this brand new tax bill into committee of the whole. We have accepted this procedure of using Schedule A as the ways and means resolution, and I think we had better get off on the right foot. If the House will take my word for it, Mr. Speaker, there are other cases where there are substantial changes. The House won't be surprised that I picked out this one, without saying who directed it to my attention, to demonstrate the fact that there are changes of substance. Perhaps we have need to pass a new resolution. Maybe each time in committee of the whole we come to one of these clauses in the bill that is different from the clause in Schedule A there will have to be unanimous consent, or maybe we will have to get some blank cheque recommendation from His Excellency the Governor General to cover these things. But it seems to me we will have to face up to this situation.

The Minister of Justice quite rightly points out that the picture is changed now that we do not have a committee of ways and means before the bill is introduced. But it was quite deliberate on the part of the Committee on Procedure and on the part of the House when we kept alive the requirement that there be a ways and means resolution even if, by itself, it is not debateable in the House. Since we have that resolution, I think we have to stick with the rule that the bill must carry out its intention. Pardon me for repeating myself, but I say again that there is no quarrel about changes of wording or refinement of meaning, but where there are changes of substance I suggest that these are matters with which we have to deal.

Because the other two points raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West were hypothetical, may I refer to them just briefly. I think his point about this being a second budget debate in the session, with a second motion having been made and so on, is well taken. We cannot deny the right of the government to bring in two budgets in a session. It has been done a number of times, and the language of Standing Order 60 contemplates the fact there could be more than one budget in a year.

But I think the hon. member for Edmonton West is perfectly correct when he says that, if it is open to the government to re-open the whole question of its fiscal, financial or budgetary policy and to bring before us a motion identical to a motion put before the House previously, the opposition should have the same right to make the same kind of motion it made in that respect earlier in the session. That, of course, is hypothetical. We can deal with it when such an opposition amendment happens to be before the House.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But how about going back to a decision taken? This is the point that arises then.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The whole question about what we do about decisions previously taken is, as I say, related to the fact that twice in this session we have taken the same decision on the government's initiative, namely, "that this House approves the government's fiscal policy". If that kind of decision can be taken twice in the same session, surely other matters related thereto can also be subject to a second try by members of the opposition.

With respect to the third question as to our rights in committee of the whole when we seek to make amendments to the bill, I think that here the hon. member for Edmonton West has a good point. However, I think that the best time to deal with this issue is when such amendments are made. No doubt he will make amendments to the bill in committee of the whole, and I will support his right to make them even though I do not agree with them, just as he will support my right to seek to increase rather than decrease the corporation tax.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I wish to intervene very briefly in the debate. I know that Your Honour is anxious to deal with this rather important point, just as we are anxious to have it dealt with so that we can get on with this rather important legislation. But I would beg leave to take the time of the House for just a few moments to make one or two observations on this question which is really deciding, or attempting to decide whether the points raised by the members opposite are questions for debate or whether, in fact, they go to the correctness of the measure that it is proposed we debate today.

In that regard I would first draw Your Honour's attention to the specific wording of Rule 60(11) on page 63 of Standing Orders which says:

> The adoption of any Ways and Means motion shall be an order to bring in a bill or bills based on the provisions of any such motion.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, if it were the intention of that rule to say something other than a "bill based on the provisions of the motion"—which I submit certainly is not the confining language which hon. members opposite have contended—that rule would be differently worded. It would say something along the lines being put forward by members on the other side of the House, that is to say, that the bill that is be brought in must be exactly as the ways and means motion is worded. That is not seriously urged today.

We then come to Beauchesne's reference, which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) cited, dealing with the case if any of the provisions of the bill should be found to go beyond the resolution. I would submit, Your Honour, that the operative words are "going beyond," and with respect in fact I submit that there are two blatant weaknesses in the argument put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The first is that he has singled out a tax relieving provision, and not a provision that seeks to impose or increase the tax. Since the section that he has referred to tends to graduate the relieving provision downward, it can scarcely be argued that it goes beyond the resolution. It is going in exactly the opposite direction, so certainly does not go beyond the resolution as he has argued.

• (4:00 p.m.)

I would submit, Mr. Speaker, that the most telling argument against the hon. member's suggestion is contained on page 9 of schedule B that was tabled with the ways and means resolution. In the middle of that page there is a paragraph dealing with corporations and their shareholders, and precisely the language now contained in section 123 of which he complained is contained in the schedule. Obviously, in his examination of the legislation his customary care was not taken. While he is usually noted for his precision in these matters, he obviously did not get as far as schedule B or else overlooked that paragraph.

At this point in the argument, I submit that while certain changes have been made between the ways and means resolution and the bill now before us, those changes were advertised completely and accurately when the bill was distributed to all members of this House. Whatever that language is, it fulfils the obligation of the government completely and absolutely, unless it can be shown to you that that language goes beyond the ways and means resolution. I submit that no one who stood up this afternoon for the opposition has shown a single example where the language of this bill goes beyond the wording of the resolution. I submit we should go ahead with the debate, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I should like to indicate immediately to hon. members that the point raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has such vast implications that I should like to reflect on the situation. I suggest that perhaps for the time being the House should be allowed to go on with the consideration of second reading of the bill.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has suggested, it is somewhat of a monumental task that is proposed to the House, that is, to study the schedule which is in itself a monumental document, and compare it with the bill now before the House to determine whether there are substantial changes and whether, in fact, what we have before us now is a document which effectively goes beyond the terms of the resolution which has been adopted by the House.

I might say that I am somewhat puzzled by the fact that the novel procedure being followed in this instance is the result of consultations with representatives of the parties of the House. It seems that hon. members, on behalf of the respective parties, got together and agreed that a new policy would be followed, but it seems that perhaps those hon. and learned gentlemen had not foreseen all the difficulties which might result from the agreement under which they were prepared to proceed. I am wondering whether it should not be their penalty to get back together and find an answer to the problem which they have caused for the Chair. I am saying this, perhaps somewhat wistfully, but with a degree of seriousness. If it is found by the Chair that there are some things irregular about the procedure we are now following, and if my conclusion is that certain aspects of the bill would preclude it from being considered by the House in its present form, I think there must be a responsibility on certain hon. members to get together and find a solution to the problem. This might perhaps be in the form of a motion which might be adopted by the House without the necessity of another six day debate before we proceed with second reading of the bill based on the schedule or the motion.

This being said, I appreciate all the advice that has been given to the Chair; it is very learned advice. Within the next couple of hours, I shall look into the matter and try to look at all aspects of the schedule and of the bill. An example was given by both hon. members of where there might be substantial changes between the two documents which might indicate that there is procedural difficulty about having the bill before us in its present form. When I have done that, I will be glad to come back to the House and give a ruling which may be that I would need to consult with hon. members before reaching a decision. The House knows that this is part of the responsibility of the Chair when faced with a particularly difficult situation, to seek the advice of the learned members. I know that all hon. members are, in essence, learned but some have a bit more experience than I, so I may seek their advice and guidance before a ruling is made and before we decide what course of action may be followed later on. For the moment, I suggest we proceed with consideration of the motion now before the House.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am opening this debate on second reading of this bill on behalf of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). As the House knows, it is necessary for him to take part in an important Canada-Japan ministerial meeting, and then to go on to take part as chairman of an equally important meeting of the Group of Ten.

Mr. Speaker, the past two and a half months have been busy ones for everyone interested in the reform of the Canadian income tax system. On June 18, the Minister of Finance tabled a ways and means motion providing for the most comprehensive reform of the system since it was started in 1917. Following the final vote in the budget debate, first reading was given to this Bill C-259. The motion was more detailed than usual in order to provide members of the House and Senate and the public with as much information as possible during the budget debate itself.

It also meant that the legal and accounting professions could set to work immediately reviewing the proposals. Representatives of these professions traditionally review tax legislation for technical and linguistic deficiencies between the time of a budget and the passage of the bill in the House. The complexity and length of this bill required even closer consultation and co-operation. Earlier this year officials of the Department of Finance were in touch with the Canadian Bar Association and the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. These organizations and the Canadian Tax Foundation formed special committees which later prepared briefs for submission to the government. They also met many times with officials of the Department of Finance during the summer. I should like to thank these organizations, as well as other organizations which have submitted briefs, for their good work. Submissions from other organizations are still arriving. As a result, technical deficiencies requiring amendments are being continuously brought to the Minister of Finance for decision and sent to the law officers of the Crown for preparation of amendments. These will be moved by the government during the clause by clause study following the second reading vote.

During the summer, the Minister of Finance also discussed the implications of federal tax reform for the provinces with his provincial counterparts. This was followed up by meetings between federal and provincial officials. A main goal of tax reform has been to achieve a federal system which the provinces would find acceptable. The legislation reflects many of the important representations made by the provinces following the publication of the white paper on tax reform.

At their meeting in July, the Minister of Finance reminded the provincial treasurers and finance ministers that those provinces which harmonize their income tax systems with the federal system will receive the same amount of revenue between 1972 and 1974 as they would under the existing system. Income taxes are being reduced for most taxpayers and the federal government is prepared to bear the cost; it is not our intention to force the provinces to share the cost of these reductions. But while it is felt that the provinces should not suffer financially from the federal tax cuts, it is also felt neither should they gain. Therefore, the provinces were informed that the federal undertaking to guarantee provincial income tax revenues if their systems are harmonized with the federal system is conditional upon the provinces establishing rates on January 1, 1972 which, when applied to the new tax base, will result in provincial income tax revenues no higher than during the current year. After that date, the provinces will be free, subject to the provisions of the tax collection agreements, to adjust their rate as they wish.

• (4:10 p.m.)

In seeking approval in principle for this bill, I should like to review what we feel the goals of a good tax system should be.

• (4:10 p.m.)

[Translation]

A good tax system must be responsive to the economic and social needs of the country. It must also distribute the tax burden fairly, and it must convince most taxpayers that fairness has been achieved. This means that persons in similar circumstances should share similar tax loads, and those with the lowest incomes pay a smaller share of their incomes in taxes. There must be as few loopholes as possible, and in a complex commercial and industrial society this requires fairly complex tax laws.

A good tax system must be capable of efficient, economical and objective administration. And, as I mentioned earlier, in a country such as Canada the federal tax system must be capable of being harmonized with provincial tax systems to avoid a tax jungle.

[English]

As the House knows, some of the measures in the June budget are already in effect. A further stimulus to the economy was provided by the abolition as of July 1 of the 3 per cent surcharge on personal and corporate incomes. The abolition of the personal surtax alone will add about $90 million to the buying power available to Canadian families and individuals during the second half of the year.

The lowest rates of federal tax were changed to eliminate taxes after July 1 on persons with taxable income of less than $500. This change was accomplished in the main by relieving taxpayers with $500 or less taxable income from liability for the whole year under Part I of the Income Tax Act. The guaranteed income supplement for persons 65 and over was exempted from tax, retroactive to January 1 of this year. These latter two changes meant an end of income taxes after July 1 of this year for more than three quarters of a million persons.

The bill, providing it is approved by Parliament, will bring further tax relief to millions of individual Canadians on January 1 and in subsequent years. Personal exemptions are raised to $1,500 from $1,000 for single taxpayers and to $2,850 from $2,000 for married taxpayers. This is the most fundamental form of tax relief provided in the tax reform proposals. There are several measures to help hundreds of thousands of elderly Canadians. The existing $500 extra exemption for persons 70 years and over is increased to $650 and extended to all persons 65 and over. This and the removal of the guaranteed income supplement from taxable income means that all single taxpayers 65 years and over will be exempt on $2,250 of income.

For the six out of seven Canadian taxpayers who are wage earners there is a new employment expense allowance permitting deductions of up to $150 a year; a deduction of up to $500 per child and up to $2,000 per family for child care expenses and new broad deductions for the expense of moving to a new job. Also, unemployment insurance premiums will be deductible, although the benefits will be made taxable.

There are other changes in personal income taxation. Payments made to a school for the care and training of mentally handicapped persons or disabled persons will now be deductible. While medical expenses paid by a medicare plan will no longer be tax deductible, premiums will be deductible if paid to a non-government medical or hospital plan. The limit on charitable donations is increased to 20 per cent from 10 per cent of a taxpayer's income. Donations to registered national athletic associations are to be deductible.

Two new forms of income averaging are provided and these will be available to large numbers of Canadians. An important measure to encourage savings and to permit

Canadians to better provide for their retirement raises the deduction limit for contributions to pension plans, deferred profit-sharing plans and registered retirement savings plans.

Passage of this bill by Parliament will mean that 1 million taxpayers who would have paid taxes next year will be removed from the tax rolls. We estimate also that taxes will be reduced for 4,700,000 taxpayers, and will be changed by less than 1 per cent for another 2 million taxpayers.

There are changes in the definition of income, the most important of which results in a capital gains tax. Half of a capital gain will be taxable at the taxpayer's personal rate, while half of capital losses will be deductible. Accrued capital gains will be taxed at death, and as a companion measure federal gift and estate taxes are to be abolished. A taxpayer's home and an acre of land will be exempt from the capital gains tax and personal property is exempt unless the selling price is more than $1,000. For corporations and their shareholders, the general tax rate for corporations is 50 per cent in 1972. The continuing tax cuts will drop this rate 1 per cent a year, reaching 46 per cent in 1976.

To help the growth of smaller Canadian controlled private corporations, the tax rate is 25 per cent on the first $50,000 of business income. A reformed dividend tax credit, 33.33 per cent to be included in income, makes the credit of greater value to lower income shareholders.

For mining and petroleum industries, substantial incentives are continued, but they will be more efficient and less costly to other taxpayers. Automatic percentage depletion will continue until 1976 when it will be replaced by a system of earned depletion. The three-year tax exemption for new mines will be withdrawn and be replaced by a system of fast write-offs. The federal tax on mining profits will be reduced to 25 per cent from 40 per cent in 1977 to take account of provincial mining taxes. Important changes affecting business and property income include a provision to make deductible interest paid by Canadian corporations on money borrowed to buy shares in other corporations.

The rules applying to business and entertainment expenses are to be tightened. Taxpayers in professions such as law and medicine will bring amounts into income as fees are billed.

I think it is again important to note that several features of the proposals will help encourage Canadians to acquire equity in Canadian enterprise. As I already said, Canadian corporations will be permitted to deduct as an expense, interest on funds borrowed to finance the purchase of shares in other corporations. This measure will take away a disadvantage which Canadian corporations have had in competing with foreign corporations in take-over bids. There will be a 10 per cent limitation on foreign assets of pension funds and retirement savings plans and this will have an important influence in channelling the funds of these large intermediaries to Canadian investment. The lower tax rate for small business will be available only to Canadian-owned companies and tax savings afforded by this incentive will be recoverable should the ownership of companies which have benefited from them pass to non-residents. Also, the form of the dividend tax credit makes the incentive to invest in shares of Canadian corporations more attractive for most Canadians.

• (4:20 p.m.)

In the international field, our tax treaties will be expanded to seek competitive tax treatment for Canadians investing abroad. The withholding tax on investment income paid to non-residents will remain at 15 per cent until the end of 1975. At that time it will be increased to 25 per cent in non-treaty countries. Pensions will be subject to withholding tax after January 1, 1972, but all old age security pensions and $1,290 of Canada and Quebec pension plan benefits will be exempt.

Finally, there are changes in administrative procedures to recognize more fully in law the rights of taxpayers.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it has taken more than 10 years to bring about this reform. The process began in the late fifties with the clamour from the business community for reform. The response by the former Conservative government was the Carter Commission which was established in 1962. Each stage of the process—the royal commission hearings, the commission report, the ensuing debate; then the production of the white paper and the debate on that—contribute to the shaping of public opinion and, indeed, to our knowledge of what a good tax system is all about.

[English]

The period since the budget was presented I submit has shown that a good consensus about tax reform has developed in Canada. I also submit that this consensus is reflected in the bill and I therefore urge on this House its passage into law.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I would suggest to the minister, who appeared to sigh with deep relief as he ended his peroration by saying that a good consensus among Canadians is expressed in the bill now before us, that the Canadian economic body consisting of the entire citizenry has, indeed, heaved a great sigh of relief. But there is a difference. It is the relieved sigh of a man who, suspecting he is suffering a deep-seated ailment, receives a diagnosis which says: yes, we regret to say you do have cancer in the lung, but you have it in one lung only.

We are looking at the Canadian economy in the light of the tax picture as it now appears, and of the changes which will be brought about by Bill C-259. Since the present government took over, the Canadian economy has experienced many rebuffs. It has been constantly plagued by inflation, and a good deal of that inflation was built into the system by the sins of omission and commission of the previous administration. A considerable number of those who sit on the treasury benches today were members of that administration and they cannot shuck off their responsibility. They were responsible for the Pearson decisions which drove inflationary factors deep into the economy. We have not yet got rid of the effects of those decisions, notwithstanding the fact that the present administration has over-reacted in the last 15 to 18 months by taking action which has resulted not in containing inflation but merely in increasing unemployment.

I will say that in 1968 the Canadian economy encountered another major setback through the adoption by this chamber of a new estate tax act, a measure as punitive and as depressing as could ever be devised. The net result is that after three years the government has finally realized it must get rid of that legislation. Thus, we have before us a proposal that the Estate Tax Act and gift tax provisions shall expire as of December 31, 1971. Well, to this extent I suppose one can give a mild hurrah. But it will be only a mild cheer because, as in the old shell game, there has been a great deal more change in appearance than there has been in substance. I say this because there has been a real sand trap or, shall I say, quicksand left in three of the major provinces. It is all very well for the minister to say we intend to get rid of the estate tax because, frankly, we only retained 25 per cent of it except in the case of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario which collect their own. That is precisely the point. The government is giving away nothing, yet it is imposing upon the people of Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia a capital gains tax in return for which there is no compensation whatsoever. This is part of the shell game which has been going on under these provisions. It really does not matter, I suppose, to a bona fide resident of Alberta who was paying 25 per cent estate tax, because in due course there was a 75 per cent refund—that portion which the federal government re-allotted to the province in about the third year after the death of the estate owner. This amount was passed back to the estate upon application. All right. So there is no estate tax and no refund. The Albertan says this is good. But he suddenly finds himself facing a capital gains tax, an additional tax.

With regard to the situation of the man in Ontario and in the Province of Quebec, may I say that admittedly there was a dovetailing of the two acts, the federal and the provincial. The estate tax gave credit for succession duty paid and, subject to some minor differences, it was in effect the same. Now, the federal government says: We are going to be good boys, and we intend to cancel the estate tax. But residents of Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia must still pay succession duty and in addition, as taxpayers, they are to be faced with a capital gains tax. What have they gained in consequence of this shell game? The net result is that a new capital gains tax has been added to their burdens. Let us consider this for precisely what it is. It is an additional tax, and the fact that estate tax has been removed means precisely nothing in the case of three provinces because succession duty will continue to be exacted.

It was a fateful day, that day in November, 1970, when the government white paper on taxation was unveiled for examination. They called it tax reform but no, it was not tax reform at all. It involved tax changes in connection with income tax. There was a great propaganda effort made, and I remember the debate was scheduled to begin on the Friday preceding the Grey Cup game. What the minister had to say as well as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and others who had criticisms, by then apparent, of the white paper was completely lost in the discharge of euphoria over the Grey Cup weekend.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

• (4:30 p.m.)

Then, we started the debate in December in this House, which lasted until December 19—in fact, I think it went on even longer than that—to refer the contents of the white paper to the finance committee. The Leader of the Opposition then went from one end of the country to the other on a blitz campaign to get people interested in what would happen to them if the government's proposals in the white paper were adopted. Though these were government proposals, they were known by the minister's own name. However, he has been a poor martyr. The proposals should have been known under the government's title.

In the result, of course, there was a big public uprising against the proposals. As a member of the finance committee, I can assure hon. members that there was wave upon wave of protest sent to the committee. I am not talking of the inarticulate protest which may sometimes arise from the natural reaction one has against paying taxes. No one likes to pay taxes. I am referring to intelligent, cogent criticisms. We were able to examine government officials and those who supported certain aspects of the proposals, such as integration and a number of the other, shall I say, rather sophisticated but unreal proposals that are made in the white paper.

I am sorry that on this occasion we are not going to have the opportunity of at least a limited examination of these protests. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) has told us that representations have been received by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) in regard to Bill C-259. Outside of the brief of the Canadian Bar Association, which has been discussed publicly, very little by way of criticism has reached the members of this House. We have had a fragmentary presentation of objections from certain categories of co-operative societies, but we have not seen what the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants has prepared, which I gather is a very telling document.

As I said on my previous argument on the point of order, this debate is bound to generate amendments of substance; otherwise the government is going to find this bill amending the Income Tax Act unworkable. This is why I intend to read extensive portions from the brief of the Canadian Bar Association which indicate just what is wrong in the approach taken to this bill.

As I have said, the Canadian economy has suffered a number of rebuffs, and it will continue to suffer rebuffs because of the uncertainty surrounding the tax changes. Mercifully, we may be getting to the end of this period of uncertainty, but why did this uncertainty arise? It was not because the members of the opposition or the Canadian public took a long time to convince the government that it was in error. It is now 22 months since the publication of the white paper, which frankly was like the government putting a fox among the chickens. Although schedule A to the June budget papers had the effect of calming people down, frankly some people had already made the decision not to invest and had taken their money out of the country. I am sure the Minister of National Revenue would be very interested to learn how many people have decided to take their money out of the country during the past year in light of the white paper proposals.

In addition to that, our reputation in the overseas investment market has gone as a result of these foolish steps that were taken. The uncertainty created has also had a great effect upon the Canadian economy. As a matter of fact, the effect of these proposals may be just as bad as the effect that some of the fiscal and monetary restraints proposed by the government have had on creating unemployment.

The government has now seen the error of its ways and has brought back many changes. As a matter of fact, when we look at the schedule containing the comparative tables showing the present law, the white paper proposals, the recommendations made by the House of Commons committee and the proposals contained in the present bill, we find a welcome number of changes which parallel the recommendations of the committee. I suppose that as a member of the committee I should feel gratified, but this seems to me an awful way to run the shop. The economy of this country has been through some 18 months of convulsions, and now the government has come back along the same general path in its return to a little sanity.

Yet that is the exercise we all went through. There has been unemployment and restrictive government policies, both monetary and fiscal. There has been premature acceleration of Kennedy round cuts. I should like to know whether the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) or the Minister of National Revenue is able to tell this House whether these premature cuts did the employment situation in the chemical industry any good. This industry has been driven to its knees as a result of the action of the government. It would have faced a good deal of difficulty with the unpegging of the Canadian dollar, which would have meant an immediate increase in its prices of 7 to 8 per cent. In view of the narrow margins on which so many of our export industries work, it is not difficult to realize the effect on this industry of the action taken by the government.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Since August 15 we have had proposals by President Nixon for the restoration of the United States economy which are very unsettling to Canadian industry and the whole economy of Canada. There is the 10 per cent surcharge, the DISC program and the further upward pressure on the Canadian dollar. We may see an attempt to force the Canadian dollar up to the $1.03 or $1.04 level. Again, this will put people out of business in the export market.

Then, we come along with these tax changes. Are they going to do anything to help the Canadian economy? We realize that many of the changes will be beneficial and welcome, including the increase in personal allowances. The government has not answered in any satisfactory way why it would not have been more beneficial to low income groups, including low wage earners and pensioners either on low personal pensions or on public superannuation allowances, to have instituted the system of tax credits.

A bill was introduced today in respect of income security plans. The same could have been achieved through tax credits with better results and effectiveness and with less injustice than is now apparent under this system. I understand the standard allowance will be $2,850 for a married couple. This exemption of $850 in personal exemptions to a married couple will be of greater benefit in respect of a taxable income of $10,000 than a taxable income of $5,000.

In any event, with these changes we are caught with a question of timing and of complexity. There is no doubt in my mind that this House would be far better occupied in dealing with the major economic problems which now exist. I have in mind unemployment, trade and the terribly complicated relationships with the United States. Instead of that, we are going to be in the committee of the whole dealing with a bill some 600-odd pages long. This is a terribly complex bill, but the whole machinery is related to Bill C-259.

The only way we can deal with Bill C-262, once it comes out of committee, is by suspending our consideration of the tax changes and dealing with the report stage and third reading. All I can say is that in preparing its original white paper the government can only be compared to an engineer, an architect or contractor who, in putting up a building, completely misjudged the necessity of appropriate excavations or footings and foundations. He starts to construct his building and finds that the excavations for his footings and foundations are far too deep and too wide. He has to pull down what he has put up and begin filling and compacting in order to re-establish his foundation. That is all the government has been doing in the past several months in respect of these tax changes. It has been filling and compacting in order to arrive at a much better footing for these tax changes.

Let us consider some of the major provisions. There is no way I could go into all the aspects of this proposal. The House will take some satisfaction from the proposed increases in personal exemptions. They are acceptable as far as they go. Of course, there will be a difference of opinion as to the level at which the increases in exemptions are established. Some might suggest $1,500, others $1,800 and even others $2,000, but the government has proposed $1,500 and that is its responsibility.

There are two areas where I believe some changes in respect of exemptions might have been made had the government been in favour of dispensing entirely with a tax credit system, and one relates to allowances in respect of post-secondary education. Percentages in respect of post-secondary levels in Canada are insufficient and we have been advocating for years that every effort must be made to get children through some form of post-secondary education. We have many community colleges and technical schools where people are improving their qualifications to hold down better jobs, but not one blessed penny of the tuition a taxpayer pays can be recovered through an allowance on his ordinary income. The cost of sending a daughter, a son or even a wife to university in order to obtain a higher level of education is treated in the same way as the cost of taking a trip, in that neither are allowed as an exemption. Certainly, if a student has summer earnings or a personal income he can deduct his education fee on an approved scale, but this is only a minor thing. It seems to me we could have done better with fewer complications by adopting this idea of allowing as a deduction from gross income the cost of tuition for post-secondary education. Many people think that post-secondary education is a prerogative of the more effluent in this country. That is not true and quite contrary to the facts.

In my riding there are many landed immigrants who have come within the last three years. In many cases, the husband and the wife have gone out to work. Many of them speak very little English. They have obtained their citizenship because the president of the citizenship court has admired their guts and determination. Their children are going to university, or in some way are obtaining superior education. Why could we not have rewarded those people and given them encouragement for sending their sons and daughters to university in order to improve themselves. I find it incomprehensible that we somehow feel that an attempt to achieve success must be penalized. Then, we have the case of the Chinese market gardener whose son becomes a doctor in zoology. The father worked with his hands through long hours for years and yet we do not give a damn about him. This is the sort of thing that tax reform should mean for the betterment of Canada. Everyone of those people contribute a great deal more. Not only that, but then we turn around in these proposals and say we are going to tax anyone who wins a scholarship or bursary which will help him in his higher education. We are going to bring in that provision.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Some people will say I am an elitist. Of course I am. I will forever reinforce success and encourage competence and excellence. As Canadians, we should do that. This does not work to the disadvantage of those who do not have those qualities. You are not doing them any good by pulling down the others. You know, we will not build a nation or an economy by merely insisting on a fair share of mediocrity for all. So, it seems to me that in that area the government could have done a lot better. There are complexities. This is referred to in the 76-page brief of the Canadian Bar Association. I should like the government to release the briefs it received from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants and many others. If the Canadian Labour Congress has put forward a studied brief on this, that is fine; I should like to be able to see it and any others which are of a competent nature and which try to improve this law. That is why as I say it would have been better to have sent this bill to the Finance Committee where these people could be heard, and their views examined. Then, it could have been brought back here in due course. But, no. Let me read what the Canadian Bar Association had to say:

> Accordingly, we have tried to avoid in this brief, the expression of views on questions of broad social policy. We have attempted to focus on questions of policy only when the proposed legislation appeared either to depart from what we understand to be the expressed intention of the government or where our particular expertise and experience with legal concepts indicates that the proposed changes may have unforeseen consequences.
>
> At the outset, we must stress that we regard this brief as inadequate. Many of the concepts in the proposed legislation are novel in the sense that the implementation of even previously announced goals has been accomplished by the introduction of concepts which never existed in Canadian tax legislation before, if indeed they have ever previously existed. We are impressed by the attempted integration of these concepts throughout the statutory framework. This has been largely accomplished, however, at the cost of instituting a completely new taxation vocabulary, the mastering of which may be likened to the difficulty of learning a new language. Over and above the vocabulary problem, we also have problems with the extremely complex and detailed provisions, utilizing that vocabulary, which have been considered necessary to implement the desired goals, including permitting necessary exceptions where hardships or overlapping would otherwise occur. The transitional provisions were not available until the beginning of July, the outline of the resource industry regulations and the international income regulations were even later.

I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that if the Canadian Bar Association was handicapped in its examination of these proposals, then the Members of Parliament have been handicapped even more so. I say through you, Mr. Speaker, to the government that it is indeed unfortunate we are to now have this whole complicated package tossed before us, because frankly those who will have to swallow or digest this very indigestible material will not be in a position to deal with it one way or the other. Surely to goodness these tax changes are highly important to the Canadian economy. We can destroy it. The parliamentary secretary just before his peroration—I apologize to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray). Mind you, I knew him very well as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue and as Chairman of the Finance Committee. This was old habit. We will go back to the Bank Act sometime to see how we get along. The minister spoke about equity, justice and parity. Of course, a tax system must produce some revenue. I suppose it should incidentally, according to the government I think, maintain and promote economic growth.

Well, we are now being asked to put something on the back of the Canadian public when, frankly, no one, least of all the government, knows what it will do. The Canadian Bar Association complains about the shortness of time and I do, too. The Canadian Bar Association goes on to say:

> We do feel confident that for every problem or mistake, we have found in the statute, there are ten we have missed. In addition, we are sure that some of the possible problems or mistakes hereinafter referred to will, upon further study of the reform legislation, prove not to exist.

I gather that already officials of the Department of Justice have started to take apart this brief and, in places, have found the Canadian Bar Association or the authors of this brief were in error. Such is always the case, particularly when the job has to be rushed. The brief continues:

> We do not feel one can commend legislation of such complexity without a fuller assessment of the benefits it will bring than we have had an opportunity to make in the time available to us. In the same vein, we do commend for your consideration the rewording of definitions which are a complete misnomer.

I shall not go through all that they say about the necessity of rewording all definitions, but they conclude with this:

> Furthermore all defined terms should be put in capital letters to alert the reader to the fact that, in this legislation, words are often defined in strange ways.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Anyone who has had experience with taxation statutes would wonder if there is not some different version of the English language, one reserved specifically for tax statutes.

> Many provisions of the bill are virtually unintelligible at first reading because their purpose is often obscured by the method of presentation. This problem should not be dismissed as being unimportant as the legislation should be understood by——an intelligent reader and not only by specialists.

And I trust all hon. members of this House qualify under this definition.

Reference is made by the authors to the internal revenue code of the U.S. being written in a much more readable form. They finish their recommendation by saying:

We commend for your consideration, the setting forth of a general rule at the start of every subdivision where possible. In many instances it is now difficult to tell whether a section in the bill contains a general rule or is dealing with an extraordinary circumstance, special exception or loophole. We have indicated in this submission, several places where reciprocity of treatment is not afforded to both sides of a transaction—

And this, I trust, will be corrected, Mr. Speaker.

—as where a selling price is deemed to be some amount but the purchase price is not deemed so to be. We are sure we have overlooked many places where this will be a problem in the legislation and we suggested a general section might be included to the effect that such reciprocity will always exist unless explicitly excluded in the statute.

In other words, if you sell a car for $5,000, somehow or other that is not the purchase price for the buyer under the circumstances explained in the act. The intelligent reader would say: "Now, come on, let us have a little sense and let us get a little sense". Now, Mr. Speaker, this will create some problems later on. I referred to this in my remarks in the point of order I raised. I do not think it is any secret that the Department of Finance has an armload of amendments ready for this House on this bill. I know that some of them are to be of substance, and I am wondering. I think there is a way out but I wonder whether the government is prepared to take it. However, this cannot be brought about by shuffling amendments.

May I conclude the introduction of the presentation of the Canadian Bar Association:

In view of the complexity of the draft legislation, we are certain that in the course of the next two or three years, many situations will come to light where the technical application of the legislation will be most unfair to taxpayers. We are equally certain that many "loopholes" will become obvious.

But here is that query: why are the dice always loaded in favour of the government?

We assume that it is for the latter reason that the tax collector has retained a broad discretion in cases where the equities clearly dictate a tax should be imposed, even if such a tax is inconsistent with the technical words of the Act. Surely, in fairness, this should be broadened so that the taxpayer has a similar right if he can convince the courts that to levy a tax would be a manifest inequity.

I have not been able to find that particular section, one of those broad discretionary powers given to the Minister of National Revenue that always loads the dice in favour of the tax collector. The hearings of the Finance Committee on the tax proposals, the hearings of the committee of the other place, the representations in the press and the letters to the press all demonstrated one thing, if nothing else, that the Canadian public are in fact the people more affected than the government. Gracious me, you would think sometimes that the government and the people were enemies, but certainly those who line themselves behind the bureaucratic walls consider the public to be the enemy, to be the body that has to be plucked. This white paper of the government was supposedly founded on the main principle of equity; in other words, a sort of neutrality between taxpayers. This was the darling of the academics, so many of the obscure economists who have been writing about this in some dusty journals.

I majored in economics, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps one would never know this, but those were my better subjects in my undergraduate years, and I won a scholarship on the basis of that. But many of those things drove me away from that fate which I thought was worse than death. Many economists have become enlightened, but we have talked about this equity as between taxpayers which was supposed to be the first principle of the white paper. The Canadian public, to a man almost, said that equity is as between me, the taxpayer, and the government. That is where equity shall lie. That is where I say it should lie. As between government and taxpayer there shall be equity, and as between taxpayer and government there shall be equity. There is no equity between those to whom I referred last. Gone are the days of these prerogatives. Many of them are carryovers from the rights of the lords to all sorts of privileges over the persons and property of the subjects they governed. These rights have been translated into government. But I would suggest to you that people are saying no, and after all I do not think that the people of this country exist for this government to govern but that this government exists to govern over the people.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Now, let us turn to other matters. There is the matter of the capital gains tax. It is a very complex matter. We have used the phrase "a can of worms". I have used it many times. It has become a trite phrase. In fact, I think it is a barrel of worms. Some good may come out of it, but it certainly has differing effects in various parts of Canada. I want to point out quite clearly that a case can be made for a capital gains tax with regard to gains in the stock market, provided adequate provisions are made for allowances for losses. Personally, I have always felt that that has been one of the unfortunate features of the financial history of this country. By reason of the absence of a reasonable capital gains tax, with compensating allowances for losses, we found that the average Canadian simply could not afford to lose, and so he allowed the other guy to come in who, under another country's law, had a way of compensating for his losses. As a result, the Canadian invested in savings accounts and government bonds, but not in equities.

Then, we had the principal occupation rules that were insisted upon, contrary to reality. Our foreign friends really were invited to come in to take over many of our natural resources because of a stupid stubbornness to insist upon the purity of the main principal occupation rule.

An hon. Member: You tell them, Marcel.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A lot of nonsense has been written in the newspapers about capital gains. So far as hon. members opposite are concerned, I can certainly tell them that during the years when I was on that side of the chamber, and connected with National Revenue, there was a degree of inflexibility in the thinking about these matters. Like hon. members opposite now who find themselves in the same position, we were struggling against some kind of official position as inflexible as dry wood.

When you put too much pressure on it, it does not bend; it cracks.

Another reason for this inflexible attitude was that the oil patch was too far away from central Canada. Because oil development was happening a long way off, those people here who were making the decisions did not understand what was involved. The Department of Finance officials did not understand the difference between conventional oil production and the production of oil from tar sands. In their original conception, both forms were lumped together in the most amazing way. Maybe now, after some exposure, we will get a better understanding of the matter.

A lot of people claim that foreigners are making capital gains, that somehow or other this is totally wrong, and that they should not escape free. Should a Canadian firm be taxed because it develops an industry in a foreign land?

Some hon. Members: Sure.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): These people here, Mr. Speaker, are the original goose killers, without understanding whether the eggs are made or laid.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Even the geese are off the gold standard now.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I have seen some rather naïve discussions in some newspaper columns with regard to these tax proposals. Look at the volume of comment that has developed with regard to Imperial Oil, lamenting that we cannot go and tax Standard Oil of New Jersey because of the increases in Imperial Oil assets. Of course, you are never going to be able to do that under a Canadian capital gains tax. The man who wrote that sort of stuff should start back at square zero.

During the committee hearings on capital gains we made a great attempt to bring some fairness and reality into the original proposals. Mr. Speaker, you may recall that the principal residence was going to be subjected to tax, after some allowances. It is true that a principal residence will still not be entirely free from attracting capital gains tax at this time, although in some cases it may do so, but the proposed rates have been halved.

I remind hon. members opposite that when I moved an amendment to exempt farm lands and ranch lands from capital gains tax when sold for bona fide farming purposes, the Liberal majority on the committee voted against my amendment and defeated it. We will have to return to that matter. There is a complete failure to understand the problem when, out of the blue, the government thinks it can institute capital gains tax on farm lands with any degree of equity towards the people who have farmed those lands, or towards those who intend to farm the lands.

We have had quite a reaction to this bill from the co-ops. I do not know what the house is going to decide, but it seems to me that the government has advanced its proposals after looking at some of the largest co-ops in the country, organizations which have lost their co-operative origins, that operate in the hundreds of millions of dollars class, their boards of directors being far removed from the ordinary members, in the same way as the boards of the biggest multinational corporations are far removed from the shareholders.

Unfortunately the government's proposals gather up into the same net hundreds if not thousands, of small local co-operatives. I am speaking of co-operatives organized on a local self-help basis.

Mr. Broadbent: You are defending socialism now.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If the hon. member thinks that socialism is the co-op movement organized on a local basis, he is one of those academics who got lost in the economic woods.

Then there are the proposals with regard to child care expenses. Unfortunately, there are a number of limitations proposed that will disappoint a great many people. There is the necessity for people who do the child caring to furnish receipts, and there are provisions with respect to income tax, the Canada Pension Plan, and blood relatives under the age of 21 years. I ask, why is the age of 21 years stipulated since a number of provinces now insist that people are adult at the age of 18 years? The federal government has not kept in tune with Alberta, Manitoba and Ontario, in which persons aged 18 are now adults. Under the federal government proposal, persons between the ages of 18 and 21 years are somehow left in the land of limbo, and apparently under these proposals any blood relative under the age of 21 is going to be disqualified. We will find inequities in working allowances and moving allowances. I can think of some office bulding in the centre of this city where there may be a large law firm with a number of young staff lawyers. They will be entitled to working allowances but a young man or woman out of the same graduating class, who may be in a struggling partnership in one of the less attractive sections of the building, will not be entitled to those same working expenses, even though they be incurred. This does not make sense.

• (5.20 p.m.)

Next, we come to medical benefits. In the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta, if medical premiums are paid by the employer, as they and other fringe benefits are under many collective agreements, they become additional income and are taxable. While the payment of premiums is taxable, the benefits, or shall we say the expenses, that are paid on behalf of the individual are disallowed under the medical expense allowance. A lot of people have not heard about that.

With regard to small businesses, we have here a partial unveiling of the government's policy with regard to foreign ownership. The differential in favour of small business is limited to Canadian owned business. All foreign held business of a corporate nature, even though it may be just a small distributing agency, is disallowed from the more favourable rate. I know of scores and scores of businesses, Mr. Speaker, which are small subsidiaries of foreign firms—French, Belgian, British, or even American—that have been domesticated and are presently entirely Canadian. One could be the distributor for an English firm of tool manufacturers, but the net result is that the business will be closed and I suppose the government will be proud of that.

Mr. Woolliams: They have a fair record in that regard.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This is going to be part of some of that bludgeoning that they do. Some of it is bull-headed, but it is bludgeoning, in order to correct some minor type of inequity. Are we going to tell the Canadian president or manager of a foreign-held subsidiary producing a product which we do not make, that we are putting him out of business, that we are going to tax him at 50 per cent from now on?

I find that the tax changes at this time are inadequate for many reasons, Mr. Speaker. We are being caught up in this tangle whereby this House cannot deal with economic issues unless we swallow this whole bill in one indigestible gulp, acknowledging to the government that, through necessity of dealing with other matters, we will skip over this. That is what they would like. If that is the case I am going to move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard):

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted:

This House deeply concerned with unacceptable levels of inflation, persisting unemployment and stagnant industry and conscious of the necessity for meaningful tax reform declines to give second reading to a bill which does not provide sufficient stimulus to the economy of Canada with appropriate tax cuts and incentives, does not contain adequate tax exemptions and is not calculated to materially improve business and labour conditions in Canada now or in the foreseeable future.

Subject to your views with regard to the nature of this amendment, Mr. Speaker, I would like to continue my remarks after we have had a consideration of it. If Your Honour wishes to put the amendment, I will be quite happy to conclude my remarks after you have done so, but in the interval I would hope that I could continue my remarks.

Mr. Speaker: Before putting the amendment to the House, it would be helpful if the hon. member or anyone else interested might enlighten the Chair as to the acceptability of the proposed amendment. I might say, prima facie, it looks like a substantive proposal rather than an amendment, but I would be pleased to hear what hon. members have to offer to the Chair by way of guidance.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I welcome the opportunity to try to assist you in accepting this amendment.

First of all, may I repeat an argument that I made the other day, that we are under new rules and that reasoned amendments should be acceptable at second reading. It must be remembered that on this bill this is the first opportunity for debate. This bill had its origin in a resolution passed before this House without debate or amendment. The provision of rule 60 is such that the minister is empowered to bring forward a bill. That is the motion; it is not the budgetary proposal that antedated it. The motion starts with the ways and means resolutions which were not the subject of debate. This, then, is the first opportunity for debate.

I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that in order to have debate there must be a joinder of issue; there must be an alternative to the principle. There is a joinder of issue when we consider the matter of the principle of second reading of this particular bill. These I have outlined. We declined to read the bill and from a procedural point of view I find it extraordinary that this type of amendment in this House would not be accepted, whereas in the procedure from which we draw our inspiration or, shall I say, our origin, this type of amendment is a commonplace. I would say that certainly the House can express its concern about "unacceptable levels of inflation, persisting unemployment and stagnant industry". That does not introduce a new principle into this particular bill.

• (5.30 p.m.)

We come to the tax bill being conscious of the necessity for meaningful tax reform, but we decline to give second reading to this bill because there is insufficient stimulus to industry contained in the provisions and the amendments to the tax bill. I find it difficult to understand how one could give reasons for being opposed to the bill and still be penalized. This is the point we were making the other day when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) presented a reasoned amendment on another matter.

Is a six months hoist a reasoned amendment? I ask that question in a rhetorical way. Is a motion that the bill be not now read a second time, that the contents be referred to not another committee but to committee of the whole, a reasoned amendment? When a reason for an amendment were added to one of those referral amendments the other day, that portion was chopped and the referral accepted. I find this difficult to understand.

Under these rules, Mr. Speaker, Beauchesne is of little help. I say this with fond memories of the position Your Honour is occupying at the present time and the difficulties I faced in those earlier historic times deciding how far Beauchesne should or should not be used. The interpretations of the rules contained therein go back to a time that even my grandfather would not have known.

If we consider the changes in the House and in the rules today, I submit that now is the time when reasoned amendments can and should be put forward. At the report stage of a bill the amendments to individual clauses are put forward for consideration. That is the change that can be made at that time. On third reading the only amendments that can be made are a six months hoist or referral back to a particular committee for study, not a reasoned amendment such as we are now putting forward.

I hope I have covered some of the ground to assist Your Honour in determining whether this type of amendment is acceptable. Some of my colleagues and other members of the House wish to express themselves, so I will yield the floor.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin).

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am yielding the floor only on the point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I realize this. I appreciate that the hon. member has further remarks of substance to make.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I see that I have outfumbled the parliamentary secretary. We are back on the old battleground which we have traversed so often. I think this time we are on pretty good ground. We have our artillery, infantry and cavalry at strategic points. Hopefully, Your Honour will recognize and give effect to the glorious batallion of words used by my friend the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), which I think will be supported by other members.

We come back to citation 382. I will deal with that in a little detail and relate it to this amendment. It provides:

It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill—

I stop there. I draw to Your Honour's attention the words "any special reasons". These must be reasons which persuade a member of this House to take steps over and above the usual remedy which he might have when voting on a bill or proposing a six months hoist. There must be some scope for him, if we are to have meaningful, clearcut, precise debate on issues brought forward on, as my hon. friend said, a joinder of issues. There must be special reasons for not wanting the bill to be passed standing by itself, not by voting against it and not by proposing a six months hoist but by saying that (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e) are the special reasons he is advancing for, using the words of the citation—

—not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions—

The hon. member for Edmonton West has included in this resolution special reasons for not agreeing to second reading of the bill. He makes this quite plain in his amendment which uses these words:

This House deeply concerned with unacceptable levels of inflation . . . declines to give second reading to a bill which does not provide sufficient stimulus to the economy of Canada with appropriate tax cuts—

They are the special reasons. They are squarely within the four corners of citation 382 which the hon. member has used in an effort to persuade the Chair that he does not agree, and that other hon. members should join him in not agreeing to second reading of this bill. A resolution which he is entitled to move pursuant to this citation is as follows:

—a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill—

Obviously, in a bill as lengthy, as complex and covering as many subjects as Bill C-259 there cannot be said to be one single principle. On that aspect, it is not easy for a member to use this as a peg on which to hang his argument. In addition to that the citation covers:

—the principles, policy, or provisions—

I pluck out of this citation the word "provisions". The hon. member for Edmonton West is stating his reasons for not agreeing to second reading of Bill C-259. He has moved an amendment adverse to or differing from the provisions of the bill. Within the four corners of an amendment of this kind you cannot fill in all the details and particulars as to clauses. Even if the hon. member tried to do that, Your Honour would probably rule him out of order.

The hon. member has said that because he does not like the over-all provisions of this bill he is asking the House to join with him in an amendment which disagrees with the provisions of the bill because it does not provide sufficient stimulus to the economy of Canada with appropriate tax cuts and incentives, and does not contain adequate exemptions. In this way the hon. member is putting on record a resolution that is declaratory of a principle adverse to the provisions of the bill. I quote further from citation 382:

—or otherwise opposed to its progress—

• (5:40 p.m.)

My hon. friend is saying, I suggest, that because the bill fails to provide sufficient stimulus to the economy by using appropriate tax cuts and incentives, and because it does not make provision for adequate tax exemptions, we are opposed to its further progress. How much further can we go in attempting to place before the House in clearcut terms an opportunity for the House to divide?

It is all very well to say that hon. members can express these views in the course of debate, but I think the House is entitled to have the opportunity to consider motions which will divide the House and compel the government to take a stand, to declare that it approves or disapproves. Obviously, in light of what has already been said by the minister and his supporters, and judging from government policies in the past, members opposite will vote against the amendment and no doubt it will be defeated. But that is not the point. It is our right, I contend, to place the government in a position from which it cannot easily extricate itself through its continued objection to reasoned amendments.

We have reached a point at which there is increasingly little opportunity for hon. members, on second reading, to direct consideration to the reasons for which they believe the principle of a bill should be opposed. There is little opportunity for them to put forward motions of this kind, making it clear why in their view bills coming before the House ought not to be supported.

The other day, speaking to a point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) I had occasion to put on record two reasoned amendments which had been accepted in the United Kingdom parliament. I have other examples I should like to place before the House now. While we are not bound, of course, by these U.K. precedents, I think I am entitled to say that the origin of our practice here is the practice in the United Kingdom. In recent years the practice in the United Kingdom has gone a great deal further than was originally allowed. In 1948, Mr. Churchill moved the following as a reasoned amendment:

This House, while recognizing the necessity for an equitable scheme of redistribution, declines to give a third reading to a bill which repudiates agreed recommendations of Mr. Speaker's Conference, 1944, and disregards for the purpose of party advantage the findings of the Boundary Commission, thereby bringing discredit on ministers of the Crown and lowering the traditional standards of our public life.

In 1961, on second reading of a bill dealing with Commonwealth immigration, the following amendment was moved and accepted as a reasoned amendment:

This House declines to give a second reading to a bill which, without adequate inquiry and without full discussion at a meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers, removes from Commonwealth citizens the long standing right of free entry to Britain, and is thus calculated to undermine the unity and strength of the Commonwealth; gives excessive discretionary powers to the executive without any provision for appeals; will be widely regarded as introducing a colour bar into our legislation; and, though providing for health checks and for the deportation of those convicted of certain criminal offences, fails to deal with the deplorable social and housing conditions under which recent Commonwealth immigrants and other subjects of Her Majesty are living.

In 1964, in connection with the resale prices bill the following was moved and accepted as a reasoned amendment:

That this House declines to give a second reading to a bill which may threaten the livelihood of many small independent traders without attempting at the same time to deal with restrictive practices by large commercial monopolistic organizations and trade unions which have a far more profound effect on the national economy.

In connection with the bill dealing with race relations, the following was moved and accepted as a reasoned amendment:

This House deplores discrimination whether on racial or religious grounds but declines to give a second reading to a bill which introduces criminal sanctions into a field more appropriate to conciliation and the encouragement of fair employment practices while also importing a new principle into the law affecting freedom of speech.

The following amendment was moved and accepted as a reasoned amendment when the land commission bill was under discussion:

This House, deeply concerned to secure an increased supply of land for building, while thinking it right that a reasonable charge should be imposed on increased values resulting from the grant of planning permission, declines to give a second reading to a bill which seeks to set up a land commission which is wholly irrelevant to the collection of a levy and which will reduce and make more expensive the supply of building land, so retarding the housing of the people and essential building programs.

Here is another amendment accepted as a reasoned amendment to the motion for second reading of the prices and incomes Bill:

This House, believing that price stability can only be achieved by a comprehensive economic policy which would include the sharpening of competition, the reform of trade union law and the removal of harmful restrictive practices, and accepting that a productivity, prices and incomes board has a useful function in such a policy, declines to give second reading to a bill which makes no contribution to the solution of the serious problems facing the nation caused by the collapse of the economic policy of Her Majesty's government and which introduces a measure of compulsion which will inevitably lead to state control of prices, wages, dividends, and to direction of labour.

I conclude on this note. I ask Your Honour to the extent you exercise a judicial function, to take judicial notice of the fact that debates in this House have tended to decline in quality mainly as a result of the introduction of new rules which have failed to provide adequate compensating factors to private members, particularly members of the opposition. I believe it is in the interest of strong and healthy debate to provide as many opportunities as can be found within the four corners of the rules for expressing disagreement, and that the discretion given to the Chair should be exercised as far as possible on the side of permitting opportunities for clearcut and decisive debate and decision. With respect, Mr. Speaker, this can only be done—

Mr. Mahoney: By changing the opposition.

Mr. Baldwin: —by providing an opportunity for amendments of this kind to be considered, in order that we in the opposition and private members on the other side, if they have the intestinal fortitude to do so, may put forward amendments containing reasons for opposing a bill on second reading—a resolution declaratory to some principle adverse to the bill the government is introducing.

Mr. Speaker, we are concerned now about the economic situation. It cannot be argued that a budgetary measure of the kind before us, legislation which extends beyond the usual budgetary matters to questions of tax reform, will not have a major impact on the economy. Indeed, from speeches which have been made both inside and outside the House we gather that the point of the bill is to improve the economic situation of the country generally. Concern with the economic situation is the gist of the first part of the motion, that we decline to give second reading to a bill which fails to provide the stimulus the economy needs.

• (5:50 p.m.)

I suggest that there is no way in which we can do more to bring ourselves within the scope of citation 382. I urge Your Honour to exercise the discretion that you have in allowing this amendment, hopefully to initiate not a spasm of these amendments—because I realize that they must be reasoned amendments—but to bring about beneficial debate in this House. I know that Your Honour cannot go beyond the rules that the House has given you, but in light particularly of precedents in the United Kingdom I suggest that the time has now come when we should enlarge opportunities for debate on second reading by moving reasoned amendments.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will take only two minutes to say that, if I read correctly between the lines of the remarks made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), I am sure what he is really saying is that he knows perfectly well that this amendment goes totally beyond the rules as we understand them but that he wishes it did not.

Mr. Baldwin: No. On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if the argument that the parliamentary secretary is going to make conforms with his first remarks, then I think he might as well sit down now.

Mr. Jerome: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member will agree with me that it is extremely clear under our rules that an amendment should be just that—a proposal to change the motion presently before the House in some way, not completely to negative it. Obviously, the effect of this amendment that he so seriously argues is, he must agree, directly to negative the motion for second reading by saying that the House votes against the motion. The first part of the amendments sets out the mood of the House and the latter part gives reasons why the measure itself is not acceptable and why in the opinion of the opposition it is inadequate.

Although these are interesting questions for debate, surely we are not being asked to come to the stage where what is passed off as a reasoned amendment on second reading is nothing more than a description of the reasons why the opposition rejects the motion for second reading.

Certainly the amendment before the House is clearly and simply just that.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the only thing I find wrong with this amendment is that it contains a split infinitive, which is something up with which I find it difficult to put.

Mr. Baldwin: That is a very serious accusation that you make.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is. I am glad my hon. friend recognizes that. However, despite the error I regard the amendment as being one of substance which we can support, and I should like to join with the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) in urging Your Honour to give very serious consideration to it.

It seems to me we are getting to the point where reasoned amendments have become more difficult to move than they ever were, though they have always been difficult. I confess that when I take note of the rulings that we have had from the Chair on reasoned amendments in recent times, especially those that have been negatived, I have had to agree that those rulings were based on precedents and on reasons and that therefore I could not appeal the rulings even if that right still lay with us.

However, if we are going to keep alive the phrase "reasoned amendment" it must be possible to make some kind of amendment under that heading. I am not floored by the comment just made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Jerome) that this amendment is just a statement of opposition to the bill plus reasons for so being opposed. I think that is a pretty good description of a right that we ought to have.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): And do have.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In fact, I think that is what a reasoned amendment is supposed to do. We already have the right to say yes or no to a bill. We have the right to propose a hoist, which is really just another way of saying no. We also have the right to seek a reference of the subject matter rather than the bill to a committee, which again does not permit any reference to any reasons or any alternative ideas.

In some of the previous debates that we have had on this question it has been said by those on the other side, or by the Chair, that if certain reasoned amendments were allowed the House would find itself discussing, not what the government has put forward but what the opposition has put forward.

Mr. Baldwin: Terrible!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Not if what the opposition has put forward is in the same area. Indeed, if all that the opposition puts forward is a set of reasons for being opposed to the government's measure, it seems to me that we ought to have the right to have that sort of discussion.

I do not want to be regarded as pleading that we open up the whole business, that we get to the point where anything that might be a substantive motion and which normally requires notice can be dragged in under this heading. But I do confess to some concern lest we are going in the other direction and getting ourselves in the kind of box where we will not be able to make any reasoned amendments at all.

Citation 382 of Beauchesne has been read, and those of us who take part in these little discussions have read it so often that we know it by heart. So instead of picking up Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, today I have decided to pick up May's seventeenth edition. It is a little unfair to my late friend Dr. Beauchesne to do this, because one sees where he got many of the things that he wrote in his book. But in his seventeenth edition May says the same things that are in citation 382 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, namely, that a reasoned amendment can be declaratory of some principle adverse to or differing from the principles, policies or provisions of a bill.

The hon. member for Peace River pointed out that that is what this amendment proposes to do. By the way, Beauchesne does not use the words "reasoned amendment", but May does. At the bottom of page 526 there is a paragraph with the heading "Reasoned Amendment" which goes on to say:

> It is also competent for a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move what is known as a "reasoned amendment".

My concern today relates not only to the amendment now before the House, which I should like to see allowed, but as to where we are going in this whole area. There is a lot more on pages 526 and 527 that I could read, but Your Honour has probably read those pages time and time again. However, I should like to draw attention to the material at the bottom of page 528 and the top of page 529 of May's seventeenth edition, the section under the general heading of "Effect of carrying a 'Reasoned Amendment'." That heading in itself carries a very interesting implication; it suggests that there are times when a reasoned amendment, even though it takes the House away from what the government wants to discuss, might be carried.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, I should like another four or five minutes. Does the House want me to continue now, or at eight o'clock?

An hon. Member: Eight o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): All right; let me call it six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is it understood that we will rise at this point and pursue the argument at eight o'clock?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We can resume the discussion then.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 40, the following matters will be discussed this evening at the time of adjournment: the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—External Affairs—transmission to United States Secretary of State of third report of environmental pollution committee and concurrence of House; the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom)—Agriculture—prairie provinces—action to improve net farm income.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray (for Mr. Benson) that Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act, be read the second time and referred to a committee of the whole.

Mr. Speaker: Order. When the House rose earlier today, hon. members were debating the procedural acceptability of an amendment proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). We heard from a number of learned colleagues. I remember well the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) had the floor, and still has the floor for the purpose of enlightening the Chair.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As Your Honour has just pointed out, when we rose at six o'clock we were discussing the procedural aspects of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West. I had occupied the time of the House for a few minutes, indicating not only my support for the procedural admissibility of this amendment, split infinitive and all, but also my belief that the House as a whole should take a new look at the whole question of reasoned amendments.

I had begun to point out—and I was going to quote a bit more from May's seventeenth edition—that one of the arguments that is sometimes made from the other side is that if a reasoned amendment is allowed, the House can find itself discussing a proposition which differs from the proposition put before the House by the government. I see nothing wrong with that; in fact, I think there is everything to be said for it. I believe we have to stay within the rules of relevancy: if the government brings down a bill having to do with elephants, we must not try to switch to a discussion about kangaroos. However, when the government brings in a bill having to do with so-called tax reform, surely we have the right to alter that discussion so long as we stay within the general ambit of tax reform. Therefore, I suggest the argument that a reasoned amendment produces a slight turn in the debate on the floor of the House is not a valid one.

It is also sometimes argued from the other side that if a reasoned amendment were to carry, certain dire consequences such as the defeat of the government would follow. On this side of the House we do not regard that as a dire consequence; we regard it as something devoutly to be desired.

Mr. Fairweather: A merciful delivery.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to remind the House there have been, certainly in the United Kingdom Parliament, a number of occasions when some pretty far reaching consequences have been the result of reasoned amendments. As I pointed out just before six o'clock, there is a section in May's seventeenth edition, beginning at page 528, which carries the heading, "Effect of carrying a Reasoned Amendment". I do not think the first paragraph is quite so important because it deals with amendments which try to achieve additions to the bill which could be put in the bill in committee, and it tends to frown on that kind of amendment; it states that that kind is really not a reasoned amendment. However, there are examples of even that kind of amendment having been allowed. It is the second paragraph to which I refer and which I should like to read:

> It must be borne in mind, however, that the amendment—

This is a reasoned amendment.

> —if agreed to, does not necessarily arrest the progress of the bill, the second reading of which may be moved on another occasion. The technical effect of such an amendment is to supersede the question for now reading the bill a second time; and the bill is left in the same position as if the question for now reading the bill a second time had been simply negatived or superseded by the previous question. The House refuses on that particular day to read the bill a second time, and gives its reasons for such refusal; but the bill is not otherwise disposed of.

That is precisely what we have in the amendment which is before us. It is a statement that this House does not want to give second reading to this bill, together with the reasons for asking the House not to do so.

• (8:10 p.m.)

I emphasize the fact that these paragraphs in May's seventeenth edition carry with them the implication that because a reasoned amendment can result in something that is not planned by the government is no reason for not allowing such a reasoned amendment.

Then let me draw attention to some of the examples that are on these pages. Granted, some of these go back in history a bit.

Mr. Benjamin: How far?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The first was 110 years ago. This is recent history. It reads:

> In 1861, the second reading of the marriage law amendment bill having been superseded by a resolution, the Speaker, on an appeal from the mover of the bill, suggested that the best course would be to withdraw the bill and introduce another in harmony with the expressed opinion of the House.

There is a footnote to tell us where that can be found. But the point of reading it is to tell the House that here was an occasion when a reasoned amendment was allowed and was carried. Things did not fall apart. The Speaker just said to the mover of the bill that it would be a good idea to bring in another one paying attention to the views that the House had just expressed. That is what my friend the hon. member for Edmonton West is suggesting, that we not give second reading to the bill that the government has brought in, in its present form. I suggest that if that amendment were carried, two things could happen, one might be an election, the other might be a decision on the part of the government to pay some attention to what the House has said by its vote.

The next paragraph in May goes on to say:

> The practical result of carrying such a resolution varies according to its character and importance, the support it has received, and the means there may be of meeting it, and on certain occasions has had far reaching political effects.

I emphasize these few sentences because of the fact that it is so often said from the other side that if a reasoned amendment were allowed, were voted on and were carried, it would be the end of this Parliament, we would have to have an election. Listen to this:

> For example, the amendment to the second reading of the conspiracy to murder bill, in 1858, being also a vote of censure, was not only fatal to that measure, but caused the immediate fall of Lord Palmerston's ministry; and the amendment to the second reading of the representation of the people bill of 1859 was decisive as to the bill and led to a dissolution.

So there have been occasions when reasoned amendments were not only allowed but were voted on, were carried and resulted in the fall of the government of the day. I am not predicting that that would be the result of the amendment that is before us, for I suspect that the majority on the other side of the House is still loyal enough to the government that this amendment would be defeated. But I present these points in support of the argument that I am putting forward, namely, that one cannot contend that the results that would flow from a reasoned amendment are a basis for denying the admissibility of such an amendment.

As I have said two or three times now, some of us are concerned about the developments that have taken place in connection with reasoned amendments. We know that on the opposition side of the House we always go as far as we can with our amendments. We would like to take control and tell the House what it is going to debate. We have to be held in check. We have to see to it that matters that are really new are submitted as substantive motions with proper notice, and we must not break the rule of relevancy. But so long as we stay within the four corners of the subject matter of a government bill which is before us on second reading, I think we should have the right to move, as a reasoned amendment, a proposition to the effect that we do not agree to the second reading of the bill in its present form. We should be allowed to state our reasons for opposing it, our alternative propositions, and such a matter should come to debate on the floor of the House.

Therefore, I not only support the procedural admissibility of the amendment now before us but I hope that we may find ways and means of developing a little more satisfactory experience with regard to reasoned amendments generally.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it is all very well for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to suggest that this is a welcome opportunity for Your Honour to redefine the scope and ambit of reasoned amendment but I submit to Your Honour that you and the House are bound by the rules as you find them and the precedents as you read them. I want to attack the admissibility of the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) on a number of grounds but primarily on the ground of relevance. I know that the citations are quite familiar to Your Honour, but for the record and in order that you might have in some convenient form the arguments before you I would like to cite Beauchesne's fourth edition citation 203 (1) which reads as follows:

> It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed. Every amendment proposed to be made either to a question or to a proposed amendment should be so framed that if agreed to by the House the question or amendment as amended would be intelligible and consistent with itself.
>
> The law on the relevancy of amendments is that if they are on the same subject matter with the original motion, they are admissible, but not when foreign thereto.

Beauchesne's citations also refer to May and when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre starts bringing in May we know that the big guns are out. I want to introduce some citations of May which have received the approval of the Chair in this Parliament and indeed the approval of previous Speakers. On reasoned amendments I refer Your Honour to May's seventeenth edition, pages 526 and 527. May at this juncture is describing what a reasoned amendment is. Here is what he said:

> It is also competent for a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move what is known as a "reasoned amendment". This amendment is to leave out all the words in the main question after the word "that" and to add other words; and the question proposed upon the amendment is, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question. A reasoned amendment is placed on the paper in the form of a motion and may fall into one of several categories.

May lists three main categories of a reasoned amendment. The first is:

> It may be declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill.

The second is:

> It may express opinions as to any circumstances connected with the introduction or prosecution of the bill, or otherwise opposed to its progress.

The third is:

> It may seek further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence.

• (8:20 p.m.)

I submit to Your Honour that the third illustration does not apply here; there is nothing in the amendment that seeks further information in relation to the bill, either by committees, commissioners or the production of papers. I submit, further, that there is nothing in the second category that pertains to this amendment because there is nothing in the amendment expressing an opinion as to any of the circumstances connected with the introduction or prosecution of the bill.

So we are left with the first category, that is to say, that the amendment may be declaratory of some principle adverse to or differing from the principles, policy or provisions of the bill. There really is nothing in the amendment presented by the hon. member for Edmonton West that does that, because there is no position taken adversely to the principle of the bill. Irrelevant and additional matters are brought in. The amendment reads:

> This House deeply concerned with unacceptable levels of inflation—

That is matter foreign to the bill.

> —persisting unemployment and stagnant industry and conscious of the necessity of meaningful tax reform declines to give second reading to a bill which does not provide sufficient stimulus to the economy of Canada with appropriate tax cuts and incentives, does not contain adequate tax exemptions and is not calculated to materially improve business and labour conditions in Canada now or in the foreseeable future.

If you take the amendment, Mr. Speaker, in its terms there is nothing attacking the principle of equity or reform contained in the bill, but only matters foreign to the bill. The use of a tax bill as a vehicle in the economy or as a fiscal weapon, admittedly within the terms of this amendment, are alluded to, and so there are references in the amendment to inflation, to labour and management, to economic stimulus. But on the face of the bill and within the terms of the bill I submit to Your Honour that there is nothing in the amendment stating a principle adverse to the principle of the bill.

After setting forth those three categories, May goes on to say—and I submit to Your Honour that the amendment does not fall within those categories:

> The following rules govern the contents of reasoned amendments:—

The first is the one Beauchesne was referring to in the citation that I gave to Your Honour, 203(1). Here is what May says at the bottom of page 527 of his seventeenth edition:

> The principle of relevancy in an amendment...governs every such motion. The amendment must "strictly relate to the bill which the House, by its order, has resolved upon considering", and must not include in its scope other bills then standing for consideration by the House.

These words have been approved by the Chair on several occasions in this Parliament, and I refer Your Honour to a very recent decision of the Deputy Speaker, in fact made last week, relating to Bill C-262. I quote from Votes and Proceedings of September 7, 1971, at page 779 as follows:

> Mr. Lewis, seconded by Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre), proposed to move in amendment thereto,—That Bill C-262 be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this House the government should give consideration to the introduction of measures to stimulate the Canadian economy and to free it from its dependence on that of the United States, to obtain additional markets for Canada's exports, and to protect Canadian jobs from the consequences of the policies announced by the President of the United States.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I am not going to argue the substance of that amendment. I am trying to argue the relevancy of that amendment and I want to draw to the attention of Your Honour the similarity between the amendment introduced by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), seconded by the perennial hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and the present amendment proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West. I use the word "perennial" with respect to the hon. member's membership in this House and also with respect to his support for this type of amendment which, I suggest to Your Honour, does not usually receive the approbation of the Chair.

I draw Your Honour's attention to the references in both amendments to stimulation of the economy. I agree that this is a very laudable objective, but it is foreign to the substance of this particular bill. What did the Deputy Speaker say on that occasion? He said:

> —an amendment must clearly oppose the principle of a bill.

The Deputy Speaker referred to May and went on to say, as recorded at page 779:

> The second point I should like to make is that an amendment must stay within the four corners of a bill. On the question of relevancy it does seem to me that this amendment goes beyond the four corners of the bill.

I could go on with these precedents, but my first submission to Your Honour is that this amendment as reasoned amendment does not qualify within the essential categories May specifies as a reasoned amendment. I bring in May because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did so, but more particularly because even if it were a reasoned amendment, which I submit it is not, it does not qualify because it is irrelevant.

There are two other citations from Beauchesne that I would like to draw to Your Honour's attention. Going to citation 203, I submit that paragraph 3 is relevant. It reads:

> An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved.

I submit to Your Honour that if you read "bill" for "motion," then the principle of foreign and irrelevant matter again would go to exclude the amendment.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Are "sufficient stimulus" and "tax cuts" also foreign?

An hon. Member: You are getting to him.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes, I may be reaching the hon. member for Edmonton West. In the third place, may I draw Your Honour's attention to citation 203(5):

> An amendment was ruled out because it raised a new question which could only be considered on a distinct motion after notice.

I submit that the matter raised in this amendment dealing with inflation, unemployment, industry, stimulus of the economy, incentives, methods calculated to materially improve business and labour conditions in Canada, are sufficiently wide and sufficiently foreign to the bill before the House that they would deserve to be included in the substance of a distinct motion that might be made on another occasion.

There is one further remark I would like to make, with Your Honour's indulgence and that of the House. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre sought to cushion the effects of what you might decide to do by submitting to Your Honour that if a reasoned amendment were to be found admissible and were to carry, the result would not be as catastrophic as one might think. He quoted from May at page 528 in the seventeenth edition. I think he was quoting through Beauchesne—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No, I have got my May too.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Well, he has got May too.

Mr. Lewis: That sounds like the first words in a new rock song.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It is permissive anyway, not compulsory.

It must be borne in mind, however, that the amendment, if agreed to, does not necessarily arrest the progress of the bill, the second reading of which may be moved on another occasion.

That is an isolated paragraph from a larger quotation on page 528. I submit that if you are going to get the complete context of that paragraph on the effect of carrying a reasoned amendment, Your Honour might direct your attention to the entire paragraph.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I read the entire paragraph and three or four more after it. Where was the minister?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I am just drawing to Your Honour's attention that the paragraph begins with these words:

According to modern practice, it would appear to be unlikely that, after a reasoned amendment had been carried on the second or third reading of a bill, any further progress would be made.

The last paragraph on the page is even more—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Read all of that paragraph.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I will read the whole passage, and I will do my own underlining. How would that suit?

If it is merely desired to draw attention to a matter incidental to the legislation intended by the bill—

What it is not.

—or to affirm a principle which could be incorporated in the bill at a later stage—

Which it is not here.

—this purpose could probably be better effected by an instruction or an amendment moved in committee.

That is fine.

• (8:30 p.m.)

It must be borne in mind, however—

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

These are the words recited by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

—that the amendment, if agreed to, does not necessarily arrest the progress of the bill, the second reading of which may be moved on another occasion.

I add, parenthetically, that that has to be read with the opening words of the passage where May says that according to modern practice it would be unlikely that any further progress on the bill would be made.

The technical effect of such an amendment is to supersede the question for now reading the bill a second time; and the bill is left in the same position as if the question for now reading the bill a second time had been simply negatived or superseded by the previous question.

Of course, I say parenthetically that that is technically right, but in terms of practical parliamentary procedure any hoist or negative of second reading or any motion following second reading in effect kills the bill.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) wishes to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, Your Honour, I do, with respect. I am hoping the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) is trying to convince the Chair of the point, not the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), because he will never do that. I think he should direct his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The hon. member is right; but I believe the Chair is omnipresent in this chamber and so I am always speaking to the Chair, and through the Chair, to members.

Mr. Nowlan: But when he said "May", Mr. Speaker, I thought he was getting too close to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; he was getting too intimate.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I think the hon. member knows from his active days of practice at the bar that although he addresses the judge, he rubs elbows with counsel at the bar.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Please leave me out of this.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did not enjoy that last metaphor, Mr. Speaker. I want to go on with that passage and give it its full amplitude.

The House refuses on that particular day to read the bill a second time, and gives its reasons for such refusal; but the bill is not otherwise disposed of.

Technically, I suppose that is right, but in practical parliamentary terms that bill is dead. Then there is a citation in respect of the marriage law amendment bill. I will not read that now, but this is the paragraph I want to draw to your attention:

The practical result of carrying such a resolution varies according to its character and importance, the support it has received, and the means there may be of meeting it, and on certain occasions has had far reaching political effects.

Now, what about the character and importance of this particular piece of legislation?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I read all that.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Starting with the Carter report about nine years ago, followed by the white paper which involved more informed public discussion than probably any other measure in this Parliament or, indeed, as far as I can recall in active public life—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That bill didn't.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I suggest that because of the far reaching nature of this particular measure, any reasoned amendment, if it were permitted and carried, would have far greater impact than the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was willing to concede.

May I say one thing further, Mr. Speaker, on the general subject of relevancy and the responsibility for introducing business. I suggest to Your Honour that the government has the responsibility under our parliamentary system to bring the business before the House.

Mr. Fairweather: That is one of our problems.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): And it is going to remain one of your problems. That being so, Parliament has held throughout the years that in order to keep the discussion pertinent and relevant, amendments must stay within the four corners of the business of the House. That is my argument, Your Honour.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for the advice and guidance they have provided the Chair in relation to the very difficult ruling which has to be made on the procedural acceptability of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

Hon. members have recognized that it is difficult for the Chair to rule on the procedural aspect of reasoned amendments. Hon. members who have participated in this very interesting procedural debate have suggested, or some of them have, that it is becoming increasingly difficult to propose acceptable reasoned amendments. I cannot agree entirely with this suggestion. If hon. members will look into the records of our House of Commons they will note that during most of our parliamentary history so-called reasoned amendments have been proposed on rare occasions only. It seems that only during the last few years have members started to use this device, that is, the device of reasoned amendment, on second or third reading of bills.

I agree that more such amendments have been ruled out of order in recent years. That is, of course, because many more than before are now proposed for consideration by the House. In other words, if 25, 40 or 50 years ago only one or two such amendments were proposed every session, not many of them were ruled out of order—perhaps one or two every session.

It seems to me from my experience, which is very limited in comparison with that of many other hon. members of this House—and I go back only to the days when I was Deputy Speaker—that I had the impression that very few people understood a reasoned amendment. It is only in recent years that the use of that kind of device has flourished—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is progress.

Mr. Speaker: —for the benefit of hon. members and a nightmare for the Chair. Because there has been a tendency in that direction, I have intended for some recent weeks and particularly in recent days to study very closely all our precedents in relation to these motions. This is a study which I admit is not yet completed. When it is, I feel I will be in a much better position to set down rules which will take into account not only British but relevant Canadian precedents.

Briefly, hon. members know, from my having quoted them on a number of occasions, which rules govern the content of reasoned amendments. These are enumerated in May's seventeenth edition at page 527. As suggested by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), I am sorry to have to disappoint hon. members but I have got May too. Among other rules, it is required that such amendments should be "declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill".

Looking at the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West, I find it difficult to identify any such principle—in other words, that the amendment is "declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill". Other conditions expressed by Sir Erskine May are enumerated at page 527 of his seventeenth edition. I doubt whether there is any purpose in my reading paragraphs 1, 2 and 3.

Looking at this question closely, I appreciate that in many respects the amendment proposed by the hon. member and now before the House quite seems to meet some of the requirements proposed by Sir Erskine May. The most important of these, of course, is that the principle of relevancy should govern every such motion. This is the point which was made very clearly and cogently a moment ago by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) in suggesting to hon. members that relevancy is the cornerstone of parliamentary debate. There can be no effective parliamentary debate, there can be no logical debate without the application of this principle by the Chair and, I should add, without respect for the principle by all hon. members who take part in the debate.

As my colleagues will recognize, it is a most difficult task, and a great responsibility for the Chair to insist that hon. members address themselves to the question before the House, not to stray too far and to try to limit contributions to the motion before the House. It is a basic principle that there can be debate only when there is a motion before the House, and contributions should always be limited to what we have before us. Otherwise I suggest there can be no meaningful debate in the House.

It is the responsibility of the Chair to invite hon. members to limit themselves to what is before the House at the time. It is the duty of the Chair to suggest to hon. members that amendments should be relevant to motions before the House. Again, I say it is the responsibility of hon. members also to co-operate with the Chair in this respect.

In connection with reasoned amendments, the same as in connection with all other amendments and motions, it is the duty of the Chair to enforce the principle of relevancy and it is the responsibility of members, as active participants in the parliamentary process, to respect that principle. That is why it is so difficult for hon. members to propose a reasoned amendment which in effect is not an expanded negative. If an amendment, reasoned or otherwise, is only an expanded negative it is, of course, out of order because it is well known that the way for hon. members to express their objection to a motion before the House is to vote against it. If it is much more than that and goes beyond the four corners of the motion before the House, then it offends the principle of relevancy.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Therefore, in my view hon. members should not be surprised that it is so difficult in practice, from a procedural standpoint, to propose procedurally acceptable reasoned amendments. I think that hon. members expect the Chair to ensure that Parliamentary debates remain logical, meaningful and relevant from a procedural standpoint. Because of this the Chair has to look with extreme caution on so-called reasoned amendments.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) suggested that the time has come to enlarge the opportunity for debate. I suggest to him and all hon. members that this is not the responsibility of the Chair. If hon. members wish the rules to be changed to provide for enlarged debate, they will themselves have to change the rules which guide the Chair.

Having said all this, I am prepared to look at the amendment with considerable sympathy. The hon. member for Edmonton West, having heard me go into some detail to explain why the amendment is perhaps out of order and the reasoned amendment should not be accepted, will probably be surprised if I tell him that I am ready to accept it. The reason is that this is perhaps a borderline case. I admit that it is very difficult. It has been very difficult in recent weeks and months to determine which reasoned amendments ought to be accepted and which ought to be refused. This one, I suggest to the House, is a borderline case.

In view of the fact that the whole matter of reasoned amendments is being reviewed by the Chair, perhaps hon. members will want the Chair to exercise some leniency and allow debate to continue on the reasoned amendment. At the same time, I would like to stress that hon. members should not think that the way has been opened for all possible reasoned amendments, which would make Parliamentary debate just about impossible.

I might say I suspect that whether or not we have this amendment before us, the debate which will take place tonight and perhaps in subsequent days will pretty well turn around the points which have been raised in the amendment. It would be very difficult for the Chair to rule out of order considerations which relate in some way to the substance of the reasoned amendment now before us.

We may have a test as to whether we are making a mistake by accepting this kind of reasoned amendment by a subamendment which may be proposed later and which might indicate how far away we would be getting from the motion now before the House. However, that could be a test which might be useful as a guide for the Speaker on future occasions.

Having said all this and having invited hon. members to realize the difficulty with which the Chair is faced in this situation, I feel in the circumstances that I should allow the amendment and put it to the House.

I repeat to hon. members that in the next few days I will continue to consider the general matter of reasoned amendments. The next time one is submitted we may have a set of rules which will establish when, how and in what circumstances such amendments can be accepted. I am afraid it might make it a little more difficult for hon. members to propose amendments which will be acceptable in view of the precedents.

If hon. members will allow, I will now read for the benefit of the House the motion proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard):

That all the words after "That" be struck out and the following substituted:

"this House deeply concerned with unacceptable levels of inflation, persisting unemployment and stagnant industry and conscious of the necessity for meaningful tax reform declines to give second reading to a bill which does not provide sufficient stimulus to the economy of Canada with appropriate tax cuts and incentives, does not contain adequate tax exemptions and is not calculated to materially improve business and labour conditions in Canada now or in the foreseeable future."

Before the hon. member for Edmonton West is given the floor I would like to refer briefly to the procedural objection he took this afternoon to some aspects of the bill now before us. The difficulties with which the Chair is faced in this situation were also referred to this afternoon by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He and the hon. member for Edmonton West suggested that the bill before us is in a substantive way different from the provisions of the schedule attached to the ways and means motion. He is probably right. I say "probably" because it will take the Chair a long time to analyse the 560 or so pages of the bill and collate them with the schedule attached to the ways and means motion. I suggest to hon. members that the Chair should not be requested to do this. I do not think it is the duty of the Chair to perhaps suspend the sitting of the House for a few weeks while I take this huge book, try to compare it with the schedule attached to the bill and see whether there are substantive differences.

Perhaps the difficulty we are faced with arises from the fact there has been agreement among responsible representatives of the parties of this House that we should follow a new system. Instead of having a generally termed ways and means resolution, it was agreed between representatives of parties that we should have for consideration by the House by way of a ways and means resolution, a draft bill.

If the House of Commons accepts this procedure and adopts as part of the ways and means resolution a draft bill, I do not see how any amendment can be adopted or suggested to the House at any time thereafter either by the government or the opposition, because the objection can be very well made at any time an amendment is made by the government, the opposition, a member of the opposition or any individual member of the House that this amendment is not in keeping or in accordance with the terms of the ways and means resolution. It will not be, of course, because it is different from the draft bill which has been submitted. I think the House got itself into a bit of a bind and difficulty by following this procedure. I think it should be for the House to find a way out of it. For the moment, I suggest to hon. members that we proceed with the bill before us.

One solution is that there be a further meeting between representatives of the parties to agree on a motion which might rectify the situation. This solution has been proposed by hon. members who took part in the debate. If this is not done, the bill will eventually go to committee and hon. members may make an objection to the effect that the amendment is not in order, actual clauses of the bill now before the House are not in conformity or in accordance with the provisions of the ways and means resolution or the schedule to the ways and means resolution. That would be a good argument. I rather suspect the chairman of the committee of the whole would agree and would refuse to have the committee consider that amendment or clause. But that might cause difficulty for members on both sides of the House, so I suspect it will be an advantage for both sides of the House to get together very soon and try to find a solution to the problem which some of our distinguished leaders have caused for us.

In the circumstances, I think the bill should be allowed to proceed and hon. members given an opportunity to pursue debate on it.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I am very grateful to Your Honour, particularly in the face of the difficult problem that was facing the Chair in considering the arguments put before Your Honour with regard to this amendment.

• (8:50 p.m.)

I should like to complete my analysis of the bill as far as I can. Many of my hon. friends will be discussing particular aspects of the measure and making other general observations on second reading. There is one further point, however, I think should be made; it is one which has been made many times. The bill before us continues to accept the philosophy that the government knows best how to dispose of the public's money. An ever increasing share of the gross national product, an ever larger share of the nation's increased productivity is to be collected and distributed by the treasury.

This philosophy is not limited to the federal government. More and more is being taken by provincial governments; more and more is being taken by municipalities. The figure is now, I suppose, up to 38 or 39 per cent of the gross national product, give or take a fraction of a percentage point. It is this that goes against the grain of the majority of Canadian citizens. No matter how hard they struggle, no matter how hard they work, no matter how much risk they take, the government says to them: Give us a bigger share of what you make, because we know how to dispense it.

Look at the size of the national budget in 1963—$6.4 billion. Now, nine years later, it is in excess of $15 billion in proposed expenditures.

Mr. Francis: What about the GNP?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The GNP has gone up, but it has not doubled or more since that time. One has only to look at the percentage figure. And, of course, the GNP is measured in terms of ever escalating dollars, in cheaper dollars.

Mr. Francis: So are taxes.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, they are, but the government tends to improve its position because its sales tax and customs duties are all imposed on an ad valorem basis.

Mr. Francis: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No. I will finish my speech and the hon. gentleman can speak later if he wishes. Then, through a system of progressive income tax, as it is called—I do not think it is progressive; I believe it is a regressive form of taxation—the government takes an ever increasing proportion of salaries, wages and profits. In many cases, increases in these sources of income merely mark time in terms of constant dollars, but because of the incidence of inflation an individual finds himself in a higher tax bracket and taxed at a higher rate.

The same applies in the sphere of sales tax and customs duties. The same applies in the case of ever escalating municipal taxes. Having served on a city council, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) can tell us just how far within this city municipal taxation has increased in terms of real dollars—

Mr. Francis: Not federal taxes.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Federal government taxation has certainly increased by a great deal. Members opposite describe this as tax reform, but the person with a low salary, the person living on a low income who is paying little or no income tax asks, "What will this do for me?" The answer is that it will do nothing, or really very little.

There has been no tax reform proposed within the field of these ad valorem taxes. Real reform in this area and in the area of realty taxation has proved beyond hon. members opposite. These are the areas to which we refer. They call this tax reform, but the principles of taxation have not changed. There is provision for increased exemption, there is a proposal for a capital gains tax. Some tinkering has been carried out here and there, but the principle is the same. I maintain that the opportunity for true tax reform has been missed. There is no question in my mind that the elimination of the estate tax in no way compensates for the imposition of the capital gains tax. The capital gains tax is certainly new. It hits everyone, and most people are still saddled with the equivalent of an estate tax. I urge the House to adopt my amendment.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, if we look at the progress of the debate today we get some indication of the affection in which this bill is held by the opposition. We have heard a short statement by the minister and a somewhat longer statement by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) whose amendment would have the effect of killing this measure.

The legislation before us is thoroughly bad legislation and it does not represent tax reform. When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) referred to it in his budget speech, he and his hon. friends were crowing; they thought they had pulled off the grand coup. Here was finagling to end all finagling, a juggling act to disguise the fact that after nine years during which the country had been looking forward to tax reform, the government had betrayed it by producing, not tax reform at all but merely some tinkering with existing provisions. At that time, when the budget was introduced members on the government side were saying, "Let's call an election. Now we really have an act to go to the people with."

I said at that time, as did some of my hon. friends, that they must have thought the Canadian people fools to buy the stupid legislation they were introducing. The Canadian people are not fools, and they have not bought it. They see right through the sham measures contained in this so-called tax reform proposal.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Today we have a rather subdued group of people on the government benches. They are not hooting and hollering as they were on budget night, they are not nearly so confident of themselves as they were then, because a look at the legislation of which they were so proud a few months ago reveals that these so-called increased exemptions will do little more than restore the purchasing power of the old exemptions which were introduced many years ago. In other words, they are doing today—inadequately, I might say—that which should have been done progressively over the last ten years at the very least, namely, raise exemptions along with the increase in the cost of living, in fairness to the taxpayers of Canada. This was not done. The government put if off and put if off in order to enable them to put it all together in a little package and to pretend that they had accomplished something substantial. But this has been seen through completely. It is a sham and everyone can see it for what it is.

In many cases the so-called benefits that the taxpayer, particularly the working-class taxpayer, was supposed to receive, if you look at the tables, will not be felt. It is claimed that these taxpayers will be paying $100 less in taxes, in some cases $110 less. However, the government do not take into account, or they pretend not to take into account, the fact that many of these taxpayers will really be paying more taxes, not less, as a result of the increased exemptions.

For the first time unemployment insurance is going to be part of taxable income. Therefore, those who have been receiving unemployment insurance benefits in the seasonal industries will find that they are worse off under these provisions than they were under the old legislation. Those who have been receiving allowances for manpower retraining programs will also find they are worse off, because all their allowances will now be taxable and as a result they will pay more tax, not less. In many cases trade unionists who have negotiated contracts with their employers to include in their wage packages payment of medicare fees, which in many cases were included in the wage packet in lieu of increased wages, will find that these payments are now taxable and will have to be reckoned as taxable income, the amount of which may be far greater than the so-called increase in exemptions that has been granted. So all in all, as a result of just the few examples I have mentioned many of our working men will find they are worse off than they were before. This is why we are quite happy to support this amendment, and we congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton West and all those who participated in preparing the amendment for moving that the bill be not now read the second time.

One must also ask why tax reform was dropped. Why, after all these years during which we had the Carter commission, the white paper, the House of Commons committee report and the Senate committee report, did the government capitulate completely to those who are against tax reform and virtually drop every progressive measure from the tax package? My hon. friend from Edmonton West suggested that it was because there was a large public outcry. I ask him, a large public outcry from whom? The Liberal bagmen were the only ones who were crying out, because they were going to be paying more tax.

I conducted a survey in my riding on the white paper and sent out a questionnaire. Questionnaires usually return about 400 answers in my constituency, but the questionnaire on the white paper returned 500 answers, 300 from those who freely admitted that they did not understand what was in the white paper, the remaining 200 objecting. The truth of the matter is that most people in this country are not opposed to tax reform since it is they who would have benefited substantially from such reform. The people who are opposed to it are those who always "had it made", those who are satisfied with things as they are, those who are getting their money from capital gains, those who are escaping taxation through depletion allowances and shares in resource industries, those who are getting the 20 per cent tax credits: in other words, the very small group at the top.

I am surprised that my hon. friend from Edmonton West says that there was a large public outcry. Perhaps the large public outcry was from friends of his. I understand that there may have been a large public outcry in the circles in which he moves. I am sure there was a large public outcry in the circles in which the Liberal backbenchers move, because the biggest enemies of tax reform were the Liberal party.

I would remind hon. members on the government side that for an opposition party we were very restrained during the discussion of tax reform. There were many things contained in the Carter report that we did not like. There were also many things contained in the white paper that we did not like. But on the whole we thought it was at least a step toward tax reform and we tried to avoid excessive criticism of those reforms in the hope that perhaps this government would bring in some reforms. But, of course, the government did not need our criticism because their own backbenchers were "knifing" the minister every day in the House. When they were not knifing him in the House I understand they were knifing him in the caucus.

As I say, the reason we did not get tax reform was because those who have always "had it made" did not want it. Certainly it was not because of a large public outcry; it was because some people decided that equity in the tax system was not for them. So once again the Liberal party, rather than respond to the mass of people in this country, responded to this very small group who support them in office through their bagmen. I can find no other way to describe the situation.

Mr. Alexander: The only word you can use is bagmen.

Mr. Saltsman: Looking at this great volume one may well wonder what it is all about. There are close to 700 pages in it and it is a very imposing kind of document. If anybody ever digs it up 10 to 15 years from now they will marvel at the ingenuity of the government party that devised something that was so beyond the comprehension of even the tax experts of the country. I am sure it must be even beyond the comprehension of those who had to write the document.

We have a large unemployment problem in this country with over 6½ per cent of the population unemployed. But, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party has ensured one thing: it has ensured that there will be no unemployment for accountants and tax lawyers. The government has guaranteed that these people will have enough work from this piece of legislation to keep them going forever, because it defies the mind of man to understand it.

I recently attended a number of tax seminars along with people who were experts in the field, and not one of them really knew what was in this legislation or understood its import. One of the reasons for the establishment of the Carter commission was that our tax system had become so complex and open to misinterpretation that it was felt necessary to find a way of evolving a tax system that could be readily understood not only by the experts but by the population of this country. That was one of the terms of reference of the Carter commission, quite aside from the question of equity and general fairness.

Instead of coming up with legislation that would have simplified our tax system, as the Carter recommendations would have, by including all kinds of income within the tax base, the government has so distorted, twisted, picked and plucked at the Carter commission as to make its report unrecognizable and the entire tax legislation even more unintelligible than it was before. This is quite an accomplishment. It took nine years and a great deal of expertise to accomplish this minor miracle of making what was already so totally bad even more so.

• (9:10 p.m.)

I sometimes wonder what the historians, political scientists or archeologists will think when they dig up this little document, this gift from the Liberal party to the people of Canada. What will they think about our civilization and the value judgments of the society of today? A tax system as much as anything else tells us what is important, what is not important, who gets rewarded and who gets punished.

The tax system outlined in this bill very clearly defines the philosophy of the government of today. It tells us, for instance, that the tax system will continue to be unfair as between the manufacturers of goods and the exporters of raw materials. It indicates that the privileges industry has always enjoyed and the privileges the mining industry has always enjoyed are to be continued, albeit in a new form, but no more acceptable than the old form. The point is, the tax system is still biased and loaded in favour of the development of raw materials against the development of the indigenous manufacturing industry.

When they dig up this document it will also show that this government did not think very much of public expenditures. It will show this government was convinced in its mind that any kind of private expenditure, however meagre or unsatisfying, was far more valuable than the roads we built collectively, than the parks we built collectively, and even far more important than the medical services, hospitals and other things which make life civilized in a society. Obviously, this government feels that private needs are more important.

If one looks at the measures proposed he will see there is an advantage to those who possess equities in private corporations as against those who buy bonds in government-financed projects. More important, the historians will see that this government has made a value judgment in respect of the ordinary man. They will find that the government has said to the ordinary man who works with his hands and his skills, "Your wages, your salaries and your income are not terribly important because every cent you earn is subject to tax. You are the people who will pay the entire shot in taxation on your income."

This applies as much to the university professor as it does to the man who works in the construction of a building. However, if one has capital, no matter how he has acquired it, he can invest that capital without working very hard and the income will only be subject to partial tax. Instead of a 20 per cent dividend tax credit he will receive a 33⅓ per cent tax credit. In addition, that capital gain will only be subject to half taxation; he will not have to pay the entire amount.

That is an important value judgment on this society; it shows that those who have money are far more important than those who contribute their skill and intelligence to society. In our view that is a shoddy judgment which we cannot accept. I should like to remind this House that the Carter commission rejected that judgment when it said everyone should be taxed on an equal basis. It suggested everyone should be taxed on total income no matter where that income was derived. This government has seen fit to reject that recommendation based on the concept of equity.

In a primitive society one might accept the proposition that equity should be put aside in the interest of growth, as desirable as the principle of equity may be. The Minister of Finance has said this in similar words; he has said we would like to have equity but we cannot because we must have growth. Let us consider that proposition. The Carter commission pointed out that we have one of the most inequitable tax systems in the world, yet this country has been plagued repeatedly and cyclically by unemployment. We have been plagued repeatedly by slow growth. Therefore, our inequities in the tax system have not helped this country develop.

There is really no argument to be made for a trade-off as between growth and equity. On the contrary, it would seem that equity and growth go hand in hand. After all, one of the things that determines growth is the willingness of ordinary people to work. An investor always invests. There is no merit in the suggestion that we must give special concessions to investors. What will they do with their money except invest it?

History will bear out the fact that there are opportunities when people have purchasing power. If a country is prosperous, the investor will find a way to invest and satisfy the needs of society. After all, that is his role. There is very little evidence to suggest that an investor has to be stimulated over and over again by tax concessions which create a climate of unfairness.

Let us again consider the concept of growth and equity requiring separate things. Let us consider the middle-income earner who is the skilled workman, the school teacher, those who work in hospitals and others. Let us remember what the Carter commission had to say about this group. This is the most mobile group in our society. The point the Carter commission made was that this group could emigrate most easily but was the group being hit hardest by our tax system.

This country is in dire danger of losing some of its most skilled and intelligent people unless we provide a fairer tax system. We have not done so. Nothing will kill incentive in this country faster than the feeling that the people who work with their hands and their brains are being penalized and disparaged while those who invest money are being rewarded. If we are to have growth in the labour and professional groups in this country, then we must recognize their talents and adopt a tax system they consider to be fair. One does not trade off growth against equity. When you have an equitable society, growth is very often the product rather than competition.

Let me repeat some figures I have used before to indicate the manner in which people are discriminated against in our society. I intend to use some tax tables prepared in the summer of 1971 in respect of tax reform legislation. I have in mind table No. 2 on page 17 of this report. I obtained these figures from government representatives, so I assume they are reasonably accurate. I asked what a person would pay in tax if he were receiving personal income in the form of wages or salary, or perhaps interest on bonds such as Canada bonds, compared with what he would pay on his income from money invested in equities of a Canadian corporation. Let us consider the line which is headed, "From $5,000 to $7,000". If the money he made is received in the form of wages or salary, the tax is $1,280.50. However, if that money is received in the form of dividends, the tax would be $200. This is about one-sixth of the amount paid by a wage earner.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

• (9:20 p.m.)

But that tells only part of the story, because if those dividends carried in them an element of capital gain the tax could very well be half that amount. If we go to the figures here of from $11,000 to $14,000—this inequity does not apply only to the lower or somewhat above average wage earners; it applies to people on salary generally—we are speaking perhaps of some teachers, and if the teacher receives the whole of his income from teaching he pays in tax $3,230.50. If that teacher happened to be smart enough to acquire a rich father—I suppose he should be awarded for the intelligence to have chosen a rich father rather than a poor one—and was able to take the rewards of his efforts and invest it, he would have to pay only $1,350 in tax. Again, if those dividends came to him with a major element of capital gain in them, the tax would be lower.

How does society go on with a tax system of that kind? How does it say to its people that they should work hard because their country needs them, it is advantageous to them and they will be rewarded? It is things of this kind which create tremendous dissatisfaction in society. It is things of this kind which put the lie to this government proposal which is called tax reform.

Therefore, let me sum up the kind of message which we get from this great document the geniuses on that side have devised. First of all, it says that the holders of capital shall be rewarded more than others, even to the extent that if you leave a great deal of money or any money when you die there is no tax on it; it can be transferred without any tax whatsoever. I could understand giving consideration to a person enjoying the rewards of his own labour or the fruits of his own labour, if you wish to be poetic, during his lifetime and even to the extent of perhaps passing it on to his wife without taxation, because very often wives contribute very substantially to the acquisition of wealth of this kind. What argument, however, is there for taking this wealth and passing it on to those who have never lifted a finger to earn it? Some of it should go to the heirs, but why should all of it go to them without taxation?

How can such a situation be considered just, when ordinary wage earners have to pay tax on every cent they make excluding their exemptions? How can we develop a country when we insist on promoting the development of raw materials in that country and provide substantial tax benefits for that purpose? At the moment we face a very severe situation. The United States has put on a 10 per cent surtax. There is threatened protectionism growing in the United States. The only thing they want to admit into their country free of this surcharge and other protectionist devices is raw materials because they are either running short of them or they are becoming too costly for them to develop. We are being drained, and through our taxes are encouraging this drain. This is not a national policy, it is national suicide. I know of very few developed countries that would follow this kind of development policy.

Voices have been raised, and fortunately one voice in particular has been raised. I refer to the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans) who spoke from the other side of the House with great intelligence. His comments have received enormous attention across this country; perhaps they have received more attention than the comments of some of my colleagues. But he is not suspect; he is not a member of the opposition. He is a member of the government and, so far as we can see, a loyal party member. His criticism is therefore more pungent or more acceptable when he makes his case against the export of raw materials and the bonus in our tax system to these industries. In making comments both inside and outside this House he has pointed out that in some cases they pay a tax of less than 10 per cent on their earnings as against the manufacturing industry which pays virtually a 50 per cent tax on its earnings.

So everything conspires in this country—the tax system and the public policies of this government—to make us little more than an underdeveloped colony, a servant to a giant industrial state that has run out of many raw materials itself and is now draining our country of them. Surely at a time when we are talking about tax change this is one item the government should immediately alter in order to remove these special advantages and privileges of the resource industries.

This is one reason I have no hesitation in wanting to see this bill killed. The bill deserves to be killed, because I would far rather see it go under than see some of the continuing ill-effects this kind of philosophy will have. It is a policy of "The future be damned. Let us live it up today and get rid of the resources as quickly as we can; we have no obligation to posterity or those who come behind us. Let us get rid of these resources"—and when they are all gone, all that will be left to us will perhaps be to seek on bended knee some kind of a quiet attachment to some other country.

This bill does almost nothing in terms of providing a measure of full employment. By stimulating the resource industries it does not provide the employment required in this country. I know the resource industries are arguing that employment is provided through an overflow into other industries. No one argues that this is not the case. We argue, however, that there are infinitely better ways to provide more employment than is provided by the resource industries.

I saw some figures in respect of the Iron Ore Company of Canada which indicate that for every $900,000 they create one job. When we consider the number of new labour force entrants, something like 400,000 every year, plus the 6½ per cent unemployment, where in the world does there exist enough capital to provide jobs from these resource-based industries? It does not exist. Our only hope is that we can develop the manufacturing industries along with other industries to achieve a proper balance in order to provide employment in this country.

There was a time in our society when people were not as concerned about the environment, when people were not as concerned about things like public transit, crowded cities, health and education, and when unrestrained growth was everything. I am pleased to say there are now very strong signs that Canadians no longer have this attachment to growth for the sake of growth alone. They want a little more quality to their life; they want a little more quality to their society. They want to say that some things are more important than others.

How, then are we to achieve this growing feeling in our society if we have a tax system which encourages private expenditure each time rather than providing some incentive to people to invest in public projects through government bonds? How are we to build these public transit systems which we talk about, create the parks that we want so much, improve our hospital facilities or medical research if everything is to go to the private sector, because the private sector, whatever its value may be and however useful are some of the things it produces, does not produce what to me are some of the most essential things of civilized society. The answer is obvious. We want to be able to do it and we will need genuine tax reform to accomplish some of these objectives.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Therefore, it seems to me that this tax bill for which we have waited so long really has not been worth the effort. It is sad to think that it should be put aside and a fresh start made because the government have made such a mess of it. That is what they have done. They have wasted nine years of searching for a proper system of tax reform, and it will have to begin all over again—if not the search, then certainly legislation that will reflect some of the wisdom that came out of the search already undertaken is badly needed in this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Do I understand, Mr. Speaker, that you are about to put the question? I have a few words of wisdom on this motion. I regret I was not here, but I thought that on an amendment as momentous and as important as the one introduced by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) at least someone from the government side would have risen to defend the government's record and to indicate whether or not they intended to support this amendment.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Is the muzzle on over there?

Mr. Baldwin: Spontaneity, intelligence and validity are the trademarks of this party. I wish I could say as much for my hon. friends opposite. Even the very interesting meeting held in the city of Peterborough not long ago did not produce these qualities. I say that with deference to my hon. friend for whom I have due admiration, but I must say that the meeting which was dreamed up there was sadly lacking in these important qualities. This debate has revolved around an amendment moved by the hon. member for Edmonton West. I think it goes to the root of the problems which face this country today. I am given to understand that on Thursday of this week figures will be released with regard to the economic situation, the cost of living index and unemployment. We all hope that despite the absurd and ridiculous economic policies which have been pursued by this government there in fact will be an improvement shown in these particular industries. But in light of the incompetence demonstrated by this government, in light of its incapacity to fulfil the primary function of government today to provide an economic climate within the framework of which the ordinary citizen can expect to find that standard of living to which he is entitled—and in my view this has not been the case—we have been met with procrastination, with delay, with evasion and with a series of proposals which have not met the root problem which we face.

The very basis upon which this budget was formulated and the extent to which it is being reflected in the bill we have today is founded on false premises. The statements of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) as to the healthy economic condition which we can expect to find in this country have been demonstrated to be completely false and we are facing, even without any international action, another winter of discontent. But we have a situation which has been brought into this country primarily by the action of the President of the United States and, to a lesser extent, by other countries, so that our economic situation is being aggravated to a point where it will be beyond the capacity of many of the ordinary people of this land to bear the heavy burdens which will be imposed upon them during the course of this winter.

We had the message of the President of the U. S. with regard to the surtax. What was the reaction of the government? As one newspaper said, they were running around like a lot of headless chickens. When the master returned there was a little clarification, there was a more even disposition, but basically no valid proposals were made which would give to the people of Canada some aid and comfort with regard to the situation which was being inflicted on this country as a result of the presidential action.

But it has not stopped there. We find that just today a senior official of the United States treasury, Mr. Volcker, the Undersecretary of the Treasury, made a categorical, firm statement at a Senate subcommittee hearing in Washington at which he said quite plainly that in case of any attempt in Canada through the use of the Employment Support Act or regulations under it which would have the effect of creating a situation where in the opinion of the U. S. government the provisions of their particular legislation dealing with countervailing duty laws were breached, they would feel free to impose a further charge added to the surcharge which would nullify in its entirety the effect of the employment support measure.

The leader of this party when speaking in this House on the day we came back, September 7, asked during the course of his speech a question of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. He asked whether it was not a fact that this possibility existed and that the measure of the value of the Employment Support Act would be to a large extent determined by the reaction of the U. S. government. He mentioned this particular opportunity existing under the U. S. legislation.

• (9:40 p.m.)

What was the reaction of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce? He said, "Oh no. The Americans would not dream of exercising their right under this legislation." But repeating what I said before so that it may be brought home to this lack-lustre government, a senior official of the American government today made it absolutely plain that in his view if an examination of the employment support bill, Bill C-262, and the regulations which would be enacted under it made it clear that there was a conflict with the provisions of the American legislation, then the American government would act immediately. This relates directly to the amendment introduced by my hon. friend from Edmonton West because in his amendment there is a requirement for the government of this country, through the medium of this tax legislation and through other means, to introduce an adequate stimulus to our lagging economy.

Under those conditions we find this specific threat. All the very meagre and limited reactions which this government can provide to the serious problem posed by the American presidential action, all it has to offer, will be negated or can be negated by further American action.

I am not intending during the course of this speech to involve this party, and hopefully this chamber, in what could become a very serious situation if these two countries became concerned in what would be only retaliatory action, which could have no other result than to damage our economy very seriously. But I do suggest in all seriousness that the government has a duty to go beyond the sort of pap dished out by the Prime Minister today in response to my question when he said, "Oh, we are going to wait until we find out what the government of the United States is really going to do, but this is all hypothetical." What nonsense, when there is a specific statement by the Undersecretary of the Treasury that the American government is going to act!

Mr. Murphy: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Baldwin: Delighted.

Mr. Murphy: I am wondering if the hon. member is suggesting that the government should bring its draft legislation to Washington for approval before submitting it to this House?

Mr. Baldwin: What utter, piffling nonsense. I am suggesting that this government cudgel whatever limited brains it has to try and come up with a number of reasonable alternatives in the form of contingency plans which would be of some benefit to the hard pressed people of this country faced with damaging, serious, crippling unemployment and inflation through the actions of the government in not bringing to the country what remedies it needed under normal circumstances, and now aggravated beyond all endurance by what will be the result of the actions of the United States. That is what I have to suggest.

Has the government anything to suggest? I asked the Prime Minister today, and he replied, "Oh, we will wait a little while. We will wait and see what will happen, whether this is going to be more than hypothetical." Mr. Speaker, how much drivel can we afford to listen to from the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues? I think it is a shocking situation and obviously my hon. friend opposite, for whom I have the greatest admiration except when he makes interjections of this kind, has not bothered to examine with some clarity what no doubt will be the result in his own constituency. Further, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You have 15 minutes more to kill.

Mr. Baldwin: Fifteen minutes? Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) should be informed that behind me are battalions of hon. members seeking an opportunity to debate this very important legislation and the amendment.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): What a team!

Mr. Baldwin: Later today there was a report filed by a presidential commission which should give some pause to our government, a report which indicated that there was a recommendation going forward to the American government that a great many of the U.S.-Canada arrangements should be rescinded. This included, as I understand it, the Canada-U.S. auto pact and a recommendation that there should be no more discussions of a bilateral nature, and only on the basis of multilateral international discussions should further agreements be worked out.

In addition there are proposals introduced in the American Congress under the DISC act which would also have an exceedingly detrimental effect on this country. Under those circumstances it surely is the right of hon. members to ask for, and the duty of the government to provide some assurance that the government has plans, has programs, has alternative proposals which will meet the situation which is inevitably going to develop during the ensuing winter months.

Under those conditions it is quite obvious that the amendment of my hon. friend from Edmonton West, which I may say was conceived some time before today, achieves added significance and importance. There is a need for the government to bring before this country and this Parliament meaningful and realistic policies which will result in a stimulation of the economy. There must be consideration given to tax cuts of a kind calculated to improve the economy, to regenerate the kind of confidence which has been lost over so many years through the dissatisfaction of the people of Canada with the procrastinating proposals of the Minister of Finance. There is a need to consider reasonable increases in tax exemptions of further kinds which will add to the purchasing power of the people of this country. No motion could be better calculated at this time to engage the interest of the people of this country and get their support.

I say this more in sorrow than in anger to the members of the government. We know they are the ones who can initiate policies. We hope they will do so. I assure them now that if they bring forward policies and proposals which will have the effect of achieving what my hon. friend, on behalf of this party, has laid down in his amendment, they will secure our support.

I know there are other hon. members who wish to speak. I will not take my full time because I know there are hon. members on this side seeking the opportunity to advise the House of additional reasons to support this amendment. I hope that before this debate is concluded some members on the government side may have the fortitude to stand up and indicate their position with respect to the amendment.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, after nine years of gestation I think all members of the House are ready, willing and able to speak at the drop of a hat on tax reform. If this bill of over 700 pages, which certainly will help the pulp and paper industry even if it does not help the average Canadian taxpayer, were tax reform in the full sense of the word, then I think we would likely have moved on with second reading and voted on the very stirring amendment advanced by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and allowed by His Honour, which pinpoints in a general way some of the ills which are besetting this country and where tax changes should be directed to help a very stagnant and stuttering economy.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, while this bill has the complexity of the Medes and Persians in all their doctrines of ages ago, it is not tax reform. Indeed, it will just create a tax jungle, and from tax jungles you do not get tax justice. From a tax jungle you will not have tax reform.

It is for that reason and a multitude of others, Mr. Speaker, that I have the privilege to stand in my place tonight, where I hope to stand other nights and other days as we go through these 700-odd pages, to try to impress upon the government the error of their ways so that this country in time may have legitimate tax reform that conforms more to the principle, so-called, of a just society than within a tax jungle which will make a jest of the just society. It is for that reason, in a very general way, that I stand here tonight.

In opening, some of my remarks will be of a general philosophical nature. I have followed with interest all the task forces and commissions, the Carter report and reports of the Commons committee and the Senate committee that delved into this very detailed subject. Mr. Speaker, this mytosis developed over nine years ago, before I came to this chamber but it may be going on when I leave—who knows in this day and age of political mortality?

Mr. Mahoney: Yes, indeed.

Mr. Nowlan: I will put my political mortality against that of the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) any day of the week, and I certainly have no hesitation in putting my political mortality as far as this tax bill is concerned against the member for Calgary South any day of the year.

I should like to go back in a serious way to this general point, which has surprised me. Every conceivable suggestion for reform has been made. Different schemes have been advanced, proposals have been considered, we have had the white paper and now the tax bill. There is only one group of people who will benefit from this bill, and they are the professionals, be they the professional tax lawyer or professional tax accountant. I do not think even they welcome it, though, because they are still pretty confused about what it means.

In all this gestation period no one has mentioned something that I have wondered about. When I mention it I know there will be catcalls from the other side. I say we are going back to the dark ages. I submit that if tax reform is going to be so complex that the average taxpayer will be left so far out in the field and lost in the tax jungle that he cannot fill out his income tax return, we have to be more fundamental than Mr. Carter was in his tax report. I suggest that instead of a tax bill that has so many exemptions, exceptions and rules and regulations as to make it almost beyond comprehension, we will have to start at square one.

We will have to watch and question why it is not possible in this day and age of advanced social concern, when we have plans and programs to help and protect the individual in health, in welfare and areas of government involvement which were not even considered when income tax was introduced during the First World War, to go back to square one as far as income tax is concerned. I predict that before I am dead and gone some type of straight line tax policy will be adopted by some government, rather than a progressive income tax with all the exemptions, exceptions and bewilderment that this document contains.

An hon. Member: Not likely.

Mr. Nowlan: Some one says "Not likely," and at first blush some obviously could say it is not. By straight line tax rates I mean some flat percentage across the board, without exemptions, without exceptions, without deductions, without expenses that can be fiddled with. It is not so unreasonable, Mr. Speaker, because where government has involved itself so necessarily in the affairs of the individual in order to provide the basics I think we should be able to look anew at this whole question of tax reform.

In other days when someone suggested a flat rate or straight line tax rate it was regarded as heresy because at that time it obviously benefited the rich and did not help those without financial means. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has shied away from government support programs and an integrated income incentive program. He is as scared of that as a colt is with a kitten. Where government has necessarily and legitimately involved itself in health plans, welfare plans and pension plans, providing the basics with a proper income incentive plan or a negative income tax plan to provide a base level for an individual, we should look at the other side of the scale. Instead of getting a tax bill that will only benefit those who can employ a professional tax man or a corporation that can set up a tax plan to avoid income tax to work around almost any tax plan, we should start at square one when trying to review our tax system.

In the area of capital gains, I wonder why there cannot be discrimination in favour of Canadians so that there is no capital gains tax for Canadians investing in Canada, rather than the cumbersome, complicated and wholly inadequate means set out in this bill.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—TRANSMISSION TO UNITED STATES SECRETARY OF STATE OF THIRD REPORT OF ENVIRONMENTAL POLLUTION COMMITTEE AND CONCURRENCE OF HOUSE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on June 23 I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), following representations by myself and others, if he would communicate to the Secretary of State of the United States the report of the Committee on Environmental Pollution, a special committee of this House unanimously approved by this chamber, and if, in reference to the proposed trans-Alaskan pipeline with all its hazards for Canada the Secretary of State for External Affairs would present to the United States government this powerful indication that someone in Canada cared about the matter and that the people's representatives herein assembled supported them in their views. It was a very serious question.

• (10:00 p.m.)

We live in an age where there is some concern, thank God, about the exploitation of our environment by those of us who enjoy it and live upon it; but as is often the case, the people were and are more sensitive on this matter than their government and the legislative body, more alert than the power-loving executive of this nation. The report of the Special Committee on Environmental Pollution, a document of first-class importance and vital significance, commanded very little respect on the part of the government of this country, with the minister cleverly and evasively refusing to reveal to the House and to me that he thought it of such significant import that he would communicate its contents to the government of the United States on a question of crushing importance to this country.

The minister gave me a most evasive answer and, indeed, it would be a clever one if obfuscation is to be regarded as a prime virtue; but his answer was surely not a helpful or meaningful reply to a very serious question, one which can have profound dangerous implications for Canadian citizens in our time and in ages yet to come. I thought for a moment that the minister and the government might have thrown off the cloak of omniscience and recognized that the members of this House might have, through their special committee which was very ably led, come up with something that would have strengthened the hands of the government as they discussed this very important matter with the government of the United States.

I thought they might have realized that there was value and strength in this approach and that their representations might have been powerfully backed had they indicated to Washington that the point of view that Canada apparently heretofore had tentatively presented was backed by the representatives of the Canadian people in this chamber.

All too often, I fear, those now in power in this land forget the principles of representative government and that the people in this chamber collectively represent all the people of Canada. When that truth is lost, the underpining of parliamentary democracy has been forsaken. What troubles me now and what troubled me on June 23 was whether the government really tried, really exerted and asserted itself to build a case. I wonder if they vigorously compiled and presented powerful arguments against the dangers of the trans-Alaskan route.

I have become deeply disturbed by the timidity and tepidity of the representations that this country makes to other countries on matters affecting in a vital way the interests of Canadian citizens. The other day I heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) say in reference to a matter, "I do not think I will make special representations. They know what we think." Do they really? Should a head of government not assert to another head of government matters of this importance? Very often we hear that the French know what we think about arms, the Americans know what we think about Amchitka and the Skagit Valley...but is there no place where the Canadian government presents its case clearly?

I fear that in this pusillanimous correctitude, which is no substitute for vigorous, impressive statesmanship that the government might provide, the land might benefit if from time to time they would drop the cloak of omniscience and look at this chamber and the committees of this House for some help and guidance.

In times past, they who represented this country in the councils of the world found the courage to speak boldly and were able to assert themselves without obfuscation. Macdonald did it; Borden did it. I should like to think that in this twentieth century we could produce someone who would do it as well as a special committee did.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose it would make any difference to the colourfully expressed views of the hon. member had he chosen to check his facts between June 23 and today. He would no doubt be interested to learn that the report to which he has referred was transmitted to the Secretary of State of the United States by the Canadian government late last June with the advice that the House had unanimously concurred in the committee's recommendations.

AGRICULTURE—PRAIRIE PROVINCES—ACTION TO IMPROVE NET FARM INCOME

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, on May 7, I directed a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) arising out of statistics issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics in May concerning net farm income. When I first saw those statistics I noted that net farm income in Canada had fallen drastically between 1968 and 1970, particularly in my province of Saskatchewan. Net farm income there had fallen from about $462 million to $202 million in a two-year period. This represents a decline of 56.2 per cent.

In these circumstances, and because of my knowledge of the hardships faced by western farmers, I asked the Prime Minister the following question:

> In view of the fact that farm income in Saskatchewan has dropped by 56 per cent over two years and in view of the fact that the bills now before the House will do little to alter that situation, is the Prime Minister contemplating any emergency action to try to improve the farm income picture in western Canada?

I would point out again that this decline of 56 per cent represents net income, what the farmer gets as his take-home pay. This alone must indicate to all of us that there is something really wrong with the western economy and that real hardship is facing the farmer. After all, if our income as Members of Parliament, or as private citizens in whatever capacity were to drop by 56 per cent, I believe we would all recognize we were faced with a real emergency. This is the situation of the western farmer. This is why I asked my question and this is why I want to say a few words about the subject tonight.

The parliamentary secretary may get up and say, "Well, we have a stabilization bill before the House and there is $100 million for farmers in that bill." The bill was first introduced in the House on October 29 of last year. The farmers of western Canada want the $100 million. All political parties realize this. On June 8 of this year my hon. friend from York South (Mr. Lewis), on behalf of our party, introduced a bill designed to divide the stabilization bill into two parts and enable the $100 million to be sent out unconditionally to the farmers of western Canada.

On many occasions we and other members of the Conservative party have asked the government to divide the bill in such a way that farmers could have $100 million in cash, because the money is needed immediately. Many other things are needed right now to salvage the family farm in western Canada. Action cannot be put off indefinitely because the longer it is delayed, the fewer farmers will be remaining on the land. In Saskatchewan last year more than 30,000 left the province, most of them as a direct result of the slump in the agriculture industry.

• (10:10 p.m.)

We need to take many steps if we are to save the family farm. We need a two-price system for grain, for example, which will give the farmer a certain price for wheat that is sold domestically and another price for wheat sold internationally. We must do something about the high cost of farm machinery, about implementing many of the recommendations made by the Barber commission on the high cost of farm machinery. Most of all, as a Parliament we must try to convince the government that they must listen to farmers and farm organizations. This they have not done in the past. It is about time democracy was made more meaningful and the government listened to the farmers, instead of having an election every four years and forgetting about them in the interval.

The National Farmers Union, the Federation of Agriculture, the wheat pools and other organizations are unanimous with regard to many recommendations that have been made to the government. One thing they all call for is emergency action, and this call has been made for the last year or two. Let us not put this action off any longer. They need the $100 million and they need it now, so why does the government not listen to them?

The farm unions also want us to debate the stabilization plan because many of the provisions contained therein are not what the farmers want. Why does the government not listen to the farmers for a change, instead of dictating to them? These are some of the steps we shall have to take to stimulate and encourage a way of life that is a very meaningful one, the rural way of life. But instead of this we have hassles about the government withholding payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act which should be made to the Wheat Board for storage. These payments should be made. The farmers should be helped, not hindered.

I anticipate that the parliamentary secretary will stand up and talk about the stabilization bill and say that we are holding it up. I would remind the House once again that we have moved to separate this bill. All members on this side of the House want the bill separated so that the $100 million can be paid out. When the parliamentary secretary rises, I hope he will have something constructive to say. If not, then I am afraid that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) will be afraid to participate in the Assiniboia by-election that will be held on November 8, because at that time the farmers will have a chance to pass judgment on the government's agricultural policies.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), I would first like to pick up one of his remarks to the effect that I would probably blame the opposition for the bad situation because they are the ones who prevented Bill C-244 from being passed. Well, I am afraid I will disappoint him a little for I had no intention whatsoever to deal with the legislative steps.

The hon. member pointed out, very eloquently I must admit, the difficult situation of agriculture in the Prairies, and particularly in his own province of Saskatchewan which was more affected than the two others by losses in grain sales over the last three years.

I should like to point out that he is asking the Prime Minister to make a statement on a new policy the government could propose with a view to solving the problem. It must be recognized that the government has made numerous efforts to that effect in the last few years and that, if the problem has not been solved to the satisfaction of the hon. member and western farmers, it certainly is not that the government has remained idle. After all, it must be agreed that we are dependent of international factors which are beyond our control for all practical purposes and the government must act under such circumstances.

Now last year was excellent, since our sales reached a record figure. Indeed, according to the data obtained up to now, we have sold this year over 600 million bushels of various kinds of grain. We recognize that even if this is a record in the history of grain sales in Canada—those are only exports—the prices were not as high as expected and the amount paid will probably be equivalent to that of the best previous year. But to that, one must add the sales made in Canada, and the prices paid last year were necessarily higher than those of the previous year. The serious problem is that the farmers, having gone into debt during the two preceding years, having even received advances for the crops they reaped and stored, and obviously having paid part of this debt, surely do not have the cash they would like to have.

However, some legislation is now being prepared. The hon. member mentioned an act on price stabilization. Certain other legislative proposals are being drafted and I feel that, within a few months, the economic situation of the western provinces will have improved. It will come back to the level it had reached some three years ago, when there had not yet been any reduction in prices.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:17 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, September 14, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. WHELAN—INACCURATE VANCOUVER "SUN" REPORT ON REFUSAL OF CONSENT FOR MOTION RESPECTING PROPOSED AMCHITKA NUCLEAR BLAST

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Essex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on a question of privilege that I believe affects every member of the House. My point of privilege has arisen because of a newspaper report that appeared in the Vancouver Sun datelined Friday, September 10, 1971 and attributed to the Sun's Ottawa bureau.

This report is one based on pure conjecture, perhaps mental telepathy, I suspect a bit of pure political partisanship and just plain poor reporting which may have been contributed to by hearing difficulties. The effect of the report reflects adversely on all members of the House and on me in particular. It has also given Sun readers a false version of what took place in the House.

This report states that I am in favour of the United States government setting off the atomic blast scheduled for Amchitka.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Whelan: It also claims that I was the only member who said "No" to the motion proposed by the member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) that this blast be condemned. Hansard for September 10, page 7701, shows this statement to be false. According to Hansard, at that page these words are recorded:

Some hon. Members: Nay.

This is a clear indication that other members were opposed to what was proposed.

The Sun report also states that I did not recognize that the words used by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West in his motion were those of the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) for Canada. This is the very reason, Mr. Speaker, that I said no. I did recognize that the hon. member for Fraser Valley West was plagiarizing the minister's brilliant speech for his own cheap political purposes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that perhaps very soon another member will have a question of privilege. The hon. member knows that he cannot impute motives. Certainly he has no right to make the statement he has just made. I suggest to him that unless there is something more than what he has presented to the House up to this point he has no question of privilege I would invite the hon. member to conclude his remarks as quickly as possible.

Mr. Whelan: Your Honour knows that I do not bother you very much in the House, but I will withdraw the word "cheap". I read the minister's speech, I watched him on television, and I told him personally that I agreed 100 per cent with his stand.

I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, to protect ordinary members of the House from this type of cheap journalistic tactic that attributes to one member something that the record of the House does not substantiate. The record shows that more than one member said "Nay". This report has given false information to the good people of British Columbia, some of whom believe the story in the Sun and think that I am in favour of this horrible blast. The record shows that a number of members said no to the tactic of trying to get credit for something which the capable Minister of the Environment and the government have already put on the record.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt that hon. members would want this matter to be pursued further.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

GRAIN

TABLING OF CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD PRESS RELEASE ON SALE OF WHEAT TO PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I wish to table copies in both official languages of a Canadian Wheat Board press release on the recent sale of Canadian wheat to the People's Republic of China.

* * *

• (2:10 p.m.)

LABOUR CONDITIONS

POTENTIAL LOSS OF JOBS IN AUTOMOTIVE AND FARM IMPLEMENT INDUSTRIES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O.43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 which states that in cases of urgent and pressing necessity a motion may be moved if unanimous consent is given. The matter of urgent and pressing necessity is the potential loss of jobs to thousands of Canadians employed in the automotive and farm implement industries. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn), the following motion:

In order to clear up the present uncertainty concerning the maintenance of the employment safeguards in the Canada-U.S.

Automotive Agreement, this uncertainty having arisen because of the repeated refusal of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to give the House the necessary assurances, and because of the Prime Minister's reference yesterday to the possibility of the safeguards being negotiable, and because of yesterday's recommendation by a presidential commission that the American government continue to press for the removal of the safeguards, this House resolves that such safeguards be maintained.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, the motion cannot be put without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent, therefore the motion cannot be put.

[English]

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

INCOME TAX

AMENDMENT OF BILL TO PROVIDE SAME STANDARD OF FAMILY NEED AS IN PROPOSED FAMILY INCOME SECURITY PLAN

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the FISP bill introduced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare yesterday uses a substantially different standard of family need in relation to allowances for dependent children than does the tax reform bill introduced by the Minister of Finance, is the government proposing to introduce amendments to the tax legislation in order that the standard in respect of family needs in the two bills will be consistent?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

* * *

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY

PUBLICATION OF GOVERNMENT PLAN TO FIGHT POVERTY TO FACILITATE CONSIDERATION OF BILL—QUEBEC PROPOSAL CONCERNING PAYMENT LEVELS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): In the statement released yesterday by the Minister of National Health and Welfare reference was made to the FISP bill as part of the fight against poverty. Will the Prime Minister tell the House when such a co-ordinated government plan to fight poverty will be made public in order to facilitate rational consideration of the bill introduced by the minister yesterday?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the over-all approach was spelled out by the minister almost a year ago in his white paper, and the details of it are coming out as evidenced now in the FISP legislation and earlier in the increase in the guaranteed income supplement.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Mr. Stanfield: I was wondering whether that was what the minister had in mind. In view of the proposal the Prime Minister is reported to have received from the Prime Minister of Quebec to the effect that subject to conforming to certain national standards the provinces should be allowed to determine the levels of family allowance to be paid by the government of Canada within the respective provinces, is the government considering this proposal and does it intend to confer with all the provinces on this matter before we proceed with second reading of the FISP bill?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the House will recall that when the Minister of National Health and Welfare was preparing the FISP bill he had discussions with all the provinces during a long period last winter and spring. Indeed, our proposals at the Victoria conference followed very shortly a meeting by the minister with his opposite numbers in the provinces and indicated that the federal government was prepared to spend an extra $150 million in an attempt to meet some of the improvements suggested by the various provinces. We feel we have done a great deal to meet provincial suggestions.

This letter from the premier of Quebec arrived a little more than a week ago and contains an interesting proposal, but it was not received in time for us to readjust our bill, examine the proposal in detail or consult, as the hon. member suggests, with other provinces which might be interested. For the time being, all I can say is we are glad Premier Bourassa is in this case at least spelling out in a little more detail what kind of co-operation he thinks is needed to perhaps obtain a constitutional agreement. So we are prepared to discuss this administrative arrangement with him, and until that has been done I cannot report to the House concerning whether or not we will accept it or whether or not we will discuss it with other provinces. It is an interesting proposal and we are looking at it.

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

Is the government considering the possibility of making the necessary amendments to meet the requirements of the Quebec government?

Mr. Trudeau: I think, Mr. Speaker, that I tried to answer that question when it was asked by the Leader of the Opposition, but I can repeat to the hon. member that the Quebec premier, when rejecting the Victoria agreement, had stated that he was doing so because he would like to elucidate the interpretation of the clauses under consideration concerning the constitution and social security. If his proposal is an indication that he would like to elucidate those clauses, we would be quite pleased and I repeat that we would be ready to discuss with him the possibility of amending our legislation in order to attain the proposed goals.

[English]

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LETTER FROM PREMIER BOURASSA CONCERNING DETERMINATION OF PAYMENT LEVELS BY PROVINCE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister if he would consider tabling the letter that this government received from Premier Bourassa, assuming of course that Premier Bourassa is willing for this to be done?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have no objection at all. I will communicate with Mr. Bourassa's office and if he is in agreement we will table the letter. He may by then have made it public himself, but I will certainly follow up that suggestion.

* * *

SOCIAL SECURITY

PROVISION OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE FOR SELF-EMPLOYED AND AUTOMATIC COST OF LIVING ESCALATOR IN FEDERAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): In view of the fact that the government seems to be moving into the area of humanitarianism, as leaked by the Prime Minister the other day, is the government now going to bring in legislation to provide unemployment insurance for the self-employed and to provide for automatic cost of living escalators in federal social security programs?

* * *

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT IN LIGHT OF UNITED STATES ECONOMIC MEASURES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): In view of the concern that has been registered by people in Canada, particularly with regard to the United States DISC program and the 10 per cent surcharge, is the Prime Minister going to make a realistic statement concerning the state of the economy with special emphasis on the target for employment this year?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will consider that very helpful suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

* * *

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

PRESENTATION OF AMENDMENTS THIS SESSION IN LIGHT OF COMMITTEE REPORT

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the government House leader. In view of the fact that the report of the Special Committee on Election Expenses was tabled in the House on June 4, is legislation now being prepared by the government to amend sections 62 and 63 of the Canada Elections Act and is the government going to bring in new legislation pertaining to election expenses this session?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would like to give some consideration to the question.

Mr. Benjamin: In view of the fact that the Prime Minister is on the record as favouring control of election expenses, limitation of election expenses and reimbursement for election expenses from the federal treasury, would he give the assurance that legislation will be brought before the House to complete the amendment of the Canada Elections Act in time for and prior to the next federal election?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): When the House leader is giving consideration to that question I will join him, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the House leader. Would he consult with the other House leaders to see whether arrangements could be made to shorten the period of debate so that this important legislation on election expenses might be passed before the next election takes place?

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's supplementary question is in the form of a suggestion to the minister.

* * *

FINANCE

PROPOSED INCREASE IN VALUE OF GOLD TO FORCE DEVALUATION OF U.S. DOLLAR—CANADIAN POSITION AT GROUP OF TEN MEETING

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is to the Prime Minister. In light of the announcement today by the Common Market countries that they propose to increase the value of gold in an attempt to force a devaluation of the United States dollar, would the Prime Minister advise the House whether any instructions have been given to the Minister of Finance to act as a mediator between the two contending parties? Also, what is the attitude of Canada at this meeting of the Group to Ten that is to take place tomorrow in regard to this whole monetary question?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am sure the Minister of Finance will attempt to report to the House on the point of view that he took when he returns from Europe next week.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Is the Prime Minister giving us to understand that the Minister of Finance has a free hand, that he can solo in this effort, or has he received any instructions from the government as to Canada's attitude in regard to the effect on the Canadian currency of a forced devaluation of the U.S. dollar?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member will have to wait and see, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question to that of the hon. member for Edmonton West with regard to instructions to the Minister of Finance respecting the position that Canada will take before the Group of Ten and the International Monetary Fund. Is the Prime Minister not prepared to recognize that this is a matter of importance and concern to all the people of Canada, and would he not consider it appropriate that the people of Canada should have some opportunity to express an opinion about the stand to which the responsible minister may commit this country at those meetings?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we hope very much that the people of this country, and particularly the opposition, will take a stand.

Mr. Stanfield: That is not an answer to my question, Mr. Speaker. I asked the Prime Minister a perfectly straightforward and polite question, if I may say so. Is it not in the public interest, in the Prime Minister's opinion, that the people of this country should know in advance and have an opportunity to express an opinion in advance with respect to the position to which the government proposes to commit this country with regard to international exchange rates and the whole international exchange system?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is a very serious nor constructive proposal unless the Leader of the Opposition is suggesting that we debate in advance the whole range of positions which will be taken by the various members of the Group of Ten and all the different hypotheses which would lead our Minister of Finance to give different answers. I think the suggestion is completely unrealistic; it is not possible for the Minister of Finance to state before leaving exactly what he will do and to have the opposition debate it and have the country give its opinion on it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Is it the view of the Prime Minister that the government knows best and that the rest of us have to be stuck with whatever it commits us to?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that we are getting into a debate at this point. I gather there are a number of members seeking the floor for the purpose of asking supplementaries. We might have two or three supplementaries and then go on to the next subject.

MAINTENANCE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR BELOW PAR WITH UNITED STATES DOLLAR

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. As the government earlier committed itself to a Canadian dollar that was neither unrealistically high nor unrealistically low, is the government now prepared to take whatever steps are necessary to keep our dollar below par with the United States dollar?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not admit the premises of the question, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

MAINTENANCE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR BELOW PAR WITH UNITED STATES DOLLAR—REPRESENTATIONS BY MINISTER TO GROUP OF TEN

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister was kind enough to admit that this is a matter of concern to all Canadians, and since he is not going to inform us of the detailed plans, objectives and strategy of the Minister of Finance, can he tell the House in a general way whether the Minister of Finance has the objective of maintaining the Canadian dollar under the United States dollar and whether he will be trying to enlist the support of the European Economic Community and the Group of Ten in this regard before the International Monetary Fund meeting?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe that not so many days ago the Minister of Finance himself said in the House that if he had the choice he would like to see the Canadian dollar rate lower rather than higher but that he may not be able to control all the monetary forces at work. He has stated his position which is that of the government.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—SUGGESTED PERSONAL APPROACH BY PRIME MINISTER TO PRESIDENT NIXON

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, in view of reports that President Nixon is reconsidering the possibility of a nuclear test at Amchitka, against which the Canadian government has expressed itself on many occasions, and in view of suggestions in Washington that a further representation by Canada may have an important influence in President Nixon's consideration of the matter, would the Prime Minister make a personal approach to the President of the United States asking him to cancel the blast which is scheduled for some time next month?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I attempted to answer this question last week. I said I would not rule out that possibility. If I felt it was necessary to do so I would take my cap in hand—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —and go to the President of the United States.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I would hope that this time the Prime Minister would leave his cap at home. One can make a trip to Washington, or a telephone call, without cap in hand.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, hon. members opposite should have learned by now that shouting will not get them anywhere.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly ask his question.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. In light of the answer given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on September 9 to the effect that his department has not yet definitely decided whether further representations should be made, in view of further reports from Washington which no doubt have been drawn to his attention, and in view of the fact that time is of the essence since the blast is scheduled for some time next month, could the Prime Minister not assure the House today that he will make such further representations personally to the President of the United States?

Mr. Trudeau: The answer is the same, Mr. Speaker. I dealt with this before. The hon. member is quite right in congratulating the government for having made representations at various times to the United States government on this matter. I do not know to what reports from Washington the hon. member is referring. If he can tell me what he is alluding to, and if it gives me additional cause to want to speak to the President, I will certainly consider that very seriously.

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. As the Soviet Union is much closer to Amchitka, the site of the intended undergrounded nuclear blast, has any objection been made by the Soviet Union to this test?

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Since there are a number of very important issues involving Canada and the United States where direct consultation between the Prime Minister and the President might produce constructive results, could the Prime Minister inform the House whether it is pride, prejudice or policy that prevents him from undertaking the 350-mile trip to Washington after his travels round the world—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This exchange has not produced very much up to now. I wonder whether there should be further supplementaries. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate on a further supplementary question and then we will go to another subject.

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister just threatened that he would at least consider making representations to the President of the United States. I wonder whether he could assure the House that, in order to avoid any possibility of such a blast, he will not make personal representations to the President of the United States?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We will attempt to go to another subject. The hon. member for Vancouver East.

* * *

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PUBLICATION OF DETAILS OF WINTER WORKS PROGRAM

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): In the absence of the Minister of National Defence, who I understand is in the United Kingdom, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In order to set speculation at rest, will the Prime Minister tell the House when it is intended to make public the policy and details of the government's plan to proceed with a winter works program by the Department of National Defence of a similar nature to the summer employment project?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not heard of any such plan so I cannot tell when it is intended to make it public.

* * *

GRAIN

WITHHOLDING BY GOVERNMENT OF PAYMENTS UNDER TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES ACT

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In light of the fact that the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act was not repealed by Parliament prior to July 31, 1971, and as the Canadian Wheat Board, in the normal manner, has presented numerous invoices to the Canadian government for payment under the provisions of that act, can the Prime Minister advise the House why these payments have not been made?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question appears in Hansard in answer to written questions.

Mr. Mazankowski: Is it the view of the Prime Minister that the government is within the confines of the law in refusing to observe its obligations under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will realize that he is asking a member of the government to express a legal opinion. In those terms the question is not in order.

* * *

AUDITOR GENERAL

ESTABLISHMENT OF SALARY BENCHMARK FOR OFFICE EMPLOYEES

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): I should like to direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board. Before doing so, however, I should think members of the House would like to join me in extending congratulations and best wishes to our Auditor General who has just been elected president of the Eighth International Congress of Supreme Audit Institutions of the World. Can the President of the Treasury Board advise the House what progress has been made toward establishing a benchmark for the employees of the Auditor General's office?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think there is continuing discussion, and a report has been made to the Public Accounts Committee of which the hon. member is chairman. So far all we have succeeded in doing is making arrangements for increasing the salary of the Auditor General himself.

* * *

INCOME TAX

OPPOSITION OF CO-OPERATIVES TO PROVISIONS OF BILL—SUGGESTED MEETING OF PRIME MINISTER AND REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): My question is for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In light of the information that leaders of the co-operative movement in Canada at their recent meeting with the Minister of Finance voiced strong opposition to Bill C-259 as it will affect co-operatives and in view of the fact that they apparently did not meet with too much success, would the Prime Minister be prepared to meet with representatives of the Co-operative Union of Canada and Le Conseil Canadien de la Co-opération to discuss the matter further?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I would first have to seek a report on the meeting from the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Muir: I wonder whether the right hon. gentleman is really aware of the disastrous effects that the passage of the bill as it now reads will have on co-operatives and their future activities in this country?

* * *

PENITENTIARIES

MILLHAVEN—PROVISION OF RECREATIONAL AND WORK OPPORTUNITIES

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. In light of the situation at Millhaven where there is a virtual lack of recreational opportunities and work opportunities in the shop structure, would the minister look into the situation to see whether the frustration and anger developing among inmates because of these deficiencies can be dealt with?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity of visiting Millhaven this summer and while I noted that certain improvements were required, the institution in general is starting to operate in fairly normal fashion. We hope that the institution will be completely back to normal in the near future.

[English]

MILLHAVEN—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DIRECTIVE CONCERNING INMATE CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): May I pose a supplementary question to the Solicitor General. Would he be prepared to table in the House so that everyone can see it the directive issued to inmates of Millhaven with respect to inmate correspondence, which seems to countervail what the minister said earlier about correspondence by inmates?

[Mr. Drury.]

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): I certainly do not accept this allegation, Mr. Speaker, but I will inquire and should the instructions not be in accordance with the directive given, we will certainly have the situation corrected.

* * *

[English]

NATIONAL PARKS

EFFECT OF AGREEMENT WITH BRITISH GOVERNMENT FOR USE OF SUFFIELD MILITARY BASE ON PLANS FOR PARK

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Norhtern Development. It arises from the long-term agreement between the government of Canada and the British government with respect to the use of the Suffield military base in Alberta for the purpose of training British troops. Does this mean that the government of Canada and particularly the minister's department have abandoned the long-term plans for the use of this area along with a similar area across the border in Saskatchewan as a typical prairie grassland national park?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of this particular problem. I shall inquire and report to the House tomorrow.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: While the minister is investigating this matter, in view of the area's ecological importance and fame as the land "where the deer and the antelope play" would he consider the possibility of using the large area available at the Shilo Canadian Armed Forces Base?

* * *

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

KILLING OF CHIEF ED BIRD IN NORTHWEST TERRITORIES BY MEMBER OF FORCE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a question for the Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister what action the government has taken or will be taking with respect to the killing of Chief Ed Bird in the Northwest Territories by a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in my view, that question should be directed to the Solicitor General who, in the circumstances, is the responsible minister. However, I believe the coroner's inquest is underway, and I feel that it would not be advisable for me to comment on the matter at this time.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: In view of the fact that the inquest has been completed, is it the intention of the government to institute any further inquiry, particularly with respect to the involvement of a member of the RCMP coming under the minister's jurisdiction, in connection with this tragedy? Second, will it be the intention of the minister to table the report of the investigating officer of the RCMP so that members of the House may be informed of the full circumstances of this killing?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I feel that the report of the coroner, who is essentially responsible for the inquiry, must first be studied.

* * *

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ADVERTISEMENT PROMOTING NEW PLAN—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF TRUTH OF STATEMENTS AND REASON FOR EXPENDITURE

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question covers two departments, those of the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs; therefore I shall address my question to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister undertake to examine an advertisement for which the Canadian taxpayers' money is being used in which the government advertises the new unemployment insurance plan in these words: "Unemployment Insurance Benefits Went Up, Beginning June 27. And That Was Just The Beginning. It's The Start of Something Big. The Full Story Is In Our 'Guide To The New Unemployment Insurance—Information For Employees'." Will the Prime Minister investigate the truth of this advertisement and the reason why the Canadian taxpayers' dollars are being used for this nonsense when the effort of the government should be directed toward creating employment, not increasing unemployment?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

* * *

INCOME TAX

LACK OF BASIC EXEMPTION FOR WIFE WHO SUPPORTS HUSBAND

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): My question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact that the income tax department permits a man to claim a $2,000 exemption for his wife on the basis of his statement that they live together while it refuses to allow a wife a similar claim in respect of her husband, does the department propose to move to wipe out this flagrant example of discrimination against the female sex?

• (2:40 p.m.)

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to look into the hon. lady's question, but at first glance it appears to be a matter of tax policy and that is the responsibility of the Minister of Finance.

Mrs. MacInnis: May I ask the minister to look also into what proof a wife must produce before she can successfully claim a $2,000 exemption for supporting her husband?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the supplementary should be placed on the order paper.

* * *

IMMIGRATION

ILLEGAL ENTRY BY RUSSIAN SAILOR—DISPOSITION OF CASE

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration if it is the intention of his department to grant political asylum to the 20-year old sailor, Serge Kourdakov, who jumped ship at Vancouver? If so, when can the House expect a statement in that connection?

Mr. Speaker: According to my recollection this question was asked yesterday, but perhaps the minister might answer if he has further information.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there is no further information, but I should like to comment on the particular manner of perhaps granting legal status to the Russian sailor concerned. It may not be in the form suggested by the hon. member. As I indicated yesterday, it will not be long before a conclusion is reached.

* * *

STATUS OF WOMEN

REPORT ON REVIEW OF COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS—PRESENTATION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the question asked by my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, but it is addressed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. I understood he was committed to the important task of reviewing the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women and their various proposals. Is he prepared to report to the House on the results of his review and to tell us what legislation, if any, is proposed to implement the report?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position yet to give the report the hon. member is seeking simply because some of the working committee reports have yet to come forward and they must be reviewed and consolidated. There is no attempt to delay. We want to get on with it.

* * *

POLLUTION

ST. MAURICE RIVER—LEGAL ACTION AGAINST INTERNATIONAL PAPER COMPANY

Mr. Raymond Rock (Lachine): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. Do officials of his department intend to take any legal action against the International Paper Company for dumping black fluid into the St. Maurice River, thus killing thousands of fish, especially as the Quebec minister in charge of the environment, Victor Goldbloom, stated recently that this is now a federal matter?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we will be holding discussions with the Quebec authorities in connection with this matter.

* * *

FISHERIES

ADMINISTRATIVE RESPONSIBILITY FOR ORGANIZATION OF CONSERVATION CONFERENCE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries—and I should like to point out for the benefit of Hansard that there is still a Minister of Fisheries—if he intends to accept administrative responsibility for the conference on conservation which is being organized by his colleague, the Minister of Transport and if not, why not?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we will accept responsibility for organizing the conference.

Mr. McGrath: May I ask the Minister of Fisheries if the conference will take place in Ottawa, when the conference will take place and who will represent the government?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, invitations have already gone out. We expect the conference to be held in Ottawa within the next two weeks.

* * *

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

LAND USE REGULATIONS—REVIEW BY COMMITTEE OF HOUSE

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Have the proposed Arctic land use regulations been completed and approved by your department?

Mr. Chrétien: Would the hon. member repeat the question, please?

Mr. Harding: Have the proposed Arctic land use regulations been completed and approved by your department?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member no doubt realizes that the question ought to be addressed through the Chair. This having been said, the minister might reply.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the regulations in question were published in the Canada Gazette in July. Those who were interested had six weeks to present a report and make comments. Those six weeks have now expired. We are studying the recommendations, and I trust the regulations will become effective about the middle of October.

[English]

Mr. Harding: Will these regulations be reviewed by the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development before final adoption?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am not a member of the committee. These rules have been published and they are official; if the members of the committee want to consider them, it is their privilege and not mine.

[English]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, will the minister make available to the committee which is now studying these matters the representations that he has received as a result of the publication of the regulations in the Canada Gazette?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not know which of these representations could be forwarded. Some of them have been on a confidential basis. As for those which are of a public nature, I have no objection against making them available to the committee.

* * *

[English]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister about bad dreams which apparently are now in the public domain. May I ask the right hon. gentleman if bad dreams have cabinet collegiality? In other words, is the cabinet permitted to watch the national news television broadcast and, if so, do 90 per cent of the cabinet share the Prime Minister's bad dreams—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Fairweather: —after hearing unemployment statistics?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

* * *

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST THAT COMMITTEES NOT SIT DURING DEBATE ON INCOME TAX BILL IN HOUSE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the government House leader in reference to the business of the House during the income tax debate. Has he given serious consideration to seeing that none of the standing committees of the House sit during the tax debate because of the difficulty and complexity of the bill that is under consideration and which will be considered further in the committee of the whole house?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to ensure that while the committee of the whole is sitting and discussing the tax bill no meetings will be scheduled for standing or special committees. That is the general policy that I hope will be followed. There may have to be an emergency committee meeting, but that is not planned. I hope committees will meet in the mornings and that we will have the rest of the day for the bill.

* * *

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

EFFECT OF POSSIBLE INCREASE IN TOLLS ON FARMERS AND OTHERS—GOVERNMENT DECISION

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Transport but in his absence I should like to direct it to the Prime Minister. In view of the widespread concern in the farming community as well as in other sectors of the economy as to whether St. Lawrence Seaway tolls will be raised, and in view of the several inquiries put to the government in this regard before the summer recess, is the Prime Minister now in a position to advise the House just what the government's decision is in this most important matter and, if not, when can we expect a decision?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport is in Vancouver on government business but he will be in the House for the question period tommorrow.

An hon. Member: Is he organizing a fishing conference?

* * *

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—FULL EMPLOYMENT POLICY SIMILIAR TO THAT OF UNITED STATES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Can he say whether the government now has a full employment policy and indicate whether this policy is active in terms of Canadian potential and not reactive in terms of recent American behaviour, and whether there will be any announcement of the—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the hon. member is asking or restating a question that was asked during the question period earlier today.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if we are to raise questions from day to day on an issue which is of such immense importance to the Canadian people, with half a million unemployed, then certainly we have to continue asking these questions if we are to obtain a reaction from the Prime Minister who refuses to answer them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that it is hardly orderly procedure to ask the same question too often at least during the same question period. I am suggesting to the hon. member that the question was asked earlier in the question period.

Mr. Stanfield: Try it tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we should go on and give another hon. member the opportunity to ask a question.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I am asking my question on the basis of domestically created unemployment. On that basis may I repeat the question. Has the government a full employment policy similar to that which the United States is obviously working toward today, and will that type of policy be announced clearly to the Canadian people at an early date so that we do not get completely sidetracked by the chronic and serious problems created by the recent United States action?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his suggestion.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must ask the hon. member, on behalf of his colleagues in the House, for co-operation. Hon. members have been trying to ask questions from the beginning of the question period. When we are nearing the end of the question period I think we should try to limit supplementaries. At the same time I appreciate the importance of the matter raised by the hon. member. If he will ask his supplementary we will then go to the next question.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I recognize that you must rule regarding supplementaries, but what kind of government do we have or what kind of opposition do we have if we cannot raise further supplementaries?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lundrigan: May I put my point of order?

Mr. Speaker: I ask the hon. member to resume his seat. The hon. member for Regina East.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rises on a question of privilege.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. Lundrigan: Yesterday I sat in my place as a member of the House of Commons for half an hour listening to the hon. member for Winnipeg somewhere or other speaking on a question of privilege directed to one unique point. I am now seeking to rise as a member with the responsibility of presenting the problems of half a million Canadians who are today unemployed. If I cannot be allowed additional supplementaries in an attempt to elicit a sane, sensible response from the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a question of privilege. The hon. member asked a question and a supplementary. He is now seeking to ask a second supplementary. I suggest to him, with respect, that perhaps we should give other members an opportunity to ask questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: As far as the Chair is concerned there are 40 minutes available for oral questions. If hon. members wish to spend the entire period on one subject, that is their responsibility, not mine. I try to be as fair as possible and to give every member a chance to ask his question. That is the only reason I suggested, very honestly and in good faith, to the hon. member that we might go on to another question. I recognize the importance of the matter and the right of hon. members to ask supplementaries, but the rules are clear. Supplementaries are within the competence of the Chair; and when the Chair feels that we have reached a point when other members should be given a chance to ask questions, hon. members should try as far as possible to co-operate and give the Chair an opportunity to move on to another member.

Mr. Lundrigan: In co-operating with Your Honour I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he will make a clear statement tomorrow on motions regarding the plan of action the government has in mind to react to the domestic unemployment situation so that hon. members will not be obliged to take up the time of the House day after day attempting to pursue this serious question involving half a million Canadians today and a million Canadians several months from now? Will the Prime Minister make a statement on motions tomorrow?

Mr. Trudeau: If I had an assurance from all hon. members of the opposition that should I make such a statement they would ask no further questions I would make it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Wouldn't you be happy!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have about reached the end of the question period.

Mr. Lundrigan: If the Prime Minister would show a little co-operation in the House—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Regina East.

Mr. MacInnis: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member for Regina East. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond rises on a question of privilege.

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ADVERTISEMENT PROMOTING NEW PLAN—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF TRUTH OF STATEMENTS AND REASON FOR EXPENDITURE

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege relates to the original question I asked the Prime Minister concerning two departments of government, namely, the Department of Labour and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Inasmuch as the minister responsible for the latter department is present in the House, I will ask him, now, since the Prime Minister will not take the responsibility, why he, as minister of the department concerned, allows false advertising to be carried at the taxpayers' expense with respect to the unemployment situation in this country?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a question of privilege. The hon. member is repeating the question he asked a few minutes ago. Perhaps he did not get the answer he wanted. Nevertheless, the question having been asked, the minister might now be allowed to answer and then I will again attempt to recognize the hon. member for Regina East.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Since he asked this question the first time the hon. member has failed to send me the advertisement about which he complains. If he will do that, I will be happy to examine it.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, further on the question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should recognize that this is not a question of privilege. He asked the minister a question and I allowed the minister to reply. Perhaps there might be communication between the minister and the hon. member so that they could consult on the matter raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond.

Mr. Trudeau: What are you trying to hide?

Mr. MacInnis: On a question of privilege arising from the remarks now being made by the Prime Minister who insists on trying to hide something, I am not going to hide anything.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are certainly not progressing very effectively or efficiently this afternoon. We have already reached the end of the question period. I am somewhat grieved that we have not had a chance to recognize a number of hon. members. I am sure we can remedy this situation tomorrow when, with the consent of the House, perhaps some of those hon. members might be allowed to ask a few of their questions. I doubt whether there is a legitimate question of privilege in the matter raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond.

Mr. MacInnis: Does a question of privilege not arise when a member of the government imputes motives to a member of the opposition? This is exactly what the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has done and what the Prime Minister has just done with his remarks from his seat.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is quite right. It is not in accordance with correct parliamentary practice to impute motives and I have pointed this out already today to hon. members who in my view were doing that. I agree with the hon. member in that respect. Again I will call on the hon. member for Regina East. Perhaps he might ask his question.

* * *

AGRICULTURE

ACTION TO OFFSET IMPACT OF UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX—RESPONSE TO LETTER FROM SASKATCHEWAN WHEAT POOL PRESIDENT

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): My question is very simple and uncontroversial and it is addressed to the Prime Minister. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has received a letter from Mr. E. K. Turner, President of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, asking that further action be taken to assist agriculture in offsetting the impact of the United States import surcharge? Can the Prime Minister tell us what response he has given to that letter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have no memory of receiving such a letter. Had I received it I would have referred it to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board to advise me on a possible answer.

Mr. Burton: May I ask the Prime Minister whether the government has considered any further special measures to bring before Parliament to assist agriculture in offsetting the effects of the situation in which it now finds itself as a result of the United States economic measures?

Mr. Trudeau: The Minister of Agriculture in his speech on Bill C-262 indicated what the government proposes to do.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have to find a new question of privilege because I have already ruled there is no question of privilege before us. The question period has expired, but I recognize that we are going to spend more time on a question of privilege. The hon. member has the floor.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacInnis: My question of privilege arises from the fact that the government has advertised false information regarding the unemployment picture in this country. I would ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, as head of that department, whether it is not his duty to safeguard the interests of the Canadian public and the Canadian taxpayer by preventing money being wrongly spent by the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to all hon. members that that is not a question of privilege. It is a matter of debate between the minister and the hon. member and I think he should not pursue the matter further. I have already called orders of the day. In any event—

Mr. MacInnis: Once more, on a question of privilege, I do not intend to stand here and listen to snide remarks from that minister who is failing to carry out the duties imposed upon him by the government.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the Day.

• (3:00 p.m.)

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Monday, September 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray (for Mr. Benson) that Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequent upon the amendments to that act be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West) (p. 7763).

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it was as long ago as September 7, 1969 that the present government, with a great flourish of trumpets, tabled the white paper on tax reform. It was on November 28, some three weeks later, that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) rose in this House to present the white paper on behalf of the government and to move its reference to the appropriate committee.

The minister said then that the white paper was not binding upon the government and that if anyone had any better suggestions to make those suggestions would be taken into consideration. But it quickly became apparent that the minister did not really believe any basic changes were needed. In fact, it was not even necessary to wait until he had reacted with hurt and astonishment to the first criticisms. In his opening speech, the minister let his mask of neutrality slip when he said, and I quote him:

> We in government believe that the system proposed is a good one. As I said, it is being put forward as a proposal for discussion, to be brought into study whereby it will be accepted by Canadians as being a good tax system.

May I repeat the last phrase "to be brought into study whereby it will be accepted by Canadians as being a good tax system". What that means, if it means anything, is that Canadians would be given the right, as far as the government was then concerned, first to study the white paper and then to adopt it. The government may not have felt bound by the white paper, but it was clear from the outset that the Minister of Finance was, psychologically at least, very much bound up with its proposals. It was his baby and he was not about to give it up.

You may remember, Mr. Speaker, that the minister told us at that time that this was a fight between ordinary Canadians and big business, that it was a crusade, that it was to be a march to victory. It was an advance, however, that was quickly halted, then turned into a retreat and finally a rout. The final act as far as the white paper and its sponsors were concerned took place on June 18 last when the minister, his tail set very firmly between his legs, stood up in this House to present a tax reform package whose closest relationship to the white paper was the fact that it was being introduced by the same man, a man who had grown older and perhaps somewhat wiser in the interval.

That was a sour defeat for this government, but it was at least a partial victory for the people of Canada. It was a defeat for this government at the hands of many people and not at the hands of big business, in spite of the minister's original claims. It was a defeat at the hands of small businessmen. It was a defeat at the hands of ordinary taxpayers who realized that they were to be victimized by hidden tax increases amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars. It was a defeat at the hands of homeowners and those who want to own homes in the future.

On the other hand, it was a partial victory for commonsense. It was a partial victory for the Canadian economy. It was some kind of victory for just about everybody except for the handful of men who temporarily form the government of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: It was a victory, too, for the Conservative opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mahoney: This is the funny part.

Mr. Stanfield: Hon. members opposite do not like that very much, Mr. Speaker. From the very start, we attacked many of the white paper proposals for their absence of humanity and lack of realism. We attacked them for their discouragement of incentive and their assault on investment in Canada by Canadians, and we forced the government to retreat. It was not, of course, just the force of our arguments that did this, strong though they were. We know that the government makes it a point never to listen to the opposition if it can avoid doing so.

Mr. Boulanger: You said that we did.

Mr. Stanfield: I will explain to the hon. member in a moment.

Mr. Ricard: He would not understand it anyway. He has no head for that.

Mr. Stanfield: Then, I will be clear so that even he can understand. This time the government could not help listening to us. No matter how much it grated, this time the government had to listen and to take heed, because what we were saying was being said by others. The attack came from every direction—from both Houses of this Parliament, from business, labour, the farming community, and eventually even from within the caucus of the Liberal party itself.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): What about listening to your own caucus?

Mr. Stanfield: Let me tell the minister who interjected that certainly his own party does not listen to its caucus; that is well known. Certainly, no member knows it better than the hon. member sitting there in the middle row on the other side. But this time it was different; the government had to listen because, behind its own caucus and behind the opposition in Parliament, the government could hear the voters. Ordinarily, perhaps it would not even listen to them, but election time is coming and certainly the government can read the calendar, whatever may be its other deficiencies. This was why the government was forced to retreat. It was not because of big business or secret plotting; it was because the people of Canada rejected, and rejected summarily, the propositions that the government had put forth.

It is an impressive catalogue of retreat: retreat from the tax on the sale of a man's home; retreat from the hidden tax increase that was originally built into these white paper proposals; retreat from the unrealistically high capital gains tax that was proposed; retreat from the ridiculous proposal to tax capital gains on company shares that had not even been realized by the individuals concerned, which would have increased enormously the difficulties Canadians would have faced in retaining control of the Canadian corporations that we still happen to own; and retreat from the attempt to undo what little encouragement had been accorded to the small businessmen of Canada. In short, there was retreat from some of the worst elements that had been present in the original proposals made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance in the white paper of the government.

As I say, it was a victory for the Canadian people who need not now fear that they will be subjected to some of the more ridiculous schemes that were concocted by the present government. But we must remember, Sir, at this time that the victory is still only partial. A battle has been won but not the war. Instead of having our head banged on the hard floor, it feels a lot better when someone puts a pillow under us. But we must not forget that although the changes have been made, they were not made willingly. The government did not want to make these changes, and this is why the opposition in Parliament and the Canadian people generally have to keep a very wary eye to ensure that what the government could not get in through the front door it will not try to introduce through the back door.

• (3:10 p.m.)

I do not pretend, of course, to know the intentions of the government in this matter, but when I look at the present bill the most charitable conclusion I can come to is that perhaps the government itself does not know what it is doing. If many of the white paper proposals were totally unacceptable, we now have a bill before us that is in many respects totally incomprehensible. I suppose for this government this must be considered as some sort of an advance. In fact, most of the retreats made by the present government are advances as far as the Canadian people are concerned. The fact remains that from policies which were unacceptable the government has retreated into confusion. We are faced today on second reading with a jumbled mass of legislation which makes a can of worms look like a disciplined army on manœuvres. It is a piece of legislation that has lost specialized lawyers and economists alike in a mass of regulations from which many can see no exit at all.

We are all familiar with the comments by the tax experts associated with the Canadian Bar in respect of the complicity of this bill. These are serious technical criticisms specialists in the field are making, Mr. Speaker. When we are dealing with technicalities in the field of taxation we must realize that technical problems turn quickly into human problems. If this law is unintelligible to tax experts, how much more frustrating is it going to be for the ordinary taxpayer and especially the professional men and women and small businessmen and women who are already wound up in miles of red tape?

These small enterprises in Canada did make some headway between the white paper and the present bill, but that will not do them much good if businessmen have to keep a chartered accountant or a tax specialist constantly on hand to advise them every time they turn around. That surely is not the kind of tax reform the Canadian people want and it is not the kind of tax reform the Canadian people were promised. They were promised greater simplicity and what the government has produced is simply greater chaos.

That seems to be pretty well the unanimous opinion of everybody outside the government. I note that both Canada's leading business weeklies, the Financial Post and the Financial Times, are now suggesting that the only solution is to delay, if necessary, the practical implementation of this bill. I may say that does not mean the government should delay measures for the immediate tax relief of those on lower incomes. There are other ways to do this than by a bill such as this.

Even if we forget the drafting errors and the complexities, and look beyond them to the substance, it is already clear there are questions which will have to be examined extremely carefully. Of course we are pleased by the almost immediate relief, though it may well be temporary, which will come to Canadians at the bottom end of the income scale. We on this side have been urging such measures for some time and we certainly accept them now.

This bill as put forward is a long-term measure, at least that is what the government says, so we have to look at the long-term effects of it. They are not so favourable to Canadians on lower incomes. The ones who are going to be hit hardest, without any doubt, are the hundreds of thousands of middle and lower income Canadians who, after possibly one or two years of temporary relief, will find themselves in a worse tax hole than ever before.

When we consider the natural and constant growth of cash incomes in Canada as a result of inflation, collective bargaining and promotion on the one hand, and on the other hand the steeply rising rates of taxation once somebody is on the tax rolls under this new bill, it becomes clear that this so-called tax reform is not going to operate to the benefit of any group of Canadians for very long. In the long run this so-called reform package is really a sham. That is what the government will not admit but that is the truth of the matter; the bill is a real sham.

Take a look at the position of small co-operatives and credit unions. They will find themselves denied their former position of encouragement under this proposed legislation. There is a good deal of concern in those organizations about the legislation and we in the opposition are certainly going to take a good look at this aspect of this bill. We must not lightly allow any new law to change the whole nature of the co-operative and credit union movements.

Mr. Muir: What has the minister from Nova Scotia to say about that?

Mr. Stanfield: If it is true, as alleged, that the cumulative effects of this legislation would be to place a discouraging burden on the co-operative and credit union movements, this would certainly be a blow against the whole spirit of co-operatives in this country. The co-operative and credit union movements must not be killed and they must not be crippled by any hastily, ill-conceived measure. We in the opposition intend to make certain this does not happen.

We shall have to take a close look at the question of capital formation and the taxation on capital gains as well. Certainly, the present bill is an improvement over the white paper in this regard, but we want to know what the effects of this proposal will be, for example, on the family farm. We shall certainly reject any attempt by this government to sneak into a tax bill any measures designed to further weaken the position of farmers in this country, because this government has already done far more than its share to destroy the way of life in our farming communities. There comes a time when we have to attempt to call a halt to this process. That time is just about now, if it was not yesterday.

Furthermore, we want to know how the provisions of this bill will affect Canadian ownership of the Canadian economy. This is, of course, a matter of continuing or, indeed, permanent importance, but in the present circumstances when the whole question of the future contribution of United States-owned subsidiaries to the Canadian economy is being raised by the actions of Washington, such as in the proposed DISC measures, this question is especially vital. Let us make no mistake about it. If the DISC program goes through Congress, there will be tremendous pressure upon United States companies operating in this country to concentrate their production in the U.S.A., and we shall be the losers. We should be doing everything reasonable as the Parliament of Canada to encourage Canadians to participate in our own economy, and that is the point of view that we are going to take in looking at the details of this bill. That is the right point of view for us to take and that is the right point of view for this country.

Another serious problem is the relationship between the capital gains tax and the question of duties on estates. This leads us directly into the larger question of relationships between the federal government and the provinces in the field of taxation. It is clear there will have to be a massive re-adjustment in tax laws of the provinces to fit them in with any new federal tax package, this or any other package which may be adopted. Take for example the two great provinces of Quebec and Ontario. They will have to make fundamental amendments to their respective personal and corporate income tax laws if they are to be at all consistent with the proposed legislation we have before us.

• (3:20 p.m.)

The three provinces of Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta are also to be affected in quite a different way by the proposal to tax medicare premiums paid by employers. This again could cause serious disruption, not to mention injustice, to hundreds of thousands of Canadians and hundreds of thousands of taxpayers unless changes are made and made quickly. We want to know how far the discussions and negotiations have gone between this government and the provinces. We want to know if any assurances have been given with regard to uniform legislation and fair taxation. We want to know if we in this country are now in danger of creating a new and even more impossible tax jungle if this or any other bill should become law before January 1 next or indeed at any time in the near future. This is a tremendously important aspect of our discussions. One thing that has not changed from the original concept of the white paper in the present proposal is that the federal government is still doing it alone. It is preoccupied solely with its own needs. It is preoccupied with what the Canadian government itself wants to get from the Canadian taxpayer. I say that is just not good enough. The federal government must take the provinces and the needs of the provinces into consideration. It must consider the men and women who will have to pay the taxes, either to this government or to the provincial governments.

Some hon. Members: Hear. hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Let us not forget one thing. When you come right down to it there is just one fellow paying those taxes whether they be federal, provincial or municipal. There is just one Canadian taxpayer. He is the one who will have to suffer from any tax jungle that exists. He is the one who will have to pay all the costs and suffer all the frustrations if we do not come out of this with a credible and understandable package.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I do not mean just at the federal level. I mean at all tax levels. That is why it is irresponsible for this government to go off on its own and ignore the problems it may have created elsewhere and at other levels of government.

These are just a few of the questions the government will have to answer in the course of this debate. If those answers are not ready and if they are not convincing, then that is another reason for this government to take another look at its timetable because we shall certainly give no assurance that we will expedite measures which after all could cause more difficulty than they would solve. There is one other major question to be considered in this whole matter of timing. That is the matter of priorities. What is this massive and complex bill which is before us going to do to help solve the immediate pressing problems of the Canadian economy and, need I say it again, the problem of mass unemployment the spectre of which is again facing hundreds of thousands of Canadians this coming winter? What does this bill propose for that? I do not have to answer the question because it answers itself—nothing. In fact, the effect will be negative because we will be spending the time on this measure before we have any program adopted for our immediate problems.

This tax bill is important. It is vital that we clear up the uncertainty which has been plaguing the economy for two years or more. But this Parliament in this September of 1971 has another more urgent responsibility. By all indications we are racing into another winter season of massive unemployment. That is a situation we cannot afford to contemplate. One winter like the last one is already too much to have had to bear. A second such winter would be disastrous.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: What is this government going to do to ensure that this does not happen again or to even to try to ensure that it does not happen again? There are not any indications of it doing anything. Inaction we cannot accept. Inaction, Sir, we will not accept. Let this government not use that old line that this measure has to go through immediately to permit lower income Canadians to come off the tax rolls during the next fiscal year.

I have said before that we on this side of the House, speaking for my own party at least, have been ready to co-operate to the fullest extent with any effort made by the government to achieve its goal of providing tax relief to lower income Canadians. I proposed such relief a year ago and repeat the offer today. But I say the government could proceed immediately with such relief through a system of tax credits. I believe all parties on this side of the House have been advocating this. It is a system which would be easy to implement at relatively moderate cost. There is no need at all for these two issues, immediate tax relief for lower income Canadians and a general change in tax procedures, to become confused. If the government really wants to provide help for lower income Canadians it can do so without trying to ram this whole tangled mess of proposals down the throats of the members of this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Let us have no more attempted blackmail on that score. That is something we certainly cannot accept. For that matter, does the government really know what it is doing with its whole anti-poverty program? Yesterday we received from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) some details concerning the family security program. There is evidence that there may be no co-ordination between the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Finance—I do not know. I do not know whether these two ministers are speaking to each other these days. Perhaps they have had a quarrel. But surely, there must be people in their departments who talk to each other occasionally. If they do, however, they certainly are not communicating very effectively. The Minister of National Health and Welfare tells us, for example, that his plan takes into account the fact that it costs more to raise a child when he is 12 years old than when he is younger than that. So, under this measure the government proposes to provide more money for children at that level.

The Minister of Finance, in proposing his deductions for taxpayers, agrees it is more expensive to bring up older children, but does not recognize the difference until the age of 16. Which minister is right? They cannot both be right. They cannot agree on that and they cannot agree either on where the magic line comes between those families which need additional help and which of those do not, on the one hand, and those which should not pay income tax and those who should, on the other. It is pretty clear that logically the group that needs help and the group that does not pay income tax should be the same, but that would be too simple for this government, so we have a Minister of National Health and Welfare telling us that any family with one child and an income of $4,500 or less gets special aid. The same person, however, under the tax law proposed, will be paying income tax on something over $1,000 of his income of $4,500. So, the Minister of Finance is telling us that that fellow not only does not need aid but he can afford to pay taxes, whereas the Minister of National Health and Welfare thinks he needs help. The government giveth, the government taketh away. But both those ministers cannot be right, although certainly the thought crossed my mind that they could possibly both be wrong.

• (3:30 p.m.)

This government is not just confused, it seems to be unconscious.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Beyond that, Sir, we demand that the government do something effective and do something quickly to restore economic and social health to this country. We demand action to create a climate of economic confidence and to prevent the return of mass unemployment that threatens this coming winter. Tax reductions for the lowest income Canadians will help, but they are not enough. Under the present circumstances if we are to make any substantial progress in combating unemployment we must have reductions across the board in income tax rates. In addition to that, we must either have the complete elimination of or at least a very substantial reduction in the federal sales tax on building material.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I think this is obvious. It is all the more urgent since the Minister of Urban Affairs (Mr. Andras) has indicated to the press that his housing program will inevitably be hurt by the diversion of $80 million to help the industries that may be hurt by President Nixon's export surtax, and also the minister fears that people who are trying to borrow money for homes are likely to encounter higher interest rates.

We should now be looking at other possibilities this winter, in conjunction with the provinces, such as the possibility of industry training and retraining support programs for men and women who are now employed to help them upgrade their skills. This, I suppose, is a long-term program, but it could start this winter and it would certainly increase in value over the next few years. We must, as I indicated a minute ago, look at the possibility of maintaining a proper rate of interest in this country. This would provide encouragement for the economy in general. It would help the Minister of Urban Affairs to maintain a housing program which would provide houses at a reasonable cost, and of course it would also help us to withstand a further upward pressure on the Canadian dollar. In other words, it would help both our exports and our internal markets. We must also consider what we can do now in co-operation with all levels of government to get work for Canadians this winter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The hour is late, but there is surely no justification for delaying matters any further. For a start, we must help the citizens of Canada, as well as the provinces, in financing their welfare programs. We have had warnings from the governments of both Ontario and Quebec. They face a time of intense pressure on their welfare systems and it is very clear that those two provinces will not be alone. But we have to go beyond welfare. Welfare is not enough. It is work that is needed. We must get started immediately. I do not care how much pooh-poohing there is across the way, we must get started immediately in conjunction with the provinces on an effective winter works program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The government itself has set a precedent this summer in its Opportunities for Youth program which could well be described as a sort of summer works program. But there are worthwhile things that could be done this winter too, Sir, by this government and this Parliament. We owe something to the unemployed men and women of this country and the ones who will find themselves without jobs in the next few months. That is why I am demanding a winter works program. The government has already delayed too long. I am not looking for perfection; I realize that this is a palliative so far as this winter is concerned, but the government has let the situation become so serious that we have no other choice now.

Mr. Muir: They are callous and do not care.

Mr. Stanfield: Beyond these emergency measures, faced with the trend in the United States, we have to take a very urgent look at our export industry. I agree that our export trade has been hurt by the U.S. surtax. I support the measure brought forward, I support that principle. But I believe other urgent steps have to be taken. The legislation to which we have given second reading last week was, in my view, a hesitant and an inadequate first step which may or may not be effective, but our export trade is basic to the development of our whole economy, not only this year of course but every year, and the Americans have taught us a painful lesson with regard to President Nixon's surtax. They may very well be preparing us for an even more painful lesson in the long term with the export bonus proposals involved in the so-called DISC program. Let us take these lessons to heart and let us consider urgently what we can do for our export industry, what possibilities we have for aiding our export industry. Of course, the basic position is that we have to maintain or achieve a reasonable rate for the Canadian dollar, one that will enable our exporters to compete. But let us also consider what we can do, and indeed what we must do, to give tax encouragement to our export industries, particularly those that are important to Canadians from the point of view of employment.

Whatever other effects they may have, the actions of the United States have shown the hollowness of this government's complacency about Canadian exports. It just is not good enough for this government to preen itself by talking about success in selling raw materials abroad. Much of the secondary manufacturing industry of this country is approaching a crossroads in so far as foreign markets are concerned. I have been urging for a year or more that we formulate long-term policies to enable us to diversify our foreign markets and to embark upon serious programs to increase trade with trading blocs such as the European Common Market. However, I believe that this government has preferred to avoid the hard task of rethinking the options open to Canada and to this government. I say that trade missions, no matter how immediately successful they might be, are no substitute for long-term policies. The success of such missions must surely in the long run depend upon such policies. But that is something this government cannot understand. And now, even when the President of the United States talks about a new era opening in international trade, the significance of that statement has obviously not yet dawned on this government. At least it is not reflected in any action it has taken.

• (3:40 p.m.)

I sat in this House the other night and listened to the Minister of Finance give his usual complacent account of the economic situation. I do not want to be facetious, but I hope the Prime Minister will lend our Minister of Finance to the International Monetary Fund to help them work out their problems. It was the same old complacent record he gave us that we have heard for the last two years—prosperity is just around the corner.

Mr. McGrath: He didn't say what corner.

Mr. Stanfield: I am surprised he did not go back even beyond Herbert Hoover and promise us a chicken in every pot. It is now pretty clear that the government has no intention of giving us any real projections for the coming months. I and my colleagues have been pressing for that. I guess we have been wasting our time. It is also very clear that the government does not intend to propose a program, either long or short-term, to restore the Canadian economy.

I have to ask, why is this government so stubbornly refusing to tell us its projections? Is it because even before the American moves they did not show that the upturn is just around the corner? Is it because the figures show that the unemployment situation is not going to improve for the balance of this year, as the government has been promising? Is that the reason the government won't release its projections? Or is it simply because the government has no reliable projections and no effective programs? Is the government simply whistling in the dark?

They can whistle if they like, Sir, but that is exactly the way they appear to me, and I think to most of the Canadian people at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Stanfield: The only clue to the government's intentions so far lies in its ineffectual efforts with regard to wicked Washington. Obviously, the idea now is to lay the blame for our current and future problems on the backs of the Americans. I think we are being hurt, and we may be hurt more. I have already said that here, and I have said it outside this House. But this government, no matter how much it squirms, isn't going to be able to slough off its heavy responsibility for our present situation in this country. This government and no other is responsible for the two years of economic stagnation in this country. This government and no other is responsible for the policies that have led to a continuous massive unemployment that as yet shows no signs of substantial and significant decline. On the contrary, it threatens to grow worse in the months ahead. This government and no other is responsible for the uncertainty that has prevailed in this country for a year and a half on the whole vital issue of tax reform.

It is time for this government to share its responsibilities—well, not to share, even though we would be happy to share them . . .

Mr. Trudeau: Would you?

Mr. Stanfield: Yes, we would be happy to share them, but we would have to be satisfied that the government is prepared to take some action first. We don't want to get involved in doing nothing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: It is time for the government finally to move to boost the economy and effectively to combat unemployment. This is the first priority we have as we sit here today and during these weeks. This is the first priority which the legislation now before us does nothing to meet.

May I emphasize two things in closing. First, there are immediate, pressing problems that face us right now, and that will face us in the coming months, for which this bill is quite irrelevant. Regardless of whether or not the government proceeds with this legislation now, it has to act now with regard to these problems, problems that I am sure each member of this House recognizes as being serious and needing attention. It is not just the opposition in this House, Sir; it is not just me, it is not just my colleagues, and it is not just the members down here to my left who are demanding action. It is the people of Canada. It is the Canadian people who are demanding that this government take effective action to attack unemployment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: There is very little if anything in this bill that will help spur the Canadian economy forward. There is nothing positive in this bill to encourage Canadians to invest in their own economy. I admit that there is the removal of a disincentive, and I suppose we should be grateful for small mercies, but there is nothing in the bill to help us build up our industries or build up our exports. In short, there is nothing in this bill, or for that matter in the policies of the government in general, to encourage the incentive on which the progress of our Canadian economy and our Canadian society has been based, and will continue to be based, if we are to build in this country for the future.

The whole philosophy of this bill and of this government is to replace individual choice and individual initiative by government fiat. In its attitude towards taxation, just as in its attitude towards the economy, in its attitude towards welfare, and in its attitude towards the unemployed men and women of this country, this government ignores the power of incentive to encourage individual Canadians to work to improve their lot. That is where we part company with this government. Our goal is precisely a society where the role of government is, above all, to maximize the possibility of the free choice of the individuals and the groups that make up our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: It is from this point of view that we shall examine this bill, as we have examined other policies of the government. It is from this point of view that we shall comment upon, and criticize, and fight where necessary. It is from this point of view that we have presented our amendment, its purpose being both to force the government to prepare a better bill and to force the government to face up to the real and urgent economic and human problems that confront us, the members of this House, the members of this government, and the people of this country right now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in the next few minutes I would like to talk to the House about the effects of the bill under consideration, namely Bill C-259 entitled "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that Act."

I read somewhere that this is the biggest bill ever introduced in the House. If it is true about its size it certainly does not apply to its quality or, at least, to its clarity. Considering that this bill covers some 710 pages, I do not think that I can deal with all the amendments to the Income Tax Act.

However, I should like, Mr. Speaker, to speak on behalf of the cooperatives of Richmond riding, to categorically oppose this bill which tends to change the method of computing the capital employed. I suggest that this would assuredly lead to double taxation for cooperative members or affect the capital invested by them in such cooperatives.

Mr. Speaker, I want to read a telegram that I received recently from the Cooperative de Saint-Paul de Chester, a small town in my riding. I quote:

> The Cooperative of Saint-Paul de Chester is taking exception to the decision of the Minister of Finance to maintain the concept of capital employed as a taxation base for cooperatives STOP This concept is contrary to the very principle of the cooperative and it becomes even more unfair by the new provision of section 135 of Bill C-259 which changes the method of computing the capital employed STOP We believe that nowhere else in the world is there another example of this concept of capital employed in any tax system STOP Adoption of this concept will weaken the financial structure of our cooperative and will also decrease possibility granting fair rebates to members STOP Asking for no favours but request that fiscal plan respect structure and operation of cooperatives STOP La Coopérative de St-Paul de Chester is a branch of La Coopérative fédérée de Québec which was represented on the delegation which met the Minister of Finance August 11, 1971 to suggest alternative method of taxation for cooperatives which would not jeopardize the very existence of such institutions STOP Solicit your support with Minister of Finance to obtain amendment of bill presented along lines of recommendations already submitted by cooperatives.
>
> Roger Croteau
> Coopérative de St-Paul de Chester

Mr. Speaker, I have received dozens of telegrams with identical or almost identical wording in my office recently. I want to stress that I entirely endorse these protests.

On August 26 last, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) said to the members of the Law Society of Upper Canada at the York Hotel in Toronto, and I quote:

> The tax reform bill is proof that the government has taken into account the many briefs it has received and the proceedings of two parliamentary committees as well. I think that the majority of our most eager critics were surprised at the way the government met the wishes of Canadian taxpayers. The fact that the Bill contains virtually all the major proposals of the committee of the House is a tangible proof of that. Had it not been so, the publication of the White Paper would have been a meaningless farce.

And he went on:

> As I said in my budget speech, the White Paper process was an important step in the evolution of participatory democracy in Canada. Through the debate and the discussions which took place it has been possible to set up a tax reform plan that not only does take into account the needs of Canada but also reflects the views of the Canadian people.

When I read this bill it does not seem to me that the minister paid much attention to the views he expressed that day at the Royal York Hotel. Neither does it seem to me that the cooperatives have made clear strongly enough their views on this bill.

I have here a copy of the memorandum submitted on November 7, 1969 by The Co-Operative Union of Canada and Le Conseil canadien de la coopération. These two co-operatives represent La Coopérative Fédérée de Québec, the Fédération des Magasins Co-op, Pêcheurs Unis de Québec, the Fédération Co-op Habitat du Québec, the Fédération de Québec des Unions régionales des Caisses Populaires Desjardins, La Fédération des Compagnies d'Assurance Mutuelle contre le feu, La Fédération de Montréal des Caisses Desjardins, La Fédération Régionale des Chantiers Coopératifs de l'Ouest Québécois, the Fédération des Caisses d'Économie du Québec, the Fédération des Coopératives étudiantes du Québec, La Société des Artisans, L'Assurance-Vie Desjardins, La Mutuelle SSQ, Assurances U.C.C., Compagnie mutuelle, La Sauvegarde, compagnie d'assurance sur la vie, La Société d'Assurance des Caisses Populaires, Les Producteurs de Sucre d'Érable du Québec, the Institut Coopératif Desjardins, La Société de Fiducie du Québec, La Sécurité, compagnie d'assurances générales du Canada, and L'Association Coopérative Féminine du Québec.

It is, therefore, obvious that all the members of these companies think the same way and find many inequities in this bill—in its treatment of the capital invested in our cooperatives, in its way of evaluating the capital invested in our co-operatives.

About the brief I mentioned earlier, when we discussed with the representatives of co-operatives we compared co-operatives, closely-held and widely-held corporations. Here is what was said:

In a comparison of a closely-held versus a widely-held designation, a co-operative must of necessity be treated, by the very definition, as a closely-held corporation. However, the treatment of a co-operative as a corporation of any designation would certainly not result in an equitable treatment. The necessity for the recognition of the special form of co-operative distribution was accepted by the "McDougall Royal Commission" of 1945, the "Carter Royal Commission" of 1966 and again by the White Paper proposals.

Some of the reasons dictating this recognition of a separate treatment are as follows:

The capital nature of a co-operative is essentially different from that of a corporation. Whether the investment of the co-operative member is in the form of a loan or is in shares the member capital contribution is more like a deposit than a capital contribution in a corporation. The capital structure of a co-operative is a "fluid" type of structure subject to constant fluctuations whereas the capital of a corporation tends to have a "locked-in" aspect keeping it available for the purposes of the company.

This difference in capital structure must be provided for in any system of taxation which is to be applied to co-operatives.

To treat a co-operative as a corporation for tax purposes ignores the nature and ownership of co-operatives distribution and the claim which the patron owners have to the surplus earnings.

Any treatment of a co-operative as a corporation for tax purposes would create the problem of numerous T-5 returns for small amounts (and the necessity of devising a formula for passing on creditable tax with patronage refunds). Because many of the recipients of co-operative distributions will not be taxable many claims for refunds will result from the election of this method of taxation.

I think that Bill C-259 considers treating co-operatives on the same footing as closely-held corporations. Therefore, I believe that this would not be fair at all for members of co-operatives.

I would also like to draw the attention of the House to an editorial written by Mr. Jean-Paul Légaré in the August 27, 1971 issue of Ensemble, and I quote:

Mr. Benson's 1969 white paper on tax reform took no account of the particularities of co-operatives and savings and credit unions.

Bill C-259, introduced for first reading in the House of Commons in June 1971 and advocating a new taxation policy takes no account either of co-operative institutions' particularities.

When we consider the fact that the Canadian co-operative movement clearly established its position through briefs presented the legislator in 1970, we arrive at one of two conclusions: either the federal government deliberately ignores the principles that guide the co-operatives, or it proves clearly its intention of evening out the taxes of companies in Canada.

As the prime concern of the state should be the application of a tax system that is fair to all companies under its jurisdiction, we fail to understand the attitude of the federal government which persists in its inequity towards co-operatives, savings and credit unions. Indeed, as provided for in Bill C-259, tax proposals continue to place co-operatives in an unfair situation compared with companies and other corporations.

Should Bill C-259 be adopted, it would interfere with the normal expansion of co-operatives. Not only would the federal government thus provoke a deplorable state of affairs, but it would deprive itself, in the future, of sources of revenue it seeks through taxation.

[Mr. Beaudoin.]

Co-operatives and credit and savings unions have repeatedly stated that they were not asking for any preferential treatment with regard to taxation . . .

The federal government is apparently giving way to the pressures brought to bear by Canadian corporations, judging by the provisions of Bill C-259 with regard to co-operatives. That is exactly where the government is in error and consequently places the co-operatives themselves in an unfavourable position.

The Canadian co-operative movement is united against Bill C-259, as it was against Mr. Benson's white paper. Its views were set out in two briefs presented to the Minister of Finance in July 1971 and reproduced on pages 14 and 15.

The co-operative movement invokes reasons of justice which must be the first concern of a government that advocates "a just society". We feel sure that the federal government cannot in all decency ignore the appeal of 4 million co-operative members.

. . . whom we represent.

Mr. Speaker, with my colleagues' co-operation, I merely wanted to draw to the attention of the House the views of the Quebec co-operatives, particularly with regard to determining the amount of capital invested in such co-operatives. My colleagues have pointed out, or will shortly do so, numerous other defects of this bill. Such are, Mr. Speaker, the points I wanted to mention.

• (4:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House is grateful for the compliments paid by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) to the Opportunities for Youth plan. That shows belated support for the plan and it is encouraging. I believe it is the hon. gentleman's first public pronouncement in support of this great social measure which was such a success this summer. It really was encouraging to note that, in his speech, the Leader of the Opposition was able to say something constructive and new in his approach to government operations.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is the hon. member's turn now.

Mr. Gibson: Yes, it is. At this stage I wish to refer to something else that the Leader of the Opposition said. He put this proposition to the House: what proposals has the government put forward to deal with the present problems of the Canadian economy? I submit that, among many other proposals, the government intends that 750,000 Canadians shall be removed from the income tax rolls in order that they need not pay income tax. Also, it has proposed very substantial tax amendments in order to alleviate the burden of poor people faced with pressing problems. Replying to the Leader of the Opposition may I say, after analysing his speech, that it is obvious that the tax reform bill was a victory for the government, the people, and the cause of participatory democracy. It is also apparent that the opposition, as usual, had very little to contribute to the debate on tax reform except vague and hackneyed generalities. We have heard the arguments which the Leader of the Opposition presented in his speech this afternoon in previous debates at different times. There was little new in them. I was disappointed that he could not come up with something more specific than the generalities about unemployment and the economy that he raised.

Yesterday the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) in scathing terms, criticized the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Murphy) because that hon. member had asked him if he was suggesting that the government should take a draft of the legislation to Washington for approval before submitting it to this House. In his answer the hon. member for Peace River suggested that the government should come up with a number of contingency plans. May I comment on that.

I suggest it is ridiculous to expect any government to anticipate all the permutations and combinations of decisions which might be taken in the United States in the next few weeks and bring into this House a contingency plan. What could be more absurd, what could be more ridiculous, particularly at a time when governments are discussing these important matters among themselves at the official level, and just before the international meeting, headed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) as chairman of the Group of Ten nations, which is to commence today. How unrealistic and impractical can the opposition be?

The tax reform bill which is before the House for second reading is the product of the most democratic tax review ever conducted by any government. The white paper hearings, for the first time, provided the Canadian people with a direct voice in expressing their opinions on government tax policy. The facts are that the government responded to requests for substantial tax changes as a result of reaction to proposals outlined in the white paper. This attitude and this response have been acknowledged by a great many Canadian people as being successful methods of conducting reform in our system of taxation.

Before us now is a vast and complex bill. Admittedly, it is complex, because reforming the tax structure is a tremendously difficult task. Nevertheless, although there are complications in the bill, there is real heart in the approach to tax reform that has been taken by the government and the Minister of Finance, and the bill represents substantial relief to low income Canadians. I do not intend to outline and catalogue all of its legislative provisions. I wish to outline some of the highlights. Personal exemptions will be raised to $1,500 from $1,000 for single persons and to $2,850 from $2,000 for married persons. Exemptions will be $500 for children under 16 and $300 for children over 16. Child care expenses will be deductible, up to $500 per child under 14, for a maximum of $2,000 per family. An employment expense account of up to $150 a year is introduced. All taxpayers with married exemptions and income solely from wages and salaries will pay less tax than at present. All taxpayers aged 65 and over will receive a special exemption of $650. The guaranteed income supplement will be exempt from tax. Capital gains will be taxed on a reasonable basis. Comprehensive provisions have been made for corporations, so that they will be able to expand and develop without being hindered from expansion, as originally outlined in some provisions of the white paper. Incentive and encouragement to develop are the key notes relating to corporation tax provisions in the bill.

The total result of these measures reflects a fairer system for taxing the Canadian people. People on low incomes and retired people are treated with sympathy and justice. The integrity of the bill stands out in a major overhaul under which unjust treatment of poor people is abolished. Over 750,000 people henceforth will no longer pay any income tax.

The attitude of the government, taken together with social security measures adopted for those on low incomes and with heavy family expenses by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) reflects a determination to direct Canada away from being a land with a high level of poverty. Opposition members, particularly the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), have admonished and chastised the government in speeches made during this debate. They have criticized the wording of the bill and criticized continually every step taken by the government to bring about tax reform. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that a note of bitterness and pessimism was expressed by the hon. member for Edmonton West which, if accepted, could lead one to believe that any tax reform is impossible. He has seldom acknowledged the good features in the bill and merely emphasizes gloom and doom to the detriment of speedy action in this House.

• (4:10 p.m.)

For ponderous pontification and pessimistic prolixity the hon. member for Edmonton West takes the prize. Those who adopt his long speeches of technical misery as constructive criticism will find few followers among the electorate of Canada. Mr. Speaker, I urge all hon. members opposite to cut down on the length of their speeches and proceed to end this unnecessary second reading of the bill so that valuable time which could be better employed in committee of the whole will not be wasted.

The difficulties in draftsmanship are human difficulties, but there is not the slightest doubt that we on this side of the House are determined that the Canadian people are granted the fair and just tax reform bill before us.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The question is on the amendment.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I had not expected to take part in the debate at this point primarily because I am not prepared. I wanted to have the opportunity to get some notes by me for reference. However, one does not need an agglomeration of notes in order to stand before the House and give some indication of the feelings of the Canadian people toward this bill. Not too long after the intervention of my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) the public became extremely concerned about what the government was attempting to do. They were concerned because the government appeared to give no recognition whatever to those who, after hard work and personal initiative, felt they were entitled to some reward. The government appeared dedicated to removing the reward factor from those who were deserving of reward. I am thinking of those who had struggled for a long time to acquire a home, a place they could call their own. The government wanted to tax them. Again, I think of those who through initiative and ability had been able to build up a small business and I reflect upon what the government wanted to do to them. In the end, members opposite had to back away. As my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition said, the bill now before us is evidence of a retreat on the part of the government. It has admitted defeat. Government must recognize the desire of those who want to work to be rewarded for their work.

If we are to be faced with the continuing pleas of those who believe we should secure the ownership of a greater share of our own economic structure, then I would respectfully submit that incentives must be provided to the end that there might be something left in the taxpayers, pockets, money which can be used, not to buy back Canada, because I believe that to be impossible, but at least to acquire a larger share of Canada. Incentives must be provided to encourage industry to expand production and, in turn, to create a greater measure of employment. In considering this bill, we must ask ourselves whether the Canadian people are being given a greater opportunity to invest in their own economy, to invest in their own future.

The measure before us is so complex that even tax experts find difficulty in understanding it. As my hon. friend from Edmonton West has said, many of its provisions are confusing. As a whole, it is irrelevant to the needs of the economy in terms of growth, in terms of production, in terms of employment and in terms of assistance to secondary industry, and for these reasons it should not now be read a second time.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the tax proposals before us have been described by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and other ministers as constituting one of the greatest pieces of legislation of the century. Great reforms, we are told, are now being presented to the people of Canada. Five taxpayers out of eight, it is said, will obtain substantial tax reductions.

At a time when we are faced with high taxes, high unemployment and high inflation levels simultaneously, and after nine years of supposed serious thought during which period we have seen the Carter Report and the white paper, one might have expected a substantially different set of proposals to have been presented to us, proposals which in a democratic society would benefit, in the main, the average and the poorer citizens of this country, that is, the vast majority of our people. Instead, looked at from any point of view, whether in terms of taxation or in the terms of effect upon employment or the development of our economy, the average person has nothing to gain from this legislation. The best that can be expected is that the average Canadian or the poor Canadian will find his position no worse.

Provision has been made for some marginal improvements to which I shall refer in due course, affecting the very poor, but in the main we are being offered no reform. This needs to be said, and I hope it will be said over and over again by all those who give serious thought to these proposals. I wish to deal with the question of equity, the effect on unemployment and the question of resource development. I propose to deal with these subjects one by one and explain my reasons for reaching the conclusions I have.

[Mr. Alexander.]

• (4:20 p.m.)

By raising the exemption level to $1,500 from $1,000 for single people and to $2,850 for a married couple, and by removing the 3 per cent surtax, as the Minister of Finance indicated, some one million people have been removed from the tax rolls. But how real are these benefits? How substantial are these gains after nine years of promises of significant tax reform? The tax proposals in the main, in terms of their effect on income, represent for most people a saving of about $100. For a family of four, spread over one year this would amount to about 50 cents a week for each member of the family. Real reform that is!

However, Canadians in income groups that are well above the average, those who are struggling to get by on an annual income, for example, of $30,000 a year or more, are going to make real gains as a result of this raising of the exemption level. For instance, a man who is ekeing out an existence on $100,000 a year will save $5,423 in income tax. A man who earns $400,000—there are not many in this category but there are a few, people who, by the way, finance and participate in the government party—will save as a result of this increase in the exemption level some $27,000 of personal income tax. Compare this saving with the $100 that the average worker will at best save during the course of a year.

The so-called "renegade report" prepared by the group of people who departed from the Senate inquiry into poverty indicates that over the past 20 years there has been no change made in the distribution of income in this country. For example, 20 years ago the top 20 per cent of families in terms of income had 40 per cent of total income in Canada, whereas the bottom 20 per cent had some 7 per cent of total income. This 7 per cent in terms of numbers represents about five million Canadians.

No action has been taken by the government—and I include the present tax proposals—to change one iota, this pattern of income distribution in Canada. Serious tax reform and major improvements for working Canadians would have led to some significant redistribution of income, but these proposals simply do not. For example, using tax credits instead of changing the exemption level would have been one means to make a move in this direction. However, this government, not surprisingly to members of my party, decided against that method.

Let us look at another category of reform, of great innovation, according to members of the Liberal party. They are claiming that the working people in Canada are now going to be able to deduct from their tax working expenses incurred. They will be allowed $150 a year for expenses directly related to their work for which they will get some tax credit. Is not the government magnanimous! It is telling all automobile workers in Oshawa, textile workers in Montreal and loggers in British Columbia: "Look, you fellows, we are really being very generous and are going to allow you what we have been allowing corporate directors, lawyers, doctors and indeed university professors for many years. We are going to allow you to claim some expenses that are related to your work as a tax deduction. However, we are putting a ceiling of $150 on those expenses".

However, this bill places no such limit on the expenses of corporate directors in this country or on those categories of professionals to whom I have just referred. Such people are going to be able to attend up to two conventions a year, which many of them do, and claim their expenses. They will be able to have a meal and spend a night in Montreal entertaining clients. They will be able to spend, not $150 spread over the course of a year but $150 in one night, at the same time, of course, enjoying themselves immensely. And they will be able to claim every bit of that expense as a tax deductible item. I suggest it is sheer hypocrisy for a government to say to the working people of Canada that they can claim up to $150 a year for expenses while those who want to work for corporations or professionals who regularly attend conventions will be able to claim almost unlimited expenses that they incur. This is the effect of this legislation and I challenge any member opposite to get up and deny it.

Let us look at a third example of the glaring and grotesque inequality that is found in these taxation proposals. One of the fascinating things about the Liberal party of Canada is that they are always talking about equality of opportunity, never about equality of condition. In every little village and town in the countryside you find members of that party saying that what we want in Canada is equality of opportunity. They espouse a great new society that has a wonderful class ladder. As long as all kids start at the bottom in supposedly equal position, it is all right to have this class division. I reject this whole concept of class but I would like to apply to the members of the Liberal party their own wonderful principle of equality of opportunity.

Let me deal with their wonderful estate tax proposal. As of the end of this year, Mr. Speaker, as the Financial Post of all papers, points out, it will be Christmas for the relatives of the wealthy of this country, not on December 25, 1971 but on January 1, 1972. Because as of that date all of the millionaires of this country will be able to pass on to others, without paying any federal tax whatsoever, their property and wealth. Think what it means in a democratic society. Think what it means in the city of Toronto where there are thousands of poor kids who will never inherit one cent. They are going to be born into poverty, as are some 20 per cent of the population in Canada today. Yet this great Liberal party, under its leader, Mr. Trudeau the reformer, is going to abolish estate taxes. There is real equality of opportunity! Many people in Westmount, Montreal, in Rosedale, Toronto and their equivalents in other big cities of this country, in the wealthy areas of the land, are going to be very happy indeed with this budget, because they are going to be able to pass on to their poor sons and daughters millions of dollars—and that figure is no exaggeration.

• (4:30 p.m.)

I would recommend that members of the Liberal party get John Porter's book "The Vertical Mosaic", because I suspect some of them are interested in reading, on occasion. In that book you will discover that the wealth and power of 85 of the 100 most wealthy and powerful families currently existing in this country are the result of long established family patterns. The party which governs this country is the one which talks about equality of opportunity. This is the same party that is abolishing estate taxes. So much for justice in that area.

An hon. Member: Tell us about yourself.

Mr. Broadbent: Now that is a relevant question, a real gem, a profound bit of insight on the part of one of the government members. It is not bad enough that we do not have better tax proposals which remove tax burdens entirely from the poor—they are still going to be paying taxes—but if you apply the Economic Council of Canada concept of poverty in Canada, even with these proposed tax changes, the poor, whether they are single or married, are going to continue living in poverty and paying taxes while the rich can pass on their estates without paying a cent of tax on them.

In addition to improving the tax position of the poor, maintaining or increasing estate taxes, which the government has not done, other steps are necessary. We cannot just redistribute the tax burden and expect there is going to be a real and final redistribution of income. If we simply redistribute taxes so the poor and average have a bit more and do nothing about corporate power or price-making decisions by companies in this country, what is gained one day through serious tax reform can be lost in a matter of days and weeks as a result of automatic increases in prices. If we are really concerned, as opposed to Liberal party propaganda, what we need is an innovation in the power structure which would take some of the price decision-making authority away from some of the major corporations, and specifically in certain key areas.

What is needed to complement serious reform is a prices review board, or whatever you want to call it. We need some public agency with the determining authority in respect of price making policies of companies in essential areas like medicine, dentistry and the legal profession. We need such an agency to regulate the price of milk, bread, transportation and gasoline. Such an agency could fix prices in other areas of effective monopoly positions in the economic market place. I have in mind the automotive, steel and mining industries.

In all these areas in Canada what we need is a prices review board which would have, not a continuing and nagging bureaucratic function but a negative legal power enabling it to say to all those companies in essential or monopolistic areas, you cannot automatically pass on an increase in corporation tax to the average citizen. If they have a price increase that can be justified by a real increase in the cost of production, of course, this will have to be considered. The point is they should not have the right any longer to pass on automatically an increase to the average and poor people of our country. It is time we subjected those with corporate powers to the democratic test of responsibility. The only way this can be done is by setting up some kind of effective prices review board. To summarize, it is senseless to increase corporate taxes and decrease the tax on the average and poor people, and then allow such gains to the public to be wiped out by increased prices and profits.

Let me now deal with the question of tax reform and unemployment. It used to be part of the Liberal convention wisdom that 3 per cent was the highest level of unemployment a civilized, industrial society could permit. We now have a level of 6.5 per cent unemployment. There are some 650,000 Canadians out of work, not for a month, two months or three months but for one, two or three years. That is the situation and it would not be tolerated in any other advanced industrial, liberal, democratic society. Only in Canada under that great reformer, Mr. Trudeau, do we permit, year in and year out, thousands of Canadians to go without jobs.

What does the budget offer in this situation? Does it really offer the stimulant of a significant across-the-board tax reduction? It does not do that. Does it offer major incentives to increase productivity by other means? It does not do that. It does nothing to change the unemployment situation whatsoever. I am informed that the statistics we will get tomorrow will show that things are getting worse. The unemployment statistics for the month of August, normally a good month, will show unemployment increases. The proposals we get from this government do nothing to change that situation.

In the views of the members of this party we should have major tax reductions, especially of sales tax on manufactured goods. This is certainly one good short-term means of stimulating the economy and providing jobs. We should have removed the special tax privileges enjoyed by the extractive industries which currently employ relatively few people and make huge profits. Let me say something more about that, Mr. Speaker.

It is estimated that about $300 million in mining and oil alone is being lost in tax revenue because of special tax concessions to the extractive industries. Manufacturing in this country, which is taxed more highly, employs 1.7 million Canadians while the coddled and coaxed extractive industries, oil, gas and mining, employ only 100,000 Canadians. Let me give you some figures for 1968, the most recent period for which figures are available.

In 1968, the profits of the metal mining industry were $497.3 million. The taxable income was only $93.2 million. The percentage of profit being taxed was only 9.3 per cent and the rest went tax free. The profits in the oil and gas industries for 1968 were $339.8 million and the amount taxed was only $25.2 million. This represents a tax on only 12 per cent of the profits.

Let us compare this with the manufacturing industry. I will give you three examples. Manufacturing industry is labour intensive and a sector of the economy that provides many jobs. In 1968, the profits of the printing and publishing industries were $128.1 million and they were taxed on 41 per cent of that profit. The profits of the electrical products industry were $121 million and that industry was taxed on 37 per cent. Textile mills employ a great number of people and they were taxed on some 40 per cent of their profits.

• (4:40 p.m.)

The point has been made by members of our party, and more recently by the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans), that what we need is a reversal of investment policies and taxation incentives, away from the extractive industries, which are high profit and low in terms of numbers employed, with a move toward the labour-intensive industries. The present tax proposals do not do that in the slightest. The special concessions to the oil industry and the mining industry are to be continued for another three years. It has been said that this gives them time to adjust. They have had a whole history of exhorbitant profits at the expense of the people of Canada and yet they need three years to adjust. However, as the hon. member for Duvernay pointed out, when the special concessions which currently exist in respect of the mining industry are to be phased out a whole new system of accelerated tax write-offs for capital equipment will come into effect, which in turn will leave the industry virtually unchanged in terms of taxation. It is a sham of reform and is a backtracking, not only from the Carter Royal Commission report but even from the government's white paper proposals in this area.

In the past few years, the Carter Report has shown what can be done. It has shown we could substantially reduce taxes for the average person and simultaneously increase public revenue if we fill in the loopholes in the corporate structure and increase the tax on the wealthy, including a capital gains tax. It has been shown that this could be done. Members of the New Democratic Party have argued this in recent years. It was argued during the 1968 election and, I am sure, will be argued again in the forthcoming federal election. Very recently that would-be reformer who is now leaving the federal government, the hon. member for Duvernay, pointed out in some detail what could be done. Indeed, the Minister of Finance of the government of Manitoba, in essence, implemented within his province the kind of proposals I am talking about now. As a result, if I am not mistaken and if I am I hope someone will correct me, that province has now the lowest growth rate in terms of unemployment in this country. He recommended that the federal government follow similar procedures in terms of tax proposals but was turned down.

I should like to make the very sad observation that those who are right at the bottom of our economic system, that 20 per cent of Canadians who have only 7 per cent of the income, that whole group of people who on many occasions go to bed hungry at night, who live in homes which need plumbing facilities and indoor heating or who need new homes, will not benefit by these proposals.

I shall conclude by expressing, not in partisan joy at all, the regret of one citizen in any event who had some hope that in this area the party which has governed this country for so long, the party across the aisle, would do something that would have meant something to the average and poor guy. The government has not done so. This is something for which all of us in this House should feel some very genuine regret.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It is my duty at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the question to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment is as follows: The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand)—Air Transport—Airline Pilots request for early action on hijacking.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray (for Mr. Benson) that Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West) (p.7763).

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, as members of the House will recall, we are not at the present time in this House debating the income tax proposals which are presently before us but rather are dealing directly with the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) in this House yesterday. I should like to repeat the amendment to remind hon. members that it is, in fact, this amendment with which we are dealing:

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted:

This House deeply concerned with unacceptable levels of inflation, persisting unemployment and stagnant industry and conscious of the necessity for meaningful tax reform declines to give second reading to a bill which does not provide sufficient stimulus to the economy of Canada with appropriate tax cuts and incentives, does not contain adequate tax exemptions and is not calculated to materially improve business and labour conditions in Canada now or in the foreseeable future.

It is very important that members of this House recall that it is this matter which is presently before us because it points up the basic weakness in this massive piece of legislation which has been presented to the House. As has been indicated here this afternoon and prior to today, there is a very real need for realism about the problems with which the country is faced at the present time. One would wonder whether someone on the government side, particularly among those who assume functions of responsibility, has somehow entered into a kind of Alice in Wonderland situation in which it is believed that things can be dealt with in terms which seem most attractive to the government, whether or not they bear any relationship to the facts.

The fact that we are going through a very serious economic situation, some part of which has been manufactured deliberately by the domestic policies of the government, and the fact that the government is seemingly ignorant of these present and future difficulties or treats them as peripheral items of concern, seems to me to be a clearcut indication of the lack of realism, or might I say the lack of sensitivity, of the government for the basic economic problems that face Canadians today. The fact that we have had for some months between half a million and three-quarters of a million unemployed, and the fact that there is no obvious indication we can expect any substantial reduction in that number, seems not to have caused this government to think that the measure it was intending to introduce in respect of taxation reform this fall might in fact have to deal with this very serious situation. This government seems more than willing to spend some weeks and perhaps some months in debate on the various intricacies of tax reform without, in the first instance, assuring the Canadian people that it is taking every possible step to alleviate the serious problems of unemployment in this country which exist today and which will very obviously increase in the days and months which lie ahead.

There has been no clear-cut indication either from the comments of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) or any other minister with regard to the economic side of their portfolios that they are prepared to accept responsibility in this very vital area of unemployment. Apart from the kind of glowing remarks that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) is capable of uttering but incapable of fulfilling in terms of action they are quite willing, it would seem, to accept this as a standard situation, hoping perhaps in an Alice in Wonderland kind of way, that somehow it will go away. We have heard of other regimes at other times that have acted as if the problems that were most imminently under their responsibility would somehow cease to exist, as if there were no cause for alarm. Whether it was Nero fiddling in his time or the Czar and his family cavorting in their time, the ignorance of such problems of such massive proportions was simply a reflection of the distance they had placed between themselves and the people, and the degree to which they had insulated themselves from the real problems with which people were faced.

• (4:50 p.m.)

We need action today, not some months hence when we are in the midst of an even more serious economic situation in this country. The bland assurances of either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance will do little to answer the basic economic needs of thousands and hundreds of thousands of Canadians when they find themselves in the bread line and out of work. If this government is not prepared to discuss realistically the detailed plans it has now to meet these economic needs, then one can hardly criticize the members of this House who themselves, individually, refuse to discuss these things until the government has met these basic concerns. This government, on top of the fact that it seems to be unaware or incapable of facing the basic unemployment problems in this country, seems also to have opted for a series of economic policies and platitudes which do little to recognize the tremendous change that has occurred even in this last decade with regard to the economic situation, with regard to the monetary and fiscal problems of a highly developed nation such as Canada, with regard to the taxation requirements of other authorities, whether they be provinces or municipalities.

It would seem altogether too clear that the insulation that exists in terms of present problems also works against most of the economic realities that exist in a rapidly changing social and economic situation in this country. It would seem to me that this government continues to demonstrate its inability to face up to the real problems as they have presented themselves day after day to members of this House and to the people of this country. But in proposing this amendment to the House yesterday, we are simply assuring the many Canadians who have already had the opportunity to study the minister's taxation proposals that the government may take seriously the degree to which it has now entered into a program of mystification. We seem to find ourselves faced with a government which is running into serious objections to its basic economic policies. Its response is not to try to understand and relate to the real situation but to confuse and to mystify. What the government has done with respect to the taxation proposals is to produce an exaltation of ad hocery while giving unwarranted prominence to what surely must be described as the supertechnocrat. I am referring to those individuals who perhaps have dedicated the better part of their lives to drafting taxation laws in such a form that not only the average layman will be unable to understand them but that most of the people who are charged with administering them or dealing with them on a day to day basis will have great difficulty in understanding them as well.

It has been mentioned before that when the members of the Bar Association met they expressed their own frustration and concern about the imcomprehensibility of these taxation proposals. It should be said as well that the confusion and the disquiet that exists among many of the lawyers of this country, who of course will have much to do with the interpretation of any kind of taxation proposals, have extended well beyond the legal profession to include organized business as well. Anyone who has taken the time to study the recent submissions of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce—a pretty respectable and conservative institution in this country, I might say, and one whose members normally do not have too much difficulty in understanding the taxation proposals of the federal and provincial governments—would find that it, too, says time and time again, "We would like to have been able to understand more clearly what the taxation proposals meant but we were simply not able to get to the bottom of a number of fairly basic questions". This organization suggested, too, in its submission to this government that if the confusion is to remain it will become almost impossible not only for individual citizens, not only for lawyers, but for the business interests in this country to be absolutely sure they understand these new taxation proposals. Indeed, the Chamber of Commerce went so far as to suggest that there may well be need for some period of time—they did not indicate how long—during which some kind of special forgiveness would be granted to those individuals or corporations who incorrectly filled out their income tax forms. There should be some kind of relaxation of the normal legal controls that exist because it will be quite natural, under the present proposals, to make mistakes and not be aware of them.

It is a well known fact that a taxation program in any country is extremely important to the level of activity, not only economic but in a variety of related fields such as social and cultural, and if it is true that of the vast majority of the people who specialize in the taxation law many find it difficult to understand what in fact the government is proposing, has it not crossed the minds of some people that there may be a reason for introducing this kind of obfuscation? Why is it that the government which was seemingly pretty clear in its proposals in the white paper based on the Carter report, which was clearly understood by most of those involved in the taxation fields, suddenly introduced this new element of confusion and incomprehensibility? Is it possible that the government has some hidden agenda, some reason that it has not indicated to the Canadian people for keeping them somewhat in the dark about what the eventual effect will be of these new taxation proposals? Why are these supertechnocrats so happy that most people, apart from themselves, seem unable to understand all of the implications and effects of these taxation proposals?

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

• (5:00 p.m.)

Could it be, Mr. Speaker, that some changes are being smuggled in under the guise of reform or progressive taxation that are exactly the reverse? Could it be that steps are being taken in this legislation to achieve some of the most repugnant aspects of the original draft of the white paper? It is a question that many members of this House, and hopefully many specialists in tax law, will ask themselves repeatedly in an attempt to understand what exactly the government is up to in the proposals it has placed in this bill.

And I do not think it should be enough, Mr. Speaker, to say that simply because we are dealing with a massive overhaul of the federal tax system it will not be possible for most people to understand the details of that kind of endeavour. That is purely and simply a snow job, one which members of this House and members of the public generally should refuse to accept. For this reason, I hope we will have the opportunity to consider all of the implications of the taxation proposals that the government has placed before us.

I am reminded of the words of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) when he spoke in this debate yesterday, as reported at page 7756 of Hansard and I quote:

> A good tax system must be capable of efficient, economical and objective administration. And, as I mentioned earlier, in a country such as Canada the federal tax system must be capable of being harmonized with provincial tax systems to avoid a tax jungle.

The first place to stop a tax jungle is in your own backyard, and there is just too much of a tax jungle at present in the proposals that have been placed before us. But, Mr. Speaker, as I said in opening, we are dealing at the present time with an amendment, one which in the first instance focuses on one of the key problems facing the people of this country since the people of this country essentially are not concerned with all of the intricacies of tax reform.

While all of these reforms will have direct and indirect effects on the people, and hopefully benefits, there is really only one question that is of major concern to the people of Canada, and that is the degree to which this economy fails to offer employment opportunities to a significant number of Canadians. To me, it does not seem possible that we can engage in economic actions related to tax reform or anything else unless they are dealing directly with the basic economic problem of our day, and that is the problem of unemployment.

Again to refer to the remarks of the Minister of National Revenue yesterday, he said at one point, as recorded at page 7757 of Hansard:

> Passage of this bill by Parliament will mean that 1 million taxpayers who would have paid taxes next year will be removed from the tax rolls.

That sounds great. I am sure that everyone could cheer when realizing that those who, unfairly and unjustly, had to pay income tax in recent years would now be relieved of that unjust burden. But if all we are doing is taking one million off the tax rolls while also ignoring one million people in this country who are unemployed, then that certainly is not an aid or assistance to this country. It leaves one million people suffering the indignity, the injustice and the misery that is inherent in not being able to support oneself and one's dependents.

Members of this party, and other hon. members have indicated that they would act immediately to process those elements that are in this bill which would relieve the onerous and unfair tax burdens on the people to whom the Minister of National Revenue referred. But we must take action now as well to deal with the problem of unemployment that exists in this country today, and the problems of unemployment that are bound to increase in the months that lie ahead.

It has already been clearly indicated that in presenting these proposals the government has not attempted in any co-ordinated way to deal with the continuing problems of unemployment and poverty that exist in this country. I am very tempted, as one who represents an area where there is an almost continuing problem of high under-employment and unemployment, to talk specifically about the special need for a co-ordinated approach to long-term and hard core poverty in this country. But there has obviously been no recognition by the government that policies must be co-ordinated, beyond speaking about them on occasion.

What has happened to all of the great hue and cry that existed when the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was originally established which suggested that this department finally, after so many years, was going to co-ordinate the economic approaches to the disadvantaged regions not only of the various programs of that department but of many other departments—Trade and Commerce, Agriculture, Finance, National Revenue? In almost every department of government that you can name, there are decisions being taken day by day which, in more than a few instances, simply counteract the attempts that are being made by other programs to overcome the long-term situation with respect to poverty and under-employment.

One would have expected, Mr. Speaker, that in committing itself to any kind of major tax reform the government would have been prepared to say that these reforms were directly related to an over-all attack on the problem of poverty in this country, the problems of the 20 per cent who exist in that grey no man's land of subsistence living, and that they could point to programs in Health and Welfare, in Agriculture and in so many other departments to which these tax proposals were directly related in a co-ordinated fashion.

Yet today when the Leader of the Opposition asked the Prime Minister about the discrepancy between the FISC program introduced yesterday by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) and the program of exemptions in this taxation proposal, what did the Prime Minister say? He said that there will be no attempt to co-ordinate the approaches of both these programs, something which it seems so obvious is necessary when dealing with the same two constituent elements. How then can one expect to believe that the government has faced the situation realistically and is prepared to meet the real economic needs of Canadians?

Time and again it has been said, usually by people on the government side, that no specific proposals have been advanced by the opposition. They have said, "It is one thing to criticize; anybody can do that". I do not really agree with that. I think it takes some level of understanding to be critical, or at least to understand what the real problems are. But they say, "You are critical. So what? What would you do?" That is often the screen used to allow people to ignore all of the suggestions that have yet been made, some of which seem so obvious and so appropriate that one wonders whether hearing has not stopped altogether. It has been said so often that to repeat it almost seems to be repeating an obvious truism, that if there is to be a turnaround in the present unemployment situation direct action must be taken in the area of tax cuts. I am not talking about the kind of piddling 3 per cent action taken by this government in July, which was really only withdrawing something that it had almost illegally and certainly unethically foisted upon the Canadian people much longer than it had a right to do. Unless significant tax cuts are made there can be no significant stimulation of production and of our economy.

• (5:10 p.m.)

I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, that what seemed so obvious to most governments throughout the history of this country should seem almost beyond realization by the government that faces us this afternoon. If one wants to be even more specific, when faced with the prospects of increased autumn and winter unemployment, surely the most obvious area for government action is the cancellation of an item that has been argued by just about every responsible economist in this country for the past couple of years, that is, the 11 per cent tax on building materials. For the life of me, I cannot understand why anyone with any sense of the needs of this country should still have to argue for something that seems so eminently sensible. The favourable repercussions that would occur in the building trades, particularly the homebuilding industry which is so vitally important, seem obvious, yet this government persistently refuses to remove this barrier to increased activity in this field. Why is that so?

An hon. Member: Stubborn.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Is it stubbornness? Is it pride? I recall the Prime Minister saying on more than one occasion that he likes to surprise people and that he does not like to go for the obvious. He is certainly being consistent in not going for the obvious when he rejects removal of that 11 per cent tax.

In the field of manpower retraining, which is very important in terms of the number of dislocations which have occurred in this country recently, there are obvious needs for revision of the act. With other hon. members, month after month I have requested the government to recognize the need for amendments to the Manpower Retraining Act so that many thousands of Canadians now denied further or new training could make use of this opportunity during the difficult months of winter unemployment. But again, Mr. Speaker, such an obvious step is rejected by this government.

When we think of the difficulties that the continuing high interest rates cause small and large borrowers, small borrowers in terms of those who would willingly enter the mortgage field for homebuilding and large borrowers in terms of industrial expansion and specialization, we wonder why an attempt is not made within the many programs initiated or influenced by government financial activity to exert some control. The ironic paradox is that in most of the government lending programs over the last three or four years, interest rates have skyrocketed. If the government has given any leadership in the field of interest rates, it has been that everybody should increase them. What kind of economic nonsense is that in a time of high unemployment?

Repeated suggestions have been made in this House that programs such as the winter works program of earlier years or the recently completed youth programs operated this summer should serve as examples for additional economic stimulation during peak unemployment periods in the winter. One suspects that the government's reluctance to revive the winter works program mostly relates to a sense of pride. It was not their idea and the Prime Minister does not like to think that somebody else might have had an idea first or that he would be building upon the earlier experience of others. That kind of pride, Mr. Speaker, has meant a loss of respect and opportunity for too many Canadians for them to feel that it is in their best interests.

What is the government doing about the immediate problems that will be faced by many Canadians who will find themselves persistently and consistently on the welfare rolls? Last year and again this spring when provincial budgets were swollen because of increased charges for their welfare programs, there was no recognition of the special problems that might exist in the larger urban centres, places like Vancouver and Toronto, or for the poorer provinces that find difficulty in raising their 50 per cent share of the shared assistance programs. There was no recognition of municipal needs in this country and one suspects there is no sensitivity to a repeat performance this year. Surely, the government has a responsibility before the programs are fully implemented to respond sensibly to the immediate welfare needs that exist. As in so many other things in the economic field, one suspects that again they have simply buried their collective heads in the sand, hoping that somehow or other this problem will go away or that it can be ignored altogether.

When one examines the tax bill before us, one realizes its fundamental weakness, that there is little here to stimulate economic growth. We may have a revised taxation plan but without that economic stimulation we will not have met the basic economic needs of the people. It is no good to reapportion taxation responsibility unless the people can be assured of some benefit from it. What is being attempted in this amendment is a vivid reminder to this government that it must act now to alleviate the kind of continuing stagnation, under-employment and unemployment, that exists in this country, not only because the situation is bad now but because without some kind of responsible action it is bound to get worse.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

• (5:20 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to comment on Bill C-259 entitled "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that Act".

Mr. Speaker, it is specified that it is an act to make "certain alterations". It is rather surprising to find in the title of this bill of more than 700 pages the mention "certain alterations".

Speaking for his party, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) moved the following amendment:

> This House deeply concerned with unacceptable levels of inflation, persisting unemployment and stagnant industry and conscious of the necessity for meaningful tax reform, declines to give second reading to a bill which does not provide sufficient stimulus to the economy of Canada with appropriate tax cuts and incentives, does not contain adequate tax exemptions and is not calculated to materially improve business and labour conditions in Canada now or in the foreseeable future.

Mr. Speaker, if we could still hope to amend this bill presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), I think all members would attempt to make scathing speeches in order to bring the government to its senses. I am sure, as are other members of the Créditiste party, that the speech which I am going to make this afternoon is not going to make the slightest difference to the contents of this bill. And I think this is also the opinion of practically all members who have spoken before me, as it will be of all who will speak to this bill after me, because this government has shown, ever since it came to power, that whenever legislation is submitted to the House, all is said, all is done, and the legislation has to be carried. Whether debates last a day, a week, a month or a year, the government, on the strength of its majority, has become so dictatorial that even criticism is no longer accepted. Finally, they sit back, as we see government members doing today, quite comfortably awaiting the end of the speeches in order to get on with the voting. That is the absurd side of the situation when a government has absolute majority. Again, I have always said that an absolute majority government works against the interests of the people, being in power merely to assist big finance. We have overwhelming proof of that today, to the extent that I feel hon. members take increasingly less interest in legislation brought before the House, not even venturing to debate, since they feel their speeches are lost in a vacuum. You might as well be speaking to rocks.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the opinion of the people today is somewhat along those lines. They are being told: What is the use of speaking up and of fighting for you today, because with this government, the more they dig, the more they favour capitalism and discriminate against the worker and the consumer.

Mr. Speaker, this bill has been under discussion for a long time. I am a member of the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. Numerous briefs, submitted by all sorts of organizations have been discussed in the House. It seems to me that this should have prompted the government to amend this bill substantially.

Again today, on reading Le Devoir, one can see the dissatisfaction evident at the CICA convention about the new tax system, and I quote:

Dissatisfaction was expressed over the weekend with regard to the new federal tax system at the convention of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants.

Most Canadians, it was stated, will benefit, but the small businessmen, the professionals, the self-employed and the investors will have a hard time figuring out their taxes.

The firms that will benefit from tax reductions will find any advantage greatly reduced due to the complexity involved in their bookkeeping and the interpretation of the law.

When an accountant has to read the whole bill and study it in depth, he will end up feeling a little like us:

I quote further:

Mr. I. H. Asper, editor of the tax column, stated that the public does not realize the complexities of the new bill: the tax expert will become more important, especially to the small enterprises with private capital.

He gave several examples to show that small enterprises will have to take a close look at their tax situation in order to protect their working capital.

Thus, said he, things will become very complicated at the time of the decease of the owner of an enterprise or farm; under the new system, the father's estate will be deemed to have sold its interests and will have to pay taxes on all capital gains realized at the time of the decease.

That is exactly what the government is doing today: after taking from the living, it will catch after death those who succeeded in escaping its tentacles. The provisions on succession duties will be the ones to give the fatal blow to private enterprise or family farms. The article goes on to say:

Since no real sale will have taken place, the family will have to find the money for taxes.

The first thing to do will be to pay taxes even before the burial.

The situation will only be worse if the provincial government imposes estate taxes in addition to capital gains tax at the time of death.

That is the scheme of the two governments.

Mr. R. A. Lachance from Montreal said that the federal tax proposals threaten to slow down real estate investments and reduce the amounts of Canadian capital normally invested in Canadian enterprises.

He recalled that the government does not want any more tax exemptions based on property depreciation, and he added:

"It seems that clever taxpayers will still be able to hide some of their income, so there will not be any of the much needed money for real estate.

The new taxation for non residents in Canada who have large interests in Canadian companies may force those companies to seek the required capital in Canada and not abroad".

• (5:30 p.m.)

This statement, as well as the dissatisfaction shown by the CICA, according to the item that I have just quoted from Le Devoir, should remind the government of the dissatisfaction of the people with Bill C-259 designed to amend the Income Tax Act.

Moreover, I myself have received, after certain studies, and after the representatives of our local organizations and groups appeared before the committee, the following telegram from La chaîne coopérative du Saguenay, that is from Saint-Bruno:

La chaîne coopérative du Saguenay is greatly disappointed with the Finance Minister's decision to maintain concept of capital employed as basic principle for taxation of co-operatives. This concept goes against very principle of co-operatives and becomes even more inequitable by new provisions of clause 135 in Bill C-259 which changes calculation method of capital employed. We feel there is no other example in the world of the application of concept of capital employed in any tax system. Adoption of this concept will result in weakening our co-operative financial structure and reduce possibility to give fair returns to our members. We do not expect any special treatment but ask that taxation system respect structure and management of co-operatives. Saguenay co-operative chain affiliated to Quebec Coopérative fédérée represented within delegation meeting with Finance Minister August 11, 1971 to suggest alternative taxation system for co-operatives which would not endanger very life of such institutions. Request your support with Finance Minister to obtain amendments to bill according to recommendations made by co-operatives.

Léopold Harvey, President La chaîne cooperative du Saguenay Saint-Bruno, Lac-Saint-Jean.

And here is another one I received from the Roberval Co-Operative Stores:

Roberval Magasin Coop strongly against amendment to Income Tax Act Section 135 as suggested Bill C-259. Roberval Magasin Coop unable to raise necessary funds for reimbursing capital and paying patronage dividends under new provisions Section 135. Evident that if our co-operative must spend more capital than it receives, it will have to cease operating within a few years. The Roberval Co-operative Store supports the demands of Le Conseil canadien de la coopération . . .

This shows, Mr. Speaker, that the famous clause 135 of the bill goes entirely against the principle of credit unions which are, in short, owners. They are not ordinary corporations which sell shares, but merely owners. I have in hand a copy of a letter sent to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). As far as I know, the Prime Minister did not table that letter in committee. Anyhow, it reads as follows:

Mr. Prime Minister,

As a result of the Benson white paper on tax reform proposals, the representatives of the Caisses populaires Desjardins and the Co-operative Movement of Canada have met with the members of a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons, in order to discuss with them the integration of credit unions in a new tax system proposed by the Benson report.

We would like to give you some particulars which will enable you to understand better the co-operative fact and the reasons for our recommendation to the said committee.

We are not seeking any special tax privilege. We are convinced that the co-operative nature of the Caisses populaires Desjardins must be recognized as such so that it might get a better treatment and be covered more easily in Minister Benson's white paper.

The following pages will show that, on the one hand, our position is motivated by the active co-operation we intend to maintain in order to continue participating in the economic development of our country and that, on the other hand, government revenues will not be reduced as a result of the integration formula which we propose. In addition, our position will lower the cost of collecting taxes from credit and savings unions.

The proposals of the Caisses populaires Desjardins and those of the white paper were annexed to this letter. I quote:

Until now the Caisses populaires Desjardins have not had to pay tax on their annual operating surplus which is charged to their reserve funds and which cannot be divided among members and does not create any capital gains on members' shares.

Members form a group to obtain services at cost, for surpluses over costs are redistributed as patronage dividends or interest adjustments to members.

In practice, members pay into their reserves a part of their surplus earnings to ensure their financial stability.

SPECIAL TREATMENT OF COOPERATIVES PROVIDED BY WHITE PAPER.

The White Paper proposes to treat Caisses populaires and Credit Unions as other cooperatives are treated for taxation purposes (4.73).

1. The White Paper proposals do not take into consideration the fact that Caisses populaires must build up important general reserves in order to ensure their financial stability.

2. The notion of the capital employed developed in the White Paper is not explicit for the cooperatives; it is far less explicit for the Caisses populaires. Furthermore, it is very hard to establish a direct relationship between operating surplus and capital employed, as well as between the profits and the capital stock of a company.

BASIC PRINCIPLE OF WHITE PAPER

Therefore the Caisses populaires dispose of their operating surplus in two ways:

(a) through refunds to their members;

(b) through transfers to their reserve funds.

The amount repaid to the member becomes taxable in his hands . . . consistent with the principle of taxing the income in the hands of the person to whom it belongs.

In a Caisse populaire, the amount transferred to the reserve funds can never be distributed to members.

TAXATION TREATMENT

The White Paper seeks to integrate concerns in either one of the following categories:

(A) PARTNERSHIP

In order to qualify in this first category, the Caisses populaires Desjardins should have the signature of all their shareholders who would ask for such treatment (4.22).

Due to the great number of their members it would doubtless be difficult for the Caisses populaires to obtain the signature of them all (2,500,000).

(B) WIDELY-HELD CORPORATIONS

The Caisses populaires Desjardins cannot be considered as widely held corporations.

1. Shares not transferable.

2. Limited territorial jurisdiction.

3. Spontaneous non-profit participation of the community in the administration of cooperatives.

• (5:40 p.m.)

The Caisses populaires cannot be assimilated to this category.

C) Closely-held corporations

The Caisses populaires Desjardins must be considered as closely-held corporations.

The taxation treatment for closely-held corporations proposes that "they would have to pay a tax of 50 per cent on the taxable income of the corporation. However when the net profits are distributed to the shareholders, credit would be given for the full amount of the tax paid by the corporation on those profits" (4.24). Section 4.27 stipulates that dividends may pe paid in shares.

We understand that by this taxation treatment the White Paper's aim is twofold:

1. To Safeguard the basic principle that income of enterprises should be taxed once only and at the rate of the individual to whom this income belongs.

Indeed, the 50 percent payment is only an advance payment. It will be reduced through the tax credit obtained by the partners up to the level of taxation of each shareholder . . .

2. To safeguard corporate liquidities.

In effect, for the shareholders to profit from the tax credit the corporation has to distribute the profits among its shareholders.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

However, as in par. 8.10 of the white paper, we think that the corporation will distribute its profits in the form of shares so no liquid assets will be necessary.

The corporations are sure of being able to keep 50 per cent of their net income for capital stock is not redeemable by a closely-held corporation.

The Caisses populaires want a treatment similar to that of capital stock companies which are considered as closely-held corporations.

However, because of the co-operative characteristics this taxation treatment does not meet the above-mentioned objectives:

1. To allow our members to profit from the tax credit large production of T-5 forms would be necessary . . . Furthermore, these forms would then be taken up for analysis and tax collection by the federal and provincial income tax services.

Those are, Mr. Speaker, all the complications I was talking about a while ago. The Caisses populaires have more than 2,500,000 members: Can you imagine the situation if we had to send a form to each of our 2,500,000 members!

It goes on to say:

2. The cashflow problem is even more important because the proposed treatment does not ensure maintaining adequate liquidities.

There is a great difference between the capital employed of a capital stock company and that of a co-operative.

The comparison here is between a capital stock company and a co-operative. In the former the capital stock is not redeemable but in the latter the capital stock can be withdrawn on demand. In the capital stock company the surplus can be distributed in the form of dividends whereas in a co-operative the surplus is never distributed to the members.

It goes on to say:

It should be well noted that for a capital stock company a transfer from surplus to capital stock . . . improves the liquidities of a company by freezing that part of the capital employed.

For a co-operative, the same action (for instance, partial transfer of excess payments to social capital) has a reverse effect. This action would make a more important part of the "capital employed" withdrawable on request.

The caisses populaires have made proposals and I quote:

The tax system applicable to co-operatives should follow two rules:

1. Co-operatives should be able to eliminate taxable income by paying interest or patronage dividends to their members from excess payments.

2. The portions of excess payments credited to the reserves of these collective enterprises and held by them would be taxable at the average rate paid by their members.

The purpose of this rule is to enable the government to secure the same tax yield as though the amounts credited to the reserves had been distributed to their members while permitting the collective enterprise to build up general reserves from its excess payments.

Mr. Speaker, in this brief the co-operatives have quite well explained the logical tax procedure and in connection with doubtful debts, transition periods, etc., the spokesmen for co-operatives feel that:

If caisses populaires are taxable it is quite normal that they should be able to build up, from their future taxable earnings, reserves for doubtful debts and liquidities comparable to those allowed to the banks.

They are merely asking the government to grant them the same favour which it is granting to the regular banks in connection with doubtful debts.

As regards transition periods, they say:

If caisses populaires are subject to income tax they will have to revamp their account system so as to take the tax system into consideration.

This would not be a simple operation, as it concerns a movement composed of 1310 autonomous enterprises carrying business with their own accounting for many decades. A transition period to establish procedures permitting especially a reevaluation of the assets will surely have to be provided for.

In conclusion, we find the following:

This taxation treatment offered to collectively-held corporations or co-operatives would not show favouritism. It would be an equitable treatment respecting both the characteristics of co-operative corporations and the basic principle of the Carter Commission and of the White Paper stipulating that income of enterprises should be taxed once only and at the rate of the individual to whom this income belongs.

After all, the real owners of the co-operatives are their members taken together.

Mr. Speaker, this gives an idea of the situation, and my suggestions are aimed at renewing the opposition which showed while this notorious bill was being studied in committee. At the beginning of my remarks, I said that the first intent of this bill was to protect the big capitalists at the expense of workers, families and consumers.

We have always wished that the government would introduce amendments concerning basic fiscal exemptions. For some years, we have been requesting that the basic exemption be proportional to the cost of living and, to that end, we suggested that it be increased to $3,000 for single people, and to $5,000 for married couples. Today, a couple cannot live with less than $5,000: two married people can keep body and soul together with less, but to live as human beings, they need at least $5,000 a year.

• (5:50 p.m.)

If we do not accept this $5,000 basis, we are taxing the necessities of life. I think that Canada is wealthy enough so that we do not have to tax necessities, only the surplus over and above $5,000. This is why we have always advocated basic exemptions of $5,000 for married couples and $3,000 for single persons.

As for children exemptions, we repeat that there should be a $500 exemption for each preschooler and $1,000 for each child attending school. If this were provided in Bill C-259, we would have nothing but praise for this government.

At the present time, it is not to be commended for it is only proposing an increase in the basic tax exemption which is a sham, a mockery, and ignores the suggestions we have repeatedly made in this House.

We also asked the government to exempt transportation for workers, food, moving expenses as well as tools. It is not only an amount of $200 or $300; the cost of workmen's and professionals' tools must be deductible. It is normal that workers should be considered on the same standing as professionals, industrialists or traders.

If we accept as tax abatement the dealers' and professionals' expenditures, the same should be done for workmen who deserve as much as the others.

We also had hoped that under the legislation, municipal and school taxes would have been deductible from personal income. It would have been one way of avoiding double taxation.

All those reforms would have been advisable and if the government had considered further the social aspect of the problem, it could have at last established social justice, as promised, not only for big financiers or capitalists, but for the entire community, the small workmen, the breadwinners and the child who goes to school, where discrimination exists between the children of rich people and those of poor people.

All these are loopholes which instigate reactions, not always good, from youth. Young people are right. Indeed, they think they are getting social laws, but these are antisocial laws, favouring capitalism to the utmost.

Mr. Speaker, I would have much to say, but as the time allotted to me has expired, I hope the government will come back to reason as soon as possible and will at last introduce, not omnibus or autobus bills, but bills of a social character which will benefit the people and protect human beings. Then, capital will no more be protected at the expense of men.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the amendment proposed to the tax bill by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), one is struck by the fact that whatever the bill brings, good or bad, to the Canadian economy it has been dwarfed by the impact of the American action in imposing surcharges on a large part of its imports, including highly vulnerable and politically sensitive Canadian manufactured products involving secondary industries.

The tax bill represents many years of effort, almost a decade in fact, since the Carter commission was appointed and I cannot help but wonder if the exercise was worth while. In the main, one has to recognize that we are dealing with the realities of a particular situation and that what seemed a logical and equitable tax system a year ago at the moment seems grossly inadequate and not capable of solving the taxation problems of our country.

The action of the United States government has brought home to us the enormous importance that the American economy has on our own. A mere 10 per cent surtax, and in actual practice much less, on one quarter of our exports to the United States has created violent consternation and controversy. Indeed, it indicates that no matter how carefully the tax system is set up, it has to conform with the needs of the time and it has to be adapted to best deal with the situation. What would have been an excellent tax system a year ago now becomes unworkable under the new conditions. I believe that the situation in which the Americans now find themselves is one that makes these proposed tax reforms largely superfluous, and if adopted as they now stands they will not facilitate our adapting to the new conditions in which we find ourselves.

Mr. George W. Ball, a leading American authority on international trade, stated the other day that if there is a serious delay in reorganizing world economy, or if the present disarray is long protracted, mounting protectionist pressures could lead to a destructive trade war, competitive devaluation, or both, with implications of catastrophe that cannot be overstressed. Foreign trade is a relatively small component of the United States gross national product, but Mr. Ball saw no conceivable means by which that country could immunize itself against the world depression that might follow. If this is true of the huge American economy, it is more true and more terrifying in the case of smaller and more vulnerable nations like Canada.

With this in mind, it is to be hoped that the strategy of Mr. Nixon to employ the lever of an import surtax to force nations to realign parity of their currency in relation to the dollar will in fact reflect the real purchasing power of that currency. The result should be to restore the United States balance of payments equilibrium. But this will require the full co-operation of powerful interests outside the United States, and the approval of the American people and Congress which in the end makes tariff policy.

All the measures taken by the American government so far are to be jettisoned once the balance of payment is restored, but they may well develop a life of their own and temporary measures have been known to continue for years. This situation is made even worse by the fact that high-cost American industries will like being shielded from foreign goods by import restrictions and will not want to abandon them, especially at a time of high unemployment, and an election year would make them very susceptible. But Mr. Ball remained optimistic about the self-defeating nature of economic warfare, bearing in mind the destruction in the thirties as a result of the tariff wars of that era.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

* * *

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, when the bell sounded at six o'clock I was attempting to show that the new tax measures were based on an error and that we are now faced with a new set of circumstances which will make them somewhat unworkable and not nearly as useful as they might have been.

In the annual report of the International Monetary Fund which was published this week the situation has been likened to a world map drawn in 1944. It describes accurately and in detail a monetary system which no longer exists. There is no doubt that after the industrial nations have passed through a period of negotiation and adjustment, new formally structured monetary systems will be adopted, but it will certainly not be the Bretton Woods system with its rigid parities and weak adjustment mechanisms and its heavy dependence on the United States dollar as a reserve medium and reference currency. On March 7, 1969, while speaking in this House on the proposed amendments respecting the International Monetary Fund and exchange fund account I suggested that greater exchange rate flexibility might be attained by use of the so-called crawling peg. I suggested that Canada should be in the forefront of change in the international monetary system. The collapse of the monetary system resulted from the massive $16 billion rise in international reserves in 1970; two-thirds of the 1970 increase in global reserves was concentrated in four countries, West Germany, Canada, Japan and France. This was largely the result of the U.S. balance of payments deficit. One method which might have helped to prevent this would have been the introduction of greater exchange flexibility over a period of time to allow currencies to be in better relationship one to another.

I do not feel that the bill will help those industries which will be affected by the surtax. The bill, as evidenced in the committee, is an open invitation to favouritism and regionalism. Payments are to be made on a plant by plant basis. It seems quite obvious that the plant which gets the ear of the board will end up with the money. This is not a good situation. The bill is designed to concentrate industry in a region which politics decides is most opportune. It would have been much better if the government had attempted to take the thrust of our exports away from the United States and reinforce companies in areas wherein we could make significant inroads. The new currency rates should increase our ability to compete in the western European and Japanese market especially. Rather than this bill, it seems to me an export incentive tax rebate would have been a proper tool to use to stimulate export growth to these countries. The effect of the United States action is to reduce their own expenditures in order to improve the internal economy. One interesting provision is the deferral for one year of welfare reform.

Speaking on the general tax question I should like to point out that Canada faces many problems. The most urgent at the present time are in fields in which this government has been least successful—economic growth, and in some sense Canadian participation in the world at large. As to the latter, its relationship to economic growth is obvious particularly in Canada, the sixth largest trading nation in the world where the equivalent of one-third of everything produced is exported.

In these tax reform changes the government has opted for equity rather than in favour of economic growth. We should remember that in the past 20 years we have seen significant changes in our population growth. We are still experiencing the massive birth-rate of the fifties and the entry into the market of these people. When one considers that in 1957 approximately 500,000 children were born in Canada, compared with some 360 thousand last year, it is appreciated that for some years to come we will be involved in providing jobs for this growth in population.

I believe the tax reforms are being brought in too soon. I think the idea of achieving complete equity before growth could well have been deferred for some years. In order to promote economic growth we need to encourage savings. By definition, savings and investment can be obtained only from what is remaining after spending. A person has to spend less than he earns. Capital investment, the main determinant of growth, can be financed only by saving.

• (8:10 p.m.)

I think one might say that by definition saving is an individual choice. Years ago, when our social services were not so well developed, saving was undertaken by an individual to assure himself of a comfortable old age and of a retirement income, but in many cases the individual is now free of these worries. He is free of the high cost of medical and hospital services which were often extremely worrisome to a person 60 years of age and over. Now this is handled by our social services. Also, in the matter of housing he is able to a large extent to buy a house and finance it on a long-term basis. So that although there may have to be some saving, not nearly as much is needed as when a person had to finance his house for a shorter period of time. In other words, the personal inclination to save has materially diminished and the problem of encouraging individuals to save should be tackled in the immediate future.

In the economic field no one can believe that the Liberal government has really laid the cards on the table. As usual, some people are trying to determine the government's policies by gauging public opinion, and as usual public opinion is blurred and drifting. Not since the belt-tightening program of 1962 has any solution to our economic problems been presented. Likewise, no one believes that some magic piece of legislation or embarking on a spend-your-way-to-prosperity program is the answer now, when in many areas governments in particular are already spending too much. Rather, it is widely accepted that what is required may be aptly described as a tough, positive, farsighted program for giving Canadians renewed opportunities.

In the matter of spending by the three levels of government in the field of health, welfare and education we have only begun to grasp the problem and to attempt to find ways of curtailing these expenditures. We must attempt to set down guidelines by which these various social services can be tailored to the money that can be allotted.

It is generally recognized that there is no alternative for Canada but to seek wider and more diversified access to markets, not only for our primary products but also for those manufactured goods in which Canada has or may be able to get a basic competitive advantage. This will necessitate exposing Canadian markets in return. Trade with the Communist bloc has been sadly neglected; the initiatives demonstrated by the wheat shipments during the days of the Diefenbaker government have generally been allowed to lapse. The Pacific rim area is the place of greatest potential gain, yet it has been all but ignored recently. It is acknowledged that this involves trading in new international markets for greater international trade, which will produce the maximum Canadian productive effort. I think that in this respect our tax system is most important.

The spur to Canadian business can come from access to new markets and the subsequent exposure to aggressive enterprises. On the other hand, Canada has made no counter proposals to Britain's current bid to join the European Common Market although Britain has been Canada's most valuable customer, the nation that has provided Canada with its biggest surplus on its current and trading account.

Obviously, Canada cannot merely decry Britain's efforts to join the Common Market. It must offer something tangible which would help to offset the theoretical lure of the European Economic Community. Free trade with Britain in manufactured goods might be the spur to tip the balance against Britain joining the EEC, particularly if public opinion there remains so divided. It should be remembered that Britain is our best customer, that our trade with her provides us with a huge surplus and that therefore we should make an effort to maintain this market.

Canada needs the opportunity to participate in new trading markets, particularly now when 65 per cent of our exports are going to one country, the United States. Needed, too, is the carrot of being able to keep more of what you make. This is an essential element of producing a positive climate for aggressive effort and risk-taking. This means the elimination of taxation proposals which would make it unprofitable for Canadian companies to expand overseas. Also, it means that there should be a shift in the burden of taxation from taxing earnings toward taxing consumption.

No one really believes that there is much likelihood of an over-all reduction in the Canadian tax burden in the near future, although that must be an ultimate goal. In fact, it is imperative that some of the weight of taxes be removed from the Canadian economy or entrepreneurs will move to more favourable economic climates. A shifting of the burden off the risk-takers and onto the consumers would be an important element in encouraging maximum productive effort.

Thus, we should encourage personal and corporate industry by shifting some of the tax burden from enterprises which are efficient and well managed to enterprises which are not so successful. There must be a slow weaning of Canadian secondary manufacturing industry away from its underlying branch plant psychology. There should be little reliance on artificial supports or other gimmicks of a legislative character, or on speeches before Canadian clubs in American cities, as a means of achieving greater Canadian control of our manufacturing industry and the requisite export effort.

Too much reliance recently has been placed on boosting Canadian participation and on talking for or against foreign investment. It is essential that capital flows on the basis of market decisions arrived at by considering the economic merits. We must rub the salt of reality into the wound of our depressed economy. What is required is the creation of a climate of competition in the international marketplace; then Canadian enterprises will find it to their commercial advantage to service an available market which is much larger than the Canadian market. Obviously, this will not be an easy or quick solution.

Speaking of the attempt to consider non-resident control of our companies through the tax bill, I do not think the answer to non-resident control rests with legal devices which counter the natural economic forces but, rather, with the encouragement of Canadian enterprise in positive ways and the discouragement of non-enterprise regardless of its parentage. For example, foreign non-enterprise could be discouraged by negotiating a tax treaty with the United States so that operating losses of American subsidiaries would not be used to offset income taxes of the parent company in the United States. In this way, unprofitable operation in Canada would not be encouraged, as is the case today, and true economic decisions would be made.

There is much more I could say, but I shall reserve further remarks until later in the debate when I can apply them to the specific areas on which I should like to speak.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, this is becoming an unusual House of Commons. Last Friday we had to work like the dickens in the House of Commons to get an opportunity to speak in the debate because on one day there was, I believe, a ratio of five Liberal speakers to two opposition speakers on a piece of legislation having to do with the Canadian reaction to the American surcharge. We were amazed, because we had three or four points of view to put across and we had to work like the dickens to get them in and to express the official position from this side of the House.

Today we are dealing with a major piece of legislation, one of the most important that has been placed before the House of Commons in a decade. I have been here only three and one half years, but this must be one of the most challenging pieces of legislation to come before us, one of the most controversial in many ways. It is a piece of legislation that needs all the reactions of members of both sides of the House, the Gillespies and others who have taken part in tax reform chit-chat for years and years, the Kaplans and the others—

• (8:20 p.m.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Chair feels this might be a good opportunity to remind hon. members of the practice of the House according to which we do not call individual members by name. Over the past few days and weeks the Chair has noticed that hon. members in their speeches have referred to, and found ways to refer to, other hon. members by name and even to refer to ministers by name. Of course they may be excused for using the name of a member of this House by quoting it in a citation, which is acceptable. But this practice has developed more and more, and before it goes too far the Chair thinks it should take this opportunity to read citation 146 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition which reads as follows:

> It is the custom in both Houses that no member should refer to another by name. In order to guard against all appearance of personality in debate, members should be referred to in the third person as "the honourable member for—says or contends, etc." A minister should be designated by the portfolio he holds in the government as "the honourable minister of". It is usual to refer to the chiefs of the two main parties as, "The Prime Minister" and "The Leader of the Opposition".

This having been said, I wish to state that I am not blaming any hon. member in particular, but I thought that something said in the last remarks of the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) offended against this citation. He is not one who is normally at fault in this matter, but he did give the Chair the opportunity to raise the point and read citation 146, which might be useful to hon. members during the course of debate.

Mr. Lundrigan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact, that was the first time I violated citation 146 which Your Honour quoted. Some of my bad manners, or perhaps some of the procedural disrespect manifest in my last remarks was prompted by the daily violation of that rule by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the question period, and I hope the Chair will remind that right hon. gentleman of the citation. The hon. members to whom I was referring were the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan) and the hon. member for Etobicoke (Mr. Gillespie), constituencies not quite as familiar to me as Gander and Twillingate.

The point I was trying to make was that today we have had six or seven members of the official opposition and other members on this side of the House taking part in the debate on this most important piece of legislation, one of the most burdensome and complex pieces of legislation presented to this House within the past decade, and we have not had a member of the party responsible for presenting this garbled mess to the Canadian people presenting any of that party's argument, points of view or positions.

Mr. Mahoney: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Lundrigan: This is somewhat frustrating. We have had enough interruptions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker, I recognize that the amendment before the House gives this debate the broadest possible scope in respect of economic matters. I am not sure of the relevancy of the hon. member's remarks, but I am sure he would wish to be accurate. The hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson) did participate in the debate earlier today. It is unfortunate that the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) does not spend all his time here, as he would have us believe.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Chair is of the opinion that the first part of the remarks of the parliamentary secretary was quite right and to the point, namely, that the rule of relevancy should apply to the House. I would point out that in his recent ruling Mr. Speaker put into perspective the importance of the relevancy of debate. I think that point was well taken, although the second portion of the parliamentary secretary's remarks was more or less a point of debate.

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson).

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Speaker, I did speak in the debate this afternoon and my one regret is that the opposition were represented in the chamber by only one member of the Conservative party.

Mr. Bell: Can you blame us?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Again, this is a question of debate, a matter which could be debated for a long time if we pursued this type of intervention. Therefore I would ask the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate to continue his remarks.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, a lot of members were behind the curtain this afternoon during the ten-minute interruption that we had in the House, and I do not want to overlook the fact that we had several interruptions in the debate. Let me go on to deal with some aspects of the legislation.

I think it goes without saying, and without reflecting a lack of knowledge on anybody's part, that it would literally take years for the average Canadian to understand some aspects of the legislation before us. Even some of the greatest tax experts in the Canadian nation admit that its actual effects may not be known for years, perhaps a decade.

I would like to make a few remarks about one aspect of the legislation, namely, its impact on low-income Canadians. As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) said this afternoon, we have almost been placed in the position of being blackmailed to present a positive outlook on this legislation because some low-income Canadians will receive an easement or some kind of reduction in taxation because built into this massive piece of legislation is one favourable feature which we can all support, even though some of us would go further and suggest that there should be greater increases in the basic exemptions proposed for low-income Canadians.

For the past three years one simple amendment dealing with such exemptions could have been brought forward. I know that I am not communicating effectively with the tax expert from Calgary, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney), because he does not have ears to hear average Canadians. But let me repeat that at any time during the last three years we could have passed a simple amendment in this House to give relief to low-income Canadians, instead of waiting and having such an amendment incorporated in this massive piece of legislation. By the time this legislation takes effect, bearing in mind that the proposals have been revised following advice from the Official Opposition and other Canadians, I believe some if not all of the potential benefits will have been eaten away by inflation which over three years has reached the cumulative effect of 15 per cent or 16 per cent.

Now I come to deal with the middle-income Canadian. Who is the middle-income Canadian in this country of ours? Some middle-income Canadians are professional people, some are technically skilled people and some run small, unincorporated businesses. Although I have not seen statistics in this respect I suppose there are tens of thousands of middle-income Canadians or small businessmen across Canada who do not find themselves in a position to take advantage of the relief under the incorporated small business legislation. With the advent of the present income tax proposals we have seen middle-income Canadians express the sentiment that they might as well give up. The small businessman believes there is no advantage for him any more to engage more actively in the Canadian economy. A tremendous amount of apathy has crept into the attitude of the middle-income Canadian. Again, the word incentive, which creeps into everybody's language these days, is perhaps the one word that can be used to challenge the legislation before us.

• (8:30 p.m.)

I am not going to offer an opinion on this matter, but I am sure that people wonder whether these tax proposals will do very much to encourage Canadians to invest in their own country. The increase in taxation will make those Canadians who are trying to invest in any aspect of the economy take a second look at their prospects. I am not speaking of people who invest millions of dollars but, rather, the average small investor with $5,000 or $6,000. I cannot predict the impact that this measure will have on investment in our nation when we are crying out to Canadians to invest in their own economy.

Many people believe that the domestic international sales corporation proposed by the American government will become law. This, with the 10 per cent surcharge which has affected the secondary manufacturing industries and other resources, makes the tax package before us redundant. In his speech the other day the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans) covered many things that we in this party have already said. In this tax package I do not see anything which is the kind of direction we were looking for as far as resource industries are concerned.

In later remarks the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Peddle) will confirm that we were shipping millions of tons of iron ore from Labrador to the American market for manufacture. With just a large crane and half a dozen men we can ship millions of dollars worth of non-renewable raw resources, those which cannot be replaced. It can be seen that there is very little incentive for the paper industry or the fishing industry or any non-renewable or renewable resource industries. I do not know if it is because the government did not see fit to address itself to the problem or lacked the ability to do so, but the resource industries of this country are not mentioned to any great extent in this tax legislation.

I am not going to ramble on for 40 minutes speaking in generalities, Mr. Speaker. However, I have a few suggestions, not very sophisticated or complex, which could be considered. One small thing which would not excite many members opposite is the tax now to be imposed on scholarships and bursaries. At the moment, if a young Canadian, especially one involved in graduate work, receives a scholarship worth $4,000 or $5,000, with the exception of $500 it will be subject to income tax.

This is a country that should believe in the development of human resources and should place almost unlimited funds at the disposal of young Canadians so that they may become actively engaged in our educational processes, yet it is proposed to impose a tax on scholarships and bursaries. Most other countries, especially the developing ones, must regard this as a joke. Yet we are a developing country, a country of vast raw, undeveloped resources. We have a population of 22 million and need to develop our skills to the greatest extent, yet it is proposed to tax scholarships and bursaries and other financial rewards given to outstanding students. This proposal should be reassessed if we are to encourage our young people and realize the value of human resource development.

I challenge any economist in Canada, the United States or Europe to deny that there is but a positive correlation between the educational development of a nation and its economic development. The reason for economic development may not necessarily be educational development, but the fact is that in most nations this does seem to be the case. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that we should never take any action which will discourage the development of our human resources.

Another point which I realize will be presented by other hon. members is the impact of this tax legislation on the co-operatives of Canada. There are not many co-operatives in my province—only five or six in my riding of Gander-Twillingate—but I think each one of them has made representations to myself and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). They claim that the co-operative movement is in danger of having to completely reform its foundation and to become a corporate structure if it wants to survive, unless there are changes to Bill C-259. The fact that they will be forced to redirect their profits to the investor rather than the patron of the co-operative, and the increase of taxable reserves from 3 per cent to 5 per cent, means they will have to be restructured or go out of existence.

I should like to know who drafted this provision and why. It seems to be an attack on the co-operative movement and the credit union movement. Is there someone in a back office with some kind of a hang-up on co-operatives? When the hon. member opposite who is the expert on tax legislation is giving his prepared dissertation soon, I should like him to tell me the reason. We strongly recommend that the government reassess its position on this tax bill as it pertains to co-operatives in Canada.

The third point I should like to make briefly, Mr. Speaker, concerns the impact of the total tax legislation on the unincorporated, small business. In the last several years we have had considerable discussion about effective tax arrangements for the small incorporated business, but nothing on the unincorporated business. There must be thousands of them across Canada wondering what their future is to be—firms employing four or five men to drive trucks or, for example, small lumbering operations. They must be terrified by the complexity of the legislation before us and the fact that there is no protection for them under the tax laws of the land. This is making some businessmen wonder why they should not just try for a job in a factory so they can come home at five o'clock in the evening to enjoy supper with the family and forget about the economy of the nation.

Everbody looks at General Motors, Imperial Oil, the American Oil Company. Has anybody ever looked at the small, unincorporated businesses in Canada? They do not have a very sophisticated structure and cannot present their case or briefs to the Minister of Finance and the House of Commons, but I would like the government to consider these people before driving them out of business altogether. The headache of running a small, unincorporated business when you do not have protection under the law taxwise, so to speak, when you do not have the assistance of accountancy firms and tax lawyers, must be unbearable. I make a plea on behalf of these people.

• (8:40 p.m.)

I wish to make a fourth point. I am trying to make a few simple points about subjects that have not been covered very extensively. In my province it has been announced that one of seven paper-making machines in the Bowater complex in Corner Brook, Newfoundland, is being closed. You will be hearing more about this as the days go by. When the announcement came, everybody got up in arms and said, "What are we to do to avert a disaster and to prevent between 1,000 and 1,200 people becoming unemployed?" "Conversion," some say, "may be possible." We must remember that even if we convert a piece of paper-making machinery, the conversion will take time and that will mean temporary unemployment. As I say, the conversion process will take time and put some people out of work. I am using this as an example.

Many industries in Canada today are finding that they must change their manufacturing process. In other words, they are being forced to change their entire process and are thereby forced to retrain their people or lay them off. I should like the government to take a much closer look at the question of industrial retraining. Let us not wait until the fish and chip factory in Prince Edward Island is forced to close its doors simply because it must bring in new machinery to manufacture weiners, say, and must retrain people to manufacture them. Could the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang), who is responsible for most of the industrial retraining programs in Canada, not work with industry and bring about major changes in industrial retraining so that the workers who otherwise would become redundant could retrain and readjust to new methods and not be thrown out of work?

I should like to see some of the experts from the Department of Manpower and Immigration look into this question. They are not like hon. members of this House who are generalists, who have some knowledge of a few things and perhaps not a great deal of knowledge of many things. I should like to see civil servants in the Department of Manpower and Immigration who earn between $30,000 and $40,000 a year get together with ministers of education in the provinces and personnel in industry and see what can be done to provide industrial retraining programs for Canadians.

I should like to make another point, Mr. Speaker. For the last three years I have listened intently to the ramblings of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the question period. Now and then members of the House have asked whether there have been provincial and federal consultations and whether federal, provincial and municipal authorities have come together so that we might find solutions to our economic conditions relating to unemployment, as well as to taxation problems. The philosophy that has been foisted on the Canadian people is that there are two different kinds of Canadians, the federal Canadian and the provincial Canadian; they are two different kinds of animal.

Nowhere is this philosophy adopted by the Prime Minister more evident than in his attitude toward taxation. People say that the Canadian taxpayer cannot carry the burden any longer and that we must integrate our taxation structures at the federal and provincial levels in order that our people can better carry the burden. Then we are told that the provinces can increase their taxes, as if you are talking about two different fellows, or as if there is a provincial fellow down there and his federal wife up there somewhere. I do not understand this. For the last several years we have been led to believe that we have in this country two completely unrelated systems of government, the federal system up here and the provincial system down there.

We have reached the point where Canadians in Newfoundland are wondering if they are living in Newfoundland or in Canada, where Canadians in British Columbia or Quebec are wondering if they live in British Columbia or Quebec alone, or if they are part of Canada. I do not care whether we live under federal or provincial jurisdiction; there is need for more consultation and for greater integration. When you talk about integrating the tax system you must remember that today's taxpayers are being taxed by school boards, by municipalities and by provincial governments and the federal government. There must be some way for us to integrate our tax system to a greater extent so that Canadians can understand what is happening, instead of facing total frustration.

I am a believer in simplicity, and I speak from personal experience and for many thousands of Canadians when I say that when Canadians have to deal with our tax system the result is absolute and total frustration. The average Canadian has to have some knowledge of accountancy; he has to be a bit of an economist, a bit of an insurance agent, and so on. All this is causing a great deal of anxiety and confusion in the minds of Canadian people.

Perhaps I am just talking off the top of my head; perhaps I am not really putting my point very well to the members of the House of Commons. But, surely there must be some way for us to bring about greater integration of our tax structure so that Canadians will know where they stand on taxation. For example, I should like to see a greater effort made so that provinces receive benefits from total taxation that are commensurate with their needs. The present system must be frustrating even for the province of Ontario. The Ontario government has done much to contribute to confederation and it must be frustrating for them to wonder if they can meet their obligations, because the tax burden which is imposed by the federal government in part is unrelated to provincial tax needs.

We hear much talk today about reducing taxes. Every time we talk about reducing taxes we hear members on the government side saying that we also want to reduce services. I am not an economist but according to authors whose works I have read, if the government had the courage, gumption and determination to reduce taxes substantially, increased tax revenues would be the end result. That move, as a matter of fact, would broaden the tax base in the country and increase revenue. It may seem foolish to say that you can reduce taxes and increase revenues, but I for one think you can do that. I think it is time we developed that point of view, because by reducing taxes we would give the people an incentive to spend money that would have been taken from them in taxes by the very fact that average earners would then have more money at their disposal.

Some economists insist that if you increase demand that way, you will also increase your tax base and tax resources available to the Canadian people. I firmly believe that. For example, to use the example given by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), if you were to remove the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials, as has been advocated many times, in a few years you would replenish any moneys lost from the federal treasury because you would create new tax sources. For instance, you would create a mini building boom, make housing more accessible for ordinary people and stimulate the economy as well. Look at the jobs that would result. But we cannot get that idea through to the Minister of Finance or to the Prime Minister. The people across the way refuse to accept our ideas when we raise them. They refuse to backtrack one inch because we in the opposition would get the credit for the ideas. I could develop other examples to show that by reducing taxes the average Canadian could buy a better car, better furniture and more groceries in the store. The total effect on the economy would be enormous.

We are getting no tax adjustment in this bill, Mr. Speaker. The government is increasing exemptions by a few hundred dollars for people who are already well below the poverty line. Yet the government has the gall to say to the Canadian people that it is readjusting their tax burden. That is a lot of gobbledygook.

• (8:50 p.m.)

I wish to sum up a point of view which I raised earlier. Your Honour will be hearing this point of view thousands of times in the coming months. It has been heard before. If we want tax reform in this nation, there has never been a period in Canada's history, especially in the context of the United States present attitude, when it was more necessary for us to reassess our whole position with regard to the taxation of basic resource industries. I do not see any proposals for tax reform in the present legislation. I see tax changes but not basic reform.

Let me give a few examples. We export $202 million worth of fish annually to the United States. I believe that roughly $101 million of these exports are affected adversely by the surcharge. We export a tremendous amount of fish. It may not sound much when one is thinking about a total budget of $14 billion, but fishing is a major Canadian industry and in my province alone it affects directly some 20,000 people out of a working force of about 150,000. We bring back our fish, we remove the meaty part of the fish and ship it to our neighbours to the south. They take it and chop it into little fishsticks, they tin it and cook it, etc., and their own people are on the production lines cutting up this fish. It is they who are employed in making fishsticks which sell at a very high price, while the fishermen of this country are still receiving 4 or 5 cents a pound for a product which sells here in Ottawa for 85 or 90 cents a pound.

Never has there been any assessment of ways in which we could give inspiration and incentive to our processing industries so that we could benefit from the labour content. Perhaps this is because we are only talking about exports amounting to $200 million in value—a relatively small industry like fishing. But look at the paper industry. In the last few years the international market has been softening up considerably all over North America. Has the government ever seriously considered offering some incentive for the further refining or processing of wood pulp products, or to measures designed to enable our lumber industry to compete more favourably in the international market?

Consider the iron ore business. I am sure my hon. friend from Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador will wish to say something about this later in the debate. From time to time I visit Labrador on the way to my constituency and take note of the developments which have taken place in that region. Settlements have grown up such as Schefferville on the Newfoundland-Quebec border, and Labrador City and Wabush where 14,000 people live in an attractive, modern community in the north of Newfoundland. We in Canada are getting only a very small benefit from the profits of that investment. The real cream goes to Pittsburgh. We are exporting this raw material and the benefits end up in the pockets of United States investors and big American developers. I do not blame these people. They have the technology, they have the administrative expertise and they possess great financial resources. In addition, they have access to a market which caters for 220 million people. Nevertheless, I am convinced that if we were to encourage further development of these raw resources, the further manufacturing of these materials, great advantages would follow in terms of employment and increased prosperity and I have no doubt that tax arrangements could be developed which would give an incentive to this end.

I shall make another minor point. There lies off the coasts of Canada, both Atlantic and Pacific, territory which is just as much our own as the ground on which we are standing. It is called the continental shelf and it belongs to Canada. We still have to resolve the question of fishing rights because other nations are permitted to harvest our marine resources in the area, but the bottom of that ocean is Canada's...all the minerals, all the resources, everything connected with the bottom of the sea is Canada's by law. There are places off the Atlantic coast where the continental shelf sweeps out for 400 miles. Right now companies such as Shell Oil and the American Oil Company are doing exploration work there.

We have never been given a clear and definitive statement by the government as to where it stands with respect to the taxation of these corporate giants. I have been informed by people knowledgeable in marine law that these great companies have not only been permitted but encouraged to go into these areas without even having to bid on the millions of acres over which they have control for exploration purposes. I have heard the expression that Canadians are the Arabs of the 1920s. I am not referring in a derogatory way to the Arab world. The point is that it was 50 years ago when these people were as naïve about the value of their resources as we are in Canada today. We are considered by these corporate giants as being an extremely naïve nation, as an extremely naïve people.

I have never heard any statement in the House of Commons, for example, setting out what the taxation policy is to be as far as these companies is concerned. Nor have we been given any definitive statement as to what the government is prepared to do to protect the public interest in this field. There is no integration of federal and provincial effort; all we hear is wrangling between the provincial and federal governments while the oil companies are laughing all the way to the bank—and the bank is not a Canadian bank.

In addition to all this, we have a great opportunity to further develop our mineral resources in the opinion of some knowledgeable people in the area. Is this not another field in which we could encourage the corporate community of Canada, the business community, to become involved in exploration work? I remember when I was a little younger than I am today; the Prime Minister at that time was my hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I recall being a long way from Ottawa—the east coast of Newfoundland is a long way from Ottawa.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. He may, of course, continue if the House gives unanimous consent.

Mr. Bell: If Your Honour would check with the House I am sure you would find there is unanimous consent for my hon. friend to continue his very pertinent speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House consent to the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate pursuing his remarks?

Mr. Perrault: I will give my consent if the hon. member will agree to answer a question before he ends his speech. I have been listening very attentively to what he has had to say.

Mr. Lundrigan: No conditions. I will answer the hon. member's question, after I have finished my speech, for half an hour if he wants me to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The Chair wishes to remind the parliamentary secretary that it needs more than the consent of the parliamentary secretary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House give unanimous consent to the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate to pursue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Perrault: I suggest it requires my consent as well. May I ask my question now?

Mr. Lundrigan: When I have finished my remarks. Then the hon. parliamentary secretary, the member for B.S.—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member now has the floor by unanimous consent and he is the one to decide when a question may be asked.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Lundrigan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I did have a few further points to raise as suggestions. However, I shall not take the time of the House to make them now; I shall do so later when we get into committee of the whole and make a clause by clause analysis of the legislation before us.

As I was saying, in 1961 and 1962, when the right hon. member for Prince Albert was Prime Minister and we were even more distant from Ottawa than we are today because communications were not as sophisticated as they are now, I remember listening to the talk emanating from Ottawa about developing the north, about the vision of the north, and could visualize the Prime Minister of that day leading the Canadian people, with his usual style and magnetism, into the exciting prospect of developing the northern resources of this country.

I vividly remember that and the tremendous effect it had on me as a young Canadian who was just old enough to vote. I have not witnessed that kind of attitude in this country during the last three or four years. I have not seen the kind of leadership where our people are told that we must develop our great resources. The continent of Labrador, which belongs to the province of Newfoundland, with all its natural resources, the great oil reserves in Alberta, require for their full development vision, determination, incentive and drive. This is what is lacking at the present time. Not only is it lacking in this bland and bare piece of legislation now before the House; it is lacking in our whole attitude to the development of the resources of this country. We have no leadership, no development programs, no drive or determination.

I should like to see Canadian-owned and Canadian-inspired industries given a little extra incentive to develop our natural resources in the north, our oil, timber and so on. But this is what is missing in this tax legislation and in the attitude taken by the government. In short, we lack leadership. I am receiving no inspiration from this government and neither is the average Canadian investor. No incentive or inspiration is being given to even our business community.

No incentive is given to encourage people to go into the north and make a few dollars for themselves. How many members of this House of Commons have seen our people spend six or eight months working in the north in order to earn a few extra dollars to put in their pockets? These people are adventurers, explorers and developers, yet they get little benefit from their efforts. They give up the easy amenities of life defined by the hon. member for Mount Royal, the one who believes that everything should be big and rosy under the street lights. Certainly there is lacking the inspiration reflected by the author of "Sam McGee," Robert Service and other great Canadian writers, and this whole attitude is compounded by the lack of leadership shown this country.

In conclusion—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lundrigan: —I want to deal with a matter that I am sure others will want to develop. We have in Canada today the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, sometimes called DREE, which sounds like some form of nasal congestion. This department is charged with eliminating regional disparity in Canada. Under this new, just society there is to be no more regional disparity in Canada.

One of the things that someone has dreamed up is that we are not prepared to amend our monetary and fiscal policies on a regional basis because we might offend Canadians in other parts of Canada. So the department has decided to give incentives to enable industries to be started, for example, in the Gaspé area, a slow-growth area which has been called a designated region. I do not know what Tom Kent calls it because there are so many different nomenclatures attaching to it. Although this has been the thinking and philosophy of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the officials of the department have shown a good deal of interest, their programs just have not worked.

Why have they not worked? It is because these designated areas are among the most backward in Canada, economically. They have few formalized business structures. Few of the businessmen in the Gaspé are able to open up their books to prove they qualify for an incentive grant; they are not able to say that they received $40,000 from firm A and $50,000 from firm B. I am sure the hon. member will agree that business communities are not well formalized in the underdeveloped parts of the country in particular.

The fact is that the philosophy of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion—if there ever was one except in the mind of the former deputy minister—has not been a success. Put our loan program, our fisheries development program, the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Small Businesses Loans Act and our incentive programs all together in the same bundle, we still have not eliminated areas of greatest disparity in Canada. On this basis I challenge the Minister of Finance to rethink his tax proposals as he lets them float away down the drain during the next few months. Let him either consider modifying the monetary and fiscal policy of the government on a regional basis or reassessing the direction being taken by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

I put that forward as a suggestion, though I do not know that I can back it up with all of the examples that I would have to use to convince the hon. member from Calgary of its merit. But I can tell him that in the province that is most economically deprived and with which I am most familiar, the present tax package put forward by the minister and the programs under DREE are not to our advantage. These underdeveloped areas have great potential, yet they are made to feel like the foster children of the Canadian nation, as if they are having an unhealthy effect on the unification and Canadianization of this country.

I have rambled on for a few moments, Mr. Speaker, but I do want to give the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault) the opportunity to raise his point of order, which I am sure will consist of a calculated attempt on his part to embarrass me after hon. members opposite have listened to 50 or 60 minutes of a few things which must certainly hurt a little.

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that embarrassing him is the last thing in my mind. I have listened attentively to his remarks. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate is a considerable orator, but some hon. members are somewhat baffled and bewildered by what he has said.

Mr. Stanfield: Question.

Mr. Perrault: My question is this. I took copious notes of what he said and at one point he said, "We are being blackmailed into presenting a positive outlook on this bill". Does the hon. member find it painful to be positive? That is the question.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I am assuming in answering the hon. member's question that the House is giving me the time to do so in order that he will be able to understand my reply, though that would take a lot of time. Let me say very seriously that if that is the most serious question that he can ask me, having listened to my feelings for the last 50 or 60 minutes, I am amazed at his intellectual bankruptcy.

Secondly, if he would care to check the official report he would find 50 or 60 places in that report where I made adjectival or adverbial slips. My point is that when one talks from the heart, one really believes what one is saying and one does not worry about whether hon. members get the full adjectival and adverbial meanings that are intended. Quite frankly, that question does not bother me at all.

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker...

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member made "fuddle-duddle" the new magazine.

Mr. Osler: No, I did not. I have not enough brains to think of a name like that. You would have to be much more bilingual than I to think of a name like that. Before I get serious, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) that...

An hon. Member: You are reading.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Mr. Osler: Yes, I am, and I can read my own writing for a change. I made a note that suggests the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) said there was some dire reason why entrepreneurs from central Canada had not rallied to the aid of the oil industry in the west and that there must be some plot on the part of this government or a previous government of the same political persuasion. I do not know much about his part of the world and I respect his judgment in respect of Newfoundland, but in my part of the world a lot of people spent 40 or 50 years trying to convince the people of Canada there was a gold mine in the oil fields in Alberta, but nobody did a thing about it. The Americans came in, started testing and took up land options. If anybody is to be blamed for the situation in the oil industry of western Canada, it is not the Americans. They took what was offered them and prospered as a result of the lack of action by the entrepreneurs in central Canada. I hope you people have more luck in your venture. Perhaps the people have become more sophisticated in the last few years.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie). I have great respect for him and his opinions.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Osler: Mainly because he is a Manitoban, and they deserve more respect.

An hon. Member: What about Borowski?

Mr. Osler: Borowski was one of the few people in that government with any brains.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Osler: You had better watch out, because before you know it you may get him.

An hon. Member: We wouldn't trade him for you.

Mr. Osler: You wouldn't have the chance, so that is a very academic question.

The hon. member for Dauphin referred to the fact that the personal savings of Canadians were dwindling and they were not being encouraged to save. He suggested this was the result of some mysterious plot fostered by the present iniquitous government. I do not have the latest figures, but the figures for last month show exactly the reverse. Canada has a higher per capita saving today than it has had for a very long time, probably higher than it has ever had. In addition, the gross national debt per capita is lower than it has been for many years.

There is a great deal of saving taking place. If this were not so, where would all the money be coming from to pay for the increased housing that is taking place? More housing units are being built in this country than ever before. More housing starts are occurring in one year than occurred in ten years under any other government. I ask where the money is coming from if the savings in the private sector have dried up or the people have been frightened off by the present government? There is something obviously wrong with the figures quoted by the hon. member, and I just point that out as one Manitoban to another. Perhaps his research men have made a mistake.

The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate talked as though the federal tax was putting such a drag on everything. I do not like the tax any more than he does, and if the federal tax could be decreased I would join with him in a whoop for joy. He must realize that municipal and provincial taxes are much higher than federal taxes. Provinces and municipalities obtain a far greater tax share from the people of Canada than the federal government. When you travel around your constituency, at least in my part of the country the main complaint is in respect of real estate taxes; that is what bothers people. This is a strictly provincial matter. Perhaps the provinces should ask the federal government to make a deal in this regard, but we cannot do a thing about real estate taxes as long as provincial and municipal governments grasp this avenue of revenue in their hot little hands. We are doing what we can. In any event, this matter does not have any place in a debate on federal tax reform.

It occurred to me there was a bit of cloudy thinking by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) in respect of the amendment he moved to this motion. He has a perfect right to disagree, and I expect him to do so because that is the job of the opposition. The motion suggests that we throw the whole bill out because of unacceptable levels of inflation, persisting unemployment and stagnant industry. If his statements were true they would have no place in this debate. They should be made during the budget debate, and that debate has concluded. There is a difference between budgetary problems and tax reform. We are now talking about tax reform. If hon. members did not like the budget they should have complained during the budget debate. They should not propose amendments relating to the budget during a debate on tax reform.

It seems there was a bit of cloudy thinking, again, on the part of the research department who advised that hon. member. He suggested the opposition wants meaningful tax reform as though there were no meaningful reform in this bill. That is stretching the point, even for an opposition member who is being paid to be opposite. There are increased exemptions. Some may think they should have been more and some may think they should have been less, but this is a meaningful tax reform. The removal of a million people from the tax rolls is a meaningful tax reform. The reduction in taxes for 4.7 million others is a tax reform.

An hon. Member: What about the removal of the estate tax?

Mr. Osler: I will get to that.

An hon. Member: Good.

Mr. Osler: The guarantee that people 65 years of age and over will not pay taxes on their taxable income of $2,250 for a single man and $3,600 for a married man is a welcome change. You cannot sweep these reforms under the carpet. You might say you would like to have more, but then you should suggest how the government will get more money in order to accomplish this purpose. You cannot sweep these reforms under the rug by suggesting there is no reform. By doing so you are discrediting this place, and parliamentarians cannot afford to be discredited.

There is also a reform in our tax system in that we are adopting the principle of a capital gains tax. I think it is time this country got into line with other countries in respect of a tax system including capital gains.

Mr. Orlikow: It is only a half-price measure.

Mr. Osler: It may be suggested it should be 150 per cent and then everyone would be happy, but people engaged in business must have some encouragement. If hon. members on the opposite side of the House do not believe in what the government is suggesting, they should say so where they campaign. Hon. members do not say so in Manitoba where the NDP has formed the government.

We are doing all kinds of things to encourage business. Hon. members opposite cannot encourage business by discrediting the government in respect of a capital gains tax.

An hon. Member: Oh, come off it.

Mr. Osler: I tried to get a copy of the latest budget presented by the government of Manitoba but my secretary could not find it. My own secretary is on holiday and I have a new girl who is strange to the work. That budget will show that long before we brought in the proposition to eliminate the estate tax, the government of Manitoba had placed itself in a position where it had to increase taxes this year to balance its budget. It was then very easy for the government of Manitoba to be highly moral and suggest the federal government had committed a sin because it would cut them out of the 50 per cent or 75 per cent they would get from the estate tax. This is the way they felt in Manitoba in spite of all the assurances by the minister that they would be compensated.

Try to convince the farmers or the entrepreneurs that this is the case. Try to convince them that they can make as much money as they like and they will be taxed at the rate of 50 per cent, 75 per cent or 150 per cent on capital gains but get no relief in respect of succession duties, and you will see what little faith they have in this argument. If you try to become elected there against our promise that they will pay nothing when they leave their property to someone else, you will lose. Even if you were elected you would not have enough to pay the salaries of the ministers who are elected because there will be no one left in the province to pay the taxes.

• (9:20 p.m.)

So be realistic. If you are going to talk, try to talk a little sense. If you want to put on an estate tax, then suggest what the capital gains tax should be and what the estate tax should be and then tell us what it will do to people who have worked hard all their lives in order to pay the tax. Your Premier asks for heavy taxes to help Manitoba be a good province. I have nothing against the Premier. I just say to you, "Be consistent; tell the same story in this House that you tell in Manitoba and we will all be very happy."

The amendment I referred to earlier may have some bearing on the budget, but unfortunately we are not talking about the budget. We have already talked about the budget and have adopted it. The budget created a shift in monetary policy which has caused Canada to drastically expand its rate of growth. All we need do is look at the figures of OECD which indicate that prior to what happened last month Canada was coming out of whatever problems it was in and had attacked them in the right way and was on the right side.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Osler: You can laugh if you like. We are considering here a new tax policy designed to rationalize the tax system and introduce greater equity into it. Rationalization and equity have been achieved by the new deal for individual citizens, as I have pointed out. It may be suggested it is much nearer equity than anybody has proposed before.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Olser: You can laugh, but let us see if anybody could make your system work. It was tried in England and in New Zealand, where it was thrown out. We do not need it here. We have had an opportunity to see how it works. If we were talking about a clause by clause analysis of this bill I would not be competent enough to speak because I am neither a tax expert nor an economist. However, we are talking about the bill in general at the moment.

When considering tax reform—and this new bill is just that—we must consider one aspect of that subject which I feel should be looked at when we are involved in the clause by clause study. I refer to the regional aspects of tax reform. We need to bring in tax concessions to encourage high employment industries in the slow-growth regions. As an example I refer to the Prairies. Manitoba has solved its unemployment problem, relatively speaking, by emigration. Between 1961 and 1966, 30,000 left as a result of emigration and, tragically, 11,500 of these were between 25 and 44 years of age. I could recite other figures, but I did not bother to look them up on this occasion; I have previously placed them on the record. Surely this is the wrong way to solve the unemployment problem. It is certainly not an example of the equality of opportunity for which this government stands. So far as we from Manitoba are concerned, it is not equality of opportunity to send our young people away in order to keep the unemployment rate down, and it is not good for Canada as a whole.

I point out that 44.5 per cent of the Canadian-manufactured products used on the Prairies come from Ontario and Quebec. Flowing the other way, only 1.9 per cent of the Canadian-manufactured products used in Ontario and Quebec originate on the Prairies. This represents a whopping 14.4 per cent of all Prairie-manufactured goods. In other words, the markets of Ontario and Quebec are very important to us. We are in a unique position. Our second most important market is the central part of Canada. So when you talk about DREE and the shift to manufactured goods, you are talking about a shift to manufactured goods which in the Prairies at least depends on the well-being of central Canada for a market. I submit that we on the Prairies are vitally interested in the economic well-being of the central region of Canada.

An hon. Member: You are reading.

Mr. Osler: I did not read that. If Canadian policy allowed us to grow, as Canadian policy reputedly does, we would be able to buy from the central part of Canada more than the measly 6.4 per cent of the manufactured goods that we presently buy. Traditionally, we were supposed to be a captive market for the east. We do not now mean as much to the central provinces in terms of a market because they are interested in world trade. We mean very little to them, but they mean a great deal to us as we enter the manufacturing phase. Generally, we must have conditions which encourage the purchase in Ontario and Quebec of our manufactured goods. Of course, the big employer is found in the consumer services, but these in turn must feed on secondary manufacturing to reach a take-off point of their own and it is the secondary manufacturers I am humming away at tonight. We are nowhere near a take-off point yet and we need regional taxation policies that will help us get there.

The Prairies are the only region where the primary sector exceeds the secondary, commodity sector in labour force size. Within the Prairie region those engaged in agriculture represent 18 per cent of the primary sector, despite a decline in the farm labour force. This is a far larger percentage than anywhere else in Canada. Since agriculture still dominates our area, and since the agricultural labour force is declining, the labour force on the Prairies is bound to show less rapid growth than in other regions, despite the fact that we are shifting over to manufacturing and that we are doing everything we can to keep people from emigrating.

Though the percentage of total employment in service industries is comparable to that in the rest of Canada, the total labour force itself cannot grow as rapidly as in other regions until or unless employment in the secondary sector can take up the slack caused by slow growth of employment in the primary sector, the farming community. I suggest that when we look at tax concessions we should look very hard at encouraging to the maximum degree manufacturing processing and completion of our farm goods, in much the same way as our hon. friend suggested in respect of fish products in his part of the world.

Our economy has been tied into agriculture for a long time and I do not believe it is turning into a liability, as many people suggest. We should place more accent on manufacture and finishing of agricultural goods. This could go a long way toward providing a key for the future growth and prosperity of our part of the world.

In taking a hard look at tax concessions, the deliberate tax concessions built into our tax policy as a matter of regional economic expansion, let us not forget what is already being attempted under manpower training programs and DREE. If we can do this in respect of raw materials, mining and for Canada as a whole, we can surely have a good, hard look at doing it in particular cases in particular regions through encouraging regional growth.

• (9:30 p.m.)

After all, that is what DREE is doing or is attempting to do. It is doing a good job and it is not neglecting the Prairies. In 1969 and 1970 DREE put 26 per cent of its total outlay into the Prairies, that is, $52 million. Of that amount, $13 million went to our province of Manitoba. So it is wrong for the prophets of gloom and doom and the professional organizers of some parties to say that this party or this government does not understand or does not care for the west. It spent $52 million there, plus a great amount on housing, for which of course the government of Manitoba is taking credit but 90 per cent of that is federal money through CMHC in almost all cases. This federal government is doing more for the west than did any other federal government. It must try to do more; it must continue its efforts to understand the particular problems of the west and it must not allow itself to be stampeded by all the noises it hears from time to time from lesser elements that happen to hold office in other parts of the country.

There is nothing wrong with the DREE approach. I encourage it and I welcome it, but I think it should be re-examined. If you are spending $52 million on the Prairies, would it not be better to give $52 million worth of tax concessions to secondary industry to produce certain results which you wish to achieve, and leave it to individual businessmen to take the initiative and to get going? It is something worth examining. At the same time I suggest that we take a very hard look at this aspect of multinational corporations and subsidiary corporations. In our tax bill we have good proposals in this regard, but I think we should look at them hard before adopting them finally on a clause by clause basis.

Mr. Benjamin: We have been looking at them.

Mr. Osler: But you cannot understand them. There is no use in your looking at them. I am speaking to people who are responsible and who can understand them. We have had opposition days for years, and they do no good. I am talking to the government. You people have made no constructive criticisms. Someone has to. This is a job for the backbenchers of this party, and we welcome it, both in caucus and in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Osler: I repeat what I have said. In general, I congratulate the minister for his bill, and in particular I think we should look with a great deal of interest at every clause as it goes through. I urge that from the point of view of my region we consider the possibility of putting DREE funds to better use in respect of tax concessions.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, following as I do the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler), I cannot speak without making a few comments on some of the things he said. He said again and again that the debate we are conducting at present is about legislation which will bring about tax reform in this country. If anybody outside this House were to characterize these proposed changes in the tax structure as tax reform, I would immediately say they were lying. I know that it is unparliamentary to use that kind of language about things which are said in this House, so I simply say that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has misrepresented completely what this bill proposes to do.

Mr. Osler: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Osler: I rise on a point of order just to point out that if I thought the hon. gentleman was serious and had thought through what he was saying, I would raise a question of privilege.

Mr. Orlikow: I was never more serious than when I said that while this bill may change the tax structure in the country, there is nothing in the way of tax reform in it. The hon. member tried to create the impression that only the wild-eyed radicals in this part of the House were critical of this bill.

Mr. Osler: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not think that I used the word "radical". Under no circumstances would I call these Tories radical.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Chair has no alternative but to rule out the point of order because it is a point of debate.

Mr. Orlikow: The financial columnist of the Toronto Globe and Mail, the anchor, the flagship of that great newspaper chain started in Winnipeg, F.P. Publications, Ronald Anderson, in discussing the legislation which we are now debating wrote on June 19 the following about the bill which the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre lauded so much:

> The tax bill brought down last night by finance minister E. J. Benson represents a major reprieve from the proposals advanced in the 1969 white paper on tax reform.
>
> The capitulation, on almost every proposal that had met substantial opposition, was more complete than even the most vigorous critic of the white paper could have foreseen.
>
> All the key proposals—the integration of personal and corporation taxes, taxation of capital gains at full rates, five-year revaluation of common shares, and the intended distinction between widely held and closely held corporations—have vanished without a trace, as has the plan to allow small corporations to be taxed as a partnership.

That was the assessment of these proposals by the financial correspondent of the Globe and Mail. The position we have taken with regard to the revision of the tax system in Canada has been a simple one. Our position has been that what we need in this country is to establish a tax system which will provide equity for the people of Canada, which will provide that the people who have the income will pay their fair share of the taxes which are required to meet the cost of government in this country.

Where did we get most of the ideas which we have been espousing for almost ten years? We got them from the report of a royal commission appointed by a Conservative government headed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). That commission was chaired by Mr. Kenneth Carter, one of the most prominent chartered accountants in Canada, a former director of the Canadian Tax Foundation. That commission, which was appointed in 1962, took two years to make its study, spent about $3½ million dollars and brought in a very detailed and comprehensive report on the Canadian system of taxation, what was wrong with it and what ought to be done. I wish the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, before he made his speech, had taken the time to look at the recommendations of the Carter commission, because those recommendations are a condemnation of almost every word of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Let me summarize some of the points made by the Carter commission. It found that billions of dollars of income were escaping tax altogether, or enjoying tax privileges which lightened the tax burden on them. If I have time later I will put on the record from a speech made by the former Minister of Communications, a member of the Liberal party—a speech which obviously the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has not taken the trouble to read or, if he has, he certainly has not understood it—figures which show how much the mining, oil and gas companies of this country have been able to escape from paying their fair share of taxes.

The Carter commission recommended lower taxes for people making less than $10,000 a year and higher taxes for people making over $10,000 a year and for persons making capital gains. It certainly did not recommend a tax reduction for people who have an income of $100,000 a year or more, as the government is proposing. The recommendations of the Carter commission were opposed vigorously, as could have been expected, by the 5 per cent of the people of Canada who get special privileges under our present tax system. And, Mr. Speaker, they were effective. The white paper introduced by the government watered down the proposals of the Carter commission a great deal and the tax bill presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has further watered them down so that there is very little left of them.

What did the Carter commission find? It found that present taxation does not afford fair taxation for all Canadians. It found that the present tax structure has led to Canadians being less well off, through lack of goods and services that could be provided through more efficient use of labour, capital and natural resources. It found that compliance and collection costs had been needlessly raised by duplication in provincial and federal administrations, and that federal tax administration is open to political influence. It found that the fiscal situation has not been used as effectively as it could to maintain full employment, contain inflation and encourage Canadian ownership of Canadian industry.

A few moments ago the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre said that things were getting better in this country. Of course, he completely ignored the fact that for the last 15 months we have not in any month had less than 6 per cent unemployment on a seasonally adjusted basis. The Carter commission found that federal procedures to obtain and analyse new ideas on tax increases or for hearing the views of taxpayers were inadequate.

What did the Carter commission recommend? It recommended that mining companies should have depletion allowances removed. Some 85 per cent of the benefit of such allowances go to only eight oil and mining companies, most of which do not need this incentive. Removing these exemptions would provide a minimum of $150 million a year to the treasury. That was in 1964, and those companies have become richer and more powerful since then.

The commission pointed out that the uranium industry in its meteoric existence to 1964, on an investment of just one-quarter of a billion dollars made a profit of over a quarter of a billion dollars, 100 per cent on its investment, but paid only $30 million in taxes. Do I need to remind hon. members from Ontario that having made these tremendous returns, the uranium companies walked out of Elliot Lake leaving the miners with no jobs, leaving them with houses that could not be resold and as a result caused individual homeowners and CMHC to lose a tremendous amount of money? The workers lost, the taxpayers lost, but the uranium companies did extremely well as a result of our tax system.

The Carter commission talked a great deal about how the life insurance companies got away with paying virtually no tax. I am not going to go into details in that regard because since then we have plugged some of the loopholes, although not all of them. It talked about how land speculators and freeloaders who played the stock market were able, and are able, to get away with paying virtually no taxes. I point out that this is about the last country on earth without a meaningful capital gains tax. A man who works and earns $5,000 a year pays tax, but a speculator who makes $50,000 on a land deal or in a flutter on the stock exchange does not have to pay income tax on his gain.

What is the government proposing? It is finally proposing a capital gains tax but, Mr. Speaker, not a tax like anybody else would pay, not a tax on the full income earned as the result of a capital gain but a tax at half the rate which the ordinary taxpayers pay. That may suit the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre but it certainly does not suit the ordinary workers who elected him to come to Ottawa. The Carter commission recommended that all income be taxable. I think Mr. Carter used some pretty good vernacular when he said that for the purposes of taxation a buck is a buck no matter how one earns it. What would that mean? It might hurt the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre although I doubt that it would hurt many of his constituents.

If that recommendation had been adopted, all income would be taxable, including stock options, gifts—the government proposes to eliminate the succession duties and gift taxes and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre thinks that is a good idea—and pay of any kind such as strike money, unemployment insurance, compensation, sickness, group and life insurance, credit union and consumer dividends, tax free allowances, profit sharing, gambling gains, premiums paid by employers for hospital and medical insurance, and so on. Had these kinds of principles been included in the legislation which we are dealing with today, we would have seen a redistribution of the tax burden so that wealthy individuals and corporations would pay their fair share of taxation. The Carter commission estimated that in 1964, $523 million more in corporation taxes would have come to the federal government in one year, $271 million of that from foreign investors.

I suggest to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre that if Ottawa had that kind of money it could do something to help the provinces and municipalities overcome the difficulties such as his constituents have in paying their real estate taxes. The hon. member is more concerned about the profits of the mining companies than he is about the taxes of his constituents.

Mr. Osler: Mr. Speaker, I hate to be repetitive . . .

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the hon. member rising on a point of order or a question of personal privilege?

Mr. Osler: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not mind taking the jolly chidings of the people on the other side; it is part of the game. They are not intellectually very significant and we can slough them off, but when one is misquoted it must be pointed out. I made no brief for the mining companies in any way. If you look at the record I think you will find that I said there should be special grants to other companies to provide jobs rather than just to extractive industries.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member may be allowed to make a slight correction but he cannot make his speech again. I think the point was well taken, but I suggest that we allow the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) to continue his remarks.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I said that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre had agreed with the government's proposal to wipe out the succession duties and gift taxes. Since the hon. member has objected—and he did not mention mining companies—let me correct what I said. The hon. member is more concerned about the millionaires in Winnipeg who will be able to leave their estates to their children without paying any taxes than about the constituents who are concerned about how to pay their real estate taxes.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Osler: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, an hon. member cannot impute motives to another. I cannot be told by an hon. member who I am more concerned about. If he has ten fingers he can count twice the number of millionaires that there are in my constituency.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. In the opinion of the Chair the point raised by the hon. member is, again, a question for debate. It is very difficult for the Chair to follow the debate if hon. members intervene any time another hon. member says something with which they disagree. It is difficult to apply the rules of this House without the co-operation of hon. members.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear that I was not imputing motives; I was simply drawing what I considered to be a logical conclusion from the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

If the recommendations of the Carter commission had been implemented they would have provided generous tax credits for post-secondary education costs. They would have put a tough limit on travelling and entertaining costs and stopped expense account living. They would have provided for the taxation of families as units with provisions for averaging year to year income over five years. They would have provided for the maintenance of basic exemptions in the form of zero taxes on the exempt amount and much lower taxes on the balance.

Compare those proposals with the proposals made by this government. What we find, Mr. Speaker, is not the movement toward a more progressive system of taxation. In the western world, whatever our political beliefs, we have come to believe that we want a more progressive, a more equitable system of taxation. What we have here is a deliberate plan to continue the regressive and unfair system of taxation which for years has been deliberately weighted so that people in the lower income brackets pay a higher percentage of their income in taxes than those in the middle and upper income brackets.

Let us look at some of the specific proposals contained in this legislation. One is that wage earners be allowed to deduct 3 per cent of their income or up to a limit of $150 a year for expenses incurred while working. I can take the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre down to the trades hall located in his constituency and introduce him—I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, it is not quite in his constituency; it is in the constituency of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—to a dozen people in his constituency who belong to unions. In the course of their work these people are required to buy safety boots, hard hats and tools. I can introduce him to dozens of people who have to drive 35 to 50 miles each way, daily, to get to the construction site where they are employed. For these people the government, which believes in a just society, which wants to give us a system of equitable taxation, has provided a deduction of $150 a year. This is what the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault) are applauding.

Let us compare that with the deductions permitted the businessman or the self-employed person. He can go to a convention anywhere in the world as long as it pertains to his work, to earning an income, to creating more business for his company, and the entire expense will be borne by the taxpayer of Canada. He can take anybody he likes out for dinner or lunch and the cost of the meal and the drinks will be charged to the taxpayer. I say, Mr. Speaker, that if tomorrow we were to go to the Chateau Laurier or the Skyline Hotel at lunch time, 75 per cent of the people present would be on expense accounts. Why can we not get the same kind . . .

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member be kind enough to answer a very short question? Is not the same principle applied to union leaders when they have to meet their people?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, first of all, union leaders do not . . .

Mr. Prud'homme: I have been entertained by them.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member was entertained by union leaders because they thought they would benefit in some way, they certainly threw their money away.

Mr. Stanbury: He can't be bought.

Mr. Orlikow: I do not know how the expenses incurred by union leaders are charged, or whether they are taxed. To my knowledge, no trade union makes a profit or files an income tax return or corporation tax return. I do not know how a union leader's expenses can be charged to the taxpayer. They may be charged to the union member, but not to the taxpayer. Even if this were the case, it would be just as improper as for the businessman who charges his expenses to the taxpayer.

Mr. Faulkner: Absolutely.

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Faulkner) says "absolutely" and I agree with him. I am not saying that businessmen should not be permitted to charge expenses. What I am saying to the hon. member for Peterborough, who represents a heavily unionized constituency, is that union members should be entitled to some of the same tax benefits as the businessman who contributes to his campaign.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AIR TRANSPORT—AIRLINE PILOTS' REQUEST FOR EARLY ACTION ON HIJACKING

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, on September 10, I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) if he had received a telegram from the Canadian Airline Pilots Association requesting early ratification of the Hague convention on aircraft hijacking and whether the government would soon introduce legislation on this matter, as promised. I should point out that on November 26, 1970, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) in answering a question from the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) said that he hoped to introduce legislation this session. This can be found in Hansard at page 1495.

• (10:00 p.m.)

On May 13, 1971, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Béchard), speaking in the adjournment debate on behalf of the minister stated that his department was preparing a series of amendments to the Criminal Code, including certain articles on hijacking, and that these would be introduced shortly. When the Secretary of State for External Affairs answered my question the other day he said the matter was under study, but he could not give me a definite answer at that time. It is for that reason that I raise my question in the adjournment debate, hoping to get a full answer tonight.

The entire question took on new importance last fall, on September 5, 1970, when the Palestinian guerrillas hijacked four jet aircraft simultaneously and held the aircraft and passengers as hostages. Up until that time most of the hijacking was the work of individuals or small groups. The Palestinian guerrillas' hijackings were organized on a large scale for political purposes and placed many lives and much property in danger. Later in the fall, on October 15, 1970, a Soviet airliner was hijacked to Turkey, the stewardess was murdered and two pilots wounded. These events led to world wide discussion of the problem.

The twenty-fifth General Assembly of the United Nations during the fall of 1970 passed a resolution condemning hijacking in all forms and requested action by all countries to make it illegal. The resolution passed by 105 to none, with eight abstentions. Canada voted in favour of the resolution. The Security Council of the United Nations passed a resolution without a formal vote condemning hijacking and appealing for the release of the hostages who were being held.

The problem was also discussed by the Interpol general assembly in Mexico City, by the International Federation of Airline Pilots Associations, by ICAO and by IATA during the autumn of 1970. All the resolutions passed demanded action. On December 15, 1970, ICAO approved an international convention known as the Hague convention which could make hijacking and related acts criminal offences, with severe penalties, and which ruled out political motives as an excuse. It was provided that the convention would come into force when ratified by ten countries. This happened last week when the United States became the tenth country to ratify the convention.

Although Canada approved the convention last December, we have not yet ratified it, nor have we introduced a bill to make this serious offence a crime. I hope that the minister or somebody on his behalf will assure us tonight that this will be done shortly, not only for the safety of pilots and crews of aircraft but for the protection of the many passengers who travel by aircraft throughout the world.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, before the Canadian government can ratify the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft, known as the Hague convention as requested by the Canadian Airline Pilots Association in its telegram of September 9, there will have to be certain jurisdictional amendments to the Criminal Code. The preparation of these amendments is in hand and the Ministry of Justice expects that they will be introduced in the House within a few weeks. In the meantime it should be borne in mind that there are provisions in the Criminal Code at present dealing with the hijacking of aircraft which, while not as sweeping as the Hague convention, deal with the problem to a considerable extent. I refer the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) and all hon. members of the House to the 1959 amendments, section 5A. It is the intention of the government to ratify the Hague convention as soon as Parliament has enacted the appropriate legislation.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, September 15, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY

TABLING OF LETTER FROM QUEBEC PREMIER TO PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table, under Standing Order 41(2), a letter from Premier Bourassa concerning family allowances, as requested yesterday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In view of the importance of this letter I wonder whether the House would agree to have it printed as an appendix to Hansard?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For letter referred to above, see Appendix.]

* * *

TRADE

TABLING OF COMMUNIQUÉ ISSUED FOLLOWING SIXTH MEETING OF JAPAN-CANADA MINISTERIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table a copy of a joint communiqué issued at the conclusion of the sixth meeting of the Japan-Canada ministerial committee held in Toronto.

* * *

GRAIN

WITHHOLDING BY GOVERNMENT OF PAYMENTS UNDER TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES ACT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to propose a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43. This motion arises from a very urgent, pressing and serious necessity because of the continuing failure of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) to discharge his administrative responsibilities by failing to pay out of the consolidated revenue fund to the Canadian Wheat Board certain moneys to cover the costs of storage of wheat in accordance with the provisions of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, which still remains Canadian law. These moneys amount to many millions of dollars which rightfully belong to and by now should have been distributed to the farmers of Canada. Therefore I propose to move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams):

That this Parliament authorize and direct the Canadian Wheat Board to sue the Minister of Finance for his failure to pay to the said board for each day in the crop year 1970-71 and that portion of the crop year 1971-72 an amount equal to the portion of the said stocks that exceed 178 million bushels of wheat at the commencement of the crop year multiplied by the carrying charge rate paid by the board at the end of the immediately preceding crop year, as required by the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, chapter 2 of the 1956 Revised Statutes of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity; therefore the motion cannot be put.

* * *

[Translation]

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

TABLING OF AGREEMENTS WITH ALBERTA UNDER ARDA

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), I wish to table copies of the agreements signed recently between the Canadian government and the province of Alberta, under ARDA.

* * *

• (2:10 p.m.)

[English]

INDIAN AFFAIRS

STANBURY—FIELDS REPORT ON FISH AND GAME LAWS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I seek leave of the House under Standing Order 43 to move a motion and to give a brief explanation of the necessity thereof. On September 8, as shown on page 7619 of Hansard, the House passed the following motion:

Withholding of Grain Payments

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the report of the interdepartmental committee, the establishment of which was announced on March 29, 1965, which studied the question of fish and game laws as they relate to native Indians.

The adoption of that motion was contingent upon a statement made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council with regard to the authorization of the government authorities concerned. Yesterday a return was tabled pursuant to that order which states as follows:

This motion was accepted on September 8, 1971, subject to provincial concurrence. We have been informed that the province of British Columbia will not concur in the tabling of this report.

The motion I seek to move is seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). I might add that it is not my desire to enter into a debate about the matter and cut into government business, but we think an expression of opinion by the House concerning this matter is most necessary and urgent in the circumstances because of the importance of this report to the Indian people of British Columbia. The motion I should like to move is as follows:

This House regrets very much that the government of the Province of British Columbia refuses to concur in the tabling in this House of the Stanbury-Fields report.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Skeena which requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

* * *

GRAIN

WITHHOLDING BY GOVERNMENT OF PAYMENTS UNDER TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES ACT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion under Standing Order 43. My motion arises from certain answers given by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board on Monday afternoon in the House concerning the government's attitude toward the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. My motion is self-explanatory. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin):

That this House notes with concern the failure of the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board to take action to protect the interests of wheat producers in western Canada by reason of his acknowledgement that a legal opinion was not requested on the government's action in not making payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act since August 1, 1970.

Mr. Speaker: Under the terms of Standing Order 43 this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent for the putting of the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Howard (Skeena).]

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not unanimity the hon. member's motion cannot be placed before the House.

[Translation]

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR TABLING IN HOUSE OF ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-265 entitled "An Act to amend the Department of Justice Act (Annual Report)".

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill which I have the honour to introduce today is to compel the Department of Justice which is the only department not reporting to Parliament to do so.

This amendment is therefore aimed at correcting that anomaly to ensure better parliamentary control on that department and to improve its efficiency.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

[English]

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN EXPLORATION FOR OIL OFF THE EAST COAST

Question No. 1,212—Mr. McCleave:

1. Did Catalina Exploration and Development Limited suggest to the government any remedies to enable more Canadian participation in exploration for oil off the East Coast and, if so, what were they?

2. If any such suggestions were received, what action was taken on each recommendation?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. Catalina Exploration and Development Limited, in conversations with departmental officials, suggested to the Department of National Revenue, Customs and Excise, that the full rates of customs duty applicable under the law be charged against foreign seismic exploration vessels entering Canadian territorial waters.

2. The Department of National Revenue, Customs and Excise, charges the rates of customs duty properly payable under the law and the representative of Catalina Exploration and Development Limited was so informed.

EXPENSES FOR THE PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

Question No. 1,225—Mr. Nystrom:

1. What were the total expenses for the Prime Minister's Office in 1970 (a) his official expenses (b) his staff expenses?

2. What were the total expenses for the Prime Minister's Office in 1967 (a) his official expenses (b) his staff expenses?

3. What were the total expenses for the Prime Minister's Office in 1962 (a) his official expenses (b) his staff expenses?

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister):

	1	2	3
	1970-71	1967-68	1962-63
(a) Prime Minister's expenses	$ 71,963	$ 64,808	$ 49,496
(b) Prime Minister's staff expenses	$866,239	$293,531	$181,550

NOTE: (i) Fiscal years are used instead of calendar years. (ii) Answer under 3(b) does not include officers seconded from other government departments. Answers under 1(b) 2(b) and 3(b) do not include personnel under contract. (iii) Expenses shown under 3(b) do not include travel expenses for which records are not available.

* * *

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

*SALES OF TEXTILE PRODUCTS IN CANADA

Question No. 1,570—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

From April 1, 1970 to March 31, 1971 (a) what was the value of sales of textile products in Canada (b) what was the total value in Canadian dollars of imported textile products (c) from what countries were the products imported?

Return tabled.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O.26

GRAIN

WITHHOLDING BY GOVERNMENT OF PAYMENTS UNDER TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES ACT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, this is a proposed motion to adjourn under Standing Order 26. Pursuant to Standing Order 26 I ask leave to adjourn the House to discuss a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration. In view of the fact that the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) set out the details in his motion today under Standing Order 43, it is not necessary for me to go into the details in reference to my motion. I merely say that we have never had an opportunity to discuss this matter. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville:

That this House adjourn to discuss the violation of Section 3, Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, Chapter 2, Statutes of Canada, by the Minister of Finance in his failure to pay out of the consolidated revenue fund to the Canadian Wheat Board as requested by invoice by the said board in accordance with the law amounts payable for crop year 1970-71 and monthly payments to date for crop year 1971-72 which adds to the Canadian farmer pool account with the said board.

Mr. Speaker: As required by the terms of Standing Order 26 the hon. member for Calgary North filed with the Chair the required notice. Since then the Chair has given careful and serious consideration to all aspects of the matter raised in the proposed motion.

Hon. members know that two similar motions have already been proposed for the consideration of the Chair and in each instance I had considerable difficulty in reaching a decision; again I have had some trouble in determining whether the motion proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North should be allowed. I want to take into consideration that if Standing Order 26 has a purpose it is for the Chair from time to time to give hon. members an opportunity to discuss a matter which is of urgent importance and is of obvious interest not only to the members themselves but to the people they represent.

The difficulty I have had with the previous motions and, I must say, with the one now put forward by the hon. member, is that it is, as I have said in the instance of the motion proposed by the hon. member for Regina East and the motion sponsored by the hon. member for Vegreville, essentially a censure motion, and the practice is well established that a censure motion should not be introduced in the House under the terms of Standing Order 26 or, alternatively, in the form of a substantive motion or non-confidence motion. I have said, in conformity with previous rulings, that a non-confidence motion should not be brought for the consideration of the House under the terms of Standing Order 26. That is why I would find it very difficult, in view of my previous rulings, to reverse these rulings and to say that at this point an opportunity should be given to the House to discuss the matter.

I suggest respectfully to the hon. member for Calgary North and to the hon. members who have shown a continuing interest in this very important matter that if the suggestion were made to the Chair that we consider at this time or later—I am not sure whether I should put any ideas into the minds of hon. members—the plight which might result from the fact that certain actions are not taken either by the government or by the Wheat Board, then that might be an entirely different situation. I would no longer be faced with the question whether a motion of censure has been proposed to the House under Standing Order 26 which, even if it were proposed every day, I would have to turn down daily.

• (2:20 p.m.)

I do suggest therefore that the motion proposed in those terms, now before me and which was before me when the matter was suggested previously for consideration by the other hon. members, is not acceptable. Having said that, I think I must reach the conclusion that I cannot, at this time at least, accept the motion proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of order. In view of your judgment to which I listened very carefully I would now like to give verbal notice that I will endeavour to take a second strike at the ball tomorrow.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, may I ask that Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand?

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

PROGRAM TO SECURE LARGER SHARE OF JAPANESE MARKET FOR MANUFACTURED GOODS IN AREAS ALREADY LIBERALIZED

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the increased importance of diversifying the markets for Canadian manufactured products I would like to ask the Prime Minister what specific program his government has to enable Canadian manufacturers effectively to secure a larger share of the Japanese market for manufactured goods in those areas of the Japanese market that have already been liberalized?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is an interesting proposal that I had occasion to discuss last Saturday night in front of a section of the Canadian public. I am sure it is something which came up in the ministerial meetings between Canada and Japan. I will ask for a report from the ministers who were at those meetings and see if any progress was made.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, since the Secretary of State for External Affairs was present at those meetings, perhaps I could ask him that question.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think a perusal of the communiqué which I have just tabled in the House would indicate that this was one of the most important subjects of discussion. We believe the Japanese are making progress in the liberalization of their import restrictions. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce expressed his eagerness to take advantage of the new opportunities and is pressing Canadian businessmen to do so.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I clarify my question and make it very clear to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that I am asking what specific program the government has in mind with regard to increasing Canadian exports of manufactured goods, and therefore creating jobs in Canada, in those areas of the Japanese economy that have already been liberalized, whereas the communiqué related rather to the increase of areas to be liberalized?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition seems to lack confidence in the ability of Canadian businessmen to compete in the Japanese market. I do not share his lack of confidence.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Jerome.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I notice that the hon. member for York South is anxious to ask a supplementary, but for the moment the Chair recognizes the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I simply lack confidence in this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

* * *

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—EXPRESSION OF OPINION BY JAPANESE CONCERNING CANADIAN POLICY REVIEW

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the Japanese officials at the meeting expressed any opinion to the Canadian ministers with regard to the policy review under way with respect to foreign investment in Canada? For example, did they express any concern about this policy review that has been going on seemingly just about as long as the Ziegfield Follies?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, the Japanese ministers did not express concern. They themselves have been engaged in a review of their foreign investment policy and we have been encouraging them to become more liberal, as we are. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition would agree that this is desirable. We also assured the Japanese ministers that Japanese investment in Canada would be welcome and that we hoped it would be in the form of a minority interest.

* * *

TRADE

INITIATIVE BY CANADA AND JAPAN RESPECTING ACTION TO OFFSET UNITED STATES ECONOMIC MEASURES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether my question is supplementary, but I noticed it was stated in the communiqué issued following the Canada-Japan ministerial meeting that the ministers of the two countries discussed the various items of present American economic policy, both those policies which have already been implemented and policies which are contemplated such as DISC, export tax credits and so on. I want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the discussion resulted in any agreement by Canada and Japan to take the initiative in international measures by these two countries and the European Common Market to withstand the effect of the protectionist American policies?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, both Canada and Japan have been very active in the various international forums that have been discussing these matters. I think it is fair to say that the United States has been isolated and the countries of the world have joined in asking the United States to remove the surcharge and not to proceed with the other protectionist measures it is contemplating.

Mr. Lewis: I have no doubt that urging will go on, Mr. Speaker, but I was wondering whether there was any discussion at the meeting of ministers of particular steps that could be taken by the rest of the world to counter the American protectionist policies. In relation to that, would the Secretary of State for External Affairs also tell the House why the communiqué refers to the fact that "the stability and growth of the United States economy is vital to international stability and economic growth", without reference to the fact that the same is true for the economies of Europe and other parts of the world?

Mr. Sharp: I would have assumed, Mr. Speaker, that all countries of the world and nearly all politicians would agree it is important that such an important economy as that of the United States should be stable and prosperous—

Mr. Lewis: Any more important than Japan?

Mr. Sharp: That must be very helpful to all of us. That is not to say that we do not want Europe and Japan to be prosperous.

Mr. Woolliams: How generous can you be?

* * *

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—INQUIRY AS TO STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, we are grateful to the Secretary of State for External Affairs for his generosity about Europe and Canada but I would now like to address a supplementary to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the present economic situation in Canada is the result of American policies and emphasizes the vulnerability of the Canadian economy because of foreign ownership of a large part of it, may I ask the Prime Minister what stage of development the government's policy on foreign ownership has reached and whether we can expect some statement of government policy in this field very soon?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is at an advanced stage and we expect to have a report fairly soon. I might point out to the hon. member, however, something that he will realize, that even if there were no foreign investment in Canada and if we were in a position of trading 25 per cent of our GNP with the Americans, we would still be facing this difficulty.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a last supplementary at this time and then recognize the hon. member for Abitibi. The hon. member for York South.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary which follows from the Prime Minister's lecture on economics. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is seriously suggesting that if our economy was not so largely owned and controlled by American corporations the present state of our export trade would exist?

Mr. Trudeau: When I was a teacher, Mr. Speaker, that was called a rhetorical question.

* * *

[Translation]

CRIMINAL CODE

RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice.

Considering the frightening increase in crime and homicides in Canada, does the government intend to bring forward some legislation soon to re-introduce the death penalty for murderers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I missed part of the question, but if it refers to the impending announcement of a new program, the answer is no. The government knows of course that the legislation was adopted for a five-year period and before it expires we shall be ready to state the government's position for the renewal or repeal of the legislation.

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. Can the right hon. Prime Minister tell us whether during the period of application of the law, it will be constantly under review in order to ascertain whether it is truly meaningful?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the reply is that studies have been carried out and are certainly regularly updated since the government, when making its decision, must take sociological facts into consideration.

* * *

[English]

NATIONAL SECURITY

PROVISION OF OPPORTUNITY TO DEBATE ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT—STATUS OF CERTAIN CABINET OFFICIALS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister be prepared now to set a day aside, as he promised, for a debate on security and, in particular, debate on the report of the commission in reference to security matters, which up to now has not taken place.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is not unlike the question about the day to be set aside for abortion, which was asked some days ago by a member of the New Democratic Party. My answer is much the same. We have not in this session been able to advance all the legislation and the policies that the government announced in the Speech from the Throne and throughout the session. It should be obvious to hon. members that we are running short of time. We have already spilled over into this part of the year with a session which normally should have ended in June. This is because the government, of course, is not able to allot time in a definitive way. My answer to the hon. member, much as it was to the other hon. member the other day, is that if the opposition will help us try to set a reasonable time for debate on each piece of legislation or policy which was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, we will guarantee to cover all subjects.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: In light of the lengthy answer and because of the seriousness of the matter, would the Prime Minister now advise the House and country why Mr. Donald Wall, assistant secretary to the cabinet, I believe, and Mr. Donald Bevis, who I believe was secretary to the security panel or cabinet committee, were relieved of their responsibilities recently on matters connected with security and why, if not, they are not forming part of Colonel Bourne's "headless" group?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of internal organization of the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The question really does not make sense to me. I will try to answer, if I can read into the mind of the hon. member. It is as though he were asking me why a lawyer who is working with the Department of External Affairs did not stay in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Mr. Wall and Mr. Bevis have their duties in respect of cabinet matters and Colonel Bourne's group has its duties in regard to the Solicitor General's office. The answer is as simple as that.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I ask one further question. Perhaps it will clear the air. Were these two men not removed from office because the government had over-reacted with the War Measures Act last fall? Is that not one reason?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether that question as asked is in order.

Mr. Nielsen: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That supplementary question was not in order. I will allow the hon. member for Yukon to ask a supplementary to the first question.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, in view of the far-reaching importance of the royal commission's report on security and in view of the fact that in April, 1970, the Prime Minister gave his undertaking to the House to set aside a full day for a debate on that report, will he not reconsider and set aside that day at this time?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I repeat, if the opposition House leaders will sit down with the government House leader and arrive at a sensible schedule for the next months—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That means sensible for the Prime Minister.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Trudeau: —to dispose of the measures which are before the House, including the one that the hon. member just mentioned, then we will be very grateful. We believe that all these measures should be decided either positively or negatively after a reasonable period of debate. I might add, Mr. Speaker, that the allegations in the previous question by the hon. member for Calgary North are completely false.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Twice the Prime Minister has made suggestions or pointed insinuations as to the extent to which the opposition may be at fault in regard to the proceedings of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: I want to point out that there has been between the House leaders, save only when the Prime Minister has unnecessarily intervened, a fair amount of co-operation, and that it is the disastrous disorganization of the government that has been responsible for any wasted time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Selkirk.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member seeks the floor on a question of privilege. He will recognize that as a result of questions of privilege raised yesterday we got into some difficulties. The Chair takes its share of the responsibility in this respect. We missed out on a number of questions yesterday which I am sure would have been of interest to all hon. members. I trust we will not spend too much time today on questions of privilege or order, or disorder.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is very simple. When the Prime Minister was answering the question put to him by the hon. member for Yukon, he gratuitously said that my allegations were false. I made no allegations. I merely asked the Prime Minister for information which he has and nobody else has. He refused to answer the question or to set a day for the debate.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the Prime Minister that it would not be the same question of privilege because I do not think there is a question of privilege at all. I respectfully suggest that we are really engaged in debate at this point. It might be helpful to all concerned if we went to the hon. member for Selkirk and gave him a chance to ask his question.

TAXATION

ESTATE AND GIFT TAX PROPOSALS—RESPONSE TO PROVINCIAL REQUESTS FOR DELAY

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Has he yet replied to the letter which he received from the first ministers of the provinces in which they asked for a deferral of one year on the estate and gift tax proposals now before the House? If he has replied, what is the nature of the reply?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no substantial reply was sent as far as I know.

Mr. Rowland: Does the government intend to send a substantial reply to the first ministers?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the best reply would be the position the government takes in the House when the bill is passed. We cannot reply to the hypothetical situation as to what will happen if the bill is delayed past January 1, the date that the premiers mentioned in their letter to me.

* * *

SHIPPING

VANCOUVER HARBOUR—ALLEGED PRIORITY TO MOVEMENT OF GOODS DESTINED TO OR EMANATING FROM UNITED STATES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Because of the unprecedented volume of traffic in and out of Vancouver Harbour due to the strikes in United States Pacific coast ports, and in view of persistent reports of priority being accorded to the movement of commodities destined to or emanating from the United States, to the detriment of Canadian goods, would the minister report to the House just what the situation is because, as he is well aware, many western newspapers have become very concerned about this matter and the Canadian public are writing and asking whether they are second-class citizens?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I was in Vancouver yesterday and discussed this matter at length with the marine representatives of my department there and I asked for a full report. On the basis of the verbal replies that were given to me at that time I think I can say that I am satisfied that no preference is being given to American shipments. I have asked for a written report and will make it available to the House and to the hon. member as soon as it is received, which should be within a few days.

[Translation]

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CHEMCELL LIMITED—POSSIBILITY OF KEEPING MONTMAGNY PLANT IN OPERATION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Inquiries of the Ministry

As it is getting more and more obvious that Chemcell Limited is definitely going to close its plant at Montmagny, can the minister tell the House whether any business firm has asked for a grant toward the purchase of the Chemcell buildings in order to set up some other type of production in Montmagny, which would benefit the local workers?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I am not aware of that, Mr. Speaker. I shall look into it and inform the hon. member.

* * *

[English]

AIRPORTS

DEVELOPMENT OF MONTREAL AS DISTRIBUTION CENTRE FOR AIR CARGO—STE. SCHOLASTIQUE PROJECT

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Is the federal government working closely with the government of Quebec to develop a strategy to accelerate Montreal's growth and make Montreal into a North American distribution centre for all types of air cargo? If so, when will a statement be made?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in so far as the specific matter of co-operation is concerned, I know that discussions have been going on with my officials but I do not have too many details with regard to them. I can tell the hon. member, however, that we are working closely with Chambers of Commerce and other groups in Toronto, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver and all major centres to facilitate all these airports and make them as effective and beneficial to their areas as possible.

Mr. Ryan: As many of the major airlines want to have the Toronto international airport site developed for both passenger and air cargo services, and therefore the Ste. Scholastique site in Quebec may become a white elephant, will the government postpone any commitment to the government of Quebec and the Montreal Urban Commission in this regard until the economic feasibility is thoroughly proven?

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. Jamieson: Most emphatically no, Mr. Speaker. We will proceed with the development of Ste. Scholastique at the most rapid rate possible, as we will with development in the southwestern part of Ontario. When people speak of white elephants, I remind the House and the hon. member that ten years ago they told us we were out of our minds for building as large as we were in both Toronto and Montreal and we all know what has happened.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Inquiries of the Ministry

AIR TRANSPORT

IMPENDING PRICE WAR AMONG TRANS-ATLANTIC CARRIERS—GOVERNMENT APPROVAL OF PARTICIPATION OF AIR CANADA AND CPA IN PRICE-FIXING MEETING

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): I have a supplementary question. On behalf of the air travelling public, I ask the Minister of Transport whether he has any report to make to the House about the impending price war among trans-Atlantic air carriers and also whether Air Canada and CPA participated with the approval of the federal government at a price fixing meeting in Montreal last month?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that is hardly a supplementary question. However, the hon. member would have been recognized in due course so the minister might be allowed to reply. I will then return to the supplementaries.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, only a short time ago I learned of the final breakdown of the IATA talks with regard to getting unanimity on a fare structure for the North Atlantic. The government and I personally regret this very much. It may be that in the short term a price war, as the hon. member has called it, will be beneficial to travellers, but in the long run it would seem to me, and I think this view is shared by virtually all members, it would be far better if we had an organized arrangement. We will continue to press for this and try to get reasonable fares for the Atlantic, lower indeed than are in existence in most cases now.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Spadina on a supplementary to the previous question.

* * *

AIRPORTS

NEW STE. SCHOLASTIQUE AND TORONTO FACILITIES—EQUAL TREATMENT BY GOVERNMENT RESPECTING PASSENGER AND CARGO SERVICES

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): My supplementary is again for the Minister of Transport. Will the government undertake to deal with an even hand between the Montreal airport site and the proposed Toronto international airport site both with regard to air passenger service and air cargo?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I can give that assurance without the slightest qualification, Mr. Speaker. I am personally convinced that both Toronto and Montreal have excellent futures in terms of the air traffic business, and we will see that facilities are provided at both airports.

WINNIPEG—DEVELOPMENT OF AIR CARGO SERVICE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): My supplementary, Mr. Speaker, deals with the situation at the Winnipeg airport. Can the minister give the same assurance—

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that again this is hardly a supplementary. The hon. member for Parkdale asked a supplementary. I did not think it was a legitimate supplementary. I suggest to hon. members that a question does not become a supplementary mainly because it deals with the same department. With the consent and co-operation of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, I invite the hon. member for Spadina to ask his supplementary and the Chair will then recognize the hon. member for Brandon-Souris on a different question.

Mr. Ryan: I do not have a further supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary arises from the reply of the minister to the effect that negotiations on cargo matters are taking place in respect of all the major points in Canada. In light of that comment, I wish to ask the minister if the negotiations have taken into consideration the fact of the gradual erosion of the importance of the Winnipeg airport in air transportation matters. Can the minister give assurance that this erosion will not now be carried only into the air cargo field?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I made a tour of the Winnipeg airport the day before yesterday. My colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, reminded me that I left Winnipeg out of the list I gave a few moments ago. I can assure you that it was inadvertent. The volume of traffic through Winnipeg is actually higher, not so much in terms of landings but in larger type aircraft. Passenger movement is higher. The number of technical stops has increased. As I have said on a number of occasions, the bilateral arrangements with the United States which we are now working on lay heavy emphasis on western Canada, including Winnipeg, Edmonton, Calgary and Vancouver.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

* * *

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR OPPOSITION DAY TO DEBATE WITHHOLDING BY GOVERNMENT OF PAYMENTS UNDER TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES ACT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Privy Council in his capacity as government House leader. In view of the fact that a number of opposition days are left over from June and in view of the very strong desire on this side of the House to discuss the non-payment by the government of certain moneys specified in the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, will the government House leader make arrangements for an early opposition day, perhaps the first of the week, so we can have a discussion on this important matter?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, we may arrange for this to include abortion, security and the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act.

RESUMPTION OF DEBATE ON AGRICULTURAL STABILIZATION BILL

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): I wonder if the House leader can give any indication when the stabilization bill, C-244, might be presented to the House for further consideration?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker. This session.

* * *

[Translation]

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT GIVE CERTAIN POWERS TO PROVINCES

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Recognizing the fact that the federal government is responsible for setting up minimum family allowance standards for all Canadians, I would ask the right hon. Prime Minister to tell the House whether his government would agree to granting the provinces certain legislative powers that would take into account the credits allowed by the federal government to that end?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question is not simple. It is not a question of the federal government granting legislative powers to the provinces because it is clear, under the constitution, that the provinces already have them.

The only question which came up again and again was whether the federal government, which has been making payments for family allowances since 1944, may continue to do that or not. Of course, the answer must be yes: we have to continue these payments for family allowances. That has nothing to do with the letter of Mr. Bourassa in which he proposed an administrative agreement which would not change the constitution or the legislative power of the various levels of government, but would only be an administrative agreement based on the present constitution.

Again, Mr. Speaker, the answer is not any simpler than the question.

Mr. La Salle: May I ask a supplementary, Mr. Speaker?

Keeping in mind that minimal standard set up by the government, that is federalism, and considering that funds earmarked for family allowances would not represent the total amount with regard to this standard, I would like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether the provinces could not legislate on the budget surplus according to their needs.

Mr. Trudeau: There is no budget surplus, Mr. Speaker. The money which is derived from taxes is distributed through our various programs.

The province of Quebec is asking for an agreement which would suit them, and which we are interested in considering. However—I asked Mr. Bourassa this question, which I am now repeating in this House—we want to know whether the federal government is expected to sign one agreement after another without ever being told what the province of Quebec has in mind when it talks of a clearer definition of jurisdiction in the sphere of social security. We want to know, through this agreement, what Quebec is trying to achieve in respect of constitutional amendments.

* * *

[English]

HEALTH

PROVISION OF FREE DRUGS TO OLD AGE PENSIONERS AND GRADED PAYMENTS BY THOSE ON LIMITED INCOMES

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): My question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the Ontario government's decision to provide free medical and hospital care for old age pensioners and the poor after January 1 of next year, is the federal government prepared to give immediate consideration to a national drug care bill which will provide free drugs for all persons receiving old age pensions and graded payments for those on limited incomes who are now covered by medicare?

• (2:50 p.m.)

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated, we are already paying half the cost of free drugs for residents of Ontario, as we do for residents of all other provinces who are in need. We share that cost with the provinces.

Mr. Rynard: I realize that the minister is doing so in part and that there is no compulsion, but this government did bring in national medicare and I am now asking whether this will be completed by adding national drug care.

* * *

TRADE

CANADA-JAPAN MINISTERIAL MEETING—CONCLUSIONS REACHED ON METHODS TO INCREASE CANADIAN SHARE OF MANUFACTURED GOODS IMPORTED BY JAPAN

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he can tell the House what conclusions the Canadian and Japanese ministers reached when they discussed methods that might be adopted to increase Canada's share of manufactured goods being imported by Japan? I ask this question in view of the fact the minister said that this matter had been discussed and there is no mention of it in the communiqué.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is mention of it in the communiqué. We pressed the Japanese to make it possible for Canadian manufacturers to sell in Japan. In the course of the discussions, as reflected in the communiqué, the Japanese said that they were liberalizing trade and were decreasing the number of items under import restrictions. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said that Canadian manufacturers were very anxious to get into the Japanese market, and his department is engaged in helping them. Therefore it is my view that we are creating conditions that are most favourable for the sale of Canadian manufactures to Japan.

Mr. Stanfield: Am I correct in assuming that there was no discussion between the ministers of the two countries as to how Canadian manufacturers could increase their share of the market where quotas had already been removed?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman is suggesting that we should pay subsidies on the export of manufactures to Japan, we are not going to do so.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I asked the minister a question earlier in the question period and he said that these very matters had been discussed at the meeting. It now turns out that they were not discussed at all and that the Canadian ministers had no intention of discussing them there, or here.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister is rising on his own point of order, but I would suggest to the minister that the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition is hardly a point of order and on that basis I doubt that the matter should be pursued.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—FURTHER REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Having in mind today's report from Washington that, despite Canada's representations to the contrary, preparations for the explosion of a massive nuclear device at Amchitka are proceeding on schedule, will the government give consideration now to expressing new and more tangible opposition to this dangerous and useless test?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the evidence that we have from Washington is that the opposition to this test is growing daily. Even the Congress of the United States has passed a bill in opposition thereto. I hope all concerned, including my hon. friend and members in all parts of the House, will support the government in its opposition to the test and make their views known very strongly.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the proximity of this proposed blast to Canada and the effect that it might have upon us, and in view of our concern about enlargement of the nuclear arms race, would the Secretary of State for External Affairs be prepared to introduce a motion in the House so Parliament can express its view on this matter and communicate it to the President?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the views of the House have been very well expressed by members on all sides. I have conveyed those views to the Secretary of State and he knows our position. He knows that we are all unanimously and strongly opposed to this test.

* * *

WELFARE

REPORT ON EXORBITANT RENTAL AND REPAIR CHARGES TO PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State of which I have given his office notice. Will the minister make available copies of a report prepared by Mr. Robert Hébert of the minister's Moncton office about exorbitant rental and repair charges to the provincial government on behalf of welfare recipients?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the notice given me by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal has just allowed me to get very slightly acquainted with the question he mentioned. I will have to get information on the documents and their origin. Then I shall probably be in a position to answer him.

* * *

[English]

POLLUTION

REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON REMOVAL OF SUNKEN "IRVING WHALE"

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport while he is in an accelerating mood. Would he advise as to the progress being made by his department in its efforts to stimulate the movement upwards of the tanker Irving Whale which has been at the bottom of the Gulf of St. Lawrence for over a year?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I believe it was on Friday I sent a letter to the hon. member's colleague from Prince Edward Island and I shall be glad to send a copy to him. It is an up to date report on the situation. I can only emphasize at this time that we want to make absolutely sure that the maximum number of safety precautions are taken before anything is done, but I will see that the hon. member gets a copy of the letter.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I have received the letter referred to by the minister but obtained therefrom no more information than was given to the House some days ago. Can the minister assure the House that action will be taken this year to remove this very great pollution threat, as was earlier indicated by the minister and the Premier of Prince Edward Island? If it is not going to be removed in the near future, can the minister indicate at what date or within what time frame we can expect to have this threat removed?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, as briefly as you will allow me may I say,first of all, that the difficulty is that we are prepared and willing to remove it at the earliest possible moment. However, as my hon. friend knows, we are experiencing a series of hurricanes at the present time, so this is hardly the time for us to start the work. The experts are now examining whether there will be an appropriate time before winter conditions set in to raise the vessel. If that is not the case, we will leave it until the best time available in the early part of 1972. But we shall do it at the best possible time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I bring to the attention of hon. members that there are only about three minutes left before the end of the question period. Therefore I wonder whether we should have too many supplementaries.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question, but first on a question of privilege may I direct the attention of the House to the presence of a distinguished citizen of Prince Edward Island in the gallery, the former premier of Prince Edward Island, the Hon. Walter R. Shaw.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Since this matter is of grave concern to all Prince Edward Islanders, I wonder whether the minister can indicate for what reason the various steps that he outlined to us here in the House and in the letter to me last week were not taken earlier?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is debate.

* * *

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON RESULTS ACHIEVED UNDER FIRST AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the fact that last week another agreement was signed in connection with the Gaspé between his department and the province of Quebec, will the minister make a statement on the results achieved under the first agreement between his department and that province?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): That is not my intention, Mr. Speaker.

* * *

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO PAY INCREASE FOR MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board. In light of the white paper on defence and in order to uplift the spirits of the members of the Canadian Armed Forces, would he comment on whether or not they can expect their pay raise before the end of this month?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): I would not like to comment on that, Mr. Speaker. An announcement, when appropriate, will be made by the Minister of National Defence.

[Translation]

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

NEW BRUNSWICK—IMPROVEMENT OF FRENCH TELEVISION NETWORK

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Secretary of State.

Could he tell the House if the CBC has suggested a solution for improving the French television service in northwestern New Brunswick, following the CRTC statement that such service was not satisfactory?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker, a CBC proposal is before the government in this connection.

* * *

• (3:00 p.m.)

[English]

NATIONAL PARKS

REQUEST FOR MINISTER'S SUPPORT IN SECURING VACATED NATIONAL DEFENCE PROPERTIES

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Will he give his support to the National and Provincial Parks Association in respect of their representations to the Department of National Defence for the release for the purpose of park development of properties it has vacated?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest this question might well have been placed on the order paper, but perhaps the minister might reply as briefly as possible.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, this question is being very seriously considered and I am pleased to tell the House that this summer we had the privilege of signing with Ontario an agreement for the establishment of a new national park.

* * *

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEPS TO PREVENT PRODUCTION SHIFTS FROM UNITED STATES-OWNED SUBSIDIARIES TO PARENT COMPANIES

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. As a result of the recent United States measures and other proposals aimed at increasing United States domestic production, can he now inform the House what steps, if any, will be taken by the government to prevent production shifts from U.S.-owned subsidiaries in Canada to parent firms in the United States?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I missed part of the question, but I will look into the matter and see whether I can provide a reply.

PROTECTION OF GOVERNMENT INVESTMENTS IN UNITED STATES-OWNED SUBSIDIARIES TO PREVENT PRODUCTION SHIFTS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, while the Prime Minister is looking into the matter I should like to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion whether he will inform the House what steps have been taken or will be taken to protect the investments of the federal government in production plant subsidiaries owned by United States corporations in order to prevent production shifts to parent plants in the United States.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I think that I have stated many times in the House that American concerns had no special status in so far as my department is concerned and that they were treated simply like another industry.

[English]

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, is it the government's intention to suspend future grants to all United States-owned corporate subsidiaries in Canada under the Industrial Research and Development Incentives Act?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No, Mr. Speaker.

* * *

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

EFFECT OF UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX ON POLICIES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion whether he has had an opportunity to evaluate the effects of the United States import surtax on the over-all regional economic expansion policies of the government?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Finance has carried out such an evaluation. It gives us a general idea of the potential impact of the surcharge on slower-growth regions.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, does the government intend to continue the regional industrial incentive grants during its examination of the surtax and the measures it proposes adopting to counteract this tax?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I believe that if slow-growth regions are somewhat affected by the surcharge, the government would not want to increase that impact by abolishing grants.

[English]

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Tuesday, September 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray (for Mr. Benson) that Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequent upon the amendments to that act, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West) (p. 7763).

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in my remarks last night I condemned the government's proposals in respect of tax changes and made the charge that what is proposed does not represent tax equity. To summarize, the major recommendations of the Carter commission, appointed by a Conservative government, are very far removed from the provisions of this bill. There are tremendous concessions in terms of what can be charged off against income tax as incentives, that is, business and entertainment expenses of self-employed people, compared with the picayune concessions amounting to $150 per year permitted to the ordinary working man.

There are other anomalies in the proposals put forward by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). A person who earns $5,000 a year in wages will save only $14 per year in income tax under the new schedule. A person earning $7,000 per year will be paying $78 per year more in income tax. A person who has an income of $100,000 per year will pay $1,000 less in income tax than under the old arrangement. Only a Liberal government and a finance minister of the kind we have could suggest that this kind of arrangement is fair.

Let me point out some of the anomalies in the proposal to illustrate its inequity. The minister proposes to increase the limit on tax exemptions in respect of moneys paid into registered retirement plans. The proposed limit will be $4,000 per year. The deferred profit-sharing plan under a registered pension will be limited to $2,500 per year, maximum, compared with $1,500. I point out to hon. members that only people in the upper income bracket are in a position to invest this amount of money in such a pension plan, so the minister's proposal will not mean much in the way of tax exemption.

During my remarks on the budget I referred to what I considered to be the most inequitable proposal in the minister's proposed tax changes. I have in mind the proposal of the minister and the government to eliminate estate and gift taxes. Surely we in this country, as in most modern countries, believe in the principle that a tax system should be designed to provide greater equity in the lives of the people.

Most Canadians who compare this proposed tax system with systems which exist in South American countries will be disheartened by the fact that we have a very small percentage of people who are extremely wealthy, most of whom pay no tax at all, and that perhaps 95 per cent are living in abject poverty. We like to think we have a very fair and equitable tax system. This year the government proposes to eliminate one of the basic features of every progressive tax system, namely, gift and estate taxes.

I said on another occasion that we must give consideration to encouraging people to work hard, using their intelligence and adding to our productivity. We must be prepared to protect them in order to benefit from their ability, intelligence and hard work. We now have a proposal which will permit the transfer of an estate of $1.2 million to the surviving children with no tax at all. These children will reap the benefits of someone who has amassed such a fortune, without contributing in any way to the productivity of this country.

• (3:10 p.m.)

If a person should have an estate of $1 million, let us say, he could turn over to his wife and three children $250,000 each without any tax being payable on it. Invested in a very conservative way, $250,000 can give a person an income of $15,000 to $20,000 a year in perpetuity. To me this is a shocking and disgraceful proposal that the Minister of Finance has made.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler) in his speech last night implied that the speeches made by members of our party in respect of this bill were different from the type of speeches made by members of the government of Manitoba. I have here the text of a statement made by the Premier of Manitoba, Mr. Schreyer, the day after the Minister of Finance made his budget speech. I wish to place on the record some specific comments made by the Premier of Manitoba at a meeting in Hamiota so that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre will know, if he did not know when he made his speech, that what I and other members of the New Democratic Party have said in reference to the budget is precisely in line with what the Premier of Manitoba said. I shall place on the record part of what the Premier said:

> More specifically, now Manitoba would like to ask where is there equity or fairness in a tax system when:
>
> 1. Salary and wage earners will be taxed at 100 per cent of their earnings while capital gains will be taxed, but only on half of those gains, and windfall gains will not be taxed at all.
>
> 2. Unemployment insurance benefits and manpower training allowances are now taxable but business, entertainment and related expenses continue to receive the same favourable treatment in deductions from taxable income.
>
> 3. The three year tax relief for new co-operatives is withdrawn, but the business tax credit to shareholders is increased from 20 per cent to 33 1/3 per cent.
>
> 4. The 'single person' individual receiving a salary of $100,000 a year will now pay $1,000 less in personal income taxes, compared to the person earning $5,000 in wages but pays $14 less in personal income tax—further compared to an individual receiving a salary of $11,000 who now, under the new proposals, will be paying $78 more in income tax.
>
> 5. A wage-earning employee is limited to $150 a year in expenses, but high-income executives will be permitted broad deductions for the expenses involved in moving to new jobs.
>
> 6. There will be many Canadians paying personal income taxes whose incomes are well below the poverty levels, set out by the Economic Council, while a man or woman will now be permitted to transfer his or her original $1 million estate to heirs or friends without paying any taxes.

I believe it should be obvious to anyone—but possibly the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre hears only what he wants to hear—that what we have been saying is precisely what the Premier of Manitoba has been saying.

I should like to spend a few moments making clear to members of the House and the public that what we say in our criticism of the tax proposals made by the Minister of Finance is not simply criticism made for partisan political reasons by members of this party. I suggest the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) should take the trouble to read what I believe is perhaps one of the most important speeches made in recent years by any public figure. I refer to the speech made by the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans), the former Minister of Communications, on June 3, 1971, to the Canadian Economics Association.

That speech was endorsed by 300 top academics in business, labour, government and economics in this country and when the speech was concluded it received a 12-minute standing ovation, something unheard of in the history of the Canadian Economics Association.

Mr. Greene: They never heard one of your speeches; that is the only reason.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I like to be realistic. I know I am not the economist the hon. member for Duvernay is. The only difference between me and the Minister of Energy, Mines, and Resources is that he does not have the brains to know he is not in the same class as the hon. member for Duvernay.

Mr. Greene: That is not the way you spoke about him when he was in the government.

Mr. Orlikow: When he was in the government he did not talk about economic matters but only things like the Post Office, about which he is not as well versed as he is in economics. I am not one of those members who is not prepared to give credit where it is due, even if the person deserving of it is not a member or supporter of our party. I would even like to give the minister who interrupted some credit, but unfortunately he very seldom says anything deserving of credit. I should like to place on the record a few of the observations made by the hon. member for Duvernay in his speech to the Canadian Economics Association:

> Taxation allowances have been used so extensively in Canada since 1949 that the Dominion Bureau of Statistics has been forced to issue two sets of financial figures, the one based on the annual reports of corporations to the shareholders, the other drawn from the reports filed with the Department of Revenue for tax purposes by the same corporations.
>
> In 1968, for example, book profits reported to shareholders amounted to $8,350 million while taxable income reported to the revenue department amounted to $5,021 million.

The hon. member for Duvernay gave some extremely interesting figures in the form of tables which I cannot place on the record because I do not have the time. However, I believe I can summarize some of them. These figures are available to all Members of Parliament through the annual reports issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. If you compare the book profits before taxes and taxable income by selected industries for the year 1965 to 1968, you will see that the book profit of the metal mining industry was $1,707 million while their taxable income was only $222 million. In other words they paid taxes on only 13 per cent of their income.

In the mineral fuels field the book profit was $795 million while the taxable income was only $45 million. They paid taxes on only 5.7 per cent of their profits. Under the heading "Other Mining" the book profit was $374 million while the taxable income was $120 million. They paid taxes on only 32 per cent of their taxable income. In respect of manufacturing we have the point the hon. member for Duvernay has repeatedly been making. In the manufacturing industry the book profits were $12,745 million while the taxable income was $8,052 million. They paid taxes on 63 per cent of their profits. The retail trade, however, made a profit of $1,620 million while the taxable income was $1,445 million. They paid taxes on 90 per cent of their profit.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Is it any wonder that we are in trouble? Is it any wonder that Canadian and foreign money has been increasingly funnelled into the mining industry, the oil industry, the gas industry and the extractive industries which are capital-intensive and employ a relatively small number of people? Is it any wonder that Canadian and foreign money has not been channelled into the manufacturing industries which employ large numbers of people?

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member, but I must interrupt him since his time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There does not appear to be unanimous consent. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to advise the hon. member that there is no unanimity.

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have this opportunity to participate in the debate, particularly because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) seemed to indicate today—at least I thought he did—that he sensed a long and protracted debate. I do not believe that to be true. But I believe that time should be allowed for the opposition parties to project their arguments as far as they possibly can.

I congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) for having proposed the amendment before the House. It gives the official opposition the opportunity to bring to the government's attention the seriousness of the economic situation of our country. A measure as important as tax legislation traditionally has revealed and should reveal remedies to cure ailments from which our society suffers. Nothing in this tax bill, at least so far as I am concerned, counters any of the problems facing our country today. This administration appears so far to have been so administratively inept that none of the provisions included in this tax measure could do anything for the unemployed.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

This is a measure on which the government, if they have confidence in it, could justify an election. Only the good Lord knows how an election could possibly be justified in the third session of this Parliament with a record as bad as that which can be charged to this administration. If any measure could prompt a government into some kind of action, it is this one. It is apparent that this one-man administration is completely oblivious of the problems of the unemployed, of business big and small, of agriculture, of fishing—you name it, Mr. Speaker.

The $50,000 over an eight-year period for a total of $400,000 in earnings before a 50 per cent tax is applied to small businesses is, to small business in this country, a devastating piece of legislation. Over and over again we hear about the money that is reserved in the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. Surely that would help the farmers of western Canada. I have a serious suspicion that this may be held out as a pre-election dole.

So many things have happened to and with this government since the third session of this Parliament began. The third session began with all kinds of glowing promises, and all of a sudden a unique situation developed and the War Measures Act was invoked. Every member of this House of Commons knows that the essence of law and order is the federal government's responsibility. Yet the federal government invoked the War Measures Act, turned that act over to the Attorney General of the province of Quebec to administer and then picked up the $12 million tab—but there is no money for the unemployed!

Immediately after the Quebec crisis was over, inflation was the next thing with which the government had to deal. In a sloppy attempt to curb inflation the government created chaos, massive unemployment, doubt on the money market, impeded industrial development, impeded industrial expansion and created doubt in the minds of international investors in Canadian industries. We witnessed a most inept and incompetent administration at work—ministers leaving, others resigning. But before all this came the white paper, then the amendments, then the bill and then the amendment before us.

I want to deal with this amendment for a moment. The amendment reads:

> —this House deeply concerned with unacceptable levels of inflation, persisting unemployment and stagnant industry and conscious of the necessity for meaningful tax reform declines to give second reading to a bill which does not provide sufficient stimulus to the economy of Canada with appropriate tax cuts and incentives, does not contain adequate tax exemptions and is not calculated to materially improve business and labour conditions in Canada now or in the foreseeable future.

I think it is one of the most appropriately worded amendments presented to this House in a long time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Skoreyko: One thing that concerns me somewhat is that a number of hon. members on the other side of the House had a great deal to say when the white paper on income tax was before the committee, but one does not hear much from them today. Surely they must have something to say either for or against this measure, but they sit silent on the other side of the House. I should like to hear from some of the competent speakers on the other side, from somebody like the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan), the hon. member for Etobicoke (Mr. Gillespie), the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair), the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik). What about the vociferous member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Howard), the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Lind) and that ever-loving member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) who can shirk off any kind of problem with a crooked smile?

These members perhaps finally realize that the minister has completely left the world of reality and that they cannot possibly support this kind of measure. Again, why cannot they support it? Well, they sit and listen to No. 1 as good mummies or good dummies. They cannot understand how the Liberal Party's divine right to govern could ever be challenged. They say, "What difference does it make if we make mistakes; we are Liberals?" You remember, Mr. Speaker, not too many years ago the six-buck boys. Does this not remind you of the old gang, Mr. Speaker? They were defeated in 1957 and they said to the House of Commons that had a minority government sitting on the other side, "Give us back our jobs". After the next election, based on the past performance of this administration, cannot you just see that group over there saying, "Give us back our jobs"?

I want to summarize this legislation. The government, in its desire to overhaul the tax system of Canada—and they cannot be blamed for that—made their first serious mistake at a cost of $44,000 to the Canadian public when the minister brought out the white paper on tax reform. What a masterpiece that was! Even Mr. Pickersgill is incapable of that kind of deceit. Almost immediately members on both sides of this House reacted, expressing a great deal of concern, with the sole exception of the socialists who said, "It does not go far enough".

• (3:30 p.m.)

I wonder how many of the socialists who belong to the Blakeney bunch, or even those who sit in this House have had the guts to go to the western Canadian farmer in Saskatchewan and really explain what Carter wanted to do for the western Canadian grain farmer? Not many of them did, although in the last few weeks they have had much to say about economic nationalism. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) immediately set out to inform Canadians, as did Mr. Bullock and Mr. Asper. I do not need to remind the crowd over there who Mr. Asper is, but he reacted violently and went so far as to publish a book attacking the white paper proposals.

What was the end result? There was withdrawal, retreat, a backing away—and then the introduction of Bill C-259 which is so far removed from the original proposals that, if compared, any similarity between the two could not even be recognized. The government wisely interpreted the hundreds of thousands of objections pouring into Parliament Hill offices as the end of the Trudeau regime unless it backed off. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that after spending $190,000 to answer this criticism, backing off cannot now save the government. What are some of the objections? My first objection is to the $44,000 spent on the white paper, paid by the taxpayer, and to the $190,000 spent to answer the criticisms, paid by the taxpayer. Then, as I say, there was retreat and withdrawal. Members of the government said, "We made a mistake. Sorry you feel that way, Mr. Voter, but we will change".

This measure gives nothing to those who most need assistance—dry bread, a little water, not even butter on the bread, not even peanuts any more, and it threatens the co-op movement with double taxation. The share structure of co-ops is unique, Mr. Speaker, and I hope the government will review that part of the legislation. Business is concerned with the ambiguity of the tax reform legislation. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce wants more time to study the legislation. I hope it is granted.

Let us look at some of the points that make up the criteria for acceptable legislation. What was it that the minister wanted to do? Canadians in the lower income tax brackets face a heavy total tax burden. In recent years sales taxes and property taxes have been increased substantially. Where changes in the income tax can provide relief it must be given to those with lower incomes. The minister said that the government proposes increases in the exemptions to ease the burden on these individuals and families.

Mr. Speaker, let us look at what is shown in the "Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation" published under the authority of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). If a man has a taxable income of $1,200 a year, under these proposals he will not have to pay $15 tax, $1.25 a month, any more. If a man earns $8,000 a year he saves $3 in tax, about 35 cents a week. If a man earns $15,000 a year he will pay $64 more. If he earns $20,000 he pays $39 more. If he earns $25,000 he actually pays $3 less. If he earns $30,000 he pays $26 less. If he earns $50,000 he pays $163 less. If he earns $75,000 he pays $377 less. If he earns $100,000—and this man really needs it!—he pays $1,011 less.

The second point that the minister makes in this booklet is that important forms of income and benefit escape taxation. The government proposes to bring them into taxable income. In particular, a tax on capital gains is proposed. The minister has somewhat backed off that; I suppose mounting pressure has been the reason for his doing so. Later in my remarks I shall deal at some length with capital gains.

The third point that the minister seemed to be concerned about was that through clever devices tax can be avoided under the present law. The reform must close loopholes now available to those with the wealth and expert advice to use them. No one can argue that point. But where are the changes that close these loopholes? The minister also pointed out that wage earners are unable to deduct many legitimate expenses from taxable income. This is an interesting point. He said that new deductions would be introduced to benefit employees and working mothers. That is generous, Mr. Speaker, but what about allowing a man who earns $5,000 a year $150 toward the equipment that he must buy in order to keep his employment, and then taxing his son on any bursary or scholarship over $500? The Minister of Finance may please a few bachelors who would be happy with that kind of allowance, but most married people will not give it their support.

The minister went on to point out that corporations are taxed in ways that are open to abuse and that fail to recognize their differing relationships with shareholders. This appears to be necessary and I am willing to go along with that proposal. The minister also said that the mineral industries enjoy special tax benefits which have existed for many years but which are unnecessarily costly and inefficient. Assistance to mineral exploration and development must do its intended job in a more direct way that is less costly in terms of revenue. I suppose one way is to make it more efficient by reducing depletion allowances; I really do not know. But anyone who thinks that incentive allowances and depreciation allowances are peculiar to Canadian industry is wrong.

There is much concern that the accelerated allowance will not apply to used assets if those assets are recovered from unsuccessful or abandoned mines. If those assets are acquired in such a way that the taxpayer had not used their cost to earn depletion and executed an election, in proper form, to waive his right to use these costs to earn depletion, used equipment or assets should be subject to the allowance. Where is the reasoning here?

• (3:40 p.m.)

The petroleum industry in western Canada, indeed in Canada generally, is expanding its activities to new frontiers in the northern areas where it will require substantial funds to develop the industry, having regard to the competition from and experience of American industry in this area. As an example, the resource development in the Mackenzie delta will require our companies to compete for funds against companies which are developing the Prudhoe Bay area. It is essential that our companies can operate within a fair and reasonable tax structure, giving the industry desired tax benefits equal to those of foreign competitors. In order for our people to reap the benefits of this kind of development, our industry must be able to generate and attract vast amounts of capital for these ventures. Some people argue that the tax incentives are generous and that it is the duty of the government to keep our companies in a competitive position.

Offshore exploration is another area at which the government should be looking. This kind of development has interested the United States government for some time. I would not want to see this administration put obstacles in the way of our exploration companies in this regard. As I have mentioned, incentive schemes are not peculiar to Canada, as some seem to think. I have here an article which appeared in the Vancouver Sun on July 8, 1971, and I should like to put on record one or two of its paragraphs.

> Unfortunately, many of the incentive schemes have been unsuccessful and none has been as successful as those offered to mining.
>
> This is true in spite of the fact that the Canadian mining incentives are less generous than those offered in other countries with whom we compete for investment capital, notably Australia and the United States.
>
> It must be recognized that the mining industry in western and northern Canada faces problems that competitor countries do not face.
>
> Examples are the extreme climates, severe topographic conditions, vast unpopulated areas where mine development includes construction of townsites and transportation systems, no domestic markets and great distances from international markets, high labour costs, low-grade ores, dependence on world market prices that we are unable to influence, to name a few.
>
> The Canadian policy of granting incentives to many industries is unique. Incentives to mineral development, on the other hand, are universal throughout the world.

The key to a successful oil and gas operation is the productivity of its exploration program. Without exploration no new oil or gas would be found. Some of the greatest incentives for searching for oil and gas in Canada, however, are not created in Ottawa or the provinces but come from Washington, for Americans. To illustrate, under Canada's present tax laws no real incentive or encouragement is given to Canadians to participate in a risk-taking venture such as oil or gas exploration. Quite to the contrary, however, American tax laws favour the use of essentially private capital in such ventures. These laws provide a means by which well-to-do Americans can find relief from high taxes by means of drilling funds. A drilling fund is essentially a pool of risk-taking money collected from well-off professionals such as doctors, lawyers and others who may be paying 50 per cent of their top layer of income in tax. Millions of dollars are pouring into Canada from such U.S. drilling funds.

The key to the success of the American drilling funds is that the fund guarantees a 92 per cent tax write-off. On an initial investment of $10,000, $9,200 is deductible. Eight per cent is commission on the purchase of fund units and is non-deductible. The investor thus saves $4,600 in tax, making his net cost only $5,400. If oil or gas is found, the investor has an additional source of income from the newly discovered oil or gas well. If the investor now makes an annual income of $10,000 from this well, he has to declare this additional income, which is of course taxable. However, this time the investor is given a 22½ per cent depletion allowance, leaving a taxable income of only $7,750. If the same investor reinvests the $7,750 in the drilling fund he can again get a 92 per cent relief and claim $3,875 as a tax write-off, and so on.

There are two examples of the kind of investment that has barely touched its potential. The first is the Canadian-American Resources Fund, Inc.—Can-Am—an off-shoot of American Quasar Petroleum Company. Each investor in Can-Am buys his participation in $5,000 units as a partner in a venture, not as a shareholder. Can-Am makes drilling money available to Quasar Petroleum Limited of Calgary, the Canadian subsidiary of American Quasar. The profits from this joint venture are split 60 per cent to the fund's partners and 40 per cent to Quasar. For the individual fund partner, success means income and failure means success because of a lighter tax burden through write-offs.

The second is Husky Oil, a well-known company in western Canada. According to Gene Roark, president of the company, Husky was able to raise $32.5 million in the United States through its drilling fund at a time when the stock market was severely depressed. Much of this money will be spent in Canada on Husky's extensive nationwide exploration program. Implementation of Bill C-259 as presently proposed will continue to favour those elements in the tax structure which have led to the foreign domination of Canada's oil and gas industries.

At a time when public concern favours Canadian nationalism in this area, serious changes are warranted that would at least provide parity incentives for Canadian investors in the oil and gas industries. Perhaps the only solution to this problem is that tax laws in Canada should provide the same basis for at least fair competition with foreign concerns. This objective could be achieved in one of two ways, namely, provide a shelter for Canadian companies or change tax laws that would provide a true incentive for Canadians to participate in risk ventures and the ultimate development of our own resources, regardless of the tax position of these industries relative to other industries in Canada.

At a time when economic nationalism was the byword, Mr. Speaker, the socialists talked about it every day. Where are they now? Did Mr. Nixon scare them off? It is all right to talk about economic nationalism because it gets a few votes, but on analysis economic nationalism is not nearly as attractive with its accompanying hardships. I know a socialist who earns $27,000 a year and whose wife earns $10,000, making the family income in the neighbourhood of $37,000 before taxes. A free car and expense account bring the total closer to $40,000. With that kind of salary it is nice to be political and espouse the virtues of socialism, but don't cut the socialist's salary to the level of those he is trying to convert: and they say Carter did not go far enough! Economic nationalism is the order of the day. It is nice to be a socialist at times because that is the kind of talk that puts them on the pedestal. Move a socialist out of a government job and put him into business for himself and all at once he becomes a free enterprise.

Mr. Coté (Longueuil): Who appointed him?

Mr. Skoreyko: If the minister does not know that by now, there is no point my telling him. Surely the government knows as well as anyone else that in a democracy the most destructive political force is communism and the greatest threat to free enterprise is socialism. Is it not strikingly strange, Mr. Speaker, that this government has set up the Canadian Development Corporation—which cannot get out of the diaper stage—talks about buying Canada back from foreign investors, and then proposes a tax structure which will make every taxpayer tax poor? It seems to me that at a time when Canadians want to own more of their country tax cuts would have been more in order.

What about unemployment in relation to the bill? In that area this government has little to be proud of. Half a million people are out of work, and this government wishes to impose a capital gains tax, increase taxation generally and buy Canada back, to say nothing of the massive expenditures proposed by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) in connection with unemployment benefits.

Is there not something wrong when we consider the money we have wasted—millions on the Company of Young Canadians over the years and $68 million on the Opportunities for Youth program which was bungled in a mad desire to create something for youth today because there was no other way the government could find jobs for them: it is a nightmare that the minister will be living with for a long time.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Baldwin: He is living with lots of other nightmares in the cabinet.

Mr. Skoreyko: Then the government adopted the recommendations of the B and B commission in one of the most divisive pieces of legislation in the history of the country; it was not surpassed even by the flag and unification issues. Mr. Speaker, 48 pieces of legislation received royal assent before we broke off for the summer holidays and not one piece of it was designed to assist businessmen, the unemployed, farmers, fishermen, lumbermen or people like that.

Mr. Baldwin: Shame! That was terrible.

Mr. Skoreyko: I wonder if some hon. members on the other side of the House know what it is like to be unemployed. You may have a family, you may have to make car payments, mortgage payments and probably furniture payments, and have no prospect of a job: you lack training and there is nobody to look to. Then the government says to you, "We did not promise you anything in 1968," which really means, I suppose, "We do not have to do anything for you." The fact is that the government has a responsibility to the people of Canada. It must refer this legislation to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs and allow the committee all the time that is needed to hear from witnesses and from all Canadians wishing to give evidence before the committee. If the committee should recommend the withdrawal of the legislation, it ought to be withdrawn.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I felt it was my duty to take part in the debate concerning the motion on second reading of Bill C-259 entitled "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that Act".

This bill is dense in more ways than one because its 710 pages are very difficult to understand and its complex contents has given rise to the rightful indignation of several co-operatives and Canadian taxpayers. It certainly deserves our special consideration.

I would like to deal more particularly with certain provisions of the bill concerning the co-operative movement in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, with reason, the co-operative movements in Canada are very concerned and dissatisfied with the provisions of Bill C-259. Let us state first of all, so that there be no misunderstanding, that the Canadian co-operative movements are not asking the federal government for any special treatment and, secondly, that they want, in all fairness, to be recognized for what they are.

On reading some provisions of this bill, one wonders if the government has understood the meaning and the definition of a co-operative. The Canadian co-operative movement is a growing financial force in Canada, its importance being on the increase both economically and socially. The Canadian co-operative movement belongs to its members, and not only to the small group of people who are at its head. It belongs to our fellow-citizens from Canada and Quebec, and not to the Americans, nor to foreigners, not to Mr. Nixon nor to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). It truly belongs to Canadians. It is a movement that derives its strength from its base, from its members, and, consequently, it deserves to be understood and to be treated according to its merits.

The careful reader will realize that the provisions in the bill are unfair to co-operatives, and savings and credit unions, because they are not consistent with their judicial structures, basic operating principles and financing systems. Therefore, co-operatives are facing an extremely serious situation, so much so that we can foresee the disappearance of several of them within five years, ten at the most, however deep-rooted and useful to the country they may be.

The normal development of co-operatives would be greatly jeopardized by taxation such as proposed by the present government that does not respect the characteristics of co-operatives. The problem arises because the present government treats alike using the same standards, co-operatives and companies, the big corporations which are in entirely different conditions. Without discussing the provisions dealing with large companies, at least I wish to speak in the name of co-operatives and farm organizations and others in the riding of Lotbinière and say to the government that it has no right to treat co-operatives and large corporations alike.

I have received from my constituency many telegrams which all say practically the same thing. I will not read them all but they come from various places. I have one here from Clément Houle, president of the Meunerie coopérative agricole, of Victoriaville, which clearly sets out the problem to be solved. I quote:

• (4:00 p.m.)

The Meunerie coopérative agricole of Victoriaville is deeply disappointed with the decision of the Minister of Finance to maintain the concept of the capital employed as the basic principle of taxation for co-operatives.

This concept is contrary to the co-operative principle and becomes even more unfair through new Section 135 of Bill C-259 which alters the computation method for capital employed. We believe nowhere else in the world is such a concept of capital employed applied in a tax system. Adoption of this concept will weaken financial structure of our co-operative and decrease possibility of ensuring fair return to our members. We are not asking for special treatment but request that tax system respect structure and operation of co-operatives.

The Meunerie coopérative agricole of Victoriaville is affiliated with the Coopérative fédérée de Québec and was represented by the delegation which met the Minister of Finance on August 11, 1971 to suggest alternative taxation method for co-operatives that would not threaten the very existence of those institutions. We request your support with Minister of Finance to obtain amendment of proposed bill along lines already suggested by co-operatives.

Mr. Speaker, I have other similar telegrams, one from the president of a co-operative in Saint-Jacques de Parisville, from Mr. Claude Cliche, the president of a co-operative in Saint-Agapit and another from Mr. Donat Paul Bissonnette, president of the Saint-Apollinaire cooperative.

Some will say, Mr. Speaker, that this is of minor importance, and I will reply that this is of fundamental importance. I will go even further: members and directors of co-operatives are extremely concerned, and they are cognizant with the problem involved.

As an example, I will read to you a very short and significant letter from Manseau signed by Mr. Maurice Desrosiers, president, Mr. Clément Lemay, vice-president, and Mr. Albert Geoffroy, manager of a co-operative. I quote:

[Mr. Fortin.]

The Société Coopérative Agricole strongly objects to the amendment to Section 135 of the Income Tax Act as proposed by Bill C-259.

The Société Coopérative Agricole will be unable to gather the necessary funds to repay the capital and to pay returns within the new provisions of Section 135.

That means, Mr. Speaker, that co-operatives, the existing institutions which militate, work, labour in most of the Quebec ridings, and increasingly in other provinces particularly in western Canada, will find themselves unable to discharge their commitments with their shareholders since their inception, within the meaning of the legislation which appears in the Appendix to the brief presented on August 11 to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson).

Messrs. Desrosiers, Lemay and Geoffroy clearly say in that same letter dated September 1, what it means:

It is obvious that if our co-operative must disburse more money than it receives, it will of necessity have to cease its operations within a few years.

Société Coopérative Agricole (Manseau) supports the requests made by the Conseil Canadien de la Coopération and the Cooperative Union of Canada as they were presented on August 11 last.

Mr. Speaker, this is the situation at this time. The life of co-operatives is threatened merely because the government does not understand the meaning, the value and the importance of co-operatives. Things must be made clear: what is the co-operatives' position; what do they want? They want to continue to exist and pursue their activities in order to protect private enterprise, to preserve the sense of possession of the members and to enjoy the encouragement they deserve so that this country becomes ours for ever. That is what they propose. Now I would like to quote from a memorandum they have presented and which was published in the newspaper Ensemble of August 27, 1971:

One could consider section 136 in order to establish a specific way of taxing the annual operating surplus of the co-operatives. Co-operatives solicit permission to distribute to their members annual operating surpluses resulting from business transacted with such members and imposition of the balance of revenues paid into the reserve fund at the rate applicable to corporate tax. This proposal is subject to the following limits and terms——which Canadian co-operatives consider to be desirable.

1. That the co-operative withhold at the source and pay a tax on all distributions taking the form of patronage dividends;

2. That the tax thus levied be credited to the member receiving the dividend. Should that member be exempt from taxation, he could claim reimbursement when producing his personal income tax return;

3. That dividends allowed be limited to revenues obtained from transactions carried out with members and that any revenue obtained from non-members be taxed at the appropriate rate for other corporations, unless dividends are also paid out to non-members;

4. That the entire undistributed annual income affected to the reserve fund be taxable at the co-operative level at the rate applicable to corporations.

The movement, Mr. Speaker, claims that this proposal for the assessment of annual operating surpluses of co-operatives should be accepted. It acknowledges the nature of co-operatives and this is why I want to act as their spokesman and strongly insist that the Minister of Finance should reconsider his position. As for the answer that he should have given to the representatives of the 800,000 Canadian members on August 11 last, he should give it right now. He should review his position in that connection to enable caisses populaires, credit unions and the co-operative movement in general to develop and continue to serve Canada.

The heart of the matter is as follows: We have a choice to make as to the proposed tax reform. According to the Minister of Finance, the government is introducing tax reform in order to make the tax system more equitable, in respect of Canadian citizens as well as companies.

The government should not hesitate to change this system in order to protect the interests of Canadians. The basic problem is to know whether the tax system proposed by the Minister of Finance really preserves the interests of Canadians, or whether it will, on the contrary, result in a gradual disappearance of small businesses in Canada.

Is the proposed tax system likely to encourage small businesses, individuals who still believe in private enterprise, or is it, rather, going to discourage people who do their utmost in order to survive and to succeed?

Could it be that the tax system is rather a socializing measure designed to cause small businesses and co-operatives to disappear all the sooner? I must answer this question in the affirmative, because if one reads carefully clauses 135 and others which deal with the co-operative movement, one finds out that this government has no other purpose but to implant extreme socialism in Canada, by bringing about as fast as possible the disappearance of the right of private ownership for Canadians.

The Canadian co-operative movement is based on the wish of every person to be the owner. Indeed, each member is part owner of his co-op, can actively participate through his work, his savings, his sacrifices and his presence, and decide as to his co-op's future since he has voting rights.

There is, in the co-operative, another important principle that one must not neglect in considering this new legislation: it is that in a co-op, all members are equal and are not judged according to the thickness of their wallet, but rather on their value and their understanding of the co-operative movement.

• (4:10 p.m.)

That is why, Mr. Speaker, when one reads the tax proposals of the Minister of Finance, one soon realizes that the government, in putting large companies and co-operatives on the same footing, is obviously but in a devious way seeking to do away with small businesses and the feeling of ownership of co-operative members. That is a very serious matter, especially when we are going through an economic depression, even though it existed before the 10 per cent American surcharge was imposed. The government is using President Nixon's decision as an excuse for its lethargy, its total failure in the field of economics.

But, Mr. Speaker, one fact remains: the policy of the government of the right hon. Prime Minister has entailed shut-downs and bankruptcies in a great many Canadian industries, in the riding of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) in that of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) as well as in other constituencies. One also finds that this backward and ineffective policy of this government brings about an increase in unemployment and decreased motivation among the population to participate in our national growth, since this is a disincentive policy instead of an incentive policy.

Mr. Béchard: This is sheer demagoguery!

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, when one looks at the tax policy and relates it to the ineffective policy of this government which was elected in 1968, it is then possible to understand the hidden though conspicuous intents of this government, namely eradicating the sense of ownership in order to control citizens better.

We will never build a country, Mr. Speaker, we will never build our country—

An hon. Member: Not with this type of speeches!

Mr. Fortin: —with this type of policy.

Mr. Speaker, I apologize for this interruption, but I would be very grateful if you would kindly call to order the hon. government members who are deliberately being disrespectful.

Mr. Béchard: We are listening.

Mr. Fortin: They should at least have the kindness to listen, if they do not have enough heart to speak also.

As I was saying, this government has no economic policy to stimulate the economy and build this country, and the tax proposals show that the government is lost among its masses of papers and its endless inquiries.

They also show how important it is to warn the government, as objectively as possible, so that it may revise its positions and take into consideration the suggestions made by the co-operatives and the credit unions, in order to make of this tax measure something that will truly serve the interests of Canadians.

When in the crisis initiated by Mr. Nixon's decision the government puts $80 million at the disposal of large companies to assist them provided they export to the United States over 20 per cent of their production, it acknowledges the principle of helping those companies to hold their own, in order to maintain the employment level and to promote private enterprise.

If this assertion is true for large companies, how truer for co-operative institutions and small enterprises which abound in Canada and which try to survive regardless of all the problems facing them. We know that Mr. Nixon's decision affects a great many Canadian industries and entails an enormous financial loss to Canada. But I will not be led to believe that that decision is the direct cause of the slump. That is not true.

The direct cause of unemployment and of many other economic problems in Canada is the lack of government policies designed to stimulate, intensify and encourage development of private enterprise in Canada. Furthermore, the government has no policies aimed at assisting consumers, who wield and use purchasing power to absorb goods. Under co-operative methods, members own a share of the co-operative and derive certain benefits therefrom. They are able to buy products at favourable prices.

Let us consider what happens in a general way. If Canadians are really to be able to participate in the economic development of the country, it is certainly not through a disrupted fiscal scale. That is just not so. The principle is false from the start. There should be no taxation when there are no earnings.

Mr. Speaker, when we know that three out of five Canadians are directly dependent on unemployment insurance and social welfare, it is not surprising that their ambition loses its edge and their interest in participation fades out.

As a matter of fact, three out of five Canadians are waiting for the monthly pittance offered by the government to keep them alive, but they don't have any interest because they do not participate in the economic development of our country.

In the case of co-operatives, 800,000 Canadians have made great efforts to attempt to invest in Canada and bring in benefits to their fellow citizens. It is hoped that, at least, the government will not kill this movement, drive it to the wall, but that it will deign answer in the affirmative to the leader of the co-operative movement in Canada by bringing in the required changes to this law which, unless it is amended, will be far from being a forward step.

For the government, it will be a tremendous reform since it sees in it another step towards socialization and the disappearance of private enterprise. But for all Canadians who believe in the value of the human being, in his freedom and his right to achieve his own ideal, for all those who still believe in private enterprise, the legislation represents a step backwards instead of progress.

Therefore, once again I strongly urge the Minister of Finance—who is not here but should be since he is the mover of the bill—to reconsider the parts of the bill relating to the Canadian co-operative movement so that the government will prove to us at least once that it is for private enterprise.

[English]

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is my submission that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) which the House is now debating should be disposed of immediately. It reopens matters that were raised in the budget debate which took place in June. It attempts through the back door, as it were, to reintroduce matters that have been discussed both inside and outside the House throughout the course of this year. I also say, with respect, that it attempts to capitalize on the fiscal and commercial difficulties faced by Canada and all other trading nations as a result of recent United States action in order to create some political advantage for the opposition party. It is, in effect, an attempt to stave off decision on this important bill to amend the Income Tax Act. It is a stall and nothing more than that, and it is in that light that it should be disposed of.

We all know that the question of tax amendment and tax reform has been before the Canadian public for a long time—a great number of people think, for too long. The fact that this matter has been under consideration for over ten years has resulted in uncertainty as to what will finally be decided. It has, I think it can be easily proven, delayed important decisions in the private sector. In the last year or so the imminence of major amendments to our tax legislation has created an atmosphere wherein some people have delayed taking decisions of a business nature that should have been taken earlier and which are important to the development of Canada.

• (4:20 p.m.)

What I am saying, Mr. Speaker, is that we are now seized in this House with a major proposal for the reform of the Canadian tax system and we must address ourselves to that proposal. It is in the interest of Canada and all our fellow citizens that we now proceed with a detailed consideration of this major tax reform measure, and we should permit no political party or expediency to divert us from that purpose.

We are now approaching the point where I hope a vote can be taken on second reading. I trust it is within the wisdom of hon. members to agree with me that the amendment of the hon. member for Edmonton West should be given short shrift, and I hope we can then proceed with the important vote on second reading. We all know that this is merely a step along the way in the legislative process. The significance of second reading is that it advances this important measure to the next stage, consideration by committee of the whole.

At that stage we, as individual members of this House, can perhaps make our best contribution for many months. We can express our opinions on the detailed provisions of this important tax amending bill. It is beyond question that many of the detailed provisions of this immense statute will require careful consideration. We are all aware of the size of the statute; it is in excess of 700 pages and it contains hundreds of clauses, many of a very complex and detailed nature, which touch on and deal with every aspect of our taxation system.

The whole question of tax reform has been before the Canadian public for many years. Since the publication of the white paper in 1969 there has been intense public discussion. The publication of the budget proposals in June of this year brought the discussion to a head, gave it a new direction and, more importantly, incorporated the suggestions of the government in the form of a draft bill which now has been extended in Bill C-259 which is before us.

It is no wonder that people with great knowledge of the taxation system and its implications for the whole of Canadian life are making detailed and responsible criticisms of the contents of this bill. Many hon. members are aware that important submissions have been made to the government by public organizations, by co-operative movements in Canada, by credit unions, by the Canadian Manufacturers Association, by the Canadian Bar Association, by the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants and by many others who have a more particular interest in different industries and businesses in this country.

As a result of the consideration given to this bill by our fellow citizens and these important organizations, many good proposals have been made for change and improvement. In any case, I have no doubt that hon. members of this House, whether they be in the government or in the opposition, have developed ideas as to amendments as a result of their perusal of this draft bill. Certainly, at this stage the important thing for Parliament to consider is the enactment of amendments to the Income Tax Act which will be of assistance to the taxpaying public.

We may never be able to agree on the intent or principle of every amendment that is made, but one thing upon which we can all agree is that whatever is enacted by this Parliament should be clear and expressed in as simple language as possible. I suggest that in the rather arduous days which lie ahead, when we consider these changes page by page and line by line our aim should be to attain clarity and achieve simplicity.

One is tempted at this stage to refer to the important proposals which have been made for amendment, for improvement, for simplification and for clarification. When considering this measure in committee of the whole, hon. members will have an opportunity to speak on the sections of the bill which most interest them or are of greatest significance to their constituents. For myself, at this stage I ask the indulgence of the House to discuss for a few moments the same questions which were discussed by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) during the speech which preceded mine.

I refer to the apprehension, the concern, the alarm and the fear which has been caused by the proposals in clauses 135, 136 and 137 of Bill C-259, with specific reference to the taxation of co-operatives and credit unions. These proposals have been received by co-operatives and credit unions with some consternation. I am in a position to speak rather personally and with knowledge of the effect of these proposals on such organizations. Perhaps I am compelled by our parliamentary rules to say again, as I have said previously, that before my entry into Parliament, when I was practising law I was for many years solicitor and counsel to the Co-operative Union of Canada as well as many other co-operative organizations and credit unions. During the time I held this professional responsibility for co-operatives and credit unions I was directly involved in discussions both public and private on representations presented to the Carter commission, and in discussions with government officials.

Throughout our history the proper basis for a tax system of co-operatives and credit unions has been a controversial matter. I do not now intend to go over all that history except to say that one good principle has been retained in Bill C-259, a principle that has been in Canadian income tax legislation since it was first enacted in 1917. That principle is that not all taxpayers are treated as though they were the same kind of person. There are many examples of this. Throughout the history of this legislation co-operatives and credit unions have been treated differently, for tax purposes, from ordinary corporations because they are in fact different. They are different in their structure, they are different in their operation and they are different in the way in which they allocate their savings and their gains.

• (4:30 p.m.)

For this reason I approve of the philosophy behind Bill C-259 which recognizes it is not the function of the tax legislation of this country to put all taxpayers in the same mould, to attempt to treat them as if they were all the same kind of people, but to recognize there are differences in taxpayers, be they corporate or individual, arising from their structure, the type of business they conduct and the operational pattern they follow. That important principle having been established, it remains only to determine whether the proposals contained in Bill C-259 are a proper way of treating the income of co-operatives and credit unions for tax purposes.

Most members of the House will have received detailed presentations from credit unions and co-operative movements which indicate beyond any doubt that there is a flaw in the present proposals. I do not intend to deal with this problem in detail, but I think it can be clearly said that if these proposals are persisted in they will have one of two effects. First, if co-operatives and credit unions continue to do their business as they have been doing it for many years, they will be forced out of business in a short time by the new tax system.

The only other alternative for co-operatives and credit unions is to change radically their method of operation so that they will become like ordinary corporations. If they should do that they would continue in business but would cease to serve the important social purposes which they now serve. These points have been made forcefully through many representations which have been placed before the government by co-operative organizations and credit unions in Canada.

During the vacation, on August 11, a major presentation was made to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) by the Co-operative Union of Canada and Le Conseil Canadien de la Coopération. These two organizations represent co-operatives of French-speaking and English-speaking Canada. Representations of a parallel nature have been placed before the government by the credit unions of Canada, the English-speaking credit unions being represented by the National Association of Canadian Credit Unions and the French-speaking unions being represented by Les Fédérations des Caisses Populaires.

I point out to hon. members that these are popular organizations. The membership of co-operatives is in the order of 1,700,000. The membership of credit unions is in excess of that figure. These are people's organizations and the people of Canada, be they English-speaking or French-speaking, have united through the co-operative movement, credit unions and many other activities over the years. I think we should bear this fact in mind.

I should like briefly to summarize the position which was put before the government by the representatives of the co-operative movement of Canada on August 11. I read from Co-op Commentary of September 9:

> Mr. Benson was told by the delegation headed by W. B. Melvin, president of the Co-operative Union of Canada and Martin Legere, president of Le Conseil Canadien de la Coopération, that the proposed tax laws would force co-operatives either to pay taxes according to a capital employed formula, considered wrong and discriminatory, or to distribute earnings as interest on member investment rather than rebates on member purchases. The net effect of either of these choices would be to force co-operatives to change their method of financing, their method of dealing with members and their very structure if they are to avoid what would amount to penalties for carrying on as they have from their beginning.

The news release concludes by stating that the Minister of Finance asked for, and received, additional documentation on the co-operatives' position. It reads further:

He agreed to review the situation but pointed out that changes in proposed legislation after first reading may only be introduced by the government at the second reading.

In the same vein, I should like to read to the House part of a letter I received from the leading co-operative association of this province, the United Co-operatives of Ontario. The letter is from its secretary, Mr. R. J. Wright, dated August 24, 1971, and reads in part as follows:

We are at a critical point on the future of co-operatives. It is not that the many thousand people interested in co-operatives are asking the government of Canada to help co-operatives. The request is that co-operatives not be hindered in Canada in ways that they are not impeded in other countries.

United Co-operatives of Ontario feels that section 135 of the Income Tax Act amendments as proposed in Bill C-259 is discriminatory against co-operatives and would be harmful in a manner not used against co-operatives in any other country. Everywhere in the world it has been recognized that co-operatives, owned and controlled by their members, should be able to pay or allocate to patrons any savings or final payments at the end of the year. The proposals in the new tax legislation would have the effect of limiting, and in many cases, prohibiting such refunds by application of an increasing rate of discriminatory capital employed tax.

For years members of co-operatives have instructed their organization to allocate patronage returns into a revolving capital plan as a major part of member financing. Provision is made in these plans for early redemption of such member investment before maturity date in case of special circumstances such as settling of estates or old age. The proposed escalation of the tax rate on capital employed will inhibit the accumulation of sufficient funds to meet this capital redemption obligation. If this occurs, the operations of co-operatives will be greatly weakened and in many cases they will be forced out of business.

UCO was part of a co-operative delegation which met Mr. Benson on August 11 and proposed an alternative method of taxing co-operatives which would not jeopardize their continued existence.

I am sure that what I have said, coupled with what hon. members on all sides of this House have said on this important subject, is sufficient to convince all hon. members that the provisions dealing with the taxation of co-operatives and credit unions must be carefully reviewed and revised. I am hopeful that the government, after the consideration of these briefs which the Minister of Finance promised the delegation, will appreciate the necessity and the wisdom of making major changes in these clauses. I believe it would be unthinkable for Parliament to accept amendments which would have the effect of destroying important social organizations in this country.

• (4:40 p.m.)

I could say a great deal—as other hon. members could, and some of them have—about what the co-operative movement has done in Canada. But we must realize that by and large the co-operative movement in our country remains a service for the agriculture and fishing industries. It is a mainstay in many agricultural and fishing communities. It is an important part of the fabric of the lives of Canadian farmers and fishermen. They have enough problems without our contemplating in any way measures which would have the effect of disturbing one of their financial and commercial mainstays, the co-operative movement.

The credit unions operate in a wider area, not only in the country and in the rural areas, not only among farmers and fishermen but to a much greater extent than co-operatives in the urban areas of Canada. There is hardly a major factory in this country, hardly a major commercial establishment which does not have a credit union—and who here would not say that credit unions have done nothing but good for their members over the many years they have been in existence? Therefore, I say that all of us should take very seriously the representations which have been made to the government and to members of this House about the effect of this tax legislation on co-operatives and credit unions. I hope that, using our influence collectively, we will be able to achieve a result which will enable these organizations to carry on the service to Canadians which they have performed over many years.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to the amendment that is before the House, put forward by the official opposition. So that hon. members of the House will be fully conversant with the amendment, and particularly in light of the remarks made by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair), that it has been put forward irresponsibly and for the purpose of creating mischief rather than having any sincere function in this debate, I would like to reiterate what the opposition is attempting to do. We are stating that—

—this House deeply concerned with unacceptable levels of inflation, persisting unemployment and stagnant industry and conscious of the necessity for meaningful tax reform declines to give second reading to a bill which does not provide sufficient stimulus to the economy of Canada with appropriate tax cuts and incentives, does not contain adequate tax exemptions and is not calculated to materially improve business and labour conditions in Canada now or in the foreseeable future.

I submit that this amendment is very carefully devised to put a stop to the camouflage ritual through which the government is proceeding to deal with the important matter of fundamental tax reform. The whole exercise of carrying out a comprehensive reform of Canada's income tax system, both personal and corporate, began some nine years ago. At that time it was anticipated that there would be a serious attempt on the part of the government to carry out just that purpose, that is, a major tax reform.

The whole gestation period has been a long, tortuous and devious one. The royal commission did not report until 1965 even though it was set up in 1961. The response of the government of the day to the challenge of the report of the royal commission, popularly known as the Carter commission, was to produce a white paper which had such startling innovations that it has caused untold damage to the Canadian economy in the intervening years.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton accused the opposition of being frivolous and irresponsible in putting forward this amendment. I see that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) obviously concurs in the hon. member's suggestion in this regard. I would suggest to both those hon. gentlemen and to the government as a whole that the effect of the white paper as it pursued its long, tortuous course has caused greater damage to the Canadian economy than anything that could ever be put forward at this stage. The threat of valuation day which hung over the entrepreneurs of Canada, for example, resulted in lost production, lost wages and lost development which is reflected in the twin spectres of unemployment and inflation which have been hanging over the economy of Canada ever since the Trudeau administration came into power in 1968.

I would say that the government's approach to a fundamental and basic tax reform might best be compared to the sort of Liberal tinkering that went on in the famous Walter Gordon budget of 1963. It had a serious impact on the economy even though the total budget was dismantled by stages in later years. The process of economic disintegration that began with the Gordon budget was continued by the uncertainty that was engendered by the long discussion and consideration of the white paper.

It is obvious that the Canadian economy has been worsening in recent years. This has been demonstrated by the recent forays of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) into certain parts of Ontario. Even the electronically-generated charisma is not powerful enough to conceal the growing disenchantment of the Canadian public with the policies, or lack of policies of the present administration. Perhaps this is the reason why members speaking for the government are concerned that we get on with haste—undue haste, I would say—with the completion of this preliminary discussion of a major piece of government legislation. They are afraid of the continuing deterioration reaching the point of no return, and certainly, as I shall point out later in my remarks, this situation is quite possible when we consider that we are now faced with the economic blockbuster that came from south of the border just a few weeks ago.

• (4:50 p.m.)

It is obvious in the legislation that is before us, and in the budget that was proposed last June, that the government has no solutions, no plans and no policies for dealing comprehensively with the economic problems of Canada. Just last week on the hustings, the Prime Minister told the good citizens of Cornwall that he had nothing to offer. He did not even use the phrase "blood, sweat and tears" that Churchill used during the difficult days of war. He only said he was nonplussed and had nothing further to offer than already had been advanced.

This tax reform bill should be stalled in its tracks at this time, as is suggested by the amendment, because it is a sudden reversal of the whole direction of government policy and tax reform that was outlined in such precise detail in the famous white paper. Now, that white paper has turned out to be an exercise in futility. Along with the budget that was brought down almost simultaneously, Mr. Speaker, the immediate public reaction was a sort of euphoria, so much so that many commentators were referring to these measures as the sunshine economic initiatives that would bring about a new upsurge in the Canadian economy.

I think the reason for the temporary euphoria that followed in the wake of the government's initiative in respect of the budget and tax reform was something like that given by the gentleman who repeatedly used to bang his head against a wall, and when he was asked why he engaged in this inexplicable procedure he replied it was because it felt so good after he stopped. The situation seemed so bad that anything seemed to be an improvement on what had been taking place, at least in so far as those who are suffering from chronic unemployment are concerned.

The two major economic and fiscal initiatives that have been brought forward by the government are best described as an election budget and an election tax reform bill. It is the action of politicians who are being pushed into a corner by their own inadequacies and indecisiveness. This is a viewpoint that is being expressed not only by members of the opposition. In the past few weeks we have been inundated with careful and thoughtful analyses of the proposals contained in Bill C-259, analyses which have already reached almost heroic proportions in terms of quantity and size.

I have been going through several voluminous documents containing closely reasoned arguments which attempt to analyse the complexities of the government's tax bill and I shall quote from one which I think provides a very excellent summary of the essence of the bill. I refer to the Canadian Tax Reform Review which was circulated by Riddell, Stead and Company, a firm of chartered accountants, in August, 1971. The following is a quotation from the introductory statement to the analysis:

> The outcome of the "great Canadian debate on tax reform" that commenced in 1962 is reflected in Bill C-259 "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act . . . " This prosaic title may well be a more fitting description of what has emerged than the more grandiloquent "Tax Reform Bill".

In other words, Mr. Speaker, they are saying that it is full of sound and fury, signifying nothing.

> When the time, talent, effort and money (both private and government) that have been poured out in the last nine years are considered in relation to the end result, its justification may be questioned. If the debate was required to condition the public mind to accepting taxation of capital gains (already accepted by most industrialized nations), it was an expensive process.
>
> At the outset, it must be stated that the provisions of the bill are extremely complex, particularly in the areas of corporate and international taxation. Many of them undoubtedly reflect the conversion into legal language of computer formulae designed to produce the desired result with as little leeway for error or manipulation as is possible.

That points out a theme that has emerged from the discussions and the deliberations which have arisen from the presentation of this bill to Parliament and to the people of Canada. The consensus is that the bill is complex, confused and does nothing to deal with the problems that require fundamental and basic tax reform, problems that have resulted in the present unhappy slack in the economy.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, as a layman depending on the expertise of the lawyers, the chartered accountants and the economists, I think the bill could best be summarized in these simple terms, that any improvements that it does achieve are in the realm of the ordinary, orderly housekeeping that you would expect from year to year as governments face problems in income tax legislation. And most of the housekeeping that you find in the bill has been necessitated by the fact that there has been a continuous and constant erosion in the value of the Canadian dollar under the growing inflationary pressures which have operated in the Canadian economy since 1963. There was no need to usher in a grandiose, so-called fundamental tax reform bill if you were merely dealing with ordinary, minute housekeeping measures which arise from the erosion of the value of the Canadian dollar.

The bill has another major purpose, as I view it, which is to attempt to plug gaps in the income tax—in other words, to try to catch income tax evaders. Going back to the previous point I was making, raising the income tax exemption levels is an example of the housekeeping changes to which I have referred. With respect to plugging the gaps in income tax avoidance we might mention such things as the surplus stripping that was going on, particularly in resource corporations, in recent years and the proliferation of corporations that was being used as a device to achieve low corporation tax levels. But this is not the fundamental reform that was intended when the whole process of tax review began some nine years ago. Neither does this measure, as I understand it, deal with the basic necessity of achieving the goal of equity as between taxpayers.

• (5:00 p.m.)

I shall endeavour to demonstrate, as will other hon. members, that rather than removing inequities as between taxpayers, the bill increases them in certain important areas of the Canadian economy. On that basis alone I would suggest that the amendment proposed by the official opposition is more than justified. This is not fundamental income tax reform; it is propaganda, electioneering and tinkering with the Canadian economy. This has been the custom and the policy of two recent Liberal administrations from the time of the honourable Mr. Gordon to the present regime of our Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson).

Mr. Baldwin: What is his name?

Mr. Dinsdale: He has various names but I will not use them other than to refer to him in this House as the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Muir: Thirty-buck Ben.

Mr. Dinsdale: We have another major reason for supporting this amendment since the United States government shocked Canada and the whole international monetary community with its initiatives to save the value of the American dollar. If the government of Canada was confused before this event, its reaction since can only be referred to as a state of panic or chronic shock. The Financial Times referred to the reaction of the government in face of this unanticipated event. It might have been anticipated in light of the goading by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in his famous Denver speech not too many months ago, but obviously the government had not anticipated the response of the United States.

The Financial Times writes that the government was "bleating like lambs in the midst of a world cataclysm". The Toronto Telegram used a similar figure of speech. There is a certain uniformity in this because it is drawn from the animal kingdom. It described the government's reaction as "running around like chickens with their heads cut off".

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

The government might have anticipated what was going to happen. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) had been warning the government and Canadians generally that the situation with respect to the American dollar and the American economy would require rather emergent action on their part. The government of Canada had been adopting an attitude of shrill nationalism that was bound to bring some sort of reaction from the government of the United States.

I can recall in recent months direct and continuous hints of barriers being raised against United States capital as well as United States culture. There was a discussion in the parliamentary Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts about the content restrictions being imposed on the media by the regulations of the Canadian Radio and Television Commission. The initial regulation would have made it impossible for Canadians in isolated Communities to receive by means of cablevision signals emanating from broadcasting stations in the United States. This was a direct assault on American culture in Canada and shows the confused thinking of the government.

Seventy-five per cent of the people in Canada, particularly in major centres like Montreal, Toronto, Quebec, Hamilton and most of the major urban centres in eastern Canada could pick up these signals directly from the air. The only way to implement the program would be by electronic jamming, a method usually resorted to by totalitarian states. Apparently it was only the rather isolated communities in western Canada that had to be protected from the painful influences of American culture.

This regulation has been changed and we hope that by debating these measures in the House of Commons the government will be persuaded that what it has done in the economic sphere is similar to what was happening in the cultural sphere. It was flying in the face of reality. With this in mind if we are to resolve the chronic economic dilemma precipitated by the American economic initiatives we shall have to take the realities of the situation into consideration.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is in the House this afternoon and offers comment from time to time. Perhaps he will take part in the discussion. If he does not, I hope he will return to the United States and undo the damage caused by his famous, or infamous Denver speech. As one newspaper commentator put it, "He indulged in the game of kicking the Yankees on the shins". This is fine and legitimate as a political game. Speaking as a westerner, I am all for Canadians developing a reasonable degree of nationalism. Western Canadians do not have the same attachment to the emotionally shrill nationalism that has been doing so much damage to the Canadian economy as do certain other parts of Canada.

The Canadian government has been blowing hot and cold in these matters. There is a Biblical phrase that says, "Because you are neither hot nor cold I will spew you out of my mouth". The government must take a stand; it cannot be vacillating from one pole to another on this matter of nationalism. At one time when the Prime Minister speaks on behalf of Canada he sounds like a continental isolationist, and at another time when the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources speaks he sounds like a continentalist. But when the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) made a speech shortly after the one made in Denver, he took a much more moderate stand.

• (5:10 p.m.)

The unilateral action taken by Canada in certain important matters of mutual defence, such as NATO and NORAD, have their reaction in the dove cotes of government in the city of Washington. When the American government responded with similar isolationism, Canada was caught on the horns of a dilemma. Here we find, as the Financial Times has pointed out, the government "bleating like lambs in the midst of a world cataclysm" and rushing to Washington in the hope of persuading the Americans to adopt that closer relationship and buddy-buddy attitude that Canada and spokesmen for the government were so vehemently repudiating a few months ago.

I should now like to deal with a few specific problems that are generated by this bill and to further the argument that we should delay its second reading at this time, particularly since we are considering it in the atmosphere of a pre-election Parliament. We do not want electioneering on the fundamental and basic question of financial and tax reform. The proposals put forward in Bill C-259 are out of touch with the needs of western Canada. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler) last night dealt with this subject. He is one of the few members supporting the government who has taken part in this debate. Either government supporters have been completely brainwashed into thinking that this is the best possible legislation to deal with the matter, or they have been told to be silent because the government wants to rush this confused, complex and totally inadequate piece of legislation through the House. I see the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Faulkner) shakes his head. I hope he will enter this debate, because we want to hear viewpoints from all parts of Canada on this matter and he represents a constituency that ought to be greatly concerned about some proposals in the legislation.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, speaking as a Manitoban, spoke not as one indulging in basic criticisms but as an apologist for the government. He said, as has the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson) on many occasions, that the federal government is neglecting the interests of western Canada, that it is not in tune with the needs of western Canada but that it is doing its best under the circumstances. I will take a much stronger stand and suggest that the Trudeau government is completely out of touch with the needs of this important part of Canada. This has been reflected at the polls in recent provincial elections. The Liberal leader in Manitoba has re-echoed these sentiments. For the past several months he has been preaching for a call. He is leading a party in the legislature of Manitoba that has been reduced to three members.

Mr. Greene: What happened to the Tories out there?

Mr. Dinsdale: The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) asks what happened to the Tories. I presume he is interested in hearing the reply.

Mr. Greene: Oh, yes.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, the explanation is quite simple. I would think that most of the Liberals voted NDP in the 1969 election, with the result that the NDP representation in the Manitoba legislature rose from a rather insignificant number of members to become the government with a very slim majority. They had about one more seat than the Conservative official opposition. I trust that answers the minister's question. The leader of that province's Liberal party does not even have a seat in the legislature. This is a most unhappy state of affairs because it inevitably results in political provincialism, and nothing is worse for the interests of national unity in this country.

Although Mr. Asper has no seat in the legislature and therefore no platform in the legislature, he is a well-known commentator on tax matters. I trust the government is reading Mr. Asper's writings in the Toronto papers respecting the legislation now before the House. He described the white paper in a major critique as "the Benson iceberg". That description applies with equal force and validity to the bill before the House. It is still an iceberg. The old figure of speech really says that what appears on the surface is only a small part of what is involved; it is just the tip of the iceberg that you see.

From my reading of the comments of experts and professionals, they are saying, "We do not understand what the government is trying to do in this legislation." The Canadian Bar Association has said this; chartered accounts have said it. Experts who know something about this field are saying, "Beware; there are all sorts of booby-traps in the legislation". In these circumstances members of the House ought to vote for a second, serious, sober review of the legislation.

One reason it militates against western Canada is that it will destroy the family farm. The economic basis of the prairie farming economy has been seriously undermined in the past several years by Liberal administrations in this country. I travelled about my constituency during the summer months and learned that there has been tinkering and experimenting to such an extent that farmers who have been farming for years are throwing up their hands and saying they can no longer survive; the policies of the government make it impossible for them to remain economically solvent.

There has been an improvement in grain sales recently. This is vital to the prosperity of the Canadian economy. These sales normally would result in an upsurge in the economy and in a more buoyant feeling on the part of prairie farmers. That has not happened. These sales have made no impact because farmers have been living for the past two or three years on cash advances, and the first charge on any grain delivered in a period of greater activity in terms of grain deliveries is upon the grain delivered. So farmers are running to keep pace with the unhappy economic position in which they find themselves.

I hope we have a debate on this matter and cover that point specifically, especially in view of the extremely precarious position of long-established prairie farms and grain farmers in particular. The government is breaking the law. I cannot for the life of me think why it will not pay out the $81 million, I think it is, which it is obligated to pay to prairie farmers under the Temporary Wheat

Reserves Act. This has been a holdback and has been accumulating for a year. Surely the warning of recent elections across Canada, especially since the Liberal party in the western provinces has all but disappeared, must be plain. If members of the government have any political sense at all they ought to be aware that this is a major storm signal and that it does not auger well for the future national stature of the great, traditional Liberal party.

The Prairie premiers under the initiative of the Hon. Duff Roblin a few years ago organized what has become known as the prairie provinces economic council. From time to time the premiers of the three prairie provinces get together to discuss problems of mutual concern and to decide on policies which will improve the general economic condition of their provinces. It is significant, Mr. Speaker, that recent meetings of the prairie provinces economic council, or of the premiers' economic council have more and more become complaint sessions in which council members have complained against the inexplicable and incomprehensible policy initiatives, or lack of them, on the part of the federal government in dealing with special problems of the prairie economy.

• (5:20 p.m.)

I wish to pinpoint some of these problems that will be exacerbated if this legislation is implemented, particularly if the whole process is carried out in haste. The government has failed to introduce a tax reform bill that integrates the taxing functions of the resources of the three levels of government. Surely it is elementary in this country that tax reform which hopes to achieve a basic reform must co-ordinate with the taxing responsibilities and functions of the provincial governments. There is nothing in the bill that provides for this basic necessity.

The second fundamental inadequacy with regard to provincial responsibilities in this matter is that the bill reduces, rather than expands, the tax bases of the provinces. The whole matter of constitutional reform is another of the initiatives of this government. Over the past three years we have been talking about constitutional amendments with increasing intensity. There has been a parliamentary committee going from community to community and city to city with this question. It has been pointed out that the problem is economic, not constitutional; the provinces do not have sufficient funds to meet their obligations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. He may continue only with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the House give unanimous consent to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) continuing his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): There does not appear to be unanimous consent.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, could we have it on the record that the government has refused to give us time to discuss this bill at this stage?

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Chair can only abide by the rules. There was not unanimous consent and the Chair can only recognize the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters).

Mr. Dinsdale: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I regret that hon. members will not allow me to complete my remarks with regard to the difficult position in which this legislation places the western provinces in particular, but I think the answer of the west—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The hon. member has made his point of order. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Timiskaming.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, for a long time the Canadian public has been faced with the proposition of tax reform. All the discussions that have taken place, including the Carter commission, the Gordon commission and the Benson white paper, have raised a great deal of controversy in the minds of the Canadian public as to what tax reform should be implemented in this country and what the tax structure should be in terms of equality between the rich and those not nearly so affluent. As other members have pointed out, this has cost the taxpayers a great deal of money.

Looking at the size of the amendments now before us and examining the effect of those reforms, one wonders what it is all about. If these tax reforms were general enough to affect the vocal segments of our economy, I am sure the general public would demand equality as between the large corporations and families with two or three children. They would demand that the tax structure would do the things which they felt were necessary. I am sure they would also demand some say in the way matters are handled on their behalf. They would also say that many of the expenditures supposedly made on their behalf are really not made on their behalf but for others who do not need that kind of consideration.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) objected to the Conservative amendment on the basis that it was a delaying tactic. He was not doing this in opposition to the amendment but making a plea for a job that he had previously and to which he might return. He was interested in a number of changes. Surely he did not intend to say that the tax proposals that were before us in June had any relation to the present situation.

I often disagree with the Conservative party because I do not understand where they are going. It is very easy to watch the Liberals. They make all kinds of noise, such as they have done on this occasion. They present all the opportunities to get everyone stirred up and they give the least necessary to win the next election without hurting any of their friends in the process. That is the difference between a Liberal and a socialist. I believe there should be a certain amount of principle involved. Either you believe in tax reform and try to do something about it, or you are just looking toward the next election and the cheapest way of becoming elected on the taxpayers' money. That is certainly shades of Mackenzie King. I was interested in the new CBC series on Canadian content, but what do they have in the background to satisfy the Liberals? They have a beautiful, big picture of Mackenzie King. Many who were in the army and have passed on to their reward would, I am sure, roll over in their graves.

What about the Tory position? In this debate the Tories have talked about tax reform as though any change, no matter what field it is in, will be terrible. They have not been able to discriminate against their big business friends. The previous speaker talked about westerners being different from anyone else. I do not believe that is the case. His party believes in the free enterprise system. I asked a Conservative friend what a free enterpriser was. When I asked if this went back to Adam Smith, he said no, it just went back to Adam. When I asked how he related the two, he said that Eve was free and Adam was free enterprising.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Peters: This may be true, Mr. Speaker; this may be their position, but it seems to me very surprising, when they talk of tax reform, to say that any tax reform should be bad reform.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Dinsdale: No.

Mr. Peters: The hon. member says no, and perhaps I exaggerate. I suppose they would agree that a few of the personal exemptions were good, but they have made a lot of noise about the reforms that were bad, reforms that seem to me to be only a small step in the direction of tax reform, just as the personal exemptions were only a small step in that direction. Members cannot have it both ways, of course.

I am surprised when they talk about socialists in terms of Carter being a socialist. I thought that Carter was a Conservative. Even a little further politically removed, he might have been a Liberal. However, I can assure hon. members that nothing that Carter has ever said has convinced me he is a socialist. Certainly the report of Carter and the members of his commission is not the socialist doctrine of the next century.

Many of us accept the proposals of Carter because they resulted from a comprehensive examination of our tax structures. What he decided, very simply, was that a buck is a buck. I agree that a buck is a buck. Money I receive by way of family allowance consists of bucks. If I make money on the stock exchange, that seems to me a buck too, which is just as easily spent as any other buck. It buys as much beer as my family allowance buck.

It seems to me that Carter's proposals represented a fairly fundamental change. If the Liberals were interested in change they would have paid some attention to these proposals. Although they might have lost some public support, they had the opportunity to make these changes. Not in the third year of their term of office—we have all seen the little pamphlet describing the first three years of the present government—but they could have made these changes in their first year. They did not have to go into all this "b.s." of the white paper. They did not have to have dialogue with the Canadian public; they do not listen to the general public anyway. All they needed to do was to find out which segments of the public vocally opposed certain sections of the report and then modify those sections.

If the Carter proposals have any merit at all, anyone who studies them will agree that that merit stems from the acceptance of all the propositions put forward as a total package, not the adoption of bits and pieces. No doubt some of the Carter proposals are detrimental to certain segments of the economy, there is no question about that, but on balance I think everyone would agree that the Carter proposals are true tax reform. They could have been implemented holus-bolus and Canada would have been the better for it; but adopted piecemeal, Canada is the worse for it.

I am wondering why propositions put forward by those I will call free enterprisers, for want of a better word, always assume that if their proposals are supported by industry or by mining companies then they are good proposals. I know many miners across the country who do not think their proposals are good. In the town of Kirkland Lake there are no mines being operated today. The mines have extracted about half of the wealth of a generation and shipped it to other parts of the world for the generation of wealth there, and at the same time have done absolutely nothing for the Kirkland Lake community. They did not even build the people a community hall. In a similar position is the town of Cobalt, the cradle of Canadian mining. The people of that town were provided over a period of years with a very substandard type of living.

Most of the mining operations of the present day have ceased and the employees have been laid off. The companies say they are waiting for something to happen. What I should like to see them make happen is to get the government to decide to build a smelter in Canada instead of sending our concentrates to Texas or St. Helena. These mining companies are being given a three-year write-off. The uranium industry has been given a total write-off on their expenditure over a ten-year period. A full profit is given on whatever money they spend, over a period of five years in this case. But these measures are not necessarily good for the people of Canada who are still paying a debt to Central Mortgage and Housing for expansion in this particular area.

Many miners have been unable to relocate when laid off. They have established for themselves a standard of living that they have not been able to duplicate and probably never will. It is not always wise to expand industry holus-bolus, because when industry does expand it is usually at the expense of somebody else. Let me give the House an example. Not long ago a gold mine in my region indicated it was going to close down. The company concerned is extensively connected with Panarctic, and I believe they are trying to get $11 million out of the treasury for investment in other developments being carried out by Panarctic. They do not care about the 300 or 400 employees that they had in the Kirkland Lake area; it has been decided that this money is required in order to make a profit somewhere else. The Canadian public is given no consideration.

I think the situation in Canada has now changed drastically as a result of the surtax imposed by the United States. The situation today is different from the situation six months ago. In addition, I think it is time our tax structure reflected a little more our national interest, to enable us to be economically independent of the United States. Has it not surprised you, Mr. Speaker, that the representatives of ten countries are meeting in Europe now to decide what is the best way for the international monetary system to operate, and that Canada, one of the ten participating nations, will have but one vote to the nine votes of the United States? In other words, the United States is going to tell the rest of the world that everybody else is out of step but them.

This reminds me of the story of Mrs. Smith whose son joined the army. One day the army came to town and she, along with all the other people in the town, watched the army go marching by. As she did so she turned to the lady standing next to her and said, "My! The whole army is out of step except my son". This is similar to the attitude of the United States. They have told the world that they are not going to revalue their currency, that every other country of the world will have to revalue theirs. Although the United States says it may be going bankrupt, it wants every other country to get to the same state of bankruptcy so the United States will not suffer.

Not long ago President Nixon stated he was going to take the United States off the gold standard. That statement surprised me because I thought we came off the gold standard after the First World War. I have seen them come off the gold standard twice since then.

Mr. Francis: You mean the gold exchange standard.

Mr. Peters: I do not know what the gold exchange is. I do not know what the gold standard is. All I know is that the United States seems to have control of it. It is they who declare that gold is worth $35 U.S. an ounce and that the world will have to pay that price for it. That becomes the standard. Is it not time that this stupid government that we have and the Canadian public in general said to themselves and to the world that what we need is an international standard that reflects the true worth of a nation?

• (5:40 p.m.)

In my opinion the Canadian dollar is now worth $1.25 in United States currency. We are probably working hard to try to keep it down to par value. We do not owe any great amount of money as individuals in this country compared to citizens of the United States. The United States has told Japan that it must change the value of its currency in order to match U.S. currency. The United States has told Germany that it must revalue its currency, bringing it to favourable terms with the American dollar.

Is it not time that we sat down with representatives of the civilized nations of the world and agreed upon an honest value for an international unit that would be suitable and stable in every country? No matter how much money the United States needs, it finds a source. It accelerates spending as a result of the Viet Nam war. The United States makes a big name as a result of give-away programs. The United States is like a big-time gambler; it bets heavily and throws away its chips. When it finds it does not have enough money, it revalues its currency in relation to our currency and that of other countries. We must be absolutely stupid if we allow the United States to do this. This change in currency has taken place since the budget was presented. We are changing the Income Tax Act by this measure. This is a matter we should consider very seriously. It would not be difficult for me to balance my budget if I followed this course. It would be difficult for me to do so if the bank manager said he approved a big loan today, so my money is only worth half what it was worth yesterday, and did so in order to maintain the bank reserves. The bank could manage very well by suggesting that everyone's money was worth half as much and the bank's reserves remained the same. The banks can get away with this, but this would only happen once before I changed my bank and, hopefully, I would change before it happened.

We will not decide on a tax structure which affects individual businesses and people unless we know where our economy is going. We recently gave second reading to a bill to provide $80 million to one sector of our economy. The industries which will benefit are mainly controlled by foreign interests. We will in fact be saying to the United States that because of our unemployment we are going to take arbitrary steps and force these companies to operate whether it is economical to do so or not. We are going to provide the money to accomplish this end. This money will go to the United States in any event, but perhaps it will not do much in the way of assisting President Nixon's program. We are making a donation. Apparently we are not particularly worried about the unemployment problem because we did not provide $80 million last year to create new jobs; we did not make $80 million available in credit to industries.

Many interested people are attempting to redirect Canadian economics and are suggesting interventions in respect of foreign-owned companies in order to do something about our developing unemployment problem. It may be that we will have to subsidize certain industries. I am sure there is not a member in this House who would stand and say that if 40 men were laid off at a plant in his constituency they should not be compensated through existing measures or by special grants from Parliament. I am sure we would all be prepared to make part of the $80 million available for this purpose. These companies are not interested in making that kind of concession in order to enable United States parent companies with subsidiaries in Canada to operate in competition. These parent companies are not interested in making their Canadian subsidiaries competitive with their United States counterparts.

There are many aspects of this bill which will receive serious and conscientious consideration. One of the new proposals in the bill is that workers will be given the opportunity to write off $150 in expenses in respect of personal equipment. What can you buy for $150? Have any of you ever purchased sockets for use in mechanical work? Have any of you ever purchased meters for use in the electrical field? Have any of you ever bought dental equipment such as is used by a dental technician? We are not living back in the 1920s, we are living in an affluent society in which the tools and equipment required by workers are expensive. I was told by a bush worker the other day that he uses three chain saws per year and that they cost him about $300 each.

If I were the head of a corporation I might suggest that a meeting of salesmen be held in Hawaii during the Christmas holidays. This expense can be written off. I do not blame corporations for doing this, but I do not think it is fair that corporations can arrange such sales conferences in plush surroundings while the average Canadian taxpayer is carrying the load. Every time I go to a restaurant I find that the cost of a meal has increased. While I sit in the restaurant I see people ordering full course meals. Many of them are being subsidized by the taxpayer. We are paying for many of these meals because they are being written off as expenses. The individual paying the tab is likely to be a salesman offering someone a proposition. The average worker is the guy who pays the income tax in this nation. This government suggests we should allow him $150 as a deduction for which he does not have to provide receipts.

When I worked in the mines I had to buy oilers, boots, gloves and equipment which was absolutely necessary but I was not allowed to deduct that cost as a legitimate expense on my income tax. If a large corporation today had to purchase special equipment there would be no argument about deducting its cost. There is no question in respect of a farmer writing off expenses. But when it comes to the individual worker who receives a T-4 slip, he cannot write off anything except these concessions made by the government.

The average individual will consider the $150 exemption as a concession of little or no value. That is about half the price of a chain saw, four or five replacement sockets or a good quality speed wrench. That is a big deal! This government should have made a decision to tax on a pro rata basis and not continue this stupid arrangement we have which discriminates against the worker in almost every area.

• (5:50 p.m.)

I cannot think of a case in which a worker has been given a break by the revenue department. I heard of a case the other day involving a young girl 17 years of age, who was with another family and did not think she had to make a declaration to customs. It turned out that she had $23 worth of goods. The goods were seized and a charge of $9 was levied against her, the car was also seized and there was a charge of $10 before it could be returned. That is a hell of a cheap way to get money. The man driving the car, her uncle, did not think he could make the exemption for her because she was a child. They nailed her for $9 or $10 in respect of goods worth $23. If some big businessman were smuggling—and I know of several cases—into Canada articles worth $5,000, $6,000 or $20,000, a deal would be made and he would pay maybe half the charge or one quarter, or perhaps he would promise not to do it again and would be given a break. But the worker, the little person, does not get a break. Surprisingly, it is the little people who have the largest say in an election but they are not capable of or are not willing to make the decision on their own behalf.

This is the kind of tax reform we are getting. It encourages the little fellow to vote against himself. Really no one will get hurt, despite the cries which members of the Conservative party are making at this time. I could relate some of the things which have been said about the amendment in terms of full employment. I believe full employment is a criterion. I think any Minister of Finance who would consider that less than full employment was the optimum would be at least very derelict in his duty. Those people who are on welfare today, who are receiving unemployment insurance, who are receiving disability pensions and those who are, shall we say, in the category which should at least have established for them a basic annual income which would provide them with a decent standard of living, are not, and should not be, paying income tax.

I am sure there will always be some people in this category. But when we see a situation such as there is in Cornwall where, as was reported the other night by the CBC, there is an average unemployment of 22 per cent, this certainly is not in the interest of the nation. In my opinion any unemployment is not in the interest of a nation. But when you have a segment of the population which is not paying tax, then obviously those who are paying it will have to pay more in order to keep those who are unable to find employment.

We have embarked on a scale of government-oriented unemployment such as this country has never known before. There have been times when the government decided to cut back on unemployment and did so as a matter of policy. However, in Canada I do not believe there has ever been an occasion when government policy decided that a large proportion of the public would be unemployed for the simple reason that there would be less spending power, less money circulating and fewer dollars chasing the goods, so that the government would be able to implement reform and solve inflation. Those who are of that opinion follow the Adam Smith theory. That type of thing is long gone.

It is interesting to note in the pattern of purchases of young people today, as well as many of those who are on assistance of various kinds, that the expenditures they make very often are not in the category which would eliminate inflation. Many of their purchases are in areas which increase inflationary and are causing much of the difficulty. One of these, of course, is housing which produces one of our most inflationary trends. It is inflationary simply because of the necessity for people to have housing and their willingness to pay exorbitant prices for it. This is one field, if we were interested in winter works programs or in other works programs, in which we would be able to expend a very small amount of money—it does not require very much money to get such a program started—reduce the interest rate and provide a guarantee to the lending institutions which have a surplus of money, in order to encourage them to move into the field of housing. If this would increase the supply of housing within the next year or so to the extent that it would meet the continuing growth of the nation and cut into the backlog of poor and inadequate housing such as we have had in this country for the last ten years, it would do a great deal to improve the employment picture of this nation.

It seems to me that anyone looking at tax reform must look at the various measures that are necessary to stabilize the economy of the nation, to relate the economy of the nation to the production and economy of the other nations of the world and to provide for employment in areas where there is a social need.

I would refer to the speech of the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans) in which he suggested it must be a foolish government that is thinking about providing money to downgrade the industrial potential of industries which a short while ago it provided money to develop. I think if we look at our economy in terms of the amendment we will come to the conclusion that we should accept the amendment, look at the economy again and then take steps to do something to improve it.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

APPENDIX "A"

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY

LETTER FROM QUEBEC PREMIER TO PRIME MINISTER

[Translation]

GOVERNMENT OF QUEBEC
THE PRIME MINISTER

September 2, 1971

Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau
Prime Minister of Canada
Parliament Buildings
Ottawa.

Mr. Prime Minister:

You have already stated your Government's intention to table, as soon as Parliament reconvenes this month, a bill involving far-reaching changes in family allowances and other youth allowances.

The Government of Quebec has also announced that it would table in the fall a bill amending the provincial legislation on family allowances, in accordance with the income security policy it put forward in January 1971.

While it has not been possible at the recent Victoria conference to reach an agreement on the constitutional aspect of the whole matter of income security and, consequently, family allowances, the Quebec Government feels it is essential at the present time to find a way of averting a conflict in this particular area of family allowances. To this end, the Quebec Government believes that it would be advisable to include in your proposed bill provisions to the effect that family allowances granted by the Government of Canada in a province must be granted in accordance with any existing terms, conditions and regulations of the family allowance legislation of that province, such as those concerning the recipients, the nature and the amount of the allowances, the decreasing scale of benefits, up to the total amount payable to the citizens of that province under federal legislation.

In our view, the inclusion of such provisions in the bill to be introduced by your Government would meet the provincial priorities and the social objectives which are involved. I therefore urge you to give this request your earnest consideration.

The Government of Quebec would also like to inform you that, in its opinion, there would be great advantages to using the same approach in dealing with both manpower centres and adult vocational training.

Yours truly,
Robert Bourassa

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, September 16, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed Bill S-20, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (Jury Service for Women), to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

* * *

PRIVILEGE

MR. MCGRATH—FAILURE OF "HANSARD" TO SHOW THAT THERE IS A MINISTER OF FISHERIES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege. My question of privilege deals with the failure of the government to carry out the provisions of clause 3, subclause 3, of Bill C-207, the government reorganization bill, which was passed by the House earlier in the session. This clause provides:

The Minister of the Environment is the Minister of Fisheries for Canada.

I might add that that provision was consequential upon an amendment put forward by myself and moved in the House when the bill was before us.

On Tuesday, September 14, I directed a question to the Minister of Fisheries concerning a conservation conference. This question is reported at page 7790 of Hansard and Hansard makes reference not to the Minister of Fisheries but to the Minister of the Environment. When I brought this to the attention of Hansard, I was advised that they must work from a list of the ministry provided by the government and that this list does not contain a Minister of Fisheries. I also note that the list of ministers appended to Hansard for yesterday, Wednesday, also omitted the title of Minister of Fisheries.

• (2:10 p.m.)

I realize that this may not appear to be an important point to some, but considering that it took quite a long debate to bring this very important and useful amendment about I believe there is a continuing need in Canada for a Minister of Fisheries to give this important industry the continuing attention that it so justly needs at this time. Consequently I feel that the list of the ministers supplied to Hansard is not complete as it does not contain the Minister of Fisheries. Therefore I suggest respectfully that, in accordance with the provisions of Clause 3, subclause 3, of Bill C-207, in the future Hansard should record that there is, by the law of this country, a Minister of Fisheries.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will agree that the point raised by the hon. member for St. John's East is one of interest and importance. I have the impression that perhaps the point which he has raised is more a question of legal interpretation, although I am not sure. As I said, the matter is one of interest and I would like to look at it. In any event, at this point the hon. member has not thought it necessary to submit a motion for the consideration of the House and of the Chair. Therefore I will consider the matter as one which has been brought to my attention, look into it and communicate with the hon. member.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT POLICIES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, under Standing Order 43, to present a motion which I believe should receive the immediate attention of the House of Commons. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch):

In view of the unprecedented combination of the highest number of unemployed on record for the month of August and the highest July-August price increase in ten years, this House expresses its want of confidence in the economic policies of the government.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members realize that under Standing Order 43 this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is some disagreement to the motion proposed by the hon. member and the motion cannot be put.

PROGRAMS TO ALLEVIATE PROBLEMS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move a motion under Standing Order 43. Because of the urgency and importance of the motion and the constructive suggestions contained in it I hope it will receive the unanimous support of all Canadian members of the House of Commons.

An hon. Member: What about the continentals?

Mr. Lundrigan: Fullblooded Canadians. The matter involves the August unemployment rates released today showing, in actual numbers, 455,000 Canadians unemployed, the highest number for the month of August since the beginning of the compilation of statistics by DBS in 1946. Because of the obvious urgency of this problem, coupled with other economic indicators which show dramatically the current critical state of the economy, I should like to move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

This House directs the government to immediately launch a series of initiatives explicitly and purposely aimed at the amelioration of the domestic economic problems facing this nation, and that these initiatives include the preparation of a massive winter works program, and that the energies of all related government departments be directed toward this end in an effort to alleviate what will otherwise become the bleakest winter in recent Canadian history.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

MEASURES TO STIMULATE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I ask leave to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland):

That in view of the dismal prospects for the coming winter, forewarned in the statistics released this morning, this House urges the government to bring forward immediately measures to stimulate the economy to prevent a repetition of the high levels of unemployment experienced last winter.

Mr. Speaker: Again this motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The point of order I wish to raise with Your Honour is that the record should show that on each of the three motions sought to be moved under Standing Order 43 the Liberal members objected.

* * *

[Translation]

GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS

TABLING OF CANADA YEAR BOOK

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in compliance with the practice adopted last year and the wishes you expressed in 1968—and, to me, your wishes are orders—in order to hasten the distribution of the Canada Year Book, I am pleased to table today, in both languages, under Standing Order 41 (2), two copies of the work in question.

* * *

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT PROVIDING FOR DISMISSAL OF CHARGES ONE YEAR AFTER STAY OF PROCEEDINGS DIRECTED

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-266, to amend the Criminal Code (stay of proceedings).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide, where provincial Attorneys General direct a stay of proceedings in a criminal case, that after a year's lapse the charges shall be deemed to have been dismissed. The purpose is to remedy the situation revealed recently in the province of Quebec where the Attorney General of that province entered a stay of proceedings against 36 persons charged under the War Measures Act or the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act, and it was claimed that the effect of this action was that the charges could be revived at any time and thus hung over the heads of the persons accused indefinitely without giving them a chance to prove their innocence. The proposed amendment, Mr. Speaker, was recommended a year ago by the Canadian Bar Association.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

AUGUST UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE AND JULY-AUGUST PRICE INCREASE

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the unprecedented combination of the highest number of unemployed on record for the month of August and the highest July-August price increase in ten years.

Mr. McGrath: Shame!

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Broadview has given the Chair the notice required under Standing Order 26. I recognize that the matter raised in this proposed motion is one of serious importance. However, the Chair has to take into account whether there is immediately before us an opportunity for debate of the matter proposed for consideration under the terms of Standing Order 26. As hon. members will recognize, we are involved currently, even this afternoon, in a debate which comes very close to that proposed by the hon. member for Broadview. Indeed, the amendment proposed for the study and consideration of the House by the hon. member for Edmonton West substantially covers the field suggested in the proposed motion now before me. In the circumstances I would not think it would be in order for the Chair to put the motion.

* * *

GRAIN

WITHHOLDING BY GOVERNMENT OF PAYMENTS UNDER TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES ACT—FARMER'S ECONOMIC PLIGHT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, this is a proposed motion to adjourn the House. Pursuant to Standing Order 26 I ask leave to adjourn the House to discuss a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration. The matter arises from the serious shortage of cash income of Canadian farmers, making it almost impossible for them to continue farming operations and make a living. The situation has been aggravated by a decrease in the price per bushel of wheat and the fact that the Canadian Wheat Board has not received certain payments from the consolidated revenue fund of Canada for the storage of grain for the crop years 1970-71 and 1971-72 to date. I therefore ask for the adjournment of the House and move:

That the House adjourn to discuss the serious cost squeeze and present economic plight of the farmer which has been further aggravated and their income seriously reduced by the failure of the Canadian Wheat Board to receive moneys for storage of grain for the crop years 1970-71 and 1971-72 to date from the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Regina East has submitted for the consideration of the Chair a motion dealing with the same matter and essentially in the same terms. Perhaps it would be advisable to allow the hon. member to put his motion also and then a ruling can be made on both motions at the same time.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the urgent need for the government to make the payments to the Canadian Wheat Board specified in the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act of 1956 so that an immediate improvement can be made in the economic position of western farmers.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary North and the hon. member for Regina East have both filed the notice required by Standing Order 26. Hon. members will not mind my reminding them again, as I have done on a number of occasions, that Standing Order 26 specifically states that the statement of the matter sought to be debated under the Standing Order should not be accompanied by argument. The thought behind the new rule is that, notice having been given to the Chair, it will be the Speaker's responsibility to consider all aspects of the matter and to give a ruling without presentation of argument either in support of or in opposition to the motion.

This having been said, it is obvious that the general matter referred to in the motions before us is of considerable importance and interest. This is evidenced by the many references made to it by a number of hon. members during the last few days. Indeed, a few motions have already been proposed under Standing Order 26 which were disallowed by the Chair. My main objection to the previous motions was that they were essentially censure motions or non-confidence motions which are not contemplated by the Standing Order. I took the opportunity yesterday to make this suggestion to the hon. member for Calgary North.

The motion proposed today refers, on the other hand, to the economic situation of western farmers as it relates to the payment or non-payment of certain sums to the Canadian Wheat Board. The Chair would find it difficult to question in any way the submissions contained in the statements in support of the motions. On the strength of these statements and in view of the suggestions made in the course of my ruling of yesterday, I would be inclined to favour the motions and to agree that this is the kind of situation contemplated by Standing Order 26.

I do not overlook the aspect of opportunity for debate at an early date. It may well be that this is the kind of situation which ought to have been debated on a supply motion. However, I have no indication as to when this opportunity might come. In view of these circumstances, having reflected very seriously on the matter and having given, as I say, very serious and the most sympathetic thought to the different aspects of this matter, I have reached the conclusion that hon. members would want to have an opportunity to consider this matter for a few hours. Therefore I suggest, if hon. members agree, that there be a debate on this subject later this evening.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE—SUGGESTED WINTER WORKS PROGRAM AND TAX CUTS—GOVERNMENT PROJECTIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of the disturbing increase in the seasonally adjusted figures for unemployment released this morning and the ominous outlook that this provides for the coming winter. Is the Prime Minister prepared to assure the House that, in view of these figures and the outlook, he is prepared to take immediate steps to initiate a new works program for this winter, with the prospect of providing some employment through that program?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the figures are so significantly impressive that the government as well as the opposition is concerned about the publication of those figures.

An hon. Member: That's a change.

Mr. Trudeau: I just submit that, before being able to answer the question of the Leader of the Opposition, we will have to look at them in a little greater depth. We only received them this morning and it is obvious from some questions which have been asked that various interpretations are possible. We know, for instance, that these figures reveal that there has been the biggest surge in the numbers of unemployed ever during the spring and summer—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —in the numbers of employed; I beg your pardon. There has been the biggest surge in job creation ever in the spring and summer months, and this has translated itself into a lowering of the unemployment figures for people 25 years old and over. Therefore the addition in the figures is caused essentially, I would say, only by the people in the 14 to 24 age group. This is obviously very serious, but the cause of it is not too well known. What we do know is that the rate of participation has increased; in other words, the number of people who at this time of year usually withdraw from the labour force have not withdrawn in that age group. We want to see the causes and reasons for that before being able to prescribe remedies.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the fact that these figures which the Prime Minister cited just now support the position that the June budget presented by the government was based upon false premises, will the Prime Minister now commit the government to bring in some realistic tax cuts, with a view to giving our economy a real forward surge which has not developed as a result of the budget?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not subscribe to the "realisticness" or otherwise of the premise concerning the budget. I just point out to the opposition and to the country that there is nothing easier or more enjoyable for a government than to cut taxes, especially in a year leading up to when there might be an election. It is not a matter of urging from the opposition to cut taxes. We would love to do that if it were the best thing to do but, as I said in my previous answer, we are trying to look for the most responsible answer for this serious economic situation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I suggest that this is really a question of the complacency and indifference of the government. Since even the Minister of Manpower and Immigration has indicated that the purported downturn forecast by the government just is not fast enough, will the Prime Minister reveal to the House what the government's own projections are with regard to employment for the balance of the year? In particular, will the Prime Minister indicate whether he now expects the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment will fall below 6 per cent as he and the Minister of Finance have been predicting all year?

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have never made any prophecy on this. I think the Minister of Finance was indicating what he expected the figures to be from the general projections he could assemble. I certainly support the Minister of Finance.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE—REQUEST FOR NEW BUDGET WITH NEW ECONOMIC DIRECTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the disturbing rate of unemployment and in view of the fact that all of the economic indicators are in the negative, will the government now consider bringing in a brand new budget setting out a new economic direction for this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the Prime Minister is not willing to answer that question, does that mean that the government is satisfied with the growing rate of unemployment?

UNEMPLOYMENT IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—SUGGESTED TALKS WITH GOVERNMENTS ON JOINT STIMULATIVE MEASURES

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In light of the fact that unemployment in the Atlantic provinces is chronic, for example, the seasonally adjusted unemployment figures for Prince Edward Island have been around 2,000 for over a year, will the government give consideration to holding talks with the governments of the Atlantic provinces with a view to embarking jointly on stimulative measures to reduce unemployment in the Atlantic provinces?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we do not see any reason for having talks with any particular province at this time of the year. The figures with which we are concerned apply to the total labour force and particularly, as I said, those in the age group from 14 to 24. We have regional programs. We have had regional meetings with regional groups of provinces, but I do not think there would be any justification at this time for meeting merely with the Atlantic provinces and not with any other province that wanted to discuss this subject.

Mr. MacLean: A supplementary question. Will the Prime Minister consider—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I notice that many hon. members are rising on supplementaries. They will be recognized in due course, but I doubt whether all of them can be given an opportunity to ask supplementaries in the 40 minutes we have available. However, I will do my best to keep the matter rolling as smoothly as possible. For the moment I recognize the hon. member for Malpeque.

Mr. MacLean: Will the Prime Minister give consideration to meeting jointly with all the provincial governments with a view to reducing the unemployment figures inasmuch as all levels of government have a keen interest in this matter?

Mr. Trudeau: Not only will I consider it, Mr. Speaker, but I have indeed acted on it. More than a month ago I wrote to every province suggesting a meeting of the provincial premiers and myself as early in the fall as possible, this time to discuss not constitutional but economic matters and others which might be of interest to them. Although up to this stage I have proposed three or four dates, I must say I have not yet been able to get agreement from the provinces to meet with the federal government at any time. I am still hoping to work out a date for such a meeting.

Mr. Forrestall: Have they no confidence—

Mr. Trudeau: What is your problem over there?

Mr. Forrestall: Have they no confidence in you?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: They cannot on the one hand suggest that I meet with them and then on the other suggest that they do not want to meet with me.

[Translation]

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE AMONG THOSE UNDER 24—STUDY OF REASONS

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

He stated a moment ago that he was very upset by the fact that those who are especially affected by the high rate of unemployment in Canada were under 24 years of age. He also said that the causes of unemployment among those workers were being investigated.

Could the Prime Minister say whether those studies are under way. If not, what would they deal with?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would not have the hon. member conclude that very lengthy major studies are being carried out. I gave that reply to a question put to me a short while ago, i.e. that the figures had reached us this morning only and that we were analysing them. So the hon. member should not assume that this analysis will involve very long deep studies.

Mr. Fortin: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

The right hon. Prime Minister's reply would seem to indicate that studies will not last very long, because the government possesses quite a lot of the information required. In that case, is the right hon. Prime Minister in a position to indicate whether concrete, positive action is to be taken in the light of information available to him concerning the unemployment of that group of workers?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the problem is indeed quite simple. It is a matter of finding out why young people age 14 to 24 have, between the end of July and the beginning of August, left the labour force at a slower rate than in previous years. As the hon. member can see, the question is very simple. Perhaps he could come up with a very simple explanation as an answer? If so, he should provide us with it so that our studies would be all the shorter.

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT—IMMEDIATE AMENDMENT OF CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN TO HELP PROVINCES AND CITIES MEET WELFARE COSTS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. As the unemployment burden will likely be at least as great as last year and in view of the fact that the new Unemployment Insurance Commission access reforms will not help this winter, at least for the majority of the winter, is the government going to introduce immediate reforms in the Canada Assistance Plan to help the poorer provinces and the larger cities finance their added welfare costs this winter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As I answered a previous question, Mr. Speaker, I have suggested meetings with all the provinces to discuss this whole situation. I cannot answer the member's question until I know what the point of view of the provinces is on this matter.

Mr. Ryan: Will the government bring in its family income security plan for second reading now instead of postponing it until perhaps next May?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the opposition will help us pass the taxation bill now, the government will be able to do that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister with regard to the economy and the prospects this winter. Inasmuch as the Minister of Finance has been consistently wrong in his predictions about the economy and its growth, will the Prime Minister, in his quest for some ways and means of solving this situation, try doing this through another Minister of Finance?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE—ACTION TO ACCELERATE PAYMENT OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): My supplementary is for the Minister of Labour. Will the minister use his good offices with the Unemployment Insurance Commission to try to persuade them to disentangle the increasing administrative mess that has existed there, particularly with the greater rate of unemployment of the past two months or so, so that those who are unemployed can at least get their unemployment insurance benefits without having to wait for months?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has any specific cases in mind I would be very pleased to intervene personally. The latest statistics that I was given the other day by the Unemployment Insurance Commission indicate that claims are being handled at approximately the same rate as this time last year.

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question. I request the minister to use his good offices with the commission to see if they can provide him with more accurate information.

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE—REQUEST FOR RECONVENING OF FINANCE MINISTERS' CONFERENCE TO DEAL WITH PROSPECTIVE WINTER SITUATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In light of the fact that the statistics released today by Statistics Canada indicate that we are going to have a serious rate of unemployment this winter, as an immediate step will the Prime Minister consider reconvening the finance ministers' conference to deal with this situation?

• (2:40 p.m.)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): There are periodic meetings—I believe three or four times a year—of the finance ministers. There was one in the middle of the summer so there is probably another coming up soon. I do not see any need to reconvene one. I will inquire when the next meeting is to be. The suggestion was made by one of the hon. member's friends that I meet with the premiers, and I repeat that that is what I am working at now.

Mr. McGrath: A further supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's East will probably recognize that there are still a number of hon. members who are anxious to ask questions on this subject. I would hope that each member individually would try to limit his supplementaries. I am sure hon. members will recognize that this might be helpful to all concerned.

Mr. McGrath: If there is to be a conference either of premiers or of finance ministers to deal with the critical unemployment situation, would the Prime Minister consider having placed on the agenda of such a meeting the question of a winter works program and a cost-sharing formula in connection therewith?

Mr. Trudeau: I am sure this idea will crop up somewhere without the subject being placed on the agenda. Only the general subjects are placed on the agenda; we do not try to detail all the brain children that spring from various parts of the country.

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ECONOMIC OUTLOOK, GOALS AND PROJECTIONS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): In order to help those who have been swamped by the surge in the economy and hopefully to restore some confidence in the economy, does the Prime Minister intend to make a full statement on the economic outlook and the government's goals and projections with regard to employment and inflation.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Not at this time, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Mackasey.]

Mr. Nowlan: Does the government have any goals and projections regarding employment and inflation?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, to part of the question, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: What part?

UNEMPLOYMENT IN QUEBEC—SPECIFIC ACTION TO DEAL WITH PROBLEM THIS WINTER

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): In light of the forecast by the Minister of Finance of Quebec that unemployment in Quebec this coming winter will likely reach 13.5 per cent, a record high if I am not mistaken, outside of absolute depression, can the Prime Minister inform the House, given the political sensitivity of Quebec within confederation at this time, whether or not the government is taking a specific approach for the coming winter in terms of dealing with unemployment in that province?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am not sure what figures the hon. member is quoting. I believe he is referring to a figure which was given by the Quebec minister in the eventuality that the measures of the Nixon administration take their full effect, but as the hon. member knows there is legislation before the House through which we hope to prevent those measures having full effect on employment in Canada.

Mr. Broadbent: Is the Prime Minister seriously suggesting that $80 million spread throughout Canada—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this is debate.

UNEMPLOYMENT—SPECIAL CABINET COMMITTEE TO DEVISE PROGRAM TO CREATE EMPLOYMENT THIS WINTER

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Has a new and special cabinet committee been charged with the specific responsibility of directing the efforts of government and its related departments toward a massive employment-creating program this winter?If so, who heads and co-ordinates the committee and what are its terms of reference?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): We do not usually communicate information relative to internal administrative changes within the government, but if it is helpful to the hon. member I can tell him there is no such special committee.

Mr. Lundrigan: On the basis of that answer I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has directed any government departments, such as Public Works, Regional Economic Expansion, Manpower and Immigration and Finance, to concentrate their energies on massive employment-creating programs this winter and, if so, can he indicate in a general way the nature of this direction?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, I have so directed such ministers and a few others besides to find an answer to the problem about which both the hon. member and myself are concerned.

UNEMPLOYMENT—PROGRAMS TO ALLEVIATE HARDSHIP OF THOSE OUT OF WORK MORE THAN SIX MONTHS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): In view of the fact that statistics released today show that 106,000 Canadians, or approximately 25 per cent of the total number unemployed, have been seeking work for more than six months, can the Prime Minister say whether he is contemplating any special programs or legislative changes designed to work effectively with the provinces and municipalities in order to alleviate the tremendous hardship presently being experienced by these Canadians and their families?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not have the figures at my fingertips, but I believe the hon. member is referring to the hard-core unemployed and my understanding is that their number has decreased rather significantly in the past month.

Mr. Lundrigan: Further to that answer—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that we might go on to other hon. members who are seeking an opportunity to ask supplementaries on this subject.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rises on a point of order.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, I did not ask for a statistical breakdown by the Prime Minister. I asked whether he had any programs designed to alleviate the hardship of the 106,000 Canadians who have been out of work for more than six months. Could he address his energy for a few seconds to that very important question?

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE—CURTAILMENT OF SUBSIDIES AND TAX CONCESSIONS TO FOREIGN-CONTROLLED RESOURCE INDUSTRIES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): In view of the unprecedented high level of unemployment these past weeks, can the Prime Minister say whether or not the government will now move to curtail the large subsidies and tax concessions given to foreign resource industries?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The question might have been prefaced by a phrase which said exactly the contrary—in view of the unprecedentedly high number of people employed in the month of August, the highest ever. This just shows that statistics can be thrown out to prove exactly the contrary, one or the other.

Mr. Nystrom: May I ask, then, whether the government is contemplating any measures to stimulate manufacturing right here in this country and develop the processing of resources in Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: The minister responsible for industry has made several speeches on this subject—

An hon. Member: Speeches are not enough.

Mr. Trudeau: —and I am sure he will be glad to send copies to the hon. member to show the ways in which we do stimulate manufacturing industries.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Edmonton Centre and then I think, in fairness, call on the hon. member for Bellechasse.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF BRIEF OF MAYOR OF CORNWALL

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister intend to table the brief on unemployment he received over the weekend from the mayor of Cornwall? I am sure it would be most helpful at this time.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I know the brief is a public document. If the hon. member is interested in having a copy I will see he gets one. It is a three or four page brief. I see no precedent for tabling it in the House but I am sure Mr. Speaker would not object if it were the unanimous desire of hon. members to have it tabled.

* * *

• (2:50 p.m.)

[Translation]

INDUSTRY

TEXTILES—MEASURES TO CONTROL IMPORTATION AND DUMPING

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Since foreign competition is becoming increasingly keener in the sector of knitted texturized yarns, thus representing a serious threat to Canadian industries, will the government consider taking control measures with respect to these imports in order to protect Canadian industries?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we have a policy on textile products and a number of sectors of the textile industry have been assigned to the board up to this point. We had a report from the cotton yarn board which lead to decisions which I think were important. The government is currently studying a report submitted by the shirt board. I hope to be in a position to make announcements on this very shortly.

Sweaters are another matter, and acrylic fibers a fourth one, now under study. The Textile and Clothing Board is therefore very active and it issues recommendations quite regularly.

If the sector mentioned by my hon. friend is one of those which require referral to the Board, we shall act accordingly.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Since textile manufacturers who used to export to the United States are now trying to sell more in Canada and since that might amount to dumping, will the government take effective measures to prevent this?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, there is an anti-dumping tribunal available mostly to producers who feel they are affected by imports in any sector. I do not think the government needs to lead producers by the hand to the door of the anti-dumping tribunal. They are clever and aggressive enough to take those steps themselves.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is very funny, but on the occasion of a visit to Victoriaville this summer, he announced to textile manufacturers that the legislation on import controls would be more rigid. Is he now in a position to indicate whether a review of those legislative measures is under way and, if so, when will he announce it?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, there are some things the hon. member did not understand. When I was talking in the Eastern Townships, I said that there were perfectly legal and justified means available to the producers to protect themselves before the antidumping court.

Pursuant to Section 26 of the Textile and Clothing Board Act, there is also a possibility for producers, in sectors other than textiles, for instance in the footwear sector, to obtain a decision from the anti-dumping tribunal by showing that injury is being done to their industry.

Therefore what I was saying then is that those instruments are there to be used, and I would encourage producers to use them.

* * *

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

RESPONSE TO CANADIAN REQUEST FOR EXEMPTION FROM UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX—UNITED STATES VIEWS ON EMPLOYMENT SUPPORT BILL

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government has received a communication from the United States authorities giving an answer to the request of the government of Canada for an exemption from President Nixon's surcharge, and whether the government of Canada has received any communication from the United States authorities expressing any views of that government with regard to the legislation now before a committee to provide some help to the manufacturing export industries of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that we have received no formal reply, but we do know that our representations are under study.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said he had received no formal reply. Has the government of Canada received either a formal or informal communication in respect of either of these subject matters?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I imagine that when the ministers and the officials met they asked questions and got answers, but we have not received a reply to our representations.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

[Translation]

INCOME TAX

REPRESENTATIONS BY CAISSES POPULAIRES AGAINST PROVISIONS OF BILL

Mr. Raynald Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the brief submitted by the Fédération des Caisses Populaires Desjardins regarding Bill C-259, does the government intend to amend the bill as a result of those recommendations.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has informed me that he received such a brief and that he was carefully looking into it since the matter raised is important and since he also wants to add the views he will hear next Monday when he will meet other groups of the co-operative and credit union movements and that all these representations will be the object of a very serious study.

[English]

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the President of the Privy Council. In view of the minister's interest in the Antigonish movement as developed by Father Coady many years ago and which was one of the foundation stones in the development of co-operatives in Canada, will he use his great weight of office with his colleagues when this question is discussed?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question has to be considered as a representation or suggestion to the minister.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EAST PAKISTAN FAMINE—CANADIAN RESPONSE TO APPEAL BY UNITED NATIONS SECRETARY GENERAL FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will he tell the House what response the Canadian government has made to the urgent appeal of the Secretary General of the United Nations for financial assistance to cover the cost of U.N. relief operations in East Pakistan where it is reported that some 25 million people are threatened with starvation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to advise the House that the government is providing a grant of $500,000 in response to this appeal to provide assistance toward the administrative costs being incurred by the United Nations. I understand that the United States is giving $1 million and the British are giving $1.2 million. This cash donation will be used to help finance approximately 180 technical and relief experts that the United Nations is presently sending to East Pakistan to identify relief priorities and enhance the efficiency of relief distribution.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, would the minister indicate whether this grant is in addition to the $5 million in grain that was to be delivered to East Pakistan for the same purpose?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker, this is a special request made by the Secretary General for help in respect of the administrative costs, and I think we have responded very generously to this request.

PAKISTAN AND INDIA—PROVISION OF MOBILE HOSPITAL UNITS BY CANADA

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Some weeks ago I asked whether, in respect of the problem in Pakistan, we had made an offer to Pakistan and India of some of our mobile hospital units which are in mothballs in the Department of National Health and Welfare? Was this offer made and, if so, what were the results?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take notice of that question in order that I can give an accurate response.

* * *

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT IN LIGHT OF UNITED STATES ECONOMIC MEASURES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I asked the Prime Minister a question the other day regarding the circumstances facing Canada as a result of the DISC program and the 10 per cent surcharge, now aggravated by the recently released unemployment figures. I was under the impression that my suggestion that an address on the state of the economy outlining the objectives and the targets determined by the government would be an excellent way of advising the people of Canada of the realistic situation. As a result of an answer given to the same type of question asked by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley, am I to understand—I am not being facetious in asking this—that the Prime Minister does not think the state of the economy is such that it merits a statement by him now or in the very near future?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have very serious reservations in respect of the hon. member's question when he says "am I to understand" or "are we to understand" that the Prime Minister has reached such and such a decision or is of such and such an opinion. To my way of thinking that is not a proper way to ask a question. I hesitate to suggest to the hon. member that he might rephrase the question. Perhaps it might be easier to allow the Prime Minister to reply.

Mr. Alexander: In light of the preamble just uttered, Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister now give the House and the country the assurance that he will at the earliest opportunity make a statement on the economy, advising the people of Canada and the House as to the realistic state of the country in terms of the economy, the DISC program, the 10 per cent surcharge and the unemployment picture in order that we may be apprised of what the government has in the way of plans to reduce unemployment and increase productivity?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope this is not a second preamble. Again, the question having been asked I have no objection to the Prime Minister replying briefly to both questions.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If I correctly followed both preambles, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is asking for something in the nature of a budget speech. I must point out that budget speeches are normally made by the Minister of Finance, and it is not our intention to have him make one at the present time.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, in light of the lack of confidence we in the opposition and the people of Canada have in the statements made by the minister and in view of the fact he has never been right, will the Prime Minister take it upon himself to give leadership in this regard so we will know they have nothing in common by making a statement to the people about what is taking place today in respect of government plans?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

* * *

• (3:00 p.m.)

IMMIGRATION

POSSIBLE BARRING OF UNITED STATES CITIZENS SEEKING TEMPORARY WORK IN CANADA

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the increased unemployment contemplated as a result of the recent United States surtax move vis-à-vis our export market, has the government yet reached any decision regarding the amendment of Canadian immigration legislation or, on the other hand, tightening of the regulations that currently allow United States citizens to move relatively freely across the border for the purpose of temporary employment in Canada, while United States laws generally forbid equal access to Canadians who are seeking temporary work in the United States?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, no formal change has been made in the regulations in this regard at the present moment, though the matter is under active consideration.

* * *

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. C. Terrence Murphy (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Because I believe it is vital that all blatant examples of male socialist chauvinism should be bared to the public, would the Prime Minister undertake to instruct the federal task force which is studying the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women to investigate charges that a woman journalist was barred from a New Democratic Party press conference held yesterday in a sauna bath at Thunder Bay, Ontario?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

* * *

DRUGS

INTERNATIONAL NARCOTICS CONTROL COMMISSION—CANADIAN POSITION AT SEPTEMBER MEETING RESPECTING ILLICIT TRAFFIC

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. When the United Nations International Narcotics Control Commission meets in Europe at the end of September with a view to strengthening the international drugs treaty known as the "Single Convention of 1961", is it the intention of the Canadian government to support the United States authorities, who have been actively seeking Canadian assistance in recent days, in a joint effort to stiffen control and stamp out illicit drug traffic?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my understanding of that particular meeting is that its aim is not to come to any firm conclusions but to have discussions between various nations that might eventually lead to an agreement.

Mr. Southam: I have a supplementary question which is based on the statement made by Dr. Ross Chapman, the special federal adviser who will represent this country at the meetings in Europe in September. In his statement on Friday Mr. Chapman said that the Canadian position had not yet been determined.

Mr. Munro: I do not think there is any inconsistency there with what I have said.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—POSSIBLE REFERENCE BY CANADA TO UNITED NATIONS OR INTERNATIONAL COURT

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister regarding the massive nuclear test to be held at Amchtika which has still not been cancelled. Can the Prime Minister advise whether, in addition to or instead of going cap in hand to Washington, he or his government is giving consideration to having this very serious matter brought before the United Nations or referred to the International Court of Justice?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the United States has not accepted the jurisdiction of the court. In spite of the ignorance expressed in the ranks of the NDP, I do not think that the United States would in any way feel bound by a decision which they declare does not bind them.

[Mr. Murphy.]

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, I would remind the Prime Minister that the United States is a charter member of the United Nations, and I was asking what he was proposing to do in terms of making representations to that body.

Mr. Trudeau: The answer to that question, Mr. Speaker, is that we will be raising this general subject in connection with the debate on the nuclear test ban.

* * *

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

KILLING OF CHIEF ED BIRD IN NORTHWEST TERRITORIES BY MEMBER OF FORCE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Solicitor General. Has he instituted any inquiry under the provisions of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act into the killing of the Indian Chief Ed Bird in the Northwest Territories?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the House on Tuesday, I think it would be better first of all to study the report of the coroner and, in my view, it is incumbent upon the Minister of Justice, who is Solicitor for the Northwest Territories, to answer this question.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Since the RCMP come under the minister's jurisdiction, and in view of the fact that the provisions of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act provide for such an inquiry, is any inquiry under the act being made?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, there is something that prevails over the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, that is the normal process of courts and I believe that before launching an inquiry of any kind, it would be good to examine the report of the coroner who holds the first responsibility for inquiring into the matter.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary which I should like to address to the Minister of Justice. Since the coroner's inquest has been completed and his report is probably now in the hands of the minister's officials, can the minister tell the House whether any inquiry is being conducted into the killing of Chief Ed Bird by a member of the RCMP?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the coroner's inquiry and the jury's verdict in the coroner's inquiry exonerated the officer of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I am advised by our office in Yellowknife that the transcript of the inquest will be available September 17 or 18. When I have received the transcript I will decide whether any further action should be taken.

[Translation]

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING FALSE FIRE ALARMS

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Justice a question.

Could he tell the House whether he received a telegram from the Montreal firemen association asking him to amend section 393 of the Criminal Code which concerns people who make false fire alarms.

Mr. Speaker: I doubt whether that question is in order as it has been asked, because the hon. member is just asking whether a telegram has been received. In any case, the minister might answer briefly the question asked by the hon. member.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have received that telegram and I will look seriously into the matter.

* * *

[English]

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

AUDITOR GENERALS 1970 REPORT—INQUIRY AS TO REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the President of the Privy Council in his capacity as government House leader. Is it his intention to refer the Auditor General's 1970 report, tabled in the House on June 4, to the Public Accounts Committee and, if so, when may we expect it to be referred?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on this subject I would be happy to have a word with the chairman of the committee and arrange to have a reference at the most convenient time.

* * *

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG THOSE UNDER 24—NEW PROGRAMS TO DEAL WITH PROBLEM

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister which relates to earlier questions dealing with the very high rate of unemployment among those in the 14 to 24 years age group and with the fact that there has been a significant decline in the projected number of enrolments at universities this year of some 75,000. In view of the close to one quarter of a million young people who are unemployed, and in view of the government's special program this past summer, may I ask the Prime Minister whether any plans are now going ahead to formulate new programs to deal with this exceptional problem, having regard both to its present impact on the economy and its long-term impact?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to the exceptional figures with which we are faced, and I myself said the same thing when answering the Leader of the Opposition. It is because this withdrawal rate from the labour force of our young people at the present time is so exceptional that I cannot say at this time what response we are going to make to it. We are trying to understand the significance of it. Does it mean that our young people are less interested in furthering their education than in previous times, or is this just a temporary situation? Does it have to do with rejection of the work ethic or study ethic or acceptance of the work ethic? I am afraid that I am not in a position to give an answer to this question and, therefore, to pose a solution at this time.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: We have reached the end of the question period but perhaps the hon. member for Egmont might ask his supplementary before I call orders of the day.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the great importance of this question, as the Prime Minister has said, would he or one of his ministers be prepared within the next few days to outline to the House the methods whereby the whole question is being studied and the time frame within which some action is likely to be taken to deal with this problem?

Mr. Trudeau: I am afraid I cannot give that explanation within the next few days, Mr. Speaker.

• (3:10 p.m.)

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Wednesday, September 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray (for Mr. Benson) that Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequent upon the amendments to that act, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West) (page 7763).

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as Your Honour has indicated, the amendment to the bill proposing second reading of the income tax amendments does indeed give us a very fertile field to discuss the economic situation generally and of course more specifically the significance of figures that were released earlier today. Just as it seems almost impossible for the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) or the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) to mention anyone going to Washington without adding the tag "hat in hand", so I find it almost impossible to refer to hon. members opposite on the monthly unemployment statistics day without using the phrase "gloom and doom" early in my remarks. Having used it once, I will try not to do so again. The fact is that, just as it is true that unemployment was too high in mid-August, so it is true that the over-all message of our economic indicators was a healthy expanding economy, an economy expanding at an accelerating rate. For the first half of 1971 the real increase in the gross national product was 6.2 per cent, almost double the growth rate for all of 1970.

An hon. Member: It was never so good.

Mr. Mahoney: The increase in the real gross national product for the second quarter at an annual rate of 8.9 per cent was the largest in two years. Demand for goods and services was advancing. The 4.3 per cent increase in consumer expenditures in the second quarter was the largest in many years. Combine that with low inventories and we see excellent prospects for the expansion of the manufacturing sector. The annual rate of housing starts, 225,000 in the second quarter, 243,000 in August, indicate a record will be achieved in 1971 as a whole.

Mr. McGrath: You do not even believe that yourself.

Mr. Mahoney: Total capital expenditure was up 5.7 per cent and business capital expenditure 6 per cent in the second quarter. The survey of investment intentions was revised upward by two points to 11 per cent at mid-year, and notwithstanding high increases in productivity, 245,000 new jobs have been created by the economy in the past 12 months—that is a seasonally adjusted figure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mahoney: —I should like to emphasize that neither the figures I used—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member. The hon. member for St. John's East seeks the floor on a point of order.

Mr. McGrath: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but surely it would be in the national interest if the hon. member were to make his speech after the market closes today.

Mr. Mahoney: I would like to emphasize that neither the figures I have used nor those I will use later reflect in any way decisions taken in the United States recently. The message is that we were doing very well until those measures were taken.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mahoney: We performed relatively well during the current U.S. administration's period of fiscal conservatism; we performed relatively well during their period of inflation. We have proved that we do have room to pursue successfully some independent economic policies. Whether we can perform relatively well during their period of protectionism remains to be seen, but we will certainly try.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mahoney: The two areas of concern raised today are unemployment and the cost of living.

An hon. Member: Oh, really?

Mr. Mahoney: As to the latter, prices are now rising more strongly. This is a grim warning to the government, to all politicians regardless of party and to Canadians generally—bearing in mind the fact of our current economic expansion—that the danger—

[Mr. Mahoney.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I bring to the attention of hon. members that there is some unfairness in not allowing an hon. member who has the floor to make a speech in such a way that he can be heard by the Chair. It is difficult for me, with all these interruptions coming from hon. members, to hear the hon. member, and I think that in fairness to him he should be given an opportunity to make his speech. At least, it would be fair to give the Chair an opportunity to hear what the hon. member has to say.

Mr. Mahoney: I could shout loudly because common courtesy is not something I have come to expect from over there.

Mr. Stanfield: Common sense is what we want.

Mr. Mahoney: I was speaking of the two areas of concern that have arisen as a result of today's announcement by Statistics Canada—the matter of unemployment and the cost of living. There is no question, so far as the cost of living is concerned, that prices are now rising more strongly, and this is a grim warning to the government, to all politicians regardless of party and to Canadians generally—bearing in mind the fact of our current economic expansion—that the danger is not that this expansion will proceed too slowly but rather that, fostered by inflation and prodded along by political pressures as an election approaches, the expansion will proceed too quickly.

Mr. Stanfield: Shame.

Mr. Mahoney: The main reason for the rise in the consumer price index is readily identifiable. It is the rebound in food prices from the chain store price war of last winter. The consumer price index is up seven-tenths of one per cent over July, but excluding the food index the increase is only three-tenths of one per cent.

The main unemployment problem is also identifiable. It is the tidal wave of young people as a result of the baby boom of the mid 1950's that has had such a great and varied impact on our society in recent years. This has manifested itself in numerous ways ranging from the vastly increased demands on primary school facilities in the early 1960's and secondary and post secondary facilities later to the more recent but all pervasive phenomenon known as the "youth cult".

The entire increase in seasonally adjusted unemployment from 6.3 per cent to 6.5 per cent from July to August occurred among teenagers 14 to 19 years of age. For the whole of the labour force other than teenagers, adjusted unemployment declined. This, of course, includes practically all heads of households.

On the actual rather than the seasonally adjusted basis, unemployment declined in all age groups, including teenagers. Actual unemployment declined to 5.1 per cent from 5.7 per cent in July. For the adult labour force, actual unemployment among men was 3.7 per cent and among women 2.7 per cent.

Earlier this afternoon it was suggested that on the seasonally adjusted basis at least, we experienced the highest August unemployment on record. I do not know about that, I imagine it is correct, but I have not checked it. But I do know that we do have the largest labour force in history and that in August there were more people working in Canada than ever before.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mahoney: Random figures for the the number of employed will indicate the trend. In September 1969 there were 7,756,000 Canadians working. In September 1970 there were 7,898,000 working. In March of 1971 we crossed the eight million mark at 8,018,000, and in August of this year, last month, 8,517,000 were working. In other words, for the year from September 1969 to September 1970 the increase in the labour force in Canada was a little under 150,000.

Mr. Bell: But there are more people in the country.

Mr. Mahoney: For the five months from March to August of this year, the increase was just under one half million. During the current calendar year, January to August, the labour force has increased by 643,000 to over 9 million—9,160,000 to be more exact. With respect to employment, the number of Canadians working increased by 724,000 to the 8,517,000 figure I mentioned a moment ago. At the same time the number of unemployed fell by 83,000 to 455,000.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Clearly, Mr. Speaker, Canada's economy has been expanding at an accelerating rate throughout 1971 until August. There is a very real problem with the very large body of teenagers entering the labour force each year. They are entering an increasingly productive work force. Employment is increasing, increasing greatly, but not sufficiently to absorb this particular age group, and the problem of why the members of this age group—in addition to the sheer numbers that are coming along on this flood tide of young people—are staying in the labour force, why they are not going back to school or university, of course was alluded to by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a few minutes ago. It is a very serious problem, a very genuine problem. Nobody denies that. The fact is that on the over-all basis, it is the problem. With respect to other segments of the work force, other age groups, and particularly heads of households, the employment situation is not really as difficult as the over-all picture would indicate, taking into account this phenomenal situation in the 14 to 19 year age group.

I would like to reiterate that nothing I have said is an assessment of what is likely to occur as a result of recent U.S. actions, because nothing that occurred to mid August reflects those actions. At the moment, I suppose the best we could say is that it is uncertain.

Turning to the tax bill before the House, Mr. Speaker, I have been listening with some considerable amusement to the invitations from across the way for my participation in this debate. My failure to respond earlier to those kind invitations is not to be construed as ingratitude. I appreciate the kind comments of the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) and certainly shall, if the Law Society permits, use his generous endorsement of my expertise in the tax field as and when I re-establish myself in private life. I regret that the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Skoreyko) was unable to extend his brief and unusual visit to the House of Commons so that I could now thank him personally for his invitation. I must say that I found the speeches of both hon. members a refreshing change from the tedious reading into the record of the pedestrian offerings of the Tory research bureau.

I understand that during the past summer that organization found time to turn out about 20 speeches on the budget and Bill C-259, which were then circulated en masse to their employers with the suggestion that, "If you find one you like, it's yours". Evidently several hon. members opposite found ones they liked. It is an interesting use of the public funds provided to the Official Opposition for research purposes. It is regrettable, from a cosmetic point of view at least, that these speeches are so similar to each other as to be easily identified.

It may be, Mr. Speaker, that you and I are the only ones really paying attention to these speeches. After all, we are in the unenviable position of being paid to do so. Certainly, if the media are listening they are not giving any indication that they have heard, but I did think, in kindness, that I should let the hon. members of the Official Opposition who are using these bottom-of-the-line production models know that they are neither fooling nor impressing anyone who is listening.

In so far as the NDP is concerned nothing has changed over the summer. They are still on the tack that Bill C-259 does not constitute tax reform. That is a value judgment in which the government and the vast body of Canadians do not concur. I suppose that the corollary of a half truth is a half lie, but since the term "half lie" would be at least half unparliamentary I will stick to half truth. The NDP persists in telling half truths about the reformed dividend tax credit and the abolition of the federal estate and gift taxes.

Members of the NDP deal with estate and gift taxes in complete isolation from the institution of the capital gains tax. The capital gains tax is, in effect, a pay-as-you-go estate tax and, of course, a gift tax is a necessary adjunct to an estate tax. No fairminded Canadian honestly accepts that a tax system designed for equity, for continued economic growth, and to meet modern social needs could incorporate the double whammy of the estate tax together with a capital gains tax. I will leave it to others to decide whether the NDP is not fairminded or not honest on this subject, or perhaps neither fairminded nor honest, but there is not doubt, to be most charitable, that members of the NDP are deliberately dealing in a half truth when they divorce the institution of a capital gains tax from the abolition of the estate tax.

The other half truth is even more flagrant. In talking about the dividend tax credit they talk about the increase from 20 per cent to 33 1/3 per cent, but religiously never mention that the present 20 per cent dividend tax credit is tax free while the reformed 33 1/3 per cent dividend tax credit will be taxable. The present tax free credit is, of course, of more benefit to persons with high incomes than to those with low incomes, while the new system will in fact more closely reflect the recipient's own circumstances. In actual fact, assuming that the provinces conform their tax systems to the federal system, the new credit will be of the same benefit as the old to a taxpayer with a marginal tax rate of 40 per cent, that is, in the $12,000 taxable income range. It will be of less benefit to those with higher marginal rates. It will be of more benefit to a taxpayer with a lower taxable income.

Members of the NDP look upon the Carter Report as the epitome of reform. I wonder if one of them will stand in his place and say that his party endorses Carter's proposed treatment of dividend income. In case they have forgotten that, as well as some other details of the report, permit me to remind them that the combined effect of Carter's recommendations of a flat corporation tax rate of about 50 per cent and a top marginal personal rate of 50 per cent, together with a gross-up and credit system with a refund where the credit exceeded the tax liability, would result in few, if any, resident shareholders paying any tax at all on dividend income, and almost certainly in most of them receiving a credit against other tax liability, if not indeed a refund cheque.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the government in seeking the all party agreement that led to the detailed ways and means motion, which has given Your Honour some problems, was to permit all hon. members to have just as much precise information as possible before them during the budget debate. The Minister of Finance also made clear that he expected interested persons and organizations to take advantage of the summer recess to make further representations in connection with the bill. This invitation would, of course, not have been very meaningful if the government did not intend to pay attention to, and to act upon, these recommendations where they had merit. Well, it was a meaningful invitation, and the government has decided to act upon a number of the representations, and is still considering many others. I would not like to specify any of these at this time if for no other reason than that they cannot all be mentioned. It would be wrong to leave the impression that any not mentioned have necessarily been rejected. In addition, Your Honour will appreciate that government amendments to a tax bill will fall under the general constraint of budgetary secrecy.

Accordingly, I can only assure all persons and organizations who have made known their views on Bill C-259 that those views have or are being very seriously considered and that numerous amendments—my own personal guess is that there will be upwards of 100—will be offered by the government during committee of the whole. I suppose I should apologize in advance to Your Honour, and perhaps more particularly to the chairman and deputy chairman of the committee for the procedural price we may pay for the government's admirable flexibility and continued responsiveness to informed and responsible comment.

It is evident from the speeches made during this week that there has been no fundamental change during the summer since public acceptance of the budget and the tax reform package was made so manifest. Nor has there been any change in the position of the opposition parties. There have been concerns expressed about particular matters. These have or are being considered by the government. They have obviously been communicated to members on all sides of the House. They cannot be dealt with during this stage of the proceedings but must await committee of the whole.

[Mr. Mahoney.]

• (3:30 p.m.)

Accordingly, I would appeal to the members opposite to stop rehashing their budget debate speeches and let us get on to committee so that we may consider particular items of concern, improve the bill by appropriate amendment and give Canada and Canadians the benefit of the work of a decade. And Mr. Speaker, I hope all members will agree that the business community could not care less about the niceties of parliamentary procedure but it does want to know for certain, just as soon as possible, the tax framework within which it will be operating starting next year. Bourinot, May and Beauchesne may mean something to a lance corporal's guard of individual taxpayers but, for the remaining millions, increased tax exemptions, moving and employment expense allowances, child care deductions and lower taxes are the name of the game. Again, I appeal to all hon. members, let us get on with the job of giving Canada a reformed tax system, a better tax system and, for the great majority of Canadians, lower income taxes.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, it was a sheer delight to listen to the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney), the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, who has just taken his seat. He alluded to the fact that in his opinion some of the speeches from this side of the House had perhaps been prepared by members of the research staff. I admit that from time to time it is necessary for us to consult with those learned men in connection with specific points in a speech. Listening to the offering of the hon. member, no one could accuse him of using a ghost writer or any research whatsoever. As a man known for his ridiculous presentations to the House, he rose to the ultimate today. The jumbled presentation of statistics, listed in a manner which would serve the government's purpose, leads one to some very strange conclusions.

For instance, he assured the House that even viewing all these serious situations that Canada finds itself in today, in fact Canadians have never had it so good. If we are not prepared to believe this, he left the door open because he said there are some extenuating circumstances. We never had it so good and all indications were that things were going to be better until our neighbour to the south introduced the surcharge.Then for the benefit of those people who could not give any credibility in that statement, he said, "A lot of the unemployment today is attributable to too many babies just after the war". If anyone listening to this speech could pinpoint his birthday in that era, Mr. Speaker, there would be some credibility in that statement.

Mr. Bell: You can't blame Nixon for that.

Mr. Danforth: The decision by our party to propose the amendment we have before us was not taken lightly or facetiously, but was taken after careful consideration of the welfare of Canada and the economic climate which is so important to each and every one of us. This is a tremendous tax measure before us. It is an entire change under the guise of reform in our taxation system. The task of revising our tax system has beset Parliament for a number of years and now the government has brought forth this bill.

Our party is concerned by the fact that this is a long-term program, as shown by the introduction of the white paper. We have asked that this bill not be read a second time because it is primarily based on the recommendations and policies of the government as enunciated in the white paper. We are dealing with a premise, a policy, a blueprint laid down months and even years ago during the consideration of this matter. We have seen tremendous changes in the economy of Canada, not only in the last few years but in the last few months. In studying these tax measures, and knowing the basic policies laid down in the white paper, we are well aware that the concept of tax reform presented by the government has led to this major piece of legislation, the main thrust of which is intended to offset the economic indicators we face today. We are well aware that in this context it will not be effective in dealing with the major problems facing us.

There is nothing in this tax bill that will counteract the tremendous climb in unemployment in this country. Members on all sides of the House are concerned about people who cannot find jobs. In this particular measure that we are seized with, and there is no doubt that we will be seized with it for some time because of its complexity, there is no solution to this basic problem. Tied in with the problem of unemployment is the problem of inflation which has reared its ugly head again after assurances from the right hon. gentleman opposite that it was licked, but there is nothing in this bill to deal with it specifically and quickly. That is why we are asking the government to reconsider and, if possible, to incorporate into the bill specific clauses and principles directed immediately to these major problems.

I could mention other problems that could be covered in this bill such as, for instance, the rapid expansion not only of major industries but of minor industries. We do not find the emphasis on that. We do not find the emphasis on the development of our mining industries or national resources. We do not find specific measures designed to increase our secondary industries and to retain in Canada the processing of many of our raw materials before export. We do not find, either, a policy to develop incentives for Canadians to provide jobs. Today in this country we need a policy to provide jobs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mahoney: We have it.

Mr. Danforth: The hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) says we have it. That is what worries me, Mr. Speaker. The policy we have cannot, is not and will not work.

Mr. Mahoney: It is working.

Mr. Danforth: That is why something needs to be done.

Mr. Stanfield: Let us not see a breakdown if that policy is working.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, in my deliberations this afternoon, I do not propose to get into specifics on the measure before us but to deal with the principles set out in the amendment. The ordinary taxpayer, and I am proud to be one of them, today is mainly interested in knowing how much money various levels of government will extract from him. Taxpayers are concerned about how much money they will have to spend on what they consider to be their living expenses, and how much of their earnings will be left after deductions? That is what the ordinary man is concerned about, as well as the ordinary lady who goes to the supermarket to do her shopping. They ask, "How much have I left, and how much will my money buy?" In addition, the ordinary man or woman is worried about inflation and higher costs.

How many thousands of Canadians, Mr. Speaker, are worried by the terrible thought that, "perhaps next week I shall not have a job"? The emphasis today seems to be on people who have no jobs. Yet far too many families face the terrible anxiety that, just over the horizon, may lie the loss of a job, especially when they see productivity in an industry slowing down, when they see small neighbourhood businesses closing down and when they see other, companion industries in which other members of the family are engaged, going out of business. Potential loss of a job is a tremendous hardship and worry facing thousands of Canadians, and that is why there is not the buoyant spirit and confidence in Canada at present that there was a few years ago.

Everyone in Canada, without exception, favoured tax reform; yet the interpretation of tax reform in the mind of the ordinary citizen is far different from the concept in the mind of the government. Tax reform legislation for the ordinary citizen meant a measure to uncomplicate a very complicated system of extracting money from pay cheques. They wanted the system made simpler. Also, everyone believed that if there were equity in taxation, if everyone paid his fair share, there would be no necessity for the constant pressure of increasing taxes at all levels. That is why everyone supported the idea of tax reform.

Let me say why this measure is troubling Canadians today. Even while contemplating tax reform this government, since coming to office, has imposed tax after tax and increase after increase. I am not saying the same thing would not have happened if others had sat on the government side of the House. The fact remains, however, that in the past few years this government has been directly responsible for imposing six different types of taxes. It brought them in even before introducing any so-called tax reform. Perhaps I could list these additional taxes for your convenience, Mr. Speaker.

It will be recalled that shortly after this government took office, they increased the rate of the old age supplement. No one in the House opposed that, Mr. Speaker. There was much discussion about the degree to which the old age supplement should be raised, but no one objected to the principle. As with all measures of this type, some one has to pay. There was an increase in personal income taxes. The increase went directly to pay the increase in the old age supplement. After that another tax was imposed, Mr. Speaker. It was felt that if more money could be taken out of the economy, a brake would be placed on inflationary trends. The government introduced the withholding tax relating to corporations. A certain portion of a corporation's income would be retained by the government, to be paid back at a slack time at the convenience of the government. This was another tax.

A third tax was imposed. The Canada Pension Plan was introduced. No one objected; yet the actual concept and workings of the Canada Pension Plan really meant that it would be compulsory saving; that is, all those who work must pay into this compulsory savings plan or Canada Pension Plan. It is true that it may benefit people to some degree in their later years. I certainly hope the plan does that. However, in itself, it is a tax on the daily income of the ordinary individual.

Then, another tax was imposed, a tax which is still the subject today of tremendous controversy. I am talking about the 11 per cent tax on building materials and repair components. This was serious because, immediately, it affected the entire construction industry. Costs increased by 10 per cent for a home, 10 per cent for the factory, 10 per cent for a garage and 10 per cent for a school. This was a tremendous increase in costs. We were told the tax would probably be temporary. However, years afterwards, even after we had demonstrated to the government the way in which removal of the tax would immediately create jobs, inspire the economy and give impetus to the construction industry, the government stubbornly refused to remove the tax. That was another tax the government introduced. These "progressive steps" were a charge on everyone and took some portion of the ordinary man's income. Every tax, whether it was of 1 per cent, 3 per cent or 11 per cent, meant less take home pay for the ordinary individual.

In addition, we face an added tax, a terrible, creeping tax that the ordinary citizen objects to but can do little about, the terrible tax of inflation. Week by week and almost day by day, the ordinary householder pays more for everything he uses. The increase may be part of a percentage point, a whole percentage point or two or three percentage points. Today, the cost of living is much higher than it was even three years ago. These are all taxes, Mr. Speaker.

Now, we face this tremendous volume of tax changes known as tax reform. Mr. Speaker, I have contemplated very closely the impact of this measure. It will determine whether or not an individual or family can retain a business and whether or not individuals will find jobs in the immediate future. Once this tax measure passes it will determine whether or not people will be able to afford their own homes or pass on their estates from one generation to another. Realizing the implications of this measure, I am absolutely impatient with members on the government side who, one after another, have said, "Pass this measure, pass this measure". Mr. Speaker, they accuse the opposition of holding up measures in this House.

Mr. Greene: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danforth: They accuse us of filibustering.

Mr. Greene: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danforth: If you look back through the records of this session alone, you will find that whenever two or three members of the opposition rose to speak on a government measure, government members immediately said, "This is a filibuster; we cannot get our measures through the House because the opposition will not let us."

Mr. Greene: You are irresponsible.

Mr. Danforth: It is the government that is irresponsible. There are 120 members on this side of the House, everyone of them representing a very substantial segment of the citizens of this country. Every member has the right to express whatever opinion he wishes on every single measure the government proposes to bring into the House.

Mr. Boulanger: Who is stopping the hon. member?

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Danforth: I have no patience with that type of attitude in the Canadian Parliament. There was a time when the members on that side of the House were men who were really interested in the welfare of the Canadian people. Because of the magnitude of these changes, Mr. Speaker, it is going to be necessary for us to deal with them very seriously on a clause by clause basis because the ordinary man on the street does not have time to do this. He is so busy trying to earn a livelihood or find a job that he does not even have time to read the newspapers or follow the day by day deliberations of this august House. It is impossible. He relies on us, his representatives, to bring about the very best tax reform measure for Canadians.

What bothers me is the devious manner in which this government in past months has approached this entire proposition. I have absolutely no confidence in the pronouncements of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) or his parliamentary secretary. I respect them as individuals. I am not castigating them personally, but the manner in which they discharge their duties in this House is very suspect.

I remember sitting in this chamber for most of my Christmas holidays debating a government measure whereby the amount on which the estate tax was to be imposed would be lowered from $60,000 to $20,000. This bill was introduced just before Christmas. Your Honour will recall that members opposite asked us to please pass it. We were told that if we wanted to get home for Christmas, all we had to do was pass that measure and we would be home free. What a joyous occasion that would have been if we had gone home for Christmas knowing what countless thousands of Canadian taxpayers would have had to pay. It would have been a mighty poor Christmas for thousands of families if we had yielded to that type of threat. We finally reached a compromise with the government that it be reduced from $60,000 to $50,000 instead of the $20,000 proposed by the government. We did our best. We went home the day before Christmas satisfied that we had acted correctly, promptly and justly on behalf of the Canadian people.

When we returned, the Minister of Finance indicated with glee to this House exactly what had happened. It was true that he had agreed to drop the amount on which the tax would be imposed from $60,000 to $50,000, but he did not tell us that under the regulations the tax on amounts over $50,000, instead of being calculated on the excess over $50,000, was based on a rate beginning at $20,000. This might have been considered a clever move by the government, but on behalf of the Canadian people who have to pay such bills I say it was a most devious action by government members. Through experience we have learned to constantly watch for this type of action.

Any tax consultant, tax expert or anyone who has made a life study of the tax system in Canada can only reach one conclusion from viewing this tremendous volume before us. It is not tax reform; it is simply a change in the basis of taxation. Although the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance very carefully pointed out the fringe benefits, namely that some individuals in Canada will immediately have an apparent abatement of taxes, the whole thrust of this tax measure is to again increase to a tremendous degree the actual taxes paid by Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Mahoney: Nonsense.

Mr. Danforth: The parliamentary secretary says "nonsense". This is another indication of his responsibility in office, but the Canadian taxpayers will learn to their sorrow that there is an increase in taxes. As far as the ordinary man is concerned, there are, as pointed out by the hon. member to my left, very beautiful concessions to the upper end of the scale, those earning $200,000 and more, but the working man will have to pay for these concessions. It is all right for the minister and his parliamentary secretary to say that millions of taxpayers will be taken off the roll with the increase in exemption, but I challenge the minister to state in this House that those same millions of taxpayers will not be back on the roll after January 1. I do this for two reasons. First, unemployment insurance is to become part of the taxable income. Second, the rate of taxation on the first $1,000 of taxable income will be such that I wager the result of the change of the basis of taxation will be that the government will make money, perhaps to the extent of $30 million. That is not a tax concession, Mr. Speaker, it is a deliberate tax increase.

When we see that this is the policy of the government in every facet we look at, we have to be cautious. We cannot do as the government says and merely let this bill go to committee in order to get on with the business of the nation. If the economy of the nation continues to be guided by these policies, there will be no point in getting this bill through because there will not be any business in this nation. All small businesses today are faced with near bankruptcy. The matter of the United States surcharge is just an added straw on the back of the camel. It is utterly ridiculous for the parliamentary secretary to stand in his place and say that the economy was booming before the surcharge came into effect. It is equally ridiculous for the parliamentary secretary to state that the unemployment figures were decreasing before this United States surcharge.

The unemployment figures decreased because this government tried to buy that decrease. The government spent $67 million to take the students off the streets so that they would not register as being unemployed. They did not want these students to be looking for jobs and registering in the unemployment offices. If that happened, they would be included in the statistics that would hurt this government. The government would rather use the taxpayers' money for a short-term effort to remove these names from the unemployment insurance roll, but the inevitable has now happened.

Today the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) expressed grave concern and anxiety over the fact that enrolments are down this year instead of up. He said that the government is going to look into the reason for this. The answer to why young students are not enrolling in colleges today is simple. They do not have the money because jobs were not available. It is as simple as that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danforth: To suggest there is a trend indicating that young Canadians do not want an education to the same degree they did one year ago is sheer nonsense. These young people know the value of an education, and that is why hundreds of thousands of them are attending school. The fact that enrolment is down is another reflection of what is actually happening under the economic policies of this government. That is why I am impatient when those in the government ranks ask us to rush through legislation, say we are impeding progress and holding up the exemption these people may get. If we honestly believed that this government wanted people to have exemptions and that this tax reform would be such that they would have less taxes to pay, it would be in our interest as a political party to rush this measure through the House. For them to tell us that we would lose favour with the electorate if we dare oppose their will to drive this measure through the House is nothing but arrogance, to use a word which has been justifiably applied to them over the years. There is no other word for it. This explains their attitude, their policy, their day to day program. This is why they constantly talk about filibuster. If there ever has been a word which is overworked by members on the other side of the House, it is the word "filibuster".

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Nielsen: Bring in the exemptions alone and we will pass them.

Mr. Danforth: That is true. As my hon. friend says, if the government will bring in the exemptions separately we shall be delighted to pass them; there would be no hold up in this House. We have asked the government time and time again to reduce the taxes levied on corporations and individuals, burdens which are tying this country in an economic knot. People talk about Canada being subservient in economic terms to Japan, the United States and the European Common Market. For Heaven's sake, turn the Canadian economy loose so that we can go in and produce jobs instead of binding our hands by policies which have proved to be wrong, policies which cannot work. This is all we ask. This is why we have brought in the amendment which is now before the House, not to impede but to plead with the government to change its policies so as to be in favour of the people of Canada who members opposite profess to serve.

Some hon. Members: Hear, Hear!

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) made a few comments earlier this afternoon on the bill before us and I was somewhat provoked by one or two of the remarks he made. He said, in the course of his speech, that we might well be greatly concerned, now that inflation has come back again, about the fact that expansion might return too quickly to the economy. I should like to hear him say this to some of the unemployed or to some of those who are in receipt of welfare. It surprises me that the parliamentary secretary should say such a thing.

An hon. Member: Perhaps because there is an election coming up.

Mr. Nystrom: Yes, it was probably because an election is coming up. In addition, the hon. member said we could blame a certain amount of the present high unemployment on the surtax imposed by the United States. Again, he might have said that because there is an election forthcoming—

Mr. Mahoney: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I was explicit in saying that the figures for August were not affected one way or another by the United States surcharge. I do not think the hon. member can properly put the interpretation he did on anything I may have said.

Mr. Nystrom: I am glad the hon. member has clarified that point. I think most hon. members gathered from his remarks the same implication as I did. Unemployment figures are structural and the surtax had nothing to do with the figures for August. When one looks at the industrial index for July one finds that the index figure has declined. Shipments of manufactured goods were down by .3 per cent for Canada and for Ontario they were down by 19.1 per cent. This, to some degree, explains the increase in unemployment during August.

Before us today is the huge bill amending the income tax laws. An hon. member who preceded me a few days ago contended that these proposals would not really inform the tax system. About the only people for whom the bill would provide jobs or incentives would be the printers or pulp manufacturers because this 700-page bill, is one of the largest ever presented to the House.

The history of tax reform in this country goes back to the time when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was prime minister in 1962. He appointed a royal commission to study the taxation system, and heading that commission was Mr. Kenneth Carter, a chartered accountant and former director of the Canadian Tax Foundation. After a great deal of study, the commission produced an elaborate and extensive report. It said the taxation system in Canada was among the most unfair in the world. It said that hundreds of millions of dollars reaped in profits was escaping taxation; that certain industries such as mining industries were paying scarcely any taxes at all under the existing tax arrangements. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) made reference to this situation when he spoke in Calgary some months ago. About two years ago a white paper on taxation was brought down. This embodied some of the recommendations made by the Carter Commission, though they had been watered down to a large extent. Later, hearings were held by the Finance Committee of the House and representations were made to that committee by various interested groups. Today we have before us Bill C-259, an act to amend the Income Tax Act.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

The first question I ask myself when I consider a measure such as this is: will it have any effect to redistribute income and wealth in this country? In this case, the answer is, obviously, no. It will not in any substantial way redistribute income and wealth so that the ordinary people, the ordinary farmers, workers and small businessmen will have any better chance. Contrary to what the parliamentary secretary has said, this is not a bill which will result in tax equity. This is one of the first things which becomes evident to us. We have now completed the circle and find ourselves back where we were before the Carter Commission was appointed to study taxation.

I think it was my hon. friend from Oshawa-Whitby who commented that the best thing he could say about the bill was that the average person would be no worse off as a result of its provisions than he was before it was introduced. I find myself asking the following questions: where is the great innovator who was elected in 1968? What has happened to this great innovator who talked about a just society and participatory democracy? Where is there evidence of these great changes based on equity? We were supposed to see these changes, but more than three years have gone by and there is evidence of very little change in our society of fundamental importance to the average person. Instead we are faced with the highest unemployment rate of any industrial country in the world. The inflationary trend has resumed, more people are living on welfare, the housing problem is still with us and the gap between the rich and the poor is just as wide as it was 20 years ago. For reasons of this kind, I am very much opposed to the type of bill now being presented.

• (4:10 p.m.)

I often wonder what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had in mind when he talked about the just society. Did he have in mind a society which was just for the rich? This is what he might have meant, because almost every piece of legislation brought down before the House is of greater benefit to those who have it made than to the person who is unemployed. When they talk about participatory democracy what do they have in mind? We were told at a meeting of the Committee on Finance that about two-thirds of the people who made representations were from the industrial or commercial sectors of our economy. Are these people the ones who can participate because they have power and wealth in this country? It is much easier for these people to participate because of their expense accounts and huge bank rolls than it is for the poor guy who is on welfare living on skid row. These are things they forget about when they throw around that beautiful Liberal rhetoric and talk about participatory democracy.

In answer to a question today the Prime Minister asked whether I had not read the speech of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) during which he referred to the matter I had in mind. I am not after that kind of rhetoric, I am looking for answers right here and now. In this bill we still find some lip service being paid to the concepts about which the Prime Minister has talked. This has been mentioned already by members of my party and those members of other parties who have spoken.

We note that the exemption of personal income tax has risen from $1,000 to $1,500 a year for single people and from $2,000 to $2,850 per year for a married couple. This is one of the tokens or perhaps bribes the minister has thrown in to make this look even more attractive than it is. If we look at the basic things such as these, we find that once again they help the wealthy in the country more than they help the average person or working man. This increased exemption will probably save the average working man not more than $100, $200 or $300. If a man is making $100,000 a year, which I suggest is not really a poverty wage, we note that the increased exemption brought about in this bill will save him approximately $5,400 per year. Once again it is the wealthy person who gains the most by this type of an amendment.

We should be talking instead about tax credits under which a person receiving a middle or lower income would benefit even more than this bill suggests he should. Another little goody that has been thrown in is that item which allows a working man to deduct $150 a year as expenses. This is good, but again we see there is a ceiling for the working man. That ceiling does not apply to those who are directors of corporations or banks. There is no ceiling of $150 for people such as that. Again, we have the same double standard which our society has had ever since Confederation in Canada.

When this bill was brought in some people expressed a great deal of shock that it did not contain an amendment which would really change anything, and that there were no innovations. I am not surprised or shocked at all. I did not think this Parliament or that political party on the other side would do anything really serious to change the status quo in this country. I am not surprised because they just do not dare tinker with the system as it is in Canada.

The Carter commission report and the white paper on taxation created a lot of panic throughout the business communities of this country. It spread a great deal of panic and concern among the corporate leaders and the many people who are directing and managing large multinational corporations in Canada. As soon as these people expressed concern, a lot of the members stood in this House and defended them. The Leader of the Opposition and members of his party were there almost as certain as day follows night, and very shortly after we found the backbenchers on the Liberal side criticizing the Carter commission report and the white paper as well. They said we are taxing the big boys too much and we will destroy their initiative. This was the type of approach they took.

I am not surprised at all that we have a bill before us today which really does not change anything at all but keeps the status quo. It does not change anything of any importance to anybody in Canada. One of the concerns when the Carter commission report was made public was that if we acted on some of its recommendations, such as taxing the mining companies, those in the extractive industries and putting on a capital gains tax, we would destroy the initiative and the incentive of these people to develop the country. What kind of incentive or initiative do the unemployed or poor people have today when they have to carry the tax burden and are forced to foot the bill? We seem to be so concerned about protecting the huge financial institutions and the big boys in Canada, but we forget about the 80 per cent or 90 per cent of Canadian people who do not make a living or income from investment but have to work for a living.

We have in Canada what you might call a system of socialism for the rich and free enterprise for the poor. We have many protections in our society for those who are wealthy, but still we say to those who are not that they should get out, work hard and be successful. I am not surprised at all that the bill before us today is one that does not really change anything and does not challenge any of the fundamental beliefs our society has held sacred for so many years. In my position as a Member of Parliament from Saskatchewan and a member of the NDP, I owe nothing at all to the industrial or corporate sector, so I do not hesitate to rise in my place and ask that it be treated like ordinary Canadians and pay its own fair share. Most of the people in my constituency feel the same way about this. They feel it is about time we did put some fair tax on the mining industries and adopt a full capital gains tax. They feel it is time we did many of these things to lift the tax burden from the ordinary Canadian, thereby encouraging him to get more involved in the society and economy of this country. We do not seem to be doing that. We need some fundamental changes, but these changes do not seem to be forthcoming from this government or this Parliament.

In Canada we have from one-quarter to one-third of our population living in absolute poverty. What are we doing about this? We are now worried again about inflation and the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) says we have to make sure our economy does not expand too rapidly. What are we doing about those people who do not have jobs? We must consider their families and the tremendous effect it has on them. It is very easy for us in this Parliament to get up and throw around statistics and facts in respect of how well we are doing. It is easy for us to say we have increased our productivity a little bit over the last two years and we are going to expand, but we seem to forget about the real world outside and the people now living in poverty. Perhaps this is because Parliament is not really representative of the Canadian people. The people in this House are much wealthier by far than the average person in the country. As a result perhaps we do have a different perspective, different sensitivities and different ideas about solving the problems of the country. Perhaps it is all too easy for us to shrug off the problems of high unemployment and poverty in Canada.

We have literally millions and millions of people in Canada living in a state of absolute poverty. In the report written by the four staff members who left the Senate Committee on Poverty it is stated that the gap between the rich and the poor in Canada has not changed over the last 20 years. If we are to provide any real opportunities for these people who are among the poor in Canada we must begin by bringing in some real tax reforms. These people would really then have some opportunity.

The top 20 per cent of income earners in this country earn nearly 40 per cent of the total income. The bottom 20 per cent earn slightly less than 7 per cent. This, in itself, paints a very vivid picture of who is reaping the benefits of the society in which we live. It is not only the poor people who are suffering, but the whole country, because of the type of policies we consciously pursue in Canada. The Economic Council of Canada has suggested we have lost billions of dollars because we do not have full employment in this country and because we are not providing opportunity for those people who would go to work if they were able to find jobs. The Economic Council of Canada has stated that we lost about $3 billion last year. Let me remind the House that if these people were working a great deal of that money would have found its way back to the treasuries of government, federal, provincial and municipal, in which case we could have initiated some plans, social and economic, of the kind all of us would like to see. But we seem to follow blindly the same old policies year in and year out.

• (4:20 p.m.)

There are many other things that could be said about the tax system that we have in this country which, as I have said, is one not based on equity but on inequity. Unless we do something soon, a lot of the people in this country are going to lose faith with the governmental system we have at the present time. For years we have been talking about the poor people, how sorry we are for them and how much our hearts bleed for them, yet we never seem to be able to do anything for them or to change this society that creates the conditions in which they have to live.

I was quite impressed by a speech made by Doris Power of the Just Society in Toronto to the Senate Committee on Poverty, and I should just like to quote a sentence or two. She said:

—the poor have been studied all too well, but nobody has yet told them why they were poor. We demand that the committee study the nature of oppression in this country, not the oppressed.

I think this statement is a very relevant one and illustrates how we should set about tackling some of the problems plaguing us in Canada. We can sympathize all we want with the unemployed, we can quote all the figures we want, but all to no avail; what we must do is change the society that has deliberately brought about unemployment and forced the poor to live the way they do.

There are a number of other matters with which I should like to deal, and one has to do with the way the legislation treats the resource industries of Canada. I am concerned, as are members on both sides of the House, about the favoured status that we give the resource industries of Canada. I suggest all of us should take note of the speech made in the House last week by the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans), who expressed a great deal of concern about the government's economic policies and how they were favouring the resource and extractive industries of Canada over the manufacturing industries. We must make changes in our taxing policy so that special incentives and tax concessions are withdrawn from the mining industry and other industries that today are reaping the benefits to the exclusion of the Canadian people. We should also implement a capital gains tax in the same way as income is taxed in Canada. Why go only half way? Let us have a capital gains tax on 100 per cent of the gain rather than on 50 per cent. Why does the government make the value judgment that income earned from investment or capital gain is more important than income earned from toiling in a factory or teaching at school? Yet this is the kind of value judgment that is made, capital gains being taxed at 50 per cent rather than at 100 per cent.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

May I deal with one other matter before resuming my seat? I should like to add my voice to others who have already expressed concern over the affect the provisions of this bill will leave on co-operatives, credit unions and wheat pools in Canada. As most hon. members know, I come from Saskatchewan where the co-operative movement has played a very important part in our history and in the development of the province. People from all walks of life and political persuasion have involved themselves in the co-operative movement in Saskatchewan. The co-operative movement is important to these people because through it they are helping themselves. They are doing something to better themselves. I think that the co-operative movement has served a useful purpose not only to the members of the co-op but to communities in rural Saskatchewan. Therefore, I join with others in urging the government to reconsider its taxing proposals in regard to credit unions and co-operatives.

Once again, may I reiterate that this legislation is not tax reform. The bill before us does nothing except tinker with a few small changes, like raising exemptions and widening allowances for expense accounts. I say it is about time we stopped fooling around and playing games with each other and really got down to the business of changing our tax system, basing it on equity for everyone, regardless of how they earn their income, whether through investments, capital gain, or by working in a factory. Our tax system today is based on inequity. It is based on the premise that people are more valuable if they are rich, if they make their money from investments. Indeed, they are rewarded for doing so. This assumption is a wrong one, one that has to be changed if we are to do something meaningful for the ordinary citizens of this country. These are the people I am worried about, the average worker, farmer and small businessman. I have no concern at all for the millionaire, for directors of huge corporations or mining companies. It is about time that those boys started to pay their fair share. If they were to do so, the entire country would be better off. The ordinary citizen would then have a chance to reap some benefit from this country rather than just the selected few. It is about time that we discarded socialism for the rich and free enterprise for the poor and began to return to our senses.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, according to the information given in the speech made by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) on behalf of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) at the outset of the debate on Bill C-259, one realizes that it took 10 years to prepare this reform.

Preliminary studies and research started as early as in the late 50s. Governments even changed during this period of reflection. The Carter Commission was instituted, hearings were held by this commission, debates took place, white papers and reports were published, which explains to some extent this voluminous bill of 710 pages. One regrets that a less complicated bill could not have been drafted. Most Canadian taxpayers, besides having to hand part of their earnings over to the Minister of National Revenue, will require the services of accountants, and that at rather high expense, to learn that they must cede to the "taxers" part of their income.

If at least a realistic personal exemption of $1,500 for single persons and $2,850 for married couples had been established. As soon as it is recognized that an income of at least $3,000 for a single person and $5,000 for married couples is necessary to live decently, why take part of their income before they have earned what is considered absolutely necessary to live? That is sheer nonsense.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Here is what a Professor of Economics at the University of Montreal and former researcher for the Carter Commission on Taxation wrote in Montreal's daily La Presse on June 4, 1969, and I quote:

—the average Canadian, whether he is single, married or has dependants, whose annual income varies between $8,000 and $25,000, pays up to 36.6 per cent more income tax than the American resident in similar circumstances.

Paradoxically, income tax represents a smaller portion of the Canadian government's aggregate revenues, due to a lower per capita income, and because indirect taxes represent a larger part of the revenue than in the United States, the professor added—

He also said that "if we do not examine federal expenditures with a very critical eye, there is little which can be done to relieve the relatively excessive tax burden on the Canadian taxpayer."

A few days ago, several politicians were panicky as a result of an American decision to levy a 10 per cent surcharge to protect the American dollar. Some cartoonists even suggested—as in Le Devoir of September 7, 1971—that the usual smile of our Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) had been slightly depreciated. I hope that the same minister who is responsible for the publication of "Canada 1971" will find enough space in the next edition to show the doubtful efficiency of the proposed remedy which will cost $80 million to the Canadian taxpayers, to reduce the effects of the American surcharge instead of approving the mistakes of inexperienced writers who try to disparage political movements under development.

As for Bill C-259, even if it has 710 pages, those who advocate the taxation system did not find the necessary space to include a provision aimed at lessening the burden of Canadian labourers working in the United States, especially Quebec lumberjacks who are compelled to file three income tax returns, one to the United States, one to Ottawa and another to Quebec. These workers travel several miles twice a week to reach their job in the forests of various American states and are allowed no deduction for travelling expenses, purchase of machinery such as chain saws and other expensive equipment. There is no provision in bill C-259, despite its 700-odd pages, for incentives to forest workers who earn a difficult living in different logging camps of Canada and the United States.

In January 1972, Canadians working in U.S. territory were to obtain unemployment benefits. However, here again the tax people have provided in the legislation that contributions may be deducted while benefits are taxable. They do not seem to have foreseen that tax officials will demand proof of amounts of contributions paid. There will be further complications in this field and, as usual, the worker will remain a victim of an over-sophisticated tax system.

Incidentally, let me point out that the government should definitely take into account that lumberjacks crossing the border to work in American logging camps contribute to lowering the rate of unemployment in Canada. Unfortunately, those who had a hand in drafting Bill C-259 were rather inclined to protect the "fund". Obviously, nobody likes to pay taxes. It is regrettable that most people accept them as a necessary evil in the present system. However, the government should try to alleviate part of the bad effects of the system.

As far as the co-operative movement is concerned, it clearly stated its position in briefs submitted earlier.

The provisions of Bill C-259 are unfair to co-operatives because they are not consistent with their judicial structure, their principles or their operating procedure.

The capital provided by a member to his co-op is not for a direct return on capital.

If this legislation was passed without any amendment, its effect would be to stop the normal growth of co-ops, and the Department of National Revenue would be deprived in the future of the sources of revenue that it seeks through taxation.

The savings of a credit union member are refundable at his request. The rate of return on these savings must therefore be competitive, in proportion to that of other financial institutions. The application of the principle of capital employed, so as to provide a return on capital, has no reason to be, where as the market on which the credit union is dealing requires a competitive return, itself taxable, to the member. Upholding the principle of capital employed cannot but result in administrative problems, without any predictable tax profitability.

The champions of the "just society" should not give us the evidence that they are changing it to the "punitive society".

I know very well that the supporters of the system could give us proof that the origin of taxation goes back a very long way. In England, during the feudal system, the collector who could levy the most taxes was allowed to use any means that seemed appropriate to him. This system resulted in abuses of all kinds to the point where some tax collectors became richer than the king.

The incomprehension demonstrated in tax collection caused the French and the American revolutions. In 1776, Adam Smith established the principles of taxation. He summed it up by saying:

The tax legislation must be clear, simple and fair in its incidence.

Taxes must be of general application and known to those who pay them. In other words, one must know how, when, why and how much he pays.

In our times, the tax collector performs under the present law a task which undoubtedly requires much specialization. His field of action involves direct and indirect taxation. In Canada, there are over 25 regional income tax offices and around 350 customs and excise offices. The Department of National Revenue has about 13,000 employees. I admit that most of them are dedicated to their country; but they are a team of well-paid men who are enforcing a bad law.

For a very long time now provincial and federal officials have been meeting to discover new tax fields instead of seeking means of distributing the real wealth of Canada. In order to point out the difficulties caused by an upside down system I would like to quote the view of a professor of constitutional law, Mr. Justice Maurice Allard, a former member of the House of Commons. About the various tax systems he made the following remarks:

Somewhat disturbing is the fact that before 1949 the Privy Council in London allowed in carefully prepared rulings essentially indirect taxes to be considered as direct taxes. The pretext invoked is that instead of being included in the bill linking the manufacturer with the retailer that indirect tax is being charged to the consumer who pays it. Thus that indirect levy becomes a direct tax. The sales tax is a typical example. But with such fiscal definitions and moods how can we know in Canada who is entitled to levy the indirect taxes, the direct taxes and the indirect taxes which became direct taxes through a fiction of the law?

This is a complex system.

In the report of the 1941 federal-provincial conference, Mr. Aberhart stated, and I quote:

We are here to make it possible at some near future date to formulate for Canadians a series of decisions which will give them security in old age and the right to enjoy, according to their needs, the abundance of food and clothing and the comforts of adequate and sanitary shelter which the limitless resources of this great dominion can provide.

• (4:40 p.m.)

We are here, I assert, to establish a heritage of education for those who seek to learn; of health for those who suffer pain or disease; of security and deliverance from debt for those who have builded homes in their prime of life and who may face eviction and the loss of their sacred firesides when the lean years descend.

We are here, I believe, to draft a scheme of things for the Canada of the future, a scheme of things which will bring to that Canada a standard of justice which shall place human values above dollar values, a scheme of things that will provide for our fighting heroes when they return a standard of national.

Unfortunately, the wise advice of Alberta's premier was ignored then. And we are still grappling with a tax, strike, debt and even revolution producing system.

There are even newspapermen who believe that they are well informed and write fairly perplexing editorials in LE DROIT, of which I have a copy here.

The title used for an editorial reads "Blessed debts". The editorialist would like the readers to believe that the interest payment on the debt means that money going back into circulation in Canada accelerates trade in this country and that if that money is reinvested in federal or provincial government or industrial bonds, it gives a new impulse to the national economy.

That the greatest part of the charges or service on the public debt serves to enrich the taxpayers seems a paradox to me. It would be quite a task to convince people like that of the benefits of creating money without debt.

To complete the picture, an article was published in the March 9, 1971 issue of La Presse under the title "Canadian Indebtedness is Increasing": five per cent more in 1970. It is reported that total consumer credit in 1970 stood at $11.3 billion.

With all the advertising that goes on and the example set by the government, which spurs them to get into debt, a large percentage of the Canadian people can indulge in any extravagances, on credit.

On March 16, 1971, in an article written by Mr. Claude Beauchamp, and bearing a title appropriate to our time: "Flying Beggars",—we summarized the steps taken by some politicians seeking loans from the United States.

Another article, entitled: Taxes on Genius, under the signature of Maurice Huot and published in the newspaper Montréal-Matin, on December 14, 1970, referred to the fact that the former governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Graham Towers, stated in 1962 that the tax burden placed on the Canadian people by all levels of government was too heavy. The author had this to say:

Among the means to reduce unemployment, one that is evident, and all experts say so, is to induce the establishment of secondary industries creating employment. However, unless they enjoy a set of exemptions, industrialists are not inclined to initiate and develop industries whose profits taxes will eat up, leaving only the bones.

Jobs can derive only from an economy where profit is promoted in proportion to investments and risks. Nobody will work for the sole pleasure of paying more taxes to the country. When governments as a solution to all economic problems, resort to heavier and heavier taxes, they show little imagination and little know-how. But to stimulate the economy without additional burden would indicate that talent, if not genius, has come to Parliament; that is what we should expect from our leaders. Some of them seem convinced that words and speeches can be a substitute for action.

In our superstructured societies, one seems to endow economists with almost absolute infallibility. Many of them hold positions in the public service, take part here and there in a committee or an agency and are favourably looked upon by government. People listen to them. Some of them, though unfortunately very few to date, have begun to realize that order should prevail in the financial system.

Those who claim that planning—whether indicative or imperative—will put an end to all evils do nevertheless face the basic arithmetic problem that one plus one makes two. One cannot escape from it whatever theory is advanced, be it nationalism, marxism, socialism, planning or controlled economy. We are too much aware of administrative failures in other countries to forget arithmetic.

In conclusion, I will quote some excerpts from an editorial of La Presse of March 22, 1971:

False economic theories

—in the face of the extensive problems which inflation and unemployment have created lately, some specialists are now beginning to ask questions. Do economists deserve the reputation of infallibility attributed to them? Do their theories conform with reality? Is it not time to question some of their tenets?

These are not statements made by Creditistes! It is an editorial written by Mr. Jean Pellerin and published in La Presse.

I proceed with the quotation:

Mr. André Piettre, a French economist, a professor at the Paris Faculty of Law and Economic Sciences and a specialist of the economic theories expounded by the German school, has taken the liberty of initiating in the weekly edition of Le Monde of 4-10 March last, a serious review of the Anglo-Saxon school's economic doctrines. The following remarks are based on this review.

According to the Anglo-American school of economists, inflation has a beneficial aspect. It stimulates economic development. This, according to Mr. Piettre, is a pernicious and baseless theory once it is known that "recession coupled with inflation" can happen, in other words a slackening of business activity, increased unemployment and high prices. This is what Great Britain, the United States and Canada are experiencing at the moment.

Another current theory is that of relationship between wages and unemployment. If unemployment goes up, say reputedly serious economists, the demand for higher wages goes down. The facts contradict that principle. The working class, which is not blind after all, demands bigger wages as prices go up, and this never ending pursuit between prices and salaries is cutting down the possibilities of increasing productivity. Consequently, profits decline, business slows down, factories close their doors, other quickly resort to automation, and unemployment goes up.

Another theory is that, in order to reach full employment there is no reason why the currencies should not go on the chopping block. That does not make sense, say some. The proof is that the devaluation of the pound sterling in 1967 brought no remedy to unemployment in Great Britain.

The editorialist goes on to say:

There are other barren theories that were refuted by Piettre and that only served in the final analysis to send the governments—

That is interesting. Look out, for this piece of advice should be well noted. And I continue:

—on the wrong tracks forcing them to improvise on an immediate basis rather than taking action with their eyes turned to the future.

Unemployment is a striking example. Quebec and Ottawa are quite naturally trying to fight unemployment but they are reduced to the point of resorting to public works—highways, subway, airports—to reach that goal. With a view to really fighting this plague, the authorities should temporarily forget the quite challengeable theories of their economists and consider in all humility the initiatives to be taken for the development of new structures likely to provide permanent jobs to the greatest possible number of Canadians. Obviously, the economic theories applicable at the frontier time are obsolete in our highly urbanized society. We must think in terms of a completely new social texture. Our theories are wrong.

• (4:50 p.m.)

So, taking this situation into account and on the strength of our findings coupled with the many proofs which demonstrate that our current system is at fault and that our problems are due to a financial system in permanent disagreement with our current economic realities, it would be normal that the Creditiste suggestions and proposals submitted to the House on several occasions be considered more seriously if we truly want to eliminate this ridiculous social disorder which permits poverty to exist in the midst of affluence.

• (4:50 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): One cannot help feeling that this debate has an air of fantasy about it, Mr. Speaker, a feeling which was confirmed by the outstanding speech of my hon. friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney), the hon. member for Calgary South. We could hardly believe our ears. Knowing the hon. member as I do, I am sure that he would have great difficulty in believing a lot of the material he placed on the record today. I am sure he was not convinced and still is not convinced. It was, nevertheless, an effort on the part of the hon. member having some responsibility and being on the periphery of government as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, to try to justify the mess we are in today as a consequence of policies pursued by his minister and his government.

We are discussing inside this House the complex problems of the tax bill, while without the country suffers from industrial stagnation, plant lay-offs and an unemployment situation which can only be described as a prelude to an economic disaster of the first magnitude. Inflation is still with us, inflation which continues despite the policy of the government to erode the purchasing power of our dollar, to erode the consumer purchasing power where it hurts most. I need only refer to the cost of living index released today by Statistics Canada.

I say fantasy because in terms of the economic situation in this country we are not discussing meaningful tax reforms; we are discussing a measure introduced by this government which is as deceptive in style as it is in content. The position of this party is clear, Mr. Speaker. We believe this deceptive legislation will not in any way serve as one of the economic catalysts this nation so badly needs at this particular time. As the motion before us states, this government has reacted to Canada's serious economic plight with a tax program which does not provide sufficient tax cuts and incentives, nor does it contain, as the motion stresses, adequate tax exemptions to ensure a healthy growth of Canada's economy. This is deceptive legislation, Mr. Speaker. I say it is about time that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) stopped evading their responsibilities and admitted that the unemployment and anti-inflationary strategies of this government are not only useless but in fact are harmful. If proof of that statement were needed one would have to look at the figures released today by Statistics Canada showing the rate of seasonally adjusted unemployment in this country, the highest rate of unemployment since records were kept, going back to 1946. As if this situation were not bad enough, coupled with it are the figures released on the consumer cost of living index in Canada. As one journalist has put it, Mr. Speaker, it is a bad day for the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: If the government persists in its present policies there will be worse days ahead. Let us look at the cost of living index which has jumped to a record level of 135, a rise of .7 per cent in one month. In real terms that figure represents hardship to the consumers of this country. Even the hon. member for Calgary South, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, is a consumer and even he must be feeling this increase in the cost of living. I think it is about time that the government of this country lived up to its responsibilities, to the onerous responsibility it has to the people of Canada. Here is a rise of .7 per cent in the cost of living. Inflation is still with us, Mr. Speaker, and not only do we have continuing inflation but we have the double jeopardy of continuing inflation and continuing unemployment, rising inflation and rising unemployment. Something is wrong. In other words, Mr. Speaker, according to the present strategy of the government, if you can call it that, inflation was to be curbed by placing a halter on the economy. They were going to slow down the economy and as a consequence deliberately create unemployment because that was necessary to cure inflation.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. In view of the fact that the House will proceed to another item of business at eight o'clock tonight I think it would be appropriate at this time to put a motion to adjourn the debate. I wonder if the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) would put the motion for adjournment of the debate.

Mr. McGrath: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

MIC MAC OILS (1963) LTD.

Mr. Tom H. Goode (for Mr. Sulatycky) moved:

That Bill S-16, respecting Mic Mac Oils (1963) Ltd. be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Peters: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, could I inquire if the mover of this bill has the consent of the sponsor?

• (5:00 p.m.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The Chair might ask the hon. member concerned at this time if he has permission from the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Sulatycky) to move this motion for him. Under the rules of this House we have to take the word of an hon. member. The motion having been put, I will call on the hon. member.

Mr. Tom H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, if another hon. member would like to make the speech, I will be pleased to let him. The hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Sulatycky) has been called away on urgent government business.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Goode: Consequently, the honour of carrying Bill S-16 in this House falls on my shoulders. The purpose of the bill is to authorize the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) to issue letters patent continuing Mic Mac Oils (1963) Ltd. as a company under the Canada Corporations Act, thus shifting the company from Alberta to the federal jurisdiction. When this has been done, it will be possible to merge or amalgamate Mic Mac Oils (1963) Ltd. with Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited under the provisions of the Canada Corporations Act.

Mic Mac Oils (1963) Ltd. is presently incorporated under the Alberta Companies Act and is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited of Calgary. It has an authorized capital of $15 million divided into 1,500,000 shares having par value of $10 each, and 1,496,473 shares have been issued and are outstanding. Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited, the parent, is a federal company incorporated by letters patent under the Canada Corporations Act. The parent company, together with two wholly-owned subsidiaries, one of which is Mic Mac Oils (1963) Ltd., holds varying interests in petroleum, natural gas and other mineral rights in Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia and the Northwest Territories. The companies are primarily engaged in the exploration for and production of petroleum and natural gas in Canada, with their operations at present being largely carried on in Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia and the Northwest Territories, and off the east coast of Canada.

The parent and its subsidiary companies have largely integrated their operations and it is desirable to complete this integration by an amalgamation. However, as Mic Mac Oils (1963) Ltd. is at present an Alberta Company, and the parent and other subsidiary companies are federal companies, such an amalgamation cannot now be effected. Section 158 of the Alberta Companies Act authorized an Alberta company, if authorized by a special resolution and by the laws of Canada, to become a federal company, and the purpose of the present bill is to authorize the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to issue the necessary letters patent under the federal statute to bring this about. Once Mic Mac Oils (1963) Ltd. has become a federal company, it can amalgamate with its parent and the other subsidiary pursuant to the provisions of Section 128A of the Canada Corporations Act.

Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas was incorporated by letters patent in 1926. Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas has outstanding 18,294,044 common shares with a par value of $2.50 each; 54.9 per cent of the outstanding shares are beneficially owned by Continental Oil Company of New York, and 21.9 per cent of the outstanding shares are beneficially owned by Hudson's Bay Company investments Limited of Winnipeg, a wholly-owned subsidiary of Hudson's Bay Company. The balance of the outstanding shares are held by the general public.

By way of comparison, last fall Continental held roughly 67 per cent of the Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas outstanding shares. That has been reduced to 54.9 per cent and Hudson's Bay Oil is now listed on the Montreal Stock Exchange, which hon. members I am sure will be pleased to learn. In addition to the common shares, there are 600,000 preferred shares outstanding which may be converted to 720,000 common shares. These preferred shares are 97 per cent Canadian in ownership. The President, D. C. Jones, is a Canadian.

The purpose of this bill should be kept in mind. Mic Mac is an Alberta company. It is subject to the Alberta Companies Act. That act allows Mic Mac—that is, gives Mic Mac permission— to broaden its place of operations by moving to the federal field. But the Alberta act only allows the company to go into a jurisdiction which is willing to accept control over the company. The words of Section 158 of the Alberta Corporations Act are. "—if authorized—by the laws of (the) other jurisdiction".

What this bill would do is create that authorization. The company would then be able to apply to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs for letters patent for continuing the company under federal jurisdiction and under the control of the Canada Corporations Act. The bill would enable this House to take the reins of control out of the hands of Alberta.

Unlike the Central-Del Rio bill, Bill S-16 does not ask the House for permission to allow an amalgamation. Although an eventual amalgamation is presently contemplated, it will take some time to complete. In the event of an amalgamation, it would be under the control of the Canada Corporations Act. This bill simply allows the company to move under federal jurisdiction. Possible amalgamation under that jurisdiction is only one aspect of the company's operations over which the federal government will gain control.

It should also be stressed that this bill only enables an application to continue under letters patent. A discretion with respect to that application remains with the minister who works within the guidelines of the Canada Corporations Act.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, it seems strange that the sponsor of the bill should at this time suffer from the same difficulties he suffered from when the bill was considered by the Senate Banking Committee. When the committee was called to order, it was suggested that somebody else should submit the bill to the committee. Counsel for Mic Mac Oils (1963) Ltd. suggested that the sponsor of the bill was somewhere between his riding and this House. The chairman could not see why the sponsor was not present to introduce the bill. Possibly there is some reason for his absence today.

We have heard considerable debate in this House in the last while about surtaxes, foreign ownership and the employment within Canada of men working for foreign-owned corporations. The President of the United States has said that he would lift the tax load from corporations operating in the United States and enable them to increase their exports. Naturally, we realize that this move can do nothing but harm employment in Canada. This is the main reason that bills such as this should be given thorough consideration. Questions must be asked and answered. Unfortunately, the hon. member speaking for the sponsor did not suggest that this company would be prepared to abide by the amendment we have proposed to another bill pertaining to the Bank Act. That amendment, if accepted, would mean that Canadian ownership of companies would be retained.

I was pleased to hear the hon. member speaking for the sponsor suggest that the shares outstanding of this company are Canadian owned. The fact that the company at present is a Canadian company is not good enough, so far as I am concerned. I can only refer to another situation. We have tried to introduce an amendment to another bill, the effect of which would be that a clause relating to Canadian ownership would be included in every bill of this type that comes before the House. Unfortunately, as one of the witnesses before the committee said, there is no way of making sure that shares will remain in Canadians hands if they go on the stock market. That is the situation. If the hon. member can say that he has had an indication from the people sponsoring this bill that they will adhere to the suggested provisions in the Bank Act amendment, I shall not object to passage of this bill. If the hon. member could say that, he could save a lot of discussion at this time.

• (5:10 p.m.)

If one looks at the background of the company one will see that Mic Mac Oils (1963) Ltd. was formed on a merger of Consolidated Mic Mac Oils Ltd., Mac Oils Ltd., Mayfair Oil & Gas (1961) Ltd., Mic Mac Oils (1963) Ltd. and Twining Pipeline Ltd. We must ask ourselves whether mergers of this type are in the best interest of Canada, since they do away with the competitive spirit we have seen in the past. I need only refer to the recent increase in the cost of living index, particularly as it pertains to food. When the shopping centres were involved in a price war, the cost of food to the consumer went down. As an analogy to the bill before us, I suggest that if there are too many mergers you can expect the cost to the consumer to increase. There is no competition. This argument is borne out by what happened to food prices after the supermarkets agreed to discontinue the price war. Yesterday we saw the reports indicating what happened as far as food, other than fruits, was concerned. If we are concerned about the so-called protection to the consumer, protection to people dependent on food processing or, in this case, the results of the various consolidations of the companies we see before us, we must take this area into consideration.

When we look at the various aspects of the bill before us, we see that there is not too much to it. On checking the records, we find that there will be an increase in the holdings of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Limited. We must look at the situation to determine exactly what has happened in the past and why these companies merged. I do not suggest that certain mergers are not in the interests of the Canadian public. However, if these mergers result in control of the product being in the hands of a few large corporations, then we must write into this bill some protection for the Canadian consumer. We must somehow bring about a Canadian type of ownership.

We have recently read many observations, heard many debates in this House and listened to professors talk about Canadian ownership as well as the debate now going on with regard to the tax act. We realize more and more people are concerned about the ownership of those areas that should be Canadian controlled. Unfortunately, some members are not really concerned about what may happen to Canadian industry. In fact, this subject came up in a recent committee meeting. I quote:

> On the point of order, first of all there is no government policy, no Canadian policy about foreign ownership as yet, and therefore I think Mr. Skoberg is out of order. He cannot force them to go into anything, or promise anything in that direction, unless there is some sort of a policy adopted by Parliament, and there is not such a thing yet.

Surely, the members of this House will not disagree with the idea of including in bills before us a provision that there be a majority Canadian ownership of any industry within our jurisdiction. There is considerable debate throughout the country as to whether we should insist on complete ownership of industry or whether regulations under the act will be sufficient. I suggest that this Parliament could pass those regulations. The companies that would be affected by the passing of such regulations would be quite prepared to live within the bounds of the directions given by this House.

I saw a situation in a commonwealth African nation in which no company disagreed when that country took over the controlling interest in the copper mines in their area. They took over 51 per cent of the shares of the copper mines, and paid for these shares out of the profits from the sale of copper. When I visited there, I found that the company officials were happy to remain in that country and invest in it in spite of those regulations. We call those the developing nations, but they have developed much more quickly than Canada within the last decade.

The time has come to make some type of token offering to the generation who will be coming after us. We must ensure that ownership will remain in Canadian hands, even if it is only 51 per cent ownership. We will be at least somewhat relieved that it is still a Canadian owned corporation, even to that extent. There is a provision in the Bank Act that could be included in this particular bill which should be acceptable to any company coming before us to be federally incorporated. Sections 52 to 56 of the Bank Act could be applicable to this bill. With that application, there should be no need to worry about whether in the future Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas will be passing out of Canadian hands into the hands of some other country, whether it be our friends to the south or some other country.

The time has come to realize that we must have regulations. It is not good enough to say that there is a certain ownership today. We must be concerned about tomorrow. For those who come before us and say that everything will be balanced out and everything will be looked after in the future, we must tell them that we are concerned about future generations and cannot buy their arguments. We learn from the Financial Post survey on oils in 1971 that Mic Mac Oils are going to merge with Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas. It will become part of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas because it wants to be federally incorporated.

Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas has quite a history in this country. Morgan Guaranty Trust Company in New York is involved in this situation. It has investments in various provinces of Canada. This company is involved with other carriers serving eastern and western Canada as well as portions of the United States. This fact indicates the kind of processing and where the gas processing plants are. This company also has certain investments in Alaska and, of course, across the border. We should look at the entire area and try to determine the desire behind the incorporation of this company with Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas. The information brought before the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce seems strange. The introduction by the counsel for Mic Mac Oil followed directly upon that of Central Del-Rio Limited, which company we are also asking to go along with an amendment to their bill to include 51 per cent Canadian ownership under the Bank Act.

• (5:20 p.m.)

In the examination of this bill by the committee of the other place, they determined that Mic Mac holds petroleum interests in Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia and the Northwest Territories. I understand from the member who introduced this bill today that one of the reasons the company is asking for an act of incorporation is that it will, in effect, bring it within the realm and under the umbrella of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas. In the testimony before the Senate Committee, certain areas were covered which should be covered in this House. If policy with respect to Canadian ownership is to be revised it should be initiated when bills of this kind are introduced in the other place. If this is not done it is further indication of a lack of concern for ownership of a type about which we have heard so much lately. My own opinion is that new regulations should be introduced which would allow the machinery of the Combines Investigation Act to apply to areas such as this, giving us an assurance that companies of the type in question are Canadian-owned. As long as we sit in this House and allow bills to go through unaccompanied by restrictions of the kind made pursuant to the Bank Act, no progress can be expected. If we are to do our duty in the House of Commons the least we can do is to introduce amendments in committee to bills such as the one before us, amendments which would be acceptable to all concerned, particularly to Canadians generally whose interests we are supposed to be safeguarding.

[Mr. Skoberg.]

In the case of the other bill which was mentioned a short while ago, every effort was made to get the sponsor of the bill to tell us whether he was prepared to accept a condition requiring Canadian ownership. Unfortunately, the committee did not see fit to allow that gentleman to answer the question. I, myself, felt it was quite proper to ask whether or not the sponsor would object to the inclusion of a provision of that type in the bill, which could then have been accepted unanimously by the committee. But it appears that too many people in this House are more concerned with trying to pass bills than they are about the principles contained in those bills. If anything is to be done to bring about legislation to protect the interests of Canadians, this is where it should be done, in this House. It cannot be done in committee if witnesses are denied the right to answer questions put to them by committee members. In the case to which I am referring, it would appear that the value of committees is absolutely nil. It is a matter of regret when it is suggested that questions asked and remarks made with reference to a bill such as this are ruled out of order. It makes one wonder whether the committee system under which members of the House of Commons are called in to study bills in depth is of any use. It appears as though these discussions must increasingly take place on the floor of the House of Commons should members of the committee be denied the right to ask questions in cases when the witness himself does not object to the question being asked of him. I should point out that it was not the chairman who objected, it was the committee itself which took exception to the question though the witness was prepared, I believe, to accept an amendment providing for Canadian ownership.

Looking at the bill before us and going back into history a little we note that Mic Mac Oils was incorporated on September 22, 1951. It became Mac Oils and then in April 1963 it became Mic Mac Oils Limited. Then we reach the present stage at which application is made for incorporation under a federal charter. The head office of Mayfair

Oil and Gas is in Edmonton. When one tries to find out who really owns Mayfair Oil and Gas Limited, who controls the shares, it becomes difficult to sort out the corporate structure behind the scenes. The same applies to Consolidated Mic Mac Oils Limited. A lot of the exploration done by this company was carried out in western Canada, which is all to the good as long as a reasonable royalty is levied in respect of that exploration and its results. We all know that Canada receives the lowest payment from royalties of any country in the world today. Yet we sit back with our heads in our hands and cry about being hurt by some other country. We believe that if there were a greater degree of regulation the companies themselves would not object, and the Canadian people would benefit, but as long as we sit back and do absolutely nothing, the companies concerned will take the bull by the horns and behave as they darned well please as far as the Canadian economy is concerned.

As I understand some of the observations made by hon. members, they are not concerned about the question of regulations. I believe that by enforcing certain regulations we could bring into being a much better economic picture and improve employment opportunities considerably. I am sure that some of the companies concerned would be only too pleased to reinvest in this country on a scale which would lead to the creation of employment in secondary industries. Our whole approach to this bill should be whether or not it is likely to be in the best interests of the people. After all, it is the Canadian people who, in a sense, make up the economy, and they would stand to gain a great deal if we did not give everything away. In the bill before us, for example, there is nothing which spells out the need for any type of regulation which would keep ownership in Canada. If the sponsor or any other member opposite could give us some assurance that ownership would be retained here and a provision to that effect inserted in the bill if and when it goes to committee, I am sure no further debate would be necessary. But as I look opposite I cannot help feeling that the sponsor today is probably not in a position to give such an assurance.

However, if this were possible it seems to me there would be no question about the proposal going through and I am sure there would be no debate in committee. I suggest that if this does go to a committee this will be the situation we must consider. We will have to move amendments in committee to in fact guarantee there will be Canadian ownership for ever and a day. Unless we have that guarantee there will be no use considering this type of bill in the House of Commons, because companies will be able to do exactly what they want and no one will be able to protest the passage of special bills.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must do so to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, many hon. members will be confused about this bill, and I sympathize with them, having looked at some of the financial statements concerned. Many people connected with this company, including shareholders, trust agents and others must also be very confused because the company has had a very tortuous journey during its relatively short life.

I should like to congratulate the hon. member who accepted the responsibility of sponsoring this bill today. He did a very good job of explaining what was being asked for and I hope he gets at least twice what the original sponsor would have received had he been here. I should like to ask whether he really considered this matter, or did he accept this just as a "Joe" job.

If you look at the Financial Post survey you will find this corporation was called the Consolidated Mic Mac Oil Company and it listed its address as Edmonton, Alberta. The survey indicates it held interests in 228 oil wells and 36 gas wells in Alberta, Saskatchewan, British Columbia and in other acreages in western Canada. I do not know how they can refer to acreages in Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia and then to acreages in western Canada; however, they do. It goes on to suggest they also have acreages in Montana and Alaska.

This is not really a Canadian company. It is a fairly large holding company. The report goes on to say this company was formed in 1953 as the result of a merge of Mic Mac Oil Ltd., Skyline Oil Ltd. and the Banner Petroleum Corporation. One share of Consolidated Mic Mac was exchanged for each of the following: four shares of Mic Mac, six shares of Skyline and 5½ shares of Banner. In 1961 the shareholders approved the takeover by the company of Mayfair Oil and Gas Ltd. Mic Mac then took over 900,000 shares of Mayfair which transferred its assets and liabilities to a wholly-owned subsidiary of Mic Mac. Mayfair surrendered its charter and distributed Mic Mac shares to its shareholders. Because Mic Mac owned 350,000 shares of Mayfair, the net amount of Mic Mac shares to be issued was 715,000. The exchange basis was 65 Mic Mac shares for 100 Mayfair shares. This tells us what happened some time ago. This company also was involved with very large acreages in western Canada, the United States and Alaska. It then merged with Mayfair, which is also a very large company with acreages in a number of areas. It amalgamated with Consolidated Mic Mac, with Skyline and with Banner.

I did not look at all the financial statements but I looked at them for this year and found that Mayfair, which was established in 1957, also had under its control a number of other companies. At Hilda, Alberta, it had a pooling agreement with Consolidated Mic Mac, Mayfair and Britalta Petroleum Limited. Mayfair did not disappear because of the previous consolidation, it just changed its purpose and continued to exist. The company then made arrangements to negotiate the sale of gas to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. Through all of these companies under this consortium it controlled 29,276 acres.

If we did our job as Members of Parliament, which obviously we are not doing in this field because it involves big business, we would find out where the ownership of each of these companies lies; we would look at Mayfair and discover its connections.

Both Mayfair and Mic Mac were associated in Medicine Hat, Alberta, with the Richfield Oil Corporation. Richfield is, of course, a United States-owned corporation. It was also related to United Producing Company. The United-Mic Mac-Mayfair group was in the Deer Mountain-Swan

Hill area. It was connected with Texaco (Canada) Limited, which probably is not Canadian-owned. It operated there in 1961 with four wells, of which three were in production. The Texcan-Mic Mac-Mayfair group at this point formed a relationship under the Mayfair holding interest.

If you go over the list you will see it refers to holdings in the Queen Charlottes, and in each case these were mixed up with other very large oil companies, including Penfield and Richfield, many of which were United States companies. What bothers me is that in looking at the financial statements of these companies I find this is not a company in the true sense of the word but is, rather, a stock promotion operation. We have the Mic Mac operation as a holding company and Mic Mac is involved with other companies. You find it is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Hudson Bay Oil and Gas. That company holds a number of other companies with which we have been concerned. It wholly-owned Mic Mac Oil in 1963 as a subsidiary which was formed by the merger of Consolidated Mic Mac, Mic Mac and Mayfair Oil and Gas.

In 1963 Mic Mac owned Blue Flame Propane Limited, Rangeland Pipe Line Company and Aurora Pipe Line Company. Aurora Pipe Line Company was a very interesting development by some of the buccaneers in the oil industry. Hon. members will remember that a few years ago representatives of Aurora Pipe Line came before Parliament and received a very rough passage over two or three years. That pipeline was only half a mile in length. It joins the Canadian pipeline systems to the U.S. pipeline systems to handle condensates. Condensates are developed industrially from the raw products of gas and oil.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Why did Aurora Pipe Line connect it? It put all the industrial-potential products of the oil industry into the Chicago market rather than leaving them in Canada where we would have developed a highly integrated petroleum derivatives industry. These derivatives were piling up as partially processed products. They have to be disposed of as soon as possible because the longer they are held, the less use can be made of them and, obviously, the lower their price. Inevitably, Canada would have developed the condensates and the wealthy end of the oil industry or the United States would have set up a company in Canada to develop the condensates. In both cases the employment would have stayed in Canada. A great deal of pressure was applied to Members of Parliament and finally the House passed the bill. As a result, Chicago now has 10,000 to 15,000 jobs which went with the condensates industry.

Hudson Bay has been a very valuable company to Canada and has helped exploit it beneficially. It has made it possible for us to ensure we sell our oil. We have a larger trade balance with the United States as a result of selling this oil to them. But we have not done much for Canadians generally, particularly in those instances where the only people who gained, other than those at the industrial and financial end of the operation, were those directly connected with the drilling operations and production of gas and oil in western Canada. The Canadian public in general has received very little gain, and very little employment is being created by an industry that probably has a greater potential for employment than any other industry or natural resource in the world.

There is a great similarity between Canada and the Arab countries. We have all seen the sheiks riding around in their air-conditioned Cadillacs, with a harem full of beauties, in the oil-rich states. Not long ago another bill was brought before this House and because of the sheik-like attitude of one of the heads of the companies concerned the government was reluctant to commit itself. The sheiks of the Near East have been copied by the sheiks of western Canada, and the peasants of both countries have not derived much benefit from the oil industry.

The oil industry produces, through its coal tar derivatives, a large number of byproducts. It produces paints, plastics, aspirins, all kinds of drugs, even soft drinks. An unlimited amount of byproducts are obtained from the petroleum industry. This company operates in every province in western Canada. In their submission to the Senate committee they bragged they had a company in each of the maritime provinces, both through Hudson Bay, their holding company, and through Mic Mac itself. But do we see aspirin factories here, paint factories there, and plastics factories somewhere else? We see very few factories in western Canada which produce these thousands and thousands of byproducts, from clothing material to dyes and all sorts of other products.

I suggest we do not owe any obligation to companies of this sort. Yet this company has come to Parliament and asked to extend its charter and become a federally chartered company. The reason for wanting this extension is so the company can merge with another. It seems to me rather like marriage between a mother and her son. Hudson Bay already owns Mic Mac, so why does it want to merge? The House sees that there is this kind of relationship.

Mr. Gilbert: An incestuous one.

Mr. Peters: Yes, and the shareholders will soon realize that. This kind of arrangement has no legitimate basis. If it had, when we passed the Canada Corporations Act we would have passed regulations to allow this kind of incestuous merger. But we did not.

Another company that came to Parliament with the same request was Central-Del Rio. In this case we are being asked to allow this company to do something which, although they do not state it, will obviously affect Canada and the government very seriously, because it will be related to Panarctic Oil and any investment it makes in that company.

There is a company in my area which has forsaken the people of the community who made it possible for them to accumulate a great deal of wealth. This company is deserting the area, as I am sure both Hudson Bay and Mic Mac will desert their communities, for the sake of expansion into new developments both through Panarctic and in the Arctic area itself.

If the purposes of this company were pure, it would have made an application under the new Companies Act, had it approved and gone about its business in the normal manner. But it has not done so, Mr. Speaker, and I think one of the reasons is this. I may not understand it, but those who are interested in this "shyster" business of merges, amalgamations and other manipulations on the stock market will. This company wants to establish itself with a Canadian charter rather than a provincial charter as if that had been the fact prior to the time we passed the law which prohibited such action.

I do not know just what this does to the situation. I am not well versed in high finance and diddling your neighbour on the stock exchange, but obviously there is a reason behind it. If not, why would this company go to the expense and bother of coming to Parliament and asking this House and the Senate to pass a measure which most of us know is shady? Why would it ask us to make an exception in their case? Why would it ask Members of Parliament to sponsor a bill, or members of the Senate? They must take some responsibility in the matter. There must have been something to gain that could not have been gained in the normal course of business. These companies are not foolish. They have been able to make some wild mergers in the past. They have merged companies which held very large acreages of land without, in my opinion, any real shareholder participation.

In many cases there have been mergers by establishing companies which had no shareholder control at all. In many cases the shareholder was a holding company which they had established. But they have been able to establish Mic Mac (1963), Consolidated Mic Mac, United Mic Mac Limited and Texcan Mic Mac. They have changed the name, and they go in and out of business and operate very well.

I am sure that a little guy like you or me, Mr. Speaker, who went into the stock market would remember them because we would not be party to the success they have had from this type of manipulation. Now they come to Parliament and they ask us to legitimize their actions, which obviously cannot be legitimized in any other way.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, whether or not, as the previous speaker suggested, this is an incestuous act I am not entirely sure; it depends on one's definition of the term. But it is a very clear example of the attitude of government members when Liberal legislation is brought before the House. We have in the House 13 members of the government party, including the members in the rump, either taking notes, yawning or reading the newspaper but not in the least paying attention to the measure that is being discussed, the subject matter of which has rather important implications.

Mr. Francis: Why should we listen?

Mr. Broadbent: There, again, is a typical Liberal comment. One of the members from the Ottawa area asked, "Why should we listen?"—and this is their attitude at a time when Canada is experiencing the highest level of unemployment in a decade. I will let the people of the country judge the significance of that question.

This measure is about a small concern which will be merged with a large concern. But although the bill only involves one company taking on a new form, it is very important in terms of its significance. At no time in the House in the past three years have we had a serious debate on the whole question of industrial development with specific reference to the resource industry: we have not had such a debate since the government was formed in June of 1968.

During this period we have seen a continual sell-out of our resources, predominantly to Americans, a completely unthinking continuation of policies begun a number of years ago by the Liberal Party in Canada, one consequence of which we saw in the middle of August of this year when the president of the U.S., for his own very legitimate interests and reasons, took a specific action which profoundly affected the economy of this country in a way that it affected no other country in the world. It did so precisely because of the almost full integration of our two economies. Such integration with the U.S. means, of course, pretty full control of our economy residing south of the border.

One would have hoped, following the events of this summer—events which we have discussed in the question period almost every day since the opening of the House last week—that there would be some policy announcement on the matter of resource development, with specific reference to the petroleum industry. Some time ago the government said they were going to look into the announced intention of Supertest to sell out to British Petroleum. Supertest, as hon. members may know, is the last remaining Canadian-owned oil firm. It is now in the process of being sold. The Liberal Party, the government and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene), say they will look into it. The minister said that he will report back on what the government plans to do. But we have heard nothing yet.

Recently a book was published in the United States, called "The Greening of America". What we are witnessing in this country is the "Greening" of Canada coming from the minister responsible for resource policy, Mr. Greene. The "Greening" of Canada really means the complete takeover of this country by financial interests which reside south of the border. Rather than supporting the present legislation I would like us first to have a debate on the whole question of resource development. If that is too much to ask of the government, at least let us have a debate on the petroleum industry; let us restrict it to one industry.

roWhy continue with the present merger policy? We have to ask and receive answers to these questions: Who has control of the industry or the particular firm? Who gets the profits? Who benefits in terms of jobs? Will more jobs be created by such a merger in Canada, or will they be created outside this country? I suggest that if we receive an answer to each of these questions we will find, first of all, that control resides outside of Canada, second, profits go outside of Canada and, third, most of the jobs created are outside of Canada.

One industry in this country which we should seriously consider bringing within public ownership is the petroleum industry. It is an industry in a modern economy that has amazing potential for growth, not only in the normal gasoline products area but in the whole petroleum field, the whole plastics industry that is emerging. Right now jobs in secondary industry in this field, which come from research and development, are outside of Canada.

They are not here because Shell, B.P. and Esso carry out their research and development in the United States, in France or in Great Britain and they develop their secondary industry in those countries.

All the jobs—and there are thousands of them—that are accruing in this industry do not benefit Canada at all but, rather, benefit other countries which have gained control of our industry. Therefore, if we began to move in a significant direction in regaining control of the petroleum industry, using public capital to get perhaps 50 per cent plus one of the shares, we could do three things simultaneously: first, we could stop the export of profits outside our country and thereby improve our balance of payments situation; second, we could put Canadian scientists to work doing research and development in Canada and, third, get the spin-off products in the petrochemical field which would lead to secondary industry being created here instead of outside the country. Thus we would improve our employment situation. Simultaneously, three worth while objectives could be achieved for Canadians.

Obviously, I do not have time to elaborate on each of these points, but I suggest that this kind of issue, this kind of general situation, should be receiving serious discussion when we have a bill of this nature before the House. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the Chair, to resume same at eight o'clock p.m. May I remind hon. members that at that time a motion to adjourn the House will be presented, pursuant to section 9 of Standing Order 26.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

GRAIN

WITHHOLDING BY GOVERNMENT OF PAYMENTS UNDER TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES ACT—FARMERS' ECONOMIC PLIGHT

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. Pursuant to Standing Order 26, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) moves:

That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, as the first speaker tonight I should like to put on record the motion I moved earlier today. As you will appreciate, Mr. Speaker, this was a motion for adjournment under Standing Order 26, where the Chair has sole jurisdiction in determining the importance of the debate in question.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

The question we are now debating arises from the serious shortage of cash and income of the Canadian farmer, making it almost impossible for him, not only in western Canada but elsewhere, to continue farming operations and to make a living from farming. This situation has been aggravated by a decrease in the price per bushel of grain, caused by the failure of the Canadian Wheat Board to receive from the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, which is the treasury, cash for the storage of grain for the crop year 1970-71 and that portion of the crop year 1971-72 to date.

As I have said, earlier today I moved:

That the House adjourn to discuss the serious cost squeeze and present economic plight of the farmer which has been further aggravated, and their income seriously reduced by the failure of the Canadian Wheat Board to receive moneys for storage of grain for the crop years 1970-71 and 1971-72 to date from the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

At the outset I might say that is not solely a debate on the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has broken the law of Canada, that the minister in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) has acquiesced in the breaking of the law, plus the fact that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) has even failed to print in the Revised Statutes of Canada the statute which spells out the law.

This debate has even more serious ramifications. I am sure that even the farmers who are concerned about their livelihood will appreciate that the debate centres around a more serious problem than the mere materialism involved in the storage of grain. This debate poses the rhetorical question: Is this institution of Parliament, which includes the House of Commons, the Senate and all the law-making processes, to be one that will be controlled by the executive? In brief, shall there be a law that shall apply to some and shall not apply to others? Shall the laws be obeyed by some of the people some of the time, or shall there be laws that will not be obeyed by some of the people all of the time—and here I mean the executive of the country?

Coming to the meat of what we are about to discuss, I wish to refer briefly to the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, a statute of Canada passed by Parliament, the supreme law-making power in this country. It is an act which was passed in 1956 by a Liberal government. It has now been flaunted and the government of the day refuses to obey it. Here is what the act provides:

Where, after the 31st day of July, 1955, the stocks of wheat of the board exceed one hundred and seventy-eight million bushels at the commencement of a crop year, the Minister of Finance shall—

Not "may"

—out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, pay to the board for each day in that crop year an amount equal to the portion of the said stocks that exceeds one hundred and seventy-eight million bushels at the commencement of that crop year, multiplied by the carrying charge rate paid by the board at the end of the immediately preceding crop year.

What is that all about? There are two kinds of wheat storage. First there is wheat stored on the farm. In that case the storage is paid by the farmer. But when wheat is finally purchased by the Canadian Wheat Board it is stored in the country elevators which dot the landscape of western Canada, at the Great Lakes which is the shipping centre for sending wheat down the St. Lawrence waterway to Europe, at Vancouver from where it is sent to Asia, or at Churchill from where it is sent both to Europe and Asia. The act provides that where the quantity of wheat stored in this manner exceeds 178 million bushels, the Minister of Finance shall pay out of the treasury so much money to the Canadian Wheat Board for that storage.

That is the law of Canada, which has not been repealed. That was the law which was made by this institution, approved by the Senate and received royal assent. That law is being flaunted today by none other than the Minister of Finance, acquiesced in by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. That is what the debate is about.

The Minister of Finance is not here. I am not making anything of that because we know he is attending an international meeting. The minister in charge of the Wheat Board was dean of the law school of the university from which I graduated in Saskatchewan. That university was founded in 1905. My father saw the brush cleared in Saskatoon and the foundations laid for that institution. This minister, a native son of western Canada, rose to his position because he is a Rhodes scholar. I have students in my own office whom he must have taught that the ethics of law is to understand and obey the law. I am astounded that the dean of that university would come into this institution, with all its traditions, and acquiesce in breaking the law of Canada in respect of the sum of $100 million, more or less.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Woolliams: It is hard to grasp the significance of that action. If it had been the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), who is merely a water boy to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or a water boy to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, I would understand and probably put it down to ignorance of the law, although that is no defence. But when it is a schooled and trained man who does not and will not accept the seriousness of obedience to the law, how can he ask the citizens of this country to obey the law? There is one law for some who obey and one law for some who do not obey, and I am afraid I have to put the minister in charge of the Wheat Board in the latter category.

We are not only debating tonight whether western Canada has been discriminated against or whether the minister has failed to carry out the terms and conditions of the law but, what is more important, whether this place will be supreme for the people of Canada, whether this place will always be supreme for the freedom of the people of Canada, and whether this place will remain supreme as the law-making institution in Canada and, above all—particularly with this government—whether this place will remain supreme against oppression. We might also ask whether this place will be supreme against law breakers, including the minister and the executive. When I mention the Minister of Finance and the minister in charge of the Wheat Board I might include, in passing, the Minister of Justice.

Tonight I say to the news media of Canada, check the new Statutes of Canada. Go through them. The Minister of Justice has an obligation to print in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, the statutes passed by this institution. Search as you will, you will not find an act called the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. You will have to refer to the old statutes, just as if the act had been repealed. I must say it is as if they had mens rea—the feeling that they were going to break the law—in the first place, because they would not even print the law.

An hon. Member: Premeditated.

Mr. Woolliams: I would remind him, through you, Mr. Speaker, that Mackenzie King made a great speech in which he said that the law should be such in Canada that Canadians should know it. A Canadian should be able to find it as he walks, runs, lies in bed or as he reads. How are Canadians to determine the law of this nation when it is hidden, when it is not even in the new statutes? To me that is even more important than what has been done to western Canada.

It will be interesting to see how the minister, a former dean of the law school of Saskatoon, a Rhodes scholar, a man who is supposed to be steeped—I should have said "stooped", because he stooped to break the law—in the law and jurisprudence, defends himself. There is no defence. Members from all over have stood in their place seeking answers. In particular, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) has been most tenacious in trying to get answers. Let me put on the record the question he put to the minister after encountering some difficulty:

> Mr. Speaker, will the minister advise the House why the federal government has refrained from making payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act which is now on the statute books as Canadian law under which the payment of $61 million was to be made to Canadian farmers?

Here is the only answer we could get from the minister after days of probing by the hon. member for Vegreville. This member had moved motions similar to mine day after day, and finally the Speaker in his wisdom granted my motion so that we could have this debate as the people's representatives. The minister replied:

> Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As was indicated to the House last October, it was the belief of the government it was a much better form to make payments directly to farmers of the $100 million rather than make payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act—

In other words he said, "Look, I belong to the cabinet. I never sat as a backbencher. When I came here I was like the bishop, I had a laying on of hands and I became the minister. In that position I do not care about the law; I supersede the law with my own knowledge." What the minister wants, and the new jurisprudence he has developed for Canada shows, is that Canada should be governed by the rule of people and not the rule of law. That must be the jurisprudence he wants; but if he taught it at the law school from which I graduated, it must have been after I left. I do not recall any professor teaching me that the executive rules the country. I do recall what the Nazis did in Germany. They burned down the Reichstag because they did not want a parliament.

If you are going to carry on this way you might as well lock the door, because you are treating us like children in a play-pen dancing to your tunes; you are a puppet of the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I do not do this lightly, Mr. Speaker, but tonight I call for the resignation of the minister from Saskatoon-Humboldt, a native son of western Canada, for his disobedience of the law and for running slipshod over this institution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Maybe he had better take the Minister of Finance with him, Mr. Speaker. In reference to the white paper I once called him a small town bookkeeper. Perhaps he had better go too, because under the act it says that he shall pay. I leave the Minister of Justice to worry. He is a young man, well educated, steeped in jurisprudence and ambitious for the chair. I will allow him to sit with his own conscience tonight because if his ambition is what I think it is, the people will take a second look at him as Minister of Justice of this country because he will not even see his own ministers fulfil the law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: The Progressive Conservative party can be proud of the legislation it has put on the statute books for western Canada and the western farmers. We were responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board under the premiership of Mr. Bennett. We introduced ARDA, the Farm Credit Corporation, the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act and, above all, the agricultural stabilization legislation which provided that the price of certain commodities should never fall below a ten-year average. These particular statutes, approved by Parliament, are the very foundation of the economics of the farm community of western Canada. They are the birthright of the farmers of western Canada, together with the Crowsnest Pass freight rates. That is what this party has done and we are proud of our record in that regard.

• (8:20 p.m.)

What is this government trying to do? They are trying to abolish storage payments. Not only are they trying to abolish the storage paid on grain in the amount I mentioned in my opening remarks, but they want to abolish or repeal the Prairie Farm Assistance Act which is basically a crop insurance measure. Actually, they want to abolish everything that may help the average man to remain on the family farm in western Canada. They have broken the law and, I repeat, that shows they are discriminating against western Canada.

I ask the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, what he has against farmers. What has this government against the farmers of western Canada? Rural Canada may be disappearing because of urbanization, yet within the rural areas of Canada the heartbeat is strong. The pioneering spirit is there. The spirit of freedom moves, and it will move again when the votes are counted after the next election. I predict that the minister who is head of the Wheat Board and who represents part of the city of Saskatoon, a city which relies on the agricultural industry, will not be among those re-elected to this institution over which he has run so slipshod.

An hon. Member: Resign.

An hon. Member: Otto, go.

Mr. Woolliams: The amount of wheat in storage in the 1965 crop year was $33.5 million; in 1966 it was $36,802,000; in 1967 it was about $46 million and in 1968 it was about $79 million. We are the only wheat exporting nation in the world that does not subsidize this industry. At present we are considering the only small subsidy that is paid by the taxpayers of Canada for the storage of grain. It does not apply to grain on farms that is owned by farmers; it applies to grain that the Canadian Wheat Board buys. In addition to supporting the supremacy of Parliament and the principle of the supremacy of freedom, the government ought to obey the law relating to farmers. Never before in the history of Canada, not even in the depression, have the farmers of western Canada been so hard pressed to pay their bills.

May I conclude my speech—

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: —by referring to what the Prime Minister once said. I knew the hon. member over there would applaud. The Prime Minister said, "Go and sell your own wheat." He well knew that the Wheat Board, under the law, has the power to sell wheat, and that if the government does not act in co-operation and liaison with the Canadian Wheat Board wheat cannot be sold. Men have been fined and sent to jail in western Canada because they dared transport a bushel of wheat from one province to another and sell it.

Surely, if the law applies to the farmers of this nation, it should apply to the ministers of this nation. Perhaps the legal beagles of this nation should take a look at the situation and consider what the order of the courts might be. I read three authorities this afternoon which I am sure are familiar to the dean: I am sure he has read them carefully. One is "High's Extraordinary Legal Remedies"; another is on special remedies, "Mandamus and Prohibition", by Short; and the third is "Extraordinary Legal Remedies", by Ferris. These three—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member may continue only if he has the unanimous consent of the House. Does the House give unanimous consent to the hon. member?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I will not abuse my privilege; many hon. members wish to speak. May I say that when a minister of the Crown refuses to carry out the law, you can obtain an old remedy and get an order of mandamus forcing the minister or ministers to carry out the law. Perhaps the farmers of this nation should look at the law with legal counsel to see if they cannot get a writ of mandamus to force the Minister of Justice, the Prime Minister, and the minister in charge of the Wheat Board to carry out the law of Canada, before this institution disappears.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the remarks of the previous speaker. He said that we should proceed in law to demand that a minister or ministers of the Crown in this Parliament discharge the responsibilities which have been laid on them by Parliament and which go back as far as 1956.

During the summer recess I met farmers in my constituency who were concerned about this matter. They wired the minister responsible for the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), asking for action in this matter. They did not receive satisfaction. So it has become necessary in this House to seek a remedy for the abuse of privilege which the government has exercised. The hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton), seconded by myself, moved the adjournment of the House in order that the government might make——the payments to the Canadian Wheat Board specified in the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act of 1956, so that an immediate improvement can be made in the economic position of western farmers.

In seeking justice under this act we seek justice for the western farmer. That justice must be sought in this House by members of the House no matter what party they represent. I say to hon. members: If you fail to carry out the provisions of a piece of legislation which has been enacted in this House you will provide the basis for another segment of society to do the same thing tomorrow.

We could raise all sorts of arguments as to why these payments should be made to the Canadian Wheat Board, and from there to the western wheat farmer. A few days ago in this House I quoted figures put out by the president of the Alberta Wheat Pool, to show that the income of the western farmer has declined by 44 per cent and that the western farmer is lagging far behind in income and standard of living. Apart from the legal aspects of government action, or lack of action, the figures show that there is a callous disregard of the income situation which faces western farmers at this juncture of our history. It is within the context of the situation facing the western farmer that the enormity of the action of the federal government ought to be judged.

• (8:30 p.m.)

If the government were looking at an industry that was booming and wealthy, maybe then they could find some justification for the action they have taken. However, this is not what the government is looking at. They are looking at an industry that is in difficult circumstances. They have worked out a program that they hope will get them off the hook. In order to get them off the hook completely they are going to make it retroactive to 1970 so that they can save some money which legitimately they should have paid. According to the evidence given to the Standing Committee on Agriculture, this amounts to approximately $60 million. The figure, based on the payment to the farmers out of the last pool, would have been somewhere between 9 and 10 cents a bushel.

The government persisted in this approach despite the fact that the surcharge the United States put on certain products entering that country from Canada will aggravate an already difficult situation. They persist in this approach at a time when we are going to face increasingly tough competition overseas. The government is persisting in reducing the support which the western farmer now needs for entering export markets.

According to an article in the September 9 edition of the Western Producer, with the exception of wheat all grains which we are selling on export markets have declined compared to this time last year. Rapeseed is $2.22½ compared to $2.29½ a year ago, rye is 88-7/8 cents compared to $1.09-1/4 a year ago, flax is $2.30-5/8 compared to $2.71-3/4 a year ago, barley is $1.03-3/4 compared to $1.19-3/8 a year ago, oats are 66-3/8 cents compared to 88-7/8 cents a year ago. The price of wheat is slightly higher, $1.73-5/8 compared to $1.70-5/8 a year ago.

It is in these circumstances that the minister and the government have persisted in their attitude toward the western farmer. It is in these circumstances that the government finds $85 million to assist industry in central Canada. Primarily, that assistance will go to central Canada. The government has set up a program and a pattern which, like the law of the Medes and the Persians, cannot be altered; it is sacrosanct.

The best advice that can be given this evening to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board is that he reconsider Bill C-224. He should consider a real program for the grains industry in Canada that will enable it to survive and be a viable industry. But no, I expect he will defend what is essentially an indefensible bill and continue to say that we must repeal, retroactively, the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act and save the government the money it should have paid to the farmers under that act. I expect the minister to say that the government will repeal the PFAA, which has been of considerable assistance to farmers, so they can slough off western farmers every day of every year.

If the minister had come into this House with a program to replace or improve the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, it would have been examined. It could have been seriously considered by this House. But no, he wants to dump the total cost of the storage on the farmer and give him no assistance this year, despite the fact that the grain in that pipeline not only benefits the farmer but those who haul and load it. It benefits the whole economy of western Canada.

When the stabilization bill was questioned, the minister accused those on this side of the House of filibustering it. This first occurred in May when the bill had barely come to the floor of this House. The other day I asked him a question about this matter and he again said that those who chose to question him were filibustering the bill.

The minister brought in a bill of such doubtful value that all the farm organizations in western Canada which appeared before the standing committee called the bill into question and condemned it. We questioned representatives of the Canadian Wheat Board and the Canada Grains Council. We asked questions about how this bill would work. We asked what these payments were based upon, and figures were put before the committee to show how they were arrived at. We asked representatives of the grain co-operatives whether we could operate effectively without adequate amounts of grain in storage. The answer was no, we could not. In spite of all this, the minister plowed ahead. We asked him how the stabilization aspects of the bill would apply to co-operatives, partnerships and corporations which are now becoming common among farmers in western Canada. He did not have the answers, Mr. Speaker. Then he has the gall to accuse those who question the effectiveness of his brainchild, of filibustering and obstruction.

• (8:40 p.m.)

The late C. D. Howe was not, perhaps, regarded as a great sugar-daddy in western Canada but he did appreciate the necessity of giving assistance in carrying the amount of grain which has to be carried if we are to market it effectively. The late Jimmy Gardiner saw the necessity for PFAA and put it into effect to meet the circumstances of the time.

This is all to be scrapped and in its place we are presented with the stabilization bill which will guarantee farmers the level of gross income of the last five years, a level which the president of the Alberta Wheat Pool says has dropped 44 per cent since 1967. We are to be guaranteed this level and we are to put up 2 per cent of the gross income of the western farmer to guarantee it: this is the trade-off.

The previous speaker discussed the legal aspects of what is now being done. I am talking also about the moral and economic aspects of these proposals. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he came to power talked of a just society—and this is the just society, a society in which they violate the moral and legal procedures of this country, a society in which they violate the moral economics of a large sector of this country!

At a time when there is a serious decline in income in part of the country they propose to remove the assistance which existed, and they do not propose to replace it. We have a Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) who stands in this House when we are asking what is the program for western farmers, or for all the farmers of Canada so far as that is concerned. When we ask what provision has been made for the producers of food as against the provision made for those who manufacture and process in this country, the Minister of Agriculture says this matter will be dealt with commodity by commodity.

He should listen to the radio or read the letters I am getting from producers of potatoes, of hogs, of apples. They are in a desperate situation because of the surcharge which the United States has placed on many of their commodities. The Minister of Agriculture says this question be dealt with commodity by commodity, but with regard to what single commodity has he come into the House and said, since the surcharge was imposed, "On this particular commodity we are going to act". This is the just society!

An hon. Member: Just for Grits.

Mr. Gleave: Yes, just for Grits. If the government and the minister wanted to do something they would withdraw the stabilization bill. But even if the minister does not want to do that he should allow the payments which should have been made under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act and distribute that money among the farmers. He has sent out a lovely lot of chits, little bits of paper, to all the farmers in western Canada. I have one. He said, in effects, "If I had paid you, you would have got so much money". Some of the farmers there took him seriously. Some of them said to me, "When do we get it?" I replied, "I don't know when you will get it; and if you do get it, it will cost you more than the amount of the cheque that you receive. It will be a bad deal". But the minister and the government persist in their refusal to carry out the law of the land, first; and, second, to carry out their moral obligations to the farmers of western Canada. In order to get a debate in the House—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired unless he receives the unanimous consent of hon. members to continue. Does the House give unanimous consent to the hon. member to resume his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gleave: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and members of the House. I have almost completed my remarks. I merely want to say that in order to get a forum in which this matter could be debated, the House had to accept a motion under Standing Order 26 and receive a favourable ruling from the Speaker. We had to do this before we could bring before the people of Canada the injustice which is being visited upon western farmers.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, if the motion now under consideration is quite important for the western farming community, it is also for all Canadian farmers.

I would like to point out in the first place that both members, who moved the adjournment of the House in accordance with Standing Order 26, should be congratulated.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, the reason I am rising in this debate is that I want to show the solidarity which we should feel all across the country. In short, in view of the seriousness of this problem, we ought to make our contribution and urge the government to carry out these measures which have been voted by Parliament.

The Chair allowed this debate to take place because it recognized the seriousness of this problem, and this is the reason why tonight we have the opportunity to examine the situation which prevails in western Canada.

It will be remembered that Parliament passed an act intended to provide western grain producers with a guaranteed income, and that several million dollars were voted for that purpose. However, what is happening now? As a matter of fact the government is blamed for not carrying out that act, for not giving to the farmers, to the wheat producers of the Prairies the opportunity to benefit from that act. That is precisely the reason why the opposition has moved that motion in order to draw the attention of the government and of the public to the seriousness of that problem.

It seems more and more obvious to me that the farmers of the Prairie suffer from the fact that this act is not carried out. Indeed in a speech made on January 28, 1970 in Winnipeg at the annual meeting of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture the minister responsible for the Wheat Board announced a bright future for the western wheat growers.

At that time, if my memory does not fail me, the Canadian government had proposed acreage reductions in order to set up a quota system ensuring better control of the grain production in the West, and guaranteeing to grain producers not only decent prices but also incomes in relation with the amount of work they must spend on the operation of their farm.

At that time, this is what the minister told us:

> The future prosperity of our grain producers in western Canada requires a significant reduction of our present wheat surplus and the only way of achieving this objective is to carry out acreage reductions, and while reducing our wheat surplus we must also make sure we do not have surpluses of other crops.

Mr. Speaker, all of us felt that this policy could be beneficial, at a certain time, but we have had to realize that it was not so for the western grain producers or the eastern milk producers, nor for the swine breeders or poultry farmers or egg producers. At present, the situation is tragic. I believe the federal cabinet as well as those who are concerned with agricultural problems, are in a position to find that the situation is the same in eastern Canada, in the Maritimes, in Quebec and in Ontario.

In fact, many hog farmers lose money producing pork meat or breeding piglets because of transportation problems while cereals are sold in the east at impossible prices, with the result that production costs increase in the eastern part of the country without at the same time and in a normal way favouring western cereal producers.

This means that eastern farmers do not get the share of the national income to which their activity entitles them while grain farmers in the west are also the victims of a situation detrimental to their interests.

That is why we must work hand in hand to make the situation known to the government and ask it to apply the policy in which it believes since it made the Canadian Parliament vote those bills by showing that Bill C-239 aimed at ensuring some stability in the income of western grain producers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, Bill C-244 brought before Parliament in 1970 contained the following provisions:

> His Excellency the Governor General has recommended to the House of Commons the present measure respecting the stabilization of prairie grain sale proceeds; to provide for the calculation, authorization and rate of stabilization payments to actual producers resident in Canada; to establish the Prairie Grain Stabilization Account in the Consolidated Revenue Fund; to provide for a levy to be deducted from all grain sale proceeds; to provide for refunds of over-payments of levy and for the payment of the amount of any deficit including interest of the Canadian Wheat Board relating to the grain and pool period that closed or closes on or after July 31, 1970;...

Now, under the provisions of this bill introduced in the House as a prodigious means of assuring to western grain producers some guarantee of stability, we have deemed appropriate, as parliamentarians and after having received the proper explanations, to give it our agreement and, today, it is the producers themselves who complain about its non application.

Another legislation, Bill C-239, entitled "An Act to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act" was passed by this House, and I believe that it is the failure to implement this act which has incited the western grain producers to show their dissatisfaction with the situation, and with reason. In fact, the ministers concerned by the motion are directly responsible for this situation, and it is up to Parliament to seriously consider this problem so as to enlighten this government on this situation, so that a profitable solution be brought as soon as possible.

When there are farming problems concerning the western grain producers or the farmers in the Maritimes, in Quebec or Ontario—be it a matter of dairy products, egg production, fowl meat or pork—one would think that the Canadian government does not want to bother with it, and that is regrettable.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, we have recently seen conditions which could affect part of the Canadian people. I refer indeed to the American surcharge on Canadian imports. Now, the government immediately sought the advice of its legal advisers and of all its experts in order to develop a policy which would lessen the disastrous effects of that tax policy on Canadian imports.

I agree with the government that in such circumstances we must take very quick decisions and it is probably why the government introduced in the House the bill which we studied last week to ensure the stability of employment in Canada, as mentioned in the bill.

I agree with all that, but we must not neglect at the same time another form of economic activity in Canada, that is agriculture which not only affects the grain producers themselves, but also the organized trade, our cooperatives, our western and eastern beef producers as well as all other spheres of production in eastern Canada. In short, this policy could prove disastrous for the whole country if income security is not ensured all classes of our society.

I feel that in this debate, we should prove our sense of responsibility, and I trust that tomorrow perhaps the government will take the necessary steps to implement this measure and see to it that the western grain producers receive their due without delay.

Mr. Speaker, we live in a vast country, in which there are ten provinces, where various tongues are spoken. In eastern Canada, when Parliament passes measures favouring the western producers, we meet people who, perhaps for political reasons, take advantage of this situation and tell Quebecers or New Brunswickers: "All your tax money is going out to western Canada". And today, we see that western farmers make representations in this House and say to the government: "We have not received what we were entitled to under the law".

Western farmers are dissatisfied and at the same time eastern farmers are displeased because they were told that all the money is going to the west. Enough is enough, Mr. Speaker. We have to lay our cards on the table and prove to Canadians that we in Parliament are assuming our responsibilities towards both eastern and western Canada, and that we are trying to be wise, honest and fair towards all provinces. That is how we will achieve the unity which must prevail in Canada.

I for one, as a producer of eastern Canada and as a member, felt it my duty to support the demands contained in the motion and to associate myself with the hon. members who are willing to describe a disastrous situation for the producers of western Canada, without blaming nobody in that part of the country, but trying at the same time to make the government understand that there are also in eastern Canada problems which are generated by the prevailing situation in Western Canada.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Only last week I received representations from mill owners and co-op representatives who are unable to find supplies in a normal way and at competitive prices because of those that are set today on the international market. The result of this is increased production costs for eastern producers who in turn will have to turn to the federal government and ask for special legislation in order to get the protection that will allow them to derive reasonable income from their farm or herd operations.

If we all make a serious attempt here in Parliament to find the proper solutions to our agricultural problems, and this without discriminating against any area of this country, we will be known as men of responsibilities, and this is sure to be felt among the population. This will enable us to continue building a better country in which to live and where all social classes, the farmers included, will get their fair share of the national income.

For this reason I support the motion and I ask the government to take the necessary steps to bring justice to our grain producers in western Canada.

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker this debate began with a motion which re-cited, in the first place, a serious income problem among farmers in western Canada. There is no doubt at all about the seriousness of that problem. It is for that reason that I witness here tonight, with particular regret, a continuation of the attempt by hon. members opposite, particularly the prairie members among the Conservatives and NDP, to make political capital out of the plight of the western farmer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: They attempt in this House to block and filibuster every measure that is brought forward to help the prairie farmer, and in committee they do the same. Then out on the prairies they take credit, on the one hand, for stopping some imaginary plan of the government's and, on the other hand, they blame the government for not acting on and proceeding with the very legislation which they block in this House and prevent from going through. Prairie members among the Conservatives and NDP also make it a full-time occupation to go among the farmers and spread gloom and doom in every way they know. The problems of the prairie farmer are very real in a world of low grain prices, subsidized competition and rising costs, without the doom and gloom spreaders working among the farmers to create additional feelings of despair.

I have nothing but contempt for those who, having heard the government time and time again say in this House that it is going to do everything it can to make the agricultural industry as efficient and as effective as possible for as many prairie farmers as possible, then go to the prairie regions and talk about some government plan for taking farmers off the farms. As I said, I have nothing but contempt for that kind of doom and gloom, this spreading of despair and deceit.

One of the things which caused the greatest difficulty for the prairie farmer was that over the years government after government had been afraid to tackle problems relating to agriculture. They had been afraid because they worked on a simple political maxim which was far too simple, namely, that doing nothing is far safer than trying to do something to correct a difficult problem.

Since my association with this government and my connection with this particular problem I have been determined—and my colleagues were ready, fully, to join with me in this—to try to tackle the problem and solve it, so that when we had finished the attempt the situation would be better than before, so that in legislating there might be left in years to come some improvements, whether in the quota system, the system of stabilization or the Market Development Fund, which would be permanent. What we want to do is to put the acreage of the prairies to better use.

The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) went through a litany of what the Conservatives had done for the prairie farmer over their many years in office. He found two items: the Wheat Board and cash advances. He did not remember to say that the Conservatives in their day had indeed set up the Wheat Board but had left it as a mere puff without power until the Liberal government gave it some power and gave it the ability to sell farmers' grain.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lang: I quite agree with him about the merits of the cash advance system. In fact, the one thing that I can find in the Conservative record which remained to help the prairie farmer more than a year or so after it had been legislated and put into existence is the cash advance measure. Of course, in the case of the cash advance we found it and we doubled it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lang: Members of the opposition in recent weeks have been reacting with surprise to the fact that it is the intention of this government to repeal the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act as of July 31, 1970. We indicated our general approach to prairie farmers in October, 1970. The bill containing the formal proposal appeared in this House for first reading on April 29. The hon. member for Calgary North, who learned his law at a great law school, recited the statutes but he did not have the fairness to admit that the moment Bill C-244 is enacted into law, the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act is repealed effective July 31, 1970 and $100 million can be paid out to the farmers. Farmers would then be far better off than if anything else had been done in this area for them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: Hon. members opposite saw before this House three important pieces of legislation directly related to grain appearing for first reading, for second reading and for further processing during the course of April and May of last year. What did they do? In the case of the cash advance legislation, they spoke for something like three days of House time, valuable as it is, saying one after another that they agreed with the bill, but saying it for three days. That is the kind of approach that they take to House time in terms of delaying. They knew they were delaying the bill which was to come next, which was Bill C-244. Look at the record on Bill C-244—once again meandering speeches not dealing with the merits of the bill but dealing with the agricultural situation generally and going on for days. Then, in committee, we witnessed delaying tactics such as one had never seen before.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Vegreville wishes to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Mazankowski: I wonder if the minister would agree to point out to hon. members that a mere 12 hours was spent on Bill C-244 in the House and something like—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lang: I can only gather—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Battle River rising on a point of order?

Mr. Downey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am wondering, Sir, if it is not within your power to protect the members of this House from this distortion of fact and this inconsequential drivel.

Some hon. Members: Hear hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. With respect I might indicate to the hon. members who have risen on points of order that they are really questions of debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: I think you must agree, Mr. Speaker, that this shows the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) is not in the House often enough because he does not know how many days 12 hours makes.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. Will the hon. member resume his seat, please.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of privilege. The dates are recorded here. I have them before me if the House would permit me to read the dates—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. I think we are embarking on a debate on points of debate, and I know that the hon. member for Vegreville will have an opportunity to speak shortly. I now recognize the minister.

Mr. Lang: I know that hon. members will agree that sometimes when speaking about the problems of the prairie farmer I get carried away and excite a certain amount of reaction from the other side of the House. I apologize for doing that, although the cause deserves every bit of vigour that it can be given.

When Bill C-244 finally got through committee after having been held up, particularly by members of the NDP—not those from Saskatchewan who were busy campaigning but several others who remained here from other parts of the country to block the bill we tried to move it forward in every way we knew. A technical objection by an NDP member prevented it from coming on for first and second reading in its ordinary course. Then, when we finally got to the bill on June 22, unfortunately the night before a provincial election, we moved for an extension of time, and hon. members opposite, who say they are so concerned about prairie agriculture, stood and refused to allow an extension of time that night. They refused to let the bill be debated.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Lang: Hon. members opposite have not said yet, and I am waiting to hear from them, whether they would prefer the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act payment instead of the $100 million payment under Bill C-244 because the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act payment, at a cost of $60 million to the treasury, would have meant the transfer to the farmers of $40 million in June of this year.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Put your feet on the floor and your head over the clouds.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Lang: The stabilization bill will mean a transfer of $100 million. The only farmers who would be better off by the payment of the $40 million which they would have received under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act instead of the $100 million they will get under Bill C-244 when it becomes law are those farmers who delivered in 1969-70 over 10,000 bushels of wheat. Only those with the very largest farms, with whom members opposite often refuse to have anything to do, would have benefited. Those with smaller farms will get something like two to three times as much money under Bill C-244. I hope that we will soon again be dealing with Bill C-244 in this House. I only ask that hon. members allow the issues therein to come to a vote. It has been their tactic to avoid this happening, and this should not be allowed to happen again. The money can be paid out as soon as that bill becomes law.

As the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, I have been trying to do many things.

Some hon. Members: Pay up.

Mr. Lang: I have been unwilling to stand pat. I have been unwilling to leave things alone for fear of the political consequences to me. Hon. members opposite regularly have been saying that in the next election I will be defeated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: They are now saying, under the leadership of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), who would have made a fine house leader for Machiavelli, that I should be in jail. Well, Mr. Speaker, let me tell you that I am going to go on fighting for the western prairie farmer, trying to do things I know will help him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: I am going to fight for his causes every way I know how. I am going to try to do things quickly, and sometimes take short cuts to do them instead of being held up in a legal morass. And, Mr. Speaker, hon. members opposite cannot prevent me from doing everything that I know how to help the prairie farmer by frightening me with threats of jail or defeat.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I would gladly go to jail in the cause of the prairie farmer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, what hon. members opposite will not refer to, what hon. members opposite are trying to cloud over is the fact that improvements are being made, and that last year we did accomplish a year of record grain exports from the prairie region.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Against their gloom and doom, I say that there are real problems which we must face and which we must tackle. I say that we must expand sales in every way we know how.

I am happy to say that to this point this year exports of Canadian grain are running ahead of the levels of last year, even though last year we set a record.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Lang.]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, on March 15, when I introduced the final statement for the year, which was the basis for the stabilization bill, I indicated to the House that in my view while we were taking vigorous action to promote sales, while we were doing a variety of specific things to put treasury money into the hands of the prairie farmers, notwithstanding all that, we must continually examine the question of whether the prairie farmers' income at that point in time at the end of any program is adequate. I believe that examination must go on, and I will fight for that examination to take place. I will fight for steps to be taken to help the prairie farmer in every case that this can be done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, members of t' Conservative party from the Prairies met not long ago in Saskatoon and unanimously endorsed their support for the Canadian Wheat Board. But having done that, they moved a resolution which really effectively suggested that it have its legs and arms cut off, and that it go about the world as a eunuch.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: They said, "We want the Canadian Wheat Board, but take away all its powers. Let us retain the Canadian Wheat Board, but let it only deal with the quotas and the transportation system," which is the equivalent of saying, "Let it stop being a seller of Canadian wheat, let it go as a protector of the farmer in the orderly marketing of wheat."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the minister but I do so to advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The minister may, of course, continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lang: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I much appreciate the indulgence of hon. members. I should very much like to review in full the many things we have done for the prairie farmer, but I will only touch briefly on some of the highlights. Hon. members opposite are not mentioning the fact that we have record sales.

The Conservative party does not mention the fact that last year's record compares with totals in the range or averaging just over the 400 million bushel sales they had during their years in office from 1957 to 1963. Last year, the figure was 696 million bushels, compared with their average of just above 400 million bushels, a fantastic difference.

Some hon. Members: Hear hear.

Mr. Lang: In the years when they had something to do with the government we saw, with respect to barley sales, our entry into the world feed grain market gradually dwindle into insignificance until, in the final year 1962-63, only 15 million bushels of barley were exported. Yet these are the people who say that we should be aggressive sellers. Mr. Speaker, the first thing we did was to say to the Canadian Wheat Board, "We will guarantee you credit as you sell grain throughout the world. We will assist you with a partial payment of interest if you have to reduce interest rates when you are selling to developing countries."

With that kind of help they moved into markets like Syria and Egypt, where they had never been previously, and back into Brazil, the Phillipines, and Peru where they had not been for years. That is the kind of action that contributed to record sales last year.

Some hon. Members: Hear hear.

Mr. Lang: We were also being told by some observers, some of the experts, that there was no real place for Canadian feed grain in the markets of the world. We said that need not be so. We said to the Canadian Wheat Board, "You go out with all the vigour you can, and look for a barley market." They have gone after that market. In the very first year of doing so our exports went up to 84 million bushels, and last year moved up to 172 million bushels.

Some hon. Members: Hear hear.

Mr. Lang: We need to be in the feed grain markets of the world, and we expect to assist in the additional research necessary to improve that grain or to develop other grains in order to keep ourselves in the forefront of those markets. For this reason, there was recently announced the establishment of the Crop Research Institute at the University of Saskatchewan in Saskatoon to augment, as a result of fundamental support from the National Research Council, research into the kind of grain which can be grown for better markets in the world. At the same time, we set up the market development fund as a sales weapon leading to a flexible approach to selling which will allow us to support Canadian businesses wanting to go into flour milling or rapeseed milling abroad. By doing that, perhaps they can assure a better access to the market for Canadian grain and lead to a future of greater sales.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What about wheat and the law? That is the question.

Mr. Lang: In the case of the handling and transportation system, we have launched a vigorous series of studies into the changes that may be necessary. We refused to sit still and say that it is a dangerous question to touch. I say that if there is a way to say to the prairie farmer that he can save a significant amount of money, I want to get at the facts even if the gloom and doom sayers over there will spread threats and notions of disaster from the very fact that we are trying to do something to make it possible for the prairie grain farmer to market his grain at lower cost. What we have said in connection with the studies, how this present handling system works and how alternatives can work—alternatives like cleaning more grain on the Prairies and shipping it to the coast by unit train—we have said in connection with those studies, and the government has taken the policy decision, that any change which could be made in that direction should be made only with the full support of the producers. We have also said that when such change is made the bulk of benefit must be allowed to go back to the producers. We said that in favour of the prairie farmer in terms of his grain deliveries—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This is all irrelevant to the question.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-244 will shortly be before the House again. When it is, I ask hon. members opposite to look at it fairly and to allow us full time to pass that bill and get the $100 million into the hands of the farmers.

Some hon. Members: Hear hear!

Mr. Lang: There is no doubt, and there never has been any doubt, about the fact that what we have been doing with Bill C-244 was, in terms of 1970-71, attempting to take the $60 million which the Treasury might otherwise have spent under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, to add $40 million new money, and pay the total to the grain producers as $100 million instead of $60 million. As far as the rest of the program is concerned, it meant the assurance of a contribution by the Treasury of more money through the stabilization fund than would have been available to the farmer under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act in future years.

Mr. Peters: That is not true; you know it is not true.

Mr. Lang: It is certainly true.

Mr. Peters: It is not. The maximum would be $40 million.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. The hon. minister has the floor.

Mr. Lang: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), who was so busy blocking things in committee, obviously never found out that there is no limit to the government's contribution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: There is a limit, and you know that.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, if exports could be brought up to the one billion bushel level, which I think we have to start taking as our target before long, and if sales can amount to the $2 billion level, under the bill the government of Canada is committed to pay 4 per cent of 90 per cent of those marketings into the fund, however high that rises. In addition, if at any time the stabilization fund does not have enough money to bring the producers' income up to the previous five year average, under the bill the government of Canada is committed to lend to the fund, interest free, whatever amount of money is required to make that kind of payment. The Temporary

Wheat Reserves Act was going to become far less important to the farmer in the future because we were not going to allow wheat to block the elevator system to the extent that grain could not effectively be moved to market. Moving the grain to market is the prime function of the handling system, not being blocked with grain. That is why—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom).

Mr. Nystrom: I wonder if the hon. Minister would answer a question at this time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I have some confidence that at the rate I am going I will answer all his questions before I am finished.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is that a commitment?

Mr. Lang: It is because of our belief that the handling and transportation system must be allowed to get grain to market that we must be prepared for a maximum year. We cannot afford to have one bushel of grain standing in the way of the rapid movement of grain. Because of that, for the first time in a long period farmers in the prairie region found this year that they were able to deliver a little bit of grain once again from their combines to the elevators at harvest time instead of finding the system plugged with grain on August 1. I would like to explain to members from other parts of Canada what a nonsensical system that was. We used to find the elevators plugged with grain on August 1. Farmers would have a great crop ready to be harvested in the month of September and the elevator system would be plugged so that not an additional bushel of grain could be added. We said that there had to be some sensible approach to inventory. In saying that, in the Lift program we added $60 million to the income of the prairie farmer to help him make an adjustment to his inventory.

That was not an easy program, Mr. Speaker, and my advisers told me to take another year or two before doing that. I said that we could not wait, that we had to get our handling system into shape and supplies of grain into the proper place as rapidly as possible because of the tremendous need to get additional income into the hands of the prairie farmer. I told my advisers that there are only two places where the prairie farmer who sells his grain is going to get his income; one is from his sales and the other is from the Treasury. I said that try as any of us might, there is a finite and very real limit to what can be obtained for the prairie farmer from the Treasury at any time and that, therefore, the tremendous drive must be to sell more grain, to get our grain out into the world.

I am sorry to take so long, Mr. Speaker, and I pray the indulgence of all hon. members, but I should like to say a few words about why the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act was therefore going to be worth so much less. Just by getting a little reduction of wheat in the system, a little space in the system, just by making a little room for rapeseed which was becoming a very important crop and just by making a little room for barley which we said we had to market into the world, this year the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act would have dropped in value to only $26 million and by next year the amount would have been very insignificant indeed. Against that we built in these commitments without limit—a commitment, I say to the hon. member for Timiskaming without limit—to 4 per cent of the 90 per cent of the crops marketed by the prairie farmer, into the stabilization fund to be paid out to the farmer in those years when he has his greatest difficulty. With regard to the bill that has been in the House and before the committee, I find that I owe a tremendous debt—

• (9:40 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: Pay up, Otto, pay up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lang: —of gratitude to my colleagues on the Liberal side of the House who represent constituencies in the Maritimes, Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia as well as members from the prairie provinces. I am thinking particularly of those members from parts of the country other than the prairies, who sat through the irrelevancies of hon. members opposite in the House and in committee and who helped to get this bill to its present stage, the report stage. I thank them on behalf of the prairie farmers. I want to say to them that I will try to inform the prairie farmer of the efforts made on his behalf, of the attitude they have expressed towards his problem and of the growing understanding that they are helping to bring across this country regarding the real problems of the prairie farmer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. The hon. member for Wellington has risen, I think, to ask a question. Other hon. members wish to be recognized. I will recognize first the hon. member. May I remind all hon. members in the chamber that the minister, of course, will have to indicate whether or not he is prepared to answer questions. That being so, I will recognize the hon. member for Wellington.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the minister a question, if he will answer. Is he agreeable?

Mr. Lang: Yes.

Mr. Hales: I am not a prairie farmer but I wish to ask the minister this question. Does he not agree that legislation passed by this House and on the statute books of Canada should be enforced until such time as it is amended or repealed by other legislation?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is the question.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, that is an easy, general question to answer in the affirmative. In this particular case, having announced the government's policy of repealing the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act effective July 31, 1970, and substituting therefor the $100 million payment under the stabilization bill for that same crop year, we could fairly easily have in fact made the payment to the Wheat Board.

An hon. Member: Why did you not do it?

Mr. Lang: We could have done that with the intention that upon the enactment of the bill, the amount indicated would have to be repaid by the Wheat Board to the government of Canada, in which case the Wheat Board would have had to carry that in the contingency fund. If I had done that, I think some hon. members opposite might have dragged the Wheat Board into partisan political debate and I thought it might be better to have that partisan political debate aimed at myself rather than at the Wheat Board. I believe, above all that, with the hidden enemies of the Wheat Board which are located over there in this House—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lang: —that the Wheat Board should be protected.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The minister wears the halo of a confused martyr with all that rectitude.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Can he tell the House by what legal authority, order in council, minute of the Treasury Board, or what have you, the government has refrained from paying the money set out in the Temporary Reserves Wheat Act and, in particular, since he has referred to the fact that Bill C-244 was introduced on April 29, 1971, by what authority were those payments not made between August 1, 1970, and April, 1971, when they were required to be made on a monthly basis under the provisions of Chapter 2 of the statutes of 1956?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, when this House speaks in enacting Bill C-244, as it will presumably if the opposition will allow that to happen and as the government intends and proposes—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But the minister has no right to anticipate that.

Mr. Lang: —then the effect of that law will be the removal of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act as of July 31, 1970. It was on the prospective implementation, therefore, of this bill that the government acted to carry out what would be the proper result the moment that bill is passed. I indicated that we could, indeed, have made the payment and have held the money in trust for return, but I had good reason for thinking that that was not necessarily the most desirable course to recommend. I think the key question when this bill comes to this House again will be whether hon. members, who have seen it approved in this House on second reading and seen it approved in committee as we ran through it clause by clause will allow the question on the bill to come to a vote, so that the $100 million can go to the farmers.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That still is no answer.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It seems difficult for the minister to answer my specific question, namely, what authority the government has for its action. May I ask the minister if he is aware that in 1968 the government imposed and collected a 5 per cent surcharge, on the premise that Parliament would pass it, only to discover that Parliament defeated that bill? What position will the government be in if Bill C-244 does not pass?

Mr. McGrath: Try that one on for size.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am optimistic that before long we will have an answer to that question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: If the hon. member's hypothesis were to materialize, I am sure he can imagine some of the answers which would follow. I expect, before long, that we will resolve the issue and answer the question.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The minister did not have the right to assume what he assumed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I believe that there will be a forum tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock in which questions might be asked. Having said that, I gather there is a general inclination among hon. members for this matter to be pursued. I think it would be fair if I were to recognize the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) on a question only and then go to the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), because he wants to participate in the debate.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, if I could expect an honest and sensible answer, and I doubt that I could get it, I would ask a question. I have no intention of asking a question. I wish to engage in debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I thought the hon. member wanted to ask a question. The hon. member for Vegreville.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity of seconding the motion proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). Of course, I welcome the opportunity to enter this debate. The effort of bringing this matter before this distinguished chamber for consideration has been trying and exhaustive. It is not often that I have the opportunity of following the minister in charge of the Wheat Board.

An hon. Member: Where are you going, Otto?

Mr. Mazankowski: The minister really did not enlighten us on this issue. He came up with the same old clichés about filibusters and obstructionism. It was obvious from the outset that he was fighting for his political life.

Mr. Peters: And he lost.

Mr. Mazankowski: He avoided completely the issue outlined in the motion. He also reminded us of this government's arrogant acts in taking shortcuts at the expense of the farmer and at the expense of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: I say, Mr. Speaker, let the minister bring forward legislation that will help the farmers and not the bureaucrats, and we will support it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: The farmers in my area are concerned about this matter. He should also tell the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that this is not the time for flowers and that it is not the time for kisses. The farmers are sick and tired of hearing grandiose, campaigning, misleading facts such as were completely distorted by the minister in his exposé this evening. The minister talked about record sales. He again failed to tell the full story, because the producer marketings of wheat during this crop year were only 387 million bushels, the lowest total in 15 years and at the lowest price in 17 years.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Mazankowski: Hon. members know very well the value of a dollar today compared to what it was 15 years ago. That is what matters; that is what is bothering the farmer. According to DBS figures, the net realized income in prairie Canada amounted to $1.12 billion in 1966. This figure has progressively declined. In 1970 the net realized income in prairie Canada, the prairie farm economy, amounted to $500 million. That is the kind of language the farmers understand, not the propaganda that this minister is spreading thoughout the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: The minister talked about $60 million owing from the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Here again there is an inaccuracy. It is $61,600,000 for the crop year 1970-71, plus an additional $26 million for the crop year 1971-72. That is closer to $90 million, Mr. Speaker. No wonder the minister is fighting for his political life and going about the country spreading stories of this kind.

I say at the outset, Mr. Speaker, that I commend you on your decision to allow this debate to take place. I appreciate the fact that you gave this matter very sincere consideration. I know that those who are affected by the inadequacies of this government and the failure to discharge its responsibility will very much appreciate your ruling. I know that Canadian grain farmers will be pleased. All Canadians, even Liberals, will be pleased, especially those who have fears of being trampled on and being ridden over roughshod by this government—because, Mr. Speaker, in this debate we have a very basic and fundamental issue to consider. That issue is the deliberate and calculated failure of this government to carry out its administrative responsibility pursuant to Canadian law. That is the fact of the matter.

[Mr. Peters.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Over the past week or so I must admit that I have become somewhat perplexed and bewildered with the machinery of Parliament because every conceivable approach had to be taken before this matter could be brought before the House. Questions produced non-answers and attempts to adjourn in order to debate the problem were not allowed. One cannot help becoming frustrated when one understands the situation and is in touch with it every day on returning to his constituency.

If rules and procedures become so defined and so rigid that an issue of such magnitude cannot be ventilated and debated in this House, perhaps it is time for reassessment. I cannot help being reminded of the statement of a distinguished member at the Eighth Caribbean Commonwealth Conference which I had the privilege of attending. He quoted a former Speaker of the House of Commons as follows:

> Today mankind has two alternatives, free and orderly discussion in Parliament with majority rule or fighting in the streets.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: If a question involving the administration of laws created by parliamentary democracy cannot be properly debated, it will be a sad day for Canada, for Parliament and for the system of parliamentary democracy. Throughout my experience in this chamber I, together with many other members of this House, have witnessed an increasing government disregard of laws established by Parliament. We have witnessed the deliberate downgrading of this institution. There are many examples of this. I am sure other members who will be participating in the debate will adequately deal with them.

Never have I seen, and never did I expect to see, a government so blatantly and contemptuously refusing to carry out its administrative duty, a duty which is imposed by Canadian statute passed by Parliament, a law which remains in force and will continue to remain in force until Parliament in its wisdom sees fit to rescind it. That is the basic issue, Mr. Speaker—not the bunch of hogwash we hear from the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: That fact is so elementary that one could never have conceived that this situation could occur. It is a disgrace and a shame. After all, if governments cannot conform with the law, how in heaven's name can anyone else in society be expected to do so? The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) stated that farmers were being penalized for the interprovincial movement of grains. They are being charged under the statutes covering the Canadian Wheat Board. The government is breaking its own law. How can society be expected to abide by laws if the government will not live up to them? This fact is so elementary, basic and fundamental that it is completely beyond my comprehension to understand the government's attitude.

The minister talked about the stabilization bill and filibustering. Those seem to be the only two words he knows. They are almost the only expressions he uses. He has failed to tell Parliament and the people of Canada that this stabilization bill is a measure that the farmers do not want. I ask the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, how many letters he has received in support of the stabilization bill. Today I talked to a member of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool. He said he has yet to receive one letter asking for expeditious passage of the stabilization bill. I personally have received 4,200 letters demanding that I oppose this measure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: The farmers further state that if I allow Messrs. Lang and Olson to bamboozle me and other members of this House, I am not fit to be a Member of Parliament. That is the issue, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member for Calgary North outlined the legal obligations which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and this government have under the provisions of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. What does the minister say about this? I heard him speaking on television the other day. He said it is nothing; he sloughed it off as nothing more than a trivial technicality. He said it is merely a simple bookkeeping entry. What a bunch of hogwash! As far as the farmers are concerned, this is a major flouting of the Canadian law. The payments should be made forthwith to the farmers, the producers of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: I do not want to bring officials of the Canadian Wheat Board into a partisan debate, but I owe it to the House to place on record some of the comments that were made by commissioners of the Wheat Board when they appeared before the Standing Committee on Agriculture. I quote from issue No. 58 of Thursday, June 10, 1971. In anticipation of the fact that perhaps through technical or mechanical difficulties Bill C-244 would not be passed prior to the adjournment of the House, the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) put this question to Mr. Treleaven:

• (10:00 p.m.)

MR. HORNER: How has the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act worked in the past? Has it always worked in retrospect like that?

MR. TRELEAVEN: Based on the commercial stocks of wheat on July 31, an accounting was submitted to the government and an invoice to the government, for the amount of the payment. Now that total payment would then be pro-rated over two pools, the one that was immediately finished and the one that was coming or the current pool. We have done that, of course, this year in the normal manner, but we have not received any funds from the government with respect to the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act.

Another question asked by the hon. member for Crowfoot was:

If for some reason or another this House adjourns on June 30 and in light of other prominent and important government legislation and budget debate we do not proceed with passing Bill C-244 purely because of the mechanics of the time involved, and we did not get on to passing it until next fall, then the government pretty well would be duty bound to pay that $60 million at the July 31 date. Am I correct in that? By the law of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, July 31 would go by and they would pretty well have to submit that $60 million to the final pool account or to the Wheat Board?

MR. TRELEAVEN: I do not know whether I can comment on the liability or the responsibility or the duty of the government in this respect, but under the existing legislation, yes, the money is due to the Board until such time as the legislation is repealed.

That is the crux of the matter. The Temporary Wheat Reserves Act is still law. It has not been rescinded and it will not be rescinded until Bill C-244 has been passed.

There is another quotation I should like to place on record from the proceedings of the same committee.

MR. KORCHINSKI: So, in effect, if we reach July 31 without the repeal of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act and the government has no authority to withdraw that act, they would be obligated to pay, because it is an Act of Parliament that approved it and it would be expected. Would you have to make a supplementary payment then to cover up this amount that would normally not go out?

MR. EARL: It is the only way we could do it. We would have to make another payment for that amount of money.

That is what the debate tonight is all about, the government's continued refusal to live up to its obligations morally and legally under the provisions of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. Now, the minister says it is perhaps better to pay out $100 million and call it a transitional payment rather than the $90 million. If this is what he would like to do, why does he not bring on legislation in that form and we will pass it. There will be no delay provided there are no strings attached as in the case of Bill C-244. If the payment under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act had been made to the Wheat Board, and subsequently distributed to farmers, it would have meant an additional 9½ or 10 cents a bushel which farmers would have received for their grain and this would have raised the net income of the producers. This is what is troubling the farmer, not the question of the large wheat and barley sales at fire-sale prices. It is the question of net realized income which is striking at the very heart of our grain producers.

Instead, the minister proposes to push along with Bill C-244 and use this fund as a bribe to sell a piece of legislation which is the equivalent of a program of welfare assistance which would merely stabilize the incomes of farmers at poverty level. I use the word "bribe". It is not often that anyone is bribed with his own money but it is the case in connection with the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. As I have said before, every Member of Parliament from western Canada who is associated with the Agriculture Committee has received literally thousands of letters demanding that we object to the passage of the stabilization bill because it is not what the farmers want or need, and this is what the opposition is trying to do. We are the ones who are trying to preserve the interests of the farmer and seeking to prevent Messrs. Olson and Lang from selling the farmers down the river.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: I cannot understand why this government continues to perpetrate measures of this kind on the farmers. Why does this government hate farmers? Why is it so blunt and so contemptuous? Farmers are not stupid today. They know very well that the money under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act is due and payable to them. They know they are being forced into taking Bill C-244. Farmers also know that the two ministers concerned, the minister in charge of the Wheat Board and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) are only playing politics. They also know that the minister in charge of the Wheat Board is supposed to be the custodian of the farmers' interests when it comes to purchasing, shipping, storing and the marketing of wheat. But the present minister has sold the farmer down the river. The Wheat Board is supposed by statute to act in the best interest of the farmer. Under the present minister this has not been achieved. I say: what a shame.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), as my hon. friend from Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) pointed out, are both in the same boat. But certainly one would expect that the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, coming as he does from the Province of Saskatchewan, would be more sympathetic towards farmers than he has shown himself to be tonight. He has acknowledged that farmers are critically short of cash, then he cripples them further by failing to distribute these funds. These funds should have been distributed last June. The Minister of Agriculture has not provided leadership either, as was apparent from the terms of the Employment Support Bill to which the House gave second reading last week. He knows very well that 1970-71 has been a bad year, yet all we hear are statements about the grandiose sales the ministers have been making. All that really matters is how much grain farmers have been able to market. Let me repeat statistics which have been prepared by the Alberta Wheat Pool which indicate that marketing for 1970-71 was the lowest in 15 years with the exception of one year, and at the lowest prices. It is no wonder we are experiencing a massive exodus of farmers from their land. They have to contend with the weather, with the depradations of insects and with the effects of international competition, yet the minister sits back and smiles and the Minister of Agriculture joins him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue, of course, if he has unanimous consent. Does the House give unanimous consent to the hon. member for Vegreville to pursue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Mazankowski: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members. I will conclude as quickly as I can. The minister of Agriculture and the minister responsible for the Wheat Board sit back in their places and smile because this is their way of solving the agriculture problem by removing two-thirds of the farmers from the land. I call it occupational genocide. I say that this government's farm programs are a total flop. The minister in charge of the Wheat Board knows this, the Minister of Agriculture knows this and all the western Liberal members know this as well. I do not know why they do not admit it and scrap these socialistic and bureaucratic schemes created with the aid of bureaucratic economists sitting on high in their ivory towers. Why do they not scrap these programs? Let me tell you why they do not. They just do not care about the farmer, and neither does the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Let me conclude on this note, Mr. Speaker. These two junior ministers are merely serving as puppets to the Trudeau régime.

• (10:10 p.m.)

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, there are two issues in this debate we are engaged in tonight; one is the flouting of the law by the government and the other is the failure of the government to live up to its responsibilities to the prairie grain producers in respect of their income needs. I think this is reflected by the motion I moved today, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave), on behalf of the NDP, in which we asked for consideration of this question, namely the urgent need for the government to make payments to the Canadian Wheat Board as specified in the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act of 1956 so that an immediate improvement can be made in the economic position of western farmers.

Let me deal with the basic issue which is the first point I mentioned, the flouting of the law by the government. There can be little argument over the facts of the matter. The Temporary Wheat Reserves Act was passed in 1956 by the Parliament of Canada and was given Royal Assent. That act provides that the Minister of Transport shall, out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, pay to the Canadian Wheat Board for each day in that crop year and in each crop year an amount equal to the portion of the said stocks that exceed 178 million bushels at the commencement of that crop year, multiplied by the carrying charge rate paid by the Board at the end of an immediately preceding crop year. The act goes on to provide in section 4 the moneys payable to the Board by the minister under this act shall be paid in a certain manner. It provides that the total amount payable for the crop year shall be paid in equal monthly instalments in such a crop year. There are absolutely no equivocations about the terms of the act, and there are no options or loopholes for the minister or the government.

We also have the acknowledgement by the government that it has indulged in this practice of evasion, and that in fact it has failed to make the necessary payments to the Canadian Wheat Board. The government has not even undertaken to defend its position. When I asked a question in the House of Commons whether or not these payments had been made to the Canadian Wheat Board, I was given the following answer to question No. 1,469 on the order paper:

> Although funds were appropriated in the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1972, expenditures have not been authorized because the government has a bill before the House to rescind the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act effective August 1, 1970.

We also have the testimony before the House of Commons Agriculture Committee. The commissioners of the Canadian Wheat Board made it clear they had carried out their responsibility in informing the government as to what they expected from the government under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. They made it clear they considered that act still to be in force. Mr. Treleaven, the assistant chief commissioner, appeared before the committee on June 10 and stated, as recorded at page 8 of volume 58 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence:

> Based on the commercial stocks of wheat on July 31, an accounting was submitted to the government and an invoice to the government, for the amount of the payment. Now that total payment would then be prorated over two pools. The one that was immediately finished and the one that was coming or the current pool. We have done that, of course, this year in the normal manner, but we have not received any funds from the government with respect to the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act.

Later on he made other comments, making this perfectly clear, and I quote from page 58:10 of the same volume:

> —at the beginning of each crop year we determine the amount of money payable by the government to the Wheat Board under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. The government then pays that sum in 12 equal monthly instalments to us over the crop year.

He goes on to give some information about the mechanics of the operation of this act. We also have Bill C-244 before us at this time. Clause 33 of that bill provides for the repeal of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, and it will be acknowledged that the bill is still before the House of Commons. It has not received the approval of the House or the other place, and it has not received Royal Assent. We are aware also of the fact that the Canadian Wheat Board, in the absence of any payment under this act, has made a payment to the producers which it considers to be the final payment for the 1969-70 crop year, and this has occurred without any response from the government to the invoice submitted.

Of course, we all know what has taken place over the last week when this subject has been raised on a number of occasions by members of the opposition. First of all, on September 9 two motions were made under Standing Order 26, one by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) and the other by the member for Saskatoon-Biggar. They both requested an emergency debate on the failure of the government to make necessary payments to the Canadian Wheat Board.

On Monday, September 13 a question of privilege was raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Had his question of privilege been allowed, this matter would have been placed before the House of Commons, enabling the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to consider it and make a report. On that same day during the question period, I asked a question of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. My question was:

> Since the government is following a course of action which assumes that clause 33 of Bill C-244 providing for the repeal of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act is now in effect, is the government considering following the same course of action with respect to clause 32 of that bill by paying out the 100 million provided for transitional payments in that bill?

The minister said he could not make these payments until Bill C-244 had passed. It seems to me there is a need for the minister to be more consistent in his actions. If this situation applies to one clause of the bill, it should certainly apply to the other.

We then had an astounding statement from the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. I asked him whether, in fact, a legal opinion had been obtained as to the propriety of the government's action and the minister answered as recorded at page 7748 of Hansard:

> We have obtained an opinion on the question of the requirement to repay the money should it have been paid and should Bill C-244 subsequently be passed.

It is amazing that a former law professor and a dean of law did not ask for a legal opinion on the question of whether a payment should still be made to the Canadian Wheat Board, taking into account the fact that the act is still in effect.

On Friday, September 9 other questions were directed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). I asked him whether he had obtained a legal opinion on the question of whether he should make payments to the Canadian Wheat Board, as required under that act. He indicated that there would be no such legal opinion obtained or asked for in this regard. He answered in a very flippant manner by saying:

> Not to me, no, Mr. Speaker.

And later he said:

> Not for me personally, Mr. Speaker, but I shall inquire.

The latter, when I asked a further question about the fact that the Canadian Wheat Board had invoiced the government for this amount, his answer indicated that he did not know what was going on in his own department. I think this is indicated by the fact he hase not made the payments required under the act, so the Minister of Finance should resign forthwith. I think the Minister of Finance long ago outlived any possible usefulness of service to the people of Canada.

• (10:20 p.m.)

Many questions are being raised in western Canada about the present situation. I could quote at length an editorial that appeared in the Western Producer on Thursday, August 12, which outlined the situation very fully and put forward a course of action for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. I would recommend this article for his consideration and wonder whether he has in fact read it. Part of this editorial reads as follows:

> The government's course of action seems clear enough: pay out the entire $61 million now to the Canadian Wheat Board, in accordance with the terms of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. Then, when the House goes back into session, separate the $100 million from Bill C-244 and pay that out with all possible haste in line with the acreage payment proposed.
>
> The next move should be another hard look at C-244 as it stands, and more discussion on some of its terms that have been worrying farmers and their organizations ever since the legislation was first brought into the House.

I think that throughout this entire affair we have seen an example of government arrogance such as we have never before witnessed in Canada's history. This is the performance of a sick government, a government that has outlived any usefulness it may have had. We have a government that sorely needs to be replaced on the Canadian scene, a government that is prepared to show its contempt for Parliament and the laws of this country.

I suggest that the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board and all other ministers should very seriously reflect on the question: What will the activities of the government which are under discussion tonight do to our democratic institutions? On the other hand, there has been a notable lack of willingness by the government to do anything concrete in terms of introducing agricultural policies which involve any substantial expenditure of moneys. This is the crux of the matter. When the government unpegged the dollar they said they would assist any export industry that suffered as a result. But nothing has been done in this regard. Now that other problems in the economy have arisen we find there is all kinds of help for industry. Some of this help is justified and certainly the need exists, even though the policy of the government is sometimes inadequate. Although the need is now, there is a notable absence of policies which involve substantial or adequate expenditure of funds.

I think that the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board needs to reflect on the question: What does this do to the Wheat Board itself? He claims to be the defender of the Canadian Wheat Board. He wants it to be held up as a sound institution for western Canada. If that is the case, I can think of nothing more likely to undermine the Wheat Board and confidence in its operations than what we have been witnessing over the last few months.

The minister should have a somewhat different attitude to this question in view of his acknowledged respect for and knowledge of the law. Here we have a minister who was dean of law at the University of Saskatchewan, who held a high position of trust at that university. He is now a minister of the Crown with a responsibility to his constituency, his province and the people of Canada. Tonight he participated in the debate, and I must say I have never seen such a pathetic sight, with the minister thrashing wildly about and throwing out charges left and right about all the things that were wrong with the opposition.

The minister said he was fighting for the farmers. I suggest that if what he has been doing is fighting for the farmers, a more appropriate phrase to use might be that he is going to fight for the west to the last farmer; and if he continues in office very long we will see the last farmer in the west.

The minister then made an interesting comment; he said he would take shortcuts. I should like to know what these shortcuts are. Are they the sort of activities that we are discussing tonight which involve the failure of the government to make payment under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act? I notice that while the minister defended the government's action under this act—he has every right, of course, to defend the government's stand on the question—he said not one word about the failure of the government to carry out the provisions of the act while it was still in effect. There was not one word from the minister about whether the government did the right thing in not paying out this money, in view of the fact that the legislation is still on the statute books of Canada and is in force.

Then the minister made a very curious statement. He said he would gladly go to jail in the interests of the prairie farmers, or words to that effect; I believe I have quoted him accurately. I suggest that he should be very careful about making statements like that, because more and more farmers in western Canada are beginning to feel the same way. They are beginning to feel that if the minister were given a comfortable, well-padded and upholstered cell in jail, their interests would be well served.

To indicate just how badly mixed-up the minister is in dealing with the present situation, he referred to a statement emanating from a recent conference held by the Progressive Conservative party in Saskatoon which was discussing the Wheat Board and the changes that party would like to see made. As a matter of fact, I was inclined to agree with some of the minister's observations concerning the suggestions which came from that particular Conservative conference, and that in fact they would harm the Wheat Board. Then the minister suggested that the Conservative party's proposals amounted to cutting the legs and arms off the Wheat Board and making it something of a eunuch. I think this is a little difficult to imagine. I know of no creature, alive or otherwise, the legs and arms of which you could cut off and turn into a eunuch.

I think the minister has lost all credibility in the present situation. He has become irrelevant to the political scene of western Canada and Canada as a whole. Otherwise, I cannot see how the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board could stay in the cabinet and condone the action of the government in not making these payments. Perhaps his presence in the cabinet really does not count for much.

It is also suggested that the minister should resign from the government, though I do not think this would matter a great deal. I would be inclined to leave the minister where he is for the balance of this Parliament. I think that the voters of Saskatoon-Humboldt will do a very good weeding-out job at the next federal election. Really, I feel a little sympathy for the minister.

Questions are asked in the House from time to time about when the leave of absence of the minister from the University of Saskatchewan, where as I say he was dean of law, expires. I know that some time ago the University of Saskatchewan appointed a new dean of law, a very good one I might add, so that the minister has no job to go back to anyway. In all honesty, I cannot imagine any self-respecting school of law or university appointing him to its faculty when he has served as a minister in a government that has taken the kind of action we are debating this evening. Either he condoned or approved this action, or he did not have the guts to stand up and resign.

Another crucial part of this debate concerns farm income. The minister acknowledged in his remarks that we are facing a serious situation. But if we look at farm net income in the province of Saskatchewan, for example, the decline that has taken place in the last three years is catastrophic. In 1968, farm net income in Saskatchewan was $462 million, in 1969, that dropped to $402 million and in 1970 it dropped by more than 50 per cent to just under $195 million. That, I think, indicates how serious the situation is. I think it also indicates the very urgent need for a better government response and a more adequate response to the income needs of farmers in western Canada.

• (10:30 p.m.)

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, in its presentation to the government and to the House of Commons committee on the subject of Bill C-244, pointed out that their studies show that the grain industry in western Canada is operating at a net loss right now. The only net income coming to agriculture in the prairie regions is from livestock—thank God, cattle prices have held up reasonably well—and from income in kind, the stuff you grow and use yourself. This indicates the extent of the problem that exists. My colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar pointed out how prices have declined in recent months and years, in spite of the movement of grain indicated by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. The minister pointed out the record movement of grain in western Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired, unless he receives the unanimous consent of the House to continue. Is there such unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Burton: Thank you. I assure you I will bring my remarks to a rapid conclusion. The minister has been citing this record movement of grain. If he adds together wheat, oats, barley, rye, flax and rapeseed, he can come up with a record figure, but it is rather like the old adage about adding together apples, oranges and tomatoes because it does not reflect the true situation. Also, it does not reflect the fact that we are presently selling our grain at reduced prices, at lower prices than was the case a few years ago. There is a need for action now.

Bill C-244 is simply not good enough; it does not meet the needs. We have suggested to the minister on many occasions that if the government will pay out the $100 million by separating that provision from the rest of the bill, we on the opposition side will give it immediate passage. If he says he wants to get it into the hands of the western farmers, we are prepared to do this at any time. I think this fact was made clear. He has come up with other fanciful tales suggesting how the bill has been delayed. This is simply not in accordance with the facts. We do need an ever normal granary policy. We have to recognize the need for some overhaul of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, but Bill C-244 does nothing; it simply eliminated the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. There are reasons for providing for an ever normal granary policy. There are reasons for a greater infusion of money into the western grain industry. The government can find money for just about any other sector of the economy that finds itself with problems, but they are going to set up limits on the assistance available to prairie grain producers.

In conclusion, I think the crux of the debate tonight is that farmers want the money from the temporary wheat reserves, and they want it now. Farmers need that money, and they need it now. I think also that we have to keep in mind that there is a concern with Canada's future. We are concerned with regional disparities, and among those disparities we are concerned with a host of problems in western Canada. These cannot be ignored; they are part of the over-all Canadian problem and flouting the law does not help build Canada's future. The people of Canada want the law of the land observed as it should be, and promptly. Certainly, they will deal harshly with any government which ignores the laws that have been placed on the statute books.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in participating in tonight's debate on the opposition motion of censure concerning the agricultural policies of the government, I cannot refrain from thinking how greatly our farmers can be harmed by the partisan battles waged within these walls.

Today again, we are given a striking instance of the insincerity of some opposition members, much more concerned with petty politics than with the true interest of the farmers they claim to represent in this House.

My remarks will be brief as the minister in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) has accurately and clearly described the situation and I feel it would be superfluous to add lengthy comments to what he said.

But since this government has been in office, I have with several colleagues taken part in almost all the meetings of the Standing Committee on Agriculture. Except on very few occasions, it has been a continuing battle at the expense of farmers by some members of the opposition, among whom the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner).

Tonight, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) blames the governement for doing nothing to help the western farmer. Far from me, Mr. Speaker, the idea of underestimating the problems that have experienced and continue to experience the Canadian farmers, and particularly the grain producers of western Canada, because that would evidence utter ignorance not to say real dishonesty, to claim that the situation is caused through the action or lack of action of the government. I believe that any sensible person will admit that the international situation is far more responsible, and the government has no control over that.

Who is responsible for the collapse of grain prices and for the accumulation of stocks in Canada? Plagued with production surplus, several countries forgot the agreements they had signed in order to maintain a minimum price for grain and they reduced prices to sell on export markets.

On the other hand, supported by members of the opposition and urged by farmers to resist the price war, Canada maintained its prices. But after a few months, we had lost the markets we had gained and the government had to pay storage costs for more than a billion bushels of unsold grain.

When 80 per cent of a production as important as that of grain rely on international market conditions because it is mostly exported, one can only expect instability and the government took measures to encourage reduction of wheat acreage in order to balance production and opportunities to sell at the reasonable price farmers would be ready to accept. In fact, we cannot secure a price for the producers when it is not possible to find a buyer at a reasonable price. There cannot be forever government grants to support prices when there is absolutely nobody to buy those commodities.

• (10:40 p.m.)

Let us have a look at the job done by the Canadian Dairy Commission. It took four years to clean up the market, to balance supply and demand and I recognize that now, in spite of some difficulties, the Canadian milk producers can at least rely on stability and on a better income. Since the beginning of this year there have already been four improvements in the policies of the Canadian Dairy Commission and we hope there will be some more before th end of the present dairy year. This results from the application of discipline to production, which has enabled us to strengthen markets and therefore to get better prices for producers.

We shall get the same results in the grain industry, if ever the opposition stops stirring up the population, western producers especially—I even dare say telling direct lies to farmers—by making them believe that we are against them and want to destroy them.

The facts are quite different. There is a sizable number of us here, all equally convinced of the need to protect the western grain industry as well as the dairy industry of the East, and as an hon. member from eastern Canada, I can assure the House that we are just as interested in the success of the western farmers, since the Canadian economy is such that if the West is doing well the East will also be prosperous. The fact that western farmers have not been altogether as prosperous as we would have wished in the past years has had very deep repercussions on the agricultural industry of the east; this is why we show today surplus of several types of goods, and why we must seek formulas likely to restore the balance.

Mr. Speaker, I dare the members of the opposition to show sincerity for once and I ask them to put an end to their filibustering of Bill C-244, and even Bill C-176, so that we pass them as quickly as possible.

[Mr. Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean).]

I suggest that we put an end to this debate and that, with unanimous consent, we may tomorrow consider Bill C-244, so as to pass it as quickly as possible, so that the western farmers may benefit from it. It is pointed out that this bill only provides for the allotment of $40 million and it is a fact. The minister said so. But if such is the case, it means at least an additional amount of $40 million and consequently, we would be ill-advised not to pass that legislation, even if some find it defective. Moreover, if anyone feels that it is bad, let him vote against it. We should be left to assume the responsibility of passing a bad piece of legislation, which would be agreeable to those who are dissatisfied. We are ready to accept that responsibility, if you really think that this is bad legislation. As for us, we believe that it is good and we will assume our responsibilities before our constituents at the next election. However, if the legislation is bad, the better it will be for you, since you will be more easily elected and we will thus be judged and rejected. You will then assume leadership of the government and the country, if you think you can do better.

If you do not accept this proposal—and I see that several members agree with me—this will be evidence of your lack of sincerity.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Chair is not going to let the hon. member know that his time is up, but simply to ask him to please follow the normal procedure and address his remarks to the Chair rather than directly to hon. members.

Mr. Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean): I apologize for losing my temper a bit, it is not my habit.

If the opposition does not approve that proposal, it shows in my view a lack of sincerity. On the one hand, it says to the government: You are doing nothing to help farmers and, on the other hand, when the government proposes through the cabinet measures designed to benefit agriculture, this same opposition hastens to unite against the government to denounce it and systematically check the adoption of those efficient laws.

I wonder if one cannot call such behaviour if not dishonesty, at least sadism. I think that the hold outs thus add to the difficulties of the western farmers by opposing adequate measures to help them at last.

As to myself, I have the duty to defend these measures in favour of eastern Canada, because federal members are accused of not representing sufficiently precisely that part of the country and of passing all votes in favour of western farmers. I do not agree. Indeed, my eastern friends are wrong in claiming that; when I meet farmers in my area, I stick up for the present federal policy which they consider as clearly unfair to the eastern farmers. They claim that we give all the government's money to the people out West, that we do nothing to help the Easterners. I assure them that what we are now doing is necessary for the Canadian agriculture as a whole, that to the extent where we help the farmers in western Canada, we also help those in eastern Canada.

To the extent that the western farmer can find good markets and good prices for his products, his eastern counterpart can also have fine markets for his.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I will continue to support, along with my colleagues, the government in the policy it is now putting forward, because in the absence of a better policy, I recognize that this one, though not perfect, at least proves that we are trying.

When we count the number of opposition members who are in the House tonight, we see that those members who charged us so often with not doing anything are not even here to take part in the debate. They are probably out west harvesting crops, which I think they had permission for.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind hon. members that legislations are now being proposed. They have already been introduced in the House, and if the opposition wants to give us proof that it is willing to cooperate, we will see to it that they are placed on the orders of the day as soon as possible. I am sure that the minister, if supported by hon. members, would obtain that these bills be discussed tomorrow, in order to pass Bill C-244 and enable western farmers to receive as quickly as possible the monies which can be placed at their disposal.

Therefore, I reckon on the opposition's cooperation and I hope it will stop this filibustering which in my view is totally unwarranted.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I must agree with this motion because the government has not followed the letter of the law in the payment of moneys under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act to the Canadian Wheat Board. The action of the government in not making these moneys available to the Wheat Board in accordance with the law has created grave financial hardship for our farmers in western Canada. The minister expressed it so aptly when he said that he owed a tremendous debt. He owes that debt to the western farmers.

The government has shown complete disregard for the needs of western farmers in their time of adversity. In the finance committee we are now rushing through a bill providing $80 million in grants to manufacturing industries which may be affected by the American surtax. At the most, the U.S. action represents $300 million in surtax, whereas western farmers, with a much smaller population base, have seen their income diminish in real terms by about $600 million during the past three years.

I have no quarrel with the swift passage of the employment support bill in face of the American action, but it would seem more in keeping with a government that pretends to be national in scope had the provisions of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act been followed or alternatively, had the $100 million promised by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board been paid out. Surely this is one time the minister could have talked to his cabinet colleagues, got them to see the inequity of the situation and persuaded them to carry out the proper course of action.

Withholding of Grain Payments

Evidence given before the agricultural committee indicated that in 1965-66 the value of grain marketing was approximately $1,191 million; in 1966-67, $1,417 million; in 1967-68, $908 million; in 1968-69, $742 million and in 1969-70, $682 million. I have not seen the figures for 1970-71, but the minister's own admission it will be in the $1 billion range. This alone represents a great loss of income for the prairie farmer and it is made worse when one considers it is for gross sales, not taking into account the fact that the cost of production has risen steadily over the years. Certainly, all the support mechanisms that have been built in for the prairie producers should have been used to their maximum.

• (10:50 p.m.)

The reason for this unhappy situation rests squarely on the shoulders of the minister and the government. The minister in charge of the Wheat Board, having decided in his wisdom that a new form of price stabilization should be embarked on for the prairie grains industry, brought forward in October of last year some papers which might be called a skimpy white paper to deal with the situation. But no legislation was brought down until the session was well on in in the spring—I believe April 29. The minister proposed to phase-out the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act and the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and in its place give out $100 million. The minister had a joker in the deck, though; that was the complicated stabilization formula of a 2 per cent deduction on all grains in order to build up the fund.

However, the minister failed to get his legislation through the House though the $100 million could well have been split off from the grain stabilization bill and paid out, and there would have been no opposition or questioning of this move. Instead, he chose to hold it over the summer and the payout will be some indefinite time in the future. When one considers that over $70 million of the $100 million would have been paid out to the producers long ago, the action of the government is inexcusable. It is like saying to a drowning man, "I will throw you a lifeline by and by, when I get around to it".

If the individual farmer was to receive the maximum benefit of this payout, it should have been made in the spring when he needed the money. The minister should impress upon his cabinet colleagues that the payment should be made in accordance with existing regulations and that the government should not renege on its legal obligation to pay the Wheat Board at the stated time. Only when the legislation is passed or the $100 million paid out as promised should this turning over the moneys to the Wheat Board be discontinued. Why was this payment held back? With regard to the stabilization money, farmers are saying they would perhaps be better off to receive no money than to be bound into this plan.

The nature of the plan is such that the government can wash its hands of any substantial payment in the next five years. There is no possibility of having to pay more than $20 million unless complete disaster strikes, because the limit will be so low. It is probably with this action in mind that the minister did not want to pay out $100 million. He wanted to impose the 2 per cent deduction because it would mean the government would be free of any payout to western farmers for an indefinite period unless a disaster occurred.

Prospects for the coming crop year do not appear very bright for Canadian grain sales. The minister made a statement about record sales of grain, but they are at record low prices. A quarter of our wheat has been sold on extended credit, which is valuable and useful, but it is not an assured market. Barley sales, which made up the vast bulk of the bushel increase, have had to be made at an extremely low price. We are glad they were made at all, but the impression should not be left that the dollar value of these sales is anything like the value it has been during the last 20 years. In the announcement of the sale to China the day before yesterday there was no indication of price. We do not know at what price sales are being made to these countries.

The enormous Canadian barley crop together with the enormous American corn crop leads to the possibility of a very depressed feed grain market. Almost certainly the same situation will arise wherein barley and other feed grain will be sold in the so-called blackmarket by farmers needing cash. It would seem advisable that we remove the restrictions on the movement of feed grains between provinces. I believe they should be eliminated in all the provinces which make up the Wheat Board's designated area. If the removal of the restrictions to the free flow of feed grains across provincial boundaries at first created hardship and dislocation, it could be done gradually. The removal of this artificial restriction on the movement of feed grains in all of Canada would lessen the demand for the protection of eastern meat producers through restrictive bills such as C-176. The member whom we just heard mentioned that this legislation helped the dairy industry. I hope it has helped someone; it has moved the dairy industry out of western Canada and, presumably, into his province. It may have helped his province but it did not help the over-all dairy industry in western Canada. That is what a political board will always have to do.

The ability of the eastern feeder to obtain feed grain at a price that is competitive with his western counterpart should lessen the fear that he will be deluged by hogs, eggs, broilers and turkeys from western Canada in times of a feed grain glut. Such a move would counter the latest attempt to solve the chicken-and-egg war where the proposed solution calls for marketing boards in each province to put tight controls on production and divide up Canada's market by agreement. In effect, this new effort will achieve the very thing that the Supreme Court ruling called illegal, namely, restrict the movement of poultry products across provincial boundaries and chop up Canada's domestic market into ten political pieces.

The implications of the agreement could be far reaching indeed. The agreement means that the federal government has virtually abandoned its responsibilities to provide leadership to Canada's poultry industry, and apparently the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) has assured producers that U.S. eggs will be kept out of Canada. So in effect provincial marketing boards will control and restrict all producers, so that Canada will no longer be a single poultry market and provincial governments will control the industry. The end result of this move seems bleak. It would deny Canada's poultry access to the huge United States market and condemn the producers to live in an inward-looking industry. It would commit them to an endless hassle in dividing up a market that is already too small. This development places the farmer in an unenviable position and makes him doubt the value of attempting to improve production marketing. If Canadian agriculture is forced to look only to the Canadian market for growth, it will indeed be restricted.

Mr. Speaker, the whole of this government's agricultural policy has been restrictive in nature. It has earned for the minister the title "Ottoman emperor of the Wheat Board," because of its restrictions and quotas. Payment of the $100 million should have been made through the farm stabilization program or to the Wheat Board so that it could be distributed to our farmers.

A final point, Mr. Speaker. The minister said that the government was looking at the movement of grain out of Canada through west coast ports. I shall read a news release issued by the Palliser Wheat Growers Association:

> Belle Plaine, August 17—Grain cleaning is still the big holdup at west coast terminal elevators, says Gordon Brooks, a Belle Plaine district farmer after a trip to Vancouver last week.
>
> "We spoke to workers at one of the largest terminals," Mr. Brooks said "and asked them to tell us what sets the limit on the amount of grain that can be loaded on ships in a day. They told us it was because the grain had to be cleaned."
>
> Mr. Brooks and his family also talked to the crew of a Greek ship loading wheat for China, and asked one of them, who could speak a bit of English, how long they had had to wait before they started loading. They were told that the ship had been in harbour for five days before getting to the loading dock, and "didn't like to come to Vancouver" because they always had to wait.

• (11:00 p.m.)

> Terminal workmen said that there were plenty of boxcars to unload, and no shortage of ships waiting for Canadian grain, and that although the cleaning operations were running 24 hours a day, the loading crews only worked two shifts.

I commend that release to the minister. I hope he looks into this and does all he can to improve grain handling facilities. Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank you for the opportunity to debate this urgent and important issue that affects not hundreds but thousands of people in my riding.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Little did I dream that I would live to see the day that any government would become so arrogant, so dictatorial and have such a callous disregard for the laws of Canada as this present government. Its failure to pay out moneys under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act to the account of the Canadian Wheat Board in the interests of the financially hard pressed wheat farmers of western Canada leaves this government completely indicted in the eyes of all Canadians.

In view of this flagrant disregard of our law, I must join with the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), who made such an eloquent speech a few minutes ago in his plea for the preservation of our democratic rights, in asking for the resignation of the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. This, Mr. Speaker, is a harsh demand, especially when it involves a fellow Member of Parliament from my home province of Saskatchewan. But, in light of his dereliction of duty to the farmers of western Canada, he has no alternative but to resign and take the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), who must be aiding and abetting him, with him.

A few minutes ago, the minister did his best to persuade his Liberal colleagues that we in the opposition are only "doomsters". He has misrepresented the facts as they really are, beyond any stretch of our imagination. What is the picture? Let us look at the record for the benefit of our many new government members who are not familiar with the true facts.

When our Conservative government of 1957 and 1958 took over, what did we find? We found wheat in every farmer's bin, every country elevator and in every terminal elevator. Even the skating rinks in the west were full of it. There were 850 million bushels of it. The Progressive Conservative government sold the wheat in every market of the world and made the largest sale ever made, some $428 million worth to China in 1961. There were millions of dollars of sales to every other importing country. This put the grain farmers finally back on their feet.

Our government brought in crop insurance, the Farm Credit Corporation, the agricultural stabilization bill, the ARDA program, cash advances, $125 million of acreage payments for crop under the snow and for drought stricken farmers, as well as many amendments to farm legislation that had already been on the statute books. What has happened since then? Liberals took office in 1963 and rode along on our good stewardship until they were party to the collapse of the International Wheat Agreement at the Kennedy Round in Geneva in April and May of 1967. This agreement was the farmers Magna Carta, and since its collapse the farmers have been in dire trouble.

Since then, wheat sales have gone down to their lowest ebb, as pointed out just now by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). Prices have gone down steadily as well. Two years ago the initial price of wheat to farmers was $1.70 per bushel. Last year it was reduced to $1.50 per bushel. This year it is down to $1.45 per bushel. So, the story goes. Two years ago the net income of Saskatchewan farmers was approximately $416 million; last year this net went down to $195 million. Putting it another way, three years ago average farm income was about $4,800. Today it is less than $1,200. That is the income of the average farmer. Some farmers have no dollar income at all; they are below that level and live off the depreciation on their machinery. It is the more successful farmers who help to keep the net average up at $1,200. This unprecedented act of the present government in not meeting their obligation under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act is unbelievable.

In the meantime, the interest that the farmer has to pay on loans is going up. His taxes are going up and his machinery and repair costs are the highest in history. Inflation is hitting the farmer at every turn. The high cost of living hits the farmer even more badly than it hits the average Canadian. A labourer can go on strike for higher wages to overcome higher living costs, but the farmer cannot do that. The latest blow to our agricultural industry will be the effect of the recently applied 10 per cent United States surcharge. To emphasize the seriousness of the problem, I do not think I could do better than read a few excerpts from the text of a Saskatchewan Pool Radio Broadcast on September 15. It refers to what Mr. E. K. Turner, president of the Pool said. The text reads:

> Canadian farmers deserve financial compensation as a result of injury from recent U.S. economic policies, contends E. K. Turner, President of Saskatchewan Wheat Pool.
>
> Mr. Turner has written to Prime Minister Trudeau to request that a payment be made.
>
> The U.S. has announced a series of new economic policies designed to reduce the United States balance of payments deficit to improve her trade imbalance with the rest of the world and combat inflation at home.
>
> A number of the proposals have direct implications for Canadians, especially the proposed 10-per-cent import surcharge on a number of Canadian exports to the U.S.
>
> In his letter to Mr. Trudeau, the Pool President noted that Parliament has, under consideration, legislation to provide compensation to industries that are hurt by the American action.

Two or three days ago during a debate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) indicated in a nebulous manner that the government would take action. We have been getting promises, more promises and nothing but promises from the government front benches ever since this government took office eight years ago. We want something concrete, Mr. Speaker. May I continue quoting from the broadcast text:

> 'In reviewing the figures of value of commodities affected,' he said, 'it would appear that of the $2.7 billion total, some $422 million, or 15 per cent, is animal and vegetable products. Therefore, a case can be made for a payment of about $12 million of the $80 million fund to agriculture, and hopefully passed on to the primary producer.'

I hope that part of the $80 million which is to compensate Canadian industry will also be paid to the agricultural industry. Somebody said a few days ago, "That is only a peanut effort." I think the agricultural industry will be hurt by the United States measure. I continue quoting from the text:

> Mr. Turner also noted that freeing of the Canadian dollar last year resulted in the loss of millions of dollars to Western grain producers, because the net result was an immediate reduction in the price received for Canadian grain traded in world markets.
>
> 'Actions by other countries, and also our internal policies, have tended seriously to reduce the revenue farmers receive from their grain products,' Mr. Turner said. 'With production costs rising year by year, the net income position has been steadily deteriorating. Government cannot ignore its responsibility to correct the situation.'

The text continues:

> Pool President E. K. Turner was among a number of Canadian business representatives that met with Trade Minister Pepin recently to discuss the implications of the United States surtax against imports entering that country.

He said many businessmen expressed concern about the profit squeeze and its effect on the Canadian economy—

Many of the businessmen talked about the profit squeeze that is evident and that this is forcing. So I took the opportunity to talk about a profit squeeze that some 400,000 individual farm units have been experiencing for several years and that if the American action in fact has a net effect of putting more pressure on the revenues that farmers receive, it could be the straw that breaks the camels back. It is a serious situation and anything that removes a dollar of income from a farm in Canada, has serious consequences when the situation is so tender to start with.

In bringing my remarks to a close, I want to put a few observations on the record as to what that infamous brainchild of the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, the brainchild known as the Lift program, did to the lagging western economy. Here was a minister who was quite inexperienced. The hon. member for Calgary North pointed out that in 1968 the minister was without any government experience at all. He took this brainchild, which possibly had been developed by bureaucrats in Ottawa, and implemented it or forced it, through a system of coercion, discrimination and almost blackmail, on the western farmer. If the western farmer did not accept this proposition he lost the quota, in other words, the right to sell grain.

• (11:10 p.m.)

Let us consider the facts in this regard. They are on record. In announcing his policy to the House, the minister said that approximately $140 million would be injected into the western economy. When he took another look at it he cut that estimate down to approximately $100 million. After the program had been in effect for part of the year, and before the House opened last October, he stated that in all probability the Lift program would inject about $80 million into the farm economy.

When the figure of the final net payment under the Lift program was released it was $57 million or $58 million. Let us compare that with the amount we lost in gross farm income which could have been utilized by the farmer had he stayed in production. The figures indicate that approximately 12 million acres were taken out of wheat production a year ago this past crop year. The fact is that it was put into summerfallow which has the highest productivity and an average estimate of 30 bushels per acre of production, which amounts to 360 million bushels of wheat. Taking the very modest figure of the average of the last crop year, which I think is correct within a cent or two, we sold our grain to world markets at $1.37½. Multiplying 360 million bushels of grain we did not grow on 12 million acres by $1.37½ we come up with a figure of half a billion dollars worth of wheat we did not grow.

Compare that potential income which the farmer would have received from the productivity of the 12 million acres to the $57 million he received, you can see how the farmers in western Canada have been in a declining net or gross income position. It was the most negative program ever imposed on western Canada in history. Even if the grain was not sold, the farmers could have taken advantage of the Conservative legislation put on the books years ago and carried on by the present government, which we insisted they maintain and increase, and got along with the cash advance. Instead, he received a mere $6 for each acre he took out of production. It did not cover the cost of the gas, oil and wear and tear on his machinery.

This is an example of the mismanagement, the staggering from pillar to post and incompetence of this government as far as western agriculture is concerned. This is why we are having this emergency debate about the government's failure to pay the money owing to the farmers under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. This $89 million should have been paid when it became due.

In conclusion, I implore the government to abide by the laws of this land and pay the farmers of western Canada the $89 million owing to them in order to give some semblance of honesty and maintain the democratic principles this House and the people of Canada deserve.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be brief. We are supposed to be debating an issue that is specific and important. I believe that it is a very important issue. I notice that the attendance on the other side of the House has now increased by 150 per cent. For a long time there were only two members opposite, and there are now five members on that side.

Mr. Mahoney: Where is the mover of the motion?

Mr. Nystrom: I have two concerns about the issue we are debating. First and foremost is a legal concern about whether the government should have the right to avoid making the payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. My second is an economic concern. I will try to be brief on the second point as we have all gone over the situation many times.

The Temporary Wheat Reserves Act was passed by this Parliament in 1956. It is the law of Canada. It is still on the statute books as the law of this country. The government has made no payments to the Wheat Board under this act for the year 1970-71 and for the first portion of this year. That, in a nutshell, is what this debate is all about.

Does the government unilaterally in a dictatorial way have the right to disregard the law of Canada and the law of this Parliament? They got themselves in a bind by introducing the stabilization bill, C-244. One of the clauses in that bill will remove the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act from the Statutes of Canada. The minister in charge of the wheat board is anticipating that Parliament will pass Bill C-244. Once that bill is passed, the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act is rescinded, but that act has not as yet been rescinded. The minister is very presumptuous. I know that the leader of the government party is a very autocratic and presumptuous man, but I hope that the minister in charge of the wheat board is not quite so presumptuous.

When an issue like this arises in the House, it concerns us all. It is really an issue of privilege. It is a law of Parliament, a law of the people of Canada that is being disregarded and ignored unilaterally by the government of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: This is no small matter. We are talking about well over $60 million. I think the Conservative House leader said that something like $90 million is involved in payments which have not been made to the Wheat Board that should have been made. These payments are due to the Wheat Board and, in turn, due to the farmers of this country for the storage of grain.

There are three ministers who are directly at fault. Under this act, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) is obliged to make payment of this money to the Wheat Board. He has not made that payment. His parliamentary secretary, who is in the chamber tonight, has not seen fit to rise in his place and speak. I wonder why? How can he treat this matter so lightly? It is something that no member should do, regardless of which party he is a member. If the parliamentary secretary wants to make a speech, I hope he will go back to his seat and rise. We will be happy to hear from him. We would like to have his comments on record as we now have those of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. I am sure that the minister would not go to Assiniboia and say those things. We would like to have the parliamentary secretary on record as well. The minister in charge of the wheat board is also at fault. He should ensure that the wheat board is able to collect those funds. He is not fulfilling his duties and should be severely reprimanded.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) is also at fault. He is in charge of implementing justice in this country and seeing that the acts of Parliament are carried out by everyone in this country, regardless of who he may be. Just because we have three cabinet ministers in seats of power, that does not mean they should not carry out the laws of this Parliament. If a farmer in Saskatchewan decided to withhold paying his income tax, he would soon be brought before the courts and charged. What happens when we have cabinet ministers in this House who hold back money that is legitimately due to the farmers of this country?

Mr. Alkenbrack: That is the Trudeau version of the just society.

Mr. Nystrom: Regardless of whether the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act is good or bad, and regardless of whether we pass Bill C-244 at some time, this Act is law. Until that act is rescinded, this money, is owing to the Wheat Board for storage and the farmers, in turn, should be getting some benefit. I have already asked whether the government possesses the authority to refuse unilaterally to make this payment. This is not what I call a just society where you have so much beautiful, participatory democracy. It is more like an autocracy where one man, or two or three, makes all the decisions. It infringes upon the privileges of every member of the House. Today it is the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. What will it be tomorrow or the day after? Shall we continue to ignore laws that Parliament passes? I am sure this is not the type of precedent which I or anyone else wants to see.

• (11:20 p.m.)

Each individual member here has the right and the privilege to express his views. All of us have different points of view. But when a bill is passed by this Parliament all of us, regardless of the views we have expressed, expect its terms to be carried out until it is amended or abolished by another act of Parliament. That is the only issue which is of concern tonight. I am very disappointed that the minister in charge of the Wheat Board did not deal with this issue when he spoke. He took the opportunity to talk about different things this government was doing. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Lessard) spoke in the same vein.

When the minister in charge of the Wheat Board was questioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and asked who had given him the authority, whether there had been an Order in Council, he declined to answer. Is this the attitude the minister takes toward the western farmer? I begin to wonder. I may disagree with him, we can all disagree with him, but when he shows this type of insensitivity and lack of compassion I begin to wonder. Just because he occupies a seat of power does not make him an almighty god who can ignore the rules and the laws of this country. This is the main question at issue and these are the things the minister will have to answer for.

During the time the War Measures Act was invoked, when all the laws of the country were rescinded, I remember an old fellow coming up to me. He said, "Is it ture that under this act the government has absolute power? Is it true they can do anything without consulting Parliament?" I replied, "Sure they can. But they would not do it; they would not go that far." I trusted them not to go that far. Now I do not know. We do not have the War Measures Act in force, yet we find them ignoring the laws of Parliament.

I should like to throw out a challenge to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board to go into Assiniboia between now and November 8 and say some of the things he said tonight to the people of that constituency. Why does he not go into Assiniboia, into some kind of open forum, some kind of bear-pit session and let the farmers throw their questions at him? The farmers have many questions they want to throw at the minister.

Mr. Lang: May I ask a question? Is the hon. member aware that within the last few weeks I have been in bear-pit sessions in the Assiniboia area and in Gravelbourg?

An hon. Member: Do a little work on your job.

Mr. Nystrom: I am very glad to hear that the minister has been in some bear-pits there, and I hope he will go back now the election is on, because I am sure the things he said tonight will be of great interest to the people in that riding and it will give a chance for them to pass judgment on the policies he is sponsoring in the House. The minister has said he is willing to go to jail for the farmers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: I am just saying I hope he is willing to go out to Assiniboia on that campaign trail. I think he will learn a lot, if it is possible for him to learn any more. I think he believes he already knows it all. What strikes me is that he is insensitive to what the farmers really want and are saying. Very few ministers are like this. This is not a question of whether I disagree with him or not. He has a right to say what he wishes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may of course continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nystrom: I shall be very brief. In conclusion, I hope that every member of this House will pay very close attention to the issue we are debating tonight, that is, whether or not the government has the right to act upon a bill or withhold payment for which provision is made by a law of Parliament before the bill has been rescinded. That is a very serious matter which we cannot take lightly.

I could, like others, talk about economic conditions in the west. We all know they are bad, and perhaps this is what makes the government's attitude all the more harmful to the farmer. We know farm income is down. The Bureau of Statistics said it was down by 56 per cent in my own province between 1968 and 1970. It is about time we stopped playing games of legalities; it is about time all of us got down to serious business.

If we want to help the farmer, the thing to do is split Bill C-244 and send the $100 million out right away. Then we shall debate the rest of the bill. I make this suggestion seriously. Why do they not listen to the farmers, the spokesmen for the wheat pools, farmers unions and the representatives of the Federation of Agriculture. They want the $100 million now. But they do not want the stabilization bill. That is only a part of democracy. Why not listen to the farmers and their organizations? That is all we are asking. Surely they can give the farmers at least that much. That is what participatory democracy really is. Let us start right now.

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us tonight, moved by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), is a tragic and sad indictment of this Parliament and of the minister who has appeared before us here tonight, and of ministers who are not here, namely, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson).

When the minister stood on his feet tonight he delivered a great discourse on economic conditions and said the farmers in the west would have had the $100 million were it not for the opposition. In one session of Parliament since I have been a member there were changes to the rules. Rule 75C provided that if the government of which the minister is a part felt that the opposition were holding up this bill unduly, the stabilization program, they had the recourse, in all legality, of bringing forth closure under 75C, cutting off debate, passing the stabilization program and giving the $100 million to the people without breaking the laws of the land and of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (11:30 p.m.)

Mr. Downey: That is the situation.

Mr. Woolliams: He knew it was wrong and that is why he would not do it.

Mr. Downey: Instead, you garbled the facts. You did not mention that these payments could have been made in accordance with the law. This is not the real tragedy. We must consider the fact that this man was a professor of law at one of Canada's universities. He was the dean of law at the University of Saskatchewan. Let us remember the tragedy of those pupils at this university looking up to you as their law professor.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I would respectfully request that the hon. member address his remarks to the minister through the Chair.

Mr. Downey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I offer you my apology. I think of the image these students have of this Parliament and other Canadian institutions. I cannot help but think of what these students feel about their professor. They must wonder about this place when they see how their former professor can flout the law, throw it down and trample on it. How can we expect these young people to go through life with respect for Parliament when we know they are aware of the disrespect this minister of the Crown has for the law?

Mr. Dinsdale: No wonder they are going to pot.

Mr. Downey: This is the real tragedy. We are not talking about the economics of farming, but the tragedy created by a minister of the Crown breaking the law of this country when he had available to him a means through which he could have made the $100 million available to the people. Did the minister inform Canadians of this fact when he was interviewed in the lobby tonight on television? Did he indicate how he had distorted the facts in this Parliament?

Mr. Bigg: He has already corrected his blues.

Mr. Downey: That is the tragedy of the matter. We all know about those farmers who are prosecuted because they transport grain across provincial boundaries. One farmer in my riding was fined $300 for violating this law. How can anyone stand in court again and prosecute one of these farmers who commits this offence in an effort to make a living when he knows that a minister of the Crown is breaking the law of this land?

When we first come to Parliament many of us have a certain amount of idealism. After members are here for a while this disappears. I was never so ashamed in my life as I was when I discovered that in the latest issue of the Canadian statutes the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act had been left out. It has not been rescinded by Parliament but it cannot be found in that latest issue. This act is still in force, but it is not on the statute books. This government is not concerned with economics or the plight of farmers. But their situation is completely irrelevant to this discussion. If this institution means anything it should be safeguarded by those who are here. This debate should not be another meaningless debate only with one day coverage in the newspapers tomorrow. It should mean a great deal more than that.

I was talking recently to one of my constituents. I spoke of the possibility of an election this fall. He said he did not really believe there would be an election but that the government would stay in office for a full five-year period. He suggested that a general election would then be postponed by the government as a result of an incident such as that which precipitated the invocation of the War Measures Act. He said he would be surprised if there were ever another democratic election in this country. The more I think about his statement, keeping in mind what has taken place in the last few days, the more I am inclined to agree with him.

I have never been as concerned about the future of our democracy as I have been in the last day or two. I do not intend to continue my remarks because I know other speakers wish to take part in the debate tonight, but I remind hon. members that this is the main issue.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to participate in this debate when the motion was introduced in the House this afternoon. Tonight I listened to a number of speeches and all the remarks I heard made me feel like making a contribution.

I have always felt somewhat at ease when discussing bills, especially these last three months, because of my position which permits me, quite objectively, to study and listen to sometimes serious, sometimes not so serious and sometimes regrettably partisan speeches made in this House.

However, I had several opportunities to require better objectivity than what we have tonight. Once again, tonight, it seems that some hon. members do not know what objectivity means. They have taken a negative attitude, an attitude they have used either in committee, or in the House, while demanding justice and a pattern of behaviour which they have forgotten themselves.

As previous speakers did, I realize how serious this motion is. There are legal and practical problems. If we sincerely want to help our producers or farmers throughout the country, I am quite in agreement with all those willing to do so. I listened to the excellent speech of the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) and I have also appreciated some remarks by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Lessard). And yet I realize, after several members of the opposition have blamed the government, that objectivity is lacking.

I wish, as the member for Bellechasse said, that western and eastern farmers would enjoy Parliament's consideration, provided that once and for all we could be in agreement and that it is not suggested that the government is granting more to a certain area of the country than to another. We have listened to a number of speeches from wheat producers over the last few years. I quite realize also how important wheat production is in our economic system.

• (11:40 p.m.)

This motion is extremely important since it appears that the government has not paid what they owed. Having attended quite regularly the meetings of the committee on agriculture, I know that this bill has been extensively discussed. I also know that it would be unfair to say that the government has not tried to look favourably upon farmers, during the last three years. Were the government's proposals inadequate? It is evident that we will always suggest they were. Still, we have to admit that certain efforts were made. We have to admit it, and taking into account our commitments and the responsibility it behoves us to show in this House towards all segments of society, including farmers, we have nevertheless to admit that the government has made efforts which some will praise, while others will show lesser appreciation; but it would be certainly unfair to say that the government has done nothing. Besides nobody in the House did anything.

We should often ask ourselves the following question: Has the member, has the minister or has the government done enough? Could they do better? All members here could ask themselves this question: Could we do better than the government? If so, resorting to obstruction, to an attitude likely to thwart the government on all sides or to delay the passage of bills, then rejoicing in accusing the government of having failed to introduce a measure to give millions of dollars to the western producers, as suggested in this motion, is certainly not the way to do it.

I do not wish to engage in a legal discussion as to whether the government failed to assume its responsibilities by withholding certain payments. There was a fairly fierce and negative opposition, and on the part of some members, there was an opposition I could describe as a filibuster. I do not believe I am going too far in saying that attempts were made to prevent the passage of Bill C-244 for reasons related, I think, to some provincial directives.

I am not a westerner, but I heard about certain things. I can certainly not approve of the attitude of members who blame the government today for having failed to pay grants. The government attempted, with a new bill, to provide important benefits. One was justified in believing that the opposition would willingly approve of the bill, would discuss it surely in a normal way. The member who knows what he has to do, in the opposition, should assume the responsibility of discussing a bill and attempting to move amendments that are likely to improve it. The first duty of an opposition member, like that of any hon. member, is to have no hesitation in supporting a sensible bill, as we must all have guts enough to oppose a senseless bill.

In my opinion, Bill C-244 was acceptable, since it aimed at correcting some weaknesses in Bill C-239. The government not only was making a commendable effort, but also was showing enough goodwill toward the farmers of western Canada. However, for the reasons I have already mentioned and which especially the opposition members know better than I, there was opposition to passage this bill and, today, some hon. members are happy about it. In fact, they are bent on blaming the government, which they charge with not having in due course made the payments owing to the farmers, thus indulging in petty politics and in the meantime telling the farmers that the government is refusing to pay the amounts they are entitled to.

Mr. Speaker, I feel bound to take part in this debate in order to ask hon. members for the tenth time, or the fifteenth time, perhaps, to be a little more practical, a little more honest. If some want to play politics in order to fight the government, that is possible since our present system allows it. However, I believe it is important that the farmers of this country be well aware of the position taken by some hon. members. I would not say that the majority of the hon. members are dishonest with respect to their constituents, but I consider most important for the farmers to know that some hon. members tried in committee to interfere with the government for the sole pleasure of inconveniencing it, as usual, of course, I must say, in all honesty, that when the government members sat in the opposition, they probably made the same mistake. However, this is no reason to say that when the members of this government were sitting in the opposition they were resorting to that practice. This attitude that I have been rejecting for a long time, even before entering politics, is a great source of disappointment to me.

Tonight, I hear comments about principles, liberty, injustice, but perhaps we forget to ask ourselves if we really play the part we should as opposition members. I know how disappointed the population would feel if they were more aware of the attitude of certain members who make fun out of politics when millions are at stake and the producers in need are waiting for those millions.

I am under the clear impression that the government is prepared to pay those producers. If only the members of the opposition were open-minded enough to accept that a limited period of time be set for third reading of this bill; I am convinced that the government would be prepared within 24 hours to pay the farmers who happen to be the constituents of several members who today harsly reprimand the government. Let us be honest about our responsibilities.

It has been said a while ago that this is a tragedy. The tragedy does not arise from the fact that the government has not yet paid those producers. I think that the government is prepared to pass Bill C-244 without any delay, even if they have to bring in certain improvements. The tragedy is that within these very walls there is too much politics going on, and that is the sad side of the story. All members should be objective and not resort to petty politics for we know very well that it is the people of Canada who will be paying for this.

I urge hon. members to be more consciencious in carrying out their responsibilities. I believe the Canadian people have lost confidence in politicians because of some petty politicians who produce all kinds of arguments, too often forgetting their primary responsibilities.

I could wish Canadians to be better informed of debates taking place in this House, which would lead them to invite their representatives to be more objective and to carry out more fruitful work.

The tragedy is not that the government has not paid the money, because it proved that it wanted to do so. I bring up that argument, not to save the face of the government—I recognize it must pay it and that the matter is urgent—but because it can only do so with better co-operation from the members of the opposition. I feel the government is justified in claiming it did not have that co-operation, and I would ask the members of the opposition, those who really want to prove their integrity toward their electors, to tell the government that they are willing to accept a limited debate that those payments might be made as soon as possible. I am convinced the government will then act quickly, in the interest of the producers.

• (11:50 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, the tragedy is surely not the one which was described a while ago. In conclusion, I would invite the hon. members opposite to show such objectivity. As for those who quoted Standing Order 75C, which I call the muzzle of the House, I would say to them that if the government had imposed closure during the debate in committee, I clearly feel that the members who objected to the bill would have deserved it. I am one of those who believe, that is I have for the past two years, that debate in the House should be restricted since the system enables the opposition—that has always been so—to go too far and then the Canadian people must pay for it.

It is urgent for hon. members to consider this matter and accept the limitation of debates, which would allow them to express themselves sufficiently, while allowing the government to act faster, and taking into account the interests of society. Consequently, we must not prolong debates, take advantage of the system to embarrass the government for the sake of it, but serve our constituents in an objective manner. When one considers the waste of time resulting from these sterile debates such as that of tonight and those which have been taking place for the past three years, that is since I have taken my seat in this House, it will be agreed that all the reasons that I am bringing out make me believe more and more that the limitation of debates must be initiated, that a well ordered legislative program must be introduced at the beginning of each session, so that we know that a debate will last a certain time and that each member of the opposition will be able to express himself while limiting himself objectively. The people will thus benefit from an improved service from their government.

So, I invite all hon. members to become more objective than ever, not only to let western producers benefit from subsidies which are theirs, but also to let Parliament work as it should have done for a very long time.

[English]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. La Salle: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Timiskaming may ask a question only if it is accepted by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle).

Mr. La Salle: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Peters: I should like to ask the hon. member, and I am aware of his knowledge of the Committee on Agriculture on which we both served for some time, whether he is not of the opinion that the act that we are discussing, the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, provided for the farmer a payment of something like $60 million, with an additional $26 million owing as of July 31? Is he not of the opinion that, in the light of the fact the farmer is entitled to that money, it should be paid and the government should reconsider the amount that is in the stabilization bill and talk about the stabilization bill in terms of stabilization rather than a winding up of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act? Is he not of the opinion that the law should be enforced today and that we should discuss the matter of stabilization in the light of present circumstances?

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I admit the question is justified, but I think that if Bill C-244 had been supported by the opposition, the problem would be solved. I presume it was very difficult for the government to make regular payments, considering the existing legislation, since the changes instituted in the new bill would surely have given the government much trouble. Since the government had the right to believe that the opposition would not be so dead set against the measure, I acknowledge its good will in trying to help western farmers through the new bill.

If the opposition continues to fight the bill, it seems to me that legally the government will have to pay in accordance to an existing act, but I wonder if objectively opposition members would not achieve more by helping the government to get Bill C-244 passed quickly. Then we shall have really served the people, allowed the government to pay the money and opposition members will be given credit for having contributed in this useful way to the payments that will be made.

[English]

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I hear some denigrations about potato growing. I know that the people over there have no interest in potatoes, but they need not say so so impolitely. I should like to say that I am neither a farmer nor a westerner. None of my constituents are customers of the Wheat Board, so perhaps I will be a little more considerate and not indulge in the harsh criticism that has been laid upon this minister tonight. I will say that he has been no worse in his conduct of the Wheat Board than he has in his conduct of Manpower.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: This debate underlines the gravity of agricultural problems throughout the country, and the very commodity that one of the gentlemen from Toronto was sneering at, potatoes, was terribly hurt by the surtax, but there has been no sign of any corrective measure taken by this government. All the other things that the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) indicated, are a part of this debate, namely the continuing and crying problems of agriculture with which this government fails to cope. This is just one minister who is culpable and inadequate in this field.

There is, however, another aspect. We realize, and it has been made abundantly clear in the fine speeches that have been made tonight, that a part of the citizen body of this country is being victimized by the impropriety of the government in not obeying the laws of the land, and that body is the farming community in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: This is abundantly clear, and if it were ever made clear it was revealed by the non-answer which the minister gave to the very precise question directed by the venerable member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the chancellor of a certain institution.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): At this time of night we are all venerable.

Mr. Macquarrie: But what is more important—and I say this with all due respect to those who represent the agricultural communities—is that the parliamentary structure itself is under attack. So, it becomes not just a matter of concern for those members who represent the farmers, who represent the constituencies which have heavy dealings with the Canadian Wheat Board, but it becomes a matter of concern for all Canadians and for all of us who represent the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: That is why, Sir, at this atrocious hour, I as a dour Presbyterian, am taking part in this midnight debate. For the last hour or two I have been looking up some authorities from McIlwain and Dicey and even Lang. I have read through a good many of them, but I have come to the conclusion that the very best quote I could get is one from Lewis Carroll. When Alice asked Humpty Dumpty a question he, very irrelevantly but perhaps significantly, replied: "The question is who is master". I think that that is what is the problem, this recurring excess of the executive in this country, the present executive, over the people of this country and the people's representatives in this chamber. The problem is who is to be master, and it is the eternally burning question in a democracy. Who is master? Is it the people and those who represent the people or is it someone who has temporarily the keys to the administration? That is what we must ask ourselves. It was long ago that that great man said: "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty". That question is more pertinent and more portentious today than it ever was, Sir. Lord Bryce wrote in a great classic "Modern Democracies":

> Liberty is a good thing, because it develops the character of the individual, and conduces to the welfare of the community. When one man, or a few men, rule over others, some of the subjects are sure to resent control and rebel against it, troubling the general peace. No one is good enough to be trusted with unlimited power. Unless he be a saint—perhaps even if he be a saint—he is sure to abuse it.

• (12:00 midnight)

Although I am as kindly as I can be to a former academic, I am not going to canonize him tonight. We are living in a time when the people's representatives, the House of Commons, in the eyes of the executive are becoming less and less important and irrelevant. Indeed the chief of the executive asks, and indeed he does not ask, he declares—he does not go in much for asking—they are nobodies. So, we have to be eternally watchful, eternally assertive.

Do I hear the sounding brass and tinkling cymbal from Calgary South? If he would de-orchestrate himself and take his turn in the debate it might be amusing if not revealing.

But where is the role of the House of Commons here? Why is the House of Commons important? There is only one answer, as there has always been only one answer down through the history of parliamentary democracy. It is because we represent the people. Before there was responsible government, before there was an administrative procedure for responsible government, there had to be a representative democracy, and we are here because collectively we represent the people of this country. And this why this is a very important evening. Because the regular routine has been set aside, and the people's representatives are here on a matter of great concern to the people. And they are not nobodies. When we forget that representative democracy and the representative aspect of our whole system are the keystone of our democratic system, then we are in great danger of sliding down the path that some would love to push us down. I am glad that there are many vigorous people tonight who have resisted this terrible tendency.

Tonight the minister said certain sharp things. I think he is basically a more polite man than his master, the Prime Minister. He did not call us nobodies, but he said some things that were a bit disturbing. I wrote down his expression "prospective implementation of an act"—something we are going to do in the future.

The Canadian people were told some many months ago about participatory democracy, but tonight we have anticipatory autocracy—"We, the executive, are going to do something. We have said so. Perhaps next year, perhaps next session. We have said we are going to do it, and so the law of the land is unimportant because we have declared that something is going to be different." Seemingly the body that makes that intention law, the Parliament, is not a factor at all, and so you get back to the nobody syndrome. This is the great problem in this country today. This is why it is terribly important that lovers of liberty get across to the people of this country the great danger the country is facing in this kind of arrogant, autocratic attitude towards the dispatch of public business.

Then, I heard the minister later in his speech speaking about taking short cuts to do certain things. How many times has liberty been set aside by the efficient tyrant? "Don't worry about the laws. Get it done, because the processes of democracy and discussion are too slow." So, you cut through them; you tear them down. Then, he revealed himself I think a little more clearly later on when he was discussing the opposition. I heard him use these words, "they kept saying it for three days." How outrageous, how terrible for people representing the Canadian populace to dare to talk for three days on a measure which he and his colleagues have declared is coming into law! Even before a bill becomes law, they are acting as if the law does not exist.

Mr. Lang: It is a different law.

Mr. Macquarrie: You had your chance to defend yourself.

Mr. Lang: Just get your facts right. I don't mind your pomposity but just get your facts straight.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, if this incompetent minister wishes to ask me questions, he can do so when I have finished. He made a tremendous fiasco of his speech and he is not going to assist me to do the same thing. He is the colleague of some ministers who, because they did not like the word "dominion" called it something else even though they have not mustered up the initiative to have the House of Commons deal with the statute to declare that a certain day is not Dominion Day. In other words, if the law is embarrassing, circumvent it. But we are supposed to be law-makers, not law-breakers. Is it not the ultimate irony that we become law-breakers? We are here because we are law-makers. But the government's motto is "To Hell with the law, it is our will that prevails".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: This minister, in a more happy environment, used to write books, as some of us do. He edited one, and I will just read the first sentence: "Justice in Canada is administered in accordance with the law".

Mr. Lang: Why don't you give the reference?

Mr. Macquarrie: This is the first sentence of the book which the hon. minister edited some years ago.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A "Lang" time ago.

Mr. Macquarrie: There has been talk about the minister's legal background, Mr. Speaker. I do not hold that against him but no member of this Parliament, no person nurtured in the tradition of parliamentary democracy, has to be told that our system can only work when we have a government of laws and not of men; that the temporary administrators cannot set aside the law and expect that the system will work. I would advise this minister to remember that.

An hon. Member: For Auld "Lang" Syne.

Mr. Macquarrie: It is a government of laws and not of men; however confident the men may be, however filled with their own importance they may be, the law is what prevails.

In his speech the minister did make a very fine statement when he said "I owe a tremendous debt". This government does, so let them pay it. I hope he will forget politics and not engage further in this—some said "offensive" but I did not think it was offensive, I think it was defensive—tirade. I think he saw the same public opinion poll as I did which shows that in Assiniboia, the Conservatives are leading, the Liberals are second and the New Democratic Party third. But this is not what we are talking about tonight, Mr. Speaker.

I would say to the minister: recall this important debate and what was said by eloquent members like the hon. member for Calgary North and those who followed him. Let the minister remember that with all his troubles, and he is in a troubled portfolio whichever way he turns, he has an obligation to pay the Wheat Board and the farmers. He has to obey the law and function in this House as one who knows that this House is supreme. The power which he exercises rests upon the power of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, it is a difficult task to follow the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie). The words that he had for the House, and for the hon. Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, should be taken to heart. When he speaks about the law, surely the minister will realize that the hon. member is referring to him. I suggest that when the minister gave his discourse he was talking about contemptible action on the part of the opposition. If any contemptible action was taken by any elected member of the House, I suggest it was taken by the minister in May. The Leader-Post of May 29 reported:

• (12:10 a.m.)

Otto Lang, minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, said Friday he expects the grains income stabilization plan will become law before June 23.

I suggest that the magic date, June 23, meant something to the minister. He was not concerned about what happened under the stabilization plan; he only wanted to get cash into the pockets of some farmers and he thought some of the money would go to farmers in the province from which he and I come. I think every organization representing the farming population has opposed this bill, and the minister is well aware of that. He knows that the three wheat pools, the Federation of Agriculture, the National Farmers Union, the United Grain Growers and the Unifarm organization in Alberta have opposed the bill in its entirety and will oppose it until there is clarification of its provisions.

The minister suggested we are trying to filibuster the bill. We have only tried to obtain answers from him. There is one area we ought to be concerned about. The government is encouraging the exodus of the farm population from the land and the amalgamation of farm units into more efficient sizes. Repeatedly we have asked the government what its plans are for changing the present farm units to units of more efficient size, and what this will mean to the farming population. The government has not said what this program will mean. It means that farmers will be moved off the small family farm, and the minister knows it.

As recently as last week I asked people in the farming community to put themselves in my place as a Member of Parliament and to say whether or not they would vote for the stabilization plan. The answer was a resounding no; they would not vote for it until they had information as to what the minister means when he says that he wishes to encourage farm units to become units of a more efficient size.

The minister should know that the so-called grain payments and the carrots being held in front of producers' noses will do little to ease the grain space situation. We need measures to offset any lack of elevator space. Nobody wants to plug the pipeline, as the elevator system is known. At the same time, no substitute has been put forward for the storage of grain. There has been no answer as to who will bear the cost of the extra storage which is necessary or what will replace payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act which paid for part of the storage available in elevators.

This evening the minister spoke about the opposition being obstructionist. Back on May 10 I placed on the order paper the following question concerning the Wheat Board and the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act:

1) Are payments being made on a monthly basis to the Canadian Wheat Board under the provisions of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act?

2) If so, are the payments still being made?

3) If not, why not?

That question was placed on the order paper on May 10 last. On September 8 the minister's department saw fit to answer it. No action of the government could be more contemptible than that, because the attempt was made, I suggest, to deceive producers completely. The government's action, or lack of it, consisted in no answer being forthcoming until then to a simple question. I am concerned, as are the producers. We want answers from the minister. They want to know exactly what he is talking about and why he is not obeying the law as laid down in the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. We are all well aware that it did not take the minister long to get out that seven cent payment. It was announced one day and in the mail the next. Now he has suggested that he is prepared to go to jail for the farmers. At the time he put the payment out he realized that wheat had dropped 20 cents a bushel compared with two years earlier. In fact, on August 1 it was 3 cents a bushel less.

To try to suggest that we on this side are playing politics when the government introduces that type of operation is a defamation of the word, to say the least. I am sure that all members on this side of the House are concerned about what is happening to the farm economy. We are also concerned about the fact that cash is needed on the farm. We on this side have tried our utmost to have this so-called stabilization plan based on net income. In no way will the government accept that type of proposal. The government is well aware that in the whole of the post-war period we have the lowest net income ever on the farm.

We have tried to get the government to take action on the price of farm machinery. Tonight the minister said that he would go to jail for the farm population, but he still will not initiate an investigation under the Combines Investigation Act into the price of farm machinery. He knows the farmer is being completely fleeced in this respect. If this government were concerned about the farmer and the farm economy it would do something to improve the situation.

I had to laugh when the minister congratulated the members on his side of the House who come from the Atlantic provinces and the west coast for putting up with this debate. Surely the minister must realize that the agricultural and fishing economies are the most important industries in this country. They are the backbone of the Canadian economy. Surely the minister realizes that over 80 per cent of the people are directly or indirectly connected with these two industries. He thanked the members from other parts of the country for putting up with a debate on one of the two most important industries in this country, farming and fishing. The members on this side from Atlantic Canada are fully aware of the problems in their industry. They are very similar to the problems affecting the agricultural industry in the western provinces.

Those who are sincere about this situation know that the laws made in this House of Commons should not be broken. This is my first session here. I did not think it was possible for a government to say that even though a law is on the statute books of Canada, they can break that law and nothing will happen to them. The hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) dealt with that point. I did not think it was possible to take shortcuts in order to accomplish something.

The money that is now owing to the farmers of this country should be paid immediately. There is no use arguing with this government. If the government is prepared to break the law, the people of this nation will stand up and be counted at the next election; they will let the government know what they think of these so-called shortcuts. The minister said that he is prepared to go to jail because he is taking this shortcut in order to help the farmers. This is more than a cheap political trick. These people should be going to jail because of the situation they have created.

If we look at the publications of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and other organizations we realize that our agricultural economy is worthy of support. The minister talks about what he has done for agriculture, but Canada is the only wheat exporting nation in the world that has to subsidize the treasuries of other nations. The minister brags about the great increase in farm production and export sales, but we know about the government's hesitation. Because of the cutback in concessional sales we lost markets. We realize that there are now some credit sales, but after a period of time they will be charged back to the pool. Other countries look after agricultural producers and provide protection for the people who are part of this industry.

They consider agriculture to be an asset to their countries, but not this government. They just do what they want and pretend they are helping the producers. Surely, the government realizes it has an obligation to live up to these laws. Surely it realizes that what it is doing right now can only be considered one of the worst things that can happen to a nation. I was amazed to hear the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) stand in his place and say what he did. Surely, he was not suggesting we do away with existing statutes. If this is the situation it becomes truly dangerous to allow any bill to be given first reading, since it might have an effect on existing statutes and in this case it could have an effect on various areas throughout the country.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): As an eastern member, it has not been my custom to speak on matters relating to western agriculture. In the case of my hon. friend from Hillsborough, not only does he not usually speak on western agriculture, he does not represent what is normally considered to be an agricultural riding. But there are two factors which compel me to take part in this important debate. One is that I do represent an agricultural riding. And I believe the problems of western agriculture are indivisible from those of agriculture generally across this country.

It is an obvious fact, that the government has proved both unable and unwilling to face the real problems of agriculture and is continuing in many cases to turn toward its own plans and programs, which in most instances have little to do with the real needs which pertain in the agricultural industry. It is high time members from all parts of the country and on all sides of the House expressed themselves openly and directly with regard to this subject. The cost-price squeeze and other difficulties affecting western agriculture can be repeated time and again with respect to the agriculture situation in eastern Canada.

In addressing the House this evening, I rise not just because agriculture is affected but because there is a principle at stake which concerns the very moral fibre of the country itself, that is, the right of any group of individuals acting as the government of a country or province to arrogate to itself a decision to act against the law. I think this debate may well prove to be one of the most important, if not the most important, to have been held in this chamber for many years, because it deals with a question of fundamental principle. We know that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has not a great deal of respect for the institution of Parliament. He has already indicated clearly both inside and outside the House that he regards much if not all of what happens here as either a nuisance or a bore. Some of us have been deeply offended, and by "some of us" I do not mean just the members of this House but the people of this country. They have been deeply offended by that attitude particularly on the part of one with such a high place of responsibility. But because this is a democracy we have had to tolerate that point of view. It seems now that the government has made a new departure for not only does it consider Parliament to be a nuisance and a bore but it considers itself to be above the law and this is something which members of this House totally refuse to accept.

The government may be fabricating some new morality. It may be simply willing to overlook facts in favour of its own priorities, whatever that may mean, but the fact is that there is a clear-cut statute which pertains to the administration of money with respect to the Canadian Wheat Board in this instance.

Members of this House and many members of the public, particularly those directly affected, will not overlook or accept the government's action in this regard. This government may be more interested in its own plans and policies than in the people involved in agriculture or the principle at stake, but the reason we are having this debate is to point up the fact that a country cannot long tolerate that kind of arrogance and repudiation of the basic structure on which democracy exists.

I trust that after tonight's debate in this House hundreds of thousands of people in this country will let the government know where they stand, because only through the free voice of the people can we continue to maintain respect for democratic institutions and the function of laws which protect both liberties and opportunities in a free society.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, it is not often that the Parliament of Canada remains in session after midnight and it has been my experience that on the occasions it has occurred a fundamental issue has been involved. I have discovered during the course of the discussions on those occasions that members make statements of basic importance to the well-being of this institution of Parliament. All hon. members will agree that the speech made tonight by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) was that kind of statement.

I could not help but make a mental note of the contrast between the reaction of members of the House to the speech of the hon. member for Hillsborough and the speech of the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. The minister had a great gallery behind him—all farmers from Montreal, Toronto and places of that nature! There was a lot of hooting and hollering because the minister's speech was full of sound and fury, signifying nothing and quite irrelevant to the essence of this debate. The speech of the hon. member for Hillsborough did not cause a vociferous response from the bleachers. Instead, a profound hush and silence descended over the House. I think the measure of its importance was in terms of what is sometimes called a pregnant silence.

Over the years I have had the privilege of sitting in this place during post-midnight debates. My mind goes back to the first occasion I experienced an extended debate on an issue of this kind. The issue concerned the breaking of the law by a minister of the Crown. That minister was a member of a former Liberal administration that had been in power far too long for its own good as well as for the good of the country. I am sure that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who is following this debate very closely tonight, will recall the circumstances.

• (12:30 a.m.)

The minister concerned failed to discharge his obligation under the law of Canada. Nothing happened until the official, the civil servant, who was responsible resigned in protest. Then, the cat was out of the bag and debate began in this House of Commons. I was a new Member of Parliament trying to become accustomed to the mysteries of this august chamber, and I can still remember the speech of burning and righteous indignation given by a Presbyterian Scot—I do not think that Presbyterians have any monopoly on speeches of burning and righteous indignation—the late Alistair Stewart who was then representing the constituency of Winnipeg North.

One of his ringing phrases still remains indelibly imprinted on my mind. The occasion was just before Christmas of 1951 and he said that he did not know whether the minister would be spending Christmas in the bosom of his family or in the bowels of a penitentiary. As it happened, the minister spent Christmas in the bosom of his family rather than in the bowels of a penitentiary, but the issue was fundamentally the same as this. The minister concerned was one of some considerable political experience in the public life of this country and perhaps, under those circumstances, a little bit of arrogance has to be tolerated.

The intolerable part of the issue now before the House is that we have a minister who is responsible for the Wheat Board deliberately circumventing the law of the country and justifying it with a speech that was quite specious in nature and content; a minister who has been in public life only since 1968. I would say the present Liberal administration is taking on the attributes of arrogance that brought on its downfall in 1957 much too soon for its own good.

I sat in incredulity and heard the minister deliberately digging his own political grave in the sort of speech he made tonight. I remember the late Right Hon. C. D. Howe, who made many contributions to this country during the dark days of World War II, coming out with a statement that indicated how arrogant the Liberal administration of which he was a member in the latter days of the regime had become. In a debate on a very important issue he said: "If we are not careful this discussion is going to degenerate into a debate". The implications of that statement, of course, have much in common with some of the points that were made by the government spokesman in this House tonight. I see that the Whip of the government party has something to say, but unfortunately I did not catch what he said.

Mr. Lang: He said that that won't happen now.

Mr. Dinsdale: Perhaps he intends to take part in this debate, because not many of his troops are left this evening. The point I want to make in this debate is to bring before the minister the situation existing in western Canada of which he is apparently completely ignorant or for which he has utter disregard. He was trying to point out in his defence of the indefensible here tonight that if the Parliament of Canada would only pass Bill C-244, all the problems that beset the western economy at the present time would melt away in the morning sunshine.

Mr. Lang: I did not say that.

Mr. Dinsdale: But this was the implication of the remarks, and we will be very pleased to have this point clarified because the only justification he gave for failing to discharge the responsibilities of the government under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act was that we were delaying the passage of Bill C-244 which is designed to solve these basic problems. It happens to be the opinion of a substantial group in this House, and of most of the farmers and the people of western Canada, that Bill C-244 would worsen the situation that has already been seriously worsened by the actions or lack of actions of this government.

Bill C-244, as I understand it after having discussed the issue with my farmers, would not stabilize the prairie agricultural industry but would stagnate the industry and reduce it to the poverty level. How a minister of the Crown with responsibility for the Canadian Wheat Board which has been one of the mainstays of the prairie grain industry over the years ever since it was first conceived by a Conservative administration can take this attitude of trying to foist upon the people of western Canada a bill, a government policy and an initiative that would cause profound disturbances in the prairie economy, an economy that is already at a disastrously low level, is beyond the comprehension of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris.

Mr. Lang: So is the bill.

Mr. Dinsdale: The point at issue with reference to the defence of the minister is that apparently he fails to appreciate that the farmers of western Canada are now confronted with a situation where even those with long experience who would normally be thought of as having been firmly established in the prairie economy are finding it impossible to survive. Others who have spoken here tonight have pointed out the reason. The minister does not seem to understand the cost-price squeeze, the decline of grain prices with the collapse of the International Wheat Agreement because of the failure of the government to seize the initiative in these matters, and also the fact that even though grain sales are up—and this is one of the arguments that the minister used ad nauseum here tonight—this is doing nothing to increase the prosperity of the prairie wheat farmer. He is deeply in debt from cash advances and other last resort financial measures that he has been assuming in order to survive in the tragic economic situation in the prairies. The farmer is in a position where his cash flow has been completely cut off, and this year he will not likely have access to cash advances in order to help himself in the struggle against encroaching poverty.

• (12:40 a.m.)

To bring these brief remarks to a conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I quote a former member of this House who is now a distinguished member of the press gallery. From time to time he comments on agriculture and other western matters. I refer to Mr. Douglas Fisher who on several occasions has attempted to regain his place in this House. About a year ago he lost his bid for the NDP nomination in Selkirk, Manitoba, and summed up the reason for his failure to make a strong showing, according to a Canadian Press story dated February 23, 1970, as follows:

> As a resident of Ottawa I was under the Trudeau curse. The sentiment is so strong against Ottawa that it goes against someone who even lives there.

From the stubborn, almost obtuse attitude of the minister I can only conclude that he too is under the Trudeau curse or spell, because the position he has taken with regard to this important matter is so completely incomprehensible to the people of western Canada. It is one of the reasons why we have witnessed in recent months a disturbing growth in the feeling of alienation on the Prairies.

When I refer to the Trudeau curse I recall that the right hon. gentleman who is the leader of the government, during an appearance before a farm audience in the city of Winnipeg made this strange and incomprehensible statement with reference to declining grain sales, "Don't expect us to sell your wheat." Obviously he did not even realize that under the Canadian Wheat Board Act the farmer has no other recourse than to sell his wheat through the board.

Confidence is important for the general economic well-being of the country. As the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) said a moment ago, prosperity is indivisible. The sort of defense that the minister made tonight is a disservice to the people he represents in his constituency in Saskatchewan. It is reminiscent of the defence he tried to make as recently as yesterday in face of startling unemployment figures and a shocking increase in the cost of living, unemployment figures in reference to the situation that existed in August before the impact of the American surtax, and an increase in the cost of living amounting to 3.6 per cent, the largest increase we have seen during the whole period of increasing inflation in this country. This was also an increase that occurred before the impact of the American surcharge began to be felt on the Canadian economy.

The most tragic aspect of all is that the group most seriously affected by the chronic unemployment figure of 6.5 per cent is composed of the young people of Canada aged 14 to 25 years. What the minister is trying to do is perpetuate a myth. It is a myth that has been sold by what has been referred to as "Trudeaumania".

Mr. Woolliams: The just society.

Mr. Dinsdale: The just society, or participatory democracy. Talking about participatory democracy, as I look over at the government side of the House tonight, I see that we have only three members of the government participating in this important debate.

An hon. Member: Not a member of the cabinet.

Mr. Dinsdale: The hon. minister is behind the curtain and I can well understand his desire to get out from under an embarrassing situation.

Mr. Francis: It gets a little dull after a while.

Mr. Dinsdale: Let me point out, Mr. Speaker, what the government has been trying to do to this and other important matters. I have here a quotation from something said by the late John F. Kennedy.

> For the greatest enemy of the truth is very often not the lie—deliberate, contrived and dishonest—but the myth, persistent, persuasive and unrealistic.

That sums up in much better words than I could find, exactly the exercise undertaken by the minister responsible for the Wheat Board in his defence of the indefensible. I can assure the minister that it will not go over with the farmers of western Canada who are deeply concerned about the situation.

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, we have listened to a lot of words this evening. We have probably listened to so many because it is absolutely impossible for us to discover the words necessary to describe precisely how reprehensible is the government's failure to make to the Canadian Wheat Board the payments it is required to make under the terms of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act of 1956. The government has told us that it is withholding the 9½ cents a bushel, the $60 million owing to Canadian farmers, because there is a bill on the order paper which would repeal that provision for the payment of storage and carrying charges contained in the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. This is money urgently required by a western economy already staggering, not to mention the need of farmers whose income is already marginal.

Withholding of Grain Payments

There is absolutely no justification for the government action, either legal or moral. The government simply does not have a legal leg on which to stand. The Temporary Wheat Reserves Act of 1956 is the law of the land. It requires that certain payments, estimated at approximately $60 million for the crop year 1970-71 be paid on a monthly basis to the Wheat Board beginning August 1, 1970. The payments have not been made. That is a breach of the law. It is a breach of the law knowingly—and I say knowingly advisedly—undertaken by ministers of the Crown. These are the same ministers of the Crown who paraded their virtue, their respect for the law, their desire for public order and their love of democratic institutions so sanctimoniously during the crisis last October. What is their justification for holding this money, so urgently required by the western economy? Their justification is that there is a bill on the order paper, Bill C-244, which has as one of its provisions the repeal of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act retroactive to July 31, 1970. This is, I submit, no justification at all. Anyone with even a marginal acquaintance with the procedures of a parliamentary democracy knows that a bill is nothing more than a piece of paper containing some words until Parliament sees fit to enact it into law. Bill C-244 is not yet law, nor can the government assume that it ever will be law. The government must wait until Parliament has made manifest its will. If the government is not willing to take my word for it I should like to cite a passage or two from "The Law of the Constitution" by A. V. Dicey, Tenth Edition. At page "xxxv" appears the statement:

> No person or body is recognized by the law of England as having a right to override or set aside the legislation of Parliament.

• (12:50 a.m.)

The same principle applies in our Canadian parliamentary democracy. On page "cx" Dicey says:

> —it is fundamental that there must exist some technique for forcing the government to submit to law; if such a technique does not exist, the government itself becomes the means whereby the law is achieved. This is the antithesis of the rule of law.

As I said earlier, the government has no legal leg to stand on in this instance. Indeed, it is the opposition which has the weight of legal opinion behind it and, as may shortly be demonstrated, the weight of legal procedure as well. Even if there is any legal justification for the government's action in withholding $60 million of badly needed money from the western farmer, we should look at the moral position.

The minister responsible for the Wheat Board is arguing that none of this would have happened if the opposition had let Bill C-244 go through. Indeed, the minister says not only that the government would not now be embarrassed but that the farmer also would have received $100 million in acreage payments which would more than have replaced the lost revenue represented by the provisions of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. In addition, farmers would have received the benefits of an income support program based on gross farm income.

To begin with, such a position is nothing less than blackmail. The minister in effect is saying to the opposition, "Either you allow the legislation, which you consider to be bad legislation and which many farm organizations consider to be bad legislation, to pass or we will starve the farmers by withholding urgently required income and we will blame it on you."

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Rowland: The minister tonight is being told where he can get off, and deservedly so. There is a great deal of noise being made these days about the responsibility of the government, about its accountability to the people and about the need for allowing it to get on with the work of fulfilling its mandate. One can hardly disagree with any of these concepts. However, there is another side to the coin. It is the responsibility of the opposition to see that the government does not ramrod through bad legislation. The opposition is accountable to the people for its actions in that respect.

If the opposition has the "temerity" to delay government legislation—and here, referring to Bill C-244 I might say, as someone said earlier, that it has only been before this House for 12 hours and before the committee for 24 hours—the mere fact that the opposition is also engaged in electoral politics and must seek the approval of the voters means either that in all likelihood there is overwhelming opposition to the idea, that there is a great division of public opinion, or that public opinion has not yet become clear. Surely in the case of any one of these three eventualities delay is justifiable. If the opposition is wrong in its assessment of public opinion, then it will suffer for its mistakes at the polls. This, as I said, is the other side of the coin to government responsibility; it is the side of opposition responsibility, a side too seldom seen and seldom understood. Surely the government has no justification, moral or otherwise, to employ blackmail in an attempt to get the opposition to avoid its responsibilities. Beyond that, the minister's assertion that the opposition is at fault in delaying the flow of cash to farmers is simply untrue. We on this side of the House have frequently suggested to the minister that he split Bill C-244 so that we might deal rapidly with its provisions for $100 million in acreage payments, something which all of us on this side of the House would agree to. But the minister will not do that. That is his decision, not ours. We have made the offer. As a separate measure, the acreage payments could have been put through the House before we rose for the summer. That measure could be put through very quickly right now. The cheques could soon be in the hands of the farmers of the country. The minister, however, was simply too stiff-necked to co-operate. Even the minister must understand that the other provisions of Bill C-244 are, to say the least, extremely controversial and required detailed examination.

Without giving a speech which might be more properly made during consideration of the grain stabilization bill, Bill C-244, let me mention a few areas that cry out for detailed consideration. First there is the provision for the cessation of payments to offset storage and carrying charges for unsold wheat. We ask: Is it legitimate to require the farmer to bear this cost on his own, since reserves of grain are requisite to Canada's being able to supply customers on orders and thus favourably affect the balance of payments of the country?

Another example, is it realistic to base an income support program on the gross income of a farm? Would it not make much more sense to base the program on net farm income? Gross income can be high, but so are overhead costs which could make real income marginal if not non-existent. Yet another example, is it legitimate to require farmers to contribute 2 per cent of their gross earnings to such a plan when their real earnings are so marginal that 2 per cent off the top might mean the difference between survival and failure? Surely, these are legitimate questions requiring the most careful examination. Who is the minister to demand that we in the opposition cast aside our obligation to give it that examination?

Finally, Mr. Speaker, even if the minister were right in his assertion that this is all the fault of the opposition, a point which I do not concede for reasons I have given earlier, what does that have to do with the substance of the argument before us? Absolutely nothing. The Temporary Wheat Reserves Act is the law. The government has not abided by the law. In 1968 when the opposition defeated a proposal for a 5 per cent surcharge on income tax, the government did not like it, but they paid back the money collected. They obeyed the law then, and they should do so now.

Sheer bloody-mindedness has placed the government in the position in which it now finds itself. It is time it acknowledged that fact and carried out its obligations under the law, if for no other reason than that the western economy needs the money which they are withholding.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I was born and raised on a farm in western Canada, but that does not mean the farm problems which face us in Canada today are not shared by everyone who loves the land in this country. I wish this bill, and this problem which we face, related only to agriculture. If it did, I would be content to go home, take to my bed and perhaps settle this another day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Francis: A good idea.

Mr. Bigg: I do not think there will be any applause coming from the other side of the House when I finish my remarks. I am shocked that a debate of this importance and magnitude is not attended as it should be. This House should be jammed. I wish the gallery were jammed as well.

It is not the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act that is on trial today, it is democracy itself. I wonder where the cheering ranks are that were here an hour or two ago when the minister was defending the indefensible. I call him a minister with my tongue in my cheek. No minister of the Crown worthy of the name could stand up in this House and say what the minister said, except in jest. It would be a very poor jest, indeed, to turn back a glorious period of a thousand years of history and development of democracy in the western world.

Some hon. Members: Hear hear!

Mr. Bigg: This minister of the Crown cares little, if anything, for the rights of the people in a democracy. He is a man chosen by the people, a man raised in western Canada, near the land itself and given the great benefits of Cecil Rhodes generosity. He should have his brains sharpened; they need to be sharpened. What did they do to his head at Oxford? It was not far from Oxford that they cut off the head of a king for doing a great deal less than the minister did in this House tonight. Charles I was the victim of a worn out creed, the divine right of kings. What man dare stand in this House today and say there is a divine right of prime ministers or minister of the Crown to run their ideas down our throats and say, "You will like it"?

• (1:00 a.m.)

You can read in Hansard the report of a great debate after we had voted an arrogant government out of office in a proper, democratic way. What did the then Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau) have to say? He said, "We shall decide"—he did not mean even the whole Liberal party, but the inner clique of that party—"during, before and after debate, what is to be done in this country." It is on the record. This is not the first time I have stood in this House and told hon. members to read the record, to read the books that were written, the books in which he says where he is going and in which the path is outlined.

About 40 years ago another man wrote a book, Mein Kampf, and stated where he was going. Isit not a strange coincidence that exactly 31 years before this motion was put before the House, on September 15, 1940, the allies had to shoot down 285 German planes to prove that we would defend to the bitter end our right to determine in our way, at grass roots level, what would be done before, during and after debate.

When I heard those arrogant words spoken more than three years ago in this House I expected every backbench Liberal Member of Parliament to do what some of our greatest members have done since, though only one or two—thank God there are one or two left in this country who have the guts to stand up and face the non-party, the non-dictatorship which is rapidly taking over—that is, say, "If you don't like the way I run this country, go home, preach revolution and grow radishes." Did you ever hear those words before? I did. Were they said in jest? Grow radishes? Well, it is no good growing wheat any more because if you do you will not get $2 a bushel as was promised once by the great Liberal party. The good times of the Liberal party have become the tough times of Pierre Trudeau and his mob—you cannot call them a government, you cannot call them a cabinet.

The hands are the hands of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, but the policies are those of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I think he must have told the minister that he would kick his derrière, the same as he said he would kick the small boy in Saskatchewan, if he dared oppose this demigod. I will kick your derrière, Mr. Minister. I hope I am kicking it now. How would you like to manger la merde? That is the advice our glorious Prime Minister gave hardworking men from Montreal who want to earn their living driving trucks. Is that the kind of democracy we support? Yes, point to him and give him his orders; he does not have to take them. I am being very relevant to this debate, and you know it. How would you like to fuddle-duddle? Resign. That is what that means in the Prime Minister's language—fuddle-duddle just as fast as you can.

There is more than one coincidence this week. Prince Alberta, Saskatchewan, was at one time the political home of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, one of the great Liberals of this country, one of the great leaders of this country, a Canadian who did not have to hyphenate his name. We still have the member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) whose birthday is tomorrow. He has spent many, many years fighting for this country. I wish he were here tonight, because I know he would do a much better job of kicking your derrière than I am able to do.

The only support the minister received was from a man who could not stand the heat on this side of the House and had to get out of the kitchen. Is he preaching for a call? I believe he could do a great deal better because in his ignorance he is better than those trained in the chicanery of Oxford. This is one place where we do not have to be careful. One can talk treason in this chamber if he wants, and it has been done in my presence more than once. I have sat here nice and quiet and listened to it. After 23 years as a policeman sworn to obey the law, I have never been as shocked as I have been in the last 24 hours. I wish to God the Attorney General of Canada would sign a warrant; I would enjoy serving it.

This government has run out of ideas. It has wasted our money and is now vaguely looking for other sources of income—and I am not referring to the wonderful tax expectations. It has dipped into money set aside for agriculture but is now looking for an excuse not to spend it. This government should offset some of the economic nationalism being practised by the United States. Much too much has been said in the House about this matter, keeping in mind that this young nation is trying to get along with its neighbour. Some of our international wisdom is coming home to roost. The long-range plan outlined in the Prime Minister's book is beginning to misfire. He told us in his book how to take over Canada step by step. He says we do not have to worry about the federal system because it works beautifully. He says we can gain more by democratic means than we can with guns; all we have to do is take away democratic procedures.

Sir John A. Macdonald signed a very important document in 1873. He set up the Northwest Mounted Police Force now the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bigg: You may cheer, but let me ask those who are cheering this rhetorical question: Can you promise me that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police will remain in its present position even until 1973? Or will it be part of a non-force with a non-commissioner fitting into a plan for non-freedom? I was not only a policeman and a soldier I was trained in the law. If the Attorney General of Canada does not know the law of Canada let me presume to tell him. Everybody in this country is subject to the law which we make and which we alone have the right to alter.

I hope I never again hear about shortcuts. A shortcut in the law of Canada should be a shortcut to the penitentiary, and the flouting of Canadian law as in this case, represents a breaking of the oath of office of a cabinet minister. I do not know what name to put to it, but thinking of the sacrifice made by our boys 30 years ago I am led to wonder how many cabinet ministers shot down German planes? Think of the contribution of those soldiers compared to that of those who would legalize abortion or allow pot to be used everywhere?

• (1:10 a.m.)

We have come a long way during the last 30 years. Our heroes have new faces, but they are not faces that would ever convince me I should bow down and worship them. If my leader on this side of the House tried to do to the people of Canada what is being done openly and brazenly through this legislation, then I would condemn him. Not only do I not hesitate to take that stand but I would be ashamed to do anything else. Tell that to the rest of your boys.

Mr. Woolliams: There are not many here tonight.

Mr. Bigg: The plan has misfired and those behind closed doors are looking for an election excuse. They are not satisfied with 150 seats; they have to manufacture an excuse to go to the people of Canada and ask them for an extended mandate. Why do they do this when they could not do less than they have done in the last three years?

Mr. Woolliams: They promised nothing and delivered it.

Mr. Bigg: Yes, they promised nothing and sure lived up to their promise. Now, they are trying to panic the country into a premature election. They have another two years to go and they have a majority. If they have the brains, the sharpened wits and all the answers, then let them come up with a little action.

Mr. Lang: Do you want us to go five years?

Mr. Bigg: I do not want you to go one more day. Liberal times are good times—for Liberals.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bigg: You live and learn, Mr. Speaker. These hon. members applaud too soon. The wheat farmers of western Canada do not think Liberal times are good times. The average net income of a prairie farmer three years ago was $4,800 a year in round figures. In the year 1969-70, it was $1,200 in round figures. This does not take into consideration the drop in purchasing power of the dollar.

During the last year we have been told inflation has been beaten. It may be beaten for the Liberals, but it is not beaten for anyone else in this country. Perhaps the 7 per cent increase is sufficient for some people, but I am not one of them. I want to know when these good times are going to come and when participatory democracy will mean something. When will the Liberal cabinet consult its own backbenchers? I want to know how it is that this arrogant minister can predict that Bill C-244 will go through this House. He must have resurrected Mr. Pickersgill's crystal ball. Let me tell him that Bill C-244 is not going to go through this House unamended, any more than the former bill C-197, now resurrected as Bill C-176, will go through.

Ministers of the Crown are now boasting about this amended bill and how helpful it is going to be. It is hardly palatable amended as it is, yet they are already boasting about it.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) said to me in this House: "Trust us to pass the bill and everything will be fine". How can we trust this ministry when a minister of the Crown says that although the law contains a certain provision if the government wants to do otherwise they can take little shortcuts? Is that not what the minister said? Have the "blues" been corrected? That statement should appear in Hansard or I will be up in the question period tomorrow asking why the minister did not leave it in. He said it and we all heard it. It had better be there. In my opinion, to allow him to resign would be a miscarriage of justice. He should be impeached. He is an Oxonian and he knows his history. He would not have dared to do this in the days of Burke and Pitt, and I would like to think that when history is written historians will be able to say he did not dare do it in the days of Woolliams and Mazankowski either. This may well go into the history books as a very historic occasion. I would like to think that we will win this debate and that members on the other side have enough guts to come over here and join us, because if the standards which we have heard expressed in the House tonight are the standards of the Liberal party there should not be an election. They should be ashamed to be members of the House. If that is an exaggeration, you will hear about it and I suppose I will hear about it. However, I will tell you something about the people of Pembina. They like clear, unvarnished truth and they will get it from me.

It is a big game we are playing here tonight; it is a serious game. I have spent my whole life preparing myself for it, and the chips are blue and the stakes are high. The stakes are the future of democracy and freedom in Canada, because if we let this thing go, what will it be tomorrow? There will be another little short-cut through the tax act, another little effort at the emasculation of the mounted police through the creation of a non-force? How do you protect yourself from that sort of thing? Everybody within the sound of my voice knows and every Canadian knows, that if you take the task of protecting the security of Canada from the mounted police and put it into the hands of a non-force, it will be the death of freedom in this country. I can speak from 23 years of personal experience and say to you that it did not matter what your politics were, you were safe in my hands and those of my boys. I would protect the home of a Liberal, a Conservative, an NDP or that of anybody else in this country, and the very Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself who has brought a great deal of this about is safe in my hands. I wish I thought I could be safe in the hands of the non-force with a non-commissioner, run by the non-cabinet of a non-party. It is the height of nonsense, and it is certainly another great misjudgment of the people of this country if he thinks he will get away with it.

The biggest mistake Hitler made 40 years ago was in thinking that the western world did not believe in freedom, and there were 11 million or 12 million people who showed him in no uncertain way that the only way for him was to die by his own hand. His friend, Mussolini, was hung upside down outside a forgotten gate on an Italian hill. The same fate will befall anyone who pursues this method far enough. The first step toward dictatorship was to burn down the Reichstag. You do not have to burn it down if you can get the people in this chamber to act in a cowardly and disgraceful manner, that is to allow any man, be he minister or prime minister, to stand in this House and say he will make the rules. All they have to do is to say: "We, the little group, will make the rules because we have a few fellows scared into doing what they are told".

• (1:20 a.m.)

It has been my dream since boyhood to come to this House. I achieved an ambition. But if I am to be here when democracy in Canada dies, then I wish I had never been born; I wish my mother had never brought me up on the plains of Saskatchewan. I warn you that this battle is not going to be won easily. There is a democratic way of getting rid of this sort of treatment. If you want to call an election, if you think this little piece of blackmail will work, saying we are filibustering this $100 million that you are supposed to be giving the farmers, stealing three-quarters of it out of one pocket and poking it back into another, let me tell you that it will not go over with the people.

You cannot tell the people that you are going to run the country your way, whether they like it or not. You cannot predict that you are going to ram Bill C-244 through this House. Will your next election promises be better then the promise of $2 wheat or the promise the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made when he said, "We will make the rules"?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent that the hon. member continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bigg: Thanks, all three of you.

Mr. Francis: All four. At this hour, Jack, you can't count.

Mr. La Salle: Three Liberals and one independent; you made a mistake.

Mr. Bigg: I apologize to the hon. member. I did not see him there.

Mr. La Salle: I am always here.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Right in the middle of the Liberal caucus!

Mr. Bigg: Perhaps I have deviated from what I usually do, because I always try to make my remarks entirely positive. Have I got any advice for you? Yes. I want you to obey the laws of Canada, to pay the farmers that which is justly theirs. I want you to stop this double-talk and give them the $60 million plus the $26 million that should be added to it. They need it very badly. Let us forget that they should be getting $2 for their wheat. Let us say it is $1.45 wheat; let us cut it down 55 cents. Let us let you off the hook.

Mr. Francis: Address the Chair, Jack.

Mr. Bigg: I will be very pleased to hear from the hon. member who has just spoken from his seat.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I believe the rules call for hon. members to address the Chair.

Mr. Bigg: Has the hon. gentleman got the floor?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is well established according to our rules. Our rules say that remarks must be addressed to the Chair.

Mr. Peters: Where does it say that?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think there is no question about the direction of the Standing Orders and precedents. Remarks should be addressed to the Chair, and I am sure the hon. member for Pembina is going to do that.

Mr. Bigg: I don't want to get into a lawyer's discussion with the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, but he was addressing me from his seat, which is one of the most flagrant breaches of discipline and decorum in the House. If he is to rise on a point of order, I wish he would rise in the proper manner and address the Chair, and then Your Honour could put me in my place. I thought I was speaking to the whole House through you, Mr. Speaker.

My advice is that the minister should obey the laws of Canada. If he does, he will have no complaint from us. Pay the farmers of Canada their just dues. I wish the minister would take his own advice in respect of trying to shelve the responsibility for his own delinquency by blaming the opposition, telling us that we have failed the government again in their hour of need.

We want the government to obey the law of Canada and give the farmers what is justly theirs. If the minister wants to do that by splitting Bill C-244, I cannot speak for the whole party but I can say for myself that I am willing to give my support to any bill which gives the farmers what is due to them. There is no doubt about their need. The price of machinery is high and costs of all kinds are increasing. Their overhead is not going down. Wages, gasoline and taxes are all increasing and the farmer is stuck in the middle. Just pay your honest bills, and that will be a good start.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): I have a feeling that, as the hon. member who spoke previously said, this is an historic debate. As a new member I feel privileged to be able to take part in it. Many fine speeches have been made here tonight. I have neither the rhetorical brilliance of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) nor the rhetorical and legal standing of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). However, I should like to say that in the constituency I represent we have an historic respect for the traditions of Parliament. We pay our bills and we respect the law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: As a new member, perhaps I have come to this House full of idealism. This is natural when coming to such a hallowed institution, as was stated so ably by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale). I was quite shocked, therefore, when I realized today for the first time that this administration does not seem to share the sentiments I thought I would find here of paying your bills and respecting the law. It seems to me that these two qualities I have mentioned are fundamental to the traditional qualities of Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: I am shocked that they are absent from this most hallowed of all institutions in this country. I think it was Oscar Wilde, that famous English humourist, who once said in respect of the habit of the English gentry of hunting the fox, it was a case of the unspeakable pursuing the inedible. Here I seem to detect traces of the indefensible being justified by the irresponsible. I suggest, with all deference and respect to the hon. minister, that he is irresponsible, because he knows better. As a man who is an academic of some renown, a minister of the Crown and a man with legal training, I am sure that in his heart he knows better than this. I am disappointed to find this attitude here. But I wonder, Mr. Speaker, after digging back in my memory to the 1956 pipeline and other contentious issues that have arisen to capture the attention of this country in the meantime, if this is not the hallmark of Liberal administrations.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that what we have here tonight is basically a simple issue, as was brought out so ably by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). We have a Canadian statute, duly passed by the Parliament of this country, calling upon the government to pay moneys justly due to large numbers of citizens of this country. That has not been done.

• (1:30 a.m.)

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in his great experience and wisdom questioned the minister about why it was not done. What did we get? We got irrelevancy and evasion. One need not be very astute to recognize these for what they are. We did not come here tonight to listen to a history of the Wheat Board or to politically-expedient statements from the minister about what this administration has done in the past, about great wheat sales that they ostensibly have made and hope to make in the future. We came to get answers. Unfortunately, we did not get many answers tonight from the other side of the House.

The Coutts Hallmark people have a saying, "We care enough to send the best." It seems to me that the Liberal administration which is governing this country did not care enough to send the best tonight. Indeed, they did not care to send very many people at all. Much of what I should like to say tonight has been said by hon. members more experienced and talented than me. I would be remiss in my responsibilities to my constituents if I did not go on record this evening as supporting the efforts made by my colleagues and compatriots from the western part of the country who seek justice for their constituents who are affected by this situation. As many hon. members have said, beyond that there is a question of fundamental principle, the principle that those who are instrumental in creating the law and in imposing the law should also be instrumental in obeying the law.

It seems to me, as the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) has said, that any government anticipating that a certain important legislative measure will be passed and carrying out what will be the end result of the legislation is presumptuous to the highest degree. "Anticipatory autocracy" seems to be a far more accurate description of the government's attitude than the much heralded term "participatory democracy".

It seems to me that statistics can support almost anything—especially statisticians. I think the government has refined the art of juggling statistics, forecasts and figures to an unparallelled degree. Indeed, they have refined their talents in this regard to a far greater extent than they have refined their talents for governing this nation in perilous times.

I do not intend to say much more, since the hour grows late. I would say, with all deference, that the important message has already been put across to the people of this country. I wish to echo the sentiments of the hon. member who preceded me and advise the minister to not delay any longer and to pay to the people of this country what is justly theirs under legislation passed for their benefit by their representatives.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to delay the House. I have enjoyed listening to the speeches which have been made. Much interest in democracy has been shown by many hon. members. I personally participated in what the minister called a filibuster. I was one of those who believed that the legislation was poor and could be improved. I was one of those who advocated the splitting into two parts of that piece of legislation. On the one hand there was the money that was to be paid on July 31 for storage payments; on the other hand, and separate from that measure, there was the other proposition. The government was not too clear about it; it changed its mind a number of times last year. I am talking about the legislation that came out of the task force that the government set up.

The task force report was augmented by discussions which took place with farm groups as to what percentage the farmer should pay and the government should pay in arriving at a formula respecting the stabilization of income. I make no apology for using Parliamentary methods of supporting these two things. I might suggest that there was a great deal of chance in this. I assured my colleagues I would hold the fort while they went out and fought the election in Saskatchewan. I did not think that I would get so much help from the situation that developed. I took advantage of the situation mentioned earlier. I said to my House leader that we have now changed the bill and that the government has to make this payment on July 31 because that is the law. I said that when we reassemble, we will face a new stabilization bill which will only involve itself with the stabilization of agricultural income. I did not expect there would be a way to circumvent this.

The minister can accuse me of being devious or using all types of strategy to accomplish my end, but I usually look in the book and see whether it is legitimate before I do it. I was playing the rules. I think that I accomplished exactly what I set out to do, namely to support these two parts of the bill. The minister has done something which I do not consider to be playing the ballgame. He changed the rules. In my opinion, he does not have the right to change the rules. I depended on the law being supreme. The minister says the bill is going to pass anyway. I am not sure that is true, Mr. Speaker.

I do not come from western Canada, but I received 3,000 letters from westerners asking that this bill be killed. I may find some way to help do that and the bill will not be passed. If the bill does not pass by Christmas, will the minister then let the law apply? Will he then pay the $60 million plus the $29 million that will be involved? If he does not, we will find a way. Is this going to be done at the time of the election? Do we have to participate in a donnybrook to handle that situation? There must be some way that the law can be made effective. If the minister changes the rules, he cannot blame me for changing the rules in whatever ways appear to be appropriate and taking advantage of situations that may develop. At least this is playing the ballgame as it is laid out by our Parliamentary practice and tradition.

I think the payment has to be made. I do not believe you can retroactively decide something. The minister has a legal and moral obligation to make that payment. If it means there is only $40 million in the stabilization fund, we should talk about that. I do not think $40 million is going to settle the problem in so far as the farmers are concerned. I think the farmers have already spent the nine cents or 10 cents a bushel they expected to receive as a rebate for the storage costs. If they have to pay that nine cents or 10 cents per bushel, they are going to demand it in another form.

The minister can save himself, the government and Parliament a lot of trouble. If he does not honour the law, we are probably going to circumvent his intention anyway. The minister certainly knows and understands the law. I am sure he has a great deal of moral conviction. I am sure he is very upset about what has happened in the past three days. I honestly cannot understand his reason for not making the payment to the Wheat Board, taking whatever money is left and asking the committee to look at the stabilization factor that all members and farm organizations want to have. However, the minister does not care.

• (1:40 a.m.)

The farmer says he will have to pay the 2 per cent out of his net and the government will pay the 4 per cent. His percentage will be calculated on his gross, but he will have to pay out of the net. That will make his net income so much less. Originally, the argument did not involve the figures two and four, but another set of figures. It is possible that some arrangement can be made but I honestly believe the minister will do something for himself, something for his government and something for this Parliament. I do not know how else the minister can be forced into it if he does not want to be. The Liberals have a great tendency to fall back on the proposition that they have a large majority and can do what they like. In another country, in the United States, for example, this matter would be determined by a simple recourse to the Supreme Court. But in Canada I am sure no one could refer this to the Supreme Court and hope for any satisfaction, because a Supreme Court Judge would say: Parliament is supreme and parliament will have to do it. If Parliament does not have the machinery to enforce the operation of the law, I suggest we are in extreme difficulty.

I have listened to the arguments of the minister. I have listened to the arguments put forward in committee. I really cannot see the advantage, either from the minister's point of view in a political sense or from the viewpoint of the amount of money the farmer will get, of flouting the law and maintaining that the $100 million is to be kept as a set figure as against paying the money under the present law and using whatever balance there may be to institute a reform of the income structure of western Canada by in some way guaranteeing a minimum income over a period of time. It may take some $40 million. The minister indicated that I was wrong in saying the amount could be over $40 million. The minister said it could be a lot more. He is probably right, except it means we have to increase production to a great extent. I am using the actual figure over a 15-year past average and it comes out to about $29 million.

Mr. Lang: Forty million dollars.

Mr. Peters: I don't believe it comes to $40 million. That is the high end. In any case, if we were to triple production in western Canada, we would be raising the total figure. The argument in the committee was always in relation to the last 15 years of production. I believe this is the context in which the $40 million was mentioned. There is nothing this House can do to force the minister and the government to live up to the law, I know of no way or technique to accomplish this.

A debate such as this is a means of letting off steam, but it does not come to a conclusion because we do not vote. I hope the minister has listened to the arguments, all of which have been sincere. Surely he has come to the conclusion that ministers of the Crown must live up to the law and that he as the minister responsible for the Wheat Board must obey and uphold these laws.

I am sure that members of the Standing Committee on Agriculture are prepared to consider the stabilization bill with a view to developing stability of farm income in western Canada. In this way there will be no threat in respect of the use of the $100 million. Surely this Parliament can do no more than make such an appeal to ministers of the Crown. If it were necessary to have an election every time the opposition or people in the country felt the Crown had not lived up to its responsibilities, we would find ourselves in a very serious position. We have always had very outstanding parliamentarians in this country. We have had very few reasons either here or in England to institute impeachment proceedings. That has taken place very rarely in the United Kingdom and to my knowledge has never taken place here. It is a piece of legislation we have not used and will not use in the foreseeable future. Whether democracy will continue to function and whether the law will be observed by ministers of the Crown depends entirely on the ministers who respect the wishes of this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the hon. member?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The hon. member knows that under the Standing Order he can put a question only with the hon. member's consent.

Mr. Peters: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Joliette.

Mr. La Salle: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Courtesy demands, I believe, that I put a question to the hon. member, since he put one to me.

Later today I intend to present a motion for adoption of the motion for third reading of the bill within a time limit, for the benefit of western producers. I would therefore ask the hon. member whether he is prepared to support the motion I intend to present.

[English]

Mr. Peters: No, Mr. Speaker. Any type of agreement would require hon. members justifying what the minister has done. If we were to ask now for co-operation or agreement in respect of Bill C-244, we would in effect be saying that what the minister suggests is correct and that when this bill is passed, whatever he has done is legitimate. Most members have agreed that in respect of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act the House of Commons has supported it, the Senate has supported it and it has received royal assent.

I would be prepared to accept the $100 million proposition, but once the obligation of the government has been met we should bring forward the stabilization bill and consider it separately as a method of guaranteeing the stability of farm income rather than as a partial method for the fulfilment of the purposes of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act and economic stabilization.

• (1:50 a.m.)

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I stand in my place at one hour and fifty minutes past the hour of midnight with mixed feelings. I have a sad feeling because we have to debate this type of issue in a country that prides itself on its democratic system. But I am proud that we have on the opposition side of the house a number of members who have been willing, after a hard day's work, to stay here until almost 2 a.m. to debate an issue that will go down in Canadian history as a major event in the protection of the rights of the Canadian people.

We have heard from across the way tonight a variety of members. On one occasion we heard the "grey eminence" of the Liberal party who sat there lonely in his seat, at one time the only member of that party in the House. Then we had an attempt, which the whip of the Liberal party will want to deny, to reduce the House below the level of a quorum when several members were behind the curtain, in order to try to show us up as a group of individuals who were not prepared to carry on the debate. This occurred several hours earlier. I am proud to be able to stand here with at least a solid quorum of members of the opposition who have carried on this debate and will do so until every last word has been said.

This is the second time I have taken part in a debate past midnight in this House. Last time I was here until a quarter to one. That was in the fall of 1970 in a debate on what is now referred to as the October crisis, when the War Measures Act was invoked. Having listened to that debate on the Saturday, into the Saturday night and early Sunday morning, I can say that I do not know whether I felt sadder then than I do now.

This issue is not one of wheat. Wheat has been mentioned hundreds of times this evening, and I have seen the leadership shown by the hon. member from Calgary and listened to the speech of my colleague to my left, from Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). Other hon. members have also made outstanding speeches. These members were not talking about wheat. I do not think you will get members from Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia or Newfoundland staying here until two o'clock in the morning to talk on the issue of wheat, about which they are not knowledgeable and perhaps do not have the same commitment as members from western Canada. It is obvious to me and to anyone with ears to hear that the issue here is much more fundamental. To me, this issue is national and is one of the most critical situations I have seen since becoming a Member of Parliament in 1968.

I heard the minister this evening stand in his place and tell us that he would be prepared to go to jail for the farmers. He told us how he would take shortcuts, how he would cut through red tape to get around the law. I could almost hear the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) coming from his lips. I would not go as far as other members of this House and say that he is only the puppet of the Prime Minister, that he is only doing what he is told, because having shadowed the minister from Saskatoon for the last couple of years and watched him take part in debates in this House I am convinced that much of what he is doing carries his own conviction. We have seen him today. I saw him earlier today stand before the national press down in the Commonwealth room and try to explain away the unemployment with which we are faced today in Canada by saying that there has been a growth in the labour force. He said to the national press—and I hope they could see through it—"I know you cannot understand what all these figures add up to, so come down with me to the Commonwealth room and I will explain away all the ills of the economy in Canada". He tried to tell the people of Canada, through the press, that the problem we have today results from the growth in the labour force, something which I heard back in 1945 when I was five or six years old, something which I heard repeated by his former prime minister in 1964, and something which I heard repeated every time there was a release on unemployment in the last three years. This minister is the most competent minister of any in this government in being able to present a deceitful situation to cover up the mess to which he and his government brought this nation. He is the most competent in this field because he has the smoothness, and the verbal diarrhea which goes with it, to be able to do this so beautifully that most people would never suspect him.

I remember one summer in my riding of Gander-Twillingate having occasion to witness, in a small community called Brown's Arm in Notre Dame Bay, a situation in which a number of very peace-loving ladies decided that they were not satisfied with the commitment which was made by their provincial government, made officially on paper during an election in 1966, to pave a piece of road in their community. Let me give you the full story. There is a great source of gravel in that community that was being used to pave roads all over the Notre Dame Bay area, and these ladies said: "Why should this gravel be hauled through our community with all the dust and resulting danger to our children and families?" The government made a commitment four or five years ago to pave the roads in that community and they had not fulfilled it, so why should they get away with it. These ladies decided they would picket the gravel pit from which this dust originated.

This might seem like a minor story, but it was never picked up by the national press. It was one of the most fundamental things that I have ever seen happen. Mr. Speaker is smiling. I will prove to Your Honour that this is an example of how the law applies to everybody. The ladies picketed the gravel pit which belonged to the provincial department of highways. The attorney general's department issued an order to the police that the law must be enforced. The RCMP moved in and told the ladies that they would have to enforce the law unless the ladies were obedient to that law. I remember witnessing this sad situation in a small community. I will not go into the religious affiliations of the people, but suffice it to say that they were peace loving Notre Dame Bay people. I said to these people: "you cannot break the law. I am a law-maker and I would love to be able to lead you in an issue which is legitimate, but you cannot break the law". I am also a teacher and I have spent years teaching young people to obey the law and to respect discipline. I remember going into great detail about it with these people. The next day, after the warning from the RCMP, the police had no alternative—and I am not blaming them—but to move in and arrest these ladies. They carted them to jail and charges were laid.

This is an example of how the law applies. The situation was sad, but it is an example of the fact that nobody is above the law. But here we have a situation today in the House of Commons where $90 million is being robbed from the people in western Canada, which is illegal under the law of this land. As my friend, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) indicated, here we have the minister, an eminent lawyer from Saskatoon, who is not only breaking this law but is the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. It is an unbelievable situation. I have been here a few years only, and I am a rookie in terms of the length of time in office compared to other hon. members, but I certainly feel that some of the remarks made by other hon. members were very pertinent.

I hope this debate will be well recorded and well read, because this Parliament has seen the ultimate insult. We have seen the gradual build-up to this ultimate insult—and it first started with what happened in committees. I could debate at length all that has happened in committees. I remember one night when government supporters, organized into platoons, moved in on a committee and kept it in session until 7 or 7.30 in the morning studying Bill C-176, in order to cram it down the throats of the Canadian people. Luckily we had people with the dedication of some of my western colleagues who withstood the organized efforts of the government.

• (2:00 a.m.)

I hope the Canadian people can understand what is going on in this country. We have a situation where examination of the estimates has been taken out of the House of Commons, another example of the downgrading of Parliament. Today the government can bring in any spending program it wants. Parliament has lost control. It is only a matter of time until Parliament becomes another committee room where members will only be able to do what they are doing now, that is, get up and voice opinions. As a matter of fact, I do not know how long the press can continue its present practices in face of the organized professional efforts of Information Canada and its Canadomes. In fact, it won't be long before even the verbal efforts of Members of Parliament are totally nullified. If people with legal training read through much of the legislation that we have passed in recent years they will see the break-up of democracy, with more and more discretionary power given to ministers. Such a study will show what is happening in Canada. Today the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) is the financial czar of the country. At his discretion he can decide on expenditures of up to $12 million and beyond, although he has not yet gone beyond that figure.

I just want to touch on one or two points before I conclude, Mr. Speaker. The remarks of my colleague from Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) earlier today centred on the decline in rural farms in western Canada. I cannot talk too much about those farms, although I had an opportunity to spend a couple of years of my early life living in western Canada, visiting parts of Alberta and of the minister's province. But I can tell the people of western Canada that they had better beware of the government which is running the country if they want to see any semblance or trace of rural life left in that part of our country.

We on the east coast have seen a deliberate, calculated plan to destroy the whole of rural Atlantic Canada. It is being put into effect under many pieces of legislation, and the most traumatic leadership is that provided by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. My colleagues from Prince Edward Island and the other Atlantic provinces can verify what I am saying. The people running the government have decided that everything in Canada has to be big, has to be based on the model of Montreal. It has to have an industrial complex and it must be viable, a word which has a particular meaning in government departments.

I hope nobody is fooled by all this. The government is attempting to destroy rural Canada at a time when most people are beginning to understand and appreciate the cultural and environmental qualities of life in these areas. This quality of life of these people needs to be preserved, yet the government is deliberately embarking on a policy to destroy the small communities. This is what is happening. If any farmer in western Canada does not realize that this is the end of the major aspects of government policy in this regard, he is in for a setback.

We have seen situations like this before. I am not making the charge without being able to substantiate it. A number of places in my province have been designated as special areas and will get what Mr. Tom Kent used to refer to as the "infrastructure". A number of other areas have been designated as receiving centres. This has not been announced publicly and no one in my province knows about this, but I have a copy of the publication naming the communities as receiving communities. These communities basically fall into special areas. All of the 800 communities around the coast of Newfoundland are referred to as sending communities. This matter is really relevant. Your Honour is looking at me as if I am being irrelevant. I am trying to point out that basically the type of legislation being introduced, whether referring to farming or regional development, is aimed at destroying rural Canada. That is why I say to the people of western Canada that this is the intent of the government policy before us today. In my province we have a program that the government bragged about called the resettlement program under which people are uprooted from their communities, given a couple of thousand dollars, which seems a great deal of money to them, and sent into the urban areas. Often that is the end of their lives.

Last year in Alberta I visited areas where farmers had been very successful. They might have needed a little assistance from the government to organize themselves into viable units, but the experts from the government departments came and encouraged them to move off their farms. This is what I saw in the part of Alberta with which I am familiar.

About an hour ago, as I was coming in from the lobby, I noticed the television station was signing off for the evening. It was a little moving to hear "O Canada" being played. This would send a thrill up the spine of any Canadian who feels as I do. I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am the youngest Canadian in the House at the moment, at ten after two o'clock in the morning. As a matter of fact, I am exactly 21 years old as a Canadian because Newfoundland joined Confederation in 1949. At that time, I was ten years old and it took a little time to move from the traditional background of a Newfoundland fishing community with a pride which goes beyond description and a feeling of fierce independence borne from eking out a livelihood from the rugged coastline, fighting the elements day after day in a village on the east coast of Newfoundland. The day we became part of Canada, a lot of old Newfoundlanders raised the black flag because they did not think we should give up our heritage. A lot of them died without becoming Canadians, but others became very fine Canadians. I felt proud to stand in school assemblies and halls across the province, taking part in the verses of the national anthem.

In 1968 I decided to enter politics and become a member of the Canadian Parliament, the highest court in the land. This was because I was convinced that the system of government in Newfoundland had reached a state of autocracy which could not be tolerated. That is the system presently controlled by the provincial government which I would not like to comment on in detail in this chamber, though I have done so many times in the province of Newfoundland. At that time, going across Canada was this young, aspiring Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I believe he was 49 years old.

• (2:10 a.m.)

Except for a few people on the east coast, a few people in two or three cities in Quebec, Ontario and out west, most Canadians went for this young Canadian who could dive off a diving board better than the leader of our party and who figured that he could kiss away all the problems of Canada. That was his style of politicking from British Columbia to Newfoundland. He became Prime Minister on June 25, 1968.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but must advise him that his allotted time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lundrigan: I remember coming into the House after the election and, like almost every Canadian, not knowing too much about the direction of this government or what it was capable of doing. I have had my fill of this man, who by his own definition is a young Canadian—who became our Prime Minister.

Mr. Woolliams: He is my age.

Mr. Lundrigan: The unemployment situation has reached crisis proportions—455,000 people are out of work today, the highest figure for August in the history of Canada. The wheat farmers of western Canada are making half the net income they made ten years ago.

An hon. Member: No, about a quarter.

Mr. Lundrigan: My colleague says that they make about a quarter. We have fishermen on the east coast who have been left so unprotected that people of every nationality are raping our fishing resources there. In the fall of 1970 we had a situation under which we invoked the War Measures Act. Inflation has been at almost 4 per cent over the last 12 months. It is running above that figure this year. We have an economy which because of the action of our neighbours to the south is in much greater danger now than it has been for several years. In part, that action was provoked by the contempt the leaders of the United States government feel for the leaders that Canada now has. It is a contempt for which one cannot blame them.

Now we have reached the ultimate situation. Government, which makes the law, is breaking the law. I should like to see this issue resolved in this House before we move to other legislation. I should like to see the issue resolved, with the co-operation of the Chair, during question period and by means of other procedures which we can adopt. This government must be forced to uphold the law. Even if it takes us another week, we must make sure that the government upholds the law and that it does not use any piece of legislation to blackmail the House of Commons and the people of western Canada. If this matter is allowed to drag out until the legislation passes in any form, even in an acceptably amended form, you might as well close the doors of the House of Commons.

Mr. Boulanger: Don't exaggerate.

Mr. Lundrigan: "Don't exaggerate," the hon. member says. Is there any use our continuing to pass legislation if there is one example in this history of Canada of legislation not being upheld? If there were to be one such example—and we are talking about it—and if this state of affairs is allowed to continue, we might as well resign our seats, go back to our constituencies and let the Canadian Parliament die a natural death.

I should like to see colleagues who are experienced in parliamentary practices bring in motions and adopt procedures which will force this government to pay its debts under the law. And that should be done before we move on to further legislation. I should like to see motions of non-confidence put forward in the House. I want to see members of the House of Commons forced to stand in their place and say whether they will vote for upholding the laws of Canada or not—because Mr. Speaker, that is the basic issue here.

Everyone in the House knows where we stand, Mr. Speaker. We have not yet heard where members opposite stand. Either they have not been permitted to take part in the debate or they have lost interest in the whole process. If the support that the minister, who stands sipping his coffee, has in his caucus is evidenced by the presence this evening of his colleagues, there is a lot of discontent in the backbenches and the whole of the Liberal party.

In conclusion, starting tomorrow I will look forward to standing here again and debating a non-confidence motion specifically aimed at where the members of this House of Commons stand. Either they stand for Canada or they stand against Canada. That is the issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I trust I am not pre-empting the time of anyone who wishes to take part in this debate. I assume that the last speaker was the last person to speak. If that is correct, on behalf of my colleagues— Does the hon. member—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was going to take two or three minutes, if my hon. friend does not take them from me.

Mr. McCutcheon: While I have the floor, on behalf of my colleagues, may I thank the Speaker and his office for providing the opportunity for this debate which may have historical significance. We would like to thank the Speaker's staff, the officers at the table, and all those—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Chair hesitates to accept the remarks of the hon. member in the sense that it is placing the Chair in the centre of an important debate. Hon. members are aware of the stature and position of the Chair which has the sole responsibility of applying and interpreting the rules of the House to the best of its knowledge. The Chair hopes the hon. member will not in any way imply that any decision of the Chair might be related to the debate before us.

Mr. McCutcheon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am sure Your Honour misunderstood my remarks. I meant no reference to the Chair. I was referring to the staff; the officers at the table, the interpreters, the security staff and all who provide services around the chamber. We thank them for their courtesy and apologize to them for their loss of sleep. Be assured there was no intention to reflect on the Chair. I make that abundantly clear.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will only be two or three minutes. I am sure we all agree that in many respects this has been an important and useful debate, but I think it is most unfortunate that in over six hours of debate there has been no attempt whatsoever to answer the question that has been in our minds all night. By what authority is the present government ignoring the law of Canada? The question is as simple as that.

• (2:20 a.m.)

We have heard plenty of discussion about other matters, farm policy and all the rest of it. None of it has been really relevant. The issue revolves around the fact that there is a law on the statute books which requires the government to make certain payments. Those payments have not been made. We have not been told that there is any provision in the law, any order in council or legal instrument of any kind which permits that law to be ignored. Back in 1949 when Mr. Garson, who was minister of justice, broke the law by refusing to table a report on the flour milling industry which had been prepared under the terms of the Combines Investigation Act, the best answer he could give was: We are the government; we won the election.

In 1968, when we debated the question how the government was able to get around the fact that it had been beaten in a major vote on a tax bill, we were told by the minister of justice of that day, now the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau), that they were the masters of the House. Now, all we get from the minister in charge of the Wheat Board is that these payments have not been made because there is a bill on the order paper which, if passed, would repeal the law under which they would have to be made. May I remind hon. members that there is also on the order paper a bill numbered C-264, a bill to change the family allowance scheme into what is to be known as a family income security plan. Do hon. members opposite realize that in this bill there is a clause which says that the Family Allowance Act is repealed as of May 1, 1972? Does this mean that if Bill C-264 has not been passed by that time, the government will quit paying the family allowances which are required under the present legislation? Suppose there are extended negotiations between Mr. Bourassa and the Prime Minister, suppose there are other crises and we don't get at it, or suppose the opposition filibusters the measure. Would the government cease to pay the allowances presently required by law?

I suggest these cases are on all fours. If the government, on the basis of a bill on the order paper now, can ignore a statute which that bill says will be repealed, it can do so with respect to this one. The answer Mr. St. Laurent made once upon a time was, there are certain things we don't do. The government would not do this. The government would not think of discontinuing the payment of family allowances before a new scheme came in. Yet the same government finds it possible to discontinue the payment required by statute under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act because there is on the order paper a bill which would call for the repeal of that Act.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel).]

Mr. Lang: Effective 1970.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes. The reason I chose the example I did, rather than some others I might have picked, was that in both cases there is a precise date. There is also a precise date in Bill C-244. Since the government has not been making the payments required under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, it would follow that after May 1, 1972 the government could cease paying family allowances, even if the new legislation had not been passed. I know this will not happen. I am not trying to scare hon. members opposite. It would not happen because there would be too much of an outcry. But the same principle applies. The government is doing what Mr. Garson did back in 1949. The government is doing what the present Prime Minister did in 1968 when he said "We are the masters of the House." This is not the way this place operates. We operate on the rule of law. We operate on the principle that when a law has been passed the lowliest citizen in the country must keep it, and so must the government.

I make this appeal to the government across the way. What is being done is not just harmful to the farmers. What is being done is in defiance of the rule of law and the traditions of Parliament. There is still time to correct this situation and I ask that government to make that correction right away.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I shall answer with pleasure.

Mr. Prud'homme: I think I should ask it in French.

[Translation]

Taking for granted that we are currently making a mistake, does the hon. member mean to tell us that the government must pay the highest price, namely going down in electoral defeat? Is the government not responsible for taking decisions, just as the opposition is responsible for opposing them, taking for granted that the government is erring and that it will have to pay the price, that is being defeated?

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) came very near to answering that question a while ago when he pointed out that in spite of the seriousness of the situation, the problem is that we know we can do little to force the government's hand. My hon. friend, the hon.

member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme), has raised the point that any responsible government or executive of the day can literally do just about anything it wants, provided it has the approval of Parliament and provided it is prepared to run the risk of an electoral defeat.

Let me refer again to Mr. St. Laurent—and I am sure the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) knows what I have in mind. Mr. St. Laurent rose during a debate and picked up the Bible. This action was recounted during the pipeline debate. He quoted from the Bible and pointed out that there are certain things the Romans did not do. He said of government in power that in spite of the right it has to do certain things, there are certain things it should not do. One of the things the government should not do is violate the laws of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In accordance with Standing Order 26(13), the Chair is satisfied that the debate is over. I declare the motion carried.

At 2:30 a.m., the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, September 17, 1971

The House met at 11 a.m.

[Translation]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF PRESIDENT OF EUROPEAN COMMUNITY COMMISSION

Mr. Speaker: I have the pleasure of announcing the presence in the Speaker's gallery of a very distinguished visitor, His Excellency Signor Franco Maria Malfatti, President of the European Community Commission. On behalf of hon. members I heartily welcome President Malfatti and express the wish, on behalf of each and everyone of my colleagues in the House, that his visit and that of his colleagues to our capital may be both fruitful and pleasant.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

STATEMENT BY SOLICITOR GENERAL ON USE OF INFORMERS

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I said in the House on Thursday, September 9, that I would make a statement concerning the use of informants by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, with particular reference to the serious allegations made by Mr. Robert W. Eadie, Jr. formerly of Cornwall, Ontario, on a television broadcast on September 8.

I have now received a report from the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and wish to inform the House in the first instance, of the policy in effect in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police regarding the use of juvenile informants and then to speak of the allegations made by Mr. Eadie Jr.

I am informed by the Commissioner of the RCMP that for decades it has been the general policy of the Force that police business involving juveniles should be conducted with great care and with the full knowledge and consent of the parents or guardian. Police officers are instructed that the approaches to juveniles must be direct and honest; a show of force or harshness or anything that suggests threats must be avoided. If it is necessary to interrogate juveniles, every effort is made for at least one parent or the school principal or teacher to be present.

It has been general practice within the RCMP that when a juvenile volunteers information, the police investigator obtains as much information as possible during the initial contact. If the same juvenile returns with information a second or third time, then the investigator notifies the informant's parents or guardian and obtains their consent before making further use of the juvenile as an informant.

It has not been general practice for juvenile informants to be paid for information given at the first contact though, if this information has led to an arrest or a seizure of drugs for example, then casual payments have been made after the first contact. Juvenile informants have been paid on a casual basis for information provided, which has been verified and has produced effective results. But I would like to make it clear that juvenile informants have not been carried on a regular payroll, either weekly, monthly or annually.

I am informed by the Commissioner of the RCMP that as of August 24, 1971, only six juvenile informants reporting to the RCMP were receiving payments for information on a casual basis. On August 12, 1971, a formal instruction was issued by the RCMP headquarters under the title Interim Instruction 134. This instruction was amended shortly thereafter and the amendment was distributed to all divisions on August 24, 1971. With regard to juvenile informants, the amended instruction 134 reads as follows:

"When a juvenile volunteers information, the investigator should accept whatever information is available during the initial contact. If the services of the juvenile are to be used any time after the initial contact, the investigator must first obtain the consent of the juvenile's parents or guardian.

A juvenile shall not be: (a) assigned an informant's number or (b) paid money under any circumstances.

Juveniles shall not be used to purchase drugs."

I am sure hon. members will agree that the practice of paying juveniles for information given by them to the police is repugnant. Furthermore, this practice did not add appreciably to the efficiency of police operations. Accordingly the instruction was amended on August 24 to ensure that juveniles who provide the RCMP with useful information will no longer be paid money under any circumstances.

• (11:10 a.m.)

[English]

I wish now to deal with allegations that I have been misled by the RCMP and that I misled the public when I stated on a television program in August that the RCMP "would not have a young person as informant on any payroll".

A young person within this context is a juvenile as defined under the Juvenile Delinquency Act. As hon. members know, provincial Attorneys General are primarily responsible for enforcing the Criminal Code. For this reason the definition of the age of a juvenile pursuant to the Juvenile Delinquents Act is that which applies in so far as RCMP operations are concerned. In New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Ontario, Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan and Alberts—Alberta for boys only—a juvenile is one who is under the age of 16. In Newfoundland and British Columbia a juvenile is under the age of 17, and in Manitoba, Quebec and Alberta—Alberta for girls only—a juvenile is under the age of 18.

Hon. members also know that the Young Offenders Bill, which is now in a committee of this House, enables the provinces to establish the juvenile age either at under 17 or under 18.

I have already explained that prior to August 24, 1971, it was general practice within RCMP operations for juveniles to be paid on a casual basis but juveniles were not carried on a payroll. Effective August 24, 1971, even this practice of paying juveniles for information has ceased entirely.

I will now reply to the serious allegations made by Mr. Robert W. Eadie, Jr., formerly of Cornwall, Ontario, on a television broadcast on September 8, 1971. I find it distasteful to have to do so, and I am sure members of the House and the Canadian public will also find it distasteful. On the other hand, since serious accusations have been made which hurt the reputation of some members of the RCMP and the reputation of the force itself, I consider that I have no choice and that it is my duty to reply to these accusations.

May I make it clear to hon. members that I have decided to reveal all the facts as shown in police records which deal with the accusations of Mr. Eadie, Jr. Certain details such as the exact dates of payments to Mr. Eadie, the amount of each payment and the various criminal cases involved will not be revealed so as not to jeopardize his position. It is of course, not the normal practice to reveal such information. RCMP policy is to protect sources of information, the individuals involved and their families. It is because Mr. Eadie, Jr. himself decided to reveal publicly the alleged circumstances of his becoming a police informant and to make serious accusations about the conduct of RCMP officers that I have decided with great regret to reply to his accusations in detail.

Mr. Robert Eadis, Jr. was born on August 13, 1950. He served a short sentence at Guelph reformatory, as he stated publicly, and was released on parole on September 21, 1968. Mr. Eadie's parole expired on February 24, 1969. On March 17, 1969 he was convicted of theft and sentenced to a $50 fine or 15 days in jail. He paid the $50 fine. After March 17, 1969 there were no charges pending against him.

In a television broadcast Mr. Eadie made five significant allegations. First allegation: Mr. Eadie, Jr. said:

> One night I got picked up by the city police regarding intoxication and they called the RCMP because they were aware I knew people on the drug scene and they forced me by threatening that they would send me back to prison if I did not give them information regarding drugs.

Mr. Eadie also said:

> They took me to the station and put me in a cell and then they got in touch with the RCMP as they knew that the RCMP wanted someone like me to get hold of.

The facts are that there is no record of Robert W. Eadie, Jr. ever having been arrested by the Cornwall city police or having been put in their cells as alleged; that in April, 1969, the Cornwall city police received a telephone call from Mr. Eadie, Jr. during which he stated that he had information to provide on drug use in Cornwall; that Mr. Eadie Jr. was advised that someone would contact him. The Cornwall city police then informed the RCMP detachment commander at Long Sault and suggested that he should get in touch with Mr. Eadie, Jr.; that, on or about April 20, 1969, the RCMP detachment commander telephoned Mr. Eadie, Jr. and arranged to meet with him; that Mr. Eadie, Jr. told the RCMP detachment commander that he had information to supply on both users and traffickers of drugs in Cornwall and he began supplying information to the RCMP detachment commander on April 24, 1969. He was first paid for information on April 30, 1969.

At this point, may I make it clear to hon. members that at the time Mr. Eadie, Jr. was first contacted by the RCMP he was 18 years and eight months old and was not a juvenile.

Mr. Eadie, Jr. received intermittent payments totalling $710 for information which resulted in successful police actions in 14 cases between April 30, 1969, and February 18, 1971, the latter being the last occasion upon which Mr. Eadie, Jr. received informant payments from the RCMP. Mr. Eadie, Jr. did continue, however, to supply information on a voluntary basis to the RCMP detachment at Long Sault until July, 1971, without receiving any money.

Second allegation: Mr. Eadie Jr. said, when questioned as to whether his parents were aware of his activities, "No, they were not. They weren't aware of anything at all".

The facts are that about six weeks after the initial contact was between Mr. Eadie, Jr. and the RCMP Mr. Eadie's parents were made aware of their son's activities. This was confirmed by telephone from the RCMP detachment commander at Long Sault to Mr. Eadie's father on on or about June 1, 1969. The father expressed approval of his son's activities and, in fact, on two occasions he accompanied his son to the RCMP detachment of Long Sault when he went to collect payments. Hon. members should also know that in the early spring of 1971 Mr. Eadie's father in discussion with the RCMP at Long Sault implied that the association Mr. Eadie, Jr. had with the RCMP was beneficial to him.

• (11:20 a.m.)

Third allegation: Mr. Eadie, Jr. said that the RCMP were "threatening me because I had a choice to come across with information or get busted by them even as far as getting planted with drugs on me and sent back up for this".

The facts are that Mr. Eadie, Jr. offered his services to the Cornwall City Police and the RCMP voluntarily; that he was never threatened, intimidated or coerced into giving information to members of the RCMP with whom he came into contact prior to his leaving the Cornwall area in July, 1971; that during the period between April 24, 1969, and July, 1971, there were no charges pending or laid against Mr. Eadie, Jr. known to either the RCMP or the Cornwall city police.

Fourth allegation: In reply to the question "How many busts did you help make over?" Mr. Eadie, Jr. said "three over a two and a half year period". The facts are that Mr. Eadie gave information on many occasions; that he was paid for providing information on 21 different occasions from April 30, 1969, until February 18, 1971; that the information Mr. Eadie provided contributed to 14 successful police actions.

Fifth allegation: Mr. Eadie, Jr. said his use as an informant "ended pretty well after my beating, when I got beat up because I was too scared to even leave the house for about six months, because they would not give me protection or anything so, I pack it in." Mr. Eadie, Jr. also said that he asked for police protection from "the RCMP and they laughed it off" and he implied that as a result of the beating he had lost his teeth.

The facts are that on the day of the alleged beating of Mr. Eadie, Jr. on June 8, 1969, the RCMP detachment commander at Long Sault accompanied by a member of the Cornwall city police were called to the Eadie home; that Mr. Eadie, Jr. and both his parents were present; that it was observed that Mr. Eadie, Jr. had a small cut on his upper lip for which he refused medical attention; that there was no apparent damage to his teeth; that a member of the Cornwall city police was present in case assault charges were to be laid by the Eadie family; and that the family refused to press charges. Hon. members should note that after the alleged beating on June 8, 1969, Mr. Eadie, Jr. supplied information on 14 different occasions until July, 1971—a period of over two years after the alleged beating. It should also be noted that Mr. Eadie, Jr. was seen by members of the RCMP detachment at Long Sault about one week after the alleged beating in the downtown section of Cornwall and he did not try to conceal his presence. At no time did Mr. Eadie, Jr. ever ask for police protection from a member of the RCMP.

[Translation]

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state to the House that I am satisfied that the investigation conducted by the Commissioner of the RCMP into the very serious allegations made by Mr. Robert W. Eadie Jr. was thorough, competent and conclusive. I can assure the House that the allegations of impropriety and misconduct which were made about officers of the RCMP in connection with the case are untrue and malicious.

[English]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would have thought that the minister, who has read a lengthy statement on an important subject, would have made sure that hon. members on this side of the House were provided with copies of the statement prior to its being read in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: The minister's failure to do so is an abuse of privilege.

Mr. Woolliams: I say that particularly because the statement was so important. In dealing with an important matter such as the administration of the law, may I say at the outset that the carrying out of the law is very important, and the good name of Canada has been somewhat connected with the good name of the RCMP. I am happy that the minister has had the matter investigated, but it may be that there should have been a more independent investigation.

I want to refer to one aspect that I think is most serious. In this technological age, in this age of electronics, police forces such as the RCMP or those operating in urban centres do not need to hire stool pigeons. Whether a person is 17, 18 or 19 years of age is mere quibbling. The fact is that if people are used and paid to give information, they are not really volunteering information. The element of materialism is being used to acquire information by the payment of money. From personal experience in acting as defence counsel on certain drug cases I know that stoolpigeons have been used by the police not only in urban centres but by the RCMP elsewhere. In this technological age the police have other methods of investigation without having to use the human elements of stoolpigeons and paying for information. I am always a little suspicious about the kind of information and evidence obtained from a man who has had his palm crossed with dollars.

The weakness in the minister's statement, if I might put my finger on it, is that he says the RCMP are no longer going to use juveniles but instead use the age under the new offenders act—I could say something about that, but I do not want to digress—and that even though they are not going to use persons 17 or 18 years of age it is all right to use persons beyond that age. In this technological and electronic age it is not necessary to use that kind of method to feed the police information when carrying on an investigation. I think that is where most of the trouble arises.

This investigation was carried out by the distinguished commissioner of the RCMP, a man of great integrity, but I hope the minister will not now oppose, as he has previously, this matter going before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs so that the report prepared by the minister's officials and read by him, the report on the investigation made by the commissioner of the RCMP could be examined and proper questions put by members of that committee to avoid any suspicion that there might be any prejudice or that there might have been a whitewash. In other words, it would be in the interests of the integrity that hon. members believe the RCMP have. If the report is honest and straightforward and if the investigation has been thorough as the minister would have us believe, then, although he always has refused, he should be prepared to allow the commissioner or anyone else who had anything to do with the investigation to come forward and give evidence at the committee level. If Mr. Eadie wishes he could also come forward and tell his side of the story so that the whole matter would be before us and we would not have any more problems. We must always guard against overzealousness in police work but we must also see that the law of the land is carried out. If it is flaunted, how can the citizens of Canada have any respect for the law?

I am not going to say any more because this is not the time to be talking in a political vein. The matter is too important and too close to all members of the House, no matter where they sit. I hope that the next time the minister has such a lengthy report on such a serious matter we can be provided with advance copies so that we can analyse it and reply to it intelligently.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

RCMP Informants

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I tried, as I am sure others did, to follow closely what the minister said. I had some difficulty in doing so because the subject is complex and the matter of great seriousness and consequence. We wanted to be sure that we understood correctly every phrase he used. Regretfully this was not possible in listening to the minister whether in the official language with which I am familiar or through the translation system. Like the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), I think it would have been much more appropriate and much more generous if the minister had followed the practice established some years ago by previous governments and other cabinet ministers by making his statement available in advance to opposition members so that the same care and precision could be given to the responses as were given to the preparation of the minister's statement.

• (11:30 a.m.)

One thing the minister's statement proves is that perhaps the best policemen in this nation are not in the police forces but outside of it, those who are supplying information in the manner that the minister admitted has been followed in this and other cases. One point I tried to raise earlier in connection with this case is that by using young people as informers, whether they are of statutory age or not, and paying them for information the RCMP is participating in the seduction of these persons into a type of activity which places their lives in jeopardy. We all know the value which those in the underworld or on the fringe of the underworld place on the life of an informer, and the propriety of the RCMP engaging in an activity of this type warrants examination from the moral point of view.

Had it not been for the disclosures made by Mr. Eadie on television, this matter might never have come to light. I am not surprised, incidentally, that what he said was not considered to be factual and that the minister has had to refute him point by point because, as the minister knows, one cannot place a great deal of credence upon what a paid informer says; maybe the CBC did not pay him enough to tell the whole truth. In any event, had it not been for Mr. Eadie disclosing the fact that he had been a paid informer the minister and the government would never have been in the position of having to disclose what had taken place and would no doubt have continued to keep the subject matter secret and have denied the circumstances at every opportunity as the minister did on a previous occasion.

This brings us to the point I raised on an earlier occasion concerning the necessity of conducting a counterbalancing examination into practices of this sort. I can think of nobody more appropriate than the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, consisting, as it does, of representatives of all parties of the House all of whom are equally concerned about the security of the nation, the dangers of criminality and the position the RCMP occupies in the eyes of the public as an agency enforcing the law.

It might well be that if the minister took the step of referring this matter to the committee meetings would have to be held in camera. Naturally so. A lot of the information which the police have in their possession should not be divulged to the public, since part of the public is involved in the criminal world. I am sure nobody serving on the committee would object to such information being provided in camera. But it seems to me that for the RCMP itself, which took the initial steps to employ this informer and undoubtedly is still doing so, to carry out an examination of its own conduct and present it to the minister with the words, "this is what we have discovered about our own conduct", is really not fairly balanced regardless of how valuable we think the commissioner is, or anything of that sort. We need another kind of examination. I believe that the parliamentary committee, which I am sure has as much integrity contained within it as the minister, would be an appropriately balanced group to examine this matter and other types of conduct by the RCMP and maybe even by the minister's own secret force of which he is so proud.

* * *

[Translation]

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING FALSE FIRE ALARMS

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-267, to amend the Criminal Code (false alarm of fire—penalty).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to increase the penalty to be imposed on those who are found guilty of such an offence and, at the same time, to counteract the propensity some people have for ringing false alarms.

This bill will also have a psychological impact in that it will draw public attention on the seriousness of such a futile gesture as ringing false alarms. As a matter of fact, in the city of Montreal alone, more than 6,000 false alarms have been rung in the last year; this represents a very grave danger for both the firemen and the whole of the population.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

[English]

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—FURTHER IMMEDIATE MEASURES TO CREATE JOBS—ASSISTANCE TO OLD AGE PENSIONERS BECAUSE OF COST OF LIVING INCREASE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a question. In view of the fact that it is impossible for me to have any confidence in the judgment of the Minister of Finance or to regard the Minister of Manpower and Immigration as anything more than an apologist for the government—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Stanfield: —I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government itself is now convinced that further immediate measures are required to create jobs?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): The economic policy of the government is always under review and if it is considered necessary to make changes they will be announced.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of warnings for several months that unemployment was not declining as had been presupposed by the budget, and yesterday's figures having removed any doubt at all, I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the Prime Minister saw to it that there was a contingency plan to put into effect and, if so, when will that plan come into action?

Mr. Sharp: The government has been just as aware of the developing economic situation as the opposition and perhaps has access to more of the facts. I would not hesitate to say that the government is prepared to change its policy if such a course seems to be desirable, but there are no simple solutions. A simple solution such as cutting taxes in order to stimulate the economy is such a popular measure that we would have adopted it long since if it had been the easiest and most acceptable way of achieving appropriate results.

Mr. Stanfield: I take it it is plain the government has no such contingency plan. In light of the figures released yesterday with regard to the increase in the cost of living, would the minister not at least give an undertaking on behalf of the government that the escalation freeze of 2 per cent on the guaranteed income supplement for old age pensioners will be removed so that at least that amount of justice can be rendered to the older people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Since the July index of industrial production showed a decline, as well as the value of manufactured shipments, which in Ontario alone declined by 19.1 per cent in a period which preceded the application of the 10 per cent surtax by the United States, may I ask whether these circumstances would not motivate the government into trying to do something—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): —instead of just covering up?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

• (11:40 p.m.)

UNEMPLOYMENT—PRESENTATION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PROJECTIONS AND PROGRAMS AT CONFERENCE WITH PREMIERS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister. Has the government assured the premiers that at the forthcoming conference with the premiers the federal government will spell out, as requested by the provinces, the government's projections for unemployment this winter and next year? Further, will the government at the conference present specific programs to curb winter unemployment?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, just what will be on the agenda for this meeting is something that has to be decided by the Prime Ministers of the provinces and the federal government. I would certainly hesitate at this time to lay down an agenda; I am sure that my hon. friend would want the Prime Ministers of the provinces to have a say.

Mr. McGrath: When the matter was first discussed with the premiers was the question of an agenda for the conference discussed? If so, has there been a tentative agreement with the premiers on an agenda?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it is not customary to decide on an agenda until closer to the time of the meeting. There are many changes that are taking place and, as the hon. member is aware, some that have taken place since the meeting was planned.

[Translation]

OLD AGE SECURITY—LOWERING OF PENSIONABLE AGE TO PROMOTE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Acting Prime Minister.

As a policy establishing at 60 the eligibility for old age pension would increase by more than 50 per cent the unemployment rate, would the Acting Prime Minister say whether this government has considered bringing as soon as possible a measure to that effect?

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Joliette wish to put another supplementary?

Mr. La Salle: I am under the impression, Mr. Speaker, that the Acting Prime Minister has not understood my question, and since we are seeking a solution to unemployment, and since I believe that I have one, I should like to put my question once again.

Since I think that the payment of the old age pension at 60 could reduce unemployment by over 50 per cent, I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government has considered taking such a step?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT—FORMULATION OF SPECIFIC PROGRAMS TO ALLEVIATE PROBLEM IN CONJUNCTION WITH PROVINCES AND MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the significance of the figures indicated yesterday by the Prime Minister, and in view of the well known seasonal increase in unemployment in the winter months, can the Acting Prime Minister indicate if plans are presently being formulated for specific proposals and programs to work with the provinces and municipalities in order to alleviate very serious unemployment later this year?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a wide range of possibilities is under study, yes.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Regina East on a supplementary, and then the hon. member for Villeneuve, and return to supplementaries on this subject.

UNEMPLOYMENT—MEASURES TO LOWER INTEREST RATES ON LOANS TO STIMULATE DOMESTIC DEMAND FOR GOODS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the increase in the profits of Canada's chartered banks which has been brought on by the widening gap between interest rates on deposits and on loans, is the government considering any measures to lower interest rates on loans in order to stimulate domestic demand for goods?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there has been a very sharp reduction in interest rates in Canada. One proof of this is the lower interest rates that are now being paid on government savings bonds and other government instruments.

* * *

[Translation]

GRAIN

INTEREST RATE ON SALE OF WHEAT TO PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Mr. Oza Tétrault (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Can he tell us what interest rate the People's Republic of China will be charged on its recent purchase of 500,000 tons of wheat, since the terms of the sale provide that a 75 per cent balance will be payable over an 18-month period?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I was not able to understand all of the question.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member could perhaps ask his question again.

Mr. Tétrault: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Could the minister indicate what interest rate the People's Republic of China will be charged on the purchase of 500,000 tons of wheat, since the terms of the sale provide that a 75 per cent balance will be payable over an 18-month period?

[English]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the exact interest rate, the price and other commercial details relating to wheat transactions are not normally revealed by the board. I understand the Wheat Board refers to the interest rate as being, in this case, a competitive interest rate.

[Mr. Sharp.]

WITHHOLDING BY GOVERNMENT OF PAYMENTS UNDER TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES ACT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a question. In light of the statement made by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board during the emergency debate last night, will the Acting Prime Minister assure the House that the law of Canada will now be obeyed by the cabinet and carried out forthwith?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government of Canada, of course, observes the law.

An hon. Member: Then pay up.

Mr. Woolliams: I take it from the answer of the Acting Prime Minister that he will be directing the Minister of Finance and the minister in charge of the Wheat Board to make these payments forthwith in accordance with the terms of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I assume that the hon. member's supplementary question is in the form of a suggestion. May I say to hon. members that I hope we will not pursue this morning the debate that took place last night. I appreciate the importance of the matter. I believe there are a number of supplementaries on this point, but I would invite hon. members to keep in mind that we spent some time overnight on this subject. I believe the hon. member for Calgary North has a supplementary question.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I was not making any suggestion. Let me put my question again. The Acting Prime Minister said that the laws of Canada will be carried out. In view of the fact that the minister in charge of the Wheat Board said there would not be any payment made, I now ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government is directing that the payments in question under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act be made forthwith?

Mr. Sharp: This question, as you have said, Mr. Speaker, was discussed ad nauseam, I gather, last night, and the minister gave the answer of the government behind which I stand.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, may I—

Mr. Nesbitt: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. The hon. member for Oxford is seeking the floor on a question of privilege.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, in view of the admitted and continuing refusal by the government to carry out the law of Canada as passed by the Parliament of Canada, which action clearly affects the privileges of all hon. members of this House—I refer, of course, to the proceedings in the House last evening—it seems quite clear that a motion to test the views of the members of the House on this continued lawbreaking should be debated at once. Accordingly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith):

That the motion in the terms filed by the hon. member for Peace River be now put.

If Your Honour agrees that such a motion would be in order, I am sure the hon. member for Peace River would be happy to proceed with his motion which reads as follows:

That a special committee of five members, having the powers of a standing committee under Standing Order 65(8), be appointed to examine and inquire into the continuing refusal by the appropriate government ministers to pay, as required under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is seeking the floor on a question of privilege and suggests that there is a question of privilege which ought to be referred to a committee along the lines of a motion that is already on the order paper under the sponsorship of the hon. member for Peace River. That, of course, has given me an opportunity to determine whether the motion as posed by the hon. member for Peace River is truly a question of privilege or a privileged motion, which is what the hon. member for Oxford is seeking to move now in association, I assume, with the hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Nesbitt: No, Your Honour.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking the Chair to rule whether there is a prima facie case of privilege. I would remind the hon. member that normally under the Standing Orders of the House he should give the usual notice of a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair is entitled to be heard by the House without all this noise.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I assure hon. members that I am fully aware of all the circumstances of what is going on in the House at the present time. The suggestion is that the motion being made now is a motion of privilege. I am not prepared to entertain a lengthy debate on whether this is a question of privilege. It is the responsibility of the Chair to determine whether there is a prima facie of privilege. I am quite prepared to make my ruling on this point. The hon. member for Oxford seems to think that I have interrupted him. This is the last thing in the world I would wish to do and I will hear him further if he thinks he has other considerations to put forward for the guidance of the Chair.

• (11:50 p.m.)

Mr. Nesbitt: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I was reading the motion to refresh the memories of hon. members. Or at least of those who have not seen the motion of the hon. member for Peace River. I shall not continue because it is on today's order paper. Your Honour has brought up a point that perhaps I have not given adequate notice to the Chair in view of the fact that this is a question of privilege. I submit in this regard that my question of privilege arises out of the reply of the Acting Prime Minister to the hon. member for Calgary North during the House proceedings and I raised the point at the very moment and as quickly as I possibly could. It is my understanding of the rules—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I know that rule. The hon. member does not have to explain it to me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member, and I made this point a moment ago, that I appreciated it was not necessary to give the usual notice. I am telling the hon. member now that I appreciate that point. If he has additional submissions to make for the consideration of the Chair they ought not to be related to this point on which I am in perfect agreement with him.

Mr. Nesbitt: I am glad to hear that, Your Honour. I hope your Honour would give very careful consideration to this point. This matter has become one of great urgency. I feel that Your Honour should rule there is a prima facie case of privilege since the privileges of all members of this House are affected by what the minister in charge of the Wheat Board said last night and which is on the record. Surely hon. members should have an opportunity for the earliest possible debate to express their views on this whole matter. It would seem to me that Friday afternoon is a good opportunity to do this. Many members can be present this weekend. There is no great urgency in respect of the present business before the House that it could not wait for half a day.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I appreciate the points made by the hon. member. He is suggesting, of course, that there should be a further special debate on this matter which has been raised by other hon. members by way of questions and motions during the last week or so. As I said, I would find it very difficult to overlook the fact that there has been a lengthy debate. Perhaps some hon. members would not want me to take that into consideration, but I do not think I can do that. I have to take into account that, the matter having been raised by the hon. member for Calgary North, the hon. member for Vegreville, the hon. member for Regina East and others during previous days, after much consideration and a great deal of hesitation I thought that the matter was so important that it justified the application of Standing Order 26. It is because of that that I thought a special debate should be held. Of course I could have suggested yesterday that the debate not be held yesterday but take place this afternoon and this evening, as now suggested by the hon. member for Oxford. In any event it has already been held. As to whether there should be a further debate today, I would have to be satisfied that there is a prima facie case of privilege and before the matter would go before the House for consideration of a motion and for determination by the House as to whether there is a question of privilege. That is exactly the ruling I have to make at the present time.

The suggestion made by the hon. member for Oxford, and I am sure by other hon. members who support his point of view, is that there is a question of privilege. Hon. members will remember that the matter was brought to the attention of the Chair earlier on a question of privilege and which was considered at that time. The suggestion at that time was that the law was not being followed and that there was therefore, in all the circumstances which have been explained for the guidance of the Chair, a breach of parliamentary privilege. Again, after looking at the matter with all possible sympathy and as objectively as I could, I thought there was not a prima facie question of privilege.

Since the hon. member for Peace River put his motion on the order paper I have, of course, had to consider again whether the motion as drafted and placed on the order paper actually amounted to a privileged motion because, if that were so, it would have to be given priority. This was why I said to the hon. member for Oxford immediately at the outset of his remarks that the matter had to be considered because the decision in respect of a debate has to be made immediately.

The hon. member for Peace River gave notice of his motion the day before yesterday and I had to consider what place it should be given on the order paper. Again I spent a considerable amount of time reflecting on the matter and considering all its procedural aspects. The decision I reached at that point, which is obvious because of the priority given to the motion on the order paper, and which I am afraid I have to tell hon. members I have to stand by, was that there was not a prima facie case of privilege.

I could give citations, which I had to look into of course when a decision had to be made in connection with the motion of the hon. member for Peace River. I would think hon. members would want to refer them to the well known decision of Mr. Speaker Michener which is recorded at pages 581 to 586 of the Journals for Friday, June 19, 1959, and which I have quoted very often.

I am making strictly a procedural decision. Should this matter be debated again today but this time as a question of privilege? My suggestion to hon. members is that if there is to be further or continued debate on this very important matter, it should not be done under the guise or under the umbrella of a question of privilege. In the way in which the motion has been set down by the hon. member for Peace River it is essentially, as I see it, a non-confidence motion, a censure motion, if you will, which ought to be debated either as a formal substantive motion, on which the usual private member's notice has to be given, or as a supply motion which would require a vote of the House of Commons. I really do not see how the matter could come before the House at any time except in this way, unless by agreement among all members.

I respectfully suggest to hon. members that I have looked at the matter objectively and in a spirit of co-operation with hon. members on both sides of the House. This is evidenced, I think, by the fact that yesterday I agreed there should be a debate under Standing Order 26. But I do not think it would be procedurally correct to have a further debate under the Standing Order which provides for a privileged debate.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, we feel that the decision Your Honour gave yesterday in permitting the debate was a wise and proper one, but I think we are now in a different situation as a result of remarks made in that debate last night. Surely the purpose of an emergency debate on an issue so important and critical is to see what position is taken by hon. members. The rules do not permit a vote. Of course that is what the House has decided. However, as a result of statements made by the minister yesterday and repeated in effect by the Acting Prime Minister today a new situation has developed and we now know publicly by a declaration that the government intends to continue to refuse to obey the law.

An hon. Member: Right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Of course I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member for Peace River except perhaps for a moment. I should like to invite him to indicate what his point is. My thought is that the only question that is before the Chair now is whether there is a prima facie case of privilege. I have told all hon. members to the best of my ability and as clearly as I could—I know that is not always as clear as it might be—that I cannot honestly and fairly come to that conclusion. I have looked into the matter and, even if the hon. member says that a very serious situation has been indicated by statements made in this House, I was able to reach no other conclusion than that the matter should not be debated and considered by way of a question of privilege. I have indicated why I have reached that conclusion and made the ruling that there is no prima facie case of privilege. If the hon. member is trying to persuade the Chair there is a question of privilege, I do not think that would be in order. He may have other suggestions to make, perhaps on his own question of privilege or point of order, and I will hear him of course.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I was leading up to that because Your Honour was good enough to indicate that you had examined the terms of the motion I had filed. It is because of the situation which developed that I filed that motion. In my opinion, it is a motion of censure or a motion of impeachment. Your Honour may want to hear argument on that point later. I do not propose at this stage to become involved in a long and difficult argument. I filed the motion reserving to myself, as I thought, the right to advance argument to indicate that if this motion satisfied your Honour, then under the circumstances it should be debated as a substantive motion. I thought, after listening to what the hon. member for Oxford said, that he tried to reach that same objective by a different route. I simply say that I am reserving that right for a later stage. But I do say, if the House agrees, that in view of the continuance of this serious situation, not only in western Canada but all over the nation, involving the continuing refusal of the government to obey the law, I believe some opportunity should be given to test, by recorded vote, the views of members of the House.

• (Noon)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I fully appreciate the position as explained by the hon. member for Peace River, and I see that his approach is not the same as that taken by the hon. member for Oxford. Of course, the hon. member does not have to reserve the right to make that argument. He can always rise on a point of order to make an argument and he would be heard by the Chair, as he knows.

I think that, in the circumstances, there is no point in pursuing further the point raised by the hon. member for Oxford.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA—DENIAL OF PRIVILEGES TO REPRESENTATIVES OF CANADIAN NEWSPAPERS

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): My question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Would he explain to the House why Communist China denies to the representatives of Canadian Press and other Canadian news media the privileges extended to the Red Chinese press by Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): We have been making representations to the government of China both before and since we entered into diplomatic relations. I can assure the hon. member that we would like to have further representation of Canadian newspapers in Peking. But of course this is a decision that can only be made by the Chinese government.

Mr. McIntosh: Would the Acting Prime Minister be prepared to table the documents in this House so that the Canadian people can judge for themselves whether or not Red China has breached the agreement that was entered into by Canada and mainland China when recognition took place?

Mr. Sharp: There are no documents of this kind. The only exchange that took place between our two governments that was of a formal character was the announcement of the establishment of diplomatic relations.

* * *

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR PAYMENTS DUE UNDER TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES ACT

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): May I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact the special debate last night revealed that the government has no authority to refuse payments to the Wheat Board under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act for the benefit of farmers, will the government now issue instructions that these payments be made without delay?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I do not think I can add anything to what my colleague said last night in the debate. We do not consider that the government has breached the law.

Mr. Gleave: In view of this situation, is the government ready to take responsibility for all the consequences of its negative attitude toward western Canada?

* * *

[Translation]

MANPOWER

DISCUSSION WITH QUEBEC RESPECTING ADULT RETRAINING

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, even though we worked late into the night, I see the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is here and I should like to put a question to him.

In his letter to the Prime Minister of Canada, the Quebec premier, Mr. Bourassa, said, and I quote:

— the Quebec government would also like to inform you that, in its opinion, there would be great advantages to using the same approach in dealing with both manpower centres and adult vocational training.

In view of the circumstances, can the minister tell the House whether there has been an exchange of views or correspondence between the Quebec and Ottawa authorities on this subject?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The departments of the various provinces dealing with manpower, apprenticeship and training and the federal government are in fairly constant contact. In this particular case, we had special discussions over a period of time in regard to several issues, and these discussions may well occur again.

* * *

HOUSING

LAVAL, QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF LES ABEILLES PROJECT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is for the Minister of State in charge of housing. Would the minister make the necessary investigation and report to the House with regard to the fiasco that has arisen with regard to the project called Les Abeilles in Laval and ensure that his investigation be sufficiently deep to establish whether there has been culpable incompetence or downright dishonesty both within CMHC and by other persons involved?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): The financial difficulties of the developer have been made known to me and, as of just a few days ago, CMHC has been able to take possession of the homes in the project and to move beyond that to reassure those people who have purchased homes of the satisfactory completion of the homes. We have, in addition, extended the guarantee for the repurchase of the homes for a period up to 18 months past the date when we say these homes are in fact completed. The reaction from the people involved has been a reasonable one. In fact, I was told a couple of days ago that only seven of the purchasers may wish to take advantage of the repurchase guarantee that we have offered. Indeed, we set up offices there the other day and, in addition to dealing with people in the project now, we are having to deal with other people who are coming to ask us how they can buy homes in that project.

We are going beyond that to review the whole process leading to this difficulty that was encountered, and I will be very glad at some stage, if the evidence warrants it, to report the findings to the House.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Would the minister kindly advise the House if he intends to indicate to the House whether there was incompetence in this regard and how much additional money it is going to cost CMHC to bale out this project which has arisen out of a number of circumstances. If the solution is satisfactory, that is fine, but what is going to be the cost to get that solution?

Mr. Andras: I think I have indicated that when all these alleged facts are established as facts and not allegations, I will be glad to make them known to the House.

* * *

[Translation]

AIR CANADA

TROIS-RIVIÈRES—DISCONTINUANCE OF SERVICE

Mr. Claude-G. Lajoie (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Could he tell the House how far things have gone with regard to Air Canada's intention to discontinue its air service to Trois-Rivières?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, so far as I am aware Air Canada have made known their intention to the Canadian Transport Commission, the body which deals with all such applications, but I do not believe it has been disposed of yet.

* * *

WELFARE

INCREASED FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES TO MEET PAYMENT OF COSTS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister related to earlier questions on the economy. In light of the Prime Minister's comment yesterday that he is desirous of meeting with the provinces with a view to reviewing the Canada Assistance Plan and other programs, can we construe from that that the government is prepared, if methods can be found, to pour more money into the provinces to help offset the cost of those programs under their jurisdictions during the coming winter?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): If the levels of unemployment are higher than had been expected, with a resulting increase in relief, of course our expenditures will rise because we pay half of these costs.

Mr. Forrestall: My question was designed to ascertain from the Acting Prime Minister whether or not he would indicate if the government, in light of the Prime Minister's comment yesterday, is prepared to find methods of putting more money, not only the normal increases but additional funds, into the hands of the provinces?

• (12:10 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I could not give any such assurance. I am quite sure that the provinces will be urging the federal government to take up a greater share of these costs, but what the position of the federal government will be I could not say for certain. At the moment, we are not considering any change in the arrangements.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

INDIAN AFFAIRS

DENIAL OF PASSPORT TO ELMER HILL—STATUS AS CANADIAN CITIZEN

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the hon. gentleman aware that when Mr. Elmer Hill, a Mohawk Indian born near Deseronto, Ontario, sought to acquire a passport he was advised by telephone on two occasions by the passport office here in Ottawa that he would first have to become a Canadian citizen?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I will inquire into the situation and report, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Would he be prepared, if he has not done so already, to make a declaration that people of Indian origin, born in Canada, are Canadian citizens?

* * *

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR STUDIES ON EXPECTED PROBLEMS THIS WINTER

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister supplementary to that of my colleague a few moments ago. In view of the statement he made earlier in the question period that the government has access to more facts than the opposition and the general public about the economic affairs of Canada, can he indicate whether any special studies have been made regarding expected economic problems in Canada this winter, and whether we can expect any of these studies to be made public?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, there are studies under way continuously, and needless to say we are making a very special study of the kind of conditions that will prevail this winter. Whether these can be published, or whether it would be in the public interest to publish them, I am not quite sure. Certainly, however, the results would be revealed if the government decided to make any changes in its policies.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In light of the press conference that he held yesterday, can he indicate when he discovered that Canada has an expanding labour force, and how—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Moose Jaw.

* * *

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

DECISION ON POSSIBLE INCREASE IN TOLLS—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF CARR REPORT TO COMMITTEE

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the many submissions made to the minister in the past and of some that are being made at the present time opposing increased tolls on the St. Lawrence Seaway, can the minister say whether any decision has been made that increased tolls will be enacted before next spring?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker. The situation is as I have outlined to the House on several previous occasions. No decision has been made. Representations are still coming in. It is my intention to get as many representations as possible before considering the matter. In the interim, some talks are going on with the United States, as I believe is a matter of public knowledge, at the official level between the two Seaway authorities with a view to getting a better understanding of some of the findings of the Carr report, which in effect indicated that the U.S. portion of the cost is less than the value that the United States is getting out of the Seaway in relation to what Canada is getting out of the Seaway.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, would the minister give consideration to referring the Carr report to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications so that submissions can be made to that committee?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to give consideration to that, but it might be a more appropriate course for us to accumulate all of the submissions and then submit those as well as the report to the committee, perhaps at the time that the Seaway authority is being examined by the committee. I have no objection to the committee having a look at the whole picture.

* * *

HARBOURS

THUNDER BAY—ALLEGED INADEQUACY OF FACILITIES FOR SEAGOING VESSELS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of reports that facilities at Thunder Bay are not adequate for seagoing vessels and that there is a slow turn-around of vessels, will the minister investigate these allegations and report to the House or take steps to correct the situation?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Without going into details, I think it is fair to say that improvements are being made on a regular basis at Thunder Bay and other terminals. I would hope that those who are making representations with regard to increased costs on the Seaway, that is, users of the Seaway, and others who impose much higher charges than we do, would co-operate with us in trying to keep down the over-all cost of shipments on the Seaway.

[Translation]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FRANCOPHONE CULTURAL AND TECHNICAL CO-OPERATION AGENCY—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING QUEBEC

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Since a plenary session of the Agence de coopération culturelle et technique des pays francophones is scheduled for mid-October in Ottawa and Quebec City, and in view of the fact that according to an agreement reached in Niamey a year ago Quebec was considered as a participating country, could the Acting Prime minister advise the House whether Quebec's aspirations will be met during this conference? If not, could he inform the House as to the status of negotiations between the two governments?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there have been some discussions at the official level, and within the next few days I expect that my colleague, the Secretary of State, and myself will be having discussions with ministers of the Quebec government to determine the status of the Quebec delegation at the forthcoming meeting of the agency.

* * *

AIR CANADA

REQUEST FOR LOWER DOMESTIC FARES

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. On June 30 the minister told the House that he had conveyed to Air Canada the desire of the government that Air Canada put together a package of special rates for travel within Canada. Now that Air Canada has filed special rates for trans-Atlantic flights, can the minister tell the House if it has acceded to his request and if we can expect an announcement soon on domestic rates?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not at all certain whether a specific package of fares has been filed in terms of domestic routes. I do know, however, as I imagine the hon. member does, that a number of special excursion package fares within Canada have been announced. I will inquire whether any special package has been filed and pass on any information I get to the hon. member.

* * *

PACIFIC GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY

FEDERAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR SAFETY STANDARDS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Having in mind the number of accidents which in recent years have afflicted the Pacific Great Eastern Railway, now known as the British Columbia Railway, has the federal Department of Transport any connection with, influence over, or responsibility for the safety standards on that line?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. However, I fear I did not have sufficient time to get an answer to it. I would like to examine it from a legal point of view, because clearly the answer is not the type that should be given without getting all of the details first.

* * *

GRAIN

RAPESEED—STOP ORDER ON DELIVERY OF VARIETIES LOW IN ERUCIC ACID

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the stop order placed on the delivery of low erucic acid varieties of rapeseed, which quality was to have been a promotional feature for this seed, can the minister give any indication why this has occurred and when deliveries may be normalized?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The Wheat Board reacted to the request of the industry expressed by the Canadian Rapeseed Growers Association which indicated that excessive delivery of low erucic acid rapeseed at the early stage of the year, compared with the later stages of the year, might cause difficulties in the use of that seed in the preparation of oil of uneven quality over the year and that it would be much more satisfactory if the flow of the low erucic acid type were more steady. As a result the board temporarily lowered the quota on that particular kind of rapeseed although, as I understand it, they have no difficulty in assuring that eventually during the crop year the quota will permit the taking of the whole crop of low erucic rapeseed.

* * *

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

EFFECT OF UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX—EXTENSION OF CREDIT TO SMALL BUSINESSES AND FARMERS AFFECTED

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of reports that the United States import surtax is not to be lifted so far as Canada is concerned, is the government considering urging Canadian financial institutions to extend credit to firms which are affected by this surcharge and, in particular, to extend credit to small businesses and farmers?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I thank the hon. gentleman for the suggestion, Mr. Speaker. I think it is a reasonable one, and it is an approach that we would certainly encourage.

[Mr. Mather.]

• (12:20 p.m.)

OIL

PROPOSED TAPS TANKER ROUTE—REPLY BY UNITED STATES TO CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question concerning his letter to the Secretary of State of the United States, with which he enclosed a copy of the report of the Special Committee on the environment. Could the minister indicate if he has had a reply from his American counterpart? Could he give the nature of that reply and, considering the very urgent situation, would he not obtain permission to table it?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there has been no reply. I have followed up the communications I have had with the Secretary of State and he has assured me that our recommendations, particularly in relation to the Strait of Juan de Fuca and so on, are under study. Of course, no decision has yet been made because no decision has been made even about the TAPS line itself. As I say, I do not think there is anything more I can add. There are no other documents.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the House might allow the hon. member for Fraser Valley West to ask a supplementary to the previous question. We reached the end of the question period a while ago but I thought the House would want the Chair to prolong the agony for a few minutes because of the time spent on a very interesting point of order. Having said that, I should like to recognize the hon. member for Fraser Valley West on a supplementary question.

* * *

FRUIT

REQUEST BY BRITISH COLUMBIA GROWERS FOR EXPORT ASSISTANCE—LEGISLATION TO PROTECT AGAINST DUMPING OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): I wonder if I could direct my agony in the form of a supplementary question. It is related to one asked a moment ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or someone who might reply for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the difficulties faced by the Canadian apple industry as a result of the U.S. surcharge and also a poor apple crop this year, has the government made a decision yet on the request by the British Columbia tree fruit growers for $66,000 in export assistance similar to that contemplated for industries in Bill C-262?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to look into it if I am the one who is supposed to do so. As the hon. member knows, any processing of apples will be covered by the bill which is presently in committee. I shall look at other aspects of the question and answer as soon as I can.

Mr. Rose: I wonder if I could impose on your good nature to ask one more supplementary, Mr. Speaker. As Canadian agricultural marketing is constantly being threatened by dumped imports or foreign offers at distress prices, is the government preparing some protective legislation that can be applied instantly to protect Canadian producers of agricultural products?

Mr. Pepin: We have persistently protested this when done by other countries, so it is sometimes difficult for Canada to do the same thing. I will look more closely into the positive aspects of the matter.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Thursday, September 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray (for Mr. Benson) that Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequent upon the amendments to that act, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West) (p. 7763).

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I should say at the outset, Mr. Speaker, that it had been my intention to move the adjournment of the debate because of the failure of the government to implement the provisions of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, as well as the attitude taken by the government during last night's emergency debate and the attitude expressed by the government in the House today through the Acting Prime Minister. However, since Your Honour has indicated that you still have under advisement the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) with respect to the substance of the motion and the priority of the motion, I shall refrain from doing so at this time, notwithstanding the fact that I feel we should not be proceeding with the normal business of the House until this matter has been resolved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: In opening my remarks yesterday, I discussed the bill before the House in the context of the present economic situation in the country, emphasized and underlined by the statistics released yesterday by Statistics Canada with respect to unemployment and the rising cost of living. I said then, Mr. Speaker, that the bill was being discussed in an air of fantasy because the bill will not act as one of the important economic catalysts that it should be in this very critical period of high unemployment, rising inflation and the failure of present government policies to cope with those two facts.

The present policies of the government have failed to cure inflation. This fact is compounded by the increasing rate in unemployment—record unemployment.

Mr. Mahoney: Record employment, too.

Mr. McGrath: Half a million Canadians were unemployed in the month of August.

Mr. Mahoney: But 8½ million employed.

Mr. McGrath: This might not be a serious matter for the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney), but I can tell the hon. parliamentary secretary that it is a very serious matter in other parts of Canada. We had half a million Canadians unemployed during the peak month of August. What can we expect in the months of January, February, March? One shudders to think of a million people in this country without jobs.

I realize that this matter might not be very important to hon. members opposite, Mr. Speaker, and I suggest that if they have no interest in it they should at least leave the House.

An hon. Member: They will.

Mr. McGrath: One need not be an economist to think of what a million Canadians out of work will mean in terms of lost production, increasing welfare and the general economic contraction which will inevitably result. By deliberately operating the economy at less than its potential, the government is creating a substantial loss to Canada of millions of dollars a week in output and the result is a high level of unemployment.

Even yet, the full effect of the Nixon policies has to be felt. I am now talking about unemployment and inflation in this country prior to the Nixon 10 per cent import surcharge levelled on all imports by the United States government. And the unemployment rate continues to rise. Not only is it continuing to rise, but unfortunately it will escalate and worsen as a consequence of the Nixon policies.

It just does not make sense, Mr. Speaker, that we should be giving priority to a tax bill which does nothing to promote and improve the economy; which does nothing to create jobs for Canadians, which is the main issue and should be the main issue in this country today. The government must, as a priority, take urgent and immediate steps to prepare for the critically high winter unemployment which we know is coming. Even the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is now prepared to concede that fact.

Rather than occupying ourselves at the present time with a tax bill which deceptively presents itself as tax reform, the government should be moving ahead bringing into this Parliament a crash program to curb the rising unemployment—a program that will create jobs for Canadians, especially during the critical months of the winter when unemployment in this country will exceed one million at the present rate. My leader in his speech referred to the Opportunities for Youth program as a kind of summer works project. I will go one step further and suggest that we continue this kind of thinking or this kind of program under the general auspices of a winter works program, be it an opportunities for elders, an opportunities for youth or an opportunities for Canadians program. This is the type of worth-while project, worth-while thinking, that the government should be concerned about at present.

• (12:30 p.m.)

One provision in the bill before the House is worthy of immediate attention. It is one on which steps should be taken immediately. I am speaking of the provision in the bill that would remove low level income Canadians from the tax rolls. That should be done this year and immediately, and not next year as anticipated by the legislation now before the House.

The official opposition has put forward in this House positive and definite proposals which would result in immediate action to stimulate the economy and fight the serious unemployment situation that hangs over this country like an omnimous, dark cloud. These proposals, enunciated by my leader, include the reduction of personal income taxes on a sliding scale, with the greatest reduction for Canadians in low and middle income brackets. These reductions should be implemented immediately, not next year. Our proposals include the elimination of the federal sales tax on building materials. That step should be taken now. That step would, at least, have the effect of providing jobs in the house construction industry. A consequential benefit would be that Canadians would be provided with additional, badly needed housing.

The government has admitted that $80 million will have to be drained from government revenues to soften the blow of the Nixon economic measures. That loss of funds means there will be a substantial cut in some of the funds available for housing. We should negotiate immediately with the provinces at a dominion-provincial conference, which should be called right away, in order that direct assistance to provinces and municipalities during the winter months may be made available under the Canada Assistance Plan. That would enable the provinces and municipalities to cope with increasing welfare costs and would provide them with more funds. Also, Mr. Speaker, we should re-introduce immediately a winter works program. If the government wants a vehicle for this winter works program, I suggest that it may be possible to use the Canada Assistance Plan as such a vehicle. Such a federal-provincial conference should have, as its first priority, the co-ordination of such a crash works program. The conference should be called now. It should be structured immediately. What we are looking for is a real winter works program that will produce jobs; we do not want a government snow job. We must provide such a program, because it is necessary and because the need for it is increasing. In addition, there should be a full employment budget. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) should introduce a new, full employment budget in this House.

The figures relating to unemployment deserve examination. I am glad that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) agrees that they deserve study. I know that the statistics on unemployment and on the cost of living have been repeated in this House several times during the past 24 hours, but they ought to be repeated, again, again and again until the government gets the message and until it realizes that it must act.

The unemployment rate, seasonally adjusted for Canada in August this year, stood at 6.5 per cent. That was the national rate and represented an increase over the previous month. In the Atlantic provinces, traditionally an area of chronically high unemployment, the unemployment rate stands at 9.4 per cent. That means that 9.4 per cent of the work force in the Atlantic provinces is unemployed. This represents a total in the four provinces of 47,000 people who are looking for jobs. I am talking about August; I am not talking about last spring, last winter or next fall. In my province, Newfoundland, the situation is critical. I am sorry that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) is not present in the House, because he has a great responsibility in this matter. The situation in Newfoundland is nothing short of critical and I hope the Minister of Transport will have something to say about it. We are talking about the month of August, the peak month of the year, the month when employment should be at full tilt, when the construction industry is operating at its peak and when the primary industries are at their peak. Yet, for the month of August the figure for the province of Newfoundland, unadjusted, is 8.7 per cent. So, 8.7 per cent of the work force, or 14,000 people, in my province alone are looking for work.

When one considers that these figures do not include people attending manpower retraining programs, people in vocational training schools and people attending summer schools and summer university courses, one can predict accurately that the actual rate of unemployment in Newfoundland for the month of August will be found to have been in excess of 10 per cent. Surely, it follows that if 10 per cent of the work force in that province was unemployed in August, one can predict that anticipated figures for the month of January will be nothing short of disastrous. They will reach depression proportions. I think economists say that when your unemployment rate exceeds 25 per cent, you are in a depression.

Across the country there are some areas of improvement. There are few such areas, unfortunately. The general picture remains critical, so critical, Mr. Speaker, that it dictates that this government take immediate steps to start implementing the suggestions made in this House by my leader, by members of my party, by members of other parties and by myself.

To me, one of the most disturbing aspects of the unemployment figures is the continued high rate of unemployment for young people between the ages of 14 and 24. The figure has increased by 23,000 over that for one year ago for people in that age group. Today, in Canada, there are 240,000 young people who are able to work and yet who are denied the opportunity to do so. What kind of Canada are we providing for them; what kind of outlook are we giving them and what future do they have? In my view this is a criminal state of affairs.

The report of the Committee on Youth, commissioned by the Secretary of State's department, reads in part:

> Both regionally and nationally the problems of youth have much the same chronic element usually associated with older workers. The trends repeated among the older youth groups as well suggest that high unemployment is a continuing problem of the young and also that their relative unemployment position has deteriorated further in the 1960's. This deterioration will continue. The tragedy of this statistical problem is that it becomes aggravated when national unemployment rises thus greatly understating the true magnitude of youth unemployment and the number of new jobs necessary to alleviate the problem.

I might add, Mr. Speaker, that as of April, this year, unemployment for teenage males stood at 2 5 times the national average and the unemployment rate for teenage females stood at a postwar high of 1.5 times the national average. It is fair to suggest that the young people of this country will turn this government off, and quite rightly so.

I ask, who has to bear the brunt of the government's ill conceived and outmoded concepts of economic policy. The young people, to speak of one group, have to bear the brunt. The regionally disadvantaged areas of the country have to bear the greatest burden. Those areas of the country cannot hope to gain from the government's regional development programs for some time if the government pursues its present course. That has been suggested by all the leading economists of the country. It has been placed on the record.

• (12:40 p.m.)

It is a fact and not a theory that for the disadvantaged regions of this country to be able to benefit both in the short and long term from the government's regional development policy, the regional development policy must work within a general government policy of full employment. Otherwise, one effectively cancels out the other. You cannot have one without the other.

This bill must be evaluated by asking if it moves the Canadian economy towards economic prosperity. What does it do for the Canadian economy at this critical point in our history? If it does not, and I suggest it does not, then the House should be more properly concerned with immediate and urgent crash programs to meet the serious situation in the country now and the serious situation that will flow from it in the months ahead. Unemployment in this country will reach disastrously high proportions.

This bill dictates to a degree Canada's economic climate. It must if it is to be what the government says. Economic prosperity in the sense of full employment is mandatory if regional economic expansion programs are to achieve their real potential. This government has been following a totally contradictory course with policies that are working at cross-purposes with the government's regional program. On the one hand, the government tries to solve economic disparity and, on the other, places a damper on the economy which will lead us to the darkest economic winter we have faced in many years. Full employment in Canada must be our immediate goal. It must be supported by a full employment budget.

The Economic Council of Canada defines full employment at 3.8 per cent; in other words, a national figure of 3.8 per cent unemployment. If you have 3.8 per cent unemployment, this means that in the province of Ontario, the industrial heartland of the country, you will have a rate of unemployment somewhere between 2½ and 3 per cent. In an area like the Atlantic provinces, you aim for a realistic rate of about 5 per cent, certainly not more than 6 per cent.

At the present time, the rate of unemployment in the province of Ontario for the month of August stands at a whopping 5 per cent, up over the previous month of July. What chance do we in the Atlantic provinces have if unemployment in Canada's industrial heartland is increasing at a time when it should be rapidly declining? What chance do we in the Atlantic provinces have if the unemployment rate in the province of Ontario stands at 5 per cent during the month of August? The consequence of that 5 per cent rate of unemployment in the province of Ontario for the month of August is that in the Atlantic provinces we have almost 10 per cent unemployment. That is a fact. The DBS figure for the Atlantic provinces is 9.4 per cent.

We have inflation because we have a double jeopardy here. We have rising unemployment and rising inflation. You cannot discuss one crisis without the other because they are both critical. What happens when we have high inflation? It takes its highest toll in the low income regions of the country which did not contribute to it in the first place. Inflation means real human suffering when we consider a shrinking dollar in an area of traditionally low employment and high unemployment in an area of high prices, an area plagued by transportation problems and geographical disadvantages. This government does not seem to appreciate or grasp the real suffering.

My own city of St. John's has a number of dubious distinctions. Hon. members can appreciate what this means there. That city has the highest per capita cost of living in the country and the lowest per capita income in the country. Couple this with the high rate of unemployment and you will realize what this means in terms of real human suffering. It means the difference between having beans on the table or not having beans on the table. Meat is out of the question. The present figures on the cost of living index released yesterday by Statistics Canada surely provide dramatic proof, if it is needed, that the government's policies to curb inflation have not worked. Not only do we have continuing, spiralling, runaway inflation, but we have spiralling unemployment at the same time.

Surely, the government must admit its mistake and proceed at once with a crash program to get Canadians back to work. It is as simple as that. If we did not have the present rate of inflation which, based on the July-August figures, represent an annual increase of 8.4 per cent and if we did not have the present rate of unemployment which, based on the August figures, stands at 6.5 per cent, perhaps we would have been able to weather the consequences of the present United States policy. If our economy had been in a healthy position, it would not have been necessary for us to have gone with our cap in hand to Washington plaintively begging for special consideration. The fact is that our economy has been weakened by the outmoded policies of this government.

Inflationary increases in costs are very serious. Everyone admits that. They are a very serious threat to our economy and can seriously cripple our economy. The government's obsession with their own blinker type strategy to fight inflation has deprived the economy of the vigour and vitality which could have been of so much value in helping us face up to the economic realities in the world today and the situation which we are in as a consequence of the present United States policy. As for inflation, this government has failed where it should have succeeded. As for unemployment, it succeeded where we all wish to God it had failed.

Another example of the economic brinkmanship in which this government seems to revel is the unpegging of the Canadian dollar and what that means to certain areas of the economy. In freeing the exchange rate and boosting the cost of our exports, this government has directly contributed to further unemployment. It certainly contributed to unemployment in my part of the country which, to a large extent, is dependent on exports of raw materials to the United States. The government seems committed to adding one adverse economic policy to another. The sum total is a chain reaction which perpetuates and worsens the critical unemployment picture. The country has to suffer the consequences of these ill-conceived policies and nothing short of a drastic and immediate change in those policies will do anything to cure the situation. The story of this government has been a story of rising unemployment and increasing prices. This has been the hallmark of the government since it took office. It is a sad story, a story of unfulfilled expectations. In the midst of all this we are presented with a bill which would deceive the Canadian people, a measure presented as a tax reform package, which it is not. If it were passed, it would do little to strengthen the economy. The Economic Council indicates that the Canadian economy would have to grow at the rate of 5½ per cent per year even to prevent existing unemployment from worsening. With the tight rein the government has been holding on the country in its effort to combat inflation, unemployment was bound to increase.

• (12:50 p.m.)

In July of this year we witnessed the commencement of a government advertising program designed to pass the buck psychologically. "Canada's economic future is very much in your hands; our economy depends on the private sector to create new wealth and employment". This is how one advertisement read. One economist wrote about this campaign:

> The campaign would be comical if it were not so insidious, if it were not for this government's unadmirable tendency to solve hard-core economic and social problems with public relations dazzle.

Another advertisement read: "People are still the most important resource we have". I find this difficult to believe. I do not think the government is really convinced of it. The Prime Minister tells us we have to live with unemployment and describes the miseries of unemployment as an unfortunate side effect which cannot be avoided. The Prime Minister does not know what it means to be unemployed. Too few members of this House know what it means to be unemployed, the demoralizing effect on a human being, the wasted days, the impotence which is felt as this situation continues day after day.

An unemployed man finds himself surrounded by an affluent society which, through the medium of high-pressure advertising, would force down his throat messages about all the wonderful consumer goods he could enjoy—colour television and everything else. He cannot afford them, even on the never-never plan, because he is unemployed. Because he is unemployed he has no money, so he is frustrated. Society cannot find a place for him except as one of its wards and that is ultimately what he becomes. If he cannot find work he must fall back on the state. If he is fortunate enough to qualify for unemployment benefit at least he is able to maintain something of his dignity. Otherwise, all too often, he has to swallow his pride and go on welfare.

Does the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) know what this means? I do not think he does. I do not think anybody in this House really knows what it means. It is one of the real tragedies today that in this blessed land of abundance we should deny the right to work to so many of our people. One has to be with them to come even close to understanding what it is all about. Oh yes, it is most appropriate that we should be talking about eliminating the middle or, more particularly, the low-income people from the tax rolls. We should be doing this now, not making provision for it to be done next year. It should be done right now as a crash program because this is essential if we are to make a dent in the unemployment figures and get the economy moving. I find it difficult to understand parts of the bill before the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired unless he gets unanimous consent to continue. Does the House give unanimous consent to the hon. member to continue his remarks?

An hon. Member: Will his leader come back?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): There cannot be any condition. I will ask the question again. Does the House give unanimous consent to the hon. member to continue his remarks?

Mr. Francis: With great pleasure.

Mr. McGrath: The clock will probably accomplish what some people would like to accomplish. The bill before the House is deceptive in that it does not accomplish what it proposes to do. More particularly, it does nothing to help overcome the critical situation we find in this country today as a consequence of the policies pursued by the government, and unless there is an immediate change in the philosophy of the government then the people of Canada are in for a dark, critical winter.

Mr. Gilbert: May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, this tax measure, Bill C-259, is a sad ending to nine years of intensive and exhaustive study to build a tax framework in Canada which would bring about justice, equity and economic growth for all Canadians. The bill is a clear indication of the government's rejection of the Carter report and a cave-in by the government to the business community. It is striking to me that less than 10 per cent of Canadians can dominate the other 90 per cent through their wealth and power.

Back in 1962, when the Conservative government passed an order in council appointing Kenneth Carter to look into the tax framework of Canada, it gave him specific instructions that, among other questions, he should report upon the distribution of the burdens among taxpayers resulting from existing rates, exemptions, relief and allowances provided by the personal and corporation income taxes, and secondly, the effects of the tax system on employment, living standards, savings and investment, industrial productivity, and economic stability and growth.

After spending almost three years and $3.5 million on that study, Mr. Carter reported in 1965, and I should like to summarize some of his main findings. Mr. Carter found, first, that the present taxation system does not afford fair taxation for all Canadians; second, that the present tax structure has led to Canadians being less well off through lack of goods and services that could be provided through more efficient use of labour, capital and natural resources; third, that compliance and collection costs have been needlessly raised by duplication in provincial and federal administrations and that federal tax administration is open to political influence; fourth, that the fiscal situation has not been used as effectively as it could be to maintain full employment, contain inflation and encourage Canadian ownership of Canadian industries; and fifth, that Canadian federal procedures to obtain and analyse new ideas about tax increases or for hearing the views of taxpayers are inadequate.

He summed up his report by saying that the commissioners were fully aware that their conclusions constituted severe criticisms of the present tax system, that they were not arrived at lightly nor the result of preconceived opinions. Whenever conflicts arose in their proposals they were reconciled in favour of equity. They were convinced that preserving and developing the system by scrupulously fair taxes must override all other objectives. In that report, not only was that recommendation made, but he categorized some of the special privileges which are afforded to the resource industries in our country, the insurance and finance companies, land speculators, and the free-loaders who play the stock market.

What did Mr. Carter recommend as a result of his exhaustive study? He said that two basic principles should operate in our tax structure. One is that there should be a fair distribution of the tax burden based on ability to pay and, secondly, that all income should be taxable. When he said that income should be taxable, he had in mind the income derived from stock options, gifts, income of all kinds whether it be strike pay, unemployment insurance, compensation, sickness and group life insurance, tax credits and consumer dividends, tax free allowances, profit sharing, gambling gains, bonuses, premiums paid by employers for employees under medical insurance schemes, non-cash benefits provided by employers and death benefits, because in the past these areas of income have avoided the full tax power.

• (2:10 p.m.)

He suggested, too, that there should be a redistribution of the tax burden so that wealthy individuals and companies would pay their fair share and that this would result in $523 million more in corporation taxes to the federal government in one year, $271 of which would come from foreign investors. He also recommended there should be generous tax credits for post secondary education; that there should be capital gains appended to income and property with an exemption of $25,000 in respect to an owner's home which was occupied; that there should be top limits on travelling and entertaining expenses; that there should be tax credits for children which would be substituted for present tax exemptions; that there should be—and this is very important—an integration of personal income taxes; that the efficiency concessions for industry should be abolished and that mining companies should only claim for exploration development concessions at accelerated rates.

This was a bold, courageous document set forth by a man who had given his life to the study of the tax structure in Canada. What did we find as a result of the Carter Report? We found an effective campaign against the report. There are some people who today still call Mr. Carter a socialist. This is far from the truth. We have some people who claim that the development of this country would be inhibited by the implementation of the Carter report and that personal initiative would be restricted. That criticism comes from less than 5 per cent of the communities. From the time I came down here in 1965 we were deluged with reports, not from ordinary folk but from the main sector of the business community concerning the disastrous effects which might occur if the Carter recommendations were put into effect. The Liberal party, having a close ear to the public and a far closer ear to the business community, set out to castrate the Carter Commission recommendations. They brought forth what is known as a white paper for purposes of discussion and played with that for some time before they came forth with a budget and tax changes in June of this year.

I recall quite clearly the month of June when the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) brought in his budget. I recall the reaction of the Liberal members. They were just as cocky as peacocks and quite boastfully said that they were prepared to fight an election at any time on these proposals. The Minister of Finance, in his Buddha-like performance, expanded himself and said that this is an expansionary budget which will create growth and full employment. That was in the month of June. Now, in the month of September we find a different picture. We find that the picture is somewhat shaded. We find that the cockiness is replaced by cautiousness and quietness. We find the smile off the face of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) as a result of the surtax imposed by his so-called friend, President Nixon, to the south. Everybody here remembers the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, as being a strong integrationist, feeling that it was necessary to integrate the industry of Canada with that of our neighbour to the south. He rather smiled and gloated at the apparent success which was being achieved, but when the great master to the south came down with his heavy hand it made the minister realize just what a friend we had in time of need.

After going down to Washington with cap in hand and on bended knee—

Mr. Pepin: I never wear a cap.

Mr. Gilbert: —he now realizes the disastrous mistake he made in making Canada dependent on the United States in respect of exports. I recall the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) exhorting him on many occasions about the necessity to diversify and scatter our export programs so that we would not be caught in this terrible position. When the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce heard the report in respect of unemployment yesterday, and the rise in inflation, he must have realized that he and some of the other integrationists on that front bench made a serious mistake in giving direction to the Canadian economy. I would hope he would see the light and take steps to meet the unemployment and export problems we face.

Bill C-259 is a classic example of the legal maxim problems we face, that equity varies with the length of the chancellor's foot. The maxim has now been changed to equity varies with the closeness of friendship to the Liberal party. Who are the friends of the Liberal party? Are they the old age pensioners?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No.

Mr. Gilbert: The answer is no. The Exemption of $650 for individuals aged 65 and over, replacing the exemption of $500 at age 70, does not begin to catch up with the increase in the cost of living. A short while ago the Economic Council of Canada indicated that a single person requires a minimum of $1,900 a year to meet the essential needs of the day. What has this generous government done with regard to old age pensioners? The very maximum of the old age security pension and the guaranteed income supplement amounts to $1,620 for a single person. According to the Economic Council of Canada a married couple requires $3,200 a year and yet these people are being given $3,060 to meet the essential needs of the day.

This must be small comfort to people who have given their lives to build this country. I just heard a slight groan from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I wish he had been with me on Monday of this week when I attended at the home of an old age pensioner who had written to me asking if anything could be done in respect of rent control. I had the sad duty of telling her that rent control came under provincial jurisdiction rather than under federal jurisdiction. She pointed out that a few years ago she had rented a modest apartment for $78 a month, that this rent had been increased to $95 a month and that now it is $135 a month. I am sure the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce does not feel at all happy about imposing such a hardship on a person who has given her life and strength to build a better Canada. Are the working people the friends of the Liberal party?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No.

Mr. Gilbert: The answer is no. The basic exemption which increased from $1,000 to $1,500 for a single person and from $2,000 to $2,850 for a married couple does not begin to meet the demands of the day. On many occasions we have said that the exemption should now be $2,500 for a single person and $5,000 for a married couple. If these people had these exemptions maybe they would be able to get by. I think it is time the government realized just what it means for the average working couple to meet the requirements per day.

• (2:20 p.m.)

The employment expenses to workers at 3 per cent of employment up to $150 a year are just a government ploy to distract the workers from realizing the extent of the deductions given businessmen, their business expenses, dividend credits and other tax allowances on gifts and estates. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that the best experience that the Minister of Finance and probably the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce could have had would have been to try to live on $30 a week which, the Minister of Finance boastfully stated, a single person could do. Then, they would realize that 20 per cent of all Canadians are experiencing desperation living, and at least 60 per cent of all Canadians are experiencing what is known as minimum living, merely getting by. I am sure the workers will realize that the meagre deductions that have been given to them in the form of the increase in tax exemptions and the abolition of the 3 per cent surcharge will have little effect, since some of them will have to pay income tax on employment insurance benefits, medical premiums paid by employers, and retraining allowances. The effect will be nil.

May I ask you, who are the real friends of the Liberal party? They are the businessmen who enjoy the tax benefits from capital gains, dividend income, the mining and petroleum income allowances. These are the real friends of the Liberal party. Let me give you an example. When a person pays tax on capital gain based on 50 per cent of that taxable capital gain at his own personal rate, it amounts to dividing the incomes of all Canadians into two classes; first, the income that people derive from labour and enterprise and, second, the income that people derive from capital gains. Let me give you a striking example, Mr. Speaker. If a worker has a taxable income of $3,000 from his job, he pays at the rate of 26 per cent. Yet, if a person has a taxable income of $3,000 which has been gained from a capital gain windfall, he pays half that amount or 13 per cent. This is neither right nor just.

With regard to the resource industries, there is little reform in the taxation of resources. Elimination of the 3 per cent tax exemptions on mining profits by 1974 will probably reduce the incentive to high-grade mining; in other words, mining by companies of richest ore to increase their highest profits for the first three non-taxable years. The inclusion of capital facilities, exploration and development costs as depreciable items, thereby allowing companies to deduct $4 from profits for every $3 spent, would leave these companies virtually in the same privileged position as they have experienced for the past 10 to 15 years. I recall vividly the dramatic example that the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) gave with regard to Elliot Mines. The uranium companies moved into Elliot Lake, raped the resources there in a very short time, paid little or no tax, created a community where many people bought homes, many of them through CMHC financing, and then picked up their profits and marched away leaving people in the community with no resource to develop and having large mortgages to meet. This is the tragedy of many of the mining companies that operate in Canada.

If we are going to give special consideration to the mining companies, it will not be long before the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance will hear cries from the pulp and paper companies asking for the same privilege that the mining companies enjoy.

I read a striking article in the Star a short while ago setting forth who receives the big government handouts. This was reported in the Toronto Daily Star. It reads:

> Three hundred million dollars a year is what it costs the Canadian taxpayer to subsidize, the mining, oil and gas industry, according to a survey reported in the Toronto Daily Star.

This subsidy has doubled in seven years since 1964 when it was $150 million.

The survey also shows that the money excused in federal taxes is in effect diverted to an industry which employs less than 10 per cent of the working population, and is predominantly owned by U.S. and other foreign investors.

The best—or worst—lobbyists for these subsidized industries are the provinces, especially Quebec, "eager for the economic growth and jobs they believe the resource industries bring".

Large corporations would pay a 50 per cent tax if they paid on all their net income, but in practice most companies get tax relief through depreciation and other allowances.

The mining, oil and gas industries get extra allowances.

In 1968, "42 companies which own metal mines reported a profit of $497 million on which they paid federal and provincial taxes of $45.4 million, or slightly more than 9 per cent".

The 145 companies in mineral fuel operations—mainly oil and gas wells—reported a profit of $340 million on which they paid federal and provincial taxes of only $40 million or 12 per cent.

The hardpressed printing and publishing industry paid federal and provincial taxes of $53 million, or 41 per cent, on net profits of $128 million.

The even harder pressed textiles and mill companies paid taxes of $37.7 million, or 47 per cent on profits of $79 million.

When it comes to the high taxes that the textile companies pay, surely the Minister of Industry, Trade and comedy—I mean Commerce—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You were right the first time.

Mr. Gilbert: —should take up the cudgels for the textile industry. But no, he sits like a silent sphinx, smiles and does nothing. I think that if smiling could create jobs and lower taxes, all one would have to do would be to appoint the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to be our next minister of finance because certainly he brings to his position nothing more, nothing less than a big smile.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gilbert: What about the people who derive large dividend incomes? What about those people who receive these dividend income cheques? Just how does the Liberal Party treat them? No questions are put as to the source from which the money is derived. Was it earned or was it inherited? No, all they want to do is to increase that tax dividend credit from 20 per cent to 33 per cent. I am sure that those people who receive a dividend income are laughing all the way to the bank.

Have you ever seen the boardroom watchers in a stock-market office? These are the Jim Dandy's of society who appear at these brokerage offices at about 10.30 in the morning. They are dressed as though they had just stepped out of Esquire. From 10.30 until three o'clock in the afternoon they stand watching the board, gambling on the stocks. They use all the jargon—"The market is slightly off today; there is a slight dip; the Dow Jones isn't up today." These are the trademarks of these contributors to the community who sit in stockbrokers offices all day until three o'clock in the afternoon. And then they say, "Isn't it terrible that the workers don't work? Isn't terrible that the welfare people get such large amounts?" It is to these people that the Liberal party says, "We will give you a tax dividend credit which will increase from 20 per cent to 33 1/3 per cent."

• (2:30 p.m.)

What about the elimination of estate and gift taxes? Surely, their abolition will further stratify the Canadian people into an economic caste system. Many of us shrink and cringe when we think of the caste system in India, but surely we have the same system in Canada. When one reads "The Vertical Mosaic" one gets the full impact of the economic caste system in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Hon. members should allow the hon. member who has the floor to complete his remarks. It is very difficult for the Chair to hear the detailed remarks of the hon. member.

Mr. Gilbert: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The question just crossed my mind while I was waiting for the pleasant boys on the other side to stop applauding: does the ever-smiling and happy Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce believe in the elimination of estate and gift taxes? I am sure he would have difficulty answering that question because, after all is said and done, he is a man of compassion, a man of kindness. I wonder if he really believes philosophically in the elimination of estate and gift taxes, and the impact this will have on the further stratification of Canadians in an economic caste system. What does he think about allowing a millionaire to pass on his money to a son, with the people of Canada having to pay the son interest on that money, and with the son not having to pay any taxes? I just cannot believe that the compassionate Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce would consent to that type of legislation. The government has reversed—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) knows that he can ask a question only if the hon. member who has the floor gives him leave to do so.

[English]

Does the hon. member for Broadview accept a question from the minister?

Mr. Gilbert: Certainly.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you would kindly ask the hon. member for Broadview if he would be interested in knowing why I was smiling?

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, maybe the acoustics are at fault. I just did not catch what the minister said. I think he said something about smiling.

An hon. Member: He wants to know why he was smiling.

Mr. Gilbert: He wants to know why he was smiling? Mr. Speaker, Nero fiddled while Rome burned, and our Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce smiles while Canadians go down the drain.

The government has reversed the Carter Report recommendations by putting growth before equity and fairness. It has improved the tax position of 10 per cent and worsened the tax position of 90 per cent of all Canadians. It has put the production of private goods above public goods and services, thereby ignoring our needs with respect to housing, schools, health facilities, transportation and the fight against pollution.

When I heard the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) speak yesterday of his fear concerning the rapid growth of Canada, and the possibility of inflation as a result of that growth, and when he cited as an example housing starts over the past eight or nine months, I could not help but think that he was far removed from the unemployed people, from people who have felt the effects of inflation and the pangs of hunger. He lives in an ivory tower.

What should we do? We should have followed the Carter recommendations as closely as possible, creating a tax structure which would be fair and equitable to all Canadians. We should have given tax relief to the majority of Canadians. We should be studying the guaranteed annual income plan. The figures given yesterday on the high rate of unemployment and the increase in the cost of living indicate that immediate attention must be given to tax relief and a guaranteed annual income.

In the past, governments have used the tax instrument to try to develop an equitable redistribution of income. It is obvious that that instrument has been a failure, particularly when we have 6.5 per cent of Canadians unemployed. Back in the early sixties, the thought of a guaranteed annual income was rejected by most people on the North American continent. But as we enter the seventies the thought of a guaranteed annual income becomes more appealing to a lot of Canadians. May I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that at one of its recent conventions the Liberal party adopted the idea of a guaranteed annual income.

Mr. Haidasz: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: But may I also remind the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) that the Prime Minister scuppered the idea—

Mr. Haidasz: He did not.

Mr. Gilbert: —and said it would cost too much. With excessive technological changes confronting us we will have to direct our minds to a guaranteed annual income, and the sooner we do so the better it will be for all Canadians.

The change from the work ethic to the non-work ethic is very difficult for most Canadians to accept. The experience we have had with our welfare programs has not been a happy one because of the division created among the different groups within Canada. Apparently the conclusion has been reached that we must have a certain number of unemployed. The sooner we realize this, and the sooner we develop a guaranteed annual income, then the sooner a great deal of the agony, misery, apprehension and stigma attached to unemployment and welfare will be gone. I would hope that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce would use his influence not only to diversify our imports and exports, not only to try to clear up the resource industries and not only to make the tax structure more equitable, but also to develop a guaranteed annual income. We would be spending our time much better this way than by wondering about Bill C-259 which is retrograde and not worthy of support.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): In taking part in this discussion on Bill C-259, Mr. Speaker, one must ask on behalf of the Canadian people, is this bill tax reform? I had no idea that my remarks were that funny so soon, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

Mr. McCutcheon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If I may repeat, we must ask ourselves the fundamental question that is in the minds of most Canadians, is this bill tax reform or does it just impose more taxes? Optimistically and charitably, one can say that it is tax reform; realistically, I am afraid that it may just impose an increase under a new guise. I have hoped for tax reform because hope springs eternal and naïvely, I presume, I had hoped for tax reductions. Above all, what I had hoped for, and I think I speak for a good many Canadians, was less government intervention in the business life of the country and in the private lives of the Canadian people.

As I understand developments in this country of ours, the history of taxation has inevitably been to climb progressively higher and higher. This is particularly true of the last 30 years since the adoption of a Keynesian socialistic philosophy by the government of the day under the late Mackenzie King. In fairness, I must say that this trend has never been arrested by successive governments. I would be the first to admit that this answer is too simple, but these are the fundamentals. We provide selective subsidies to industry and to people and couple them with specific government spending. This is our program versus a program which I would favour of genuine tax cuts providing incentives which would allow the people of Canada to make their own decisions. My criticism is chiefly of the philosophy of governments of all stripes, and the philosophy of some political parties, that seem to think they can spend your money and mine to better advantage than we can.

Free enterprisers have prophesied trouble for this country, but due to the great expansion period we went through, followed by an inflationary period, the day of reckoning was postponed. However, it is here now, precipitated by a lack of action by this government on economic matters. It was really brought to a head, however, by the action of President Richard Nixon. I have been a member of this chamber since 1963, Mr. Speaker. I think that most members who have been here during that period will agree that in this House we have spent more time on ways and means to extract money from the population than we have spent on ways and means to put money in their pockets. There was always the promise of more goodies for the people, more bread and circuses. The price has always been more taxes. From every corner of this House we are attempting to present the shortcomings of our existing tax structure. The government is beginning to admit what the population has known, that total taxes are too high. As things stand at present we have no particular co-ordination or linking of federal, municipal and provincial taxes. In other words, the same people are paying at all levels.

I was interested in an article which appeared in the Montreal Gazette on September 16, 1971. It bears out something which I have been saying but puts it in much better language. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read a short extract from this article:

> Almost half the value of Canada's production of goods and services—46 per cent—is taxed into the treasuries of the federal, provincial and municipal governments. This includes the compulsory premiums paid for government hospital insurance plans and the Canada and Quebec pension plans, amounting to a total of nearly $4 billion a year. If these payments are excluded, total government revenues of $38.5 billion are equal to 42 per cent of the gross national product.
>
> It's still far too high for a developing country whose most important single requirement is the investment capital for creation of new industry and the expansion and renovation of existing industry. In the United States, by contrast, the total tax take of the federal, state and municipal governments amounts to only 29 per cent of the gross national product. And the Americans have been fighting a war for almost a decade.
>
> Governments are belatedly coming to realize they're overtaxing. None, however, shows any disposition to reduce their expenditures. Instead they offer selective forms of tax relief—development grants to industry or tax rebates to the aged and impoverished. They're all more or less infected with the conviction that they know better than the taxpayers how the taxpayers' money should be spent.
>
> This is the real problem in Canada and the taxpayers themselves are as much to blame for it as governments. No government could spend as Canadian governments have spent, without the acquiescence of the voters. That acquiescence now, at long last, can no longer be assumed by governments.

• (2:50 p.m.)

A "by-product" of certain forms of aid to industry and to people of course is a loss of freedom. Invariably, when you are the recipient of largesse and you receive money, shall we say, for nothing, some freedom is lost. Some freedom involving the decision-making process is lost. This applies to businesses and to individuals.

So, Mr. Speaker, having taken a brief look at Bill C-259, which we shall shortly study clause by clause, I cannot find anything concrete that indicates to me that low income people will be removed from the tax rolls in the numbers claimed. I should like to paraphrase an expression used by a former member for Lambton-Kent, the late Hugh Mackenzie, because his words, when used to describe the numbers of people who allegedly are to be removed from the income tax rolls, fit the case perfectly. Mr. Mackenzie said, "The benefits appear more apparent than real". That, I think, applies in this case. May I continue in that regard.

Inflationary pressures, we must admit, are still present. I have nothing to say about that, except in passing. The latest civil service pay award granted this week was for a 19.5 increase over a three-year period. If that trend continues, it will mean that those employees will get a 60 per cent increase in income in ten years. My reading of the tax rates indicates to me that, although the income of those people and of other Canadians may go up by 60 per cent over 10 years, which is a normal rate at 6 per cent each year, income tax rates over that same period will go up by 97 per cent. This is not, I humbly submit, tax reform, but is what accountants call "elasticity". A 10 per cent increase in wages is accompanied by an 18 per cent increase in taxes. Accountants describe that, as I say, as elasticity. Also, elasticity means that as incomes rise, taxes rise at a faster rate.

Under the new tax bill, every 10 per cent increase in income is accompanied by an 18 per cent increase in taxes, as I said. Elasticity is best explained by looking at people with low incomes. A person earning $1,700 a year would, under the present system, claim exemptions of $1,100 and pay $70 tax on his taxable income of $600. If his income rises to $1,800, his taxable income is $700 and he pays $82 in taxes. His income has thus risen by 6 per cent but his taxes have increased by 17 per cent. So, despite all the statements and publicity to the effect that so many people will not be paying income tax, one must wonder if one can believe all those figures. Really, some of this stuff is not credible any more. For example, I recall when it was decided to remove the 3 per cent surcharge on income tax. There was great fanfare at the time, but what happened? The rate was later upped to 5 per cent. Certainly, we have increased exemptions for our lower paid people; at the same time we are taxing unemployment insurance payments.

I remember another classic example that makes me just a little suspicious of the fine print that may be in the bill. In 1968, I believe, a resolution came before the House for imposing estate taxes or succession duties on estates valued as little as $20,000. We had a great hassle in the House about this. I forget whether it was just prior to Easter or Christmas. At any rate, the minister of finance of the day agreed that the value of the estate ought to be $50,000 rather than $20,000 for succession duty purposes. This was a big deal. When the regulations came forward we found that although estates of $50,000 and less were exempt, if the estate was valued at $50,001 the rate reverted back, for taxation purposes, to the $20,000 level.

We had an important debate last night. It was alleged that the law of this land was being circumvented by the executive. So, I ask, is it any wonder that Canadians are suspicious of a bill that is this thick—it is five or six inches thick—and that has been prepared by this government. Really, we have been "sucked in" too many times already.

The taxpayer's home is not subject to capital gains. Is that so? That is what the newspapers say and what government press releases say. Yet the fine print of the bill shows that that suggestion is not always correct. We will talk more about that when we study the bill clause by clause. What about the family farm, Mr. Speaker? Canadians have been lulled to sleep by publicity indicating that the family farm is not to be subject to a capital gains tax. I have news for them. If they read the bill they will see that is not always the case. But, Mr. Speaker, happy, happy days are here for you if you win a lottery or a car. You will not pay capital gains on that. But I put it to you, Sir, that your chances of winning a lottery are about the same as a taxpayer's chances of obtaining a tax reduction under this bill. The odds are about one to 499,000 or one to 1 million against you.

I am concerned about what has happened to Canada and to Canadians. I submit that our initiative has been eroded by progressively more oppressive taxes imposed on the independent businessmen and the willing workers of this country. I was interested in hearing an hon. member speak about the guaranteed annual wage. I do not know whether he is aware that the government, reportedly, is to spend $15 million on a study to find out whether the guaranteed annual wage will destroy initiative and the will to work. I will make a proposition here and now that will save the government $14 million, and I will not take four years before bringing back an answer. If the government gives me a cheque for $1 million, it can save the other $14 million and get its answer. I think I could give the government a definite answer to this question right now. As a matter of fact, I might even do it for nothing and save the government $15 million. I have had an increase in salary and am persuaded to do it for nothing.

An hon. Member: Watch it, Mac.

Mr. McCutcheon: May I refer to the Gazette again:

—$15 million finding out whether a guaranteed annual income would cause the recipients to lose their "work drive".

• (3:00 p.m.)

Those are the words. There is another facet which concerns me. Governments have had more and more free labour provided by industry and individuals in this country than you can shake a stick at. The ordinary businessman is threatened by law if he does not fill in DBS reports—I should have said Statistics Canada because the name has been changed—unemployment insurance reports, manpower reports, Canada pension plan reports and income tax reports. Large companies have whole departments completing government forms, and small concerns must have specialists and auditors to complete compulsory governmental statistical reports. Why? So that the government can continue to play their paternalistic role. What is happening? Commerce is being hampered, business is being hamstrung. The poor individual Canadian has to pay for it through the increased cost of goods and services brought about by buckshee labour demanded by government departments. Search as I can, there is no indication in this legislation that there will be a diminution in this respect—not a bit.

In view of the technicalities uncovered in this document the Department of Labour should not have anybody with accounting expertise seeking employment. These people should never have to receive unemployment insurance because they will be the most demanded profession in the country. When the transport bill went through this chamber the minister responsible demonstrated a more flagrant approach: he got himself a job. But the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) is looking after his bookkeepers. There is no question about that, because they will be in demand. There is nothing wrong with bookkeepers, but why should every Canadian have to hire them? I do not know where it is going to end, but I submit we are close to the saturation point, the point of no return.

Welfare costs are escalating. Some say that welfare payments are high enough to destory initiative. I want to point out something to the minister. Last week the welfare officer in a municipality in my area was having a little difficulty with some of the municipal officials. He said he was going to quit his job, that it was not worth while, and he was going to apply for welfare. This is the welfare officer. He is going to quit his job. He is no longer going to work as the welfare officer but will apply for welfare himself.

How does one react to being a second-class citizen in his own country? I shall relate an experience I had a week ago Friday. I drove into a place on Highway No. 7 which had cedar posts for sale. My son needs some cedar posts for his farm. I asked the man if he sold cedar posts. He replied yes and asked where I lived. When I told him I lived in Chatham, Ontario, he said he was sorry but he would not sell me any posts. When I said, "Come again?" he said it was not worth his while. When I asked what he meant, he replied, "If you think for one minute that I am going to keep a double set of books, a duplicate set of records and a trust account so that I can pay the federal government a building tax of 12 per cent on those posts because I am selling them to you, you are crazy; and I have to repeat that again by keeping the same thing in duplicate in paying the province of Ontario 5 per cent sales tax. Why in hell should I do that when I can sell all my posts in the state of New York and I do not have to do any of this damn government bookkeeping?" Because I am a Canadian I could not buy the posts. How do you like that? We are spending $15 million to find out if anything is going to reduce our work effort.

Throughout my remarks I have tried to be charitable, but I must come to the conclusion that the benefits of tax reform will be wiped out unless public spending is confined to the natural growth of tax revenues. There is no evidence that the total tax burden carried by the individual has been considered in the development of this plan. Nor has any attention been paid to the necessity of developing a co-ordinated federal-provincial-municipal tax structure. Rather, an examination of this legislation can only lead to the conclusion that it is concerned solely with taxes levied by the federal government to raise money to meet the needs of the spending programs of the government, with no regard for the position in the total tax picture of the provinces and municipalities.

As I mentioned earlier, we had some pretty severe estate and gift taxes applied in 1968. In 1972 they are to be completely abandoned. This may be desirable, but it places some Canadians in a pretty invidious position, depending where they live. I expect to hear the classic answer—"Let the provinces look after themselves".

That is the crux of my remarks, Mr. Speaker. We are looking at this situation as a monolithic structure—federal government versus provincial government versus municipal government. This is wrong. After all, what are they? Governments are not impersonal structures; governments are people, and it is about time we started to think about the people. This measure is not reform; it is balkanization of this country. I suppose it could be called an extension of the chicken-and-egg war.

If we are to have reform, Mr. Speaker, all types of taxes must be considered, particularly the major ones such as property, sales and income taxes. A mechanism to provide offsetting credit relief from property, sales and excise taxes, etc., would be a good system to adopt. This method could be used when assessing income tax liability. Tax credits could also be an effective vehicle to give tax relief to the 2½ million Canadians who are too poor to pay income tax. They will not be removed from the income tax rolls; they have never been on them. This area has been completely overlooked. Because a citizen does not pay income tax it does not necessarily follow that he does not need relief from taxes.

• (3:10 p.m.)

I say in all sincerity that this is a national problem and so long as it remains with us the goal of real reform will not be realized. I am speaking of the need to link up and control federal, provincial and municipal tax burdens while developing a coherent, over-all package of tax and social security measures.

It is very difficult to comment on this measure without criticizing, and it is not my intention to be overcritical because I believe much that is good is contained in the legislation, at least as far as I am able to understand it. What frightens me is that some people may think, perhaps due to the size and incomprehensible nature of this document, that we can put a label on it such as "national tax reform" and then say our troubles are over. If we cannot develop a new tax structure which distributes total tax burdens fairly—and this means the taxation imposed by all three levels of government—if we cannot relate our tax system to our social security policies, and if our taxation system does not permit and reinforce broad national objectives such as increased Canadian participation in economic development and support of all kinds for activities on an international basis, I do not think we should delude ourselves by talking about national tax reform.

In conclusion, above all let us try to get in this country a scheme to foster incentive among the people. The people are better qualified to carry out their own decision-making than government bureaucracy. Let us try, when we study this bill, to maximize free choice for the individual.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my intervention in this debate will be very brief. It seems to me that the amendment before us fails to concern itself with the main purpose of the bill, which is for tax reform. I remind hon. members of the long story of tax reform in Canada going back over ten years. It started with the appointment of the Carter commission by the then government, now the official opposition. The report of that commission in 1966 was in many ways a textbook document, revolutionary in its concepts and thorough-going in the way in which it applied those concepts—a model, in many ways, of the kind of tax system which might exist in a Utopian society.

The Canadian public and business community then had a considerable period in which to consider and discuss those proposals. The white paper of 1969 was an expression of what the government felt possible to achieve and in the most democratic way for any country to achieve tax reform, the government put forward its proposals and invited the people to say what they thought about them. Two committees, one in this House and one in the other place, sat for most of 1970 hearing from individuals and groups concerned, seeking the very best of what could be offered by way of improvement to the white paper proposals. Now we have the bill before us.

The business community of Canada, those who are trying to make plans, not only for themselves but for those who are to follow them, have the right to know what the results are to be for a reasonable period ahead, say ten years. I see that the hon. member on the other side is snickering, but it is a reasonable expectation and it is an objective which is before us in this bill. There is no knowing what future parliaments and governments may do or what their monetary requirements may be. But in this bill there are certain provisions to make sure that the total demands of the government will not increase over a period of time. For instance, there are the provisions related to marginal rates of corporation tax which will go down from 50 per cent in 1972 to 46 per cent in 1976. The marginal rate on personal income tax will decrease from 17 per cent to 6 per cent.

The purpose of such provisions is to give an assurance that the intention of the government is not to increase the total amount of taxation but to implement tax reform. If a future parliament were to decide it needed more money it would have to amend the act, argue its case and obtain the support of parliament itself. I am not an expert on democratic procedures but I do not know any other way in which one could do more to ensure that those affected by tax measures have every opportunity to make their point of view clear.

This bill, which was introduced in June, was left over the summer recess for tax experts to study. I hope the House will quickly give second reading to the measure so that we can get to the clause by clause analysis. All of us recognize that in a bill as voluminous and as complicated as this one a number of amendments will be offered. I am sure they will be considered. I have read some of the speeches of my hon. friends on this side of the House and I wish to associate myself with the remarks of my friend the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) respecting the taxation of co-operatives. The subject is a complex one but I think there is merit in the argument which he used.

The way to deal with this legislation is not to go on discussing subjects more appropriate in a budget debate or the debate which took place last week relating to the United States surtax and its effect on Canada, the need to stimulate the economy and to do something to encourage regional development. It is true that all these things are affected by taxation, but the basic objective of the legislation before us is to set ground rules for a period of time during which the business community may have confidence in the arrangements we can reach—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Whether they are good, bad or indifferent!

Mr. Francis: It is our task to make them as good as they can be. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), the financial critic of the opposition for whom I have the greatest respect, says, "Whether they are good, bad or indifferent." I look forward to hearing his contribution when we reach committee of the whole. I know his contribution will be very lengthy. We are all looking forward to it. We simply ask: Why not get on with the business? What is the purpose now of putting on record speeches which are more appropriate to other debates?

I cannot help but express regret at the errors which repeatedly are put forward in some quarters. I am not a tax expert, I am not an authority on the details of this bill, but I could not help regretting that the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) who has just spoken should have discussed the abolition of the estate tax without in any way linking it with the capital gains tax. As the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) pointed out, the capital gains tax has to be related to the estate tax. He called it a pay-as-you-go estate tax.

• (3:20 p.m.)

There is no way in which, in all honesty, one can pick out one aspect of the bill, ignore others and then make the demagogic announcement that this is something that will help the rich people.

Mr. Peddle: It would take a long speech to cover every aspect of the bill's 707 pages.

Mr. Francis: There is no question of that. I invite hon. members at this time, in all sincerity, to restrict themselves to reasonable comment. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) keeps talking about the dividend credit as though the increase from 20 per cent to 33.33 per cent is giving something to rich people only. What he fails to add is that the tax credit itself is taxable and that there is a breaking point at 40 per cent on marginal tax rates. If you are on the 40 per cent rate or better, you will be worse off under these proposals than you are under the previous law. But the hon. member for Winnipeg North never tells us that story. He goes on to claim that this is a straight giveaway to the rich. I suggest that when members who should know better insist in making that kind of error, understanding in this House is not helped.

The measure before us is one of long term tax reform. The business community has been asking for this. Many decisions in this country rest on a knowledge of what our tax rules are going to be. The least of our obligations now, after ten years of keeping the entire picture as confused as we could, is to come back to this House, agree on these rules, have a clause by clause analysis of this measure and give the business community and individual taxpayers in Canada an assurance that Parliament has acted in the most democratic way it can to formulate the general rules of our taxation system.

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, the initiative of my colleague from Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) in proposing this amendment has served once again as a vehicle for showing how empty and barren are the policies of this government. It has given us the opportunity to expose the government's true intentions, to cut through the fog of pretence and misinformation with which they are trying to delude the Canadian people into believing that the so-called tax reform bill is the be all and end all.

If any further proof of this approach by the government were necessary, it is amply demonstrated by the speech of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) which we have just heard. Again, he is trying to build up a fog around this bill. He said the bill is the most important thing that has happened to the country. He completely obscures the fact that what the country needs now is something to get the economy moving again. This tax reform can wait. What we need now is something to get people back to work so that they can earn money to pay taxes.

Proof that the government's bluff has been called was very obvious from their dismayed reaction to Your Honour's decision to allow this amendment. When their shock and dismay began to settle, their first reaction was to boycott this debate, to refuse to take part in the hope that the opposition might run out of steam. How else can one explain the complete silence of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan), who had so much to say when the white paper was before the committee, or the silence of the hon. member for Etobicoke (Mr. Gillespie), who issued so many press releases on his pet taxation theories? Why the sudden silence? Do these members now agree with proposals which only a few months ago they could not stomach, or have they been taken out of the line-up and told to sit quietly on the sidelines? If so, I wonder whether they are happy with their replacements.

Are these members satisfied that the only contributions by government members to this debate so far have been a few minor interventions by backbenchers? Are they satisfied with the contributions of these members who lashed out at the opposition in the manner of people obviously stung by valid criticism? About all that I could gather from their remarks was that the tax reform bill was the most wonderful legislation ever to come before this House and that the opposition was doing a great disservice by not letting it pass without debate so that all Canadians could begin to enjoy this benevolent government's largesse as of January 1. This implied that we were being very unfair to the millions of people who were to be given tax relief. Do these hon. members really believe their own remarks? Perhaps, as the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) said, the most charitable conclusion would be that the government has made such a mess of this bill that they themselves do not know anything about it.

Would they have us believe that this bill is going to cure all of Canada's economic ills, that it will bring relief to the half million or more Canadians who do not pay taxes anyway because they cannot get jobs in this "just" society? Would they have us believe that there is anything in this bill to encourage the private sector of the economy to expand and to provide new jobs for our rapidly growing work force? Do they really believe that increased taxes, disguised as tax reform, are the solution to the many ills of our economy? If they believe all this they are completely out of step with the economists, accountants, businessmen and almost every other Canadian who has repeatedly said there is nothing in this bill to cure the long-term problems of the Canadian economy. Perhaps they do believe all this—for is not the hallmark of a Liberal the unswerving belief that everybody is out of step but him?

After listening to government spokesmen in this debate I read with interest an editorial in that great mouthpiece of Liberalism, the Winnipeg Free Press, of September 14—the same day that Liberal spokesmen were telling us that everybody in Canada wanted us to rush the tax bill through the House. Obviously there had been no consultation between the Free Press and these members because this paper expressed views so contrary to those of our Liberal apologists that I should like to read them into the record. This editorial is captioned "The mists of autumn" and commences:

> Through the autumn mist of politics Canada's primary economic need stands out as clearly as a mountain peak. It is, of course, capital investment to provide jobs for the fastest growing labour force in the western world. When something like $50,000, on average, must be invested to make one new job in modern industry, the nation's capital requirements are almost unlimited.

The writer goes on to say:

The chief immediate barrier to investment for the time being is the worldwide uncertainty caused by the new economic policies of the United States. But uncertainty existed in Canada long before President Nixon launched these policies and will continue to exist, however they turn out in success or failure, unless the Canadian government changes its ambiguous attitude toward business.

Of such a change there is no current sign. On the contrary, the government has aggravated the uncertainty by pressing ahead with a taxation program quite incomprehensible to parliament or public and adding to it a competition act still less understood. In literal fact the tax bill, chopped and changed through countless revisions, baffles the ordinary businessman and, in many tangled clauses, bewilders the most experienced auditors and lawyers. Parliament will need months—

These are not my words; they are the words of the writer of this article.

—to study its obscure and often inscrutable language and then will not foresee its full effects on the national economy.

Does that sound as though we of the official opposition are the only ones who say that this tax bill should not be rushed through the House? The editorial continues:

The government could not have chosen a worse time to introduce this climate of doubt about the future. It appears when all the government's efforts to solve the twin dilemma of unemployment and inflation have failed, when the world economy is facing a bitter moment of truth after years of unreality, when Canada suddenly finds that all its hopeful expectations are more excessive than they looked even a month ago.

How, then, could the government clarify this confusion and encourage the investment which alone will ensure adequate economic growth?

Here is where the writer parts company once again from the government. He continues:

It could abandon, or at least postpone until the international crisis has passed, the whole bungled attempt to build a new tax system on social theories regardless of economic results.

• (3:30 p.m.)

If that is not an endorsement of the validity of the amendment of my colleague, I do not know what is. That last statement describes perfectly this government's inept economic policies, its ad hoc approach to voter appeal rather than the national interest, and its patchwork attempt to paper-over problems rather than look for cures to a sick economy. This approach has never been more evident than under this government. It has been well said that the Trudeau government is more concerned with style than substance.

This government boasts about all legislation it has put through. Let us analyse it. We have had legislation to promote bilingualism and to change the rules of Parliament. We have had legislation to change labour relations laws and to alter the Criminal Code. But we have not had one piece of legislation to promote the economic growth of this country. The approach of this government continues to be a "big brother" one of taking the taxpayer's money and spending it for him.

Despite the Bonaventure fiasco, the Arts Centre mess and the hundreds of millions of dollars spent on reports now gathering dust in various minister's offices, they are still trying to "con" the Canadian taxpayer and convince him he should gladly spend his hard-earned income and let them squander it in their own inimitable fashion. I suggest that the Canadian taxpayer is becoming just a bit fed up with the action of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). Sure, the taxpayer wants tax reform, but he also wants expenditure reform. He wants equity in the tax system. But he also wants the government to leave him some encouragement to work harder and develop this growing country.

My colleague from Lambton-Kent (Mr. McCutcheon) referred to an article in the Montreal Gazette which emphasizes the growing trend of government to take a bigger and bigger bite out of the gross national product. He pointed out the fact that taxpayers are beginning to question the wisdom of turning over so much of their money and letting the government make all the decisions. He mentioned the $15 million which apparently is being granted for another study to decide whether a guaranteed annual income would cause the recipients to lose all their drive.

I wonder how many members on the government side are receiving letters from their constituents angrily denouncing the $500,000 spent on the Secretary of State's latest boondoggle, the report of the Committee on Youth. I know my desk is beginning to fill up with letters which are extremely critical of this latest misuse of the taxpayers' money. As this article in the Montreal Gazette pointed out, resentment is beginning to build up among the taxpayers and they feel that they cannot and will not continue to let the government make all the decisions concerning how their dollar should be spent. The pendulum is beginning to swing back from the extremes of paternalism—personal and corporate—through which it was taken in the sixties.

Canadians are re-learning that the best security they can have is the security of employment. That security is increasingly denied them when the means of employment are taxed as heavily as they are now. This government's paternalism and political opportunism have clouded all its legislation. When the Canadian people wanted jobs and wanted the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to do something about it, he instead gave them new unemployment insurance regulations at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars to the taxpayers. Even the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) has not been able to come up with any accurate estimate of how much more money this will take away from the private sector of the economy.

We in this party who served on the labour committee while this legislation was being examined over and over again expressed the view that while we were certainly agreed that the needy unemployed must be looked after, we were very concerned that the minister's proposals were too rich for our economy's blood. We feared that this extra bite would lead to a further slowdown in the economy, which would lead to more unemployed, which would mean heavier drains on the fund and eventually would mean higher insurance premiums. Despite all the minister's assurances that the fund is actuarially sound, we still doubt the soundness of his approach.

Would it not have been far better to do something to stimulate the economy in order to provide more jobs which would take people off the unemployment rolls and eventually lead to lower drains on the industry and individual? But not this government! There was more political clout, or so they felt, in saying to people—I think the Minister of Labour used these words, in effect, in the House one day in reply to a question—that they are sorry they are unemployed but that really does not matter too much because they are to be given more when they are out of work. This is the attitude of the government.

The recently announced program of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) in respect of family allowances carries on the established approach of this government. Dressing it up as a step in the redistribution of income and more assistance to the needy, he tries to justify the additional expenditure of some $150 million. This new tax will further decrease the ability of the Canadian economy to expand and create newer and better jobs so that less government assistance will be necessary. On September 15 the Ottawa Journal, in commenting on the new family allowances proposal, had this to say:

The real challenge is to provide greater opportunities for more Canadians to prosper in their own land. The very need for larger family allowances and the growth of the unemployment rolls show how far that challenge is from being met.

Mr. Speaker, the most damning indictment of this government's approach to economic matters is the disgraceful way in which it is trying to sell the Canadian people the idea that this bill will take from the rich and give to the poor. Over and over again we have heard the Minister of Finance and his colleagues hale this measure as one which will bring great tax relief to millions of Canadians. They have told us that if we will let these proposals rush through the House some 750,000 Canadians will be removed from the income tax rolls. They have also told us that 1.4 million Canadians will pay less taxes and that, in effect, the only ones to feel the bite of the new proposals will be the wealthy. They have tried to blackmail us into rushing these proposals through the House with the veiled threat that we are in danger of losing the support of the millions of voters about whom a benevolent government is concerned. What utter nonsense!

Why do government members continue to insult the intelligence of the Canadian voter? Do they think the voters really believe that tax relief in the form of increased exemptions or tax credits can only be granted if this bill is passed in its entirety? Do they not realize that the Canadian taxpayer knows that if this government were sincere in its intentions to bring tax relief it has other measures available to it to take immediate action to remove low-income people from the tax rolls?

The Leader of the Official Opposition has repeatedly asked the government to take steps to grant immediate relief to the low-income earner and has pointed out to them that our party would not block such attempts. We agree that the low-income earner should have tax relief, but we will not agree that this can only be bought at the expense of complicated and, indeed, antiquated tax legislation which could well cripple our whole economy. If the government is sincere in their desire to grant relief to these people, let them take the measures that are already available to them.

• (3:40 p.m.)

The Minister of Finance keeps telling us about the tax cuts contained in his legislation. But are these tax cuts real or imaginary? The minister, during his budget speech, made the claim that all married taxpayers will pay less tax in 1972 than they do at present if their entire income is derived from wages or salaries. This is not so. Once again the minister is overlooking other government levies which, no matter how the government tries to disguise them, are still taxes. In his typical fashion the minister will not admit that payments made to social welfare programs, no matter what they are called, are still a tax on income. But the new legislation broadens the concept of income to include, for example, employer-paid medicare premiums.

If we consider the increased levies for unemployment insurance premiums and the fact that the act has been broadened to include people who did not pay before, we will find in most cases that under the new legislation the minister's claim is not correct. For example, the new unemployment insurance regulations will bring more than a million new subscribers into its net. All these people not have been covered under previous regulations and so have not been paying insurance premiums. While it is true that they will not pay on their total income but only on the first $7,800, they will still have to pay approximately $62 a year for the privilege of joining this scheme, although they will be allowed to deduct this amount from their taxable income.

These premiums are not literally a tax, but effectively that is what they are. They constitute an enforced contribution to an insurance fund from which the contributor may or may not ever receive benefits and to which he has not seen fit to contribute of his own volition. If that is not the definition of "tax," it will do until a better one comes along. Similarly, many people contribute to an employer-employee medical scheme and until now their contributions have not been taxable. Under the new concept of income in this bill the employer's share of the premium will have to be shown in the employee's income. It has been estimated that on average this will amount to about $75 a year on which the individual will have to pay tax.

The Minister of Finance has made much of the fact that under the increased exemptions the average taxpayer's base income will be reduced, but he continually glosses over the fact that because of new increased basic tax rates much of the tax benefit disappears. He has told us that the rate increases are not large enough to completely offset savings which would result under the new reduced taxable income. In theory this is correct but it ignores other provisions of the tax reforms which have changed the concept of total income. The examples I have given in respect of medicare premiums and unemployment insurance premiums are a good indication of what I am referring to.

While I know that the government has some weird idea that there is a distinction between a federal taxpayer and a provincial taxpayer, and that moneys paid by an individual to finance the many social welfare schemes of this government are not properly taxes, I think the average taxpayer would be quite prepared to argue that, the Minister of Finance's opinions to the contrary, all these additional levies are nothing but additional taxes and must be considered in the over-all tax structure. So we see that the minister's claim that all married taxpayers will pay less tax in 1972 if their income is derived from wages or salaries is not quite correct.

The minister would also have us believe that his new tax proposals will bring relief to all people in the lower-income bracket and, even though middle-income wage earners might pay slightly more, this cannot be helped, and since it represents only a small section of the population it is not too serious. But what he does not tell us is that with Canada's rate of inflation, which often runs as high as 6 per cent a year and rarely is below 3 per cent, many wage earners who once were considered in the low-income bracket are rapidly moving into the $8,000 to $15,000 range and this is the area where these tax proposals will have the most impact.

With inflation and with higher wage settlements of the last few years, many people who once were considered low-income have moved into the income bracket which was once considered the exclusive property of executives and white-collar people. Consider, for example, the recent wage settlements with electricians, with plumbers, with bulldozer operators in Toronto and many others, wage settlements which have given these people incomes which once were considered only the prerogative of executives. These people will feel the heaviest impact of the new tax proposals. They will not begin to realize that although they have moved into a higher tax bracket they will have no increase in their real income.

Our income tax structure is geared to bring in ever-increasing revenues as incomes rise, and in fact as incomes rise taxes rise at a faster rate. Under the new tax bill starting at the lower end of the scale—I realize that there are many factors to be considered in different incomes—every 10 per cent increase in income is accompanied by an 18 per cent increase in tax, and as an individual's income rises he moves into a higher bracket and many more people also move into this income bracket, thus paying a higher tax. The result is a rapid progression of revenue accruing to the federal government.

I make this assertion despite all the statements of the Minister of Finance who would have us believe that the government will not take more money in taxes than they are at present. But what the minister is not telling the Canadian people is that at the higher end of the income scale this elasticity is much less pronounced. For example, for someone earning over $25,000 a year an increase of 6 per cent in his income would result in only an 8 per cent increase in his taxes. Does this sound like robbing the rich to give to the poor? The minister's hypocrisy in promoting this legislation as a system of tax relief to lower-income earners must be exposed for what it is. That is why our party has moved this amendment and why we are not prepared to let the bill pass until the Canadian public is made aware of the real intentions of the government.

Let me turn briefly to a matter which has been referred to by several members during this debate. I refer to the implications of the new tax provisions as they apply to co-operatives and credit unions. I will not go into the background of the co-operative movement because it has already been referred to by other speakers. I commend the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) on his plea for the co-ops, but I hope that if satisfactory amendments are not allowed by the government he will back up his verbal position by casting his vote against this bill.

I do not want to get into the argument that has raged for years as to whether or not co-operatives have been paying their fair share of taxes, other than to say that I am convinced that when we consider the nature of the services that co-operatives render to many communities in our country we realize they have been carrying their fair share of the load. Coming from the Maritimes, I can well remember the hungry thirties when many of our people had a very hard time to exist. Had it not been for the birth of the co-operative movement at that time many of our farmers and fishermen would have been in dire straits. When I think back to those days and consider the services that the co-ops and the credit unions provided for our people—services, incidentally, which private capital was unwilling or unable to provide—I am deeply disturbed at any proposal which might force these valuable institutions out of existence.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Along with other hon. members I have listened to representations from the co-operatives and from those who feel that the co-operatives should be paying more taxes. The co-operatives maintain that the proposed legislation is bad because it does not recognize the basic nature of their organizations. They also feel that the application of the regulations is not realistic and could lead to the elimination of co-ops which presently are operated at a loss but only because they provide service to their customers. I cannot imagine private entrepreneurs being willing to provide these services on the same basis. As I understand it, the estimated revenue accruing, if these proposals go into effect, is not large. It is certainly not large enough to risk the existence of many of these institutions. The requests of the co-ops do not seem unreasonable. I for one am prepared to support them and do whatever I can to have those clauses of the bill amended.

Speakers on the government side have taken the position that this amendment is frivolous and unnecessary. We also heard that from the speaker who preceded me. Members on the government side have said that we should dispose of it quickly and go on with second reading. If Bill C-259 contained anything that would contribute in any way to curing the ills of our economy, we on this side would be happy to give it speedy passage. But we will not be bulldozed into pushing through a bill which not only does nothing to solve our immediate problems but in fact may aggravate and intensify them.

This government has more urgent priorities than tax reform. Let the government grant immediate relief to low-income taxpayers by special legislation that would make increased exemptions effective now, rather than next year. Then let it set aside Bill C-259 and bring in a budget with effective, concrete measures to help this country recover from three years of Liberal mismanagement.

Surely the sorry figures on the state of the economy released yesterday by Statistics Canada must have got through even to the members on the other side of the House. Surely they must now realize that the policies, or lack of policies, of the government have been completely wrong. I do not want to go into the statistics in detail.

They have been referred to already. But I do want to point out to the House the dismal picture that these statistics paint of the condition of our economy.

All the economic indicators are pointing in the wrong direction. We have higher unemployment and higher prices, pushed on by rampaging inflation. We have a lower seasonally adjusted value of manufactured shipments and a lower volume of seasonally adjusted new orders. We have lower seasonally adjusted unfilled orders and higher seasonally adjusted inventory for our manufacturing industry.

It is obvious that these statistics demand immediate and drastic action by the government. They do not call for tax reform; they call for reform of the government's economic policies; they call for a policy of high employment for Canada, a policy that will provide a job for every Canadian who is willing and able to work. Confidence must be restored immediately.

For the past 18 months the leader of this party has implored the government to take effective measures to restore the health of the economy. These measures should include across-the-board personal income tax reductions on a sliding scale, with the greatest reductions for low and middle-income Canadians, instead of this camouflage the government is throwing out that it is reducing taxes—but it is not telling the people that taxes will be going up during the next two years.

There must be an elimination or substantial reduction of the federal tax on building materials. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) has referred to higher building starts—but what about the situation over the next three or four months when the money for the building program dries up? That is what the minister in charge of housing is worrying about. A new budget should include some sort of crash winter works program to make constructive use of our human resources. The government made a great play about the money it spent on summer employment. Let members of the government put their money where their mouths are, and do the same thing for unemployed people this winter.

Lastly, Mr. Speaker, a conference should be held with the provinces with the object of providing more assistance to provinces and municipalities to take care of the ever-mounting welfare costs with which they will be faced this winter. Such a high-employment budget would lead to jobs being created for Canadians, increased efficiency of production and demand for goods and services, raising shipments, new orders, unfilled orders and stimulating the economy constructively. Business confidence would be restored and no longer would Canadians be paying so dearly for the government's failure to bring in policies which will cure unemployment and curb inflation. If the government is prepared to take such action, we in this party will give it our wholehearted support.

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I was interested to listen to the remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) in which he urged those on this side of the House to stop speaking in generalities, take this bill into committee of the whole and get down to the job of amending its clauses. He is forgetting that this bill could be objected to on two points, its specifics and its generalities, and it may be that on this side of the House there are such fundamental differences in philosophies and assumptions with respect to what a tax system should be, both in its goals and objectives, that really there is nothing we can do but discuss it on second reading. There is no point in sitting down and talking about the specifics of a bill with which you do not agree.

[Mr. Thomas (Moncton).]

Mr. Francis: Then just vote against it.

Mr. Rowland: We intend to do that, but we have a duty to explain why. The Canadian public have a right to decide between the policies propounded by the government in its tax bill and the philosophy which those on this side of the House would like to see incorporated in a tax bill. That is why we are taking this course.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions, private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

INTEREST ACT

RATE OF INTEREST TO BE PRIME LENDING RATE OF CHARTERED BANKS

On the order:

Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of Bill C-40, an act to amend the Interest Act—Mr. Chappell.

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On behalf of the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Chappell) I would like to make a statement with reference to Bill C-40 which stands as item No. 2 on the order paper under public bills. The hon. member has authorized me to make the following statement on his behalf:

I ask the unanimous consent of the House to have order No. 2 under public bills discharged and my Bill C-40, an Act to amend the Interest Act, withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member. Is it agreed that consent should be given?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is so ordered.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

* * *

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

PROVISIONS IN RESPECT OF REPORTS OF ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES COMMISSIONS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved that Bill C-44, to amend the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

• (4:00 p.m.)

He said: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we had the usual Friday afternoon attendance in the House which is so somewhat like the summer congregation in church where the people present are the converted.

All hon. members who have studied this bill will be struck by its reasonableness and logic. This is the third time since 1968 that I have presented the bill. It has been debated on previous occasions, once when it was a notice of motion and again 18 or 20 months ago when it was a bill in the present form. I have come back to the charge because time is getting short with regard to any effective change to the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act. A decennial census was held last June and preliminary figures on population should be available in May or June of 1974. Upon presentation of those figures the representation commissioner must begin acting on what was then known as Bill C-72 of 1964 and which appeared as chapter 31 in the Revised Statutes of 1964. What its appellation is in the Revised Statutes of 1970 I could not say, and it is quite immaterial.

Mr. Blair: To me, too.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): "To me too," says the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) and I rather expect he has read the bill. I should like to review what has happened and why I present this rather minor amendment. The representation commissioner will set up the electoral boundaries commission which will examine the situation in each province relative to each riding. It is directed to hold public hearings and to make a report. Under section 12 of the act the commission shall——prepare a report setting forth its recommendations concerning the division of that province into electoral districts and its recommendations concerning the description of the boundaries of each such district and the representation and name to be given thereto.

Section 13 of the act outlines the factors that each commission shall consider in determining the size of a constituency, its boundaries and in particular the quantum of derivation from the norm. As hon. members know, there is a tolerance of 25 per cent up or down from the quotient or the provincial norm. There are few members present in the House, but most on this side who attended the hearings of the provincial commissions in 1964 will remember that in many instances their recommendations were completely ignored. Many of the re-fashionings of the electoral map of this country were not carried out by the commissions but were the product of some group in Ottawa that played with maps and figures from the census figures. They seemed to have the most abysmal ignorance of any constituencies except those in the city of Ottawa where they might have been able to examine the lay-out.

I do not know where the commission for the province of Ontario started, but the residual portion must have been in southeastern Ontario. Without pointing the finger at any particular seats, my heart goes out to some members on the other side of this chamber who were left with what could be considered a fashioned abortion of districts—not as to the people but as to the disparate nature of the constituencies. Any relationship to the factors outlined in section 13(c) of the act were apparently totally ignored. I recall that in my province the chairman of the commission insisted that actual figures, totals, were the primary rule; in other words, as close an adherence as possible to the rule of one man, one vote. As to the other factors, they might be considered if they had an incidental application. There was, naturally, some elasticity in numbers.

In talking to members and noting the size of the objections ruled on by Mr. Speaker pursuant to section 20 of the act, one can readily understand that on the whole the job did not meet with the approval of Members of Parliament. This bill somehow had its origin in ideas of superpolitical purity. I do not know whether the idea that anything that a Member of Parliament touches must be tainted is prevalent in academic circles, or whether it is something buried in the dust of editorial offices. In my considerable experience as a Member of Parliament and the actual servicing of a constituency where one is dealing with the community which is, frankly, the political family related to a Member of Parliament, I can say unhesitatingly that no man understands how a constituency is put together as a workable representational unit better than the Member of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There may be exceptions, but the man who has worked his constituency and attended to it knows its inner details. I live in Ottawa and occasionally I have been reproached by individuals who ask what I know about Edmonton and what goes on in my constituency. Mr. Speaker, I would wager that I know more about what goes on in that constituency and its perimeter than anyone who is bound by his particular neighbourhood and his own particular interests. Whether consciously or unconsciously, we all pay attention to details in respect of the whole area. We know the mix of the people; we know what interests they have.

• (4:10 p.m.)

My constituents are very fine people. Mine is an urban constituency, yet it covers two areas of the city of Edmonton, the western side on the north of the river and the far north-eastern side—and never the twain shall meet so far as having a community of interest is concerned. I do not say that everybody should be of the same income group in a community; I just point out that there is that particular mix.

I want, through my amendment, to make certain that when fashioning its report a commission gives reasons for its decision. I put it to hon. gentlemen that there is nothing worse than coming into this House and debating a report on the basis of objections when no reasons have been given for changes which have been made. In other words, under this act the representation commissions are simply given carte-blanche within certain perimeters to make the changes they wish. They can change the name of an hon. member's constituency and they do not have to say why; they can just sit back and the burden is entirely upon the one who objects.

It seems to me, now that we have adopted this system of a representation commissioner and the setting up of electoral boundaries under a so-called independent system—and it is not independent of certain prejudices, let me assure the House—that if changes are to be made in any province the burden should lie on those who are to make the change or suggest the change. If the name of the constituency is to be changed, the commission should let the constituents know why this is being done. If boundaries are to be extended or contracted or altered, or if this parish or that part of a township is to be removed or added to another constituency, let it be said why that is being done; let it not be merely said that this is done simply on a population basis. What is the affinity—that is the question. Let the commission, to use popular parlance, put its reasons where its mouth is, because then, I can assure hon. members, there will be much less frustration.

In the last revision, that being the first revision under this act, there was not one province without a constituency where there was not complete frustration because the people did not know why a change was made. Why was something done this way or that? Let us have the reasons. I do not have much time, and I propose to give hon. members an opportunity to ask questions. We ask: Why was this done this way?

I will simply say that if there are objections they will be more cogent and, I think, more objective if they are directed toward reasons that are given. I think, too, that in other instances where the reasons appear reasonably sensible most hon. members will accept them and we will not have any objection. This amendment is trying to establish this communication, shall we say, between members of the House and the commission. Hon. members are very much in the picture since they are the ones who are affected.

It must be remembered that under the act hon. members cannot change the reports. That cannot be done in any way, there is no provision for changes under the act. Members of the House can only air their grievances and set up counter-reasons for their objections. Then the reports are referred back to the commissions along with the verbatim report of what was said by hon. members in regard to particular constituencies, and the commissioners will either reject, accept in part the objections or start the work afresh. At least an opportunity is given for Members of Parliament, who I think know more about their constituencies than anybody, to serve their people. Merely representing a constituency for the purposes of election is nonsense. What one has to look at is a constituency which can be properly serviced by a Member of Parliament. That means a lot. In the last revision that was the lowest reason on the totem pole.

I propose merely to amend the definition section of the act to provide that the report shall contain recommendations and that each recommendation can only be considered as a recommendation if there is appended to it the reason therefor. Therefore, any report would come in with recommendations and, naturally, with reasons. That is all. I hope that hon. members will see fit to approve the amendment of this act because a great deal of, shall we say, the future of their constituencies and their ability to serve them lies in determining that we have appropriately determined constituencies.

Mr. Blair: Mr. Speaker, may I have your permission to ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I believe the hon. member has indicated that he will answer questions.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Blair: I wonder if the hon. member can tell us whether there is anything in the statute at present which prohibits or shall prohibit a commission from giving reasons for its report and for the division of a province into constituencies.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing that specifically prohibits that. I have the reports from the last distribution; all are before me and I would offer them to the hon. member in the hope that he might find one solitary, minor reason stated in the whole lot of them. There seems to be a uniformity of presentation. I will not attribute this to the actions of the representation commissioner who is a member of all the representation commissions. Let me assure the hon. member, however, that there is a rather rigid uniformity in presentation, and all without a single reason.

I know that when I spoke to a couple of the chairmen of provincial commissions and suggested that reasons would have been helpful, they simply said it was not necessary and "why should we bother our heads with it?"

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a few words to the debate on Bill C-44, in the name of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). It refers to the electoral boundaries commissions and the reports they file with the Secretary of State. The hon. member suggests in his bill that these reports should give not only the boundaries of constituencies but reasons for establishing those boundaries and the way in which they are established.

It took many years, Mr. Speaker, for the Parliament of Canada to get around to developing an independent commission to fix electoral boundaries independent of Parliament and independent of politics. This was done in 1964. It was a great step forward. Prior to that time there were a tremendous number of complaints and criticisms about setting the boundaries to suit the political advantage of the government in power. The whole idea of an independent commission was to get away from this type of criticism.

• (4:20 p.m.)

The hon. member stated that we do not have a completely independent boundary set-up as a result of this commission. The arguments and complaints against this are now much fewer than in the past. By setting out the reasons for establishing boundaries the commission invites rebuttal from Members of Parliament. In effect, we established a continuing debate. It took many years to get this matter out of the hands of the government and into the hands of an independent commission. By this proposal we are bringing it back as though the commission is only a bargaining body, and inviting members of the House of Commons to rebut this. Obviously, the reasons which the commission will give will be those set out in section 13 of the act, which states the reasons for establishing the boundaries. I quote that section:

In preparing its report each commission for a province shall be governed by the following rules:

(a) the division of the province into electoral districts and the description of the boundaries thereof shall proceed on the basis that the population of each electoral district in the province as a result thereof shall correspond as nearly as may be to the electoral quota for the province, that is to say, the quotient obtained by dividing the population of the province as ascertained by the census by the number of members of the House of Commons to be assigned to the province as calculated by the representation commissioner under section 12—

(c) the commission may depart from the strict application of rules (a) and (b) in any case where

(i) special geographic considerations, including in particular the sparsity, density or relative rate of growth of population of various regions of the province, the accessibility of such regions or the size or shape thereof, appear to the commission to render such a departure necessary or desirable, or

(ii) any special community or diversity of interests of the inhabitants of various regions of the province appears to the commission to render such a departure necessary or desirable, but in no case, except as may be necessary in order to give effect to rule (b), shall the population of any electoral district in the province as a result thereof depart from the electoral quota for that province to a greater extent than twenty-five per cent more or twenty-five per cent less.

The reasons always fall into the category of the statements set out in section 13, which is the basis for representation. Members certainly have an opportunity to make their voices heard, because under section 17 of the act we have the system of public notice. It sets out that there shall be hearings. As a matter of fact, the commission must advertise in a newspaper in the area a proposed plan of redistribution to show the number of people and the areas they designate. If a member is not happy with the plans of the commission, the battle should be fought at the public hearing; they should make their voices heard in their own back yard, not in Parliament. If this is brought back to Parliament we may as well bring it back the whole way and do away with the independent commission which everyone agrees is a real step forward for democracy.

The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) said that in his opinion a terrible job was done. That is his opinion and he is entitled to it. In my constituency a map was prepared by the commission. It was duly advertised in the newspapers. The group in the constituency which did not feel this was a good electoral arrangement, that the community of interest had no geographical background and there were certain geographical disadvantages in the arrangement, made representations at the public hearing in the normal way. The commission saw fit to change the map and bring it more into line with what we historically had in that area for electoral boundaries. I feel that the system works very well. It certainly did in the Algoma federal riding in the 1966 redistribution of seats.

One problem facing constituencies in northern Ontario is the very large area which they attempt to encompass. This is because of section 12 of the act which sets out the way in which the number of members will be calculated in each province. It states that there shall be 261 members from the provinces and two from the territories. It provides special instances, like Prince Edward Island which will have a special number, which happens to be four, and provides that certain other criteria will be applied in respect of determining the number of members; for example, no province shall have less than 15 per cent fewer members than in the previous redistribution. There are other special arrangements.

In provinces with very large, growing populations, such as Ontario, the members have to take in a much larger territory. For example, in 1966 I believe the median number of constituents in an Ontario riding was 65,000. It varied 25 per cent up or down from this figure, whereas in Prince Edward Island it was something like 25,000. I understand that when the 1971 census results are in, which will be the basis of the election after 1972, it will be somewhere around 87,000 with a flexibility of 25 per cent up or down.

• (4:30 p.m.)

The government has proposed Bill C-257 which would cover these circumstances, giving an additional number of members to provinces such as Prince Edward Island and Saskatchewan. The added representation would bring the number of members in the House of Commons to above the 263 or 264 we now have. This would certainly work to the advantage of provinces such as Ontario. It would be of special advantage in large northern constituencies of Ontario where there is a sparse population while southern parts of the province have a large and fast-growing population.

The hon. member for Edmonton West said no one was more qualified than a Member of Parliament to make representations concerning constituency boundaries. I tend to agree with him. However, I feel the place for him to make such representations, if he is not satisfied with what is proposed by the commission, would be at the public hearings. There, before a final decision is reached, he could put forward his case and bring people with him to support his views.

Section 20 of the act sets out the manner in which objections can be filed with representation commissioners. It reads as follows:

If within a period of thirty days from the day the copy of the report of any commission for a province is laid before the House of Commons or published pursuant to section 19, an objection in writing, in the form of a motion for consideration by the House of Commons of the matter of the objection, signed by not less than ten members of the House of Commons is filed with the Speaker specifying the provisions of the report objected to and the reasons for the objection, the House of Commons shall, within the first fifteen days next after the expiration of that period that the House of Commons is sitting, take up the motion and consider the matter of the objection, and thereafter the report shall be referred back to the representation commissioner by the Speaker, together with a copy of the objection and of the House of Commons debates with respect thereto, for reconsideration by the commission having regard to the objection.

The procedure to be followed is set out in clear terms. It seems to me that hon. members will know the reasoning of the commission and will be able to set forth their arguments right here in the House of Commons. In conclusion, I do not really see that the proposal before us would do much to prevent objections. There will always be differences of opinion. If an hon. member has already made his case at a public hearing before a decision has been reached, if he is unhappy about a name change, for instance, this can be dealt with in the House of Commons as has been done many times in the past. With regard to the boundaries themselves, we decided several years ago to set up an independent commission to take these things out of politics. I believe we should retain that system.

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the most interesting discussion initiated in connection with the bill in the name of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) is one which engages the concern of all of us. The hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Foster) has referred to the major reform which took place in 1964 when the procedure for defining the boundaries of constituencies in Canada was taken out of politics. This reform had been long advocated by public-spirited and responsible citizens.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And long opposed in Parliament.

Mr. Blair: Yes. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) should know. It was long opposed in Parliament. I was about to say it was for a long time a principle to which political parties and politicians paid much lip service but it was always observable that they were much more concerned about the principle of the non-political definition of political boundaries when their parties were out of office than when they were in office.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We were consistent.

Mr. Blair: The hon. member's party is always out of office and, therefore, always consistent. In any event, this was a major change and I believe it was a change which none of us would wish to disturb. However, like all changes, it produces disturbance. I conclude from what the hon. member for Edmonton West has said, and perhaps from what others have said, that virtue does not always bring its own reward: it sometimes leads to pain and tribulation.

However, I am sure that in the country in general there will be disagreement with the proposition which was advanced by the hon. member for Edmonton West and supported at least in part by my hon. friend from Algoma, that is, that we in this Parliament, as Members of Parliament, are the best judges of the type of constituencies we should represent and the boundaries of those constituencies. I think we should adopt a much more modest posture and recognize that the people of this country in every way possible have made it clear that they do not think we are the best judges at all. Our judgments on these matters in the past have always been partisan, they have been coloured by considerations of political advantage and we should do nothing in this chamber to undermine the new system by preparing the way for any type of regression to the old system.

There was a dark undertone in some of the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton West. He seemed to labour under the suspicion that the redistribution which took place under the new system was not free of political influence.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It certainly was not.

Mr. Blair: I do not know whether to be saddened by that charge or whether to be reassured. I might explain that statement by saying that at the time redistribution took place under the new system I was president of the Liberal Party in Ontario. When we first looked at the new electoral map in a serious way, a way which was not uncoloured by consideration of what it did to our party, our first conclusion was that it must have been organized by those awful fellows in other parties.

I think the conclusion of everyone who seriously examined the new electoral map was that the commission had not done a very good job and that politically it would be of advantage to other parties. This is precisely why Parliament in its wisdom and with the support, I am sure, of the majority of the Canadian people decided that the determination of boundary lines should be entrusted to independent commissions. I submit that we in this Parliament, because of our close involvement with the political process, are not able to judge this question equitably and fairly. Because of our intense involvement in the political process we are simply not able to judge these matters objectively and fairly in the interests of all.

• (4:40 p.m.)

I asked a question of my hon. friend from Edmonton West when he was speaking. His proposal is that if the provincial commissioners who determine the boundaries were to give extended reasons for the boundaries that they describe, this would make it easier for Parliament to understand what they had done and also, quite obviously, easier for him to object to what they have done. First of all, I should like to suggest to hon. members that there is nothing in the words of the hon. member for Edmonton West either today or on at least two other occasions in this Parliament to indicate for a minute that he has been inhibited or hampered in any way from objecting to what happened to his seat because reasons were not given for the boundaries that were set. He has been eloquent in his complaints against what the commission in Alberta did. But he needs, of course, bigger porters to carry the message.

The hon. member has had his opportunity in this Parliament to object to the procedure, but what he is really objecting to is the result. I am sure that he is in the position of all of us who have argued cases in the courts. When we lose the battle it is sometimes hard to accept the decision, but it must be accepted. As my hon. friend from Algoma (Mr. Foster) pointed out, when these kinds of decisions are made, the proper course is to draw back and perhaps accept the fact that the tribunal which makes the decisions is better informed and instructed than those of us who have particular points of view to argue.

I have not been unduly harsh with my hon. friend from Edmonton West because I know he is not using this bill in any sense as a vehicle to accommodate some difficulties he has had in his constituency. He has used his constituency, and others in the province of Alberta that he knows well, as examples of the difficulties that have occurred under this new method of redistribution.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I want to eliminate incompetence and ignorance in these matters.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): People who live in glass houses should be careful.

Mr. Blair: The difficulties that are bound to occur are obvious to all of us. There are certain practical factors that nobody can get around. The first is that there has to be a basic numerical unit of representation, because no matter what we think, we must try to achieve the principle of one man, one vote. In view of the nature of this country, variations are called for. There is the well known tolerance of 25 per cent up or down on the electoral quotient. Because of the vastness of this country we also have problems of geography and the problem of connecting in one constituency areas with different traditions, different occupations, different attitudes.

These problems are inescapable. The only way we can avoid them is by greatly increasing the number of constituencies or by doing violence to the principle of one man, one vote. Clearly, there is a limit on the number of constituencies that can effectively be represented in this Parliament, and certainly no one would wish to incur the greater danger of not having some equality of representation in order to get over these other problems. There is no perfect solution, and probably never will be in our country, to this problem of forming constituencies that are consistent in terms of their interests and occupations and which at the same time bear some rough proportion to the electoral quotient and bring about equality of voters.

We have established procedures which should enable all of these various points of view to be given their full weight and full play. The statute provides that before electoral boundaries are determined by a commission, the commission must hold public hearings. This gives everybody in the province and in the constituency affected an opportunity to make their views known, including Members of Parliament and prospective Members of Parliament. It will include in the next year or so any member of this House who, on the basis of his experience, has profound and sensible observations to make on the decisions of the representation commissioners.

Added to that is the procedure which has been referred to at length both by the hon. member for Edmonton West and by the hon. member for Algoma, of having a formal discussion in this chamber of the effect of the redistribution proposed by the commissions. This gives Members of Parliament a specialized forum, an opportunity which other citizens do not possess, to register their objections to the decisions. I do not suggest that objection would be registered personally by every Member of Parliament because I am quite sure they would speak responsibly on behalf of substantial bodies of citizens. Again, the procedure provides that after debates of this kind in this House the representation commissioners are to review their decisions and make such changes as they deem necessary.

On top of all this procedure the hon. member for Edmonton West proposes one small addition. He says it would add to public understanding and facilitate debate if in their report the commissioners give detailed arguments for the decisions they have made. There is nothing that prevents them from doing that. It may be some of them feel that if they endeavour to write long and involved reasons for complicated decisions it would have no effect other than to stir up debate. On the other hand, it may be that some of them feel there is no need to offer explanations after a subject like this has been in the domain of public discussion. Perhaps some of them feel that in future there are special areas where a full explanation is required in order to bring about full understanding of what has been done.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Great responsibility and great discretion resides in these commissions. I doubt that they would be assisted with the results they achieved if they were forced to explain in detail and at length the decisions they have made. Personally, I am not persuaded that the hon. member's bill, if adopted, would add anything of substance to this total process. I think there are reasons to believe it might even complicate the process. I do not think a case has been made for a change of this magnitude, and if the bill were to come to a vote I would be disposed to vote against it and would urge others to do so.

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate on Bill C-44 put forward by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). Being a neophyte in this chamber, I did not pay too much attention to the redistribution bill when its effects were first felt before the last election. At that time I was in the civil service and did not pay too much attention to such things. However, as a matter of principle I feel very strongly about this bill and the establishment of an independent commission to set the boundaries of electoral areas or constituencies in an objective and non-partisan manner.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton West to the effect that such boundaries were not necessarily set in a non-partisan manner and that perhaps other influences came to bear when the boundaries were set. After looking at the bill, however, I find both merit and some disadvantage in the intentions of the hon. member in his amendment. As I have indicated, I support his desire to have the members of commissions give reasons for their decisions in respect of boundaries but I cannot support any suggestion that the independent actions of the commission be jeopardized. To undertake such action would be a backward step.

The removal of partisan considerations in the redrawing of electoral boundaries in favour of independent non-partisan commissions was in my opinion a major step forward for democracy in this country. We are aware that debate in the House of Commons would of necessity add a partisan tinge to redistribution, and surely we do not wish this to happen. I gather from the remarks of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) and others that up to the last election there was much debate as to where boundaries should fall within constituencies. The hon. members had several advantages or disadvantages to consider. I suppose the greatest advantage sought by all was a political one because of the voting habits of the people in certain areas. Furthermore, the prospect of the House of Commons having to debate objections raised, however well-founded they may be, for each of the 264 electoral districts of Canada is staggering and, I venture to add, a waste of the time of Parliament.

Surely it is our duty to govern and take action on the important issues facing the nation. I for one do not believe a debate on particular electoral boundaries should consume time that Parliament could devote to the more important issues which face us now and which will face us in the future.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is an example of the political purity I was talking about. It is great stuff.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): It is unfortunate that the commissions, at the time of the last redistribution under the act, did not have to provide their reasons for so doing, especially in relation to those boundaries which drew strong objections at the public hearings which were held. In my riding of Kamloops-Cariboo several decisions were made by the commission which appear to be against the sentiments expressed in section 13 (c) (i) and (ii) of the act. These subsections relate to special geographic considerations and community of interest.

In order to reach the northern sector of the Cariboo part of my riding I must travel through the communities of 100 Mile House and Williams Lake, both of which are part of the Coast-Chilcotin riding. I must do this to reach Quesnel. These three centres are on the Cariboo highway, but Quesnel is the most northerly. Even though Quesnel has a great deal in common with the rest of my riding, it makes little sense to have to travel through a large part of the constituency of Coast-Chilcotin. Using geographic considerations, it would have been much more sensible to include Williams Lake and 100 Mile House in the Cariboo riding and have Quesnel attached to the Prince George-Peace River electoral district. I know there were objections raised by the community of Quesnel, the city council, the Chamber of Commerce and other citizens. They felt there was a very strong community of interest with Prince George and that they were not part of the Kamloops-Cariboo constituency. I am not making these remarks in any way to indicate that I am unhappy with having Quesnel as part of my riding. I have developed a great relationship with the people there. I know they have made a great contribution to the contribution I am able to make as a Member of Parliament.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private member's business has now expired. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2 (1).

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, September 20, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

TRADE

REPORT BY MINISTER OF FINANCE ON GROUP OF TEN MEETING—TABLING OF COMMUNIQUÉ AND STATEMENT OF CANADIAN POSITION

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a brief report to the House on the meeting in London last Wednesday and Thursday of ministers and governors of the Group of Ten.

I wish to table copies in English and French of the communiqué issued by the Group of Ten and of my statement of the Canadian position.

This was the first opportunity for ministers to examine the world monetary situation in light of the program announced on August 15 by President Nixon to correct the very serious balance of payments deficit of the United States.

All ministers recognized that a fundamental disequilibrium exists in world payments and that action on a wide front will be necessary to deal with it. We have all come away from the meeting with a much clearer understanding of positions. All of us appreciate that difficult work lies ahead, and nobody expected overnight solutions. As far as I am aware, the world has never been faced by a financial and economic negotiation of such complexity and sensitivity. The plain fact is that differences of opinion have emerged among leading nations as to the order of priorities for the major policy adjustments that are necessary. It will take time for governments to decide on such actions in light of the positions of every other government. In the meantime important work will proceed in Working Party Three of the Economic Policy Committee of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, as well as among the deputies of the Group of Ten. The ministers and governors will meet again on September 26 in Washington, in advance of the annual meeting of the International Monetary Fund.

In my remarks to the meeting as Minister of Finance of Canada I emphasized the urgency of the situation and the need to grapple positively with the issues involved. I stated frankly that the most important steps of the United States—the surcharge, the investment tax credit and the so-called DISC proposal—are protectionist in nature. They represent a departure from traditional American policies. I suggested that action is long overdue to dismantle protectionist policies on the part of Europe and Japan that have hindered the process of adjustment and that have too often been directed at U.S. products. I said that immediate adjustments would be assisted if the U.S. could make a more precise statement of essential preconditions for the removal of the surcharge.

Canada recognizes that the payments position of the United States will be corrected, one way or another. We have suggested that the real issue is the way in which the correction will occur. We hope it will occur in an environment of continued economic expansion in the world. We hope it will not occur through an unravelling of the freer trade arrangements secured in the last quarter century. We must act together in constructive ways before such a pattern of restriction sets in.

• (2:10 p.m.)

No country has more at stake in these matters than Canada. We intend to participate actively and responsibly in these discussions and provide leadership wherever we can.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to welcome the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) back to Canada and to the House of Commons. There was a little concern that he might not be allowed to return, that his services might be required to deal with these financial and economic negotiations of such complexity and sensitivity.

I do not intend to speak at any length, Mr. Speaker. I think the minister will agree with me that we have already read in the press just about everything that he said in the House today. We understood that there were no solutions. We recognize, as he pointed out, that a good deal of time will be required to work out some of these difficulties. We understood, too, that there were fundamental differences of opinion among some of the important countries and blocs attending the conference. We agree that it would be helpful if the United States were to state its preconditions for the removal of the surcharge a little more precisely. However, I gather from the minister's statement that the United States is not yet prepared to do so.

The minister has confirmed the press reports of what he said at the meeting about the positions of other countries. We can agree with his expression of opinion about the protectionist aspect of the move taken by the United States. He also expressed his opinion about what the European Common Market and Japan should do. However, I think it would have been more helpful to the House and the country if the minister had told us what measures, if any, the other countries have suggested that Canada should take. This has not been disclosed and I suggest it is very important.

There were rumours, for example, that the IMF had suggested that we should peg our dollar well above that of the United States. The minister has not told us whether other countries, the United States, for example, are insisting that Canada should move in any particular direction.

He has not told us whether the European Common Market countries are taking any position as to the direction which Canada should take with regard to the Canadian dollar or other aspects of Canadian policy. The minister has simply told us what he suggested other countries should do. I suggest it is very important to Canadians, in considering our position and our difficulties, that we have what we have not yet had, a frank disclosure by the minister or the Prime Minister as to what pressures, if any, for a change in position have been directed against Canada and by what countries.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, there may well be a reason why the minister had to be so unrevealing in his statement. It may well be that the discussions which were held in private and the negotiations which will continue made it impossible for him to tell Parliament and the people of Canada anything at all. But I must say as one member of the House that I am becoming increasingly frustrated by these non-statements and generalizations that there were differences of opinion when everyone in the world knows that to be so, and these generalizations and platitudes about the need for corrections to take place in a state of economic expansion rather than contraction, with which everyone agrees. I have a feeling that if ministers cannot say more than that, if they cannot be more meaningful than that, perhaps the practice of making these reports ought to be abandoned, because the minister said nothing at all.

I and the people of Canada would like to know whether there was any indication from the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States that consideration is being given to the removal of the surcharge. We do not merely want to know what are the preconditions but are they going to remove it? I had hoped the minister would tell us whether he discussed with Mr. Connally Canada's appeal for the removal of the surcharge with respect to Canada, and whether he had any encouragement. I suspect, since he did not refer to it, that either he did not discuss it, which I find unimaginable, or he discussed it and did not get encouraging answers. If that is the case he ought to have told us.

What the minister has brought back to us is an admission that he refused to make some weeks ago, namely, that what Canada and the western world face is not a short-range problem but a long-range problem, that the various protectionist, or what I have called in the House reactionary, policies of the Nixon administration that are working against the western world, which is what they are doing, are not going to be of short duration and are not going to disappear. Neither the surcharge nor the tax credit nor the DISC program is going to disappear in a short time. Therefore it is important for the government and Parliament to consider some long-range economic adjustments to meet the evils and undoubted serious consequences of the American protectionist policy.

I think the minister's report underlines the inadequacy, almost the irrelevancy, of Bill C-262 which we debated here. The temporary measure that the government produced cannot really meet the position at all. I also suggest that the minister would do the country and Parliament a great deal more service if he would tell us what Canada and the Canadian government are preparing to do in order to deal with the long-range economic problem that will get worse before it gets better, if it gets better, in less than a year or two. From my reading of the American temper at the moment, it is clear that Washington does not intend to abandon this protectionist role, that the policy of turning inward to deal with the problems of the United States is one that will be of long duration, that their determination to make the western world help to solve these problems is very strong, and that, therefore, we must look at some long-range solutions of our own and in unison with other countries if we can find a general policy.

Finally, I would hope that when speaking in Europe the minister pointed out to the United States, as I hope he will when he speaks again, that it is not only world trade by any means that is responsible for the American balance of payments problems but that their military commitments carry a major responsibility, and that reducing them is, perhaps, the way in which to help peace as well as the international economic security.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I read very quickly but I listened very closely to the statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) in which he said the following:

So far as I am aware, the world has never been faced by a financial and economic negotiation of such complexity and sensitivity.

Mr. Speaker I am certainly not an expert in international problems. However, if we use the good common sense with which one should study the problems we now have in Canada and which do not seem to be different from those encountered by the United States and several other countries, it appears that countries, as a rule, are faced with overproduction and goods of all kinds and that each country is trying to protect its own domestic economy by resorting to the means taken by the United States on August 15, 1971.

In view of the circumstances, and even if those problems are considered very serious, I feel that if we were up against a world famine, we would probably be wiser and perhaps more capable of finding solutions. It would seem easier to me, judging from the discussions held by the Group of Ten.

Without resorting to "overnight solutions" as the Minister of Finance said a while ago, we must look into those problems more rapidly. We must not spend years doing it. Indeed, Canada should set the example: instead of retorting with statements which may only embroil matters, the government should enact a discount on prices, stimulate consumption of goods made in this country develop our Canadian economy. This would be an example for the United States where doubtless there are as in Canada, families whose needs are not being satisfied. Even though it is said that the Americans number 200 million and that theirs is a rich country, I have had the opportunity this summer of visiting certain regions of that country and to see there, just as in Canada, poor families in a rich country.

I feel that at the new meeting of the Group of Ten, the Minister of Finance will advocate, without prejudice to Canada, the application of a policy fit for human beings who happen to be willing to reach the objective of production, by making all other people benefit from it.

In order to enable Canada and the United States to attain this objective, it will be necessary to steer off the beaten tracks, to adopt a new policy and, instead of overtaxing, to grant discounts leading to a decrease in prices and an increase in purchasing power.

In my view, unless different measures are taken, we shall see, as we did during the period from 1935 to 1940, economic rivalry between countries which can only lead to war.

• (2:20 p.m.)

I would not wish that we take the same means at this time because we would undoubtedly get the same results, which would be unfortunate. We are in peacetime and we have huge stocks of products manufactured by the population. Let us be wise enough, at least with our possibilities throughout the world, to transport that wealth to those who need it. Let us be wise enough to find the financial means to reach that goal.

That is my suggestion in answer to the statement of the Minister of Finance.

* * *

[English]

GRAIN

WITHHOLDING BY GOVERNMENT OF PAYMENTS UNDER TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES ACT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave under Standing Order 43 to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should immediately pay to the Canadian Wheat Board the sums required by law to be paid, as specified in the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act of 1956.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. Under the terms of Standing Order 43 this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Questions

AIR CANADA AND CPA—POOLING OF SERVICES

Question No. 1,293—Mr. Mather:

Is consideration being given to pooling the services of Air Canada and CPA in the international flight field to offset the costs of the new larger aircraft and the operational losses entailed by the airlines?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. No consideration is being given to the pooling of air services between Air Canada and CPA in the international flight field. However, some technical discussions between the carriers are being held with a view to exploring certain common problems of cost saving in the operation of new large aircraft.

CLASSIFICATION ADJUSTMENTS AS A RESULT OF LAST REPORT OF CLYNE COMMITTEE

Question No. 1,515—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How many classifications of public servants have had their salary ranges adjusted as a result of the last report of the Clyne Committee, as of June 1, 1971?

2. What are the classifications?

3. What were the adjustments?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): 1. As of June 1, 1971, the following classifications had had their salary range adjusted as a result of the last report of the Clyne Committee.

2. The classifications were Senior Executive Officers 1, 2, 3 and 4 (SX 1, 2, 3 and 4), Senior Executive Group, Executive Category, and Deputy Ministers 1, 2 and 3.

3. The adjustments effective January 1, 1971, were: SX 1 Former range, from $20,000 to $25,000 (with increments in multiples of $250); new range, from $21,000 to $26,000 (with increments in multiples of $100). SX 2 Former range, from $22,000 to $27,000 (with increments in multiples of $250); new range, from $23,000 to $29,000 (with increments in multiples of $100). SX 3 Former range, from $24,000 to $30,000 (with increments in multiples of $250); new range, from $26,000 to $32,000 (with increments in multiples of $100). SX 4DM 1 Former range, from $29,000 to $35,000 (with increments in multiples of $250); new range, from $31,500 to $37,500 (with increments in multiples of $100). DM 2 Former range, from $35,000 to $39,000; new range, from $37,500 to $42,000. DM 3 Former range, from $39,000 to $42,000; new range, from $42,000 to $46,000.

Note: Senior Executive Officers and Deputy Ministers are paid on the basis of merit.

REPRESENTATIONS FROM SASKATCHEWAN ANTI-TUBERCULOSIS LEAGUE AS A RESULT OF INCREASED POSTAL RATES

Question No. 1,597—Mr. McIntosh:

1. Has the Postmaster General received representations concerning the problem encountered by the Saskatchewan Anti-Tuberculosis League as a result of the increased postal rates on third class matter applicable to the League's Christmas Seal Campaign and, if so (a) what where they (b) what action has been taken?

2. Has the Minister given consideration to the effects of the increased postal rates on the Tuberculosis Prevention Program and, if so, what are such effects?

3. Will the Minister give consideration to the proposal that the increased postal rates for third class matter not apply to voluntary associations whose program funds are raised by a mail appeal?

Order for Return

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): 1. A request was received from the Saskatchewan Anti-Tuberculosis League that the increased third class postal rates not be applicable to voluntary associations whose program funds are raised by a mail appeal and in fact asked that a reduced third class rate be made applicable to such organizations. As we had received other similar requests the matter was already under study when this request was received.

2. The Saskatchewan Anti-Tuberculosis League maintains that the adverse effects of increased postal rates will be to the detriment of their over-all program.

3. By virtue of the powers vested in me by the Post Office Act, I could establish preferential postage rates for non-profitable charitable, humanitarian or voluntary organizations. Such measure would, however, be fraught with far reaching consequences extending beyond the scope of the Post Office. It would entail the setting of special postage rates based upon extraordinary welfare or social considerations; this would be tantamount to shifting the burden of foregone postal revenue to users of other classes of mail or to the general taxpayer. The question would have to be resolved as to how the Post Office could pass value judgment on the individual merits of particular charitable, humanitarian, welfare or voluntary organizations (of which there are some 35,000 registered with the Department of National Revenue as charitable institutions for income tax purposes) as opposed to organizations engaged in other worthwhile endeavours, without running the risk of being accused of discrimination. It would be impracticable and inequitable to set rates favouring a particular type, or types of organizations whose members may claim that their activities are of benefit to the public at large.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE PUBLICATION "THE LIGHTER"

Question No. 1,626—Mr. Mather:

1. What is the annual cost of the Department of Agriculture's publication The Lighter?

2. What consideration is being given to ceasing production of The Lighter, in view of the Department of National Health and Welfare's efforts to reduce tobacco induced diseases?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): 1. Cost for printing and typesetting annually for four issues, $3,480; cost of editorial services, etc., (departmental) approximately, $3,000; approximately per annum, $6,500.

2. No consideration is being given to discontinuing publication of The Lighter. This periodical does not promote the use of tobacco but conveys information to producers and the industry on current research to develop less hazardous tobacco products, a research objective quite consistent with the aims of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

* * *

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

RESEARCH IN ARCTIC

Question No. 1,610—Mr. Brewin:

1. Does the government participate in the Arctic Institute of North America and, if so (a) what is the extent and purpose of its participation (b) does it do so through the Department of National Defence or the Defence Research Board?

2. Was access to the St. Elias Mountain Range in the Yukon granted to the United States military for research and study and, if so, what is the nature of the research and study carried on by the United States military?

3. Have Canada and the United States undertaken joint military research in the Arctic and, if so (a) where and what is the nature of such military research (b) are any such joint research projects now under way and what is their purpose?

4. Has research conducted in the Canadian Arctic over the past five years included research in chemical and biological warfare and, if so (a) by whom was such research conducted (b) was it under the supervision of the Canadian Armed Forces?

Return tabled.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—ADDITIONAL GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO CREATE JOBS—ESTABLISHMENT OF SHORT-TERM FORECASTING UNIT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Last Thursday the right hon. gentleman expressed some uncertainty about the need for immediate additional governmental measures to create jobs in the country. Now that he has had time for reflection and, indeed, for consultation within the government, I should like to ask him whether he has determined upon a course of action and when we may expect to see some action with regard to job creation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have nothing to add to what the Acting Prime Minister said on Friday—that the government is considering all forms of action and that an announcement will be made in due course if further action is decided upon.

Mr. Stanfield: In order to give the context I should like to remind the Prime Minister of a statement he made on July 23: "The unemployment rate as a trend is falling and we are convinced our policies will lead to good results." I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman whether he still holds to that assessment of the unemployment trend, and what he means, in a word or two, by "good results".

Mr. Trudeau: As I indicated, on Thursday, I believe, the assessment still holds for all workers over 25. Indeed, I think it holds for workers over 20 years of age. The problem is with the teenage group which has entered the work force, or which has not left the work force after the summer period, at a vastly different rate from the past. This is the aspect of the problem with which we are concerning ourselves.

Mr. Stanfield: I am sure the Prime Minister would be among the first to agree about the importance of young Canadians as well as of other Canadians. I should like to put to him a question I have frequently addressed to the Minister of Finance in connection with a recommendation made several times by the Economic Council of Canada.

Is the Prime Minister now prepared to have the government support the establishment of a short-term economic forecasting unit independent of the government but receiving government support? I ask this question in view of the very bad forecasting, indeed, the disastrous forecasting which has been forthcoming.

With respect, Mr. Speaker, that is the recommendation of the Economic Council of Canada, and certainly the forecasts are questionable. I ask the Prime Minister whether he is prepared to have the government carry out that recommendation?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not agree with the statement in the question that the forecasting was disastrous. I would admit that in the matter of statistics one cannot arrive at the utmost precision. However, I am not convinced that setting up a department to control a department which is already engaged in short-term forecasting alongside the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada is necessary at this time.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): May I ask the Prime Minister whether I understood one of his answers correctly—that the government feels no special measures are necessary with respect to unemployed people aged 25 years and over, that everything is going well for that group of unemployed and that the government is considering only the problem of teenage unemployment? Did I understand the Prime Minister to say that?

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member did not understand me correctly. What I said was that the forecasting we had and the budgetary measures we took were showing very positive effects as regards these other age groups, and that as regards these other age groups I saw no need at this time to announce further measures. But the figures released on Thursday did bring to light the new phenomenon of the drastic rise in unemployment of those registered as unemployed among the teenagers. That is what I answered to the Leader of the Opposition.

UNEMPLOYMENT—FURTHER BUDGETARY MEASURES TO DEAL WITH ECONOMIC SITUATION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Without accepting the Prime Minister's statement last week about what the statistics mean, a statement which I think is not accurate, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he has any intention to bring in a budget or budgetary measures to deal with the economic situation?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter for decision by the government and of course it is under review. I should like to point out that the actual number of unemployed in the above 25 age group is 3.7 per cent among men and 2.7 per cent among women and has been declining since mid-1970.

GOVERNMENT GOALS RESPECTING EMPLOYMENT AND INFLATION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to those asked by the Leader of the Opposition of the Prime Minister. Last Thursday I directed a question to the Prime Minister concerning whether the government had any goals or projections and the Prime Minister answered yes to part of that question. I should like to ask a very direct question today. In view of the fact that President Nixon did present some goals to Congress in his state of the union message last week, has the government any goals—I do not want to get into disagreement about projections—relating to employment and inflation and, if so, what are they?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, but they would be expressed in very general terms. We believe in a progressively expanding economy. We believe in the lowest possible rate of unemployment and, as the Leader of the Opposition now refers to, the idea of a just society.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again we have six or seven members rising on supplementaries. I would suggest to hon. members that we should try to limit supplementaries to individual members, go on to another subject and eventually, I hope, return to the original question. For the moment the hon. member for Annapolis Valley has a supplementary.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, reducing some of the general terms of the answer of the Prime Minister to something a little more specific, does the government have any goal with regard to the rate of inflation and/or the percentage of unemployment which are unacceptable, necessitating further government programs to alleviate either or both of these conditions?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. What we are aiming for is the slowest possible rate of employment—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —the slowest possible rate of inflation—

An hon. Member: You were right the first time.

Mr. Trudeau: —with the highest possible employment.

UNEMPLOYMENT—FORECAST FOR COMING WINTER

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Finance. In view of the confidence that has been expressed by the Minister of Finance in the House that unemployment will continue to decline and in view of the fact that the minister has at his disposal elaborate forecasting machinery, would he care to predict to the House the level of unemployment we may expect in September and in the coming winter months?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nystrom: Would the minister care to explain to the House why his unemployment forecasts are consistently wrong—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ESTABLISHMENT OF PRICE AND WAGE GUIDELINES TO CONTROL INFLATION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley. Is the government now giving consideration to the establishment of price and wage guidelines with effective penalties to prevent non-compliance in order to try to control inflation which increased during the first eight months of the year at an annual rate of 6 per cent? If so, when does the government intend to announce such guidelines?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree, as usual, with the figures quoted by the hon. member, but if he will look back he will see that we have been answering to the House for some time that we were considering this. As to an announcement, of course we would only announce it after the government had made up its mind.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister will check with Statistics Canada he will find that my figures are correct.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a supplementary?

Mr. Hees: Yes. In view of the very serious and rapidly rising inflation, how long does the government intend to persist in its business as usual or do nothing attitude?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That of course is debate. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate on a supplementary and then the hon. member for Greenwood on a different subject, returning eventually to this subject after a number of other questions are asked.

GOVERNMENT POSITION RESPECTING UNEMPLOYED UNDER AGE 25—REMOVAL OF SALES TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS TO STIMULATE HOUSING CONSTRUCTION

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of persistent statements on Thursday and again today that the government considers it has not lost the fight to create jobs because there are not as many unemployed in the age group above 25, has the government taken the conscious position that unemployed people who are under age 25 are not as important as those above age 25, and will we see in the government's program any policy which reflects this kind of thinking?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is no. In respect of the second part, the hon. member will see any announcements if and when and they are made.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. I wonder whether the Minister of Finance could indicate to the House whether he has received representations from Harold G. Shipp, president of the Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada, suggesting that there will be a very substantial increase in the cost of housing in the last quarter of 1971 and asking whether the minister will accept the positive suggestion that the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials and other related taxation on housing be reassessed in order to try to stimulate growth in this particular area?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, from the forecasts I have seen this is going to be the best housing year in Canada's history with housing starts over 225,000.

* * *

COMMUNICATIONS

CLOSING OF TORONTO "TELEGRAM"—SUGGESTED MEETING OF PRIME MINISTER, ONTARIO PREMIER AND PUBLISHER ON PLAN TO MAINTAIN OPERATION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the economic dislocation which will result from the shutdown of the operations of the Toronto Telegram and in view of the public interest in maintaining a competitive press in the metropolitan areas of Canada, will the Prime Minister get in touch with the Prime Minister of Ontario and the publisher of the Toronto Telegram with a view to seeing whether some plan can be worked out for the continued operation of the newspaper?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course the shutdown of the Telegram is of concern to those who are interested in seeing the pursuance of the policy of a free and vigorous press in this country, but I do not believe the suggestion of the hon. member is one I could take up because I understand the publisher himself has said he does not want any form of government intervention.

Mr. Brewin: If that suggestion would not work, would the Prime Minister, in light of the expressed willingness of the employees of the Toronto Telegram to invest in the continued operation of this paper, suggest to the publisher that he should defer shutting down the operation until an effort is made to continue the operation by a co-operative including employees and readers of the newspaper?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, that is a different line of questioning. If it were necessary for me to serve as a go-between between the workers and their employer and if they have that confidence in me, I do not see any impossibility in following the suggestion, but I have had no request from the workers to put their point of view to the employer and it seems to me they are perfectly able to do that themselves.

CLOSING OF TORONTO "TELEGRAM"—INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGED BREACH OF COMBINES ACT

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Are the minister or his officials in receipt of a telegram from Robert Pryor, chairman of the Council of Toronto Newspaper Unions, with regard to the sale of the Toronto Telegram assets constituting a breach of the restrictive trade practices provisions of the Combines Investigation Act and, if so, is it the intention of the minister and his officials to investigate this matter?

• (2:40 p.m.)

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the wire I got was sent to my colleague, the Minister for External Affairs, who immediately referred it to me for attention, being the good member for Toronto that he is. In the normal course of events the Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act would examine the effects of a major development such as this in order to determine whether the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act were breached. This will be the case in these circumstances. I should point out that even if the Combines Investigation Act were violated in some way, that violation would hardly be of assistance to the newspaper in carrying on its business.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Does he not believe that the continuation of the third largest newspaper in this country is of sufficient importance for him or one of his ministers to get in touch with the publisher of the Toronto Telegram to determine whether something can be done to keep that newspaper going?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that this is an argument rather than a question.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, if we cannot ask these important questions of the Prime Minister, then Parliament is at a loss—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the hon. member finds ways to answer these very important questions.

* * *

[Translation]

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST FOR GRANT TO ESTABLISH CARDBOARD MANUFACTURING PLANT AT CABANO

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Has an application for a grant been filed with his Department by the Société populaire des pâtes et papiers du Québec which plans establishing a cardboard plant in Cabano but is now facing major financial problems? If so, what reply has been given to that company?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I shall inquire, Mr. Speaker, and report to the hon. member.

[English]

INCOME TAX

SUGGESTED CREDIT TO CANADIAN FARM MACHINERY MANUFACTURERS TO OFFSET FOREIGN COMPETITION AND STIMULATE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that sales of foreign-made tractors and other equipment in this country are rapidly increasing, will the government give consideration to authorizing a corporate income tax credit of 10 per cent of the value of made in Canada capital equipment purchased during the year as a stimulant to employment?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if we were considering any such announcement it would, of course, affect tax policy and would be made in the normal manner through a budget.

AMENDMENT OF BILL TO INCREASE EXEMPTIONS ALLOWED FOR CHILDREN

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In light of the FISP decision to take family allowances away from 1.4 million Canadian families, and in light of the government's acceptance that the costs of raising a family today have risen dramatically, which the Prime Minister will know soon, is the government going to amend its new tax bill to substantially increase child exemptions for all Canadian families?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister describe FISP as an example of the government's selective or sleight-of-hand humanitarianism?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

U.S. CLAIM TO MACHIAS SEAL ISLAND AND COASTGUARD INVASION OF WATERS IN DIXON ENTRANCE—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would he tell the House the extent to which Canada is exerting itself in pursuance of our sovereignty over Machias Seal Island which is apparently also being claimed by the United States? Can he explain what steps we are taking in that regard?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have always regarded this island as a Canadian island, and that continues to be our position.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Am I to take it then that apart from that declaration the government is taking no deliberate action?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I can think of nothing stronger to say than that it is our island.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, would the minister like to be as definite and forthright about that area off the Pacific coast in Dixon Entrance which is Canadian territory but which has been invaded from time to time by U.S. coastguard vessels?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we do regard that also as Canadian territory, but the United States does not accept our position.

* * *

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN PROPOSAL FOR RESTORATION OF FINANCIAL STABILITY

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of Mr. U Thant's statement that the United Nations is financially bankrupt, has the Canadian government any proposal to put before the General Assembly or the Security Council in order to get this organization in a more satisfactory financial situation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, you will recall that I made some proposals for economies in words as well as in expenses of the United Nations, and these have been acted on to some extent but not as far as we would like to have been. We hope this will be of some value, and of course we always pay our own contributions promptly, which is more than can be said for some countries.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, will the Canadian government put forward any resolution at the meetings of the United Nations in an attempt to get those nations which are in a deficit position as far as their payments are concerned to pay up?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. We have been endeavouring to do this for a number of years but with indifferent success.

[Later:]

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the question regarding the statement of the Secretary General of the United Nations about the intolerable financial situation of the organization. Does the government intend, when Premier Kosygin is here next month, to bring up with him the matter of the unpaid dues owing by the U.S.S.R. to the United Nations?

Mr. Sharp: No, I would not think so, Mr. Speaker. We have other matters of at least as great urgency of a multilateral character and also bilateral relations between Canada and the Soviet Union to discuss. We have been pressing for a resolution of that question where we should, at the United Nations itself. There are more countries than the Soviet Union involved.

[Mr. Howard (Skeena).]

CANADIAN POSITION RESPECTING TYPE OF SECRETARY GENERAL REQUIRED

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question in relation to the United Nations. Perhaps it is more of a related than a supplementary question. Does the Canadian government subscribe to the position of a weak Secretary General as outlined yesterday over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation by our ambassador to the United Nations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much that our ambassador would have said any such thing, but I can certainly say the government of Canada hopes that the successor to U Thant will be a strong and very imaginative man because the world needs a strong Secretary General at the United Nations.

* * *

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the Prime Minister will be visiting Winnipeg before the Kosygin visit, and plans to speak to the Ukrainian-Canadian community of that area, would he have the hon. member for High Park proofread his speech so he will not again alienate the Ukrainian Canadians?

Mr. Speaker: Order please. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Deakon: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I should like to thank the hon. member for Edmonton Centre for his kind and gratuitous remark. I can assure him I have not reached this esteemed position yet, but I would like to recommend to all Canadians, especially those of Ukrainian and other ethnic origins, that they should listen to the Prime Minister's speech as I am sure it will be interesting and informative.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, speaking of the Prime Minister's speeches, I notice he has been making a study of the practices of businessmen among the ancient Phoenicians, and I was wondering whether this is the origin of the government's current economic theories and standards?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I suggest to hon. members that we should perhaps limit the number of supplementary questions. I make this as a suggestion to hon. members as we will be running short of time in a few minutes. Perhaps we should make an attempt to give as many members as possible an opportunity to ask questions.

* * *

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

APPOINTMENT OF NEW CHAIRMAN

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister when he will announce the new head of the Economic Council of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Rather soon, Mr. Speaker.

* * *

AGRICULTURE

ACTION TO OFFSET IMPACT OF UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX ON SMALL FRUITS AND POTATOES

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Agriculture. What action is the government taking in light of the statement by the Minister of Agriculture, found at page 7588 of Hansard, having regard to stabilizing the prices of certain agricultural products which are adversely affected either directly or indirectly by the United States surcharge, and I am thinking especially of such items as small fruits, including blueberries, and potatoes?

• (2:50 p.m.)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The Department of Agriculture is looking at the variety of products, product by product, in an effort to see what should be done in a variety of situations about the impact on the price of the Canadian producer.

REQUEST FOR ALLOCATION OF PORTION OF FUNDS UNDER EMPLOYMENT SUPPORT BILL TO PRODUCERS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): I should like to address a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Has the government received representations from Mr. Turner, president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, that a portion of the $80 million designed to assist those sectors of the economy affected by the U.S. import surcharge should be allocated for agricultural producers? If so, can he inform the House as to the nature of the government's reply?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did reply to a letter along these lines indicating that certain sectors of the agricultural community would benefit from their share of the $80 million when it had to do with agricultural products which were processed in some way. As to the others that would not qualify for any share of that amount, I repeated what the Minister of Agriculture had told the House, namely, that we would use existing legislation where possible and necessary to assist the agricultural sector of the economy.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock.

Mr. Gleave: I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock but perhaps I might allow a supplementary question to the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. Again I bring to the attention of hon. members that if we have three, four or more supplementary questions we will again run short of time.

Mr. Gleave: May I ask the Prime Minister whether in the Department of Agriculture or any other agency of the government there is in hand a definite program which will attempt to deal with various agricultural products as they are affected by the U.S. policy?

Mr. Trudeau: I will refer the question to the Minister of Agriculture and perhaps he can be invited by the hon. member to answer the question in the House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry; the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock has his difficulties today. Again I have to apologize to him, but the hon. member for Egmont is rising on a point of order.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, this is the second occasion on which the Prime Minister has indicated that the House will have to wait for the Minister of Agriculture. As the question involves many perishable products and the minister has been absent from the House for some days, would it not be possible for some member of the administration to answer these important questions so that the farmers of this country may know where they stand?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock.

* * *

COMMUNICATIONS

CLOSING OF TORONTO "TELEGRAM"—PREVENTION OF CONCENTRATION OF PUBLIC INFORMATION IN FEWER HANDS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): My question is for the Secretary of State. It is in connection with the impending shutdown of the Toronto Telegram. Would the minister be prepared to receive and consider representations from interested parties, including Members of Parliament, aimed at preventing a further concentration of public information in fewer and fewer hands, which will be the result of this closure?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, when representations are made to a federal department, I fail to see how the minister can possibly refuse to receive them.

* * *

[English]

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON STUDY OF DEVELOPMENT OF GUARANTEED INCOME PLAN

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): My question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Would the minister advise the House if and when he is going to make a statement with regard to the $15 million study of a guaranteed income development plan, outlining comprehensively the terms of reference and the objectives?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As I have already indicated, we are prepared to participate with the provinces—and the government has so indicated to them—in experimental guaranteed annual income projects. Manitoba has put forward a project that we have indicated we are prepared to look at, and I believe Ontario is considering one also.

Mr. Marshall: In view of the answer given would the minister advise whether, since the government is making this study, the family income security legislation just introduced will meet the needs of the people, or does this study mean that it will not meet the needs of the poor people of Canada?

* * *

THE MINISTRY

SUGGESTED REPLACEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE BECAUSE OF ALLEGED UNCERTAINTY OF ECONOMIC ANALYSES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I should like to come back to earlier questions on the economy. Because many of us are concerned about the Prime Minister's uncertainty regarding economic trends, is the Prime Minister prepared now to admit that he has some very serious doubts about the economic analyses put forward by the Minister of Finance and his department with respect to where we are and where we are going and, if he does, has he given any consideration to asking the Minister of Finance whether he would voluntarily step aside and let someone else take over that portfolio?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

* * *

GRAIN

STUDIES OF HANDLING AND TRANSPORTATION

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who is in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. Has the study on grain handling and transportation been completed and when can we expect him to make it public?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Certain parts of these studies have reached a stage at which discussions are going on in a confidential way with some of the companies most interested in them. No decision has been made yet about the date when the final form of the study may be available.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. Does the report make any recommendations concerning the building of inland grain terminals on the Prairies for cleaning and processing grain in order to make the operation more efficient?

[Mr. Marshall.]

Mr. Lang: As has been indicated many times, the studies are very comprehensive and deal with a whole variety of possibilities, including the cost of the existing system. The basic object is to put the facts of the various choices before the producers so as to enable them to make a decision about the eventual system. The studies as such, therefore, do not make recommendations but set out facts and figures which will give some guidance to the people who will want to look at them.

* * *

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CLOSING OF PULP MILL, SHEET HARBOUR, N.S.—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Elmer MacKay (Central Nova): I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the critical economic condition which besets the east shore of Nova Scotia, occasioned by the closure of the Scott Maritimes Pulp Mill, practically the community's only industry, can the minister tell us what steps, if any, are being taken to alleviate the situation?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I will inquire and report to the hon. member.

Mr. Muir: Don't you know anything at all?

[Later:]

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): My question is supplementary to an earlier one asked by my colleague from Nova Scotia, and I direct it to either the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion or the Prime Minister. I am very disturbed. By nature of the reply I wonder whether the implication is that the Premier of Nova Scotia has not been in touch personally with the Prime Minister or with the minister in connection with the situation at Sheet Harbour?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Hees: No answer, as usual.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I must make some comment on the very misleading statements made by elected representatives both in the government opposite and in the government of Nova Scotia in regard to what is being done by these governments with respect to the unemployed at Sheet Harbour. I must object in the strongest possible terms. They have either been in touch or they have not been in touch, and I think the people of Sheet Harbour are entitled to a direct answer.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the answer is the same. I think I am authorized to make sure of the facts before giving an answer. I will do that immediately and you will get the answer tomorrow.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

IMMEDIATE INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO ASSIST PROVINCES TO MEET WELFARE PAYMENTS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): My question is addressed to the Prime Minister. Last Thursday the Prime Minister would not say what the government was going to do about reforming the Canadian Assistance Plan because he wanted to have an opportunity to discuss the whole matter with the provinces. Does this mean that the government is prepared to reform the Canada Assistance Plan and to pay out more money to the provinces this winter to help finance their added welfare costs?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Not at this time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ryan: In light of the fact that Bill C-259 will not affect the economy immediately, is the government considering changing its legislative priorities and bringing forward tax cuts, FISP and CAP reforms now?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. The House knows that the taxation reform bill is the one which has great urgency and that we still want to keep it before the House as much as possible and get it through as soon as possible. But as the House leader has indicated, when that bill has been dealt with we hope there will be sufficient time to deal with other matters, including some that are suggested by the hon. member.

• (3:00 p.m.)

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—REQUEST FOR ACTION BY CANADA AT UNITED NATIONS TO HALT BLAST

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the need for urgent and immediate action to stop the proposed nuclear test at Amchitka Island early in October, will the Secretary of State for External Affairs consider having the Canadian delegation at the United Nations present a resolution to the General Assembly calling for a halt to the proposed nuclear test by the United States at Amchitka Island?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman and the House that the Canadian government will be pressing as hard as it can for the stopping of all tests of all kinds by the Soviet Union, by France, by China, and by the United States, including the Amchitka test which is the largest.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Speaker, will this request be made at the United Nations before the proposed test blast takes place early in October?

Mr. Sharp: I shall certainly be speaking before that date.

AGRICULTURE

CORN—REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT ON DECLINE IN MARKETS

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Agriculture. When may we expect the Minister of Agriculture back in the House, and is the government prepared at this time to indicate its policy with regard to representations made on the very serious decline in corn markets in Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the Minister of Agriculture is busy with Japanese trade missions in western Canada and will be back in the House within a couple of days. I am not sure when he will make a statement on that particular item, but I will bring the hon. member's question to his attention.

[Later:]

Mr. Lang: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wish to apologize to the House. Earlier I referred to the Minister of Agriculture meeting with Japanese trade missions at the present time. I understand now that those meetings are finished and that he is presently visiting important agricultural areas in Ontario.

* * *

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

POSSIBILITY OF COMPLETING ITEMS ON ORDER PAPER BEFORE END OF SESSION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the government House leader. In view of the exchange earlier about House business, is it the intention of the government to complete consideration of all the business on the order paper before this session ends and does the government intend, before this session ends, to introduce any new legislative proposals?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am not even equipped with short-range forecasting equipment, like the Minister of Finance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Thank heavens for that.

Mr. MacEachen: I find it difficult to forecast even what will happen in the chamber. The answer will depend a good deal on what does happen here. With all that qualifying uncertainty, I would like to advise the hon. member that before ending this session we propose to try to clear off the order paper all the items that have advanced to the report stage. It is not planned at the moment to introduce any new legislation to be dealt with before the end of the session.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, maybe I could advise the House that in order to change the atmosphere I would like to announce that for tomorrow I will be calling Bill C-244.

Inquiries of the Ministry

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR STUDIES ON EXPECTED PROBLEMS THIS WINTER

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister, supplementary to earlier questions on the economy. May I ask the Prime Minister whether any special studies have been made regarding the economic problems expected in Canada this winter and, more importantly—Mr. Speaker, let me repeat my question. The Prime Minister cannot hear because of the excitement caused by the recent statement made by the House leader. May I ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether in fact any special studies have been made regarding the economic problems expected to face Canada this winter and, more importantly for the House and the country, whether we can expect any statement or any release of this kind of information to the public and the members of this House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I missed the final words but I think I got the gist of the question. The question has been asked before. If any announcement is to made it will be made in the House.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister certainly did not hear my question. Have there been any special studies made into expected economic problems facing the country this winter, and can we expect the release of these studies to the public?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lundrigan: I rise on a question of privilege, Your Honour. As recorded at page 7946 of Hansard for Friday last, the Acting Prime Minister made a statement to the House which certainly cannot go unchallenged. His statement was in response to the same question I just raised about special studies and the release of this information to the Canadian public. In response to that same question, the Acting Prime Minister said:

—we are making a very special study of the kind of conditions that will prevail this winter. Whether these can be published, or whether it would be in the public interest to publish them, I am not quite sure.

And he continued with his answer. I think somebody has to challenge the two conflicting statements, the one by the Prime Minister today and the one by the Acting Prime Minister on Friday, to see in fact who is telling the truth to the Canadian people—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As the hon. member well knows, and as I am sure all hon. members do, that is not a question of privilege. Debate as to facts or as to the accuracy of statements cannot be raised by way of a question of privilege, or else I fear we should spend all our time on questions of privilege. I suggest to the hon. member that this is essentially a point of debate rather than a question of privilege.

Mr. Lundrigan: If we cannot get factual statements from the opposite side of the House, we might as well cancel the question period altogether.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have indicated to the hon. member that I thought from a procedural standpoint the matter could not be raised by way of a question of privilege. Hon. members know that this is a basic rule. I would think it comes up practically every day. When a question is asked the hon. member asking it may not think the answer is quite accurate, and he might get different information on another occasion. When hon. members think an answer is not entirely factual or cannot be reconciled with a statement made on another occasion, then I suggest to them that is good, fertile ground for debate, but not under the guise of privilege. Orders of the day.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

• (3:10 p.m.)

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Friday, September 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray (for Mr. Benson) that Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequent upon the amendments to that act, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West) (p. 7763).

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) in his remarks recited a litany of the efforts made by the government of Canada over the past number of years in the area of tax reform. He drew to our attention that we first had the Carter Report—the Royal Commission on Taxation in Canada—then the government white paper on taxation, then rather vigorous public discussion, then the referral of the white paper to a committee of the other place and to a House of Commons committee, their reports, more representations from the public, explanations, alterations, and backtracking from the minister, advertising campaigns, letter writing campaigns, and now finally Bill C-259 before us in all the splendor of its 707 pages. No one can accuse the government of not having laboured on the matter of tax reform. They have produced an immense tome and many changes. However, from the point of view of reform as opposed to change, the government's labours have produced a mouse—a mouse in the form of a mountain, let it be said, but a mouse none the less.

It is only proper for me to admit frankly at the outset that some of the changes are beneficial, long overdue and highly welcome. For example, thousands of taxpayers in the lower income brackets, those families earning up to $3,500 a year, will no longer pay income tax. Old age pensioners, those living on widows' allowances, blind and disabled pensions, veterans who have no other income but their pensions, will benefit. The provision of a deduction of up to $150 for expenses incurred by a wage earner in the course of equipping himself for his employment represents an advance. Moreover, the implementation of a capital gains tax provides the government with a source of income which removes some of the potential burden of taxation from the shoulders of those who pay taxes on wages and salaries.

But all of these changes together mean neither meaningful reform nor equity when balanced against other features of the legislation. Take for example the first change which I mentioned, the virtual elimination of income tax for families earning $3,500 a year or less. This represents an improvement yes, but equity no, because the poverty level in this country has been determined by the Economic Council of Canada to be $4,000 for a family. It has been 28 years since the personal exemptions in the Income Tax Act have been revised upwards. Why, in the name of justice, did not the government raise the personal exemptions to $2,000 for an individual and $4,000 for a family? Individuals and families earning less than those figures are living in a state of deprivation in relation to the rest of society. How can anyone professing to be just, professing to be concerned with equity, demand the further reduction of such marginal incomes by the payment of taxes? Yet that is what this legislation is doing.

Where is the justice in limiting a wage earner to a maximum deduction of $150 a year for expenses legitimately incurred in the course of his work while, at the same time, business executives and self-employed persons are allowed virtually unlimited deductions for expenses incurred in the course of their work? Moreover, they are allowed to deduct those expenses under provisions which everyone knows are subject to massive abuse. Where is the justice? Where is the justice in taxing income obtained through capital gains at only half rates, income gained through windfalls, gifts and inheritance not at all and at the same time taxing income gained through wages and salaries at full rates? Where is the equity in a system which enables a single person earning $100,000 a year to pay $1,000 less in income tax and at the same time requires a single person earning $11,000 a year to pay $78 more? Where is the equity in a system which requires people whose incomes are below the poverty level, as set out by the Economic Council of Canada, of $2,000 for a single person and $4,000 for a married couple to pay income tax and which at the same time permits those who have accumulated large amounts of wealth to transfer their assets to relatives or friends without paying inheritance of gift tax at all?

I have been asking a series of rhetorical questions. Obviously, a law containing such provisions is completely barren of justice and equity. Not only is this bill barren in terms of equity and justice, but it is also sterile in terms of the kind of innovation and imagination that is required to stabilize the economy of this country, required to remove the economic disparities which exist among the various regions of this country, required to redistribute income in order to provide some measure of equality of opportunity, some measure of equality of condition for individual Canadians. It is sterile also in terms of ideas for developing economic institutions which conform to the changing system of values and social attitudes which are taking place.

Let me take those charges one by one. First, I have said that this bill will do little or nothing at all to introduce some stability into the Canadian economy, an economy now in a chronic state of inflation and unemployment. Obviously, neither of these two illnesses can be completely cured by the manipulation of our system of taxation. However, properly utilized the tax system can contribute in a major way to controlling inflation and providing needed jobs. By placing manufacturing and service industries in an advantageous position in relation to other industries, the government could encourage the flow of investment capital toward those industries. Investment capital would make possible the rationalization and updating of existing manufacturing industries, thus enhancing the productivity of that sector of the economy and so reducing inflationary pressures. Moreover, it is the manufacturing and service industries which are, relatively speaking, labour-intensive. We need jobs, hundreds of thousands of them. They will be provided more quickly by encouraging the development of new and the expansion of existing manufacturing and service industries.

Instead of this, Bill C-259 continues the practice of the present tax system of taxing the profits of manufacturing industries at double, triple and quadruple the rates of the extractive industries—oil and mining—thus ensuring that the smart money will continue to flow in the direction of the extractive industries. The extractive industries, which are big users of capital and relatively small users of labour, keep most of their special privileges and their exceptional tax concessions under the terms of the present legislation, even though both the Carter commission and the government white paper advocated massive reductions in the special tax privileges accorded to the extractive industries.

Where is the sense in such an approach? Why encourage, at a time when the country is faced with chronic unemployment, the development of an industry which employs relatively small numbers of people at the expense—since there is only so much capital to go around—of the manufacturing sector of the economy which is labour-intensive? Why encourage the same rapid pace in development in a sector of the economy, the extractive industries, which has already developed an overcapacity in areas such as oil and gas, in gold, uranium and potash, thereby distorting our trade patterns and introducing problems for our economy which need not exist? Why, for example, are we rushing to develop and exploit oil and natural gas deposits in the north, before we have developed the technology which would ensure that the ecology of the area is not damaged when, at the same time, wells in the Prairie provinces are producing at as low as 40 per cent of their capacity? Bill C-259 perpetuates this situation and continues the distorted development of our economy. That is why I have said that the bill lacks the policies require to stabilize the economy.

I have also said that this bill will contribute little or nothing to the removal of regional economic disparities. One looks through it in vain, for example, to discover measures designed to reduce the possibility of provinces continuing the practice of competing for industry by the counter-productive method of seeing who can offer the most in the way of tax concessions—a game in which the poorer provinces are always the losers. That is an error of omission. An error of commission is the federal government's decision to withdraw from the field of estate and gift taxes instead of collecting that revenue and distributing it on the basis of an equalization formula. Again, the poorer provinces are the losers. Beyond that, what if one of the richer provinces decides not to impose gift taxes and succession duties? Even though the poorer provinces desperately require that revenue, they might well be forced to follow suit in order to prevent the flow of money out of their economy.

I have said that this bill would not contribute in any meaningful way to the necessary redistribution of income if we are to provide real equality of opportunity for Canadians and some measure of equality of condition. The bill perpetuates many of the means whereby corporations and the rich avoid paying their fair share of taxation, thus shifting a disproportionate share of the burden for providing government revenues onto the shoulders of low and middle income taxpayers. The bill does not use corporate and personal income taxes or the capital gains tax to produce the additional revenue needed if provinces and municipalities are to be able to reduce their dependency on the inequitable and regressive property tax for the provision of education, health and welfare services. The bill does not even go so far as to provide the alternate sources of revenue to enable provinces to eliminate or even substantially reduce property taxes paid by pensioners and others on fixed incomes, taxes which are forcing many of these people out of their homes.

I submit that had the government been serious about more equitably distributing income in this country it would have abandoned tax deductions in favour of tax credits. The effect of a tax deduction is to reduce a taxpayer's taxable income and therefore to lower the highest marginal rate of tax he will pay. One of the basic purposes of a tax deduction is to give tax relief to lower income taxpayers. However, the actual result is to give greater benefits in terms of dollars to wealthier taxpayers. Let me illustrate this phenomenon by quoting from an article by Jack R. London which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune. Mr. London uses these examples which follow in comparing tax credits as against deductions:

• (3:20 p.m.)

For instance, assume John Smith is a married but childless taxpayer earning $13,850 per year. Under the new legislation he will be allowed to deduct from his earnings, a marital allowance of $2,850. His taxable income (after the deduction) therefore will be $11,000. On the first $500 of that taxable income he will pay tax at the rate of 22 per cent. On the last $2,000, he will pay at the rate of 35 per cent, with varying rates in between. If he were not allowed the marital deduction, his taxable income would be the full $13,850 and the tax rate on his income between $11,000 and $13,850 would be 40 per cent.

In terms of tax savings the $2,850 marital deduction will be worth $1,180. In other words, that deduction allows John to keep $1,180 more of his income after tax than would otherwise be the case. One can easily calculate the amount of tax saving achieved by any taxpayer merely by multiplying his marginal rate (before taking the deduction) by the amount of the deduction allowed.

No one would quarrel with that result viewed only from John's perspective.

The inherent problem comes to light only when John's situation is compared to that of other taxpayers with lower incomes. For example, consider Peter Jones whose marital circumstances are identical to John's but whose income is only $5,000. Because Peter's income is lower than John's, his highest marginal tax rate is only 27 per cent. The same $2,850 marital deduction will save Peter only $770 compared to John's saving of $1,180. The reason for the $410 differential is that a tax deduction increases a taxpayer's tax saving as his marginal rate rises.

Mr. London went on to say in the same article:

A tax credit neatly avoids that trap. Since it is a fixed dollar saving which a taxpayer may deduct from his actual tax liability, it is no more valuable to a wealthier than a poorer taxpayer. In fact, in terms of relative relief the opposite result occurs to an even greater degree than with a tax deduction.

John and Peter once again will illustrate. If the government decided that the amount of the tax credit should be, say, $300, then both John and Peter would be allowed to subtract that amount from their tax bills. Their dollar savings would be identical. However, since Peter's tax on his $5,000 income would be much lower than John's tax on his $13,580 income, Peter, in terms of percentages, would be saving more than John. In that case, the tax relief would be received where it was most needed.

By restricting the tax savings of higher income taxpayers in this way, the government then could make even larger tax concessions in the form of higher credits which would in turn be relatively more beneficial to those with lower incomes.

I apologize for reading at such length, Mr. Speaker, but I thought that article contained a concise and easily understood explanation of the reasons for tax credits and tax deductions. In reading it, I thought I might illustrate why the government could well adopt the tax credit technique in this legislation in an effort to introduce some equity into the system. That is the kind of imagination and innovation we had hoped to find in this bill. Unfortunately, it is dismally absent from it.

Finally, I have charged that this bill in no way encourages the development of economic institutions which will operate in accordance with the changing system of values and social attitudes of Canadians. Increasingly, younger Canadians especially are seeking methods of mutual self-help through co-operative endeavour to achieve individual goals; increasingly they are abandoning the ethic of cut-throat competition. One of the few economic institutions which fits into this new approach to life is the co-operative. Yet, not only does this legislation not encourage the development of the co-operative and credit union movements, it also inhibits their growth. Indeed, it actually threatens the life of many existing co-operative institutions.

Beyond their significance in relation to newly developing attitudes, the co-operatives have for many years been key institutions in the farming sector of our economy. It may very well be that without the co-operative enterprises such as the wheat pools, the western grain industry would be in the hands of American industrialists, just as is our oil industry. Until the introduction of this bill, co-operatives had been taxed at a minimum of 3 per cent on employed capital. Why this formula has been employed no one knows. One suspects that it was devised because co-ops kept only as much working capital as they required at any given moment. Earnings above their immediate capital needs were distributed to their participating patrons, usually in relation to the use they had made of the co-op facilities rather than in relation to the amount of capital the patron had invested. There was probably no other way for the Department of National Revenue to get at the co-ops except through levying a tax on the capital employed. One wonders why they felt moved to do so, since the participants pay full tax on dividends received and the co-ops pay full rates of tax on retained earnings. Nevertheless, a 3 per cent tax on capital employed was levied. Now, the government has decided to raise the tax on capital employed from a minimum of 3 per cent to a minimum of 5 per cent.

The probable effects of this move were set out very succinctly by my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) during the budget debate of this past June. I do not think I can do any better than quote him in order to illustrate my point. My colleague said, as reported at page 7454 of Hansard:

For a reason known only to themselves, the government has decided to jump this tax from 3 per cent to 5 per cent. This will cause a severe dislocation in the allocation of earnings and investment within the cooperative movement. The decision as to how to reinvest money within the cooperative for the growth of the cooperative will be seriously affected by this new tax pattern. Decisions will have to be made that are not necessarily in the interests of the members of the cooperative, but in line with the taxation policies of the government.

He went on to quote the opinion given by a very prominent firm of auditors, as follows:

A preliminary review of these provisions indicate that the 5 per cent may only be reduced by interest paid to members as contrasted with dividends paid on shares held by members. These provisions would appear to severely limit the deduction of patronage as compared to the present system.

Then, the hon. member continued:

I am at a loss to understand why the government deliberately set its sights on a very small sector of the economy in terms of total capital invested, and people participating, to restrict through taxation the activity of cooperatives which are truly Canadian owned and have a policy to grow, develop and serve the people.

Similarly, the credit union societies of Canada fear the effects of this legislation upon them. I have received numerous letters from credit union societies in my constituency which deal with this point. I think it might be worth while reading a paragraph or two from a letter written to me by Arborg Credit Union Society Limited. It reads, in part:

Since the disclosure in June that credit unions will be very much affected by the tax reform legislation, we have been exceedingly concerned with the threat that the tax proposals constitute for credit unions. If enacted, Mr. Benson's proposals will severely undermine the definitive characteristics of credit unions and will surely place them at a disadvantage in the competitive business market.

It is our contention that Bill C-259 reveals a very basic misunderstanding of the nature of credit unions and hence projects a tax formula that is inequitable and entirely unacceptable.

Specifically, our concerns have to do with sections 125, 137, and 189 of the tax reform bill.

The representatives of this Credit Union go on to say that they have made their objections known to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) in letters. Finally, they ask for assistance in obtaining a meeting between the Minister of Finance and the National Association of Canadian Credit Unions in order that he might hear their objections to the legislation. I have written to the Minister of Finance regarding this case. I hope he will grant these people the interview which they have requested.

I have gone over a number of points, Mr. Speaker, by which I have attempted to demonstrate that the tax changes before us really do not constitute tax reform, that they lack imagination and that they are based on a fundamentally false philosophy. In brief, Mr. Speaker, the tax system incorporated in this bill does not represent reform. It does not provide anything in the way of equity or any of the urgently required innovations in the structure of our economy. On that basis, there is no choice available to anyone truly committed to tax reform but to vote against this bill. That is what we on this side of the House intend to do.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-259, introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), is entitled "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that Act". It is a shame that Parliamentary procedures prevent the use of the author's name. "By Edgar G. Benson" would have quite a ring to it and would appeal to the readers. It is a pity that our procedure forbids a jacket such as you find on other best sellers, a jacket with a full colour-photo of the author and a brief biographical sketch. Surely, this five pound, 14 ounce, 707 page masterpiece is destined to become a national best seller. I will read the title again, "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that Act". That title alone should cause thousands, if not millions, of Canadians to rush to Information Canada to purchase first edition copies.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the minister autograph them?

Mr. Peddle: There should be a foreword by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) which could read something like this: "The Minister of Finance has my full support. I am willing to accept full credit for the popular proposals in this work, but I disclaim full or, in fact, any responsibility for those proposals which are unpopular." On the inside cover, there should be a simple little dedication: "The Minister of Finance dedicates this book to his colleague who has been his inspiration and who has helped so much in its production and writing."

To complete the picture, there should be testimonials from the country's leading newspapers and magazines. The testimonial from the Globe and Mail could read like this: "For Canadians, a startling new perspective, in language which clarifies nothing and confuses everything—the book which stupifies and bewilders lawyers and tax experts." The one from the Ottawa Journal could read: "Carries tax"—not sex like the paperbacks—"as far as it can go." From the Ottawa Citizen we might have: "Bill C-259 has everyone playing a guessing game about the real significance of its scandalous proposals. Heavy reading—to pick it up is to drop it after two minutes from sheer exhaustion, mental and physical." The one from the Montreal Gazette could read: "One of the most powerful political fantasies of our time. The perplexities of taxes have seldom been explored more subtly or with less meaning." It might be asked why I try to ridicule this bill. The answer is simple. It is ridiculous. It calls for and demands ridicule.

I just came down from my fifth floor office. I carried this bill with me, and I had to rest three times. There is no necessity for a bill of this size. I see no reason for it except that it is part of this government's general policy of confusion, trickery, subterfuge and blindfolding the devil in the dark. This is the attitude of this government. It is called participatory democracy, according to the slogan in 1968. The government said "Come join us; participate with us."

Several months ago we were given a white paper which was fairly understandable. Even the laymen in Canada could understand the terrible proposals that were being made. There was almost a revolution against the proposals in the white paper. I suggest the government never really planned to introduce these proposals. It was the old shock treatment; hit them hard and when they object hit them half as hard and then they will think that everything is rosy. It is the same old story, government by crisis. The government promotes, encourages and develops crises in Canada, then does not have a clue how to deal with the crises they have helped to develop. Canadians are beginning to realize that this government talks in high gear but performs in low gear. Canadians were swept off their feet in 1968. They have been waiting since that time for this government to change gears.

Mr. Nowlan: It has been giving Canadians the gears.

Mr. Peddle: I am not going to attempt to deal with any particular area of this 707 page monstrosity. To do so might convey, at least to my constituents, the idea that I understand what this is all about. I am not going to be so pompous as to pretend I understand what this is about when the lawyers and tax experts throughout the country say that they do not understand it. I am not going to even attempt to try.

Mr. Mahoney: You are doing all right.

Mr. Peddle: As a Canadian who has been watching the performance of this government which promised so much to the people of this country in the past three years, I cannot help but ask a very simple question. Canadians appreciate the promise in this monstrosity of larger exemptions for the lower income people. We appreciate the suggestion that there will be some relief to our older taxpayers. We do not understand the other several hundred pages that try to justify the other taxes that will be imposed to make up for the few little crumbs thrown out to the lower income and elderly people. Taxation is not a one way street. It implies a reasonable, responsible extraction of taxes from the people and it also must of necessity pay some attention to the reasonable, responsible distribution or disposition of the taxes so collected. No one can tell me that the passage of this bill has suddenly become urgent. It landed on our desks some time in September. Government supporters say: Treat this as urgent or the 1½ million taxpayers who are to be dropped from the tax rolls won't get their goodies next year. It is an old story which the premier of Newfoundland has been using for years—if you want your half pint of ice cream you will have to gulp your seven gallons of cod liver oil first.

• (3:40 p.m.)

On Friday we heard from the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), the Liberal party whip. He spoke in his most honeyed tones. He was conciliatory. That is a most important quality in a whip; he has to be a master of conciliation. In his most honeyed tones he implored us not to delay the bill any longer—"What are you fellows up to, delaying this important measure? Get it out of here and into committee."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Peddle.]

Mr. Peddle: What he was really saying was: Your debate on this subject embarrasses us. Get it out of here and into the obscurity of the committee, with half a dozen members sitting on it and maybe a small fraction of the press attending. This was what underlay the conciliatory message from the Liberal whip, and I don't blame him for trying, but it is not going to work.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member has quoted me as saying I wanted the bill referred to committee on which a few obscure members would be serving. Does he not realize that this bill will be referred to a committee of the whole House to which every member belongs and requires a quorum of 20 members?

Mr. Peddle: It is a very unsanitary thing, but the hon. member is putting words into my mouth. I did not say "obscure members". I said he wanted it referred to an obscure committee. As to the obscurity of the committee system, I say this to be quoted, it has no other effect but to destroy Parliament, generally speaking. Measures of importance to the country are taken from the chamber and shunted into semi-obscurity in some other part of Parliament Hill. They are subjected to the scrutiny of only a small fraction of hon. members.

The bill before us is called a reform package. Look at a dictionary and look up what "reform" means. The first definition is: "to make better by removing faults and defects"; the second definition is "by putting a stop to abuses and malpractices". Another is: "to abandon that which is evil and corrupt and return it to good state". This bill does none of those things. It does what it is designed to do—to further confuse the Canadian taxpayer.

As the beginning of sensible tax reform in this country, I would suggest that the 1½ million people who are to be removed from the tax rolls should be removed without delay. It should have been done long ago. Members opposite should not wait until the eve of an election to do it. A proposal like that did not need to be part of these 707 pages before us; it could have been done in a simple bill. Was it necessary to include in this bill machinery for increasing exemptions to those in receipt of lower incomes? No. That is a bit of the ice cream you get with the cod liver oil.

Reasonable tax reform must include assurances that the money collected will be sensibly spent. I have not heard this mentioned. Nothing has been said about ending the extravagance and waste which is going on in this country. It seems to me we could support the exemptions, the little bit of relaxation which the bill provides for those on low incomes and for older citizens, by making a concerted effort to cut out some of this waste and extravagance of which we see so much evidence.

I will give hon. members some examples. Take Information Canada, the whole kit and caboodle. I would suggest that 50 per cent of what is spent on that is wasted. Take the story of the Bonaventure. Let us make sure there is no recurrence of that kind of thing, and save some of the taxpayers' money. What about the ridiculous Committee on Youth that cost only God knows how much and came up with God only knows what recommendations. The opportunities for Youth program was concerned with—

Mr. Paproski: Opportunities for waste.

Mr. Peddle: —sending symphony orchestras to Newfoundland outports to try to bring some culture to them. What kind of nonsense is this?

An hon. Member: They don't want culture.

Mr. Peddle: Obviously hon. members opposite do not know the meaning of culture. To some of those sitting over there, culture has to be crammed down our throats, it is something you pretend to understand when you don't. Where I come from we don't do that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Peddle: Culture is something that we do or we don't have, and if we don't have it we don't go around pretending we do. Then, there was the Royal Commission on the Status of Women whose report has since been put in the dustbin. And think of all the waste and extravagance which must have resulted from the existence of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs under a minister who concerns himself about the correct weight of a popsicle being on the label, making sure that a square inch of a sweater has the right number of yarns in it, and so on.

Mr. Mahoney: What bill are you on, now?

Mr. Peddle: I am talking about government extravagance which seems to be an absolutely necessary part of any tax reform package. One communication went out from the minister's department telling consumers: If you have trouble with electrical appliances, make sure the plug is in. This is the kind of nonsense the country is paying millions of dollars to support. The administration has not touched the real problems of consumer relations, nor does it wish to do so. It is afraid because if it touches the real problems, some of the contributions to the party might dry up. So, they just natter away and try to convince the Canadian people they are here in their interests. This is great stuff.

Then, there is the commission to study the matter of a guaranteed annual income. If it goes the way of all other commissions, the commissioners probably will guarantee themselves an income for a limited time and that will be the end of it. I have no objection, but I think I would have to agree that the proposals made by this government during its three years, especially in the dying moments of its administration, are aimed at the majority of the taxpayers. I believe something is wrong when a government becomes preoccupied, from the day it comes into office, with winning the next election. I think that is wrong and I cannot buy it. I am not saying a government should not be political. I am saying, however, there should be some kind of a decent ratio between priorities and politics. At least some consideration should be given to the priorities of the country. If there should be a measure which would be good for 60 people this government would embrace it. The members of the government would all cheer and say "hear, hear, we have a good thing".

They could not care less if it should adversely and terribly affect another 40 people in this country representing a minority.

• (3:50 p.m.)

The attitude of the members of the government is "to hell with it" so long as they have a majority throughout. This seems to be their object in life. I say there is something a little wrong with this attitude. I am not so naïve as to suggest that a government should not be political. I have more sense than that. When everything else is put aside, and when from the day they are put in office they simply try to win the next election and the devil take the consequences, I say this is wrong. This is bad. This tax reform so-called appears in two official languages. The ordinary Canadian could not read the previous taxation bill but at least the experts could manage to pick it apart. But in this case we have been informed in no uncertain terms that even the experts and lawyers cannot make any sense of it. As I say, it is in two official languages, but I know from my own point of view that it just might as well be in Chinese or Arabic rather than in English because there is no way one can cope with it. No one understands it, not even the experts.

Mr. Mahoney: What part don't you understand?

Mr. Peddle: The hon. member asks what I understand about it. I understand only a few tidbits picked out by his colleagues. There is to be an exemption for the lower income group and a little relaxation in respect of the older taxpayers. However, it should not take 707 pages to do this and such a bill should not be introduced on the eve of an election. It should have been introduced immediately by this government back in 1968. But, no; it is introduced now when there is a federal election on the horizon. I suggest that this time the people of Canada will recognize this for what it is. We have had a bill before us involving $80 millions in aid to industries which might be affected by the U.S.surcharge. We on this side of the House had to try hard to find an opportunity to make a comment on that bill because all hon. gentlemen across the way wanted to get credit for it. Finally, before an election, they wanted to project themselves a little. They had been quiet all along, but now they wanted to get in on some little thing about which there is not too much controversy. But they are avoiding this tax reform like the plague. It is difficult to get one of them to talk about it. All they do is suggest it be sent to the committee. They do not wish to talk about it because it is embarrassing.

In rising to speak, I followed a member of the New Democratic Party. Actually there should have been one or two Liberal members rise at that time, but they do not want to talk about it. This legislation has been introduced with great urgency. It was dumped on our desks on September 7 and we were told that if we did not get it out of the way by the end of the year one and a half million Canadians who are to be removed from the tax rolls would blame us. It should not require 707 pages in order to make some provision for the one and a half million people who would be concerned. This could have been done simply.

I shall close by repeating what was said by a gentleman who appeared on the T.V. program "Viewpoint". I do not know who the gentleman is, but I listen to common sense no matter from what source. He said:

> Mr. Benson's tax reform bill is too bad to be patched up as it proceeds through Parliament. The only solution is to withdraw the Bill for re-writing. I know that everyone—the government especially—is anxious to be finally done with tax reform. Unless a few more months are spent re-drafting the Bill, however, Canadians are going to pay a terrible price for their impatience.

I am not suggesting that the little tidbit for the lower income tax payer and the extra exemption for the old age taxpayers should be withheld. A very simple little bill could have been brought in to provide for that and there could have been little or no debate. In that way these people would have been provided for and the money to look after them could have been found by a little crackdown on some of the horrible waste and extravagance of which this government has been guilty right along the line.

• (4:00 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the amendment moved by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) is fair and quite relevant. We are surely concerned about the economic prospects confronting Canada. We are also concerned about continuous unemployment and industrial depression. We are also conscious of the fact that a real tax reform is essential.

Allow me moreover, Mr. Speaker, to point out once again how the Social Credit party of Canada is particularly aware of all those economic problems plaguing us. The existence of our party can precisely be explained because we suggest specific answers and realistic solutions which would solve those endless financial difficulties.

Why should we attempt, Mr. Speaker, to patch up, to mend, to try to cure without getting at the very cause of all those economic evils and frustations, that is the present economic and financial system? There is nothing surprising in the fact that we must change our mental attitudes which are deeply entrenched in a system that moulded us to the point that the system is no longer serving the people but the people are forced to kneel and crawl to satisfy the requirements of the system.

If we must reach the point where we have to alter the very principles that pervaded our mentality, we should not hesitate to do so because all solutions we could bring forward will never do anything as long as we do not get at the problem, at its very source, that is a complete and total reform of the economy.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take too much time. I know that hon. members are perfectly aware—and if not, at least they should have a pretty fair idea—of what we want, what we wish for, and in this extremely difficult period when we all strive to solve certain important problems existing in our country, it is to leave aside partisanship and concentrate objectively on the study of all solutions, even if they are suggested by opposition parties such as ours.

Mr. Speaker, there is a general outcry against the reform as proposed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and with your permission, Sir, I would like to draw once again the attention of hon. members, like some of my colleagues have done previously, to the opposition expressed by caisses d'économie, caisses populaires and various similar co-operatives in Canada and particularly in Quebec, against certain clauses contained in Bill C-259. In order to prove the veracity of these protests which come from everywhere, I would like to read in full the last letter dated September 13, 1971, sent to me by the employees' caisse d'économie of the Canadian International Paper in La Tuque, and I quote:

[Mr. Peddle.]

Mr. René Matte, M. P.,

Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Matte:

Re: TAXATION OF CAISSES D'ÉCONOMIE AS PROPOSED IN BILL C-259.

As you probably know, the caisses d'économie have made a tremendous contribution to Quebec's economy throughout the province. We think that the development of this movement illustrates the fact that Canadians believe in the efficiency and the worth of the caisses d'économie economic philosophy.

It was announced in June that the caisses d'économie would be greatly affected by the tax reform: we have since then been very concerned. Should it be passed, Mr. Benson's reform will ruin to a great extent the characteristic principles of the caisses d'économie and decrease their competitiveness in the financial market.

We feel Bill C-259 misunderstands the nature of the caisses d'économie and, because of this, it cannot set up a just and equitable tax formula.

We are particularly concerned about Sections 125, 137 and 189 of the proposed reform. We mentioned these details in our brief to the Minister of Finance presented in July. Among other important objections and amendments we listed the following:

1. In Section 137, no provision is made to allow the deduction of dividends on social capital in calculating the taxable income. This is vital for all caisses d'économie and provincial branches. The shares in caisses d'économie are essentially savings deposits payable on demand. They are entirely different from shares in financial corporations.

2. The bill should be amended so as to include investments in caisses d'économie in the "qualified investment" category, since investing funds to build up reserves which will bring about stability and revenues for the savings of members is an integral part of the caisses d'économie financial routine. The same application should be made for a similar paragraph in Section 189.

3. The "total business limit" formula as applied to caisses d'économie in the proposed reform is not fair. The reserves of caisses d'économie as common property of all members cannot be divided among members under the form of eventual distributions. Section 125 should be defined especially for caisses d'économie and a special reference should be made for this purpose in Section 137.

4. The definition of capital employed should be deleted from Section 137. We believe that this definition is not sensible since caisses d'économie do not give a competitive dividend, so that competitors should not get any part of this return since those members which receive it are already taxed.

Five other items are mentioned in the brief to the Minister of Finance. They too are important; they deal first of all with the question of restricting activity to one province only and then with the caisses d'économie that are entitled to accept classified deposits as ineligible investment and with the pertinent amendments.

It is of the utmost importance that the National Committee on Taxation meet with the Association nationale des caisses d'économie (ANEC) in order to clarify the amendments to the proposed revision which are necessary to the success of the movement.

On behalf of 2,500,000 members of the caisses d'économie of the province of Quebec, we thank you in advance for your co-operation.

Roger Marchand, Manager.

Mr. Speaker, the reason why I read this letter is to show you that our people are very much interested in the laws considered in Parliament. They are deeply interested and here is the proof of it: they participate, indeed, by their comments and the amendments they suggest.

In short, Parliament is not anything else, and should not be anything else, but as far as possible the true reflection of the Canadian taxpayers' opinion. Then, it is not only important, but essential that we agree to consider in the House in a very serious fashion the comments and suggestions made by various bodies and, in the light of these, the Minister of Finance could improve his voluminous Bill C-259, by dividing it into smaller parts, as some speakers have suggested, because this bill is far too thick, not only in content, but literally.

We should therefore ask ourselves, when considering a bill, whether we are legislating according to the interests and wishes of the taxpayers we represent or in order to carry out mere mathematical acrobatics and satisfy our intelligence.

Mr. Speaker, there is a principle involved: most Canadian institutions and individuals are concerned with the content of this reform and it should therefore be lingered over. We must absolutely reconsider the various proposals contained in the bill and that is why I support the amendment brought forward by the hon. member for Edmonton West, which merely calls for the House to decline to give second reading to a bill which does not provide sufficient stimulus to the economy of Canada with appropriate tax cuts and incentives, does not contain adequate tax exemptions and is not calculated to materially improve business and labour conditions in Canada now or in the foreseeable future.

For, Mr. Speaker, whenever we in this House pass legislation, it is essential that such legislative measures as we adopt be acceptable to the people of Canada, and, also, that they benefit the population of this country. Of course, it may happen that the benefits are not immediate, but we should always ascertain that any act passed by this House is really going to benefit all Canadians.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the reason why I think that the Minister of Finance should back down and set this famous bill aside for the present, for it should be completely reviewed, taking into account proposals and even amendments suggested by individual Canadians or institutions eager to co-operate with their member in order to make sure that a really progressive bill is introduced which would be advantageous for the whole country.

• (4:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I want to discuss four aspects of the bill that are of concern to me at the moment. The first of these is the draftsmanship or the plain words aspect of the bill; second, the effect the bill will have on co-operative movements; third, the effect, should this bill pass in its present form, on farmers and fishermen; and lastly, what I might call the rather narrow outlook which the bill takes, if I may say so, of the whole matter of child care expenses.

I go at once to the subject matter of drafting and make a plea for clearness, for accuracy, and for brevity. I read recently of the rejoinder of a wise English judge when an expert medical witness was giving evidence at a trial. Finally, in frustration, he said something like this: "It is useless to go on giving complicated medical evidence because nobody will understand me". The judge replied: "We will understand if you use plain English". It seems to me that something of that philosophy should prevail in all legislative drafting.

The Income Tax Act, which is touted as an important element of the government's program of reform should, I suggest, be intelligible to most Canadians. Is it? I doubt that it is. A court said once that we ought not to be puzzled by such old scholastic questions as where a horse's tail begins and where it ceases. You are obliged to say at some time that this is a horse's tail. I am not sure whether within the ambit of the seven hundred odd pages in this bill anybody ever does say "this is, indeed, a horse's tail". I will not be drawn into a discussion of the other parts of the anatomy of a horse, Mr. Speaker, no matter what the temptation may be from those who call from my rear. But section 39 might be called a test section, the test being clarity, brevity and clearness. Here is what it says: I will try to read it in a straightforward manner. I do not want to miss any of the nuances or the elegances of language. It reads:

> 39. (1) For the purposes of this Act, (a) a taxpayer's capital gain for a taxation year from the disposition of any property is his gain for the year determined under this subdivision (to the extent of the amount thereof that would not, if section 3 were read without reference to the expression "other than a taxable capital gain from the disposition of a property" in paragraph (a) thereof and without reference to paragraph (b) thereof, be included in computing his income for the year or any other taxation year) from the disposition of any property of the taxpayer other than—

Then, there follow in draft form two and a half pages more of "notwithstandings", "whereases", and so on. But we are not through yet because we have to turn back to section 3. Section 3 only covers a page and a half which, in legislative drafting, is not really very bad, but it must be read as if it means the opposite to what it says. I fool you not, this is exactly the statement. By the way, section 40 carries on with two pages of general rules for the interpretation of section 39 which is to be read, as I say, in conjunction with section 3.

However, although it is easy to fall into this temptation, I will not make what could be called a hit and run attack on the drafters of the legislation for it has been said that what is commonly called the technical part of legislation is incomparably more difficult than what might be called the ethical or, in current language, the policy considerations. In other words, it is much easier to conceive firstly what would be useful law, than so to construct that same law that it may accomplish the design of the lawmaker. Another English judge said: "Nothing is so difficult as to construct acts of parliament properly and nothing so easy as to pull them to pieces". I do not think the debate will be helped by a pulling to pieces of this act just for the sake of having a pleasant afternoon's exercise in semantics.

The author of the "Complete Plain Words"—and here I do make a plea and I would hope that parliamentarians and senior civil servants would read the "Complete Plain Words"—I think was secretary to the British cabinet for some time, Sir Ernest Gowers. Whatever he was, he was a plainspoken man who had a love for the English language, and I think that if many of us read the book we would profit from it. We can see in the examples which this author uses some of the obscurantist phrases that creep into drafting, both of letters and our other exchanges with the public. But in "The Complete Plain Words" the author says:

Drafting is more a science than an art; it lies in the province of mathematics rather than literature, and its practice needs long apprenticeship.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I pay this tribute to the draftsmen. I hope they served a long apprenticeship, but I am not very sure that this bill gives evidence that that apprenticeship, and the time they had to prepare the bill, were as long as they might have been.

Somebody else, when discussing the language of legislative draftsmanship said:

The lawyer, like the theologian, is faced with a number of texts that he regards as authoritative and that are supposed to settle any question that can conceivably arise. Each text was once drawn up by someone who presumably meant something by it; but once the document has left the author's hands it is the document that matters, not any unexpressed meaning that still remains in the author's mind.

I think that is the point my hon. friend was making a moment ago when he said that most of this bill is unintelligible to the general public.

For the lawyer, the words of the document are authoritative as words and there is no possibility of obtaining further information from the author, either because the author is dead or because of the rules of evidence precluding reference to him.

Perhaps some of the lawyers in this House hope, as I do, that this rather stupid rule of evidence, that precludes courts from using draftsmen and policy papers when considering what a statute means, will soon be changed. But that is another subject. No one can expect pretty writing from the legal draftsman, who has the duty to try to imagine every possible combination of circumstances to which his words might apply and every conceivable misinterpretation that might be put on them, and to take precautions accordingly. But the trouble with the income tax bill is that when passed it has application, despite its reformative element, to the vast majority of the people of this country, and I very sincerely suggest that it should be understood by those people to whom it is applied.

My plea is that the object of a draftsman is to be precise without being obscure. Surely, it is not too much to expect that a bill should be intelligible to those who debate it and have the ultimate responsibility for it? I suggest that there is a good deal of lulling of Canadians going on through the use of such phrases as "tax reform" and "improvement over the hodgepodge of the present tax law." These phrases are bandied about by people who have not the vaguest idea of the present income tax law or the new law that we are considering. It seems to me that it is all really quite unreal, something like a trick at Hallowe'en.

The three tests should be: will the new law be easier to interpret? Will the new law be simpler to administer? Will the taxpayer have to resort to more professional advice than ever before? I am perfectly certain that the government's bill fails on each of those three tests. It will not be easier to interpret. It will certainly be much more difficult to administer. And I have a very grave suspicion that there will be more professional help needed than ever before when one makes out one's income tax return and is sending a donation to the government of Canada.

The Institute of Chartered Accountants and the Canadian Bar Association have issued what can only be fairly called objective criticisms of the bill as a piece of draftsmanship. They have drawn attention to obvious obscurities. I have not heard from anybody on the government side whether any attempts are being made to clear up these useful criticisms, objective and non-partisan. I want to know, are such attempts to be made or are we to proceed with consideration in Committee of the whole House despite the warning signals we have heard from these professional people?

I have one other comment to make on this aspect of the bill. Here I quote Mr. Robert Warner who on the CBC show "Viewpoint" on August 18 gave the example of clause 39, which I confess now I cribbed from him earlier in my speech. He said:

An example of the bill's tortuous wording is the section describing what a capital gain is. That section, No. 39, is about half a page long. As statutes go, that isn't too bad. However, after reading four lines, the reader is directed to turn back to section 3 and read in another page of type. If this were not bad enough, you are told at the same time to read section 3 as though it said the opposite of what it does say.

The explanation for this, I think, is that the draftsman, working under great pressure, took what to him was a helpful short cut. He probably understands what he was saying. But, for years afterwards, taxpayers, their advisers and judges will have to do these mental gymnastics a thousand times over. Little drafting short cuts like these are going to cost the country a great deal.

I know that many say that the tax experts are merely adding hypocrisy to their other sins by complaining. But we——are not so selfish and irresponsible as to believe that an economic bonanza for us is necessarily good for the country. None of us want to be the beneficiaries of a law which imposes a higher than necessary compliance cost on the rest of society. As Canadians we want the laws to be such that most people can understand and comply with them without the constant attendance of a professional adviser.

I assume Mr. Warner is in the category of an expert.

I sincerely believe that this is a very legitimate complaint about this huge and complex document.

I remind the House that a statute has been defined very simply. Mr. Speaker, you know this definition well. A statute is "the will of the legislature." I am not at all sure that the interpretation of that will is plain in its meaning. I think that is a fatal flaw in the legislation.

I now wish to deal with the proposed income tax changes as they affect co-operatives. I may say that the Official Opposition has been very much helped by the interest shown by government backbenchers in this aspect of the bill. I am sure the minister has heard both from my leader and others who have spoken, and also from his own supporters, with respect to these proposed changes.

In late August I myself had a very helpful meeting with representatives of Maritime Co-operative Services Ltd. of Moncton, and one of its supporting groups, the Sussex Co-operative. The latter has a paid up membership of 1,400 in my constituency. Representatives of the membership are understandably upset about the new legislation and, as a representative of an area where the co-operative movement has greatly benefited farmers and fishermen, I am glad to remind the minister and the House of the changes proposed and of some of the objections to them. The bill withdraws the three-years exemption for new co-operatives; the bill changes the definition of co-operative corporations; the bill radically alters the way in which members handle patronage dividends for income tax purposes and changes the definition of capital employed so that there can no longer be a deduction allowed for unproductive assets, that is assets not required for purposes of the business.

• (4:30 p.m.)

The bill subjects shareholders to a tax on their share of the deemed dividend which would result if a co-operative redeemed or acquired any of its common shares or reduced its common stock. Under the existing act, shareholders of a co-operative are specifically exempt from tax under such circumstances.

The bill withdraws the present exemption from taxation of moneys received from provincial grants. I think this should be checked out with the departments responsible for the encouragement of co-operative movements for that aspect of the law, which is clearly property and civil rights, falls within the responsibility of provincial governments.

The plea I make today is for small co-operatives. The definitions of co-operatives should be redrawn so that a distinction can be made between big business co-operatives, which need little or no protection, and small co-operatives which public policy has long sought to encourage. There is a curious bit of irony about the changes that the government plans for the co-operative and credit union movements in that one of the senior members of cabinet, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) is a distinguished alumnus of and a former professor at the University of St. Francis Xavier. Of all universities in the country, this one had much to do with the development and evolution of the co-operative movement. The irony is that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), through his CIDA program, the Columbo Plan and others, helps to bring students here from other countries in order to continue their education. St. Francis Xavier University receives many of these students and assists them to study the development of co-operatives and to translate the results of their studies into methods for helping developing countries. That is one aspect of a better policy but, on the other hand, the indigenous or national movement in Canada is being seriously frustrated by the government's so-called reform in this area.

I shall end this part of my speech, Mr. Speaker, by saying there is no doubt at all that it is the Members of Parliament who will hear, first hand, about the unease across the country felt by credit unions and co-operatives about this aspect of the government's bill. I hope the minister will yield to the pressures—and they are proper pressures—from those of us who see in the co-operative movement a self-help program worthy of every bit of encouragement.

Farmers and fishermen will be more heavily taxed under this bill than they are today. This flat assertion is not loosely tossed into the debate to try to win friends from the agricultural or fishing community. Rather I make the statement based upon the way the bill proposes to treat income gained from farming and fishing, bringing these vocations more into line with the tax treatment of other businesses. But are they like other businesses? What is the government's philosophy about the future of the small or family farm? This is no plea for some bucolic past when everything was fine down on the farm. Those days are gone and I suppose most farmers are glad that they are. Rather it is a plea for the efficient yet small family unit which is operated not only as a way of making a living but which is a way of life. Is this act but one more weapon in the hands of the government to deal yet another blow to the individual farmer? Have the long range policy implications of this bill been thought through by officials of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, to mention but two? Or is it specialist legislation considered in the antiseptic corridors and offices of the Departments of Finance and National Revenue?

One of the pleas made by the former minister of communications, the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans), is a thoughtful criticism of the government evolution of policy. I think I paraphrase him correctly as saying power is developed in somewhat of an isolated manner, department by department, without any over-all concern about policy implications or how policy decisions will react in other departments. I believe that as far as the farmers and fishermen are concerned, the departments that should have had most to say about the policy implications of the tax changes were not very much part of the planning of this legislation. If this is not an accurate assessment of the situation I hope someone from the government side will set me right.

The last of the four points I wish to discuss today, Mr. Speaker, is child care expenses. Here, I think the relative committee did a workmanlike job. It is an example of what good sense often comes from parliamentary committees when they consider some abstract legislation. After all, Members of Parliament should be close to what might be called the real difficulties facing people in their daily lives. If I had the time, and if members cared, I could expand my remarks into a discourse about the Member of Parliament because I feel he becomes increasingly important as government becomes increasingly depersonalized and its policies dehumanized. But nobody is interested in that on a Monday afternoon, Mr. Speaker, and this debate is on a more precise topic.

There is to be a deduction for child care expenses of up to $500 for each child under age 14, with a maximum of $2,000 per family. This is in addition to the general deduction for children as dependants and will normally be claimed by the mother. A deduction is to be permitted for expenses of caring for a child over age 14 and who is dependent because of mental or physical infirmity. I hope that deduction can be claimed whether the child is cared for in this country or in special schools in the United States or other countries. It is my understanding that this is not now the case, and it is a serious fault in the legislation. The deduction may be taken by the father if he is a widower, or divorced or separated. He may also take the deduction if the mother is incapable of caring for herself or children, or if she is confined for 14 days or more to a bed, wheelchair, hospital, mental hospital or prison. For such periods, the father's deduction is to be limited to a maximum of $15 per week for each child to a total of $60 per week, subject to the over-all limitations of $500 per child or $2,000 per family.

Qualified child care expenses include babysitting costs, day nursery care, and up to $15 a week, not exceeding $500 a year, toward lodging paid at schools and camps.

Amounts paid to dependants of the taxpayer or to relatives under age 21 will not qualify. Receipts bearing the social insurance number of the individual who performed the services must be retained. Child care expense deductions cannot exceed two-thirds of the earned income of the parent making the deductions.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I say this: I think this provision goes a long way but only part of a very important way in this whole field of child care, the working mother and so on. The Commons committee, as I said earlier, termed the child care deduction a major innovation of our tax system. It suggested that the relief be extended to cover the situation where there is a parent at home unable to care for the children because of permanent, mental or physical infirmity. This idea is incorporated in the legislation; I am glad it is, and I pay tribute to the draftsmen. It is incorporated along with other extensions to cover special situations. The bill permits a deduction for expenses of caring for a child over 14 years old who is dependent because of mental or physical infirmity. However, while this initiative is welcome by the House, I suggest that it can be considered as only going half way along the way, because it is only a half measure particularly in helping low income working women.

I come to the point quickly, Mr. Speaker, by saying that the exemptions are not large enough. Being in the form of exemptions rather than tax credits, they will be of relatively less value to the poor than to the well off. They do not consider possible increases in child care costs involved in demanding receipts from baby sitters. If anybody here has ever tried to get a receipt from a baby sitter, he must know whereof I speak. They do not in any way assist in improving day care facilities and costs, which, in effect, now largely exclude low income people.

The whole area of day care is very much in the public domain, yet we are tiptoeing around it as a national Parliament because some policy considerations may be thought to be of provincial responsibility. This is the ongoing Canadian minuet. Having said that it is the national government that has clear responsibility in the tax field, we ought to say that the matter of day care facilities and costs of operation in maintaining children in day care centres is clearly our responsibility. We should see to it that we look after this matter at this stage of the legislation.

I end where I began, with the plea for clarity and conciseness in the legislation. I expect the minister will be reviewing the wise criticisms of many hon. members about the unfair attitude this bill takes to the co-operative movement in Canada. I also suggest that the bill in no way considers the future of that distressed aspect of Canadian life, the small or family farm. Lastly, although the provisions for child care are innovative and helpful, I suggest with great sincerity that they do not go far enough to meet the realities of the present day, since such a large part of our working force consists of working mothers.

[Translation]

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my comments on second reading, or rather on the amendment brought forward by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) will be very brief.

I do not want to delay the business of the House by repeating many things that have already been said, explaining at length approaches for fiscal reform and even less, like the hon. member for Edmonton West in his amendment, taking advantage of the opportunity to discuss economic policy in general. Economic policy is a specific thing and although it is related to a country's fiscal system I do not feel it should be used as a pretext for delaying our fiscal reform and discussing the economic problems we are facing. I do believe we can now carry out this reform since we are faced with economic problems. In fact steps likely to correct them can be taken.

Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to state that I am completely in agreement with the principle of the matter. I wholeheartedly approve the government's idea of opening a public debate on the white paper and of having the tax reform proposals examined by the House, by the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs and by the Senate, and then of presenting a bill to the House. Obviously, by so doing, the government was much criticized and found itself in the rather embarrassing situation of having to defend its positions.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I believe that this will not have been in vain, because, through the debate, the public learned much on the present taxation system, and I believe that, instead of always attacking the government's policy by opposing its proposals, it is preferable to inform the people.

I think that we have done something concrete since November 1969. In fact, Canadians have a better knowledge of the tax system, its consequences on their life and on the economic system in general.

Mr. Speaker, I only meant by these remarks to bring to the attention of the House, as other hon. members have done, a clause or philosophy contained in this bill which could be detrimental to the co-operatives and credit unions, and this, because I live in a predominantly rural area where co-operatives have played, as they still do, a very important role, especially in fisheries.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Co-operatives have played a role in the Maritimes. In my constituency, they have helped the people get through a depression, a disastrous economic and financial situation. But they still have much to do.

Evidently, I acknowledge and appreciate the fact that we live in a free enterprise system and I feel that such a system is the best for Canada, in our political and economic circumstances.

However, Mr. Speaker, that system has some gaps; in general, it has some deficiencies, because too often we are governed by efficiency in terms of statistics, in terms of production, in short, in general economic terms.

I am in agreement with this approach. Efficiency is sometimes necessary. When members of a society wish to lead a certain kind of life, we must recognize their right to do so and give them as much assistance as possible, particularly by way of the tax structure.

It is obvious that the operation of co-operatives and caisses populaires is outdated. The legislation on co-operatives has not been reviewed since 1950, I think, after a royal commission studied the problem around 1945. It should be amended because in certain cases co-operatives have grown to be not only organizations grouping people with a certain goal or to improve the social or economic lot of their members, but also a threat to small private businesses.

Co-operatives should perhaps pay higher taxes. As for those which simply exist to meet a social or sociological need, they should have under our tax system the means to accumulate capital in order to achieve greater expansion. Were the proposals contained in the bill to be passed, it would be disastrous for co-operatives, particularly after seven, eight or ten years, because by increasing by from 3 to 5 per cent the employed part of the capital, that capital will accumulate from year to year in a strictly mathematical progression, and after a certain number of years, the co-operative will not have enough cash or liquid assets to meet its commitments to its members. Some co-operatives, large and small, would then disappear. I feel the cabinet has not really understood the implications of the proposal.

I therefore ask the House to amend the bill when it comes up before the committee of the whole to ensure that the tax system continues to allow co-operatives and caisses populaires to develop further.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, in the Maritimes, in my constituency especially, these co-operatives have sociological effects, and strictly with regard to efficiency, I think that without them Canada will lag behind and stand to lose. We realize today that society must look after the social condition of its citizen, their social education and give social assistance to those in need, so many programs helping the underprivileged and the poor. Many of these people live in rural regions and benefit from these co-operatives.

And what will happen if the bill now under consideration is passed? Society will have to look after these people through less efficient means than if we were to help co-operatives by tax abatements. So the income lost to the Treasury would be more efficiently spent than if attempts were made to solve social problems created by the disappearance of co-operatives. I think it would be more advantageous for the Treasury to sacrifice some revenues that would be of great benefit to the co-operatives.

The credit unions distribute their profits to their members. Profits are not their sole concern. In fact, they provide their members with economic advantages and they work in several other fields.

With regard to fishing, for instance, on the eve of the fishing season for some species, private companies are anxious to see what prices co-operatives will offer. Why, Mr. Speaker? Because in private enterprise, profit is the motivation. Private companies are less concerned with the social welfare of their members or people who sell them fish. It is quite normal to pay as little as possible to get the most for one's money. As a matter of fact, the system is so organized. But, on the other hand, co-operatives quite often give to a fisherman who is a co-operative member a much higher price. Therefore, companies must in turn pay more, which forces people at the end of the year to sell their fish and the consumer to pay a little more. Why? To pay for higher operating costs which affect no only the unionized worker from a processing plant but also the fisherman whose only protection is the co-operative.

I felt that this bill would bring about the disappearance of co-operatives as well as harmful consequences for the economy and society; already the situation is very serious in my riding. And almost one third of the population is non productive in some designated areas. In fact, were co-operatives to disappear, the social and economic situation in my riding would become more critical.

Mr. Speaker, co-operatives are of prime importance in the Maritime provinces, especially in my riding. I hope, therefore, that the relevant sections will be examined by a committee of the whole House, and that the latter will amend these sections in order to provide a more effective and more equitable way for co-operatives to remain in operation.

[English]

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased to hear a government member say some of the things that need to be said with regard to the proposals in this bill for taxation of co-operatives. At the end of June, before we adjourned for the recess, there was almost a total silence on that side. I began to be amazed that a government had been elected in which there were not any members who were either aware of or concerned about the co-operative movement.

In this overall taxation proposal, there is a lack of concern for the disadvantaged in our economy. There is a lack of concern for those people and those organizations in our economy who find it difficult to gain new capital or retain capital for their operations. I think in terms of the co-operatives, in terms of the farmers, in terms of small businessmen. These groups will probably disappear if we continue present taxation policies. It is true there is provision for an increase in basic exemptions but the majority of wage earners, pensioners, salary-earners and small businessmen will, as far as I can make out, bear a disproportionate share of taxation. The measure before us is favourable to corporate business as far as tax rates and write-offs in certain categories are concerned. The government is sometimes charged with being devoted to creeping socialism. I do not think this is true at all. The government, as it appears from this tax bill, is devoting itself to the area of managed corporate capitalism in the hope that managed corporate capitalism, if left secure and not taxed too heavily, will be a source of prosperity for Canadians and a means of providing a satisfactory level of employment. I am assuming the government would like to see a satisfactory level of employment. Despite some of the things which have been done I cannot accept that it really does not give a damn.

• (5:00 p.m.)

This being so, the government must be following the general pattern we see here on the assumption that satisfactory employment will be created. From the look of these tax proposals, we must conclude that they expect satisfactory employment levels to follow from large-scale resource development. The fact that this has not happened up to now does not seem to faze them at all. It seems they believe that what has happened in the immediate past will not happen in the future. I do not know how they come to this conclusion because like actions usually produce like results unless there are exceptional circumstances, but that is the line taken in the proposals we are considering. The bill does not follow the Carter Commission idea that a buck is a buck, that taxation should be equal. I do not think it can properly be called tax reform in the sense that most people understand the word. Rather, it is a managed tax scheme designed to give advantage to those who already have most of the economic power and to those who will most rapidly develop Canada's basic resources, which means that those already in production in the smaller segments of the economy will find it increasingly difficult to survive.

One sees the same approach toward what the United States has done in applying a surtax. The government's response has been to provide for assistance to those manufacturers or processors who are sending more than 20 per cent of their products to the United States. For practical purposes this rules out most of the small entrepreneurs in Canada whose operations are designed primarily to serve the people in their own areas but who do, nevertheless, export some of their products and who will be caught by this surcharge. The government's approach to this question is not designed to help farmers as individuals. It might do something for those who are processing farm products, but the chances of this assistance trickling back to the farmer are remote.

I know that when it comes to workers' allowances for expenses, the government's approach is to specify a flat amount. Why not allow the workers the same privileges as are given to others and accept legitimate expenses as deductible, provided receipts can be produced to show that these expenses have actually been incurred? For example, the expenses of railroaders working away from home vary a great deal. I know of verified cases in my constituency where expenses have amounted to two or three times the figure mentioned here. We are not back in the days when a working man could walk to his job, or take a streetcar, and be there in 10 or 15 minutes. These are times in which a worker whose job folds may well have to drive to another area to find employment, such is the mobility of labour. He may be required to drive and maintain a vehicle which he otherwise would have no need to drive or maintain. But no recognition has been given to these factors. They have been ignored.

Then, there is the position of the co-operatives. I cannot make up my mind whether these proposals for taxing co-operatives were the result of stupidity or malice aforethought. I suppose we shall never know. We can only hope that as the bill goes through, the present provisions will be amended. Some have said: Let us express concern over the small co-ops but do not let us worry about the big ones. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), as reported in Hansard at page 7762, said:

> We have had quite a reaction to this bill from the co-ops. I do not know what the House is going to decide, but it seems to me that the government has advanced its proposals after looking at some of the largest co-ops in the country, organizations which have lost their co-operative origins, that operate in the hundreds of millions of dollars class, their boards of directors being far removed from the ordinary members, in the same way as the boards of the biggest multinational corporations are far removed from the shareholders.

[Mr. Gleave.]

Then, he went on to say:

> Unfortunately, the government's proposal gather up into the same net hundreds if not thousands, of small local co-operatives. I am speaking of co-operatives organized on a local self-help basis.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Perhaps some private business was feeling the pinch as a result of competition from these large co-operatives. Perhaps they persuaded the government to move to clip their wings. If this should be true, then I say again this displays an amazing amount of ignorance because this bill, with its taxation proposals for co-operatives, will make it extremely difficult not only for the small co-operatives but also the large co-operatives to operate. The time is and has been for some time when the large co-operative is extremely important. If we had not developed the large co-operatives which we have both in eastern and in western Canada, we could not operate effectively. Canadian Co-operative Implements Limited surely would not be able to finance the importation of machinery, the manufacturing of machinery and the distribution of machinery if this particular tax bill should go into effect.

We had an inquiry into the cost of farm machinery and found out that the costs were excessive, but we did not receive any clear cut recommendations concerning how this situation could be changed. The only competition that is and will be effective in the farm machinery field is from such a co-operative or from the smaller manufacturing industries we have in Canada. The only real competition which exists in the distribution of fuel oil to farmers in western Canada comes from the Federated Co-operative. I would not be surprised if in a few years it were the only refinery remaining in the province of Saskatchewan because it is owned by the people of Saskatchewan and they will keep it there. So, are we seriously thinking we will bring in this kind of taxation proposal which would cripple an organization which saves millions of dollars for its people? I cannot understand those who say that a small co-operative is a nice little business and we can safely pat it on the head, but when it gets into the multimillion dollar class it should quickly have its throat cut. How else could we have established a farmer-owned fertilizer plant in Calgary had we not had a co-operative which could raise the money required to establish the plant? How else could we have established a large grain terminal on the west coast had we not had a co-operative which could obtain membership earnings in order to put it there?

I have before me the submission to the Minister of Finance by the Co-operative Union of Canada in respect of sections 135 and 136. In their submission to the minister they say their purpose is to object to the continuation of a capital employed concept as a base to determine the extent to which patronage refunds may be paid by a co-operative. They were impelled to make this submission because the government decided that 3 per cent was not enough and intended to jump it to 5 per cent. This was an illogical method in the first place. In this legislation is a proposal for the taxation of co-operatives' annual earnings. Co-operatives have not objected to paying the tax on the profits they have. They have said in this submission "for non-member earnings, tax them as a corporation". What they are objecting to is the government dictating to them the manner in which they may distribute the patronage earnings from the earnings of the members and which belong to the members. Is it correct that the government should tell them what they can do and how much tax they will have to pay?

I do not think the people who made these proposals really know how co-operatives gather and maintain their equity or how it is paid out. Co-operatives have to pay out savings and reserves as their members retire or become old. If a member should cease farming, the standard practice in the Saskatchewan Pool, or in the Biggar Co-operative or in the co-operative at Swift Current or Saskatoon is that at that point in time they repay the shares, or in other words the savings that the member has in the co-operative. The submission made by the co-operative states that under this taxation proposal either one of two things will happen. Either the co-operatives will not be able to pay out the money to these people when they cease business or retire, or, if they pay it out, the co-operatives then will be starved for working capital. Is the objective of this proposal to starve the co-operatives in respect of working capital? As I say, what is it? Is it ignorance or what? We are exercised because we have a lot of money invested. Those of us who are members of the co-operatives and who have been officials of co-operatives know; for example, that in the Saskatchewan pool, the Alberta pool and I suppose in the Manitoba pool we are facing a rebuilding and reorganization program which will cost somebody a lot of money. This will not cost the government a lot of money. It is the farmers who will have to pay the shot.

I would expect the government to be concerned with keeping the co-operative movement strong. It is a purely Canadian organization in all its aspects. It is owned by Canadians. We have no difficulty in the co-operatives in respect of foreign capital. We do not consider it is even possible that a United States or indeed a British firm could come along and close down the co-operative refinery in Regina. This will not happen because we own it and want it there. It is quite possible that any time any corporation in Canada can close a particular refinery or indeed a fertilizer plant and say, since it is not making money, it is to be closed down. Or it could be a flour mill. We had an example a few years ago when if we had not had co-operative owned flour mills in western Canada, we would not have been able to deliver flour to China because the foreign-owned flour millers simply said they would not mill the flour.

• (5:20 p.m.)

I should think that a government which was at all concerned about Canadian ownership would be busying itself making very sure that co-operative institutions and commercial operations in Canada remained viable and strong. We find the very opposite. I do not know how many letters and submissions I have received from local co-operatives in western Canada, but I have received a great many from individual members, farmers and, indeed, city people who use these co-operatives both in my constituency and others. The only other two recent actions by the government as a result of which I received more letters was the stabilization bill and Bill C-176. Our people are greatly exercised by these tax proposals. They consider these proposals will put in jeopardy thé co-operatives they have spent a great deal of time and money establishing. The only thing I can say to this government is that before it is too late it should change its basic approach.

Finally, let me say something to the government in respect of farmers. I think it was the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) who said a short while ago it was about time we recognized that the farmer was in a different position from the corporation. The farmer has more difficulty in respect of capital accumulation, and this applies to the small businessman, as well in transferring assets from one generation to another. There is no recognition of this fact in the government's approach. When this legislation comes into full effect it will make it more difficult for a farmer to purchase and maintain a line of machinery on his farm. This does not have to be so. If any real consideration were given to this matter a different approach could be taken.

If it is the government's decision to levy a capital gains tax, this could be done in such a way that it would not hamstring or hamper the ordinary farmer in doing business and maintaining an adequate capital structure. However, no consideration has been given to that aspect. It seems there is an idea in this country that we should be enamoured with corporate business because this is going to give us all the things we want in terms of growth and social satisfaction. We are beginning to find that this is not so.

There does not seem to be any urge to develop or take different approaches to meet the real needs of the people. We must meet these needs of the people whether they are in the cities, the towns or on farms, whether they are engaged in fisheries or anything else. We do not seem to be able to bring ourselves to the point of saying these people must come first and must be of over-riding concern. It seems this is impossible to achieve.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—Pollution—Request for progress report on removal of sunken Irving Whale; the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard)—External Affairs—U.S. claim to Machias Seal Island and coastguard invasion of waters in Dixon entrance—Canadian position.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray (for Mr. Benson) that Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequent upon the amendments to that act, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West) (p. 7763).

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate supporting the amendment, and I want to deal with one specific point only. I wish to espouse the cause of credit unions and co-operatives, which stand to be adversely affected by the provisions of the tax reform legislation. I make no apology for repeating this plea because I can think of no other sections of the proposed legislation which will be more harmful to the average citizen of Canada than these sections affecting the credit union and co-operative movements.

A credit union is a group of low income people each of whom as individuals was unable to amass sufficient capital to improve his standard of living. They had a common bond of union. Perhaps they belonged to the same parish, the same labour union or all lived in a small community. They pooled their resources to establish fairly substantial supplies of capital from which a member might obtain a loan to procure for himself the things he required to improve his economic position.

These loans were granted not because the individual had a lot of collateral, such as that demanded by banks and other lending institutions, but because of the man's character, his standing in the community, his integrity and the fact that he would, when circumstances permitted, repay the loan. Let me cite as an example, that small credit union in the town of Delhi. I attended a meeting of the directors of that small credit union and learned the story of a man whose name will remain anonymous unless it is required. He was a worker at a local tobacco factory in the town of Delhi. He tried to borrow money from the local bank and other lending institutions in order to set himself up as a small bricklaying contractor. He was refused because he did not have the necessary collateral. He did not own a home or have anything at all to put up in order to satisfy the bank he could repay the loan. He then joined the credit union in 1955 by depositing $5 for the purchase of a share. Then, on the basis of his credit standing, he was able to borrow a sufficient sum to obtain the tools and equipment necessary to set himself up as a small contractor. He borrowed on his character and an assignment of his income. Today, he is a successful businessman, a good community-minded man who owns his own home, trucks and other equipment, and employs a number of men in his business. This is an example of what the credit union movement is able to do in the way of assisting ordinary citizens of this country who find themselves in adverse economic circumstances.

The present tax reform measure, far from containing provisions to assist small credit unions to continue to provide these services, has a dangerous clause which, if implemented, could have the effect of forcing the small credit union to close its doors. This is one of the major reasons I join my colleagues in supporting the amendment before the House in the name of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). This amendment deplores the lack of understanding by the government of the plight of the ordinary citizen with less than adequate resources who is caught up in this conflicting economic force of inflation and unemployment. It is ironical to me that a government which purports to espouse the cause of the less fortunate is proposing tax legislation which contains sections which, if implemented, would destroy the very mechanism by which small business people have pulled themselves up by their bootstraps, and I refer to credit unions.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel).]

Perhaps at this point, so that hon. members and particularly the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) might have a better appreciation of what we are talking about, it would be in order to briefly review the history of the credit union movement. If we know where it had its beginning we might better understand it. It originated first of all in a famine-stricken area of southern Germany in the year 1849. There, the mayor of a small town in a depressed area of Germany, seeing the plight of the poor people, encouraged them to pool their resources. They did this and established sufficient small capital resources from which they could borrow and improve their positions.

• (5:30 p.m.)

The credit union movement in Canada had its origin in the year 1900. It was organized first by Alphonse Desjardins in Levis, Quebec. He was profoundly disturbed by the poor and the suffering in his own parish of that area. He talked with them, he encouraged them to get together and to do what they did in Germany—pool their small resources. It is interesting to note that Alphonse Desjardins was a reporter, a journalist, who later came to Ottawa to be a Hansard reporter in this House. By his encouragement of the people in his community he amassed a sum of $40,000 to aid the people of the area. He was the sole custodian of the fund. People in the community began to talk and said that he was misusing the funds, and so on. Therefore, on going to the premier of the province of Quebec he was able to get a charter drafted by means of which a suitable and proper constitution could be set up for the credit union movement. This, then, was the beginning of the movement in Quebec which, as the hon. member on the other side mentioned a short time ago, became what is today the Caisse Populaire organization in that province.

Today there has been a tremendous growth in the movement and credit unions have spread to the United States. It is interesting to note that Mr. Desjardins was requested by a prominent financier of the city of Boston to go there and explain to the poor sections of that city his plan. Credit unions then were formed in the United States and have grown there as they have in this country. I think it is interesting, also—people who are passing laws which will be detrimental to credit unions should know these things—that it was the credit union movement which first pioneered the principle of insuring loans to members. It was pooh-poohed by financial institutions of the day as being entirely unpractical, yet they have shown it to be workable, so much so that today many lending institutions have provided means by which a member can insure his loan so that the debt dies with the debtor, and his family and those left to carry on are not saddled with the debt which he was unable to repay by reason of death.

Many small credit unions are in existence today in this country as well as the large one, the Caisse Populaire to which I referred. The larger ones deserve encouragement and not discouragement by the government in order that they may continue the good work which they now do. I have, as have many members of all sides of this House, received letters from people who are members of credit unions expressing concern and fear of the possible effects of the reform legislation now before the House. I will read a section of a letter which is written from the heart. This is what the writer has to say, a member of the Delhi Ontario credit union to which I referred a short time ago:

> We would like to express our displeasure of even the thought of taxing the so painfully established credit unions, who have rendered so far tremendous service to their members. Most executives are working voluntarily many, many hours to manage a self-help association. We are sure the federal government already derives a great deal of good, directly and indirectly, from credit union service. I am thinking in terms of education re merits of saving, forgiveness of debts when fatally hurt—it just happened here recently to one of our members again. Also getting people out of unforeseen trouble with dignity, even to loan money to pay our ever increasing taxes. Just ask any credit union committee member to learn more about that, or look into the history of credit unions. Are we members not already taxed for things we buy with money borrowed from the credit union? When no one else wants to help you, the credit union seems to give the chance and now you are asked to vote to tax them out of existence, at least the majority of the smaller ones. Why?

This, I think, is a simple plea from a member of the credit union movement for some humanity in the legislation now before the House. It is interesting to note what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said to the credit union members on international credit union day earlier this year. Among other things, he said:

> Credit unions have experienced enormous success because they encourage both regular savings and the wise use of credit. But even more important, credit unionism encourages self-help, mutual assistance, and personal involvement. In this sense credit unions are more than financial institutions, they are a positive social force within our communities.
>
> To over 38 million members of the credit union movement in many countries of the world, I send my best wishes for continued growth and prosperity.

Those were fine words to assure credit union members that all would be well. The actions of the Minister of Finance belie the honeyed words of the Prime Minister. Something is wrong in this contradictory approach to this legislation. The specific fears which credit union members have are to be found in sections 127, 135 and 189 of the tax reform legislation. The credit union people tell me that they are about to experience a double form of taxation. The profit accrued from the pooling of resources of all its members still belongs to the members but they are leaving it in the co-op to be distributed as they see fit as tax dividends. Now the government is proposing to tax the pooled resources of the members. Then, when the members receive the profits of their organization in dividend tax credits they are forced to declare them on their income tax returns and are again taxed on the same money. This, they feel, is unfair double-taxation.

The government must distinguish between the economic aspect of the credit union movement which I have just covered and the humanitarian aspect referred to by the Prime Minister in his congratulatory message. Most important of all, I think we must remember that we are dealing with people—not figures, not dollars and cents, not mere statistics, but people and their condition of life. Credit union people have been able to improve the cultural aspect of their communities and themselves. They have been able to obtain the better things of life. To the people who were once caught up in abject despair, who had given up all chance of success, has been given a new outlook on life. People have been able to make a contribution to Canadian life rather than become a drag on society. They have become wage earners, not names on welfare rolls. I cannot say too strongly that this factor should be taken into consideration when we are studying the dollars and cents effect of this legislation on the credit union movement.

Now may I turn for a moment to the co-operatives and their plight, which is somewhat the same although not quite. In my own community we are served very well. The farmers in my area and other people who desire to use the services of the Norfolk Co-operative Company Limited, serving the people of Norfolk, Haldimand and counties, are served very well. This co-operative is independently managed by its own directors. It does not take orders from United Co-operatives of Ontario, an organization which helps to buy and supply them with the goods which they sell but does not control the decisions and the policy-making of that group.

• (5:40 p.m.)

It serves many hundreds of people in my area. It is one of the main reasons that the family farmer has been able to maintain himself in a society which today appears to be tending towards bigness in farming operations and in which the family farm is largely being ignored. This is something that cannot be allowed to happen, Mr. Speaker. The family farm provides a satisfying way of life for many people. The co-operative movement in my county and in many other areas across the country permits small farmers to live the kind of life they want to live.

The co-operatives are deeply concerned about the increase in the rate of tax on employable capital. Over the years the Equitable Tax Foundation has released a barrage of criticism against the co-op movement. These releases have landed on the desks of Members of Parliament. They are most unfair in their criticism of the co-op movement. The previous speaker, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) dealt quite effectively with this aspect of the matter. It seems to me that the people in the Equitable Tax Foundation fear the competition of the co-ops. But, Mr. Speaker, the co-op is the governing influence, the levening influence that keeps prices within the reach of the ordinary person in our society. I fear that the drafters of this legislation have been listening too much to the Equitable Tax Foundation. In fact, one even wonders if that foundation helped draft some of it. To those people I would say, as I have said to hon. members here this afternoon, there is a distinct failure to consider the human aspects of the co-ops and the credit union movement.

The co-ops and the credit unions have one thing in common. They are held together by a common bond of association. They are designed to provide service to their members. They are self-help groups. The co-ops are self-sufficient. The Caisse Populaire movement is a good example of a co-op being able to stand on its own feet. But let us not forget that big as some co-ops are across this country of ours, they provide sustaining support for the small, local co-ops throughout the country. Without the assistance of the larger buying power of the big co-ops, the little ones would be in trouble. Let us take a hard look at what we are doing before we pass damaging taxation laws which will hurt these people. Let the government not forget that it has sponsored and encouraged the co-op movement among the Indian and Eskimo peoples of our country. Now we find this iniquitous piece of legislation which is going to damage that whole program.

There are other aspects of this bill that I would like to talk about, but I will not take time to do so at this point. However, before I conclude I wish to refer to student exemptions. It seems to me that a student who is attending a registered university or college should be completely exempt from taxation until he or she has completed the full course of education and taken a proper place in the work force of the country. It is difficult to understand a policy which provides student loans so that people may continue their post-secondary education and yet at the same time taxes those people on the summer earnings they have accumulated to try to maintain themselves in college. Something is wrong here, Mr. Speaker. The amount of tax revenue derived from such income, compared with the total tax revenue of this nation, would be a mere pittance. Let us give the students a break.

Not only is the economic aspect of it disheartening to the young person who works hard to earn money and then finds he must give part of it back to the government coffers, but it is also demoralizing to him. He is prompted to ask: What is the use of working? He is prompted to say: Let society keep me. Let them put me through college. I believe that taxation should not apply to students who are earning their own way through college. Such tax relief would give them some incentive.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to take part in this debate. It brings us closer to the end of this particular road, and perhaps not too soon, because if the debate on tax reform and all the documents which accompany that reform continues for even two more years we will have to build a 20-storey skyscraper in Ottawa to accommodate just the mere words, let alone the Members of Parliament who are being hemmed in their offices by what they are receiving in their daily mail.

The fight for tax reform started a considerable time back. I suppose the peaks of it were the decision by the Diefenbaker government to appoint the Carter royal commission and the other events with which most of us in this chamber are familiar, in particular the presentation of the white paper by the government, the studies made of it by the finance committee of this chamber, the finance committee of the other chamber and then the presentation of the budget.

I do not think that the presentation of the budget, for reasons I will go into briefly, was the end of the trail so far as tax reform is concerned. I say this because as some of us see it, in particular the last speaker with his eloquence about co-ops and credit unions and others who took part in the debate earlier, there are cases where we have to examine carefully the minutiae put before us in such cumbersome form by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson).

In dealing with the problem of what is a fair tax system we have to consider two or three questions. These are the questions that I would ask myself: What social objectives do you consider? What do you do in taxation when you deal with those whose income earning may take place rather late in life? The last speaker mentioned those who go to university. I am thinking particularly of doctors. I know of doctors who have gone well into their twenty-seventh year, and some beyond their thirtieth year, in getting their education. I admit that certain economic advantages may come to them rather quickly and rather bountifully after that, but this should not make us indifferent to the fact that for many of them there has been a great deal of sacrifice over a long period of time.

[Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand).]

But even before the doctors and people in the category—the long learners, if I may call them that—I put those who are under certain disadvantages in today's society, in particular the old people, those who are not able to earn, who are not really able to fight the inflation that has hit all of us, who come to the end of their days having given their all to Canada and who suddenly find there are new challenges which they are totally or partially unable to meet. If you are to have a fair tax system you must consider that old people deserve special consideration when you are making out the formula. Then there are those who are physically and mentally disabled. They have to be considered as well.

I would like to think that in making out the exemptions, which are the very heart of our tax system, we would pay more regard to the poverty level that our social scientists now talk about. I mention this because when you see exemptions continuing at a certain level for over a decade, particularly in the period of inflation since the end of World War II, you know that things do get out of joint. We also know that the people who save are least able to fight against inflation. I should like to see an income tax law eventually framed so that the poverty level would be the exemption rather than some arbitrary figure. In other words, I should like to see more flexibility, which the measure we are considering does not have. I shall have more to say about that matter when we get into the question of the exemptions provided in the bill, Mr. Speaker.

• (5:50 p.m.)

There are those with special responsibilities in the work force, such as women. This question has been well researched by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, I admit, and they do not lack champions. However, one has to ask whether the formula contained in this proposed legislation is proper, or whether it should not be more generous and complete. Perhaps this is a matter of detail but it is important detail because the number of women taking part in the economic life of this nation will increase.

When one sits down to frame legislation, the economic objectives of taxation are important. As an example, there is large-scale exploration for oil in the province of Nova Scotia. It is known to be there and it has been brought up from subterranean sources, but so far there has been no public indication of how vast and exploitable these resources may be. It is something to find oil and to give an incentive to the companies that look for it, but it is something else to have that oil brought ashore and used in a commercial process.

Mr. Speaker, I wish the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) would turn his voice the other way, toward the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier). I find their conversation distracting.

I think we should be asking ourselves if it is only a matter of finding something that can be squirrelled away by the oil companies and marked as part of the natural resources of oil in North America without doing anything about it. Should we not give exemptions and benefits to the companies that search for oil, ensuring that such benefit is available only if there is a use for the oil? I fear that we may establish beyond all reasonable doubt that there is oil in commercial quantities off the coast of Atlantic Canada but we will not in some way ensure that the oil is not exploited in such a way that we have a resource in Nova Scotia that perhaps we cannot use. That situation could be avoided by provision in the act that we are considering.

I should like to quote a submission made to the House of Commons Committee on Tax Reform by the Nova Scotia Voluntary Planning Board:

> Many aspects of the proposals and of the projections remain implicit. The assumptions underlying the proposals are not given so that it is impossible to determine what kind of economic model is used as a basis. Is it a growth model and does the model incorporate a rate of inflation? Has analysis been undertaken of the effect of the proposed tax changes on the rate of saving in Canada, and, perhaps more importantly, on the inducement to invest? Is it known what effect the changes will have on initiative, entrepreneurship, and the willingness to work, particularly on the part of the entrepreneurial group?

Those questions have not been answered, Mr. Speaker, although they were presented some time ago by a responsible organization. At a time when we are in economic trouble, when we have to ask ourselves the purpose of our tax laws, when perhaps more than ever before we have to ask people to be prepared to invest and risk money without any guarantee that it will come back, to risk money for the sake of promoting development in Canada and providing jobs for Canadians, these are valid questions. The reasoned amendment presented by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), on which we will be voting shortly, commends itself because it asks these basic questions and says to the Minister of Finance, "You have not gone far enough. You should have been able to show us that this fancy package has the objective of increasing the Canadian economic potential."

The brief presented by the Nova Scotia Voluntary Planning Board continues:

> If the proposals lead to a reduction in private saving—

And I think that will happen.

> —owing to the incidence of taxes on decisions to work and to save, it will be necessary to resort to public saving and/or borrowing, or the attraction of more external funds to finance economic growth. When the private sector is acquiring liabilities and assets at a rapid rate there is prosperity,—

I suppose one could say, parenthetically, that this has been the case in the past.

> —but when the public sector is required to acquire liabilities, there is an increase in public debt. The situation may become very confused owing to different attitudes toward public and private finance.

I think those are very valid questions and are as valid now as they were at that time.

Mr. Speaker, it is close to six o'clock and my next thought cannot be unburdened in anything less than five minutes because it deals with the language of the proposal. May I suggest that it is now six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, when I broke off my remarks just before the supper hour I had tried to express my feelings about one or two of the principles that ought to guide us in our quest for tax reform. Now I wish to carry my argument forward to a more specific field and deal with how that tax reform should be achieved.

I am a lawyer. Quite a number of members of this House are lawyers. Sometimes it is said that perhaps there are too many lawyers here. I always vigorously disagree with that contention. It is an old axiom of the law that everybody is presumed to know what the law is. Obviously, that must be a legal fiction because it could never be fact. Even if you read the many pages of the bill dealing with tax reform and knew what the law was, at the end of it all you still would not know the law in all its detail.

One of the complaints about the new legislation is that it will be very difficult for anyone to know what the law is. It is expressed in such cumbersome language that no one can read it and understand instantly what one's rights are. I think we should not forget that point when dealing with the bill. After all, the cumbersome language will lend itself to this difficulty: if we accept the draftsmanship of the Minister of Finance and his officials—and a lot of thought went into the drafting of the bill—and the legislation is proclaimed law, for a long time many people will be coming to the Department of National Revenue to find out exactly what rulings have been made on what the department and the government thought was the law. I can see a practical difficulty here, Mr. Speaker. That could be done for a considerable period and suddenly some bold soul could take this law before the courts. After winding its way through the lower courts of the land, the legislation could wind up before the Supreme Court of Canada and, bang, there could be a decision dead against any interpretation made by lower courts all down the line, as well as by the Department of National Revenue.

That is why I say that regard must be paid to drafting this bill in the best and clearest language. If it is not, the Department of National Revenue will find itself in difficulties and we in this chamber will find ourselves under a certain amount of opprobium for passing such a law. There may need to be a fair amount of fighting to achieve this clarity. I give the other side of the House warning that there may have to be a fight if we are to achieve what chartered accountants of Canada, bar associations and the like have said we must achieve. They have said that the proposed law is simply not expressed in clear enough terms; it must be clearer.

I see I am running out of time, Mr. Speaker. I wanted to make several points but I shall have to abbreviate what I wanted to say. My first point deals with co-operatives. Several colleagues in the House have already dealt with this question and I shall not trespass on ground they have gone over. I should like to say something about Monseigneur Moses M. Coady, the man from the Margaree Valley of Nova Scotia. He was not the father of co-operatives, and no one should say that he was, yet he was the man who probably gave co-operatives their greatest impetus in Canada. If any Canadian, dead or alive, deserves sainthood, my personal vote as a Presbyterian would be for Moses M. Coady. The "M" may stand for Michael or Mathias, because like Harry S. Truman he did not have a middle name, being known as Moses M. Coady.

He was a Roman Catholic, a very distinguished person and fought for a considerable time for many rights. Between 1949 and 1959, when he died, he fought particularly for the co-op movement. Indeed, half the speeches he made in those years were on behalf of the co-op movement. His biography describes him as a man with a soul and with a bent for poetry and idealism. I think that is a fair description of the man. Many years ago he saw the great disaster of 1929 in terms described in the book "The Man from Margaree", edited and with commentary by Alexander F. Laidlaw, which are worth repeating before hon. members of the House:

> The sorry situation of orthodox economists and financiers following the disastrous market crash of 1929 he likened to the helplessness of muskrats carried down the Margaree River in a great flood which ravaged the Valley in his boyhood. The muskrats had built their houses in the river bank according to instinct and the traditions of the breed, but that did not save them—they were swept away to destruction.

Dr. Laidlaw's account of Mr. Coady continues:

> He urged people to breathe life and vigour into weak community organizations just as in his young days the farmers would bring sick lambs back to health and strength by feeding them milk from a bottle. Sometimes his recollections ran to fanciful and humorous pictures that strained the imagination of his audience. "When we were boys, they used to send us out cutting alders when there was nothing else to do on the farm. Before leaving for the woods, we'd get our axes so sharp you could shave a sleeping mouse with them without waking him up."

• (8:10 p.m.)

I hope that no one in this chamber who is engaged in tax reform is in the same picture as Moses M. Coady going forward to cut alders. In his middle years, if I may call them that, he was engaged in a great movement in Nova Scotia and, I think, in other parts of Canada. It was a countermovement against young people leaving farms. The first fight in that movement was in favour of adult education and, second, to get into the breech in respect of the value of co-operatives.

I wish to again quote briefly from Dr. Laidlaw's book on Dr. Coady. I should point out that Dr. Coady did not assemble a book in his life. He was a rather vigorous person, always on the go. He would write notes on parking tickets, if he ever came across such a thing, or on whatever else was available. He got his speeches across in very powerful rhetoric which was quite rare in Canada. He spoke about the basis of the American way of ownership. I presume that these words were in a speech he delivered, as we say in Halifax, in the Boston state. This speech could well apply to Canada:

[Mr. McCleave.]

> The fundamental idea of American democracy was ownership, a land where everybody was a lord, with no lords over him and no serfs under him. The family farm was your economic and social unit. Then came the industrial revolution and the city proletariat. As time went on, the industrial revolution had repercussions on democratic ownership in the country, and a new and terrible feudalism was thrown up. We now have the double proletariat of industrial centres and open country. We have lost the idea of the family farm and ownership, but we can bring it back again through economic co-operation. The co-operative system, whether it be in the country or in the city, is only an enlarged family where all are brothers and no one exploits his fellows. This technique could enable the people of America to repossess the country that their fathers once owned. In doing this, too, they would establish the foundation for social justice and charity and give us a new and peaceful world.

I do not think that is very radical. In a way, it is rather conservative. It is an assertion of people of very humble means getting together to pool their muscle, instinct, resources and what remained in their purses after they looked after their families and the like. It does more than that. These people want a co-operative movement for the simple reason that the more you consume, the more interest you have in the particular society. That is the basis of the co-operative movement in Nova Scotia. It is now being threatened by this new legislation.

The hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) and I had an opportunity this summer to meet 70 members of Atlantic co-operatives in Truro, Nova Scotia. I think other members also met people belonging to co-operatives. We learned more about the co-operative movement than could be spelled out in a 30-minute or 40-minute speech. We intend to carry the fight through. One principle that has to be reasserted has been overlooked in presenting this legislation. If we do not strengthen the co-operatives and give them something to which they can look forward by means of this legislation, we are simply relegating people to economic slavery. I do not believe we should do that. Co-operatives are a special means by which people can assert their right to be an owner of something. This was the biggest criticism I heard of the legislation. People are going to be denied the right to be something, in face of the very large fellows.

This legislation simply asks that $5 million be put into the pot in return for several hundred thousand Canadians who feel they are being deprived of something. I realize that not all Canadians are co-operatively inclined, but a certain number are so inclined. I do not know the formula we must come up with when we get into the nitty-gritty of the legislation. I shall not try to deal with it now. However, we must do something to enable these Canadians to have their small share in something that is distinctively Canadian. We must be able to carry out the ideals of Dr. Coady.

If I have two minutes remaining, I would like to mention two thoughts in the field of housing and urban development. I wish to quote from a brief sent to the minister on September 1 by the Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada. This should be on the record. Although they make nine points, I simply wish to record two:

> 1. Large investors who would normally build for the rental market will divert funds from residential into commercial and industrial buildings.

2. Investors wishing to build up estates for pension purposes will be prevented from carrying capital cost depreciation from a building costing up to $50,000 to a larger one and hence will be discouraged from any form of such investment.

My time has run out. I cannot deal with the complete picture in a 30 or 40 minute speech. I have mentioned some of the things I would like to see carried on. I had the advantage of being on the committee which dealt with taxation reform. We are so close in 90 per cent of the things that have been talked about for so many years that this should lead us on to see that the final 10 per cent of contentious matter is cleared up so that everyone will be reasonably happy. We should have something that will appeal to all Canadians.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, on budget night last June I was reported in the press as having said it was a good budget. However, only half of what I said was reported. The complete statement should have read, "Compared to the white paper, this budget seems to be a good budget."

Mr. Mahoney: You are a little late for those remarks.

Mr. Thompson: I am not trying to correct myself; I am only trying to give an introductory statement to lead into my comments regarding the budget.

The white paper turned out to be nothing more than building up a straw man which the public tore down, viciously at times, in order to make the alternative which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has produced seem at least better than it was, even though it was bad. The Canadian Press probably summed up well the budget version of taxation reform when it stated the following on the day after the budget speech:

In essence, all the major features of the 1969 proposals that enraged the business community and aroused some provincial governments have been dropped or significantly moderated.

Certainly what was left, Mr. Speaker, could have been inserted into the normal budgeting procedure. This prompts me to make some comments on the usefulness of the bill as a measure of tax reform. There is a real question in my mind as to the effectiveness of the procedure the government decided to adopt. The white paper process cost millions of dollars directly and many more millions indirectly by virtue of the uncertainty and hesitancy it induced in the economy generally.

• (8:20 p.m.)

In light of what it has cost, the bill before us is a very poor buy. The effects of the white paper held us back to the extent that today we face unemployment at a higher level than for many years. The government's proposals as they relate to tax reform fail entirely to alter the pattern of federal tax activity; they merely try to give old ideas a new appearance. Nothing is done to ease the basic burden of taxation, nothing has been done in the field of tax sharing with the provinces or to ensure greater equity for taxpayers in the middle-income bracket. The poor are still taxed, and no attempt has been made to employ a tax credit rather than an exemption system to more effectively assist low-income Canadians.

It is easy to talk about taking 750,000 people off the income tax rolls. What we ought to realize is that the amount of income tax collected from these people is probably not sufficient to cover the cost of administering the collection of the tax involved. Nothing really has been done for the people on low incomes as far as tax reform is concerned.

There is another important aspect which the bill does not cover. It fails to simplify the language or improve the draftsmanship of the existing act. Supposedly there are a great many loopholes in the present legislation—certainly people have been able to avoid paying taxes which they should have paid. The complexity of the drafting of the bill before us is that ten loopholes are left for every one which has been closed. I am not an authority in this regard but I read what the experts in this field have to say, the members of the legal and accounting professions who work in this area, and this is exactly what they are saying.

Then, again, the bill fails to reform the basis of tax collection. Here is one of the most pressing areas of reform as it relates to the existing legislation. Many of those who are authorities in the taxation field have not yet arrived at a complete understanding of what this bill will mean to those they represent or to the economy in general. As far as public understanding goes, the bill is really a vacuum. I should like to quote from the text of a letter written by Mr. Thomas Ferguson, a tax accountant, in the August issue of Canadian Business:

Most people in the business world think this law is a great improvement over the white paper. Whether we are right or not may take years to learn. After all, we are still dealing with appeals about the interpretation of the 1948 law. This new tax reform bill will prove no easier to interpret, and without any question it will be much more difficult for the Department of National Revenue to administer.

More rewriting of the Income Tax Act is not too many years in the future.

It is not an easy thing, unfortunately, for the general public to interpret a technical, legislative document such as the huge bill before us. Many of the reforms contained in it may have some merit, or at least some people think so. The trouble is that so most people cannot understand what the bill is saying, partly because it is so huge, so complicated, and partly because it is so badly drafted as to be almost unreadable. Take, for example, clause 39 which deals with the capital gains tax. It is only half a page in length and seems to be very concise as statutes go. However, after he has read four lines the reader is directed to turn to clause 3 and read another page. At the same time he is required to read that clause as though it says the opposite of what it really does say.

None of us wants to be the beneficiary of a law which imposes a higher than necessary compliance cost on the rest of society. As Canadians, we want the laws to be such that most people can understand and comply with them without the constant attendance of a professional adviser. The bill presented to us will afford a heyday for tax consultants, lawyers and accountants simply because the public is not able to understand or cope with it.

Usually, the legislation we pass in this House affects relatively few of the population directly. If difficulties are raised, there are the judges, lawyers and other officials who manage to make the law work reasonably well most of the time. The irritation and expense occasioned by shortcomings in a statute do not present a major problem to the ordinary person, as a rule. But when these shortcomings exist in an income tax law the situation becomes very different. Virtually everyone in the country is directly affected, and affected continuously from year to year.

The complexities of capital gains taxation will affect many more people than does present income tax. Most of the burden of coping with this complexity will fall on taxpayers in business, rather than on salary and wage earners. Then, too, there is the question of the added expense. The cost of complying with the new tax law will, like other business costs, find its way into the prices of goods and services which we all buy. An income tax law should not be rushed on to the statute books; the consequences of errors and ambiguities are far too damaging. This is one of the first objections I have to the proposition before us.

I turn, now, to another aspect, that of inflation. Your Honour will recall the words spoken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) last December when he proudly announced that inflation was licked and that he could, as a result, go on to deal with what he considers the No. 2 problem, namely, unemployment. It is strange indeed that after the employment situation has been used and manipulated by a deliberate depression of the economy, we find that not only has unemployment increased in our midst but inflation has not been licked either.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Just the other day when speaking in Port Hope the Prime Minister had to admit that inflation was rearing its ugly head again and presented the government with a much tougher problem than it had before. It is strange that some of those who advised the Prime Minister and who are responsible, as tax experts, fail to understand the situation as it exists today, not only in this country but in all western countries, which is that you can no longer manipulate the economy in such a way as to push down inflation without affecting the other aspect, unemployment.

It is time we realized that those theories which may have worked before World War II and in the more prosperous years thereafter have been replaced by a situation which requires something very different from before. If we are to come to grips with the problem of inflation we must gear our financial policies to consumption rather than to profits. This is the reason the present incentives given to industry are not really producing the jobs in the way they should. Quite the opposite is true. The government is giving subsidies to industry and inflation is going ahead faster than ever before.

So the Prime Minister was right when he admitted that he cannot do as was done before. He said we cannot slow down the economy again because it is already slowed down. The problem now is how to put more money into the economy and stop inflation. The Prime Minister went on to paint a very gloomy picture of what would occur if the government imposed compulsory controls. He said very clearly he was not in favour of compulsory controls on either wages or prices. It is one thing to speculate in a pre-election campaign in parts of the country, but it is another to come up with an economic policy which will face up to the problem of inflation and at the same time provide jobs for an expanding population.

[Mr. Thompson.]

It is interesting to note that one of the most severe and intelligent critics of the government's financial policies in this budget is the leader of the Liberal party of the province of Manitoba. Mr. Asper is rather alert in some of the things he says. I wish that instead of trying to build a party in Manitoba he would come down here and give some advice to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, who are certainly in need of sound advice so far as monetary economic policies are concerned. Mr. Asper had this to say on June 19:

> But the budget plan has a major failing. It suggests we can honestly finance the tax cuts and economic expansion by further deficits, financed by creating more public debt. This does nothing but postpone the day of reckoning. For over a decade now, Canada has financed its economic slowdown by spending more than it produces in revenues.

It is good to find someone who supports what I have been trying to say in this House for a long time. Let me read what he has to say with regard to the folly of this course of action:

> The folly of this ought to have been learned in the lessons of the past few years, where, because of the massive federal deficits of earlier years, and the government borrowing needed to fill the annual hole, we have been suffering tight money, and worse, expensive money, because government has attracted the majority of loan moneys available, causing private borrowers to have more difficulty and more expensive access to money markets.
>
> Government does nothing for the average Canadian taxpayer, when, with one hand it reduces his annual taxes by $200, while with the other it takes it away indirectly by forcing up the interest rate he must pay for a mortgage to enable him to buy a home.
>
> Last Friday's budget speech indicates Ottawa is going to borrow $1.4 billion this year, and $2.4 billion next year. The federal deficit this year will be nearly $400 million, and next year, as if to compete with the years of Walter Gordon, the fiscal cavity will be $750 million, written in red.

The federal deficit no doubt will be more by the time the supplementary estimates are finalized. So I am disturbed by the economic policies which are bound up in an attempt to balance the budget through deficit financing. I might give the Minister of Finance a bit of advice. It is very simple. I think it came from my grandfather a long time ago. I wish more people on the government side would remember these few simple words: If your outgo is more than your income, then your upkeep will be your downfall. That is exactly what is happening in the government now.

Another aspect of the budget is simply that you cannot possibly bring in a federal budget without proper and complete consultation with the provincial governments. Taxation reform is not the sole prerogative of, nor does it affect only the federal government. It is imperative that the provincial governments and the federal government plan together. The question of estate taxes and gift taxes, as they have been deleted by this budget, is an ample example of this. I confess that getting rid of the estate tax seemed to me to be a good thing, but the problems the budget has produced for the provincial governments in the area of the proposal to delete estate taxes have been tremendous.

The government has failed to properly consult with or listen to the provincial governments. Whether or not it is the provincial, municipal or federal government which is involved, it is the same taxpayer who pays in every case. So it seems that in this area as well, because regional prosperity or regional economic growth is not of a universal pattern in this country due to the different regional characteristics, it is imperative that any tax reform at the federal level should involve full consultation with the provincial governments.

I should like also to refer briefly to estate and gift taxes. In this regard I would say the decision of the government to increase the allowable tax deductions for charitable giving to 20 per cent, compared to 10 per cent, is one commendable feature of the budget. Because we have organizations like CIDA which are set up to assist and co-operate with the private sector in so far as international development is concerned, it is only sound policy to increase the amount of the deduction. This applies not only to organizations like CIDA but to other private organizations, church and otherwise.

The question of government support of education at the private level is an election issue at this time. But apart from the basic argument in that controversy, the increase to 20 per cent gives people the opportunity to have tax deductible allowances made for contributions to that kind of education. This is a good thing. It is also good for the many organizations which operate on a charitable basis, represent the private sector and play a far more important role in the over-all aspect of our economy and way of life than we usually give them credit for. So having said that, the elimination of the federal estate and gift taxes as of December 31, 1971, might be a good thing if the legislation before us passes this House by that time. It was there to avoid double-taxation because a capital gains tax will now be in effect.

• (8:40 p.m.)

According to the legislation there is no tax on bequests as between spouses. The inheriting spouse acquires assets at their original cost to the other spouse and the tax is paid only when the inheriting spouse sells or transfers the assets by gift or bequest. Gifts between spouses, outright or through a trust, are tax free but subject to tax in the donor's hands upon sale of the assets as if the donor spouse had continued to own the assets.

In respect of the impact this has had upon the provinces, we find with some surprise—and I am sure the Minister of Finance was among us—that the provincial governments attacked this very severely. The Ontario Treasurer attacked the move as too hasty and said the estate and gift taxes should be phased out as the capital gains tax is phased in, instead of creating a gap between the two which the provinces are left to fill. It will lead to loss of revenue for the provinces and create inequalities in the tax system. Without disagreeing with the basic principle of eliminating this tax, he certainly differed very strongly as to how it should be implemented.

The finance ministers of the seven provinces which do not have succession duty machinery have stated they will not be able to develop such machinery by January 1, 1972, and will thus lose revenues and become a tax haven for those in Ontario, British Columbia and Quebec. Former Premier Robarts of Ontario blasted this decision as inconsistent with the principles of tax reform and as indicative of a federal government tax reform philosophy that is solely concerned with raising money for federal spending programs rather than with a more equitable situation in so far as tax is concerned. Mr. Robarts said that the federal decision to eliminate death taxes puts provinces in the difficult position of having to maintain a tax on wealth until the capital gains tax matures. Far from reform, he suggested, this approach simply encourages and perhaps makes inevitable internal balkanization and tax competition between tax jurisdictions, surely what any program of true tax reform should try to avoid.

Behind all this is the simple fact that we are the most overgoverned people in practically the whole world. This is because of lack of co-ordinated tax policies among the three levels of government, because every dollar each one spends must come out of the same pocket—the taxpayer's. It would have been far more satisfactory, as far as the government is concerned, in relation to inflation, unemployment and the various problems which have now developed as a result of the DISC program of the United States and its surcharge on our exports there if the government had consulted, on the one hand, the provincial governments about the whole question of tax reform and, on the other hand, had realized that instead of bringing in tax reform, so-called, it is doing nothing but increasing the take as far as the final result is concerned. It should have cut taxes and given incentives to the consuming public.

It is an interesting suggestion that in addition to increasing deficits as far as the budget is concerned, the minister should have looked a little more closely at the increased take that will occur. The combination of increased federal income and higher deficits means that the minister plans to spend $1,224 million more this year than last year. This is more than $100 million per month in 1971 than in 1970. He has undertaken this massive program at a time when inflation so far in 1971 is running at an annual rate of more than 6 per cent and coming up quickly. At this rate, the drop in purchasing power will be more important to the average Canadian than the tax relief the minister holds out in this budget. The amount of money that is taken in by the tax collector, more than $100 million a month, represents a loss in purchasing power of the consumer to that extent. This pushes up inflation and makes it more difficult as far as the cost of living is concerned.

It is very interesting to note that a group of professors from the University of Toronto, speaking through Professor Thomas Wilson, when they testified before the Senate Committee on Finance earlier this year talked about the course the government was taking and said that the best means to accomplish an increase in jobs and control of inflation was to bring about a substantial tax cut. They told the Senate committee that the government's policy of cautious expansion was not enough to push the unemployment breakdown to a more desirable figure, such as the 5.5 per cent which they recommended.

They based their argument on a computer study of the economy. They told the Senators that the federal government should aim to reduce Canada's seasonally adjusted unemployment rate to a minimum of 5.5 per cent as fast as possible. They stressed the removal of the 3 per cent sales tax, which the budget does, but suggested this was not sufficient in itself and there had to be a further stimulant which could only come about through a reduction of corporate or of personal income taxes. They stated that taxes should be cut and that their preference was a cut in federal sales tax. I might add that this tax cut should be made in areas of the economy such as the sales tax on building materials and production machinery.

In addition to cutting taxes, the federal government should curb the growth of money supply to a rate consistent with stable economic growth and low inflation, instead of saying on one day it has to be reduced and interest rates increased, then turning around the next day and putting out a vast increase in the money supply without any real thought of what this sudden injection of money would do to the economy. If this new money supply had gone to the consuming public, the result would have been far different. The injection of extra money into the economy through incentives to industry, such as we have now, really does not relieve the case of the unemployed.

While I am sure there are many Canadians in the low-income bracket who are grateful that the exemption for tax has been raised from $1,000 to $1,500 for a single person and from $2,000 to $2,850 for a married couple, the fact remains that the benefits to be gained in this way do not really help the average wage earner.

Another aspect of the economy about which I am very concerned—I just mention this in closing—involves the area of people who do not earn enough to pay taxes. Many of these are not the unemployed or the people on welfare or unemployment insurance; they are the working poor. Every one of us in this House knows that in our constituencies we have people earning $60, $70, $80, $90 or even $100 a week with take-home pay of something less than $400 or even $300 a month. They are working regularly but cannot maintain a standard of living compatible with that which this country is able to provide, simply because their pay cheques cannot go around. This budget does nothing for the working poor. The Senate Committee on Poverty brought out the fact that there were nearly five million people in this category in Canada, and nothing is being done for them.

In light of the budget with which we are dealing, it seems the amendment to hoist the bill becomes all the more legitimate simply because the budget does not do what it states it is going to do. It really does not do anything to alleviate poverty where it is most crucial at present. Certainly it does not do anything to control inflation, stimulate the economy or bring about the increase in jobs which we so desperately need.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate hon. members who spoke earlier in this debate; I thought they brought out many useful points. After all, we are trying to arrive at a consensus of what is best for the Canadian people.

• (8:50 p.m.)

The drafting of this bill was particularly complex and complicated, far more so than it should have been. This tax reform bill that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) brought to the House last June is a far cry from the regressive, destructive white paper proposals of a year and a half ago. Most people at least had time to get a long breath after hearing the final proposals in June. However, during those 18 months of uncertainty the economy rode under a cloud of fear, suspicion and uncertainty of what might be the ultimate outcome of the finance minister's tax reform. It not only frightened people but discouraged corporate and individual effort. At that time the Minister of Finance stated that it was a fight between ordinary Canadians and big business. Thank goodness some of these measures were changed, for instead of having four million people below the poverty level we would now have ten million.

The Minister of Finance pictured himself as the great reformer, instead of the great destroyer. He stated that he felt this bill was so good that he wanted to display it to all at large to see, to study and to admire. We are mighty fortunate that they did see it. That is one good thing—they had a chance to look at it. The people across this country were stunned when the first proposals for tax reform were brought out. They reacted slowly as the meaning of these various proposals sank in. At first they just could not believe it.

When the people did react, they did so very definitely. Letter by letter poured in, and so many were there and so great was the objection that a special staff of accountants had to be hired to handle them. Special writers on taxation for the newspapers wrote about the destructive influence that would be experienced if the budget proposals were brought into being. Deputation after deputation made their views known. They made known the disaster that would follow if the white paper proposals were ever adopted. The House of Commons Finance Committee pointed out the errors in it; the Senate Finance Committee ditched it almost in its entirety.

Eternal optimist that he is—perhaps it is good to be optimistic sometimes—the Minister of Finance finally did see the hole in the doughnut. Napoleon's retreat from Moscow was nothing compared with the minister's retreat from the white paper on tax reform. On June 18 the minister made his famous retreat. When he was through, you could scarcely recognize the white paper which had been introduced with such fanfare just 18 months previously. It is a victory indeed for the people, it is a defeat for the government by the ordinary taxpayers of Canada, and it must have been a humbling experience for the minister and the government. It was a triumph for democracy.

It does indicate, perhaps, in our present way of thinking and in our careless or monopolistic way of doing things, that perhaps all major legislation should be given a waiting period to test public reaction. Members of the Official Opposition also deserve credit for the fight that was put up, and even some members of the Liberal party who dared voice an opinion.

An hon. Member: Thank you.

Mr. Rynard: I appreciate that. Do not imagine that the bill which the Minister of Finance brought in is a simple one. As a matter of fact, it is a very complex bill and the interpretation of the clauses is difficult and obscure. A high-ranking tax officer told me that it will be months before all ramifications of this bill are understood.

Mr. Mahoney: Don't believe it.

Mr. Rynard: If the hon. gentleman from Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) wants to speak, he can get up and do so. I do not want his interruptions. I will try and answer any question he may have at the end of my speech.

Economists generally wander around in a jungle of words in which they cannot find any sound conclusions. One economist told me that the complexities of this bill frustrate him—and of course to the average tax paying Canadian it is an impossible monster. This situation is totally wrong. There is far too much bureaucracy, unintelligible to the average Canadian who can no longer understand his tax forms. They must be interpreted for him, and in many cases he signs a blank cheque. If he cannot afford an accountant, he is in a bad way and may find himself subject to tax penalties.

The government has made much of raising exemptions and taking some 750,000 taxpayers off the rolls. Taken on the basis of when all this started, back in 1948, it is not even justice to these people. To have kept pace in all fairness, the exemptions should have been higher. For example, the 1961 consumer dollar now purchases only 74 cents worth, and the 1948 consumer dollar purchased only 75 cents worth in 1961. So there we have a devaluation of over 50 per cent. This exemption gives little relief which is long overdue and which will be completely wiped out by inflation within a year or two. The lower and middle-income people will be made worse off than before by a ruthless taxing government.

To dwell on some of the problems which have been poorly handled, consider the taxing of sickness premiums paid by the unemployed under the new tax "reform." The government proposes to tax medicare premiums paid by the employer. This will affect three provinces—British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. In Ontario this will amount to millions of dollars. What are they going to do about this? How do they propose to handle this situation? Will we be in another tax jungle? Apart from this there is another problem, the farm problem. I have here an article written by Mr. Knox in Farm and Country. He wrote:

> The question now to be asked is whether he gives sufficient recognition to the special nature of farming—and whether he gives fair treatment to farmers compared with other tax paying groups.
>
> The small investor collects in the form of investment income. He is to obtain the relief on the new dividend tax credits.
>
> The wage earner collects his economic rewards in the form of earned income. He is to share the same or a lighter income tax load than before—
>
> Of course, various taxpayers will be facing a variety of new taxes on their earnings, their enterprise, their savings and investments. But the farmer is the one who has to put all these economic eggs in one basket—and the one who will have to meet the capital gains tax head on—
>
> When the figures are fully worked out they show the so-called tax advantage to be mostly sleight of hand—and by the time inflation (and tax on inflation) is taken into account, it is not the capital gain but the farmer that Mr. Benson is sawing in half!
>
> The farmer who makes the same economic gain as the wage earner, but makes it partly in income and partly in increases in the capital value of his farm, can be worse off.
>
> This result comes about for two main reasons. First, because the farmer's "hidden" yearly capital accumulation does not obtain the full benefit of annual personal income tax exemptions. Secondly, because inflation gouges a huge bite out of the farmer's deferred capital gain while it only nibbles at the salary earner's income.
>
> During his lifetime, then, the farmer has to get by on a much lower standard of living than the income-rich non-farmer. And at the end, his heirs inherit an illiquid farm estate and a whopping lump sum bill to cover capital gains at death tax (and provincial death taxes).
>
> Some people have suggested that by cutting the tax in half, Mr. Benson's revised capital tax system has saved the farmer's neck.

• (9:00 p.m.)

> On closer analysis it may turn out to be a new form of "capital punishment" which will tighten a noose around it.

There is another point I would like to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker: it concerns the credit unions. Usually a credit union is a small organization set up in a small community. Its main purpose is to serve the people in that community. Some people may have a few dollars to spare and they put them in the credit union. Other people who need a little money, borrow it from the credit union at a modest rate of interest. Now the government, through this new tax reform bill, proposes to hit these small organizations which have played a great part in saving the people of small communities from having to deal with the larger financial institutions at higher interest rates. This is a small community, enterprise, non-profit, with little or no expenses. Its sole purpose is to serve the people in the community. They must be left alone.

Looking back and being honest about it, I think most of us could say in all conscience that over the last three years we have witnessed mismanagement and failure by the government with regard to the economy. At the beginning of this year the Minister of Finance proclaimed that the worst of the unemployment situation was over. But from that time on unemployment rates increased, with the latest released just a few days ago showing an increase in August of .2 per cent, at a time when we should have expected the reverse.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is King Canute in reverse.

Mr. Rynard: Yes; and they cannot blame the American surtax for that result. Food and shelter costs rose 1 per cent in August, which is at an annual rate of 10 per cent. I am afraid we have not reached the worst yet. I am wondering what will happen when countries such as Japan, West Germany and Taiwan from which we import goods revalue their currencies to meet the American surtax. The result will be that we will have to pay more for the goods we import from those countries.

I also wonder about the cost of Canadian manufactured goods, a cost which is going up because of increased labour costs, in turn made necessary by increased taxes, but without any accompanying increase in production. Now we find we have more government interference, such as the new competition act. Taxes have to be increased to meet rising welfare costs and unemployment insurance costs. Indeed, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) conceded the other day at a committee hearing that business was not investing in job-creating industry.

Almost all economists have been crying out over and over again for tax cuts. But the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has refused to listen. Like Ulysses, he has wax in his ears; he cannot hear the danger sirens. He does not have enough money to meet the ever expanding costs of unemployment and welfare. The Prime Minister has been in office for three years. During that time we have seen mounting unemployment, inflation and bad relations with the United States. Canada's relations with the United States have hit a snag. The situation has gradually grown worse, with open hostility shown in speeches to the Americans by cabinet ministers, and even by the Prime Minister, ranging as far as from Denver to Moscow.

This is hardly a good neighbour policy, Mr. Speaker. It is certainly very ineffective in helping to sell our products and in getting due compensation for them, with the give and take that must dominate in the marketplace. It is indeed sorrowful to contemplate, considering that the United States has been our best customer in many ways, taking between 60 per cent and 70 per cent of our exports and owning about 55 per cent of all industry operating in Canada. It is all right to say that we will find markets elsewhere, after admitting that this takes time. How are we going to compete with countries which produce goods of comparable value and workmanship but with a lower labour cost than we have in Canada? This is a serious problem which faces Canadians who must be able to sell their goods in the export markets of the world.

If the government is not going to lower taxes, then it should at least take the sales tax off building materials. There is no reason for it now that the government is subsidizing housing. The sales tax was taken off drugs. Surely adequate shelter is an accepted "must."

Let me deal for a moment with unemployment figures in the province of Ontario. That province had the largest increase in unemployment of any province in July and August. For young people aged 25 and under the unemployment rate for July and August, seasonally adjusted and readjusted, was the highest ever. In July and August 28,000 women dropped out of the labour force. The length of time that people are unemployed is getting longer and longer. In August 106,000 Canadians had been looking for a job for six months or longer.

The whole story of this government is rising unemployment and rising prices. When 500,000 Canadians are out of work for a year, this means a loss, in round figures, to our gross national product of well over $3 billion. What country can afford that disaster? What does unemployment do to the fellow who really wants to work? It destroys him. This year in a large city in Canada I took a taxi when I was visiting the hospital there. The driver seemed to be a nice fellow and he unravelled an amazing story to me. Four years ago he had been working for $35,000 a year and living in a very elite, suburban area. About a year later he lost his job because business was shrinking and his company laid him off. He was one of the younger fellows in the firm.

Then he got a job with another firm and was earning about $25,000 a year. I should mention that he was a university graduate, and engineer. He held this second job until the company was amalgamated with another, and then he was out of work again. Finally, he took a job in a field removed from engineering at a salary of $10,000 a year. In the meantime he had lost his home, having depended on his big salary to keep it. Six months later he was out of the $10,000 a year job. He had a family of two children, and his wife was working too. Talking to that fellow one could note his sense of depression. I felt very sad when I got out of that taxi, so I gave him an extra tip. At first I thought driving a taxi must be a part-time job for him, but that was not the case. There is nothing wrong in being a taxi driver, but this fellow's deportment was that of a man who had received a good education. He simply could not get work of the type to which he was accustomed, and so became a cab driver.

Now we have another example in the city of Toronto where the Toronto Telegram, one of the "big three" newspapers in that city, is being closed down. As a result, over 1,000 people will be looking for jobs and 10,000 more people will be affected. This will affect both the newsboy and the man who sells the papers. Then there are the people who drive transports to deliver the newspapers all over Ontario. The people operating newsstands and many other services are involved. There are maybe 10,000 more people affected. This is a calamity. Whether the unions or management were at fault in not being able to find a common denominator means nothing to the fellow who tomorrow loses his job—and I know a lot of them. A way out must be found. No group must be allowed to hurt others.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Things look very tough and I would say to the government that in their reforms something must be done about getting jobs—perhaps winter works programs. There should be consultation with the provincial premiers in this regard. My own province of Ontario, which is a key province, has experienced the worst unemployment ever. Something should be done to enlarge the scope of the Canada Assistance Act, to remove the 12 per cent sales tax on building materials, and so forth. Perhaps there could be better diplomacy when dealing with our trading partners.

The government should get the chip off its shoulders. Instead of making speeches which only irritate and annoy, the Minister of Finance should have been looking ahead and some months ago had the dollar pegged at a more satisfactory rate for trading. If he had used the velvet glove he might not have found himself in a floating market with competitors who can outsell us on world markets. Now we have to compete with countries taxed at half our rate of taxation.

This is a tremendous problem, Mr. Speaker. It is not easy to find solutions. However, the record of the government stands barefaced for the people to see, and it is one of mismanagement and mishandling of our affairs.

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): I do not propose to take much of the time of the House, Mr. Speaker. At this stage of the debate I hope we can get past the amendment we are dealing with so that Bill C-259 can receive second reading and we can proceed with its clause by clause analysis as soon as possible.

This is a very large and complicated bill. I do not have much sympathy for the lamenting of hon. members on the other side of this House. However, it was ever thus. I suppose we need only look at the existing tax bill and much of the other legislation that we deal with in this House to realize that by necessity some of it is very complicated. Perhaps in order to come up with a bill which could be more readily understood by the public we would have to get rid of some of the experts who draft the legislation, though I do not think that would be too practical in this country. If I had my "druthers", however, I should like to see a change in the whole approach to money. Perhaps we could return to beads as the form of barter! I think my own economic power would be greatly enhanced in this way, Mr. Speaker.

My main purpose in rising tonight to participate in this debate is to join hon. members from both sides of the House in their pleas to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) on behalf of credit unions and co-operatives. There have been some eloquent speeches in this regard and I do not want to go over ground already covered by a number of my colleagues. I think we all know the part that co-operatives have played in the life of Canada and the life of members of our constituencies. I think we all know, too, the part that credit unions have played in the life of Canada. However, I should like to take a few minutes to read excerpts from some of the correspondence that I have received on this subject. In a letter from the B.C. Central Credit Union, signed by Mr. R. A. Monrufet, four points are put forward which indicate some of the concerns that credit unions have been bringing to my attention. These points are as follows:

(1) There is no provision in Bill C-259 permitting a credit union to deduct as a business expense the dividends it pays to a member on the money deposited by a member in credit union shares. The failure to provide for this provision would appear to result from failing to realize that credit union shares are a form of deposit and are not like the shares of a banking institution. The lack of this provision will most seriously affect the provincial central credit unions and the Canadian central credit union, which organizations were created to provide stability to Canadian credit unions.

(2) Credit unions are concerned about the manner in which the provisions of section 125—reduced rate of tax—will be applied to them. Credit unions have suggested that their methods of operation be considered and provided for in this section.

(3) There are serious limitations drafted into Bill C-259 restricting the investments of credit unions. It seems most unusual to provide for taxation to apply to an institution and at the same time by a taxation statute to restrict the manner in which it can operate.

(4) Credit unions feel that the imposition of a capital employed formula on their methods of operation is punitive.

I think this sets the tone of the representations that many hon. members have been receiving from credit unions.

An hon. Member: Do you agree with it or not?

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Here is a letter from the Shuswap Consumers' Co-operative Association, signed by Mr. A. Olson, president. I should like to read a few paragraphs which will indicate some of the concerns the co-operatives have about the tax bill which is before us for consideration. Mr. Olson writes:

Mr. Benson has presented a tax reform bill that I personally feel is duly unjust to co-operatives and credit unions and will eventually create a hardship upon these people oriented organizations.

Your government has seen fit to set up a department of consumer affairs to look after the interest of consumers. We in the co-operative and credit union movement have been doing this for years. Now you have decided that the savings we have been able to create for our members must be taxed before you give it back to the members . . .

We have tried to establish for our members and consumers the cost of retailing consumer needs. We do this as near as possible to cost and provide not only a guideline but do also stabilize the cost of consumer products within a given area.

I am at present a manager of a credit union, and also president of the board of directors of a consumer co-operative. In both of these organizations, there are no directors' fees, no high-cost director expenses; the people who serve or these boards are dedicated people, dedicated to the interests of consumers, interested in seeing that people get the best break in consumer purchases. Now you want to tax this effort.

The next letter is from the Canoe Co-operative Association. The gist of this letter was dealt with in some detail by my colleague the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) in his remarks the other day. I shall read the closing paragraph of the letter to indicate some of their feelings:

• (9:20 p.m.)

On behalf of over 1,000 co-operative members in this area, we urge you to study our proposal and that of the co-operative delegation that visited Mr. Benson. The proposal as put forth by Mr. Benson could well mean the death of many co-operatives, not only in this province but right across Canada. Co-operatives are owned and controlled by the people in any community.

Mr. Speaker, judging by the performance of the Minister of Finance and the way he has listened to the people of Canada on matters concerning the white paper and taxation, I am confident that the plight of co-operatives and credit unions will receive every consideration.

Mr. Benjamin: Is that a caucus secret?

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): That is not a caucus secret; it is just the way I feel.

Mr. Benjamin: I wonder about the hon. member's confidence.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): I have confidence in the minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dinsdale: That is just blind confidence.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): I do not agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) who a short while ago spoke about the white paper. We have been listening to the Canadian people. The government listened to the people after the white paper was introduced. After all this, hon. members on the other side said, "I would not trust that government one bit, because the white paper shows the kind of legislation you will be getting. They are going to shove this white paper down your throat; there is no consultation with the people at all. This is how it is going to be." Now that the government and the Minister of Finance have listened to the people, hon. members opposite are crying that we are backing off and that we are afraid of the white paper's approach. I do not agree with what they say. I am most proud to be a member of the government party, a party that has made this approach. It is a government that has considered and listened to the views of the people of Canada before bringing in legislation, particularly legislation of such a complex and far reaching nature as the bill before us.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member knows that he may only ask a question with the permission of the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo and if the hon. member agrees to answer.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I will meet the hon. member outside.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Chair would like from the hon. member a clear indication whether he will accept a question.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has something to discuss, I will discuss the matter with him later.

Mr. Benjamin: It's just a question, Len.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard).

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest, of course, to my friend the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand). We hear from him so seldom that it is all the more refreshing and interesting when he speaks. May I say to him through you, Mr. Speaker, that when I get letters from a credit union they are usually classified as "friendly reminders". Apropos the provisions of the bill relating to credit unions and co-operatives, those of us who have been members of credit union and co-operative movements, for some years are pleased to see that finally some of our views with regard to the damage that certain provisions of the bill will do to credit unions and co-operatives are getting through to some people in authority. Those of us in this House who have been supporters of the credit union and co-operative movements for many years welcome the support of the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo and others in his party on this particular matter. We hope that support will have some effect.

Mr. Whelan: The credit unions and co-operatives were there long before you.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Simply because I believe in something does not mean that I started it. I did not say that, and the hon. member knows it. In view of the hon. member's interjection the other day about being in favour of the Amchitka nuclear blast, I should have thought he would keep quiet.

An hon. Member: He will not get to the Senate now.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I hope that the representations of the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo and others will have a beneficial effect and that the damaging features of the legislation will be taken out of the bill. The interesting thing is that they should be in there in the first place. One wonders at the ignorance displayed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and officials of his department in permitting such legislation to be drafted. Over the years they have listened to groups such as the Equitable Tax Foundation who wish to destroy the credit union movement. I hope that others who have received representations from the credit union and co-operative movements will be as proud of those representations as the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo is, and that they will stand up in the House and say so. More importantly, I hope that when these particular clauses come up for consideration they will vote against them. That is the key to it. It is not what we say that counts; it is what we do.

When we look at the entire bill I do not think we ought to consider it from the exclusive standpoint of taxes. I do not think that we should consider taxes merely in terms of what taxes are levied, how they are levied, whom they are levied upon and what the income of an individual is likely to be after tax has been paid. We should look at this matter in a larger sense. Perhaps more than any other piece of legislation introduced before this Parliament or, indeed, introduced before the previous Parliament, this bill reflects largely the economic attitudes of the government, that is to say, the economic attitudes of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) the Minister of Finance and, generally, of the whole Liberal party.

The economy will be affected by the imposition of these taxes. I do not say this unkindly, but I submit that in his younger years, and indeed in the last few years also, the Prime Minister spent a great deal of time travelling around the world and that therefore his concept of the world community and his feeling for situations in other nations are such as to make him a bit hazy and foggy when it comes to nationalism. His experiences make him somewhat foggy as to what should be done to preserve the position of Canada among the nations of the world. He does not know what we need to do to maintain our integrity as Canadians in Canada, what we must do in order to develop our own human resources so that we may have pride in ourselves as human beings, and what we must do in terms of legislative sanctions and objectives set by government so that the resources of the nation can be used to the full advantage of the people within the nation.

We must bear in mind that squandering or exploiting these resources without due concern for mankind is a rather narrow attitude to take. This history and the attitudes of the Prime Minister, I submit, show him to be more a continentalist than a nationalist. This makes him think more in terms of what the attitude of foreign owners will be toward Canada, as distinct from the attitude Canadians ought to have with respect to Canada.

Regretfully, other countries have had a growing involvement in the economy of Canada. Although this matter has been talked about at various times in the past, until three or four years ago there really was not strong public concern about it. There really was not a strong public interest in the matter, nor was there an awareness of the damage that could accrue to Canada if the growth of the foreign control of our economy were permitted to continue. In that sort of atmosphere one can reasonably expect a government to have a similar sort of attitude. When the public is not concerned about something, the government will not be concerned, because governments to a large extent operate as a result of reaction to pressures put upon them by people in the country.

• (9:30 p.m.)

There is a developing public awareness and tremendous concern among farmers, workers and small business people all across the nation about the damaging effects accruing to us from foreign domination of our economy. The government of Canada should realize the fact, be concerned about it and exhibit the degree of pride in Canada that is necessary. This is one of our problems. It has been compounded. There is still a partiality on the part of the Minister of Finance, the government and the whole executive structure toward foreign investment, a partiality that other lands can do those things for us which the government feels we cannot do ourselves. It is that partiality that is injurious to us.

When we look at this situation in the context of what we would like to accomplish and what we should try to do, we must assess ourselves. What is the wealth of this nation apart from the people in it and their abilities and skills? What is the wealth of this or any other land? Surely it is not money in the traditional form, which the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo mentioned, or in the form we have today. Wealth cannot be measured in terms of money alone. It is true that if you have a lot of money you are wealthy and can get along well. However, in its basic sense the wealth of a nation is in its resources and what it can do with those resources to transform them into something useful. The greater amount of effort we as individuals put into transforming raw resources into something useful, whether in a mental or muscular way by the use of machinery and technology, the greater amount of wealth we create because we have added the component of work. This increases its value and consequently increases the wealth for us.

There has been a deliberate, conscious move on the part of government, federal and in some cases provincial, to export our raw materials either in a raw or near raw state. This was not by accident. We did not suddenly wake up one night to find this was happening to us. To use the classical phrase, we are the hewers of wood and drawers of water for other nations. This can be justified in an area where we are dealing with renewable resources such as timber where the potential wealth and volume of the resource and its productivity far outstrips our ability to consume. We can justify exporting a renewable resource such as timber in its raw state, as logs or semi-refined, because we are able to again grow trees on that spot for future generations. Some of that resource will still be there. If properly harvested, the resource will not diminish. We will be merely wiping out the evidence of overgrowth that exists.

By exporting non-renewable resources such as minerals we are doing ourselves a tremendous disservice. If we only employ miners to take the ore from underground mines or open pits and then export this ore, we are exporting the resource in its least valuable state. It has the least attachment to monetary value that we can place upon it. If the ore is run through a crusher and concentrator, we employ more men as well as increase its value. If it is run through a smelter, refiner or manufacturing process, the finished product increases in value to its maximum. More men are required, thereby increasing employment possibilities in this country.

When minerals are run through the mill in concentrate form, loaded on a boat and shipped to Japan, for the sake of argument, we are exporting job opportunities for Canadians. The government participates in this. It says it is a good thing. The government does this deliberately and consciously. I say it is a disservice to the Canadian people and our economy. I will use copper as an example. There are approximately 90 producing mines in Canada. Some operate in conjunction with a smelting system, some do not. About 15 or 16 of these producing mines are in the province of British Columbia. Almost all the production in the province of British Columbia is shipped in concentrate form to Japan. There are another 20 or 25 relatively small mines in the rest of Canada that do likewise. That is about 7 per cent of the total.

Approximately 25 per cent of the copper production in Canada is exported in the form of concentrates. We are exporting job potential as well. British Columbia produces approximately 18 or 20 per cent of the copper in Canada. It is run through a mill in that province. The production, reserves and expected life of the known reserves is sufficient to warrant the establishment of a viable smelter without any hesitation or question. The resources are there. A smelting structure, refining process, extrusion plants and a whole range of manufacturing of copper to the finished product of wire, cable or in whatever medium it is required, could be established right now.

Because of the conscious, deliberate policies of the federal government endorsing the idea and issuing export permits for raw material, in conjunction with the deliberate policy of the provincial government of British Columbia, a criminal act has been committed in that province. At one time there was a requirement in the British Columbia mineral processing act that 50 per cent of the production of any mine be directed toward a future smelter. In other words, 50 per cent of the production was to be set aside. stockpiled or kept in reserve for the potential building of a smelter. Each mine was to set aside 50 per cent of its production. However, not too long ago the British Columbia government in its wisdom, and because of the great help it wants to exhibit to Japan, cut that figure to 12½ per cent. It in effect said to British Columbia that it is not interested in building a viable smelter in the copper industry.

An hon. Member: The Liberals agree.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Certainly they agree. Once the mining operations are finished, all that will remain will be a hole in the ground; the non-renewable resource will be gone. As a result of that policy, this nation is filled with holes, stokes and everything else. We must have a policy of what to do with our resources, a policy that will do something that will promote employment.

These remarks are relative to the tax bill. At the present time we have 6 per cent unemployment. I hesitate to guess what the figure will be this winter. I have heard figures, but it is damaging and shocking to guess what they are likely to be. Every day of the week some company is closing down. Workers are being laid off. These companies are going out of business because they are broke. The government feels that this is all right. It refuses to recognize our need to promote jobs in this country.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Look at the tax structure as it relates to mining operations. In 1968, out of 42 companies whose affairs were examined—companies engaged in metal mining operations as distinct from coal mining—it was found that taxes amounting to just over $45 million had been paid on profits of $497 million, a tax rate of little more than 9 per cent. Ask the person working for wages at the lowest possible paid job that exists, the job at the very bottom of the tax scale, how much he pays in personal income tax. It is not 9 per cent. It is 18 per cent or something of that order. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) tells me as an aside that it is 17 per cent. The worker pays that on an income way below poverty level, an income upon which a person could not possibly keep a family. Yet the rich mining industry which has exploited and seduced this nation and successive governments for many years pays tax at a rate of 9 per cent on its profits.

The wage earner is the only person who really pays his full share of taxation—because he has no choice. He goes to get his cheque on a Thursday and the paymaster has already taken out his chunk for the federal government. He has no opportunity to make deductions from it or to retain money for depreciation. It is snatched from him and he pays the whole 17 per cent or 25 per cent or whatever rate is applicable. The mining industry pays 9 per cent.

How did this happen? It happened partly because we allowed a three-year tax-free period in respect of mining operations. After a mill gets into a certain percentage of production, I think it is 80 per cent, a mining company does not pay a single cent of tax during the next three years. Do you know what they do? Anyone halfway familiar with the mining industry knows what happens. The mining companies spend the development period, the period when it should be stripping off the overburden and getting ready for production, stacking up high-grade ore so that when they set into operation they can pump it through quickly and sell it in large volume. Why? Because that is when their profits will be highest and their taxes nil.

One cannot even ask the government to say how the company is doing. The reply is, "We don't know." They are not required to file any returns. Once the companies get through the tax-free period they begin to pour money into maintenance that they skipped in previous years. They pour the money into replacement of machines which wore out during the three-year period, they pour it into other capital ventures and activities of the mining industry, mostly machinery repairs and the like, so they can deduct these amounts in their tax returns. They deduct these sums from their income in the years following the three-year tax-free period.

There are many mining operations which get away with murder—it is not a three-year tax-free period, but a four or five or six-year tax-free period, depending on how long they can stretch it out. There was one mining industry in British Columbia which operated a mine during the war. After the war it closed down. They had just reopened it again. Do you know what the company did? It simply sank a new shaft into the old workings and now it is back with the three-year tax-free period. I forget the figures, but this is why the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans) was able to say the other night that the tax load on the individual wage earner, the farmer and the fisherman had gone up in percentage figures and that the tax load on industry had decreased. With the blessing of the government these companies were able to cheat the average worker and farmer of this country out of millions of dollars.

Mr. Drury: What is happening to that situation?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): It is going to change. On June 18, as reported at page 6899 of Hansard, the Minister of Finance spoke as follows with respect to this tax-free period. First of all, he said it would be withdrawn at the end of 1973: Rake it in while you can, boys, because it will end on that date! Then he said:

> In place of this incentive, assets related to a new mine will be eligible for accelerated depreciation. The cost of these assets may be written off against income from a new mine as quickly as the income will permit.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, we have exactly the same thing as the tax-free period. "As quickly as income will permit" assets will be written off. It is the same program. It will lead to high grading, cheating the average taxpayer out of millions of dollars. It is the same proposal, in other words.

Mr. Speaker, we are in great economic trouble. This tax bill was prepared by the Minister of Finance at a time when he was also very busy miscalculating the economy. He has been persistently inaccurate in his forecasts about the growth of the economy, persistently wrong in his predictions of what was going to happen to the unemployment figures. Last spring everything was going to be great, we were just round the corner. We have gone around seven or eight different corners since then, and unemployment still confronts us.

The very fact that the tax bill was presented to this House by a Minister of Finance who has proved his incompetence in dealing with the financial matters of this nation should prompt us to regard the tax proposals with suspicion. We are entitled to ask a very simple question: Is the government blind to the needs of Canadians, or does it not care about them? Does it really not see what is happening, or doesn't it give a damn? I think it is probably a combination of both; and our continuing economic subservience to foreign capital and to the United States is bound to cause us still greater difficulties. That, of course, has been the traditional characteristic of the Liberal party—not to think for itself; not to think for Canadians, certainly. Its tradition is to think of other lands and nations because, as the saying goes in the Liberal party and in the Prime Minister's lexicon of preferred conversation, "What is good for the United States is good for Canada."

• (9:50 p.m.)

If I could summarize, using the name of the Minister of Finance as an acronym, perhaps we could put the tax bill and the budget, too, for that matter—this tax legislation—in a category of being the result of bungling, the promotion of economic disaster, niggardly in its concept and reflecting a great deal of stupidity, olivaceousness and nihility. Put those together and you have it.

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member may call it ten o'clock only with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): There is no agreement.

Mr. Noble: Mr. Speaker, when this government took office three years ago there was a mood of excitement and curiosity in the country at large. I am sure none of us were immune to that mood. Post-centennial Canada was to witness an apparent turning of ways. The Liberal party had materialized a new leadership, a new style, a whole new government, or so it seemed. There were new phrases in the air, "participatory democracy", "the just society", "co-operative federalism", "the new politics". Well, these were not really new phrases, they had been in currency for some time. The difference was that they were being used as techniques on the political platform and that gave them an aura of newness and mystery. And, of course, we were all curious to see how those phrases would be turned into action. And here we are, three years later, debating an amendment on a bill on tax reform, a bill that grew out of a white paper that had fumbled and failed at participatory democracy; a bill that cannot be described as reform because it does not aspire to a just society, it merely covers up for a few years some of the more glaring injustices that now exist; a bill that is so difficult to read and so secretive in its intentions that it smells of the rankest of the old politics; and a bill that flies in the face of even the least generous concept of co-operative federalism.

Since other members will be addressing themselves to many different aspects of these issues, I will confine my remarks tonight to the problem of federal-provincial relations. I do not mean to imply, of course, that these are separate issues; they all hang together as a cloak of this government's arrogance. But for the sake of emphasis I would like to highlight certain aspects that are of particular importance to the provinces.

With its assault on the nation's economy over the past three years the government has not only aggravated the condition of the provincial economies but has seriously constricted the provinces' ability to solve their problems. Every time the federal government puts its leaden foot on the economy the provinces must pay the cost through increased welfare payments. It is indeed shocking, therefore, that this bill gives so little deference to the provinces and the dire economic straits into which the government has thrown them.

The need to co-ordinate federal tax policy with provincial and municipal taxes is becoming increasingly urgent. The rate of municipal and provincial expenditures combined is growing at a much faster pace than that of the federal government. It is no longer good enough to dismiss flippantly the discrepancy between provincial revenues and expenditures by saying that the provinces can simply raise their own taxes to make up the difference.

In the first place, if this government is truly concerned with a more rational and just system of taxation, it must face the fact that all these taxes are ultimately coming from the same taxpayers. Second, apart from income tax, provincial revenue tends to come from far more regressive sources. Increasing sales and property taxes are extremely hard on those low-income groups the federal government is so piously pretending to help. Third, every time the government amends the federal structure of taxation, provincial revenues are immediately affected. It only makes good sense economically and politically to consult and co-operate with the provinces on the issue of taxation.

Why, then, has this government failed to do so? Perhaps the federal government does not mind having the provincial governments driven to the point of exasperation where they will have to set up their own independent tax systems. It would be a good election issue for the Liberal party which sees itself as the only vehicle of national unity. After allowing balkanization to take place as a result of its own callous neglect, it could argue to the Canadian electorate that it will put these provincial governments in their place. The former Premier of Ontario, John Robarts, has charged that the new legislation on tax reform shows no regard for the position of the provinces and municipalities in the total tax picture. He has called for a fully integrated and co-ordinated package of tax reforms and social security reforms.

Such a program would take time and care to accomplish. And it will take courage, not because the provinces are unwilling to negotiate but because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) will have to reverse his position of stubborn pride in his past accomplishments. We in the opposition hope to give him every opportunity to adopt a more open-minded attitude. As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) pointed out on September 14, the fiasco of the white paper originated in the peculiar stubbornness of the Minister of Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the minister rising on a point of order?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the matter of federal-provincial problems. Since some of us will not be able to be here tomorrow I wonder whether we might have unanimous consent to allow the hon. gentleman to cut the last page off his speech and continue.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order may I point out that we will not be on this subject tomorrow, so the minister can come back in two or three days from now and hear the remainder of this speech.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I should like to point that out even though there might be a speech made from copious notes tonight, none of it matches the speech the parliamentary secretary made the other night. It was the worst garbage that has ever been brought in here.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

Mr. Dinsdale: It was all carefully written out, too.

Mr. Francis: May we continue for a few minutes?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): There does not seem to be agreement.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

• (10:00 p.m.)

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

POLLUTION—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON REMOVAL OF SUNKEN "IRVING WHALE"

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry that we did not have the opportunity of hearing further from my colleague. I know that those who are leaving the chamber disappointed will have to watch those who are coming in just to hear me.

Last Wednesday I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) what progress was being made in an effort to get something done about raising the Irving Whale, the oil tanker which has been lying at the bottom of the Gulf of St. Lawrence for over a year. The minister indicated he would forward me a copy of the letter he had already sent to my colleague the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald). Although I have not yet received a copy of that letter from the minister, I understand from my Island colleague that the said letter contains no information not already conveyed to the House, and that has not been an overwhelming amount.

It is hardly necessary for me to say again that this serious pollution threat is of great concern to all the people of Prince Edward Island. Last March, a long time ago, there were patches of solidified oil along the north shore of Prince Edward Island on our priceless and beautiful beaches. Happily, there were no great spills; but how long can we feel assurance that some substantial leakage may not occur? The situation is one where dependence upon good luck is not sufficient. The threat should and must be removed.

Last winter a member of the Prince Edward Island government, the Hon. Robert Schurman, was giving assurances that the Irving Whale would be removed before May 15 of 1971. This magic date has come and gone, but not the Irving Whale nor its polluting cargo. Then there were suggestions that removal would come in the fall after the close of Prince Edward Island's great tourist season, but last Wednesday the minister spoke of hurricanes in the east coast coming in the fall. Regrettably, some day soon, all too soon, he will be able to stand up and say snow and ice have come, along with other unhelpful gestures of nature.

One of the officials of the Department of Transport is quoted in a September 7 Canadian Press dispatch as saying he doubts whether the removal of the 1.1 million gallons of bunker oil will begin before next spring. If this is the case, we shall have another fall and winter of anxiety. The regional director of the marine section of the department, Mr. Weston, expressed doubt that the work could be carried out during the winter.

Since there are so many adverse weather conditions and so much of the year when circumstances are not propitious, is it not regrettable that the job was not done last spring? I do hope that a firm commitment will be given and that definite plans will be laid to remove this serious threat to our beaches and marine environment at the earliest possible date.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel).]

Little is now to be gained by deploring the opportunities which have been missed, although in dialectic and debate much can be said about this. The main trust should be toward early, effective action to cope with this serious and worrisome pollution threat. I am convinced that in respect of this matter, if no other, I am speaking for all the people of the province of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in replying to the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) has asked me to express his assurance again that this potential pollution threat will be removed and that the removal operation will begin as soon as the circumstances permit.

Over the past months every effort has been made by the ministry of transport to gather all useful information about the vessel, its structure, its position on the ocean bottom, temperature factors and data about the Whale and her cargo which will be imperative in preparation for a successful salvage operation. The situation now is that the Whale or her cargo will be removed at the earliest possible moment. Prospective salvage tenderers who would have the capacity to handle this type of operation have been meeting over the past weeks with ministry of transport officials. A pre-tender meeting has been held and the tenderers have visited the area for an on-site inspection. Tenders are now being sought from these companies and the final decision will be made only after it is absolutely certain that the maximum amount of protection can be provided.

I know the hon. member is aware that the Atlantic region is experiencing unpredictable weather at this time, with hurricane conditions, and this is one reason why even greater emphasis is being placed on timing and the safety factor.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—U.S. CLAIM TO MACHIAS SEAL ISLAND AND COASTGUARD INVASION OF WATERS IN DIXON ENTRANCE—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, earlier today during the question period I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) what position Canada took and what steps we are going to take with respect to Machias Seal Island at the mouth of the Bay of Fundy, and particularly with respect to Dixon Entrance on the Pacific coast.

The comments I want to make tonight relate to the situation at Dixon Entrance because that has been a pretty crucial one and one of harassment for Canadian fishermen for the last few months. To look at the situation in its context, in 1903 a tribunal headed by a sell-out artist from England, called Lord Alverstone, made a ruling with respect to the border between Canada and the U.S. demarcating British Columbia from Alaska. That border, in so far as it stretches out into the sea, did not cause any disagreement in 1903. The disagreement was about the area in the hinterland about which we are not concerned at the moment.

The border between Canada and the U.S. stretches in a westerly direction from an area close to the mainland out to a point, Cape Muzon, at the southern tip of one of the islands which are in fact in the state of Alaska. We all know that one side of a border of that nature belongs to one country and the other side belongs to the other. We have always considered the side south of that border to be Canadian and its side north to be American.

When I inquired of the Secretary of State for External Affairs today what action was being taken with respect to preserving our integrity and our sovereignty in that area, he said we have declared that it is Canadian waters but that the Americans do not agree. They certainly do not agree, and they have not agreed for some period of time this summer and even before that. I saw an American chart some years ago which showed the three-mile territorial sea of the U.S. extending three miles southward from the border itself. In other words, the Americans claimed that not only did their territory go up to the border between our two lands but it also extended three miles into Canada.

This is the attitude that coastguard vessels have in the Alaskan waters right now, because this year they have chased Canadian fishermen using Canadian registered fishing boats and fishing in Canadian waters. They have chased those boats in Canadian waters, undertook one arrest and have attempted other arrests and harassment of Canadians fishing in Canadian waters, which I think would be an act of war if it were to take place between two other countries which did not consider themselves to be as friendly as Canada and the U.S. But in all of this intrusion and invasion—not to the territorial waters of Canada but to the inland waters because they are inside our border—by American coastguards, their harassment and arrest of Canadian fishermen has gone almost unnoticed by the Canadian government.

• (10:10 p.m.)

We send protest notes to somebody in Washington about it, but when it comes to dealing in a really substantial way with the problem there is silence: not one solitary attempt is made to have any compensation paid to the halibut fishermen who have lost gear and who are being chased out of the area by Yankee coastguard vessels. These men have lost fishing time and have also lost their catches which were seized without any recompence to them. The only attempt is a bland note of some sort that we send to the United States saying, "Look here, we protest and we disagree with what you are doing." That is where matters stand now.

The Americans still claim that area as part of their territorial sea, as an extension of the United States into Canadian territory, and we do not do anything about it. Mr. Speaker, we have a navy. It does not seem to be doing anything worth while in other parts where it is operating. I would advocate in a positive way that we should put our navy on manoeuvres along that border to show the U.S. coastguard that we really mean business in determining what is Canadian territory.

Some 15 years or more ago the very small country of Iceland, which is largely dependent on fishing, extended its territorial seas to 12 miles off shore and stood up against the might of Great Britain in enforcing its action. This was an extension out into the high seas of territorial waters, from three miles to 12 miles off shore. Surely we have as much pride in our nation and in ourselves as the Icelanders had in their country. Here we are dealing with Canadian territory and an invasion of U.S. coastguard vessels into Canadian waters. I submit that for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and our government just to make a declaration that these are Canadian waters is simply not good enough.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), in his questions directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) this afternoon and again tonight, has touched upon two problems which have caused great concern to the Canadian government, particularly because of the difficulties being encountered by Canadian fishermen.

In light of recent incidents in Dixon Entrance we have made it clear to the United States that the Canadian government does not accept their authority to interfere with Canadian fishing vessels operating in waters south of the A-B line. That line, of course, was fixed by the 1903 Alaska Boundary Award as the international boundary between Canada and the United States in Dixon Entrance.

Canada has already established an exclusive Canadian fishing zone throughout the whole of Dixon Entrance and does not recognize any extension of the U.S. territorial sea and contiguous fishing zone south of the A-B line. While making Canada's position clear we have indicated our willingness in principle to hold talks with the United States authorities with a view to avoiding further incidents and achieving a satisfactory resolution of the Dixon Entrance problem.

The long-standing Canadian claim to sovereignty over Machias Seal Island is well founded and goes back to the construction of a lighthouse there in 1832. The Canadian government has also made its position clear to the United States in connection with this matter. It is hoped that a resolution of this problem can be achieved without incident and to the satisfaction of the hon. member.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.16 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, September 21, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GLEAVE—POSTPONEMENT OF DEBATE ON AGRICULTURAL STABILIZATION BILL IN LIGHT OF MEETING SOUGHT BY PRAIRIE PROVINCE GOVERNMENTS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege of which I have given notice. My question of privilege arises out of news reports last night and this morning that representatives of the three prairie governments will seek a meeting with the federal government in respect of Bill C-244. In view of this, surely it is unfair to the House to ask members to proceed with Bill C-244 until after such meetings have been held. I therefore address my question of privilege to the government House leader in the hope that he will schedule some other legislation for today.

Mr. Speaker: My understanding is that questions of privilege are normally addressed to the House generally and to the Chair. This one comes before us in a novel way. I am sure the hon. member will agree with me that this is not a question of privilege in the traditional terms; it is rather a submission which he is making at this time to the government by way of a question of privilege. I do not think I should rule further on the matter.

* * *

GRAIN

WITHHOLDING BY GOVERNMENT OF PAYMENTS UNDER TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES ACT—SUGGESTED CONSIDERATION OF MOTION TO ESTABLISH IMPEACHMENT COMMITTEE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to ask Your Honour to consider arguments as to why there should be put before the House a motion for the establishment of an impeachment committee. This motion is couched generally in the terms of motion No. 48 which appeared on the order paper for Monday, September 20. There are some changes in it so I shall read it as it is only a few lines. My right or the right of any member to put such a motion forms the subject of my point of order. The proposed motion reads as follows:

That a special committee of five members having the power of a standing committee under Standing Order 65(8) be appointed to examine and inquire into the continuing refusal by government ministers to bring about the payment as required under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, Chapter 2, 1956 Statutes of Canada, of such sums as are lawfully payable to the Canadian Wheat Board for the benefit of certain Canadian wheat farmers and to draft and recommend the form of articles of impeachment for this misdemeanour.

When I first filed my private members' motion I asked, in the form of a letter to the government House leader (Mr. MacEachen), whether the government, because of the importance of this issue related as it was to the business of the House, would see fit to accelerate the bringing forward of that motion under terms of an agreement which would limit the time for debate but would provide for the question to be put at the end. The House leader refused that request, as of course is his privilege, and this with other reasons accounts for my bringing forward the proposed motion now.

The question then is for me to place before the Chair sufficient facts and precedents to warrant the request I have made that the motion in the terms indicated above be put to the House after receiving due debate. The facts, of course, will be limited to those which I think should be made known to the Chair and will be submitted not to argue the merits of the motion in terms of trying to persuade hon. members to accept it—I hope that will come later—but merely to convince the Chair that this is a motion of substance which needs to be put and, of course, that the precedents and practices of the House warrant the Chair in entertaining the motion and, by putting it, placing it in the custody of the House. What in fact is in issue is the right of myself or of any other member to bring forward a substantive motion of this kind and have it put to the House. The gist of the facts is not really in issue, but I think the Chair is entitled to have at least some knowledge of the facts so it may be understood that there is in fact a prima facie case, in the same way that a person who has been charged must first go through a preliminary hearing to determine whether there is enough evidence to warrant him being committed for trial.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Most of the facts have been well ventilated. There is an act called the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act which places a mandatory burden upon the government and, in particular, upon the Minister of Finance to make certain payments to the Wheat Board, which in turn are used to defray expenses of the board and thus indirectly benefit the farmers who have their net receipts from the Wheat Board as a result of the sale of wheat increased to that extent. The government has admitted, by returns filed in the House which are a matter of record, that moneys are owing for one crop year and for part of another. The act provides that the moneys are to be paid on a monthly basis. Various members of the government have repeated unequivocally that they do not intend to make these payments. I would add in this regard that if the action of the Minister of Finance, who under the act is charged with responsibility, is, as I assume it to be, the collective action of the government and the cabinet, then they are all tainted with the same misdemeanour and this would be in effect a collective agreement to break the law, a form of conspiracy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: The core of the defence is that the government has indicated that there is other legislation which will have the effect of repealing the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act and, this being the case, they have merely ignored the requests which have been made that the funds should be distributed. In short, Mr. Speaker, has democracy come to this, that the government need only signify its intent to legislate for that intent to be accepted as holy writ? I suggest that intent is part of the issue to be considered here. For that reason I find that the offence of the government has been aggravated by facts which have just been brought to my attention recently.

I have before me the final volume of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, it being the volume which contains the indices and which I only read two or three days ago. It has been in our possession for only a few days. The Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, were brought into effect pursuant to a statute of this Parliament in 1965 which placed upon the Minister of Justice, under sections 2 and 4, the responsibility for examining the Revised Statutes of 1952 and placing in the form of the Revised Statutes of 1970 those statutes of 1952 which have not been either repealed or consolidated. I find, on looking at page 57 of this last volume, that chapter 2 of the Statutes of Canada, 1956, which is the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, has set against it in the appropriate column the letters "Om.". On examining the page containing the glossary of terms, the letters "Om." are stated to, mean, "omitted and repealed by revision". This statute, in spite of what the government says, is still alive and well. It has not been repealed. Yet the Minister of Justice and his colleagues and those who were on the committee charged with the responsibility of preparing the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, have taken it upon themselves to repeal the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act while it is still in existence and part of the law of this land.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Baldwin: I think that shows intent better than anything else that could be said. In this issue intent must be part of the facts which I must establish in order to make a prima facie case.

Mr. Stanfield: Impeachment is too good for them.

Mr. Baldwin: The government has seen fit to bring the agricultural stabilization bill back before the House today, unless they yield to the request made by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar a short time ago. I suggest to the House and to Your Honour in particular that, taking into account the facts and the decision you have to make, it does not constitute any real change in the situation to bring back Bill C-244 for discussion. I think this action is merely a tacit admission of guilt on the part of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, as a member of the profession to which I and other members have the honour to belong, Your Honour will know and admit that the law speaks ever, speaks continuously. From the minute of the day when a statute comes into effect the law speaks every month, every day, every hour and every minute. Even as I pause for a few seconds, the government has breached the law of this land because it has failed to carry out the terms of a statute of this country.

The purpose of an impeachment in the modern sense, as I will endeavour to convince Your Honour, is not to punish as in the older types of impeachment cases. It is a means of declaring that certain people holding high offices are not fit to hold those offices. Even if Bill C-244 is brought back for debate there will be every reason to debate the number of amendments which are before the House at reasonable length. But even if that bill should pass, with or without amendments, that still will not purge the contempt that the government has shown because for a period of much more than a year it has failed to obey a law which is in existence. If the bill is passed there will be a detriment to the farmers because they will not receive the benefits under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act which they would have received. Its passage also cannot alter the fact that for a significant period of time members of this government, as I hope to suggest to Your Honour, have been in contempt by their failure to observe the law of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Passage of Bill C-244 will not constitute a retroactive pardon. I might point out in passing the famous case of impeachment of the Earl of March who, a great many years ago, was impeached, found guilty and beheaded. The next year Parliament found it had made a mistake, repealed its act of impeachment and pardoned the Earl of March. Unfortunately this did not place his head back on his shoulders. Passage of Bill C-244 will not constitute a retroactive pardon for these improper actions on the part of the government.

There are a number of volumes dealing with the question of impeachment. The book by Mr. Alex Simpson deals fully with impeachments in the United Kingdom and the United States. It cites a number of instances where impeachment proceedings were taken. To show the resemblance to the present situation, I will cite cases where impeachments were in fact taken and brought into the House of Commons and House of Lords. Lord Treasurer Middlesex was impeached on a number of articles, one of them being that he refused to pay the merchants importing sugar the impost paid on importation, contrary to direction given by His Majesty's letters patent. In other words, refusal to pay moneys lawfully appropriated for a specific purpose constituted a valid ground for impeachment. In the case of Lord Melville, which I will deal with later, it was a valid reason for impeachment that money was paid for certain public services before the act authorizing the payments had in fact been passed.

There are other interesting cases. The only other one to which I will refer is the case of a man called Benyon. This may be of interest to people who are connected with, but not in, the House. It is a valid reason for impeachment to falsely and maliciously give out and utter divers, bold, arrogant, false and scandalous statements in derogation and in contempt of the privileges of Parliament.

Mr. Hees: That's our boys.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Baldwin: The power of this House to proceed by way of impeachment is embodied in the British North America Act, in statutes of this Parliament and in the Standing Orders of the House. The preamble to the British North America Act provided that Canada shall have a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. Section 18, as amended by the Imperial Act of 1875, provided that the privileges, immunities and powers of the Senate and House of Commons are as defined by act of the Parliament of Canada but are not to exceed those of the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom. Section 4(a) of the Senate and House of Commons Act, pursuant to that constitutional provision, states that the privileges, immunities and powers of the Senate and House of Commons are those of the United Kingdom Commons of 1867. Standing Order 1 of this House states that, in all unprovided cases, the usages and customs of the United Kingdom House of Commons apply as applicable.

I have here a very ancient volume, The Rules of the House of Commons as of 1912. The first Standing Order, which is worded somewhat differently, says:

> In all cases not provided for hereinafter or by sessional or other orders, the rules, usages and forms of proceeding of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in force on the first day of July, 1867, shall be followed.

I believe I am correct in saying that this House and this Parliament have done nothing to remove from the members of the House the right to proceed by way of impeachment. It is a right which did exist, which has not been taken away and one which, modified by the circumstances and conditions of today, is a right and a privilege of this House to be exercised when circumstances warrant. The concept behind this power is the right of Parliament to control and punish the use, misuse and abuse of power by persons to whom Parliament has entrusted political or administrative authority. The procedural remedy used to enforce this control is the power to impeach.

Over the centuries the power of impeachment has been refined by statute and in some cases rendered dormant by the provision of alternative remedies. Dormant it may be, but it has not been extinguished. I have here the most recent parliamentary dictionary, Abraham and Hawtley. It contains a definition of impeachment on page 113. I shall not take time to read it. I simply say it is placed before people involved and interested in parliamentary matters, and nowhere does it suggest that this particular right has been extinguished. In fact, illustrations are given of cases in 1816 and 1848 where motions were moved revolving around a question of impeachment.

I draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the fact that as recently as 1959, according to a volume of the memoirs of Harold Macmillan—I think it is in the third volume—a debate took place in the House of Commons in 1959 relating to a request by motion that the House approve the Anglo-Egyptian financial settlement following the Suez Canal crisis and the Leader of the Opposition, Hugh Gaitskell—I think this appears on page 641—made a very interesting speech. It was a good debate and at the close of the proceedings the Leader of the Opposition called for the impeachment of the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Baldwin: I mention this to Your Honour so you will realize that even within so short a period as 12 years ago consideration was given by the United Kingdom House to impeachment as a valid means of punishing those who occupy high places.

In the United Kingdom there have been certain alternatives to the use of impeachment. By their Standing Order 9, which is the equivalent of our Standing Order 26, after debate upon an urgent and pressing matter the Commons could find that there was a prima facie case against a high official of abuse of his power and a select committee would be appointed to inquire into the matter. Because this proved susceptible to political expediency, the United Kingdom passed the Tribunal of Inquiry Act of 1921 which provides that where there is a matter of urgent and pressing importance there can be a resolution of both Houses for the appointment of a committee. We have no equivalent procedure. In any event, it was not a procedure to extinguish the remedy of impeachment but was an alternative or additional power which could be exercised.

In Canada this House has never had that alternative. Standing Order 26 operates in a vacuum. There is debate on the motion to adjourn to discuss an urgent and pressing matter, but there is no provision, under the interpretation that has been given by our Speakers, to conclude with a motion to appoint a select committee to investigate, make findings and recommendations. I think there is no question that that is what is accepted. Under these conditions, I submit to Your Honour that the onus is upon those who would argue the contrary to convince Your Honour and the House that there is not still present in the House, as there ought to be, the right to make a motion to impeach. To those who suggest otherwise, who suggest that the right is no longer valid, I point out that all of the rules, cases and statutes to which I have referred suggest that this is a right imported into Canada and into this House of Commons, and until extinguished by specific act it is a right which in extraordinary cases should and can be exercised.

Why is it that this right has not been used in recent years either here or in the United Kingdom? I think the answer is very simple.

Mr. Stanfield: We have never had a government like this before.

Mr. Baldwin: Yes, as my leader says, we have never had a government like this before, and that is part of the argument I propose to develop.

After the reform act of the United Kingdom and following upon responsible government in this country, for a number of years we had a situation where certain wholesome restraints were capable of being exercised against the executive. I shall have a later opportunity if and when Your Honour grants the motion to argue that this government is the worst offender, but there has been a tremendous and fantastic growth on the part of the executive, perhaps required by the conditions of the society in which we live. Nevertheless, I would suggest to Your Honour that this growth, coupled with our decreasing power and opportunities for exercising that restraint which this House possesses, should make us alert and vigilant to find ingenious ways of controlling a capricious executive. I therefore suggest I am entitled to make this motion and to urge upon Your Honour that this argument regarding the use of the remedy of impeachment is one that should be considered.

I have almost completed what I want to say, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to put my final argument on as high a plane as I can. It is this. I would commence by citing a remark made by Lord Brougham referred to in the book I mentioned on federal impeachments by Alex Simpson. Lord Brougham made this appropriate comment, that the right of impeachment was so large and so capacious that he could place no bounds on it either in space or time. He went on:

The House of Commons might impeach for whatever was indictable but they might also impeach in cases where no indictment could be found... In short, this maxim has been laid down as irrefragable and whatever mischief is done, and no remedy could otherwise be obtained, it is competent for Parliament to impeach.

• (2:30 p.m.)

This is supported in a Canadian publication by Alpheus Todd. In his book, "Practices and Privileges" of the House of Commons, this is stated at the beginning of chapter 18:

The High Court of Parliament is the supreme court of the Kingdom, not only for making, but also for the execution of the laws by the trial of great offenders ... by a method of parliamentary impeachment. This custom of impeachment, says Blackstone, has a peculiar propriety in our constitution. It may happen that a subject entrusted with the administration of public affairs may infringe the rights of the people and be guilty of such crimes as the ordinary magistrates either dare not or cannot punish.

On the next page it is stated:

It is absolutely necessary for the preservation of our liberties and the safety of our constitution that the Commons should possess this extraordinary power of bringing great offenders to justice.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think we can forget that over the course of the last 15 or 20 years, particularly in the last eight or nine years in Canada, there has been this fantastic increase in the powers of the executive, with the result that in the parliamentary structure, through changes in rules and practices, it has become increasingly difficult to deal with an arbitrary and arrogant executive.

If there is any doubt about the right of the executive to be bound by the law, I would refer Your Honour to a judgment of the Supreme Court of British Columbia by Mr. Justice Norris, dealing with the case of Mr. Gaglardi, a minister of the Crown in that province. He said:

It is the duty of members of the executive to obey the law, not to disregard it, and they must ascertain the law in order to obey it. The matters of the practice and policy of the government or any department thereof cannot override the duty of obedience to the law, nor will it avail a minister of the Crown to say that he acted on legal advice when it turns out to be wrong.

This judgment is not necessarily binding on Parliament but I adopt and concur in those words, and I say they are the words which Your Honour should have in mind. I suggest that these conclusions follow: This House possesses and enjoys the power to impeach high officials of government in respect of their conduct in office; the House as a whole has no alternative procedural remedy to the power of impeachment although the government possesses the preliminary aspects of a substitute power in its control of the Inquiries Act; the House, possessing this right and having no alternative remedy, cannot be deprived of the exercise of this right and it is for the House to determine the incidental procedures and orders necessary to its exercise.

Finally, I suggest that it is the crowning glory of the parliamentary system that it has this flexibility, that wherever there is a wrong there must be a remedy, and wherever there is a difficulty there must be some means found by this Parliament to deal with it. I suggest it is a duty falling upon every member of this House and upon the Chair, who is the guardian of the privileges, duties and obligations of the House, to be ingenious to assure our supremacy, and that the writ of this highest court of the land must be made at all times to run above even the views of the Prime Minister or cabinet ministers.

The Prime Minister has said, as have others, that we are entering an era of contest, a contest between the rule of order and reason and the rule of violence in the streets. If those who are sitting in authority above us refuse to obey the rule of order, what hope is there for us to win this battle?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the long statement made by the hon. member on the other side of the House on what he described as the process of impeachment in the Canadian House of Commons. In spite of the long statement and the call to you and to the House to respond, the hon. member has not made clear yet what that process is, what an article of impeachment is and, if an article of impeachment is framed—whatever that is—what you do with it, and if you get it and it is carried what happens to the person who is impeached.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I do not really know from what the hon. gentleman said whether an impeachment is a benefit or an injury to an individual. It is just a word that has obviously appealed to the imagination of the hon. member who ingeniously decided to throw some dust in our eyes at the very time when the House is being asked to pass the agricultural stabilization bill which will provide for the payments complained about by my hon. friend and will in fact provide those payments plus more.

Mr. Baldwin: You are still wrong.

An hon. Member: You missed the main point.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Where is your argument and your credibility?

An hon. Member: What credibility?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am sure I am getting much more reaction from the House than did my hon. friend.

An hon. Member: You deserve it.

Mr. Baldwin: I said something worth listening to.

Mr. MacEachen: I do not know whether that is a good reason for impeaching the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), but in any event, having stated that the hon. member did not really make clear what he means or what he is asking us to do, what the process of impeachment is or when it was used last, let me say that I read the hon. gentleman's private notice of motion and made some very preliminary inquiries about the process of impeachment in Canada. Certainly I could find no instance in modern times in this House when any person was impeached, and the most recent case I could find in the United Kingdom was in 1805.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I discovered it was a process, developed before responsible government, which has long since been abandoned and has not been used in any modern Parliament. As a matter of fact, the only modern case of impeachment I could find took place in the Chateau Laurier when Mr. Dalton Camp impeached the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I am not sure that the hon. member for Peace River is suggesting that as a precedent for use in the House of Commons. I do not seriously regard impeachment as a process that is applicable to our proceedings. If the opposition wishes to complain about the government or wishes to accuse the government, it has two procedures open to it. The first is a motion of censure, as was recently outlined by Your Honour, which can be moved as a substantive motion complaining against an action or lack of action on the part of the government. In due course, probably later this week on Thursday, we will be setting down an allotted day in order that the opposition can bring a motion to accuse the government of action or inaction, or to discipline it for the policy it is following. That is a well known procedure and seems to be the kind of procedure that ought to be followed if the hon. member wants to develop a grievance against the government. The other procedure is to accuse an individual member of the House of wrongdoing. Probably, although the hon. member did not say so, he had in mind that by indirection he would ask the House to agree with him that wrongdoing had been undertaken by a minister or by a group of ministers.

• (2:40 p.m.)

In the Oxford Dictionary definition of impeachment there are these words: "To accuse a person of treason or other high crime before a competent tribunal." If the purpose of the article of impeachment or the process of impeachment is to accuse a minister of wrongdoing, of misconduct or of being a criminal or a lawbreaker, there is another course open to the hon. member. Your Honour has often told the House how that process can be developed and its consequences. You will recall the classic ruling made by Mr. Speaker Michener. When he laid down, it seemed to me to be the procedure which must be followed forever and a day in this House of Commons if any hon. member is to accuse another hon. member or group of hon. members of misconduct.

What greater misconduct is there than treason or high treason as envisaged in the process of impeachment? What greater misconduct can be alleged against a minister than that he is willingly and deliberately breaking a law of the land which he is sworn to uphold? If that is the charge, then the hon. member should put it down in the explicit form of a motion setting forth a bill of particulars. When he has done that, if Mr. Speaker regards it as a prima facie case of privilege it goes to the committee, and if the committee upholds the motion then action will be taken against those convicted or found guilty of wrongdoing. If not, the irresponsible person who has made the accusation is then expected to take the serious consequences.

I would say that if the hon. gentleman wants to accuse the Minister responsible for the Wheat Board or some other minister of wrongdoing or misconduct he must do it directly and must put it directly in a motion and the House will deal with it.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, would the minister accept a question?

Mr. MacEachen: But here he has taken a very roundabout way. He has introduced a procedure which is not known in this House. As I say, there is no way we can deal with a request to impeach an hon. member or accept a motion on the grounds of privilege to send a matter to a committee asking the committee to prepare articles of impeachment. What are the articles of impeachment? For what crime or for what misconduct? Surely, Mr. Speaker, if an hon. member is to be impeached, whatever that means, he ought to know what the charge is and it should be clearly stated in the motion made by a member of the House. Having said that, I do not think the hon. member for Peace River is really serious. He is just having a little byplay before he is confronted with the difficult political question of dealing with the agricultural stabilization bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question? The minister apparently is willing to answer a question. Does he not realize I have charged the members of the government with a misdemeanour in their failure to obey the law?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, we are not now debating the motion placed on the order paper by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), nor are we debating the substance of the misdemeanour which is referred to in this motion. As I understand it, the hon. member for Peace River has risen on a point of order asking that Your Honour direct that there be an early debate on the motion that is on the order paper in his name. I rise to support his contention that there should be such an early debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In other words, I do not think it should have to stay on the order paper until it is reached, which will not occur in this session of Parliament. Rather, I think it should be set down some day for a debate under motions or at some point which is mutually acceptable. One of the reasons I feel we should have this debate is that it is the kind of motion which leads to a vote. The time has come when the House of Commons should be able to take a decision on the matter of whether or not the government has committed a misdemeanour in failing to carry out the provisions of the law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before I get into that I should like to say just a word which I am prompted to say because the President of the Privy Council also looked at the Oxford dictionary. The word "impeach" is not a light word. It means "to call in question, disparage, accuse of, find fault with, accuse of treason or other high crime before a competent tribunal." The word "impeachment" is defined as "calling in question, accusation and prosecution for treason."

I submit that when a motion is placed on the order paper by a responsible member of the House, using the word "impeachment" in relation to the activities of certain members of the cabinet, it should not just lie there. In fact it seems to me the ministers of the cabinet themselves should be insisting on finding an opportunity to have this matter discussed and clarified in one way or another. The motion is that serious and its implications are that extreme. I think that common sense and the ordinary rules which ought to apply to debate should permit an early discussion of this motion.

However, my main reason for contending that we should have a thorough debate of this matter arises from the basic nature of our parliamentary set-up. I refer to the responsibility of the government to Parliament. All the authorities speak of that not just in terms of responsibility to Parliament but, more specifically, responsibility to the House of Commons.

• (2:50 p.m.)

There are a number of citations in Beauchesne. I will not take the time to read them but just refer to them in passing. Citations 2, 67 and 76 point out that the superior power in the state is the House of Commons, that the government's responsibility is to the House of Commons, and that it is the House of Commons that should make the final decisions. One of those citations points out the strange situation that we are in now, that so long as the government can command the support of a majority of the House of Commons it can do anything and get away with it. We had a little bit of discussion on that the other night. But at least, Mr. Speaker, there ought to be an opportunity for the House to have this kind of discussion and to make the decision.

It is not good enough for the government to say that it was elected by the people and that the people will decide at the next election whether it should stay there. That approach strikes at the whole concept of responsible government, strikes at the whole concept of the importance of Parliament, of the importance of the House of Commons.

This issue has been around now for a long time. After all, it is 13 or 14 months since the government quit making the payments required under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act; in other words, it is clearly admitted that for 13 or 14 months the government has been breaking the law. In view of the fact that this is the situation, and in view of the fact that members of the House of Commons are complaining about it, I submit there should be an opportunity to have this kind of debate.

Your Honour might say that we had a debate last Thursday night for six and a half hours on a motion to adjourn under Standing Order 26. That is true. It was a pretty good debate. We did not get much of an answer from the minister, but in any case it was a pretty good debate. But how did it end? It ended with the House adjourning and no decision being taken.

We have had many questions put during the question period. We have had attempts at motions under Standing Order 43. I myself tried a question of privilege on September 13 and offered a motion that would seek to refer the whole matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Your Honour did not find that my case that day qualified under the definition of parliamentary privilege. But in the meantime more days have gone by and the issue becomes more serious and more intense. With respect to the whole concept of the superiority of the House of Commons over the government, I believe this House of Commons should have the chance to say where it stands.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The motion of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) provides that kind of vehicle. I think that if I had been drafting it I might have drafted it differently. But let me say for it that although it carries serious implications, although it says so clearly that even the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) should understand that the law has been broken, nevertheless it does not try to settle the issue finally. The motion merely asks the House of Commons to recognize that the issue is serious enough that a special committee ought to be set up to study it. Therefore I think that the basic argument to be used, in trying to persuade Your Honour to grant such a motion, is that it is a motion of a privileged character.

The whole right of the House of Commons to be superior to the government, the whole right of the House of Commons to be the body to which the government must be responsible is challenged by the actions the government is now taking. And I submit that we should have the chance to make a decision on that point.

The government may tell us that it has a majority in the House, and of course its majority will line up with it and it will be sustained. Well, that is for the members of the government party to answer for when they go to the people. But in the meantime let us keep alive the principle of responsible government, which means the responsibility of the government to Parliament, and particularly to the House of Commons.

The President of the Privy Council says that the hon. member for Peace River is just trying to get in a little dig or two before we debate Bill C-244 this afternoon, if indeed we do get to that bill. I submit, Sir, that even if Bill C-244 were passed this afternoon, even if we cleared all 16 of those report stage amendments, and third reading, and got it over to the Senate, and had Royal Assent tonight—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is not going to happen, but the applause from the other side of the House shows how members on the government side think more of what they want to get than they do of the means to achieve it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They completely forget the role of parliament in legislating.

Mr. Trudeau: But it was your suggestion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was about to say that even if that were to happen and that bill were passed tonight, which will not happen, and even if the cheques started going out in the next day or two, this would not cure the fact that the government has been breaking the law for the past 13 or 14 months.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The government thinks that the farmers might be happy to get their money. I am told they would not be happy to get it with the strings that are in Bill C-244. However we will deal with that when we get to debate that bill. But the point is that even if they get the money and in that sense the issue might seem to die down, this will not have got rid of the issue that for 14 months, more or less, we have had a government of this country refusing to obey a statute of this Parliament, namely, chapter 2 of the Statutes of 1956.

We have had a government defying the law and not even feeling that it has to stand up in this House and give us a reason on the basis of which it has the right to do that. Oh yes, they give us an excuse. They tell us that Bill C-244 is on the order paper, that it has advanced through certain stages, and that there is in that bill a clause which, if enacted, would repeal the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act as of July 31, 1970. But that bill has not passed and to this moment the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act of 1956 is still in effect. I would like to emphasize that point, Mr. Speaker, even if in this portion of my remarks I take exception to one statement made by the hon. member for Peace River.

The hon. member for Peace River read from a volume that goes with the Revised Statutes of Canada, that is entitled "Appendices", and things like that. He referred to a table in that volume, that is put there to enable readers to find out what has happened to all the various statutes. It is a very interesting and useful table; one can discover what has happened to statutes right back to the year one. But I point out to him that that table from which he was quoting does not have any official status. It is in the nature of an index that tells you where to find things. The official entry so far as this matter is concerned is Schedule A which appears at the end of the First Supplement to the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970.

This Schedule A is the schedule that is referred to in the statute of six or seven years ago that set up the commission to revise the statutes. In that statute there was a section which gives the commissioners the power to append to this new roll a Schedule A listing acts that have been repealed in whole or in part and, unless a former act is listed in Schedule A as having been repealed in whole or in part, it still exists. If one goes through Schedule A and turns in particular to page 19 of that schedule, or page 1135 of the volume, one will find listed the Statutes of 1956 that were repealed by the revision. Chapter 2 is not there; it is not in that list. So Chapter 2 of the Statutes of 1956 is still in existence. As a matter of fact, the government does not deny that. In answer to written questions and in one or two other places the government has said that the reason it is not making the payments is that it has a new bill on the order paper. The government does not contend that the statute is not there, that it does not exist.

• (3:00 p.m.)

There was one answer to a question on the order paper which I thought was a bit misleading. The minister in charge of the Wheat Board said that an estimate was included in the estimates for 1971-72 to pay this money but authorization has not been effected because of the bill on the order paper. The reason I say that answer was misleading is that the reference in the blue book of estimates to that money had beside it the note "statutory". If one looks at the bill that was based on those estimates, the appropriation bill that was passed, that item is not there at all. Parliament did not in this fiscal year appropriate any money to make payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act because it was not required to do so. To suggest that the money was voted to be paid this year and the government has not paid the money is misleading because it is the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act of 1956, ongoing and continuing, that requires the government to take this action.

I have gone into this not just to educate my good friend from Peace River about the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, but to emphasize the fact that chapter 2 of the Statutes of 1956 is the law of this land today just as much as any law on the statute books of Canada or any law on the statute books of any of the provinces of Canada. This country lives by the rule of law. We expect people high and low to obey the laws that are passed by the bodies that are given the authority to pass them. For this group across the way who call themselves a government to arrogate to themselves the right to ignore the law is, I submit, an affront to Parliament and a denial of the whole concept of responsible government, and we should have the right, Your Honour, to deal with that matter in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In closing I repeat what I said earlier. The fact that we are going to debate Bill C-244 this afternoon has no bearing on the case. Even if we pass it—and I can inform my hon. friends opposite this is highly unlikely today or tomorrow—even if that happens it does not cure the fact that, in the words of the hon. member for Peace River, there has been a misdemeanour. Of course they can say that they are in power and cannot be stopped. That is responsible government, as some governments practice it. For example, this is what turns up in Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, chapter 1, citation 67(4). Let me read this:

With the support of a majority of members it would be possible for a cabinet to suspend the sitting of Parliament, have the minority members arrested, withdraw the safeguards of liberty such as habeas corpus—

Mr. Jamieson: Aha!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My friends behind me are objecting, Mr. Speaker. They think I am putting ideas in the heads opposite but they are already there.

Mr. Baldwin: They will say it is apprehended insurrection.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

—and freedom of speech, and to establish virtually a dictatorship. All this, too, could be done within the law. It is surprising how few members of the general public appreciate how uncontrolled the cabinet is where it has the support of a loyal majority in Parliament and that "the supremacy of Parliament" in this sense is absolute and subject to no real safeguards of any kind.

I am not yet persuaded that this government is going to go that far, that it is going to put minority members in jail—

Mr. Jamieson: It is just too kind.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —that it is going to suspend habeas corpus, that it is going to establish an outright dictatorship. But, Mr. Speaker, that is the direction in which any government goes which says, "We have the support of the majority, we can do anything". That is what the government is saying by what it is doing, and I believe this Parliament should have a chance to debate this issue.

That is why I believe that Your Honour owes it to Parliament to find a way whereby at an early date we can debate the motion that is on the order paper in the name of my hon. friend from Peace River.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, we have just heard the substantiated and well-prepared statement of the member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) who has finally convinced a greater number of members to support him. We have also heard the answer of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) who has found it lengthy and boring. Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, we often find tedious the criticism of an opponent.

The basic question is as follows: Has there really been a misdemeanour against Parliament committed by a minister or a group of them? The basic question boils down to that and I will not repeat it. We want to know whether some individuals or some ministers have complied with the legislation passed by Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, indeed the parliamentary process is quite simple. The government, enjoying its parliamentary majority, introduces a bill which, through the Chair, is brought for first reading and this House must decide. It is then brought for second reading and again this House must decide. And as long as Parliament has not passed that bill, through majority or with unanimous consent, it has not become a statute.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if that principle holds true in the positive process of passing laws, so it does as far as the negative process is concerned, which means that from the moment when a law is passed, Parliament, the government and all other persons must comply with it.

Mr. Speaker, if Parliament works for many months, in the light of long considerations, discussions, numerous committee hearings, so as to pass a law, thus requiring an expenditure of public monies, and if one, two, three or a group of ministers decide, for political or other reasons, not to comply with the said law, this means that all the work done by Parliament has been to no avail. The authority of Parliament has been flouted and the government has just gone its own way.

• (3:10 p.m.)

That would also mean that there is a sort of parallel power—a phrase for which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has a special fondness—that is that, on the one hand, Parliament talks on uselessly and, on the other hand, the government makes unilateral decisions. That would surely show great arrogance.

As private members and a minority group, we must protest strongly against this way of besmirching Parliament. In our view, there has truly been contempt of Parliament, because some ministers have not abided by an act voted by Parliament.

Secondly, the President of the Privy Council claims—and that constitutes his whole argument—that the impeachment procedure was not well defined, that it was not explained by the member for Peace River and that, consequently, the motion of the ;member is not valid because it is not serious. Why? Merely because the impeachment procedure, according to the President of the Privy Council, is not well defined.

But, Mr. Speaker, is that the question? If Parliament is a supreme institution, it is not a question of deciding what means should be taken but, as the member for Winnipeg-North-Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, in view of the supremacy of Parliament, a question of a debate being held that the House might decide whether there has been misdemeanour or not and, according to the decision rendered, that action might be taken.

Mr. Speaker, Citation 113 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms provides as follows:

A question of privilege ought—

And this is what greatly bothers the Chair every day—

—rarely to come up in Parliament. It should be dealt with by a motion giving the House power to impose a reparation or apply a remedy. There are privileges of the House as well as of members individually.

Mr. Speaker, I fully recognize that the House is wasting a lot of time because of pointless questions of privilege. However in this particular case today, this is not a question of privilege concerning an individual member but the House of Commons as a whole because the matter involves the privileges of hon. members.

Before closing, I would like to recall Citation 107 at page 97 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, and I quote:

Whatever matter arises concerning either House of Parliament, ought to be discussed and adjudged in that House to which it relates, and not elsewhere.

Therefore, it is obvious that our greatest wish is to have an immediate debate in the House on this question so that we may consider the substance of the matter and force the ministers involved to account to Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, the time has come to prove that this Parliament is supreme in our democracy and that this government must yield.

During the last elections, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister told his electors: Give us a majority so that problems may be solved—

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I never said that.

Mr. Fortin: Now, they have their majority but they do not make use of it to serve the public but rather to crush Parliament. That is why we want to protest today by supporting the motion of the hon. member for Peace River.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for their comments aimed at assisting the Chair to make a ruling concerning the motion brought forward by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin).

I should refer at the outset to the point just made by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin). I feel that there might have been some mistake at the basis of his representations to the House and his suggestions to the Chair. He suggests that the motion brought forward by the hon. member for Peace River be considered as a motion on privilege and that, in short, the matter be considered and dealt with by the House as such.

May I remind him that the same suggestion was already made a few days ago and that I was able, on that occasion, to remind the House of the circumstances in which it is possible to initiate a debate on a question of privilege. I made a ruling, and I don't believe I could possibly suggest to the House that the motion before us should be considered as a question of privilege.

[English]

The hon. member for Peace River has given the Chair notice of his intention to rise on a point of order today and he indicated that he would propose a motion that was akin to but different in some respects from the motion which now appears on the order paper standing in his name. I listened with great interest to the submissions which were made for the assistance of the Chair by the hon. member for Peace River, by the President of the Privy Council, by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and, as I said in French a moment ago, by the hon. member for Lotbinière.

I am wondering whether these arguments were helpful in all respects and in every detail for the Chair, because what I have to consider is strictly the procedural aspect. Some of the arguments made to the Chair related perhaps more to the moral issues as to whether there should be a debate on this very important matter and on the duty of the Chair to allow the House the opportunity or to give the House the opportunity to discuss this important matter. With respect, I suggest to hon. members that it is not for the Chair to take this kind of decision. I recognize that the Chair has a responsibility to communicate with representatives of the parties when it is felt that perhaps it would be helpful for all concerned so that members of this House could have a specific debate. I have taken this initiative in certain instances but, again, with respect, it seems to me that this is not what has to be ruled upon at this time. I have noted the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and it will not be overlooked.

This having been said, I return to the strictly procedural aspect of the matter. Hon. members know in what way a motion can be brought before the House for consideration. There is really no purpose to be served by my going again into this question. It is well known to hon. members. It is suggested at this time by the hon. member for Peace River that there is another way, which is not too familiar to me and to some other hon. members, of bringing a matter forward for immediate consideration by the House that is over and beyond the Standing Orders that guide our proceedings and perhaps over and beyond the customs and usages of our own Parliament.

The hon. member is endeavouring to institute what might be described as an historical proceeding to impeach a minister or ministers of the Crown. This is, I gather, common to both motions now before us. The first motion is well known to the Chair because it appears on the order paper. It has been there for a few days and this has given me the advantage of being able to look at precedents and consider the matter, as I have already said in the House. The second motion is new to the Chair, but I have listened to the hon. member explaining it and referring to it and I gather that essentially it is the same as the one on the order paper.

It seems that the hon. gentleman has in the main called as his witnesses a number of early British authors and precedents. Implicit in his submission is the suggestion that the practice outlined by his authorities has been carried into and forms part of our own Canadian parliamentary procedure. The hon. gentleman relies in the main for his support on the provisions of our Standing Order 1 which, in a form a bit different from its present wording, was enacted in 1867. It might not be necessary for me to quote it since the hon. member has already referred to the substance of Standing Order 1, but I will read it in any event in case it might be helpful:

> In all cases not provided for hereafter or by sessional or other orders, the usages and customs of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland as in force at the time shall be followed so far as they may be applicable to this House.

This, perhaps, is where I have some difficulty, because it must be determined whether these usages and customs which were in force in the British Parliament in 1867 and which we have formally imported into our proceedings by virtue of Standing Order 1 are applicable in this particular instance to our own constitutional system and to our own procedures. It may be that a residue of the unusual and unused impeachment proceedings may still lie in the British Parliament, but even there, as hon. members know, such a proceeding was last invoked a long time ago. I believe there is authority for the fact that the last time impeachment was actually used and effected in the British Parliament was in 1805.

Withholding of Grain Payments

• (3:20 p.m.)

Apart from considering the difference in the constitutional characteristics of our Senate and the British House of Lords, and that appears to me to be a matter of some consequence but one which it is not competent for the Chair to explore in detail, but I believe it would be relevant and useful to consider the actual procedure observed in recorded impeachment proceedings in the United Kingdom. The most recent case that might be referred to, as I have said, is the one recorded in the year 1805. The proceedings of impeachment in that year were against Lord Melville. The matter was initiated by the British House of Commons by the drafting of articles of impeachment. The articles were then sent to the House of Lords for the lords to consider the charge, hear evidence, adjudicate thereon and act in their judicial capacity. In this regard, I wish to quote both May's 17th edition and Anson, The Law and Custom of the Constitution, 5th edition. The citation from May's 17th edition is at page 39 and reads as follows:

Acts of Attainder and Impeachments

In passing Acts of attainder and of pains and penalties, the judicature of the entire Parliament is exercised and there is another high parliamentary judicature in which both Houses also have a share. In impeachments, the Commons, as a great representative inquest of the nation, first find the crime, and then, as prosecutors, support their charge before the Lords; while the Lords, exercising at once the functions of a high court of justice and of a jury, try and also adjudicate upon the charge preferred.

At page 37 May reminds us:

The most distinguishing characteristic of the Lords is their judicature, of which they exercise several kinds. They have a judicature in claims of peerage and offices of honour, under references from the Crown, but not otherwise.

Anson, The Law and Custom of the Constitution, 5th edition, 1922, contains the following:

The Commons appoint managers to conduct their case, and the trial proceeds in Westminster Hall. The forms of a criminal trial are followed, the Lords sitting as judges, the Lord High Steward presiding if a peer is on his trial, the Lord Chancellor or Speaker of the House of Lords in the case of a commoner.

Finally, Abraham and Hawtrey, page 107:

The trial of a person, usually a minister of the Crown, before the House of Lords, on an accusation of treason or other crimes and misdemeanours brought by the House of Commons.

The thought which runs through these citations is that while so-called articles of impeachment may be started in the House of Commons, in the British tradition, in the usage and custom to which reference has been made, the actual case is heard and the determination is made in the House of Lords in its judicial capacity. This was the constitutional and procedural position in the United Kingdom in the year 1867. The proceedings were based on the exercise of judicial functions possessed by the House of Lords, a function not discharged in the Canadian Senate. I doubt, therefore, that it can be said the customs and usages of the United Kingdom are applicable to Canada under Standing Order 1. I suggest these are two entirely different situations. While an article of impeachment can be sent from the British House of Commons to the House of Lords to be considered by the upper House in its judicial capacity, this cannot be done in Canada because the Senate in the strict sense of the House of Lords does not have a judicial capacity.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Let me also refer to May's first edition, published in 1844, at page 39:

"The institution had fallen into disuse," says Mr. Hallam, "partly from the loss of that control which the commons had obtained under Richard 2, and the Lancastrian kings, and partly from the preference the Tudor princes had given to bills of attainder or of pains and penalties, when they wished to turn the arm of Parliament against an obnoxious subject."

It should be noted that that comment was published some 23 years prior to the enactment of our Standing Order 1. The case I am now making is that 23 years before the adoption of our Standing Order 1 there was authority to indicate this procedure which we are now seeking to bring into our own procedures had already fallen into disuse in the British House.

In none of the editions of our own authors have I been able to find any support for the proposition that impeachment procedure has been carried over into our Canadian practice. I suggest that, based on recent British authorities, it would be difficult to support such a proposition even in the British Parliament. In view of the fact that the last known precedent in the British House occurred in 1805 and in the absence of any known precedent in 105 years in our parliamentary history, it seems to me that such a motion is not in accordance with our modern parliamentary practice.

As stated earlier in my comments when I referred to May's first edition, other usages, practices and circumstances have arisen which render the ancient impeachment proceedings obsolete and unnecessary.

Having said all this, I will go into the arguments brought forward for the consideration of the Chair by all hon. members who took part in this debate. As I said, in my view some of these arguments were more relative to the substance of the matter and had more reference to moral considerations. Hon. members have suggested that it is the responsibility of the Chair to provide an opportunity for debate on this matter. I suggest that, even if it were so, this could hardly be done under the guise of the impeachment motion proposed by the hon. member for Peace River.

[Translation]

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Eighteenth report of Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, in the two official languages.—Mr. Clermont.

[Editor's Note: For text of above report, see today's Votes and Proceedings.]

* * *

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

ANNOUNCEMENT OF APPOINTMENT OF DR. RAYNAULD AS CHAIRMAN

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be able to announce the appointment of a chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, to succeed Dr. Arthur Smith whose resignation was announced recently. Effective January 1, 1972, the position will be assumed by Dr. André Raynauld of Montreal.

Dr. Raynauld is a distinguished economist, formerly head of the Department of Economics in the University of Montreal, who has served in many capacities in Canada and abroad.

• (3:30 p.m.)

He was a member of the Executive Committee of the Economic Council from 1966 to 1969 and has served on many other boards and commissions.

While Dr. Raynauld will not formally assume his new position until the New Year, it is expected that he will begin working with the Council on a part-time basis immediately following the retirement of Dr. Smith on October 15.

I am tabling Mr. Raynauld's biographical outline and the text of a letter dated today, which I have written to him.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that we welcome the appointment of Dr. André Raynauld as chairman of the Economic Council of Canada. His great proficiency as an economist, his brilliant career, his wide experience and his exceptional qualities made him the logical candidate for the position he is being assigned to. I would like to extend my personal congratulations to him and wish him the very best of luck.

[English]

I should like to make a particular point of emphasizing the distinguished service that Dr. Arthur Smith has rendered this country as chairman of the Economic Council of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: As successor to Dr. Arthur Smith, Dr. Raynauld will not find his task an easy one. Furthermore, our country is certainly going through a period of great economic difficulty. Great efforts will be demanded in terms of analysis and great boldness in terms of approach. But the qualifications of the new chairman are reassuring to us. We know he understands well the economic problems of the country as a whole, as well as those concerning his native province of Quebec in particular. I hope the independence of the Economic Council will be preserved and that the new chairman will not be subjected to sniping from within the government.

[Translation]

We are convinced that under Dr. Raynauld's enlightened chairmanship, the Economic Council of Canada will continue to be an essential and effective organization.

[English]

Mr. David Lewis (York South): My remarks will be very few. I, too, want to congratulate the Prime Minister for having chosen a man si intelligent, si compétent, si brillant que le Dr. Raynauld to fill the post of chairman of the Economic Council of Canada.

All I want to say is that it seems to me the government of Canada has ignored the advice which the Economic Council has given for many years with respect to a full employment policy for this country and with respect to a war against poverty in particular, so it does not appear to me that we ought to be particularly concerned about who the Prime Minister appoints to be chairman of a body which the government then proceeds to ignore. It is hoped that Dr. Raynauld will continue to make recommendations, carry out studies and give advice as the Economic Council has done in the past. From his credentials as an economist, I have no doubt that he may give very good advice but there is no suggestion in the Prime Minister's statement or anywhere else that the advice of the Council will be followed by the government. Dr. Raynauld will, therefore, suffer the frustrations which I know Dr. Arthur Smith has suffered.

I conclude by reminding Members of the House that no less an authority than the deputy finance minister suggested to a Senate Committee that the Economic Council was not sufficiently competent and that it had outlived its usefulness. I do not know for whom Mr. Riesman was speaking if not for his minister. I merely express my congratulations to the Prime Minister on the appointment and my condolences to Dr. Raynauld for the position in which he will find himself.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to congratulate the right hon. Prime Minister on the appointment he has just announced to the House. I am convinced the new chairman of the Economic Council of Canada will render tremendous services to our country and that the Canadian Parliament will benefit, through his administration, from the information required to manage the country and guide it along the path to success which we should normally follow by making it possible for the people to benefit from the great wealth with which Providence has endowed our country.

I should also like to thank the former chairman, Dr. Smith, for his courage in preparing most interesting reports for the government. I will mention among others the fifth report of the Economic Council which was a real eye-opener. We all agreed that it was the report of a courageous man which objectively described the economic conditions in Canada and included at the same time some very realistic suggestions.

I therefore hope that Mr. Raynauld may efficiently fill his term of office; he is an experienced economist and well qualified for the job. I am convinced that he will fully discharge the duties which have been entrusted to him and that under his leadership, we will have the benefit of reports accurately disclosing the result of investigations which the Council will be called upon to make, in order that public funds be used for the good of all Canadians.

[English]

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT OF DIRECTOR OF RESEARCH

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table in both official languages the Annual Report of the Director of Research under the Combines Investigation Act.

* * *

[Translation]

NATIONAL SECURITY

STATEMENT ON ESTABLISHMENT OF SECURITY AND RESEARCH PLANNING GROUP

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, because there have been requests by Members of Parliament for information on the Security Planning and Research Group and because there have been some misunderstandings on this subject, I have decided to make a statement at this time.

The subject of the security of the state is a delicate one where the executive must always balance the rights of the state and the liberty of the individual and it is encouraging to me that there is public concern.

The Royal Commission on Security made it clear in October 1968 that, and I quote:

—Canada remains the target of subversive or potentially subversive activities—

That was paragraph 15 of the report. The report further stated, and I quote:

—the duty of the state to protect . . .its institutions from subversion and its policies from clandestine influence is indisputable—

I have just quoted paragraph 28 of the report.

I have established the new Security Planning and Research Group in the Department of the Solicitor General to advise me on internal security matters. The functions of the group are:

1. to study the nature, origin and causes of subversive and revolutionary action, its objectives and techniques as well as the measures necessary to protect Canadians from internal threats;

2. to compile and analyze information collected on subversive and revolutionary groups and their activities, to estimate the nature and scope of internal threats to Canadians and to plan for measures to counter these threats;

3. to advise me on these matters.

It is absolutely wrong to suggest that this group is "an anti-rebel police force" or a "civilian security force".

• (3:40 p.m.)

The Group has no operational duties; they are advisory in nature. In short, the duties of the Group are to conduct research, analysis and planning. This is a far cry from the beginnings of the establishment of a police state as has been implied by some critics. The concept of a police state is as repugnant to the government as it is to all Canadians.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

It was made clear by the Prime Minister that the government does not intend to establish a separate civilian security service when he said in the House of Commons on June 26, 1969, and I quote:

. . .we have come to the conclusion that current and foreseeable problems in Canada can better be dealt with within the Royal Canadian Mounted Police through appropriate modifications to existing structure, than by attempting to create a wholly new and separate service".

There has been no change to this fundamental policy.

In discharging its duties, the Security Planning and Research Group will work closely with the R.C.M.Police Security Service and with other sources which may be able to provide useful information, such as the Armed Forces, other government departments and agencies, other police forces and other governments in Canada.

It is, I think, beyond question that when Parliament established the Department of the Solicitor General in 1966, it was establishing a department, separate from that of the Attorney General, to deal with police matters, criminal investigations, detentions, paroles, pardons and internal security. The Prime Minister also stated in the House of Commons on June 26, 1969, and I quote:

"Some comments in the report . . .

—of the Royal Commission on Security—

. . . which refer to the R.C.M.Police are now properly directed at aspects of government policy. We intend to keep under review our basic policies and procedures in relation to security as the commissioners have recommended. The establishment of the Department of the Solicitor General in 1966 was a major step in this direction".

A parallel might be drawn between security and criminal investigations. When the police gather material in criminal investigations and court action is to follow, it is the Crown prosecutor who assesses the police evidence and, as the Attorney General's representative, decides whether to prosecute. Likewise, the assessment of the seriousness of a security threat to the state should be made by the civil power in concert with police authorities.

To try to achieve an objective assessment and evaluation of the threat to the security of Canadians, the Security Planning and Research Group will consist of a mixture of the disciplines of sociology, criminology, psychology, law, the military and the police. I am hopeful that a mixture of backgrounds such as this will together be able to advise me, and through me, the Cabinet about the aims and intentions of groups that are genuinely revolutionary and prepared to employ violence in achieving their ends, as distinct from those who would promote social change through accepted democratic procedures. The revolutionary phenomenon now exists in many parts of the world—in Europe, in South America, in Asia, in the United States and here in Canada.

Governments are handling these groups in different ways. The Canadian government believes that dissent is healthy and necessary to our society. Canadian society can absorb dissident groups which are not a threat to the physical safety of Canadians and their democratic way of life.

It is the government's responsibility, however, and my responsibility as minister reporting for internal security, to ensure that Canadians are protected from groups who would use violence to achieve their aims. The government must be enabled to act rather than react to these groups. A step in this direction is the creation of a group in the government structure which will study and report on dissident groups and their intentions as they relate to the safety of Canadians.

I would also like to make the point that the Commissioner and the Director-General of the R.C.M.Police Security Service, who normally report directly to me, also have the right of direct access to the Prime Minister in exceptional circumstances. Another point to be noted is that departments of the government of Canada are themselves responsible for personnel and physical security matters which arise within respective departments.

In short, in view of my responsibilities as Solicitor General for keeping a watching brief on developing threats to Canada's security by virtue of my office and duties relative to the R.C.M. Police, and in view of the increasing amount of information with which I must be familiar—not only on police matters but also on matters pertaining to the Canadian Penitentiary Service and the National Parole Board—there is a need for an adequate advisory staff to assist me. The Security Planning and Research Group will perform this function where matters of internal security are concerned.

In forming this group, I am following a principle which is not inconsistent with what was said in the House of Commons on June 26, 1969 by the hon. Leader of the Opposition when the revised report of the Royal Commission on Security was tabled. Mr. Stanfield said, and I quote:

[English]

I am sure that members of parliament accept the necessity that much of the security operation is conducted outside our purview. What would be cause for grave concern would be any thought that much of the operation is beyond the ken of the ministry or the Prime Minister; that there are not ministers, elective and responsible members of government to whom the entire security operation is an open book, who have continuing access to everything that is going on in that area, and who give proper, responsible, political, civilian direction to the operation on a continuing basis. None of us would want to see a security operation in this country running under its own steam and answerable only to itself—a government, so to speak, within the government. The very decision as to what affects security and what does not, what must be secret and what public, is finally a matter of political decision and judgment. The effective supremacy of the civilian authority must never be compromised in this matter.

Those words are to be found in Hansard for June 26, 1969, at page 10639.

[Translation]

I am confident that the Security Planning and Research Group will perform a most useful function for the government and for all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, we are at long last happy that the minister has broken his and the government's silence in reference to its new security planning and research group. In fact, I think he felt that at long last he could say a few words of his own, and at long last I can say a few words of my own on this subject. The minister said at the outset of the report that he had made this statement at the request of Members of Parliament. May I point out that the expression "request" is indeed a very mild one for we have continually questioned and interrogated for days the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) and other cabinet ministers in an endeavour to pry out of the government information about what the right hon. Prime Minister of this country describes as a headless group.

What is this group? What is its purpose? Why was the report not made when Parliament first reconvened? The minister speaks about balancing the rights of the state with the liberty of the individual, yet the media, especially the press, were endeavouring to search for information and to pry the facts out of the minister in order to determine what the government had up its sleeve in reference to security.

Why was debate denied when the Prime Minister had promised it? Why is there secrecy about the whole thing?

Mr. Nielsen: There still is.

Mr. Woolliams: There still is, yes. We had hoped that the minister would tell us today about the security policy of this country, about the procedures which will be followed to ensure that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the security group act under the guidance of the minister and the cabinet, so that the minister and the cabinet can effectively discharge their responsibilities as the civilian heads of our security force. But there was not a word as to this, only a bald statement full of references about functions, followed by historical and philosophical remarks.

The government has continued to exhibit this curious reluctance to "come clean" until finally the pressure of public opinion, no doubt, forced the Solicitor General to make the statement he made this afternoon. As a result of this curious reluctance we must weigh, analyse and scrutinize the statement with great care, indeed I say with suspicion.

Speaking of suspicion caused by the minister's reluctance to speak, I recommend and urge that this matter, indeed this report and the minister's statement on the whole question of security, be referred to a special committee made up of members of this House and of the other place. Alternatively, if necessary, and if the minister should so decide, it could be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. In view of the fact that security is a very serious matter and that certain facts must be kept confidential, if necessary portions of the hearing could be held in camera, just as security matters during the war were reviewed and discussed by Members of Parliament of this chamber.

The purpose of having a committee to analyse the report and this statement is to find out from the minister the reason that a new liaison group was set up when all the time a liaison group was in existence, as well as the reason that the personnel of that liaison group and of the privy council and external affairs department have been mysteriously banished from their high, sensitive positions to far away places. We find that there have been more changes, new moves and fresh firings and banishments taking place even over the weekend.

Mr. Nielsen: There may even have been impeachments.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, there may have been impeachments.

• (3:50 p.m.)

We want to know from the new personnel who have replaced these former liaison groups what formula they will use and what criteria they will use in passing on information from the RCMP to the cabinet and, above all, to make certain that the liberty of the subject is always protected and is not treated as totally expendable because of the state. As my leader said, who was quoted with approval and affection by the minister today:

> What would be cause for grave concern would be any thought that much of the operation is beyond the ken of the ministry or the Prime Minister; that there are not ministers, elective and responsible members of government to whom the entire security operation is an open book, who have continuing access to everything that is going on in that area, and who give proper responsible, political, civilian direction to the operation on a continuing basis. None of us would want to see a security operation in this country running under its own steam and answerable only to itself—a government, so to speak, within the government.

When you analyse this statement, which was quoted with approval, it provides all the more reason this matter should be carefully considered by the committee. Is the minister's word sufficient to satisfy Parliament in this regard, especially when he has been so reluctant to tell us about this new headless group? Will this new headless group function with a formula and criteria having such high aims and objectives as the minister suggests? We sincerely hope it will, and I think we are entitled to be assured that it will. We do not want, of course, files on individuals and files particularly in reference to security matters to be used other than for the purposes of security.

In answering this statement, let me conclude by referring to page 8, paragraph 22 of the report of the royal commission on security. It reads in part:

> Although the more moderate elements of the Quebec separatist movement have up till now been conducting a largely political campaign, it appears to us that there is in certain quarters a tendency to resort to activities that could well be regarded as seditious. What is more, there is no doubt about communist and Trotskyist interest and involvement in the movement.

That refers to elements of the separatist movement. The report goes on to say that if the activity is merely political, it is all right. The point I make now is that the government was warned much earlier than last fall, actually in 1969, but did nothing about it. This warning was in print, but the government stood idly by and did nothing. I think we must hear more than this statement, lengthy as it was, and full of verbiage, in order that we may be assured that this matter is free from suspicion today.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the minister in his statement quite rightly said that a delicate balance must be sought between the rights of the state and the liberties of the individual. I suggest, therefore, that Parliament must not only be a jealous guardian of the state, but also a zealous protector of the rights of individual citizens. All too often, the first obligation is used as a pretext to disregard the second.

For this reason the members of this House who demanded an explanation of this new security machinery in the Solicitor General's department were entirely justified. The hesitant, dilatory and evasive attitude of the minister in the past led to suspicions which were very properly expressed about the whole project. Now that the minister has at last given an explanation to Parliament I can say, and I think I have been particularly concerned about the subject of civil liberties, I find nothing objectionable in the security planning and research group. Indeed, I welcome the proposal that information about security be channelled through a small group of civilian experts, advisory to the responsible minister.

In my experience such matters as security require, for their proper evaluation, an extensive political knowledge and a sound judgment. These qualities do not, as we have learned in the past, always exist in those who are trained as policemen. I entirely agree that civilian control in such delicate matters is essential. What is required is the ability to distinguish between radical proposals, new and dangerous thoughts which are entirely healthy and, indeed, essential to a dynamic society on the one hand, and activities directly related to violence against the state or against the individual on the other.

I hope the minister will report regularly to the parliamentary Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs on the activities, scope and size of this branch or group so that the committee on behalf of Parliament can ensure that what is starting out as a small, doubtless useful and necessary organization, does not in the course of time blossom out into something large and sinister.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. minister for having sent us in due time the text of his statement in English and French.

Mr. Speaker, my party has long been expecting the statement the Solicitor General has just made.

Referring to groups that are prepared to employ violence in achieving their ends, the Solicitor General said, and I quote:

> The government must be enabled to act rather than to react to these groups—

The Solicitor General has thus aptly defined the policy any responsible government should follow and this, not only in connection with groups determined to overthrow it by force, but also towards the whole population.

The existence of such revolutionary groups, Mr. Speaker, proves that there is a concrete reaction to the present government and its methods of administration. If the government decided, once and for all, to govern this country with some practicality, not only reacting to the evils which befall us or result from its inefficient administration, but also working towards a better future for all Canadians, the statement which we have just heard would never have been made.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, during the war measures debate, members of this party repeatedly expressed deep regret over the failure of the present government, as well as of its predecessors, to act before violence occurred. On November 30, 1970, I rose in this House on the matter of emergency powers and made the following statement, as recorded on page 1610 of Hansard:

> We must not say that they take us by surprise. The government was well aware of the situation, had been for a long time, but nobody was courageous enough to say what was wrong and, above all, to apply the appropriate remedies.

Mr. Speaker, today we deplore the creation of such a body, which is to be called the Security Planning and Research Group.

The terms of reference of that service, if they remain as indicated by the Solicitor General, seem adequate to us, but we insist that that group have no active function whatever within our Canadian police forces. The advisory role of that group must be well defined, and we believe that it will have to remain of a strictly advisory nature.

Since the establishment of that group has become practically indispensable owing to the period of carelessness which has prevailed for too long in our governments in connection with their commitments toward the population, we therefore welcome although we do not like it this step toward police re-organization in Canada. Prevention is better than cure.

However, if that assertion fits perfectly the announcement of the Solicitor General, it applies all the more to the rationale behind the government's decision to establish the Security Planning and Research Group. The Canadian people are getting fed up with unemployment, unfulfilled election promises, trips abroad, etc.

The setting up of that government branch shows pretty well where we are after several years of gloomy administration under this government and previous ones. What a pity! It seems to me that we will not get anywhere as long as we do not realize that any basic reform must be founded on charity and on the individual human being.

* * *

• (4:00 p.m.)

[English]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS BY GENERAL MOTORS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I ask for unanimous consent, under Standing Order 43, to move a motion on a matter of urgent and public concern.

In light of General Motors decision to lay off 2,000 workers from its plants in Oshawa, Ste. Therese, St. Catharines, Windsor and Scarborough, it appears that we are witnessing the beginning of a large-scale export of Canadian jobs to other countries which will affect many centres in this country.

I therefore move:

That this House requires the government to take immediate steps to ensure that Canadian jobs are not sacrificed to provide jobs for workers in other countries.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings. The motion, moved under Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RAISING OF PROPOSED AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST AT UNITED NATIONS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I also beg leave to move a motion under Standing Order 43 in respect of an urgent and pressing necessity, namely the commencement of the General Assembly of the United Nations. The motion I seek to move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) is as follows:

This House is of the opinion that the government took the correct stand in expressing objections to the proposed nuclear device test scheduled to be conducted by the Atomic Energy Commission of the United States of America and therefore urges the government to raise this proposed nuclear device test in the United Nations forthwith in the hopes of developing a world wide concern about the moral issue of the United States of America adding further to the nuclear arms race and contributing to a potential environmental and geographic disaster.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Skeena. This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

* * *

[Translation]

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING JURY SERVICE FOR WOMEN

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth) moved for leave to introduce Bill S-20 titled "An Act to amend the Criminal Code (Jury Service for Women)".

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Speaker, this bill proceeds from the report on the status of women, which advocates equality for Canadian women.

[English]

The sole purpose of this bill is to ensure that, in respect of jury service in criminal cases throughout Canada, women will be in all respects equal to men.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Inquiries of the Ministry

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS BY GENERAL MOTORS—EFFECT ON CANADIAN ECONOMY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the announced lay-off of 2,000 employees by General Motors of Canada in Oshawa, Scarborough, Ste. Therese, St. Catharines and Windsor and the implications thereof for the Canadian economy in an industry which was expected to benefit from the recent United States economic measures.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) has filed the notice required by Standing Order 26. The hon. member proposes that the order of business be set aside for the purpose of discussing a lay-off by General Motors of Canada and, to quote the hon. member's words, the implications thereof for the Canadian economy.

The Standing Order sets out the factors which have to be considered by the Chair in determining whether a specific matter should be debated in priority to the previously announced business. I recognize, as do all hon. members, that the matter raised by the hon. member is one which is important, urgent, and of national interest. The procedural prerequisites in this respect are amply met. The Chair must consider other factors, however, and one of these is opportunity for debate. The House has had before it for a few days the tax bill, and more particularly the amendment which refers in broad terms to economic conditions in the country. Problems such as the one raised by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby have already been the subject of discussion in the course of this debate under the umbrella of the amendment now under consideration. That order of business is still before the House and it should be reasonable to assume that it will be called again. That debate in my view does provide an opportunity for the consideration of the situation on which the motion is based. I regret to conclude that the motion should not be put at this time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS BY GENERAL MOTORS—POSSIBLE TRANSFER OF JOBS TO THE UNITED STATES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in respect of the lay-off to which reference has been made. Can the minister tell the House whether he or the government intends to conduct an inquiry into this matter or whether the minister is really satisfied in his own mind that either General Motors has in fact a legitimate problem of over-production on the one hand or whether, on the other hand, the company is reacting to the program of President Nixon and as a result is transferring jobs to the United States.

[Mr. Gibson.]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I must confirm that these lay-offs will be taking place. For how long, I do not know. The reason given by the company in the communique, I understand, as I have not seen it, is the importance of imports from overseas. This is one aspect of it. I am sure there is also another aspect. It is that General Motors does not produce in Canada the popular compacts and sub-compacts produced by other Canadian manufacturers and imported from overseas. The cars produced now in Canada by General Motors are mostly full-sized Pontiacs and Chevrolets, and these have not been as popular in Canada or the United States as was expected, so the company is going through a period of adjustment now. General Motors has announced these 2,000 lay-offs in Canada but I am informed they have also announced the lay-off of 27,000 people in the United States. Tomorrow I will be seeing some of the top officers of the company and will try to find out as much as possible about Canadian interests in these matters.

• (4:10 p.m.)

LAY-OFFS BY GENERAL MOTORS—PRIOR NOTICE BY COMPANY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I take it from what the minister has said that he had no prior warning of this lay-off, that there was no prior consultation between the company and officers of his own department and that there were no discussions yesterday on this subject between himself and U.S. Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Stans?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we have established very good relations with the manufacturers of automobiles in Canada and, generally speaking, they keep me and my department well informed on these matters. They did give us advance notice of the 535 or 570 lay-offs at St. Thérèse, but I must say—and I regret having to say it—they did not give us any prior notice of these latest announced lay-offs in addition to the ones at St. Thérèse. I find that rather annoying and I hope this is an accident which will not occur again.

LAY-OFFS BY GENERAL MOTORS—GOVERNMENT PLANS TO PREVENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): As a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister whether he has any plan in mind to avoid this lay-off by GM and, if so, whether he can indicate briefly to the House what this might be.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Obviously, Mr. Speaker, this is the sort of subject I intend to take up tomorrow with the officers of the company, but I am rather hesitant to deal with the subject for obvious reasons. It is quite difficult for me to make any suggestion that the company should start building sub-compacts and compacts in Canada because it may very well be that the situation next year will have changed completely. This is the sort of advice that ministers refrain from volunteering.

This is one of the difficulties we have had with the automobile agreement, and I have said so in public. We do not have anything to say about the decisions of the companies on the types of automobiles that they build in Canada. I am sure however that hon. members of this House would view with anxiety the government telling the companies they should build in Canada, at St. Thérèse or at Oshawa, this particular type of automobile, because in such instances we may win once but lose ten times.

LAY-OFFS BY GENERAL MOTORS—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION TO MAKE EARLY ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUCH PLANS MANDATORY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, since the minister has told us that he was not informed of the lay-offs that have recently been announced outside the province of Quebec, and has at last expressed some annoyance with the automotive industry, could he inform the House whether the government intends to take steps making it mandatory for any such future lay-offs to be announced well in advance, in fact, many months in advance, to the government?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the legislation in Quebec and the legislation in Ontario are different on the timing of such notice. Companies in Quebec have to give four months notice when a number of employees, I think it is 300, are to be laid off. In Ontario one month's notice is required and this is what has taken place in the particular case with which we are now dealing. What I was saying, really, was that I would have expected the company to have brought these intentions, I mean with respect to these particular lay-offs that were announced yesterday, to our attention because it had done so with respect to the ones at St. Thérèse.

ST. THÉRÈSE, QUEBEC—POSSIBLE FURTHER GENERAL MOTORS LAY-OFFS—ASSURANCE OF MAINTENANCE OF PRODUCTION IN CANADA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, it is not that I am pleased with that answer, but I do want to ask a related question to which I expect a negative answer. Is the government aware that a production change in the General Motors' plant at St. Thérèse next spring will result in the cancellation of the production of a large number of Pontiac automobiles, involving approximately 2,000 jobs at that plant and, if the government is aware of this, what does it intend to do to ensure that when the production of these automobiles is transferred from that plant in Quebec it will at least be transferred to another plant in Canada and not to a plant in the United States?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, obviously this question demonstrates the complexity of the subject. I will read it again and will tomorrow try to extract as much information as I can from the officers of the company.

* * *

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister advise the House when the government intends to inform the country of its policy on this whole, broad matter of foreign investment in Canada and how it will operate here?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): We hope to be doing that pretty soon, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: As a supplementary question, has the Gray report turned into a grey area of indecision, ineptitude and frustration—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: —as widely reported, meaning that we may never know the government's views on this very important matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

* * *

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—REQUEST FOR AID TO SUBCONTRACTORS—POSSIBLE PRICE REDUCTION TO INCREASE SALES AND EMPLOYMENT

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. What does the government intend to do to help the subcontractors and those who are producing car parts? Also, when he is speaking with the manufacturers tomorrow will he suggest to them that if they would reduce the price of cars made in Canada to the same level as that in the United States they would sell more cars in Canada and employ more people?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered the second part of the question on a number of occasions, but with regard to the first part, the off-market parts are not exempted under the United States surcharge. However, my opinion is that they would be included under Bill C-262, which has just been reported by a committee to the House.

* * *

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS BY GENERAL MOTORS—POSSIBLE PRODUCTION OF SMALL CARS IN CANADA TO MAINTAIN EMPLOYMENT

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister, in view of the large number of industrial specialists attached to his department, and in view of the obvious fact that for a dozen or more years there has been a move on the part of the buying public to purchase the smaller, less costly cars, whether his department has discussed—I am not suggesting has ordered—at any time with the auto makers in Canada the advisability of their locating facilities for producing smaller cars in Canada, something which would have avoided some of these lay-offs?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, when you do not want to give an opinion it is difficult to make the discussion of a problem interesting. I find that a reluctance to express specific views on what automobiles should be built and in what particular plant does not help to enrich a conversation.

Mr. Broadbent: That is not the question.

Mr. Pepin: I think it should be underlined that Canada cannot have it both ways. We have been rather fortunate in the sense that some of the very popular automobiles have been built in Canada. I am referring, for example, to the Maverick, the Pinto and the Dart. We cannot have things all our own way. There is an element of gamble in this matter and sometimes you win, sometimes you lose.

Mr. Orlikow: On a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, the minister has mentioned the fact that Ford and Chrysler have located facilities in Canada for building smaller cars. I am simply asking the minister whether in fact none of the experts in the automobile field located in his department, where they are paid very good salaries, has discussed with General Motors in the last couple of years the advisability of locating that kind of facility in Canada? If they have not done so, why have they not done so?

Mr. Pepin: Well, Mr. Speaker, under the present Canadian philosophy, government officers do not tell companies what to do.

• (4:20 p.m.)

[Translation]

LAY-OFFS BY GENERAL MOTORS—REQUEST TO LIMIT IMPORTATION OF EUROPEAN AND JAPANESE CARS

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member for Richmond like to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Since it would appear that lay-offs in the automotive industry are attributable to massive imports of small European and Japanese cars, could he tell us whether it would not be advisable to consider once again the possibility of restraining these substantial imports?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, Canadians must make a choice when purchasing an automobile. There is now a law on overseas imports which provides for a 15 per cent tariff, and assessment regulations under the Customs Act. I think that Canadians must decide for themselves where are both Canada's and their own interests in these matters. Any steps taken by the Canadian government to restrain imports would normally bring retaliation by other governments.

* * *

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR ACTION BY GOVERNMENT TO STIMULATE EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of this latest blow to employment in Canada, and in particular in view of the additional unemployment that will take place in the plants of subcontractors, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether this brings any nearer a decision by the government to take some action to create additional employment in Canada or, if not, what is required to wake up this government?

• (4:20 p.m.)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. Leader of the Opposition that the question asked in those terms is hardly in order. The hon. member for Spadina on a supplementary.

Mr. Ryan: Not a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I believe there are a few members who wish to ask supplementaries, so I will recognize them first and then proceed to the hon. member for Spadina.

* * *

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS BY GENERAL MOTORS—POSSIBLE INVOLVEMENT OF MANPOWER SERVICES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. May I ask the minister whether his department is involved in the serious matter of the lay-off of 2,000 Canadians and whether he has anything positive which he can report to the House about the involvement of his department?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): In the ordinary course, and more and more in recent months, the department is being informed by companies about lay-offs in advance of announcements. Whenever that is so or whenever we learn of them at a later date, we immediately attempt to utilize our full manpower consultative services, leading usually to agreement to study the situation and attempting to provide the full scope of the department's services including, of course, the very important mobility service.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—REQUEST FOR REDUCTION IN EXCISE TAX TO STIMULATE SALES

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): My question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the example set earlier by the government in reducing the 15 per cent excise tax on electrical appliances and before that on drug prices, is the minister recommending a reduction or abolition of the present 12 per cent sales tax on domestically produced automobiles in order to lower prices and stimulate local sales?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I am sure that the Minister of Finance will be informed of this question, Mr. Speaker.

* * *

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS BY GENERAL MOTORS—INQUIRY AS TO NOTICE OF SITUATION AT OSHAWA PRIOR TO IMPOSITION OF UNITED STATES SURCHARGE

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who has indicated that there was some advance notice given by General Motors of these lay-offs. I should like to ask specifically, was advance notice given to the government on the lay-off at Oshawa and can the minister indicate whether such notice was given before the imposition of the surcharge by the United States because of the tax implications involved?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I think I have already answered that question, Mr. Speaker. There was advance notice to my department of the possible lay-offs at St. Thérèse, but there was none with respect to the added 1300 to whom we referred this morning.

Mr. Danforth: A supplementary. Was this notice given prior to the advent of the Nixon surcharge or after?

Mr. Pepin: The notice about Ste. Thérèse was certainly prior to the surcharge. I would think, Mr. Speaker, wanting to be fair to the company, that the difficulties to which I referred in connection with the full size automobiles is something that has been known by the market and by the companies for a number of months. This is not something new with us.

Mr. Bell: Years.

LAY-OFFS BY GENERAL MOTORS—POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF PLANTS IN CANADA BY FOREIGN MANUFACTURERS

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): A supplementary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In light of the fact that these lay-offs have been attributed in some part to the effect of imported automobiles on the market, has the minister taken steps to encourage Japanese, British, Italian and German manufacturers of automobiles to establish assembly plants in Canada in a like manner to those of certain French and Swedish manufacturers?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): There are already some assembly facilities in Canada owned by a Japanese group, the CMI and there is a full fledged operation of Swedish origin in Canada, the Volvo. These are the realities of the moment. I have personally brought to the attention of one foreign company that there are possibilities in Canada, but you cannot force companies to come and establish plants unless they have an advantage in doing so.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It may be the sense of the House that perhaps the Chair might allow a last supplementary and then return to this subject later. The hon. member for Hamilton West might resume his seat for the moment. If he has a point of order I will hear him, of course. It is my thought that, unless hon. members think we should spend another five or ten minutes on this subject, in fairness to other hon. members who have been trying to ask their questions we might give them the opportunity to do so and return to this important matter. For the moment, I shall recognize the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby on a supplementary.

LAY-OFFS BY GENERAL MOTORS AT ST. THÉRÈSE—ACTION BY GOVERNMENT FOLLOWING NOTICE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The minister has indicated that he has known about the lay-offs at Ste. Thérèse for some time and, to my knowledge, that time amounts to about three months. Can the minister inform the House what the government has done in that three month period concerning the announced lay-offs in the province of Quebec?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): We have known about the possibilities of the lay-offs, Mr. Speaker. If I was not too precise, I apologize. The company was hoping there would be a pick-up in the market which would help them and make these possible lay-offs unnecessary.

* * *

IMMIGRATION

ILLEGAL ENTRY OF RUSSIAN SAILOR—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON STATUS

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I wonder if the minister can bring the House up to date on the case of Mr. Serge Kourdakov. I am particularly interested in finding out the status of this gentleman's request to stay in Canada.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the government is employing the order in council power which is provided under the Immigration Act to overcome the various technical impediments to Mr. Kourdakov's admission to Canada. He is apparently otherwise eligible in accordance with our regulations for landed immigrant status, and I should expect this to be granted him very shortly.

* * *

COMMUNICATIONS

CLOSING OF TORONTO "TELEGRAM"—POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT ACTION TO MAINTAIN OPERATION

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): My question to the Prime Minister is with respect to the possible sale and windups of the Toronto Telegram. Would the Prime Minister consider trying to arrange a meeting with Mr. Bassett and representatives of all parties concerned with a view to arriving at a temporary moratorium in the hope that arrangements could be made to rescue the jobs of the 1200 employees involved and also to continue this paper in the public interest?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): In view of Mr. Bassett's own statement and position, Mr. Speaker, I think I must answer that question in the negative.

Mr. Ryan: A supplementary question. Does the Prime Minister not believe that it is never too late to mend and that this is a very serious situation in Toronto which involves political and social—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Fundy-Royal.

EFFECT OF COMPETITION ACT ON OPERATIONS OF NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): A supplementary question directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. When the Competition Act becomes law will rationalization of newspaper operations be less inhibited than is now the case under the Combines Act?

Mr. Bell: Just the ones in the Maritimes.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the bill is before Parliament. I would not want to speculate on what it turns into because we are asking for public comment on the bill and it may well be amended. Certainly, the whole purpose of the Competition Act as proposed in Bill C-256 is to put forward a far more flexible approach to industrial organization than is possible under the existing Combines Investigation Act.

CLOSING OF TORONTO "TELEGRAM"—POSSIBLE DISCUSSION WITH SENATOR DAVEY

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): A supplementary question. Has the Prime Minister had any discussions with Senator Davey about this Toronto Telegram matter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Senator who?

[Mr. Lang.]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS BY GENERAL MOTORS—POSSIBLE INVOLVEMENT OF MANPOWER SERVICES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): A supplementary for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that 1200 jobs will be involved in the present announcement which the Prime Minister reacts to so lightly today, can the minister say anything specific—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member wants to ask a question, which he has a right to do by way of supplementary, perhaps he might ask the question directly.

Mr. Lundrigan: My question is almost complete. Can the Minister of Manpower and Immigration indicate whether his department is in any way involved in trying to help the 1200 employees who are faced with the possibility of loss of employment.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): We certainly will be, and again it will be important to notice that the range of facilities will include attempting to find other employment for people who may be laid off, and in providing appropriate mobility grants if those are applicable when the men involved are suitable for jobs available elsewhere in Canada.

* * *

• (4:30 p.m.)

HEALTH

PROPOSED BAN ON CIGARETTE ADVERTISING—EFFECT OF ANNOUNCEMENT BY INDUSTRY ON GOVERNMENT LEGISLATION

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to direct my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but in his absence would you permit me to ask one of his colleagues to take note of it. Having in mind the significant announcement made today by the tobacco industry of Canada that at the end of this year it will discontinue all television and radio cigarette advertising, my question is this: will this announcement deter the government from proceeding in due course with its amending legislation to cover all forms of advertising, including printed forms relating to that dangerous product?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton Centre.

* * *

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON THE STATUS OF THOSE RECEIVING PAYMENTS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In light of the fact that university enrolment is down by 75,000 from that expected by the Economic Council of Canada because of student unemployment this summer, and in light of the fact that the government supposedly spent $67 million this summer for student employment, is the Prime Minister going to undertake an inquiry into how many of those jobs went to poor and married students as compared with the number obtained by the sons and daughters of the affluent?

An hon. Member: Answer.

Mr. Paproski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When will a statement be made to show just who got the money?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member knows, and the House knows, that a report is to be made after the assessment of the Opportunities for Youth program has been terminated. I assume that some information of this kind may be available.

Mr. Paproski: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did the government ever have a policy this summer for giving priority assistance to poor and married students, or was the assistance to be just for Grits?

• (4:30 p.m.)

* * *

[Translation]

OIL

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—DISCUSSION WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Could he tell us whether officials of his department are discussing with his American counterpart the setting up of a pipeline in Alberta to develop the Prudhoe Bay oil-fields?

[English]

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there has been discussion for the last year or two in general vein, but there has not been any in the last few weeks.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Brandon-Souris.

Mr. Nielsen: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Brandon-Souris. I will recognize the hon. member for Yukon immediately thereafter.

* * *

AIR CANADA

REQUEST FOR LOWER FARES, OTTAWA TO VANCOUVER

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. As a result of the failure of IATA to reach agreement on overseas air fares and the resulting "hanky-panky" which forced Air Canada to reduce its trans-Atlantic fares to $186, is the government taking action against domestic "hanky-panky" which allows Air Canada to charge $280 for fares from Ottawa to Vancouver?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will allow the minister to reply. However, I think hon. members should take care in placing questions before the House to make sure that, from the procedural aspect, they are in a form which makes it easy for the Chair to allow the questions to be asked and answers given.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, may I say how much I appreciate that ruling. I would not wish to be known as the minister in charge of "hanky-panky".

Mr. Baldwin: That portfolio is already occupied.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Jamieson: Answering the question, I am hoping to have discussions with Air Canada within a few days with regard to the whole question of fares and the like resulting from the IATA disagreement or from the failure to reach agreement. I have nothing new to report at this time other than what I have said in the past.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. With respect to your comments, Sir, may I say that I picked up that phrase from the report of these discussions. I should like to ask the minister if he is aware of expert opinion to the effect that a fare of $180 would be economically feasible for the Ottawa-Vancouver run?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, there are all kinds of experts in these matters. I should like to get the evidence directly.

* * *

OIL

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—CONSULTATION TO SETTLE LAND RIGHTS OF NATIVE PEOPLE

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to ask of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources with respect to the potential pipeline from Prudhoe Bay across the Yukon and down the Mackenzie Valley to Alberta. Since the completion of ecological studies is now in sight, and since the consortiums which are prepared to commence construction of this $2 billion project are on the threshold of beginning, will the minister say whether the government has come to grips with the only remaining problem, namely, immediate consultation with native peoples in order to settle their land rights in the areas involved.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the question of consultation with the native peoples comes under the jurisdiction of my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Nielsen: Where is he?

Mr. Greene: I understand that these consultations have taken place. Certainly, I am confident that the government, having foreseen the problem some two years ahead of time, will be ready to answer effectively any application that is made for the construction of a pipeline in the public interest.

Mr. Nielsen: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In the absence of the minister who is enjoying the outdoors in my riding at this moment—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: What is he doing, hunting?

Mr. Nielsen: —may I direct this question to his parliamentary secretary. Is the government taking immediate steps to consult with the native peoples concerning the settlement of their land claims?

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to draw the question to the attention of the minister.

* * *

AIRPORTS

SUDBURY—REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT ON MUNICIPALLY OWNED FACILITIES

Mr. Gaétan-J. Serré (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has he completed in final form his over-all policy regarding grants for the administration and construction of municipally-owned airports? If so, when can we expect an announcement to this effect so that construction and expansion can proceed where the service is urgently needed? I am especially referring to the situation in Sudbury, Ontario.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I hope to have an answer with regard to Sudbury very, very soon and with regard to the over-all policy shortly thereafter.

HAMILTON—POSSIBILITY OF PLACING FACILITIES UNDER JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL DEPARTMENT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I have a supplementary or related question with respect to Hamilton Airport. Since it has now become what can probably be called an international airport as a result of the service undertaken by Nordair to Pittsburgh, which will mean that the cost of this particular airport will probably be beyond the reach of the city of Hamilton, does the government intend to discuss this matter with the city of Hamilton and its officials with a view to placing Hamilton Airport under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which ought to be considered in the total context of the development of air services for southwestern Ontario. As I have answered in the House on several occasions, I am in a position to discuss this at any time with the government of Ontario. I imagine that they have a few other things on their minds at the moment. I think the provincial government is the appropriate agency with which we should speak in the first instance on this and related matters.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SALARIES OF NON-UNION POSTMASTERS

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. Some months ago, to be specific, last March, in answer to a question concerning the review of salaries of staff postmasters who are not represented by a union, the Postmaster General said that his department was reviewing that at that particular time. Can he say what has taken place or what progress has been made?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I will take this question as notice. I hope to have a report for the House tomorrow.

* * *

GRAIN

POSSIBLE EFFECT OF PRAIRIE PROVINCES REPRESENTATIONS ON GRAIN STABILIZATION BILL

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the publicly announced intention of the three prairie governments to make common representations to the federal government in respect of policy proposals which are included in Bill C-244, the grain stabilization bill, is the government prepared to delay further debate in the House until such time as those consultations have taken place?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we certainly want to proceed with enactment of Bill C-244 as soon as possible. Discussions had been going on with the provincial governments about it for a long period when it was being discussed with producers. The provincial governments made some technical suggestions with regard to the plan, some of which were adopted. The plan, of course, holds open the possibility for those provincial governments desiring to do so, of being able to pay money or undertake extra financing for farmers. We can certainly co-operate in making that possible for them.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Gleave: A further supplementary question. Does this indicate that as far as the minister is concerned, any change or adjustment that the provincial government may wish to recommend is limited to the amount of money they are prepared to put into it?

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker, it does not. We will always very seriously consider any representations they wish to make. Needless to say, if their recommendations involve policies which we consider acceptable we will proceed with whatever appropriate legislative steps may be required.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): A supplementary question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In light of the government's position on the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act because of the proposed stabilization bill presently before the House, has the minister consulted with his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and recommended to him withholding family allowance cheques until such time as FISC is approved by Parliament?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I remind hon. members that we are running short of time. There are about seven minutes remaining before the end of the question period. I am anxious to recognize some hon. members who have been seeking recognition by the Chair since the beginning of the question period. For the moment, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre on a supplementary.

STABILIZATION BILL—POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT AMENDMENTS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): My supplementary is for the minister in charge of the wheat board. In light of representations that have been made to the minister, not only by former provincial governments on the prairies but present governments since the House recessed at the end of June, and in light of further representations by farm organizations, is it the intention of the minister during the current discussion of Bill C-244 to bring in any further changes, additions or deletions to the bill?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): A variety of suggestions for improvements in the stabilization plan made by farm organizations were incorporated in the final version of the bill. Some amendments were made in committee and, of course, the bill will be further considered. Generally, the farm organizations still have the very strong feeling that the financial position of farmers is extremely difficult and requires additional help. As far as I can see, they are not making any substantial suggestions for improving the bill except ones that would simply involve a lot more money.

* * *

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INCREASE IN PASSENGER FARES—CONSULTATION WITH GOVERNMENT

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): My question is for the Minister of Transport. The CNR today announced an increase in passenger fares amounting to between 10 and 15 per cent effective October 1. Did they consult the government about this and does the government feel this large increase is inflationary?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, they have not consulted the government with regard to this increase. The normal procedure is that advice is conveyed to the Minister of Transport. I, personally, have not seen that advice today. I cannot say at the moment whether it has been sent or not.

* * *

TRANSPORT

FREIGHT RATES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH WESTERN PROVINCES

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): My question is for the Minister of Transport. Several times before the House recessed for the summer I asked about the continuing negotiations between the minister and his officials and the premiers and their officials in western Canada regarding the high freight rates now existing in western Canada. Can the minister report to the House what progress, if any, has been made in this regard?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have a little problem keeping up with the premiers, but to the extent I have been able to do so we have moved the discussions eastward, having dealt with Alberta and Saskatchewan. Within the past three months I have received submissions from the province of Manitoba. If my officials are not there now, they will be within a few weeks. The negotiating process is continuing with all three governments. Given the political developments in that area in recent months, a certain measure of review is necessary.

* * *

AIR TRANSPORT

BOMB SCARES—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO MAKE OFFENCE A CRIME RECOGNIZED INTERNATIONALLY

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): I have a question for the Minister of Transport of which I have given him notice. In light of the bomb scare telephone call yesterday by a crank from a foreign country involving Halifax international airport, will the minister ensure that steps are taken to make this kind of mischief a crime that is recognized across international boundaries? I ask this because I am reliably informed that the identity of the one making the calls is known, but action against him is difficult.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I thank the hon. member for notice of this question. I am advised that if the background is correct, the crank in question is in Hawaii. Why he would want to call Halifax from Hawaii, I do not know. I can understand wanting to call Hawaii from Halifax at times. All I can say is that I will look into the matter.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I almost think there is a question of privilege involving the grand atmosphere of Halifax arising out of the minister's response.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Translation]

NATIONAL SECURITY

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF DUTIES OF SECURITY PLANNING AND RESEARCH GROUP

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General for some clarification of his statement of today on the Security Planning and Research Group. On the one hand, the minister tells us that this group will have only advisory duties and I should like him to explain the meaning of the fact that they are to compile information on groups, act on groups, look after groups. Could the minister give us some explanation of those functions of the advisory group? Are its members going to carry out operations?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, there is no question of this group carrying out certain operations, such as conducting inquiries anywhere in Canada or on anyone in Canada. Its duties will be limited to analysis, planning and research.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I again bring to the attention of hon. members that we have just about run out of time. I feel strongly for the 10 or 12 members in the third, fourth and fifth rows who have not yet had a chance to ask questions. We should limit the number of supplementaries.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question. Does the function of this group include the examination of breaches of the law in high places?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

* * *

AGRICULTURE

EFFECT OF UNITED STATES SURTAX—REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): My question is for the Acting Minister of Agriculture, if such a person is present today. The minister was supposed to be here today, as he was yesterday. When will the Minister of Agriculture announce specific programs and policies with regard to food and agricultural products that will be badly affected by the United States surtax?

• (4:50 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, may I say to the hon. member that, following the statements previously made to the House by the Minister of Agriculture, we can assure hon. members that the department is presently considering what action should be taken. Within a few days, the minister should probably be in a position to announce what definite measures will be taken to correct the situation described by the hon. member.

[Mr. McCleave.]

[English]

EFFECT OF UNITED STATES SURTAX—INFORMATION FOR AFFECTED PRODUCERS

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question. Will the parliamentary secretary indicate what information is being conveyed to primary producers whose orders for prospective shipments to the United States this fall have already been affected?

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, no definite information can be given at this moment on any action that the Department of Agriculture and the government could take in order to help primary producers who will be affected, but the hon. member—as well as all hon. members—may rest assured that such action will be satisfactory.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A further supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question period has expired. The hon. member for Kootenay West has been waiting for some time. I do not think he has asked a question and perhaps with the consent of the House he might be permitted to do so. If hon. members agree, the hon. member for Egmont might then ask a further supplementary.

[Later:]

EFFECT OF UNITED STATES SURTAX—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO POTATO PRODUCERS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): A further supplementary to the parliamentary secretary. In view of the fact that markets are presently being lost, can the hon. gentleman inform the House whether officials of the Department of Agriculture are in contact with primary producers, in particular with potato producers, to assist in meeting the difficulties caused by the surtax?

Mr. Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean): I cannot assure the hon. member that officials of the department are in contact personally with potato producers, but I can assure him that those to whom he has referred will be covered by the program to be put forward by the government. Right now, approval of the criteria is being considered and an announcement by the government should come very rapidly.

* * *

POLLUTION

PHOSPHATE CONTENT OF DETERGENTS—EFFECT OF UNITED STATES ACTION ON AGREEMENT REGARDING GREAT LAKES

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. In view of the recent news report that the United States government will not reduce the phosphate content in detergents, how does this recent action fit into the agreement which we have been told was made between the Canadian and United States authorities in meeting pollution problems in the Great Lakes, specifically that dealing with phosphates?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the targets which were agreed upon can still be met by the United states. They will need more treatment facilities. We are taking a two pronged approach, reducing phosphates in detergents and adding treatment facilities.

* * *

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STATUS OF BILL C-187—ANNOUNCEMENT OF ALLOTTED DAY ON THURSDAY

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): A point of order, Mr. Speaker, concerning the business of the House. In view of the announcement which was made by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in Whitehorse last Friday concerning Bill C-187, is it the intention of the government to proceed now with Bill C-187 either in committee or in this House? If it is not the intention to do so, as the minister said in Whitehorse, can a statement now be made accordingly so as to remove the uncertainty affecting mining capital going into the Yukon?

Mr. Speaker: I am not prepared to recognize that that is a point of order. At the same time, I am prepared to allow the minister to reply to the question.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): I should like to clarify the situation and will do so as soon as I have a moment in which to discuss the matter with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

I had intended to ask for the floor myself on a point of order, but merely to confirm what I think has been conveyed informally, namely, that in view of the large number of allotted days facing us in this part of the session I should like to call an allotted day for Thursday, and I so give notice for the benefit of the table officers.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PRAIRIE GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

PROVISION FOR PAYMENTS TO WESTERN CANADA PRODUCERS IN YEARS WHEN RECEIPTS BELOW FIVE-YEAR AVERAGE

The House resumed, from Tuesday, June 22, consideration of Bill C-244, respecting the stabilization of prairie grain sale proceeds and to repeal or amend certain related statutes, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture, and motions Nos. 1 and 2 of Mr. Gleave (page 7252).

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, on June 22 last the Liberal government had the audacity to bring forward for debate Bill C-244, expecting it to pass through the House with all its amendments before the Saskatchewan election took place the following day. The amendments we have introduced, Nos. 1 and 2, are concerned with the costs of production. If the bill had gone through without amendment on June 22, no doubt the minister would have been pleased, but the farmers of western Canada would have known full well that they had been seduced by the government.

The amendments were not accepted at that time and the minister failed to learn a lesson from his experience in the House. He went ahead. He sent out promissory notes to the producers of western Canada telling them what they would be getting and when they could expect it. There can be no question that the amendments we have introduced in connection with costs of production deal with the most important aspect of this legislation with which Parliament should concern itself. It is not a question of trying to brainwash the people of western Canada with stories about what they are to get and when they can expect it.

Back in June, when this bill was last debated, reference was made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) to the cost of farm machinery—a direct cost to producers. In the short time I had the floor, I pointed out to the Minister of Agriculture that he had done nothing for two years about the cost of farm machinery even though Dr. Barber had recommended that an investigation should be carried out under the terms of the Combines Investigation Act. The minister said; "Stick to the facts. That is not true."

I wish to point out to members on the government side, and particularly to the minister, that as long ago as October 14, 1970, questions on this subject were asked during the question period. A late night debate took place on this very question of whether the government was prepared to take action under the combines legislation with regard to the price of farm machinery. We talked to the Minister of Agriculture and to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) on numerous occasions, and the only acknowledgement we received was to the effect that the government was looking into the question and would see what could be done.

One of the questions on this subject was asked as long ago as October 14, 1970. On May 21, 1971, questions were still being asked about it. There were debates late at night about what was to be done so far as the Department of Consumer Affairs was concerned. The only information we received was that the matter was being looked after. All this shows that little is being done in an attempt to reduce cost to the producers of western Canada, yet this is an area of the greatest significance and it is what amendment No. 1 is all about. The minister should cease trying to tell the farmers of western Canada that a stabilization plan based on gross income instead of net income is in order.

The other night a great debate took place in the House on the subject of the stabilization plan as it relates to the situation under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. Members of the House heard how the laws of the land can be broken by taking shortcuts. At that time the minister was criticizing some of my hon. friends. He said the bill had been held up particularly by members of the NDP—not those from Saskatchewan who were busy campaigning but by several from other parts of the country who had remained here to block the bill. Mr. Speaker, at that time, on June 22, two New Democrats from Saskatchewan spoke on this particular bill. Again, this shows the inconsistency of hon. gentlemen opposite. The half-truths we are hearing about this bill appear to be the order of the day.

The credibility gap widens from day to day as the government talks about the equitable distribution of wealth and hon. members opposite talk in terms of gross income without any consideration for the things that really matter, net income and the cost of production. No wonder we object to the passage of the bill before us without amendment or without its being divided into two parts so that there will be ample time for full discussion later.

The government are now recognized as being the hangmen of the Prairies. They are regarded throughout the Prairies as exactly that. From the travelling I have done this summer in Saskatchewan and Alberta there is no doubt that the carrot the government is holding before the Prairie people will not be accepted. They want more than that, and they want it immediately or there will be some changes.

I wonder whether the government is aware that last year, in one small municipality, 61 notices for tax enforcement were published. Do members opposite believe that this reflects a satisfactory situation, that it represents the normal process of operations, or do they realize that the only way in which this situation can be sensibly met is to look at costs of production on a net income basis? If they were to do this I am sure their proposals would receive more consideration in the House of Commons.

We have tried to move the government into showing some concern. We sought to do this last Thursday until 2.30 Friday morning. We thought that the government, and in particular the minister who represents Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang) in this House, would recognize the need for providing ample opportunity for discussion and the so-called dialogue about which we hear so much between Parliament and those engaged in the agricultural process. The whole situation is ironic. A consideration of the various arrangements which have been put before us makes one wonder whether the minister is really concerned about the economic plight in which the western economy finds itself.

• (5:00 p.m.)

The members of this party know that the protection offered farm income in this bill is inadequate unless we use net income as a base and not gross income. This is exactly what the amendments before the House are designed to do, and if they were adopted something could be done about the costs of production.

I suggest to the House that if the minister from Saskatoon-Humboldt would stand in his place and agree to divide the bill, the $100 million could be paid out immediately. The facts of the situation are well known throughout the country. These acreage payments would be paid out and we could then have further discussion of the government's stabilization plan. I am sure no problems would arise and we would be well satisfied that something was being done to assist our agricultural producers. However, we know that probably this will not be the case. I thought that during the question period the minister was going to rise on a question of privilege and say that he was quite prepared to pay out that money, but such was not the case.

[Mr. Skoberg.]

I am reminded of what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said not too long ago during an interview with Peter Thomson and Fraser Kelly, then with the Toronto Telegram. Incidentally, I am sincerely disappointed to hear that the Toronto Telegram has probably sold its subscription list for $10 million but was not concerned about its employees. The Prime Minister said:

> Perhaps, to be quite candid with you, when you talk of growing disenchantment I must begin by saying that some of my reading of the west is that it is always disenchanted.
>
> In the years when wheat is good and selling most of it is disenchanted; if there is too much sun it is disenchanted; if there is too much rain it is disenchanted.

I wonder whether the minister from Saskatoon-Humboldt or the "prairie twins", from the west are not so much concerned with the plight of the western economy as with another matter on which a question was asked by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave), namely, that they thought if the prairie provinces were prepared to make some changes there is no doubt the government would do something about the situation.

Mr. Lang: Might I raise a point of order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. minister is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Lang: May I suggest, with respect to Your Honour, that again the hon. member is showing an inclination to speak generally about the problem, repeating a speech that has been made so many times in this House by himself and other members. The House is dealing with two very specific amendments, and in order to attempt to expedite the business before the House it would be useful if he were to address himself to those amendments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair appreciates that there are two specific amendments before the House, but it does seem to me that the first amendment in particular is rather broad. However, I would associate myself with the minister in saying that perhaps the hon. member could be a little more precise in his remarks.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, I thought I would follow up my remarks on cost of production with the response that we received from the other side of the House to questions about the agricultural economy. I could also use the analogy of last Thursday, when the minister never got around to the subject of whether or not he was breaking the law but instead talked about the stabilization plan.

Mr. Lang: That was a pretty general motion.

Mr. Skoberg: When we talk of increased cost of operation I think we must look at the total picture in Canada. Government spokesmen tell us what is going to be done as far as the prairie economy is concerned, and then we are told that if the provinces themselves are prepared to do more perhaps the federal government will do the same. Although I do not object to this, in the province of Quebec there is an acceleration plan under which the government tries to create additional job opportunities. We on this side of the House are also trying to preserve job opportunities and assist the agricultural economy of the west. Eliminating these opportunities naturally increases rural problems.

This bill has received considerable debate in committee, but very little in the House. Although the minister complains about the debate it has received in the House, I thought the debate in the committee was a good one and had purpose behind it. I suggest the motions we have put forward are reasonable and practical and should be accepted by the government if it is at all concerned about increasing farm incomes above the poverty level. These motions give real consideration to the problem of increased cost of production and I see no reason why they should not be accepted.

We all know that the three agricultural ministers of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba have requested a meeting with the federal minister to discuss the general situation confronting agriculture. We know that a reasonable attempt is being made to try to find a solution. If we are to be reasonable in this House of Commons the least the minister can do is allow this discussion to take place. Surely there could be nothing wrong with adjourning the debate at this point in order to allow this kind of representation to be made, as a result of which we could divide the bill into two parts, pay out this money to the farmers and at the same time give consideration to using as a base net income rather than gross income. If this were done I think everything would be perfectly all right.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert):

That the debate on the report stage motions Nos. 1 and 2, Bill C-244, be now adjourned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Skoberg) which was negatived on the following division:

Division

YEAS

Messrs:

Aiken
Alexander
Baldwin
Beaudoin
Bell
Benjamin
Brewin
Broadbent
Burton
Cadieu
Carter
Code
Comeau
Crouse
Danforth
Dinsdale
Dionne
Downey
Forrestall
Fortin
Gauthier
Gilbert
Gleave
Godin
Gundlock
Hales
Harding
Harkness
Horner
Howard (Skeena)
Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre)
Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand)
Lambert (Bellechasse)
Lambert (Edmonton West)
Latulippe
Lewis
Lundrigan
MacDonald (Egmont)
MacKay
MacLean
Macquarrie
MacRae
McCleave
McIntosh
McKinley
McQuaid
Marshall
Mather
Matte
Mazankowski
Monteith
Muir
Murta
Nesbitt
Nielsen
Noble
Nystrom
Orlikow
Paproski
Peddle
Peters
Ricard
Ritchie
Rose
Rowland
Ryan
Saltsman
Scott
Simpson
Skoberg
Skoreyko
Southam
Stanfield
Tétrault
Thompson (Red Deer)
Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley)
Woolliams—77.

NAYS

Messrs:

Allmand
Anderson
Andras
Badanai
Basford
Béchard
Benson
Blair
Blouin
Borrie
Boulanger
Breau
Buchanan
Clermont
Cobbe
Comtois
Côté (Longueuil)
Crossman
Cullen
Danson
Davis
Deakon
De Bané
Drury
Dubé
Dupras
Duquet
Forest Forget
Francis
Gendron
Gervais
Gibson
Gillespie
Goyer
Greene
Guay (Lévis)
Guilbault
Haidasz
Hogarth
Hopkins
Howard (Okanagan Boundary)
Hymmen
Isabelle
Jerome
Laing (Vancouver South)
Lang (Saskatoon-Humboldt)
Laniel
La Salle
Leblanc (Laurier)
LeBlanc (Rimouski)
Lefebvre
Legault
Lessard (LaSalle)
Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean)
Loiselle
MacEachen
MacGuigan
Mackasey
McNulty
Mahoney
Marceau
Marchand (Langelier)
Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo)
Morison
Noël
O'Connell
Osler
Otto
Pelletier
Penner
Pepin
Portelance
Pringle
Prud'homme
Reid
Richardson
Roberts
Robinson
Rochon

Messrs:

Rock
Roy (Laval)
Serré
Smerchanski
Smith (Northumberland-Miramichi)
Smith (Saint-Jean)
Stanbury
Stewart (Cochrane)
St. Pierre
Sullivan
Thomas (Maisonneuve-Rosemont)
Tolmie
Trudeau
Trudel
Turner (London East)
Turner (Ottawa-Carleton)
Wahn
Weatherhead
Whicher
Whiting
Yanakis—101.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter)—Fisheries—Effect of operations of foreign nationals—Action to achieve conservation; the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz)—Air Transport—impending price war among trans-Atlantic carriers—Government approval of participation of Air Canada and CPA in price fixing meeting; the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg)—St. Lawrence Seaway—Decision on possible increase in tolls—Request for reference of Carr report to committee.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PRAIRIE GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

PROVISION FOR PAYMENTS TO WESTERN CANADIAN PRODUCERS IN YEARS WHEN RECEIPTS BELOW FIVE-YEAR AVERAGE

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-244, respecting the stabilization of prairie grain sale proceeds and to repeal or amend certain related statutes, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture, and motions Nos. 1 and 2 of Mr. Gleave (page 7252).

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersely): Mr. Speaker, one of the amendments presently before us deals with the net income feature of farming in western Canada. I ask the House, why shouldn't we have a net income feature covering the cost of living so far as the farmers are concerned? There is nothing in this legislation concerning the net income position of farmers, and that is something which disturbs me greatly.

The price of everything a farmer purchases is increasing. The price of machinery has been going up. We appointed a royal commission to study the price of farm machinery and received an excellent report from it, the Barber report, about which the government apparently is going to do nothing. The price of farm machinery is an important item in farm costs, particularly on the Prairies. It is only reasonable that something should be done about these costs if we are going to consider the net income feature of farming in western Canada.

The costs of government have increased. The salaries of teachers, university professors and of Members of Parliament have been increased. Why shouldn't the farmer's income increase also? Instead, the exact opposite is happening; the net income of farmers has gone down. To me it does not seem reasonable that we should pass legislation averaging income without taking action in this particular area. Wheat is now being sold to millers more cheaply than it has been in past years, although production costs have continued to increase. It does not make economic sense to have a basic food ingredient selling at a lower price to the producer when the income of everybody else has increased.

Further, I suggest that flour for bread constitutes a small percentage of the consumer's dollar, although the cost of practically everything else has increased. Just last Saturday I bought two loaves of a particular type of bread at the National Bakery on Bank Street in Ottawa and found that the price had gone up by one cent a loaf. What is the reason for that? It is not because the price of the basic ingredient, wheat, has gone up. The minister should consider such matters when drafting a bill of this sort.

I think that the minister who represents the riding of Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang) made a basic assumption that the income received by prairie farmers is adequate but he has not made any serious attempt to prove that the gross income of farmers is adequate. If his assumption is based on the experience of the past five years I ask, what relationship will that have to the next five years, the way inflation has been going and with the rise in cost of all the items a farmer has to buy? It does not seem reasonable to me to expect farmers to manage in these circumstances when no other group in our economy can. If it had not been for their increased efficiency, most farmers would now be bankrupt. Some means must be found to close this gap in the cost of production that farmers have to face.

• (5:40 p.m.)

I would criticize the bill before the House and speak in favour of the amendment on two grounds. Since costs have risen and the government has done nothing about it, and since farm income has gone down and the government has done nothing or very little about that, there obviously has to be a third alternative to meet this problem. A logical method would be to evolve some means of tying the costs of production to an item sold in Canada. I have previously suggested to the minister that a good way to start would be with a two-price system for wheat. Anything consumed in Canada should be related to costs in Canada. The minister has been a member of the government for three years, but so far has done nothing about this problem. I suggest to the minister that any plan or income program that he is going to adopt in regard to prairie farmers should include this basic item.

If we sell food in Canada which is grown in Canada, it should have some relation to the cost of producing it in Canada. This is particularly so when we consider that many of the items purchased by farmers are based on Canadian costs. On my farm I have a 1600 International truck which was made in eastern Canada. The cost of that truck is a Canadian cost, not a Japanese or British cost. The price that the people working in the truck factory in Hamilton pay for bread, wheat or the basic ingredients of their food should bear some relation to the wages they get for the labour put into the truck—in effect, a net income figure related to other net incomes in Canada. The minister in charge of the Wheat Board has not argued that this is not a fair proposition. I suggest to him that it is a reasonable assumption that there should be a net income position for prairie farmers which would bear some relation to costs, especially Canadian costs.

The two-price system has been advocated by farm groups for a long time. The minister suggested that he has consulted farm groups about this plan and others that he has presented to Parliament. This is a system that all farm groups have suggested, and he has chosen to ignore it. It has some relation to costs and income in Canada. Of course, it would not solve all the problems of prairie grain producers but it does have some relevance to their situation. Just a few days ago the net income position of occupational groups in Canada was published. It included doctors, lawyers, automobile workers, surveyors, architects and others. It showed that some cities in Canada have a very high net income position. But was any city in Saskatchewan listed? Was the farmer listed, or the beef producer?

If the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt wants to draft a plan that will do some good for the prairie economy, I suggest he should consider a two-price system for wheat. The government of Manitoba believes that this would be an important feature of any stabilization program in connection with the income of farmers, and I do not recall that the minister denied this. Indeed, he did not make any serious effort to prove that farmers were receiving an adequate income.

All the farm groups that I have talked with or that appeared before the committee are opposed to the stabilization program. The farmer's increased cost of production must be taken into consideration and the minister should look closely at some of the suggestions made by the prairie governments. The minister has not proved that the farmer is making too much or too little money. He should at least prove his case if he is going to average farm income.

It must be remembered that the government's proposal will cost the farmer 2 per cent of his gross income in grain up to $300, and that he has no option in respect of the plan. If he is already in the red, he will have to go in deeper. The minister may point out that the farmer will get money back if crops are poor enough, but one of the reasons farmers are opposed to this plan is that their experience in the past with this type of base support has been rather negative. Take, for example, the 80 per cent floor price for hogs. In my part of the country last year hogs were 19 cents a pound, or less, for quite some time. Did anybody get a support or deficiency price? This price is below the cost of production. Farmers are well aware of the fact that in this type of program, before they get a support price or any help their situation must be so desperate that they are almost bankrupt.

Another awkward feature of this plan is that it is based on too large an area. Three prairie provinces are involved. In the last three years, crops in the Peace River area of British Columbia have been rather poor. These people could be made bankrupt by contributing to the plan while farmers on the Prairies received an adequate income. This is one of the reprehensible features of the plan, that a charge can be imposed on somebody who will receive no benefit from the plan or who may be bankrupt before he does.

In my experience with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, in some years I received assistance when I did not deserve it and in others, because of the blanket approach, I did not receive assistance when I was entitled to it. I am not advocating doing away with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, but it has served its purpose. If something is to be put in its place it should be a program that is much more effective.

Because of its many unattractive features, because the legislation does not consider costs, because it will increase the burden on farmers at a time when they are not in a position to bear any further increase, I must support the amendment, Mr. Speaker.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, my first remarks in this debate must be to point out that it is regrettable that the government has allowed itself to degenerate so much in the eyes of the people and particularly in the eyes of western farmers. In my hand I hold excerpts from a copy of Hansard of 1969. It is interesting to read what the late Member of Parliament for the constituency of Assiniboia had to say on the subject of agriculture. He said, as reported at page 969 of Hansard for November 18, 1969:

> We need a national policy for Canadian agriculture. It is long overdue.

At the bottom of the page he is reported as saying:

> I renew my plea to the government to support the price of wheat at $1.95½ for export as well as domestic consumption.

He said many interesting things in that speech. On page 967 he is reported to have said:

> It is the area of agriculture that has the greatest problems. The situation is not good—

One could read the entire speech and learn much from it. The point is that he said we need an agricultural policy. He also said that the price of wheat should be supported at $1.95½ per bushel. All hon. members appreciate the efforts of that hon. member, who sat on the government side of the House, in his attempts to bring forward concrete proposals that would help his area of western Canada. I hate to say what I am about to say because the hon. member is not here to defend himself: one can only say that he failed to convince the government of the need to support wheat at any price. They have deliberately refused to pay the 9½ cents a bushel owed to farmers for last year. When you couple that with the amount that has been owing since then, the government owes the farmer in the neighbourhood of 15 cents per bushel. That amount should have been paid to our farmers up to the present. The government is not supporting wheat at $1.95½ a bushel; it is not supporting it at all.

It is regrettable that the government has not introduced the agricultural policy which the hon. member said was so badly needed. In the same speech he praised the appointment of a minister who would have sole jurisdiction over the Wheat Board. He said that he knew the minister would give the Board his undivided assistance and attention. Since then the position has degenerated. He no longer devotes his undivided attention to matters involving Canadian wheat; he must devote part of his attention to his duties as Minister of Manpower and Immigration. The late hon. member for Assiniboia would be disappointed if he saw the present situation. Perhaps it is better that he does not know about it.

I now wish to say a few words about the grain stabilization program. May I say, before commencing my main remarks on the motions, that if the government had paid what it owes the farmers under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act I would have been quite prepared to vote against the motion that was brought in this afternoon. We cannot ignore the government's disobedience of the law. We should not permit the government to go on its merry way and disregard the law. With that consideration in mind I was motivated to support the motion.

The minister in charge of the Wheat Board represents the constituency of Saskatoon-Humboldt.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I was under the impression that the hon. member indicated a few moments ago that he was about to direct his remarks to the two motions which are before the House for debate. I think, with respect, that the hon. member should confine himself to that subject. We are now at the report stage of Bill C-244 and I suggest that hon. members should try to deal with motions that are before the House for debate.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I heartily agree with you. I did not think I was straying from the motions. The first motion deals with an amendment to clause 2. Its effect would be that a farmer's income would be compiled on the basis of the net income of the farmer rather than on gross sales. I wholeheartedly support that concept. Today we find the farmer, to use that old, shopworm expression, caught in the cost-price squeeze as never before. Why do I say "as never before"? Wheat prices in the last year or so have gone down, yet the costs the farmer must pay have gone up. They will go up, particularly after the government brings in its new tax measure which will impose a capital gains tax on machinery, and so on. The farmer's costs are going up, yet the price he receives for his wheat is going down; consequently, he is caught in the cost-price squeeze as never before.

That is why I wholeheartedly support this amendment. After all, we are trying to stabilize the farmer's income and bring about the greatest possible security of income for people engaged in farming. To my way of thinking, if the government really wants to stabilize the farmer's income it should do so on the basis of net income rather than of gross sales.

The minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) is from Saskatoon. Nevertheless, we must ask, whom is he serving? Is he serving the farmers of Saskatchewan or the government of Canada? One could say that he is serving both. In that regard it may be interesting to recall the comments made on June 2, 1968, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) outlined in Winnipeg the agricultural policy of the Liberal Party. He is reported as having said:

> One of the most pressing long-range problems for western farmers is the need for an adequate yearly income, to get away from the boom and bust cycle that has become part of prairie farm life. To this end, the Liberals are proposing a plan, which, in effect, sounds like the equivalent of unemployment insurance for farmers. In good years they would pay into a fund; in bad years they would draw money from the fund, thereby, to a degree, stabilizing their income.

Those words do not refer to net or gross income. I like to think they refer to net income. However, as we look at the legislation, which it is claimed expresses the concepts enunciated on June 2 in Winnipeg, we can readily see that it has been dreamed up by the civil service and the Prime Minister's establishment, and not by the farmers.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, before the supper hour I was talking about the dreams and aspirations of the late hon. member for Assiniboia and his concept of what an agricultural policy for Canada should envisage. As recorded at page 967 of Hansard for November 18, 1969, he said that the price of wheat should be supported and that there should be a national agricultural policy.

The government has attempted to establish an agricultural policy based on bureaucratic thinking and the establishment thinking within the PMO, or it might be referred to as the establishment of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), which is completely contrary to the position taken by the late hon. member for Assiniboia. This proves to me, a member of the opposition, that one cannot be effective within the government ranks, particularly when the government is comprised of an authoritative, arrogant group of ministers prepared to do what they want and not necessarily what the people want.

The late hon. member expressed the desire that prices of wheat be supported. This government is deliberately bringing in a measure which takes almost 15 cents a bushel from the farmer, taking into consideration the 9.5 cents a bushel that should have been paid out and the portion which should have been paid out since the beginning of the present crop year.

Prior to the supper hour I was pointing out that this policy was envisaged long before the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board was even elected. It was long before he had his present responsibility. I say in his defence that one cannot rightfully accuse him of being the father of the stabilization program; he is merely a servant trying to carry out the policy.

It is very important that we understand how this situation came about. The program was dreamed up. This minister is merely trying to carry it out. Let us take consider how he is attempting to carry it out. The minister's basic purpose in carrying out this program is his desire to serve the Prime Minister and the ministry. It is regrettable that he does not have greater desire to serve the farmers of Saskatchewan. I cannot change that fact; I have to accept the fact that he feels his primary purpose is to serve the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister said, "Carry out the program which I announced on June 2, 1968. Forget about the farmers and forget about the people of Saskatchewan."

The people of Saskatchewan fully understand the situation. There was recently an agricultural conference held in Regina, attended by the three prairie Ministers of Agriculture. They all regretted the actions of the federal government. The farmers have repeatedly stated that they regret the actions of the federal government. In this debate an hon. member stated that he had received 4,200 letters from people who regret this particular action. It is obvious that the minister has disregarded the views of the farmer and has decided to serve the government first.

It is always regrettable when the ministry decides it is the master, not the people, and tells the people what they are going to receive, rather than the people telling the government what they desire. That fact is vividly illustrated in this legislation. It has also been pointed out on a number of previous occasions. We have frequently seen the government adopt this attitude.

In all fairness, the minister has attempted to sell this program rather well. I say to the other ministers in the cabinet—if the Prime Minister were here he could bear witness to what I am saying—that the minister has attempted to sell this program rather well. He did not go about it in the way in which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) tried to slide in Bill C-176. In a moment of crisis and urgency that minister tried to slide in a major piece of marketing legislation which would bring about a great deal of control and rigidity in our agricultural system.

The minister responsible for the Wheat Board went about selling the concept of the government's plan in a very good way. On April 29 he announced in Parliament that the grain stabilization program was being proposed. It looked good. The Federation of Agriculture, the Farmers Union, the grain companies and all political parties studied it throughout the winter months. They have all rejected it. The Canada Grains Council have great fears about it. Mr. Runciman, chairman of the Canada Grains Council which was set up to advise the government, said to the members of the Standing Committee on Agriculture, as recorded in issue No. 58 of the Committee's proceedings, that at best the program would be a long-range one and would not help in the short range or in a temporary situation.

There is no secret about the situation in agriculture today. As I explained before the supper hour, there is an immediate problem. To use a shopworn phrase, the farmer is caught in the cost-price squeeze. That is certainly true today because the price of wheat has gone down while costs of production have gone up.

• (8:10 p.m.)

The minister, in his attempt to sell this program, initiated a debate on October 29. He did not bring in this piece of legislation until April; I think it was April 23. I would say this was where he made his mistake. He should have brought in his program in February. At that point the farmers, the wheat pools, the Federation of Agriculture and perhaps even the Farmers Union might have been prepared to give him the benefit of the doubt and to go along with it. But he waited too long.

It is a question of timing. It has been said over the years that the art of politics is the art of timing. I think the minister failed badly in his timing. Had he brought this program in in February he would not have found himself in the difficulty which confronts him now under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, when he finds that $87.6 million are owing and should be paid.

I for one have little faith in this stabilization program but I am prepared to pass it provided the minister pays his debts.

An hon. Member: A little more than that.

Mr. Horner: An hon. member to my left says, "A little more than that." I would like to see a little more than that, it is true, but I am considered a moderate. I want the government to understand that we are prepared to negotiate. We are prepared to help the government help the farmer. There may be big headlines about the minister being prepared to go to jail. I am sure that many farmers in western Canada wish he had been in jail for the last six months. If he had been in jail maybe they would have got 15 cents a bushel more for their wheat.

There is no question that the amendments before the House deal with specific aspects of the minister's program. They ask that his proposals be worked out on the basis of net income rather than gross sales. Everyone concerned should bear in mind that farmers have a margin of 13 per cent of their gross sales on which to live. Now the government is proposing to take 2 per cent of the gross, which is like taking 5 or 6 per cent of the net income since farmers live on 13 per cent of their gross sales. The Bureau of Statistics can check these figures. My analysis suggests that eastern farmers live on 14 per cent of their gross sales and western farmers on 13 per cent, but I lump both groups together and say that this measure calls on farmers to pay something like 5 per cent of their net income.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. The hon. member knows he cannot continue unless he receives unanimous consent. Does the House give its consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Horner: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and express my appreciation for the generous mood of the House. It is, I think, well known that I have not abused the rules of the House of Commons, and I assure Your Honour and members of the House that I shall not abuse the privilege which has been granted to me. I appreciate it very much.

I was saying that the farmer lives on 13 per cent of his gross sales. In charging him 2 per cent of gross sales you are, in effect, taking 5 per cent of his net income. This is why I wholeheartedly support the principle of the first two amendments moved to this bill. I know how much the government wants to help the farmers. I know how much members opposite want to get this legislation through.

Mr. Rose: Support the NDP.

Mr. Horner: I support these amendments and would gladly have moved them myself, but I consulted fellow members of the agricultural committee and knew they were going to move them.

Mr. Rose: Where are they?

Mr. Horner: They have been tabled.

Mr. Rose: They must be under the table, then.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The Chair is of the opinion that this exchange between two hon. members does not further the debate. I hope that in the extra time allotted to him, the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) will continue his remarks.

Mr. Horner: I appreciate Your Honour's comments and applogize for being side-tracked by some odd remarks.

I want to make this clear. We tabled amendments. When I go into a committee I do not play partisan politics.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: The members of that committee work together. If a member belongs to a political party and says he intends to submit certain amendments, I say, "Fine. I will submit other amendments." I do not question his motives. I believe that as a member of the agricultural committee he must be motivated by concern for the good of the farmer.

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Horner: We in this party have filed amendments; members of the NDP have filed amendments. I want to say this clearly so that the minister will understand: We on this side are prepared to see the passage of this bill, with certain amendments. I would hope that the minister, in this hour of need of farmers in western Canada, in this hour, perhaps, of political need in view of the Assiniboia by-election, will accept some common sense amendments to the bill before us. The measure deals exclusively with western Canada. When the minister said, "Let us take it to the people", did he really mean that? If he did, let us get our heads together and make some reasonable changes to the legislation.

I am not saying that the amendments which I, the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski), the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) or the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) have moved must be accepted. But I urge the minister to take counsel. Let us get our heads together; let us move and accept some good amendments, as parliamentarians, not as partisan politicians, for the sake of the farmers of western Canada. I make this plea on behalf of the western farmers and ask the minister to consider it.

[Mr. Horner.]

• (8:20 p.m.)

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am taking part in the debate on these motions moved by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) because I have a degree of certainty in my mind that grain farmers, right across political lines in my constituency, are insisting on this. Even if I were ignorant, I am not stupid about how the people who are most affected by this kind of legislation feel about it.

The motions regarding costs of production and what the minister thinks is so holy about 90 per cent of income rather than 100 per cent are a reflection, I think, of the title of this bill, which includes the word "stabilization". This word has a favourable connotation; it gives one the impression of something good, of some kind of improvement. But the word "stabilization" as used in Bill C-244 carries with it nothing more than an abstract concept devoid of any particular meaning. It is particularly meaningless since the title of the bill is "An act respecting the stabilization of prairie grain sale proceeds," and so on.

The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) referred to the words "grain incomes" and quoted the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who said something about grain incomes. But what my hon. friend from Crowfoot should remember and what the Prime Minister should remember is that the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) has never once alleged, intimated or claimed that this bill has anything to do with grain incomes. This bill has to do with grain sale proceeds, and there is a great deal of difference between the two. When the minister uses the word "stabilization" in the title of his bill, it strips it of all meaning in the sense of how you or I, Mr. Speaker, would understand the word.

If the bill were described as a bill to "stabilize grain incomes" there would be much validity to the use of the word "stabilization" in both the title and the content of the bill. This is why we believe that in the context of the title of the bill the word "stabilization" is devoid of meaning. There is a failure to apply the word "stabilization" to "grain incomes" instead of "grain sale proceeds". What a Chamber of Commerce, lovey-dovey, finance company type of title that, is!

There are reasons why members of the opposition have moved this kind of amendment to the bill, and I suspect some members on the government side would also like to move such an amendment. The minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board may be able to convince himself that the members of the opposition are bluffing or playing politics because of a Saskatchewan election, an Alberta election, an Assiniboia by-election, or any kind of election in western Canada, but I hope that by now he has the message that we are not bluffing.

I hope that the farmers of Assiniboa invite the minister to a debate on this subject. None of us has any illusions about our political lives, even if the minister has. I will take whatever chances I have in terms of how I assess the mood and feelings of the grain farmers in the three prairie provinces, let alone in my own constituency. Particularly will I take my chances in terms of how the grain farmers in the minister's constituency feel.

The minister may in his wisdom choose to ignore what some idiot like me or any other idiot on this side of the chamber may say about this kind of motion which seeks to deduct increased costs of production, but he also chooses to ignore what every farm organization in western Canada has said about changes that should be made to the legislation.

Mr. Rose: Why does he do that?

Mr. Benjamin: Yes, why? I find it passing strange, in view of the priority that is placed on this bill, that nowhere in the speech, consisting of one paragraph on each amendment, which he made when the bill was last before the House at report stage on June 22 did he refute or dispute any figures, facts or claims included in the briefs of the farm organizations and the government of Manitoba. When it comes to costs of production, I find it even more passing strange that the minister has received no support from his colleagues on the government side who come from the Prairie provinces.

I should like to ask, where is the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Cobbe)? He has a fair number of permit holders in his riding, but has he yet said a word either on second reading or report stage, or, for that matter, at any other stage? Where is the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Sulatycky)?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The hon. member is aware of the rule of relevancy. The Chair feels that his remarks at this time are going very much beyond that rule. As the Speaker himself said in a recent ruling, this rule is the cornerstone of debate in the House. I hope the hon. member will come back to the subject matter of the debate before the House.

Mr. Benjamin: I appreciate your reminder, Mr. Speaker, but with all respect I was very careful to begin my remarks by saying that not one Liberal member from western Canada has risen to his feet to speak about the incorporation into this legislation of a provision deducting increased costs of production. The hon. member for Portage has said nothing about costs of production and neither has the hon. member for Rocky Mountain who, believe it or not, has some permit holders in the Crowsnest Pass. Where is the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Smerchanski)?

Mr. Orlikow: He is never here.

Mr. Benjamin: No. He has not said a word. Is the minister's bill so good that it does not need amendment? If the minister's bill does not need this particular amendment or the elimination of the minister's "kick" about 90 per cent of annual aggregate grain sale proceeds, then why have not some of his colleagues from the three prairie provinces risen in support of it?

There are a number of other members of the House from whom we expected to hear. There is a Liberal member from Edmonton—whatever his name is—who has not said a word on this bill, though how could he if he is never here? Then they have a member from Calgary who has plenty to say about oil companies, gas pipelines and tax bills, but I have not seen him rise in support of the minister's legislation. There are other Liberal members from the prairie provinces who have been noticeably absent or silent.

June 22 was the last occasion when motions Nos. 1 and 2 were before the House at the report stage. On that occasion the minister made one speech which included two paragraphs, one on each amendment. He said that inclusion of the words "costs of production" contained in this amendment would render the provision unworkable, though he did not say why. As I say, he has yet to refute one single fact or statistic in the brief of the government of Manitoba which was presented to the standing committee of the House. He has yet to challenge any of their statements.

Mr. Lang: That is not true.

Mr. Benjamin: I spoke on the telephone three or four times this morning to people who were directly concerned with this submission, and the minister has yet to dispute their costs of production figures. He may dispute them in terms of accuracy, but he has not yet disputed them or refuted the suggestion that costs of production figures could have been used in this field. He cannot do this, because he has no figures of his own. Perhaps he could get some, but he has not yet done so.

• (8:30 p.m.)

The entire submission of the Manitoba government tears the minister's stabilization bill into shreds. It talks in farmers' language, but the minister has yet to refute any of it. He thinks we are bluffing, but he has not seen anything yet. If the minister thinks he is going to get agreement from the government House leader in respect of extending the time for this debate, he has another think coming, because he has no support in his own caucus. This bill is low on the government's priority list. One has only to look back to the debates on second reading, particularly on May 6, to see that he was in a big rush to get the bill through. Hansard of May 7 indicates that he was in a real hurry, as does Hansard of May 4 and May 10. No Liberal member other than the hon. gentleman for Saskatoon-Humboldt has been on his feet in support of this measure.

Mr. Lang: Your filibusters have been enough.

Mr. Benjamin: The minister is a loser. We are not going to allow the grain growers on the Prairies to be losers because of one lonely cabinet minister who cannot get the support of his own party to do the things he knows should be done.

Mr. Lang: Order. Speak to the business before the House.

Mr. Benjamin: We are going to talk about this bill and I would like another 20 minutes to go into some of the facts and figures on behalf of the grain farmers in the three prairie provinces. I should like the minister to tell us why he cannot take one of two suggested approaches in respect of costs of production figures. I readily agree with him that the costs of production figures arrived at by farm management groups are not really broad enough, but even they represent the situation more accurately than anything he has brought forward. The minister has even suggested there are slight weaknesses in the DBS costs of production figures. He has not even considered the method used by the government of Manitoba in arriving at these figures.

We realize that the Manitoba government is not as big as the government of Canada and not as big as this minister, but that government has taken the DBS handbook on agricultural statistics to arrive at farm net income figures. The total farm operating expenses and depreciation costs for the three prairie provinces have been tabulated by DBS. The government of Manitoba used this tabulation as a basis for arriving at costs of production figures. They do not pretend these figures are perfect; they even say that they are not perfect.

Mr. Lang: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Benjamin: By all means.

Mr. Lang: I should like to ask the hon. member whether he is aware of the fact that, apart from all the technical problems of determining what are the particular costs of production of individual farmers, the basic proposition of stabilization would not be affected whether you used a change in gross or a change in net, except if you add a significant infusion of additional cash. Does he realize that if the Manitoba scheme were implemented it might cost the producers an extra 8 per cent or 10 per cent levy on their production?

Mr. Benjamin: That might be true, if we did it the way the minister would do it. Of course it would cost the farmer more if the minister's formula were applied. When is this minister going to get the message? This is one of the few occasions in the history of agricultural debates in Parliament, going back to at least 1951, where there has been a genuine opportunity for government and opposition members to really do something about the grains income situation in western Canada.

The minister keeps applying the concepts of his predecessors. This is what we are trying to persuade him not to do. We are not particularly interested in the minister personally. We think he is a very nice fellow. But he refuses to accept the findings and figures of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the National Farmers Union, the United Grain Growers and the three prairie wheat pools. He turns a deaf ear in that direction.

He can turn as many deaf ears as he likes toward Conservative and NDP members from the prairie provinces because that is fair ball and by-play in this House of Commons—but why does he remain insensitive and stubborn in respect of what the farmers themselves are saying? What other choice do we have but to fight him and his government, even though our respective political necks are on the line? We have never had any illusions about that, but if he thinks we are bluffing I hope what has happened today has convinced him we are not.

Let me return again to the matter of costs of production figures. The minister may well interrupt me with questions but, quite frankly, I must confess I did not know what the hell he was talking about when he interrupted me, and I am not sure he does either. When is he going to reply in this House and tell us why costs of production figures are unworkable? That is what he said on June 22. He said they were unworkable, but he did not say why or how.

He has not said a word to dispute the figures put forward by the government of Manitoba. He just got up and said they were unworkable. The grain farmers in the three Prairie provinces are like the man from Missouri. Better still, they are from the three Prairie provinces.

The minister has not given us a satisfactory reply and no other Liberal Member of Parliament from the Prairie provinces has been off his seat to support him. There may be some reason for the Liberal members from British Columbia, from Thunder Bay, and Kenora-Rainy River to support the hon. gentleman, but none of them has done so yet. Why have they not?

How is it that the hon. gentleman can talk about filibusters when the whole history of his announcements in October and March, during second reading and at the committee and report stages, indicate this is a travesty? This is about the fifteenth bill presented by the fifteenth cabinet minister. Obviously, the bill and the minister are both a long way down, low on the totem pole. Obviously, they do not count and the government does not care. Why does the Liberal government need a corporal's guard of Liberal Members of Parliament from the prairie provinces when it knows they are not going to get anywhere?

Mr. Orlikow: They are not going to be re-elected.

Mr. Benjamin: The government does not need them and, I agree, they are not going to be re-elected. Where are the Liberal friends of the farmers other than the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt? Where is the support, either visual or oral, on the part of the government for this minister? The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) has made some noise once or twice, but I think the last time was about three months ago and we have not seen him since. He does not want to be caught in association with the minister on this bill.

The Minister of Agriculture is worried about things in Medicine Hat. If he thinks the uprising between the Crowfoot Indians and the Mounted Police back in the 1800s was something big, he has seen nothing yet. There is a very good reason for the Minister of Agriculture not backing up the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt on this bill. I believe this minister has made a genuine effort to persuade his colleagues in the cabinet and in the caucus to do something about this legislation, without success. I ask the hon. gentleman to try again.

When he appears at the cabinet meeting if there is one tomorrow, or at the first opportunity, he should renew his request for support of a two-price system. It is time to renew that request. He should also renew his request for something more than this stabilization bill. In that way he could prove the concern about which he speaks. I believe him when he says he will not take a back seat to any member of this House in respect of his concern for the grain growers of the prairie provinces. Let him state to his cabinet colleagues and his colleagues in the caucus that if they are not prepared to go along with his suggestions, they should get themselves another boy because he does not intend to be a political sacrificial lamb for the Members of Parliament from other parts of Canada who belong to the Liberal party but could not care less about the farmers. If the hon. member wants to be that kind of a sucker, I feel sorry for him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him by the rules has expired. Unless the House gives unanimous consent, he cannot continue.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): There does not seem to be unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member knows he can pursue his remarks only with unanimous consent, and there does not seem to be that consent.

• (8:40 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, we have now reached the report stage of Bill C-244, which apart from being most interesting, contains provisions designed to assist our grain producers, especially those in the Prairies.

A lot has been said and written about Bill C-244 and after the debate on the motion for second reading in the House, it was referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture where it was discussed clause after clause. It is now before the House at the report stage.

According to parliamentary procedure, the hon. member who did not have an opportunity to express their views or else to have the Committee on Agriculture accept the amendments they felt were reasonable, may if they so desire, submit their amendments at the report stage.

Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the case with the amendment now being dealt with, and on which I should like to make a few comments in all fairness to Western farmers.

What does the bill say exactly? Clause 2(1)(c) states, and I quote:

"grain sale proceeds" means the amount of the purchase price of grain produced on land described in a permit book and sold by a producer to a licensee, after the deduction from the purchase price of the grain of the lawful charges that are applicable to the grain on its sale to the licensee by the producer;

Now the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave), an expert in that field, felt it his duty to point out to the House that the terms used in the wording of this bill are not clear enough, and that they are too vague to do justice to western grain producers.

Also, Mr. Speaker, these vague phrases do not always apply only to western farmers but also too often unfortunately to eastern producers.

Well-meaning people often think that expressions such as "the lawful charges that are applicable to the grain on its sale to the licensee by the producer" will be enough to give producers the guarantee that the production cost will be included in the price and that the producer will eventually be protected.

In the light of the experience in my own riding and of the facts we have known throughout Canada, the hon. member who introduced the amendment was perfectly justified in doing so, I think, because he simply wanted the bill to express in an understandable manner what is meant by production cost. Part of the amendment reads as follows:

"and after the deduction of the increased costs of production, and including stabilization payments, if any";

Mr. Speaker, the expression "costs of production" comprises many things which, of necessity, are involved in a production cycle; it includes not only seed grain, fertilizers and labour costs, but also capital investment, interest, depreciation on equipment and that resulting from weather conditions on the land being used. All these things must be taken into consideration if justice is to be done to the producer who devotes himself to agriculture, tilling the soil to extract from it what is required to feed mankind.

Mr. Speaker, the people were made aware of this bill and, as it should be if committees really serve a purpose, it was absolutely normal for the interested parties, or the individual producers, to go to the trouble of sitting at a table and writing down on a scrap of paper the suggestions or the recommendations which they wanted to make to the members of a committee such as the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that you will not be shocked, because I have on my desk half a ton of papers specifically used by western producers to let it known to a member of the Standing Committee on Agriculture what was expected of him in connection with such and such a bill. This is what you see on the desk of the member for Bellechasse. These are letters sent by western producers to a member of the committee. I wanted to bring them here, because it happens sometimes that such harmless statements are merely supposed to be an exaggeration. I insisted on answering each of these letters during the period of the debate or Bill C-244. Why? Because I myself, as a farmer and producer, was often frustrated by the government's attitude. In fact, certain letters that we addressed to it were simply thrown in the basket and we did not receive any reply. The government kept on doing as it pleased, not considering any recommendation from producers.

• (8:50 p.m.)

In these circumstances, though I am a Canadian from the East, I felt that I had to take my responsibilities, acknowledge receipt of representations addressed to me and tell those who wrote to me that I would in due time make Parliament aware of their requests. I consider that the time has now come to outline their viewpoints and invite this government to bring forth precisions on Bill C-244 so as to guarantee these people the justice to which they are entitled and to ensure that they maintain their confidence in the Parliament of Canada.

This is not a matter of politics but a matter of common sense. In fact, fair representations must be made to Parliament whose duty it is to legislate so as to ensure good government for the whole country, regardless of geographic considerations. Conscientious members must carry out their responsibilities and act in the interest of the community.

That is why I wish to support the amendment now under consideration which, in my opinion, is a fair one. As a matter of fact, it is not a matter of opposing the government, but of giving the people the assurance that the best possible legislation is adopted.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one of these letters reads in part as follows:

As a member of the Committee on Agriculture I ask you to take the following positions on Bill C-244.

It is a suggestion, a recommendation.

For a few days now we have been hearing discussions relating to the introduction of motions whose purpose is to raise a debate on the non payment of grants, support payments which were to be made under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. I even attended a debate which went on as late as 2.30 in the morning on this subject. I consider that under the circumstances, if we want to be really objective, we will have to reach a conclusion and we will if the suggestions and recommendations of interested producers are given some consideration. Here is what is suggested in the same letter:

Separate the payment of the $100 million from the rest of the legislation and refuse to consider Bill C-244 until the government has made such payment.

Mr. Speaker, I know that when people expect payments for work performed, even the sale of products, it is always encouraging for those who believe in the legislation to see that it is enforced and provides at least the expected benefits. But the matter under discussion is whether Parliament will take production costs into account under Bill C-244.

• (8:50 p.m.)

A moment ago, I listened to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) make a remark that I considered serious. While one of my colleagues was delivering his speech, he said: In short, what is the production cost? As a matter of fact, it can vary from one province to the next, but not to the extent of causing serious prejudice to the western farmer. One must take the average into account, not only in clause 2 of Bill C-244, but also in any law dealing with the various classes of society.

I believe that when we are really aware of our responsibilities, it will be possible to understand one another more quickly on the contents of Bill C-244, and I invite the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board to lend a careful ear to suggestions even though they may be those of the opposition. It does not mean they are all bad. Some of them may be sound. Regardless of party politics, we are here in this House to consider those proposals seriously and to incorporate them into the law for the good of the whole society.

That is why I made a few remarks to the House on clause 2 and the amendment of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. We also wanted to prove our community of interests with other Canadians, even those of the riding of Ontario represented by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), who is not a wheat producer.

Mr. Speaker, at times I find it unfortunate that the opposition be accused of filibustering. It is perhaps true in some cases, but I would like to say that, since I have been in Parliament, although time may have sometimes been wasted on the consideration of certain measures, in general—the average must always be taken into account—we have worked seriously—

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Mr. La Salle : That is not bad.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): The hon. member for Joliette says that is not bad. Surely that is not bad, because he himself often took part in debates on bills introduced in the House. I am convinced that his contributions then were not designed to delay the passing of government bills, but to make sure that Canada is better served by the Canadian Parliament through better laws.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is in that spirit that the member for Bellechasse wishes to work here, and it is in that same spirit that he wants to support the amendment under consideration, reserving the right during later consideration of Bill C-244 to make the remarks which he will deem expedient.

Finally, I would like my friends, the western farmers, the wheat or grain producers, to know that their message reached the House, and that the member for Bellechasse was glad to act as their spokesman, as a member of the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

[English]

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Chicken.

Mr. Pringle: I have heard considerable abuse in this House of Commons, especially from the far end to my left, but I doubt if I have ever heard more abuse than I heard this evening, abuse which I think is completely unjustified and which I am sure will start farmers thinking because, although those hon. members may not realize it, farmers do think.

I have been doing business with farmers in western Canada for 30 years and I have worked on costs of production. For 20 years we have been struggling and striving to find a standard way in which to establish the costs of production of farm products, which is the subject under discussion. It is a subject that has been in the forefront of the agricultural business for as long as I can remember. I could name dozens of programs carried out by universities on costs of production. I can tell you of occasions when farmers themselves arranged to have research programs carried out. The experts can establish that one and one make two, just like the slide-rule boys do, but it is impossible to incorporate all the variables and the human elements. This is something that is not peculiar to farm products.

Is it not strange that a new provincial government comes into power and within a few months it suddenly comes up with some kind of deal that has never before been proven, that has never been worked, and says, "This is how you find the costs of production of agricultural products." I can tell you the situation of two farmers, farming side by side and supposedly operating the same way, using the same feed, and each had 5,000 pullets. They kept records and at the end of a year one farmer came up with a figure of $1 net per pullet and the other came up with a figure of $3.25 net.

• (9:00 p.m.)

I could go on and on. You will confuse the farmers with this amendment. It is not as though the opposition feel they are doing something to help the farmers. If they were to sit down with five farmers and discuss this proposal they would know that it should not be carried out. They just want to resort to red herring techniques in this House and give the impression that they are fighting for the farmers.

I see the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) is leaving the chamber. In all sincerity I should like to congratulate his brother on being appointed Minister of Agriculture in the provincial government. I am sure he will be an asset to that department with his wide knowledge and experience. I have listened to him speak with his colleagues about their new prairie coalition—a kind of oddball coalition, Mr. Speaker. I was interested when he said that the government was trying to ram legislation down their throats. I have the feeling that I have heard that before. It may well be that the real Minister of Agriculture for Alberta could be sitting not too far from me in this House of Commons. I would not suggest the advice given to the brother would not be good—only time will tell.

Mr. Horner: He is the older brother.

Mr. Pringle: I have been involved in and associated with the farming industry for most of my life and I have no illusions about the financial problems which plague farmers. I have made money with them and I have lost money with them. I have worked with them and I have been in a secondary industry, which always is a preferred industry. A relative of mine taught me that it was a little better to farm the farmers than to farm. I admit I had that advantage. In their opposition to this bill some people are working for the man who farms the farmers, not the farmers. I do not blame them for getting the support; it is good support.

An hon. Member: How do you figure that out?

An hon. Member: Explain that.

Mr. Pringle: There is a worldwide concept—

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Horner: I rise on a question of privilege. While I appreciate the hon. member's remarks and his wisdom at most times, he said that hon. members who are opposed to this legislation are opposed to it for personal reasons or political reasons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: I want to point out that if this legislation passes I have already been informed that I will receive a cheque for $928.98. If it is not passed I will receive nothing under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. I have not produced any wheat in the past two years and I will receive nothing.

An hon. Member: What is the point?

Mr. Horner: The point is that hon. members are accused of doing things for personal reasons.

Mr. Benjamin: Are your motives as pure as that, Pringle?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Chair is of the opinion that the point raised by the hon. member was well taken, in the sense that no hon. member should cast any reflection on the integrity or sincerity of hon. members. I am sure that it was not meant in that sense by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle). The Chair was not following the debate attentively at that particular time, however. Perhaps the hon. member would continue his remarks.

Mr. Pringle: Mr. Speaker, I want it placed on the record right now that there is no way I would accuse an hon. member of doing anything in the House for personal gain. I was simply referring to the fact that they were being influenced by secondary industry, and I believe that is true. Maybe they are not, but the assumption occurs to me because of the advantage the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act Provides for elevator companies. Under this act the farmers would be paid directly.

There is a worldwide concept that food must be cheap, regardless of the cost of production.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Is the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Nystrom: No, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the hon. member would answer a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member knows that he can ask a question only if the hon. member who has the floor accepts it.

Mr. Pringle: I do not have much time left—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pringle: If I could answer the question I would be glad to do so, but I am almost at the end of my time and I have much more to say.

Mr. Horner: Have you?

Mr. Pringle: I worked on this speech all morning.

Mr. Alexander: You wouldn't know it.

Mr. Horner: The whole thing sounds like an afterthought.

Mr. Pringle: There is a worldwide concept that food must be cheap, regardless of the cost of production. Food must be high in quality, regardless of input costs; and food must be produced in continuous oversupply, regardless of the fact that excessive surpluses are always sold at disastrous prices. In other words, the concept of agricultural production denies producers the right to price their products. I hasten to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that any product produced in surplus and offered for sale in excess of normal markets must run the peril of securing sales by selling at lower-than-cost prices. This is true whether it relates to neckties, pots and pans, automobiles or agricultural products.

That does not mean that this act will remain as it is for the rest of time, but it is a fair and proper start to stabilization and this we need in the agricultural industry more than ever before. The days of producing anything you want on the farm and saying the city folk will have to buy it and eat it, are gone. Specialist farming has taken over and such things as synthetic foods have taken over.It is time we realized that if we are going to maintain our agricultural industry, and especially the grain industry, we must give consideration to stabilization.

Normal stability as it relates to production, distribution and consumption can apparently only be achieved when a reasonable balance is arrived at. Certain segments of the agricultural industry in Canada have made considerable progress in bringing stability through planned production and orderly marketing. This progress has been achieved by producers who have been prepared to accept the recognized principles of business requirements. It is true that considerable planning remains to be carried out before lasting stability can be achieved, but success breeds success and gradual stability growth will continue to be in evidence within these sectors of the industry.

I do not suggest that government can or should avoid all responsibility in connection with farm income. In fact, history shows that over the years many millions of dollars have been spent by all levels of government to assist farmers. I agree that the assistance was weighted heavily toward production practices. Experimental farms, extension department services and fieldmen, university departments, financial legislation, have all combined to help farmers improve efficiency and lower production costs.

The result has been a continuous lowering of food costs through decreased production, with precious little of the savings being retained by agricultural producers. The consumers jump with joy when the bottom falls out of egg or pork prices, while at the same time they are voting to go on strike to increase their own revenue. So we have real problems in trying to stabilize in various areas of the country, and we must get the farmers themselves involved.

These so-called mandarins who start organizations and go tearing around the country sending out form letters and propagandizing are serving no useful purpose for Canadian farmers. Let the farmers get together, because they will tell you what is good for the farming industry. They know. Of course, it is more fun politically to give the government a bad time and say the farmers are not getting enough and that they need more and more.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, you need a great deal of courage to bring legislation before this House, especially if you sincerely want to help the farmers of western Canada. I use the word "sincerely" because I think the government is being sincere. The legislation the government brings in is not perfect. We have accepted amendments in the agricultural committee from various sections of the opposition. I even remember accepting an amendment one day that was in French, which I could not read. We accept amendments.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Pringle.]

Mr. Pringle: We must consider the farmer's needs and not pay attention merely to political expediency.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question and tell us just what amendment was accepted relating to the Lift program? I submit that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) accepted no amendment relating to the Lift program or to this program.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) has the floor. Unless the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) has the permission of the hon. member, he cannot ask a question.

Mr. Pringle: Mr. Speaker, amendments were accepted. The hon. member, as usual, has caught me without having the amendment in front of me. I am sure that amendments suggested by his party were accepted. In any event, I will be glad to tell him about them at a later date.

An hon. Member: They were not amendments to this bill.

Mr. Pringle: Mr. Speaker, may I continue? Of course, I cannot support this amendment. If it were workable I would be most happy to support it. This is the first time that farmers have been able to participate in their own financial future. They do a great job of growing grain. They shoulder the risk of climatic conditions and take a real risk in finding markets. The Canadian people, as taxpayers, do their bit to help wherever that is possible. I do not think we have done enough. I think we must try to persuade the people to help the farmers more.

Within the framework of this Bill the taxpayers of Canada are to put up $2 of the taxpayers' money for every dollar that is provided by producers, and this will be under a program to stabilize agricultural production. If hon. members were to research the background of this bill and study debates relating to it—I bring this to the attention of the hon. member for Crowfoot—they would find that certain suggestions made by the hon. member's party were agreed to and acted upon. If this bill had been in effect since 1950 the taxpayers of Canada would have poured $432 million into the pockets of the grain farmers of western Canada over and above farmers' contributions. That term encompasses not only wheat farmers but grain farmers producing six different grains.

We must consider another matter relating to this bill. Wheat is no longer the main grain of western Canada. Hon. members have heard arguments advanced about this question. I think the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) once talked about "the land of rape and honey". Rapeseed is a very important crop and was very important, as hon. members know, this summer. Flax is coming in, and just look at the big increase in our barley crop and the extra markets.

An hon. Member: And the price.

Mr. Pringle: I submit that this bill is designed to stabilize the income not only of wheat farmers but of all grain farmers.

Mr. Stanfield: This is a filibuster.

Mr. Pringle: I know that one could go out west and say that many farmers out there are doing well. They are not doing so well as many workers in other areas of the country. They are good people, and they are doing reasonably well. One has only to look at the financial statement put out by a wheat pools to realize that this is so. The operating revenues of this pool were some $23 million in 1970. Their net operating earnings—not their gross but their net—amounted to about $4 million, or 17 per cent. That wheat pool is owned by farmers and on $23 million they made 17 per cent. I could name 1,000 businessmen who would like to make a net profit of 7 per cent, let alone 17 per cent.

Mr. Peters: The hon. member should move the motion. He has only three minutes left.

Mr. Pringle: Because of the great interest being shown in this House, especially by those in the opposition, in this bill I wish to move, under Standing Order 6(5)(a):

That we continue sitting beyond ten o'clock for the purpose of continuing consideration of the report stage of Bill C-244.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member has just moved a motion. Hon. members are aware of the provisions of Standing Order 6 (5)(a) respecting the prolongation of hours of sittings of the House. Before putting the motion again to hon. members the Chair feels it is necessary to read section (5)(b) of Standing Order 6 relating to the procedure to be followed when the motion is put. It reads as follows:

When Mr. Speaker puts the question on such motion, he shall ask those members who object to rise in their places. If ten or more members then rise, the motion shall be deemed to have been withdrawn, otherwise, the motion shall have been adopted.

[Translation]

Hon. members know that Standing Order 6(5)(a) provides that an hon. member may propose to continue a sitting beyond the hour of adjournment stipulated in the Rules provided he moves the motion in the hour preceding the time of dinner recess or the time of daily adjournment.

Before I read the motion put forward by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle), I must call the attention of hon. members to Standing Order 6(5)(b) which reads as follows:

When Mr. Speaker puts the question on such motion, he shall ask those members who object to rise in their places. If ten or more members then rise, the motion shall be deemed to have been withdrawn, otherwise, the motion shall have been adopted.

[English]

All those opposed to the motion will please rise.

And more than ten members having risen:

Some hon. Members: Shame!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In accordance with section (5)(b) of Standing Order 6, the motion is deemed to have been withdrawn.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member who has just completed his remarks would permit a question. I notice that he had three minutes left.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member's time has now expired. He can accept a question only with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, since the House granted me more time, perhaps it would grant the hon. member more time.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat. The hon. member is aware that we must abide by the rules of the House. There does not seem to be unanimous consent, and the Chair will recognize another hon. member.

Mr. Lewis: The government does not abide by its laws; why should we abide by its rules?

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment in a general way because I believe that it points out one of the weaknesses of this legislation, namely, that grain stabilization is related to gross income and not in any way to net income. I am less inclined to support the second part of the amendment dealing with 100 per cent as opposed to 90 per cent. When an individual receives money for wages, through his business or by any other means, it is not the gross receipts that are important but the net receipts after deducting the costs of production, salaries, and so on.

• (9:20 p.m.)

I feel that this amendment is most important. It puts a different slant on the grain stabilization program. It gives an indication why the western farmers are not enamoured of the proposed program. Lumping together the $100 million pay-out and the grain stabilization program was a great mistake. I can only repeat what the Canadian Federation of Agriculture said in its brief to the Standing Committee on Agriculture on May 7, 1971. It pointed out that the bill is in two parts. I quote from the brief as follows:

The bill itself must be dealt with in two parts:

1. The vitally necessary payments to be made to prairie producers as so-called "special transitional payments" in the amount of $100 million. These are urgently required.

2. The long-term stabilization and storage policies contained in the bill. These require much improvement.

That is what has been hung on this bill. The $100 million has no relationship to the grains stabilization program. The pay-out is different and the gathering of the money is different. There is no reason to lump the two together. Payments made under the grains stabilization program will be based on the farmer's gross receipts for the last three years, but the $100 million payment will be based on an acreage payment only. Out of the $100 million, $70 million will come from the money allocated under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. There is no connection between these two parts of the bill; they should be separated. Payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act should now be honoured and the grain stabilization program looked after at the proper time.

What about grain stabilization? It must be recognized that this bill is clearly designed to place definite limits on the federal obligation to support the prairie income even in the face of chronic inadequacy. Once the stabilization program is in effect, the federal government will be able to say it has made the payments regardless of the needs of the prairie farmers. It will be a decade or more after this legislation is in force before its usefulness can be assessed. It is a means whereby the government will not have to support prairie agriculture for the next four or five years. Why? I again quote from the brief of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture:

> Consider that the likely federal financial obligation under this policy—which includes the termination of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act with no replacement of it by an alternative and better national storage reserve stocks policy with federal sharing of costs—is less than has been undertaken by the government through the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act alone in the course of the last 15 years.

This indicates that the government will be obligated to pay out much less per year than it has been paying on the average over the past 15 years even in the face of many good years and increases in the costs of farming. The obvious reason for this is the formula on which the pay-out will be based: it will be based on the previous five years' gross receipts for all of the designated wheat board area. For the past four years income has been in the neighbourhood of $800 million, $900 million to $950 million. The income in 1966 and 1967 was $1,400 million. This will be included in the calculation at the end of the crop year 1971-72. When that calculation is made for next fall these will be only one good year included in the previous five. The government will not be paying out a large amount of money for the next four or five years even in face of severely reduced grain yields and grain income; it will wash its hands of paying out money to prairie farmers for that period of time.

What is wrong with the pay-out? Consider the levy under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Under that act there was a 1 per cent levy by the government. Payments made under the act were considered inadequate because they often went to those who did not need them and those who did need them did not qualify under the regulations. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act was so tailored that even with a crop failure in six sections the farmer would qualify for a pay-out.

Consider the present situation. There will be a gross averaging of the previous five years over the whole of the designated area, that is, all of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and part of British Columbia. There may be farm income losses which will cause considerable hardship for the producers but there will be no pay-out because there may be a good crop or good sales in other parts of the area. That is a serious disadvantage. Because the minister did not break down the areas into crop districts or provinces, this indicates a lack of appreciation of the gross inadequacies that this pay-out will create. It will be based on the next receipts of the producers for any one year. It will not be related to the costs of production. It is not based on a formula which takes into account production costs and the fact that there is a 3 per cent to 5 per cent inflation factor even in good years, and 5 per cent to 7 per cent in bad years.

A 2 per cent levy will represent a sizeable portion of an individual's income. For example, if there is no pay-out for five years, a farmer who has had to pay the 2 per cent levy will not receive interest on this money. He may be in a position where he has to pay, in effect, 2 per cent, 3 per cent or even 4 per cent of his gross income. This means a further reduction in value to him of the grains stabilization program as proposed in the bill before us.

• (9:30 p.m.)

I should also like to draw attention to what I believe to be a basic weakness in the plan. It is based upon wheat. Only when wheat production or sales have failed will the average income fall to a level at which farmers can expect a pay-out. For the foreseeable future, other crops will constitute such a small proportion of the total volume handled by the Wheat Board that a crop or sales failure could occur affecting rapeseed or barley, for example, but the effect on the total dollar value would not be great enough to cause a pay-out to be made. As a result, producers of rapeseed, or barley, as the case may be, would suffer.

In the parkland areas of western Canada there is a much broader diversification of crops than in southern Saskatchewan, for example. As I say, the program is based on the assumption that wheat will be the crop to suffer sales failure or crop failure. This assumption penalizes the growers of other grains who, though they must accept the scheme, are not likely to receive a pay-out.

We all realize that the elevator system needs to be modernized and that this would cost a great deal of money. There has been little modernization in the last 30 or 40 years. The Temporary Wheat Reserves Act provides a means by which elevator companies receive payments for the storage of grain. They receive more dollars than are actually involved in the storage of grain. I am sure that this keeps the price of grain handling down. There is no doubt that the repeal of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act would lead to an increase in the cost of grain handling, and notice is being given that this indeed will be the effect. Beyond question, the ending of payments under the act would have an adverse effect on the elevator system. When one considers that the farm elevator system handles practically 60 per cent of the grain—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have listened carefully to the hon. member. He is making a very good speech, but it seems to me that his remarks are quite broad. I realize there has been a tendency in this debate to range a little and I do not single out the hon. member, but I would, with respect, ask him to remember that the House is now dealing at the report stage with motions Nos. 1 and 2 which are grouped for discussion. If the hon. member ranges too far he may be out of order. I would point this out to him.

Mr. Ritchie: The ending of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act would make the adoption of these amendments even more necessary because it would mean the termination of payments to the elevator system, payments which reduce the handling charges per bushel. Acceptance of these amendments or of similar amendments would be of great value because we are not dealing here with a monolithic industry. This is not an industry made up of 3, 4, 5 or even 10 large companies. It is made up of some 200,000 individuals who are holders of Wheat Board permits.

Under this program a large percentage of these people, perhaps between 10 and 20 per cent, may face disaster in any year without help of any kind. It would be much better if a formula were worked out under which net farm income were taken into consideration rather than gross farm income.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, the amendment we are discussing goes to the core of the debate on this bill. The measure before us is entitled the grain stabilization bill. It proposes a plan to which all prairie farmers must subscribe. I believe there would be general agreement as to the desirability of providing for stabilization at an adequate level, in favour of a plan which would bring stability to the prairie grain farmer. But in the bill now before us we are dealing not just with the principle involved, not with certain broad guidelines within which the government or its agencies can operate, but with a specific type of plan, one which has been proposed by the government. I am not critical in that respect. The fact that it is so specific at least enables us to pass adequate judgment on its probable effectiveness.

It would seem to me that by now the government, and especially the minister in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang), would have got the message—that the plan proposed in this bill is inadequate, that it will not do what its proponents claim for it. Thus, we need to give serious consideration to these amendments which propose the inclusion of a provision which would cover increasing costs of production, one of the critical factors facing farmers in their day to day operations. Every day the farmer has to keep in mind that his costs of production may rise. The income he was receiving yesterday may not be adequate today or tomorrow.

I am amazed that after all the consideration this bill has received, after all the issues which have been placed before members of the House and others in this country, the minister in charge of the Wheat Board should have replied as he did to a question addressed to him this afternoon. During the question period he was asked whether he would give consideration to representations from three prairie Ministers of Agriculture. It is public knowledge that the three ministers intend to make representations concerning the bill. A good deal of publicity was given to this fact yesterday. They made it clear they were unhappy with the bill and feel it is not good enough to meet the needs of prairie grain farmers.

What happened this afternoon when the minister was asked whether he would give consideration to their representations? The minister assured the House that he would listen to the representations made by these gentlemen and would take them into consideration. But when it came to a question of adjourning this debate at the report stage and on the amendments now before us, the government and its supporters lined up solidly against a proposal which would have meant deferring final judgment on the bill until such time as these provincial ministers have the opportunity to make their views known to the government.

• (9:40 p.m.)

If the minister is not going to listen to the three prairie governments or to the members of this House who have made their views known, who is he going to listen to? It seems to me he has displayed during this debate the attitude that he knows best for the farmers of western Canada, that he and he alone knows best what is good for western agriculture.

I think we have to keep in mind that the three prairie governments, particularly the government of Manitoba, have already made their views known. I am sure the minister will acknowledge that they made representations to the federal government which were directly related to the subject matter of these motions. The present clause as worded relates to grain sale proceeds that are gross grain sale proceeds. Motion No. 1 proposes to insert certain factors regarding costs of production. When these two factors are put together, what we are then talking about is the net income of farmers. We are talking about what the farmer is left with after paying his costs of production. Thus, I think we have to remember when discussing the representations that have been made by the three prairie provinces that the Manitoba government in particular presented a plan to the federal government proposing a type of stabilization based on the net income of prairie grain farmers.

My colleague from Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) has pointed out to the minister that we have never received a critique from the minister or from anybody else of the proposed Manitoba plan. If there are points of criticism or of weakness to be made about that plan, then I think all of us would want to hear what they are. But never have we heard from the minister what are his views or observations on the plan that has been presented.

How can we carry on a sensible discussion of this subject, one so vital and critical to the prairie farmers, when the minister does not respond to a degree greater than has been the case up to now? The fact is that he has given no indication of where he stands on the proposals that have been made. He talks about wanting to give consideration to various viewpoints and to any representations that are made, yet he turns a silent "thumbs down" to any proposal that conflicts in any way with the fancy little plan that he is attempting to foist on the farmers of western Canada.

Whenever the minister talks about this plan he has much to say about any proposal regarding changes to the plan which involve the expenditure of more money. This is true in part. There is no question that one of our basic criticisms of the bill is that we consider the federal treasury has made an inadequate allocation of federal resources to the prairie grains industry. The minister has to remember that criticism because he will be reminded of it many times during the coming months; and it will be the regret of the Liberal party if they show no change of heart, if I can use that phrase. I said it is only true in part that it is a question of more money. There is another basic point that has been raised, and this is the equitable treatment of farmers in western Canada, treatment that is based on need as it exists. That basic point the minister has totally ignored in considering this bill.

We have also witnessed in recent days the minister's attitude in this House to the flagrant flouting of the federal law of this country by the government in its failure to carry out the provisions of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act which are still in effect. This Act, of course, did make some contribution by the federal government to the prairie grains industry. I have made it clear when speaking on a number of occasions in this House that I acknowledge and agree that there is need for an overhaul of this legislation, that what we need is an over-all storage policy for all grains, which is a somewhat different approach. But not for one second can we go along with the type of approach put before the House by the minister, namely, simply to wipe out this legislation and to say to the farmers of western Canada, "We have no responsibility for presenting a grains storage policy. We have no responsibility to see that the prairie grain farmers do not bear the brunt of international grain competition or that prairie grain farmers do not have to compete against the treasuries of other countries". Although the minister recognized this point in some of his comments, never has he recognized it in any of the proposals or policies that he has put before the House of Commons.

It seems to me that if we really wanted to find a solution to the present impasse we could do so very simply. But we are not going to be bullied into accepting the type of proposal that the government is trying to foist on this House and on the farmers of the country. Why does not the minister begin to show some sense and pay the farmers the money due to them under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act? Why does he not split this grain stabilization bill, make these transitional payments under one bill and propose a permanent plan in a second bill? It has been made clear to the members of the government that we on this side of the House would be prepared immediately to agree to the $100 million payment if this provision were taken out of the bill which is before us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think it would be fair if the Chair were to indicate to the hon. member who has the floor, as it did to the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) who spoke immediately preceding the hon. member, that it seems the hon. member is ranging a little wide on motions Nos. 1 and 2 now before the House. If I am in error in this regard I know the hon. member will indicate to me in what respect. But when the hon. member debates more general matters perhaps he is ranging a little wider than he should at the report stage of our proceedings.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the concern that has been expressed by Your Honour in attempting to deal with these motions in an orderly way. I recognize the problem Your Honour faces, but as I indicated at the outset of my remarks it did seem to me that the amendments before the House go to the very core of this debate. Without the adoption of the amendment put by my colleague from Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) it would be impossible to have a plan that made any sense to the western farmers or would be of any benefit to them. It seems to me that we are dealing here with a long-range picture of the prospects facing the prairie farmers.

Related to this, of course, is the question of federal contributions or assistance to the prairie grains industry and the willingness of the federal government to stand by that industry in times of need. This in turn involves the question of the amount of money that is made available for any plan proposed in the House of Commons. This is why I was discussing the amount of money the federal government is prepared to put into its plan. Certainly this is germane to the question of taking account of increased costs of production, which is recognized in the motion moved by my colleague.

• (9:50 p.m.)

I now want to move on to further considerations involved in this bill. This afternoon the minister, in answer to a question regarding taking into account new proposals, costs of production and the net income of farmers—which is really what is involved in this amendment—indicated that if the provinces have a proposal and are willing to put up some money, the federal government will be prepared to consider it. I can only term that sort of answer as displaying a very sleazy attitude. It is a disgraceful abdication of the responsibilities of the minister, and is totally unacceptable.

This great man from the west came here three years ago. He said he was going to Ottawa to explain to the rest of Canada the needs of western Canada and of the prairie grain farmers. He is now trying to "con" the provinces into putting up some money. He knows very well this is not practicable and that the responsibility for dealing with this situation rests with the federal government. Any attempt to intimidate agencies such as provincial governments can only be classed as very despicable.

The first amendment under consideration deals with the definition section of the bill. It is important to note that clause 2(1)(c) of Bill C-244 suggests that grain sales proceeds, as the term is used in the bill, means the purchase price of grain produced on land described in a permit book and sold by a producer to a licensee after deduction of the purchase price of the grain and the lawful charges that are applicable to the grain on its sale to the licensee by the producer. The amendment moved by my colleague would add the words "and after the deduction of the increased costs of production, and including stabilization payments, if any". As was indicated, I feel this is a very critical section of the bill and that this is one of the most important amendments we have to consider at this stage. The government must give the matter serious consideration, otherwise it will completely abdicate its responsibilities.

First of all, it should be made quite clear that when one looks at the technical considerations of whether the costs of production can be determined in any sort of meaningful or adequate way, he should bear in mind that the three prairie governments have now very extensive farm management programs under way. The universities of the prairie provinces have also been engaged in such programs. They have in fact assembled data and a mass of information and figures over the past ten years which provide a substantial base upon which a meaningful determination could be made of what is involved in the costs of production in terms of developing a comparative measurement of these costs. This data is available.

I am not suggesting we have read or heard the final word in this area; we will witness further developments and refinements of the research work already being carried out. But I suggest there is now adequate information available to enable the government to make a meaningful and adequate determination of the level of costs of production. These could be given adequate consideration within the framework of this bill.

We then come to the money question as it relates to this amendment. This, again, is a critical matter. When this bill was before the committee, representatives of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture appeared as witnesses. I do not know whether the minister considers that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture was filibustering the bill when it chose to appear before the committee and inform members of its view, but the fact is that it was made clear at that time that research and analysis indicated that the prairie grains industry is now operating at a net loss. It was also made clear that whatever farm income is now coming to the prairie provinces is coming from the production of livestock—thank goodness cattle prices have held up reasonably well—and from income in kind, which is the product you grow and use at home.

The prairie grains industry is facing probably a more serious economic situation than any other sector of the Canadian economy. But what is the government doing? We find it coming up with this half-baked plan which will not provide any sort of solution. It has to keep in mind just where agriculture is situated in our economy, yet we still have the trappings of—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I do so to advise him that his allotted time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Burton: Perhaps I may continue, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members know that the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) may continue if there is unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no consent.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Speaker, it is now one minute to ten. May I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member knows he may call it ten o'clock if there is unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no consent.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Southam: May I call it ten o'clock now, Mr. Speaker?

* * *

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Will the President of the Privy Council advise the House what the business will be for tomorrow, and what is the forecast for later in the week?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we will continue tomorrow with the item we have been dealing with today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the President of the Privy Council would take into account the fact that Bill C-262 has been reported back and we in the opposition would be prepared to waive the 48-hour rule and shorten it to 24 hours in order to continue with the report stage, knowing the anxiety of the government to get ahead with this legislation. As far as I know, there is only one amendment to it.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gesture of my hon. friend and hope it will have general application in respect of other bills. I thank him for it and will consider when it may be possible to bring that bill forward.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Perhaps on Friday?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES—EFFECT OF OPERATIONS OF FOREIGN NATIONALS—ACTION TO ACHIEVE CONSERVATION

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, the Newfoundland fishing industry, which affects one quarter of the population of that province, faces danger of collapse within five years unless action is taken now to prevent the decline in the inshore and offshore fisheries. This government has been aware of this critical situation for a number of years but has elected to ignore it.

The attitude of the government, evidenced by its complete indifference to the problem of east coast fisheries, has been nothing short of criminal. Its past reaction to the wholesale destruction of our marine resources by foreign fishing fleets, and its unwillingness to lay down the law to the countries which are responsible, can only be termed as gutless.

• (10:00 p.m.)

While the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) and his colleagues in the government pursue their weak-kneed, spineless policy of appeasement, the livelihood of hundreds of thousands of our people, particularly in Newfoundland, is being stolen from under our noses without even a whisper or a word of protest from this government. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has been too busy trying to maintain his image of being Mr. Clean or Mr. Nice Guy in the cocktail circuits of Europe to take any action to protect the future of our fishing industry and perhaps cause a few ripples in the diplomatic circles of Europe.

Canada has become the laughing stock of the fishing nations of the world. Our fisheries have been abused and plundered; they have become sitting ducks. Our inshore fishermen have been forced to stand idle while draggers operating within a mile or two from shore destroy their fishing gear and while the Department of Fisheries pretends to be patrolling our coast. Hundreds of fishermen in my riding who have suffered severe losses of nets, and so on, at the hands of these draggers are living proof that the Department of Fisheries is incapable of giving them the protection they need and to which they are entitled.

How much longer must our fishermen be expected to stand by and see thousands of dollars worth of gear being destroyed by ships which are illegally operating off our shores? If I were fishermen I am afraid I would be tempted to take the law into my own hands. Surely a man has the right to protect his own property. Our Newfoundland fishermen have "had the course." Their patience has reached breaking point. They are not going to be pushed any further or put up with the gutless approach that this government has taken toward their problems.

They demand action, and they demand it immediately. They demand that the government serve notice on the fishing nations of the world that unless the countries concerned agree to meet and to adopt conservation measures we will assert our rights with regard to Canada's east coast fishing resources by fixing a date within the next year when fishing by foreign fleets in our waters will be forbidden except by our leave and our licence. Canada must not accept anything less than full management control over the whole continental shelf.

Until such time as sufficient research is carried out to determine the condition of the fish stocks and the steps necessary to enable maintenance of a substantial yield, we must demand a crash quota system. Mr. Speaker, do you wonder why we are concerned? One billion pounds of cod was caught off the Labrador coast in 1968. In 1970, despite an increased fishing effort the total catch in the same area was less than half, 440 million pounds.

In 1967 our inshore fishermen landed 270,000 quintals—a quintal is 112 pounds. In 1971 it was down to 108,000 quintals. The minister will undoubtedly tell the House tonight that the government is taking action. He will probably describe in great detail a meeting which he will convene in a few weeks' time with the various fish trades associations to discuss this very problem. I wonder whether the minister would be good enough to tell the House why he waited until 1971 to deal with this very serious problem which has been growing steadily worse over the past ten years or longer.

Why has he waited until the fishing industry is on the verge of extinction before he starts showing an interest? Could it be that his colleague, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) has suddenly recognized the political advantage of such a meeting at this time in Newfoundland? Whatever the arrangements may be for the meeting and whatever the outcome, the fishermen of my province and indeed of all eastern Canada will not tolerate the government's continued pussyfooting.

The fishermen of Newfoundland and the other Atlantic provinces demand that their rights be protected. They demand that the 12-mile limit be proclaimed and enforced. They demand that their nets and gear be protected from the criminal behaviour of draggers which like thieves in the night move in and plunder their fish stocks and destroy their gear.

If the Department of Fisheries is unwilling or unable to accept its responsibility with regard to protecting our fishermen, giving the fishermen of Newfoundland and eastern Canada the protection they deserve, I suggest that it should call in the navy. Surely the fishermen should not be expected to stand by and see their livelihood being destroyed and thousands of dollars worth of their fishing gear being destroyed with hardly a whimper from the Department of Fisheries. If the department's vessels cannot properly patrol our coast, I strongly recommend that the navy be forced into action.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, first on behalf of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson)—the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo—and myself, I would like to invite the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter) to a meeting with the fishing industry here in Ottawa on October 8 when we are going to discuss a number of these problems.

He will learn that the fishing industry in Newfoundland is not in immediate danger of collapse, as he has stated. In fact, the income of fishermen in Newfoundland has never been higher. This year it will be higher than in any previous year, and by a very considerable margin. The main reason has been a remarkable increase in the price of fish since the spring of 1969, an increase which has averaged better than 50 per cent. Our all-time record year in volume was 1970. We are off a few percentage points this year in volume, but this remarkable increase in price has more than offset the drop in volume. So if we are talking about past performance, the achievements of last summer have been remarkable indeed. I would be the first to admit that we started from a very low base and we have a long way to go in generating income in the fishing industry on the east coast before it is satisfactory to everyone.

The hon. member for St. John's West says that Canada is the laughing stock of other fishing nations of the world. I do not know what circles he moves in, but overseas fishermen envy Canada's bold initiatives, not only in declaring a 12-mile limit but in pushing other countries out of such large bodies of water as the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the Bay of Fundy and many other large inlets up and down the east coast.

As I say, representatives of the industry will be coming to Ottawa on October 8 to make submissions to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), the Minister of Transport and myself. They will be making a number of recommendations, some of which are already being acted upon. I have no doubt that sitting down again with the industry, as we have been wont to do, we will come up with ideas. One may be to push other countries not only out of our exclusive fishing zones but off our continental shelf as well. This will take a lot of doing because, Mr. Speaker, ours is the biggest continental shelf in the world.

AIR TRANSPORT—IMPENDING PRICE WAR AMONG TRANS-ATLANTIC CARRIERS—GOVERNMENT APPROVAL OF PARTICIPATION OF AIR CANADA AND CPA IN PRICE-FIXING MEETING

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, air transport should be a convenient mode of transportation available at a reasonable price to everybody without discrimination in respect of age, status or any other factor. Parliament approved the initiative of the federal government of 25 years ago to provide more adequate air travel facilities for Canadians and tourists. The result was Air Canada.

• (10:10 p.m.)

Unfortunately, air travel today in our country and abroad by Air Canada and other air carriers who have the privilege of using our airports is neither cheap nor convenient. Improvements in the congested Toronto airport are long overdue. Moreover, air fares are neither cheap nor just. Air fares are high and discriminatory, both domestically and abroad. It is discriminatory to allow a person aged 25 to fly at a reduced fare and charge almost double for those who happen to be 26 or older. Why are old age pensioners, who have to live on reduced incomes, offered a reduced fare only on a stand-by basis? Anyone who has been to Toronto International Airport to meet a passenger undergoes a nerve-wracking experience, but for an old person to wait for a flight on a stand-by basis can be sheer hell.

Also, Mr. Speaker, why should anyone have to fly with a group, at a specified time, and be tied to a tour and unwanted accommodation to obtain a reduced air fare? Air fares should be cheaper and available without discrimination and gimmicks. It is also high time to re-examine the workings of IATA and our association with what one editorial called a price-fixing cartel.

On behalf of my constituents of Parkdale, and indeed all Canadians, I appeal to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) to get together with their colleagues to develop an air policy that adequately meets the needs of all Canadians and will provide air transportation that is cheap, convenient and non-discriminatory.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member would not expect me to provide a detailed response to all the points he raised, in the limited time in which you will permit me to respond to this quite legitimate representation. Many views expressed by the hon. member are not only ones with which I am in full agreement but upon which I have spoken publicly in the past few weeks and months.

I want to emphasize that in so far as the domestic fare situation is concerned, even though there are occasions when hon. members would be pleased, I think, to accord me the right to establish such fares, that authority is not given to the Minister of Transport nor to the government. The airlines enjoy a considerable degree of autonomy in this regard, an autonomy which has been confirmed repeatedly by Parliament and with which I am not disposed to argue. In so far as the international situation is concerned, of course it is even more difficult in that the IATA arrangement, as we have seen in recent weeks, is a most complex one.

I agree with the hon. member that something should be done, and I believe now will be done, to eliminate a good deal of what has become an almost impenetrable jungle on rates and the confused situation with regard to air travel. The government of Canada, and I as Minister of Transport, are on record as favouring a much more simplified and much more fair arrangement of fares—if that is not a play on words. Incidentally, I have also indicated, although I repeat that I have no authority to impose this view on the Canadian airlines, that I believe that within their own country Canadians are entitled to at least comparable treatment, comparable rates and comparable conditions as if they were travelling overseas.

These are matters which are now being examined by me in considerable detail. I may say that I have a rather exhausting job in looking over various aspects of air policy, but I am hoping to come up with something that will at least meet many of the representations made by the hon. member and others.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—DECISION ON POSSIBLE INCREASE IN TOLLS—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF CARR REPORT TO COMMITTEE

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) and the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) for remaining in the House and handling their own portfolios tonight. I think this speaks well for many of the matters we raise.

On September 17 I asked the following question about the St. Lawrence Seaway and certain tolls and moneys:

—can the minister say whether any decision has been made that increased tolls will be enacted before next spring?

The minister replied, in part:

No decision has been made. Representations are still coming in. It is my intention to get as many representations as possible before considering the matter.

Not too long ago the same type of situation existed and the minister replied in somewhat the same vein; he said he was unable to make a statement on increased tolls on the St. Lawrence Seaway. At that time there were 49 submissions opposing an increase in the St. Lawrence Seaway tolls structure. Those opposed to increases maintained that capital expenses should not be charged against the Seaway.

At the same time, the Ontario Economic Council opposed any increase in toll or lock charges and said that increased charges would have an adverse effect both on Ontario and Canada in view of the current economic climate. Without question, increased tolls on the Canadian sector of the St. Lawrence Seaway could place the future of the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence waterways in jeopardy. At the same time, we must consider aspects such as those we have been debating today relating to western farmers, because costs to western farmers would increase. That could be very detrimental to this country in the long run. Also, Canada really needs a comprehensive transportation system. Such a system alone will serve the interests of the whole nation.

The hon. member who rose before me on the "late show" was concerned about the structure of air rates. In this case we must be concerned about St. Lawrence Seaway rates. Indeed, we must be concerned as well about rail passenger, rail freight and air transportation rates. I believe, as I have said, that a comprehensive transportation policy for Canada is essential.

The Carr report, if implemented, would as I understand it provide for an increase of 27.6 per cent over five years. We need an assurance from the minister tonight that any increase will not become effective until there has been an opportunity for ample representation. An editorial in the Standard, published by St. Catharines Standard Limited, of August 27, 1971, stated that a decision has been made and that officials of the department are understood to be unimpressed with representations which have been made, which no doubt include the 49 representations to which I have referred.

I think it is most important for the minister to assure the House tonight that bureaucrats will not make the sort of decisions we have witnessed in the past, and that any decision to be made will be made by the minister and his department in consultation with those interested in and concerned about increases in St. Lawrence Seaway tolls. Those who are opposed to increases in St. Lawrence Seaway tolls wonder whether they will be heard and whether their representations will be taken into consideration before a final decision is made. I would appreciate the minister giving an assurance tonight to the western agricultural community and to users of the St. Lawrence Seaway, the Welland Canal and the like, to the effect that there will not be an increase in tolls until those opposed have had an opportunity to make representations.

Our population is spread across the country and we know that it costs money to operate an efficient transportation system. We must not try to play off one form of transportation against another. We should not subsidize one form of transportation out of the public purse, as we have in the past, and then try to make the St. Lawrence Seaway pay for itself with regard to capital expenses. It is wrong to suggest that it should pay for itself in this respect. I would appreciate the minister advising the users of the St. Lawrence Seaway of his intentions.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as was the case with the last submission, the hon. member will appreciate that the time limitation will permit me to deal only superficially with his representations. So let me begin where he ended, with the assurance that he asked for. There is no intention whatever of making any changes in existing rate structures on the St. Lawrence Seaway until the thorough and exhaustive study that I have undertaken to make of the Carr report has been made. Of course, that exhaustive study involves the receipt of a large number of submissions from users and other interested parties. There will be this study, and any reports to the contrary are totally erroneous and can be disregarded.

• (10:20 p.m.)

Our activities at the present time are concerned primarily with our relations with the United States and the joint operation of the Seaway. In the emphasis that has been placed within Canada on the operations of the Seaway, in my judgment there has been a tendency to put too great an emphasis on one aspect, the possibility of an increase in tolls on the Canadian side or, if you like, unilaterally by Canada, and a failure—which I am surprised the hon. member has compounded tonight—to recognize that in the judgment of the Carr report the United States is by far getting the better of the deal. It is here that at the present time we are making our initial efforts.

I also commend to the hon. member something else with regard to the operating costs of the Seaway. I hope he will be equally vocal in this regard. The charges made by the Seaway only constitute a portion of the total cost of moving goods through the Seaway which is actually arrived at in terms of the user. I am not exactly sure of the precise portion or percentage.

I hope those who are making statements, including some who use the Seaway, will also recognize that it is incumbent upon them to keep their rates down and to reflect the same interest in the future of the Seaway as they expect the government to do. In other words, I do not want the government of Canada to be the patsy for this operation, the only one which is prepared to maintain this cost position in terms of charges despite rising costs, whereas shipping companies and sundry other users of the Seaway who have a much more profound effect of the costs of the western farmer are free to increase their rates.

In other words, we would like to hear, not merely why the St. Lawrence Seaway should not increase its rates but some kind of indication that the carriers and others are also prepared to co-operate in the interests of maintaining, as stated by the hon. member, one of the most important waterways and transportation links in this country.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, September 22, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

HOUSE OF COMMONS

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES—REQUEST BY MEMBER FOR SKEENA TO MOVE MOTION TO CORRECT RECORD

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion pursuant to Standing Order 32(1)(p) relating to the correctness of the records of the House. If it is accepted it is a debatable motion, but I do not desire that there should be any debate except to the extent that it is necessary for me to explain the need for the motion.

On September 15 last, as found on page 7830 of Hansard at the top of the left-hand column, there appears a quotation from a previous edition of Hansard relating to a motion which the House passed on a previous occasion having to do with the subject of fish and game laws as they relate to native Indians. When I rose on that day, September 15, to seek permission to move a motion under Standing Order 43 I did not make any reference to the motion concerning fish and game laws as they relate to native Indians but rather to another motion which the House passed on the same day. Consequently, Hansard has recorded the wrong motion. In order to correct the record, and because a great deal of confusion has been created in the minds of members of the government of British Columbia, who of course did not need this excuse, I have brought this matter before the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member, I understand, wishes to correct the record of Hansard. This is done normally in a very ordinary and expeditious way simply by indicating what the change is that the hon. member wishes to be made. I must tell the hon. member that this cannot be done under Standing Order 32(1)(e) unless the hon. member has given notice to the Chair. There is no provision for this kind of motion without notice. In any event, there should be no difficulty in the hon. member indicating what change he desires, and I am sure it will be agreed that the change be made.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, this motion is under Standing Order 32(1)(p). I assume it would require unanimous consent to move the motion without notice. In any event, the motion I seek to move is seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and reads as follows:

That the words quoted at the top left-hand column of page 7830 of Hansard for September 15, 1971 as follows:

"That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the report of the interdepartmental committee, the establishment of which was announced on March 29, 1965, which studied the question of fish and game laws as they relate to native Indians"

be expunged and the following substituted therefor:

"That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the Stanbury-Fields report."

If that motion is acceptable, the record will be corrected.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is still my suggestion to the hon. member that changes in Hansard should be made in the normal way that has been traditional in the House. What I must now ask is whether there is unanimous consent for the motion, which is debatable of course, to be moved. Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Skeena. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not and the motion cannot be put.

* * *

• (2:10 p.m.)

PRIVILEGE

MR. STANFIELD—ABSENCE OF MINISTER OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE FROM HOUSE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise a question of privilege concerning the absence today of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin). In response to questions yesterday the minister indicated he would be meeting today with officials of General Motors Corporation with regard to the reported lay-offs in Oshawa and other centres. That meeting has been held. Surely the House is entitled to expect a report from the minister on a matter of such importance. In any event, surely the House is entitled to have the minister here so he could be subjected to questions on such an important matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: There are 2,000 families involved. A backup of unemployment will also take place. The minister seemed upset, if not angry, yesterday because he had not been consulted about this matter in advance. He is not in the House today. I understand he will be meeting the press after the question period. If it is the roster system, which has no support under the rules, that is preventing the minister from being in the House today, I say that this is contemptuous of the House.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Stanfield: It is a violation of the privileges of the House and its members. I hope the Prime Minister will make it very apparent to the minister that not only is he permitted to come into the House today but that the Prime Minister would like him here to answer these questions.

Mr. Speaker: Is the Prime Minister rising on the question of privilege?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege. I wish to indicate that the House knows perfectly well there is no violation of privilege in this instance. If there were, I would like to hear a quotation from the rules as to what privilege was violated.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: You would ignore them if we cited them to you.

Mr. Trudeau: I see that they have no arguments, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I rise on the same point, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair is required to make a ruling before there could be a debate on a question of privilege. The Chair should indicate now whether there is a prima facie case of privilege. There might have been a point of order raised by the Leader of the Opposition, but I think hon. members will appreciate this is not essentially a question of privilege and the matter cannot be debated or considered by the House on such basis.

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is a pity that the Prime Minister found it necessary to sit down before he completed his remarks because, regardless of whether or not there is a specific rule to which Your Honour or anyone else may point, there are moral rules in this Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: There is a moral obligation on the minister who has met with the heads of the corporation in light of serious lay-offs and has a statement to make. If he has called a press conference, presumably he has something to say. There is a moral obligation on him to say it to this House and let hon. members find out from him exactly what was done. I suggest that when the Prime Minister seeks to hide behind technicalities as to whether a rule can be cited, it is merely further evidence of the contempt in which this House is held by him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the Leader of the New Democratic Party that it is a shame I was not permitted to complete my answer because I think I had a very rational explanation to put to the House. However, it is not my habit to try to speak above shouting such as was then apparent among members of the opposition. If they are not interested in eliciting information—

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Stop being so pompous, Pierre.

Mr. Trudeau: You see how it is, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Get out of the kindergarten.

Mr. Drury: This is a kindergarten, all right.

An hon. Member: You are worse than MacInnis.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I cannot be that bad. I am sure that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will be giving an explanation to the press when he meets them and which the House is apparently not prepared to hear.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Broadbent: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I regret that the Prime Minister has not decided to assure the House that the minister is going to make a statement to the House rather than to the press. I have been informed that spokesmen for General Motors told the press that the minister would be making a statement and they refused to comment. I think the least the minister can do is to make that statement to the House.

* * *

INDUSTRY

REPORT BY MINISTER ON MEETING WITH GENERAL MOTORS CONCERNING LAY-OFFS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave under Standing Order 43 to present a motion to the House. Seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), I move:

That this House requests that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce appear in the House today to report on his meetings with officers of General Motors.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member requires unanimous consent. Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

* * *

GRAIN

IMMEDIATE IMPLEMENTATION OF TRANSITIONAL PAYMENT TO FARMERS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave under Standing Order 43 to present a motion of pressing and urgent necessity. Seconded by the hon.

member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson), I move:

That this House is of the opinion that the government should divide Bill C-244 into two parts, and that arrangements should be made for a House order so that a bill to provide for the transitional payment of $100 million could be passed without debate.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—JET TYPE AIRCRAFT

Question No. 169—Mr. Schumacher:

1. During the calendar year 1969, how many trips were made by Jet Star and/or other executive jet type aircraft owned by the Department of Transport?

2. In each case, what were (a) the dates (b) the duration (c) the destination (d) the passengers?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1 and 2. The compilation of information and data required to ensure an accurate response to individual categories in these questions would warrant an immense amount of work by departmental staff at a considerable cost. The amount of work is enhanced by the fact that Department of Transport aircraft generally make well over 200 such flights each year. Every effort is made to answer questions of a more specific nature.

COST OF COMPUTER STUDIES FOR WHITE PAPER ON TAX REFORM

Question No. 1,318—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. What was the total amount expended on computer studies for the White Paper on Taxation?

2. To what companies, on what date and in what amounts were such funds paid?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1 and 2. In addition to computer studies performed on government facilities, the following amounts were spent on computer studies for the White Paper on tax reform: Company: Systems Dimensions Limited, 770 Brookfield Road, Ottawa, Ontario amount: $11,544.35 date: January 1, 1970.

INFORMATION CANADA

Question No. 1,608—Mr. Coates:

1. How was the staffing of the Inforama Pavilion at "Man and His World" determined?

2. Is the release issued which indicates there are eighteen persons involved in the operation of the Inforama Pavilion and that sixteen of these are residents of Montreal, correct and, if so, why was such a large number of the total staff selected from Montreal?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of State): 1. The staffing of the Inforama Pavilion at "Man and His World" was determined on the basis of previous experience of this and similar pavilions at "Man and His World", and elsewhere. Local university placement offices and the National Film Board assisted in providing a list of suitable candidates who were then selected on the basis of personality and competence.

2. The figure of eighteen persons is correct. Since the exposition operates seven days per week with hours which require two shifts per day, each position manned at any given time requires approximately three people on strength to take care of shifts and allow for days off. Most of the staff is from the Montreal area for the reasons that, (a) it was not considered to be in the public interest to pay living allowances in addition to salary, therefore persons from the area would be able to live at home or in their regular place of abode; (b) it was considered essential that all staff be fluently bilingual, and the Montreal area provides one of the best sources of young people with this qualification.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMUNICATIONS—GRANTS TO PRIVATE INDUSTRY

Question No. 1,655—Mr. Broadbent:

1. What programs of the Department of Communications provide grants, subsidies and other cash incentives to private industry?

2. What amount was provided to industry through each program in each of the past five years?

3. What amount, by program, has gone to each of the five major regions of Canada in the same years?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of Communications): 1. None.

2. Not applicable.

3. Not applicable.

* * *

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

1971 CENSUS—SAINTE-MARIE CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 1,462—Mr. Valade:

1. What are the names and addresses of the persons hired for the 1971 census in the constituency of Sainte-Marie?

2. Were the names submitted to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or his officials and, if so, what are the names of the persons, groups or political associations who submitted the names?

3. Were these persons employed through the Department of Manpower and Immigration or any other agency or department and, if so, did the Minister responsible for the hiring issue instructions as to the persons authorized to submit names?

Return tabled.

SEIGNORY CLUB, MONTEBELLO, QUEBEC

Question No. 1,500—Mr. Schumacher:

1. During the fiscal years 1969-70 and 1970-71, were any payments made to the Seignory Club, Montebello, Quebec by the government and, if so (a) what were the amounts (b) what were the reasons for each such payment (c) to whom was each such payment made (d) for which departments were such payments made?

2. Who are the owners of the Seignory Club, Montebello, Quebec?

3. To the knowledge of the government, is the ownership a partnership or private corporation and, if so, who are the principals involved?

Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I ask that Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, while I agree that these motions should stand in this instance, may I refer to one standing in my name, No. 248, which I admit is not of very old vintage. It asks for the tabling of correspondence between the government of Canada and the government of the United States regarding the proposed nuclear device test at Amchitka Island. In view of the fact the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) has said in the House that he intends to raise this question generally during the nuclear arms debate at the United Nations, and in view of the fact that the proposed nuclear device testing date is getting closer and closer, it might be desirable to have that motion put at the earliest possible moment and the correspondence tabled so that all Canada can see the nature of the communications between the government of Canada and the government of the United States.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I will take note of those remarks and look into the matter to see if something can be done soon.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR CONDITIONS

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AVOID LAY-OFFS BY GENERAL MOTORS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether he can give the House some information following the discussions of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and officials of General Motors today. Can he tell the House whether, following these discussions, there is any measure the government is taking to avoid these lay-offs? Has the government satisfied itself that the proposed lay-offs are the result of a genuine problem of overproduction, or that there is some exportation of employment by this corporation in this case?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I am not in a position to inform the House on that matter. I understand the minister had a very important meeting this morning with officials of the company and that he unfortunately had a subsequent commitment at Lansdowne Park, I believe, with the forest products industries. He has had that obligation for some time. Because of the complexities of the discussion he had this morning he did not feel he could easily convey the results to somebody else to report to the House. It is because of this conflicting engagement that he could not be here at this time to report to the House, but I am sure his views and report on the meeting will be made known as soon as possible. I believe he has a press conference at 3.30.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, the minister seems to find it possible to meet the press but not the House.

Mr. Trudeau: Not at the same time.

* * *

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

EFFECT OF UNITED STATES ECONOMIC MEASURES ON CANADIAN EMPLOYMENT—DIRECT REPRESENTATIONS BY PRIME MINISTER TO PRESIDENT NIXON

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question which I am sure relates to a matter within his own knowledge. Now that his colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs has made a vigorous attempt to bring home to the people of the United States the serious consequences to this country of President Nixon's economic measures—I have in mind the possible effects of the surcharge and other United States measures on Canadian employment—I wonder whether unemployment has reached a point serious enough for the Prime Minister to intervene directly to bring this home to President Nixon?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the country may be aware of the speech made yesterday in New York by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It was made publicly to an important audience and we have expectations that these representations will come to the knowledge of important United States officials.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, it has become clear that the government regards this as a matter of importance in view of the fact that an important minister of government has made such a speech. I should like to ask the Prime Minister how serious unemployment has to become in Canada before he will intervene directly and take up this matter with President Nixon?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the matter can be extremely serious and still be very well dealt with by ministers of this government and by officials. The opposition should realize once again that this is not a one-man government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: You can't sell that, Pierre.

SPECIAL MEASURES TO REDUCE UNEMPLOYMENT AS RECOMMENDED BY ECONOMIC COUNCIL—PROPOSED MEETING WITH PROVINCES AND MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has received a copy of the most recent report of the Economic Council of Canada which, according to press reports, urges special measures to reduce the very high rate of unemployment now and the high rate of unemployment to be expected this winter. Is consideration being given by the government to such special measures?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is probably referring to the annual report which, under the law, was tabled in the House a couple of days ago and I believe is dated early in July. Therefore his information is a little bit out of date.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, that is not what I am referring to. I will not argue with the Prime Minister, but I should like to ask him specifically, without reference to the report, whether the government is calling a conference of the provinces and municipalities not in December or January but immediately in order to arrive at some work for this winter that will create possibly tens of thousands of jobs across Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the member may have been away from the House, but a couple of days ago I explained I was trying to have a meeting with the provinces and that already four dates had been proposed by me in October and November. There is still some difficulty in obtaining agreement on any of those dates. As soon as I have a firm report from the provinces as to what date they can attend I will convene such a meeting, but I will not, as the member suggests, demand that the provinces come down here right away.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I was in the House when that question was asked and answered, and I noted that the Prime Minister said he was seeking a meeting on non-constitutional matters. I am also aware of the letters that have gone to him and the letters he has sent. I want to ask him whether he has asked the provinces, and through them the municipalities, to come to Ottawa to discuss some work program for this winter to deal with unemployment or has he asked the provinces to come and deal with general matters without specific reference to the problem of unemployment?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I explained that to the House too. Some time in the summer I wrote to the provinces to try to obtain from them consent to a day early in the fall. As is the usual practice, we do not begin to discuss the agenda until we have at least some tentative agreement on a date, but I did indicate publicly in this very place that it was the government's intention to have the item of the economy very high up on the agenda. I think the House would realize that even if it had not been our intention it probably would have been put there at the request of the provinces. Under the circumstances I do not see what more the Leader of the New Democratic Party wants.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, do I understand from the Prime Minister's answer that in fact he has not taken the initiative to call a special conference for the purpose of discussing works this winter to deal with unemployment?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the New Democratic Party can, as usual, draw the conclusion he wants from any premise. The facts are as I stated, that I am trying to arrange a meeting with me of the first ministers of the provinces on subjects to be discussed. I indicated that one of the subjects should be the very one that concerns the member, but I cannot follow his logic when he deduces from that that I would get more results if I told them to come down here now because we want to discuss this particular agenda.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Is it the intention of the government when it meets with the provincial representatives to put forward a specific plan or suggest "special measures to combat very high unemployment and high prices and costs" as recommended by the Economic Council of Canada in its report which it has made recently to the government and which has been in the government's hands for quite some time? Is that the intention of the government?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as with the question of the Leader of the New Democratic Party, it is obscure to me whether the report is the annual report, as I think it was, or some other report as the Leader of the New Democratic Party said it was without indicating what other report he was thinking of, if he was thinking at all.

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt whatsoever that the report that I am referring to is the report that was recently handed to the Prime Minister and the government. I am asking him if he intends to take specific action or not.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Témiscamingue.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I have asked the Prime Minister a further supplementary in a non-argumentative and polite way. I asked him if he intends to do certain things for the good of the people of this country. As I see it, there is no reason why the Prime Minister should not answer. I am simply asking, does he intend to continue to ignore the recommendations made to the government by the Economic Council of Canada as this government has continually done in the past? Answer that one. On your feet and answer that.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that a question asked in those terms is not in order.

Mr. Hees: What a chance this country has with a government like that!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST FOR GRANT TO ESTABLISH CARDBOARD MANUFACTURING PLANT AT CABANO

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscaminque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Last Monday my friend the hon. member for Bellechasse asked the minister the following question:

Has an application for a grant been filed with his Department by the Société populaire des pâtes et papiers du Québec which plans establishing a cardboard plant in Cabano but is now facing major financial problems? If so, what reply has been given to that company?

The minister answered that he would inquire and report to the House. Is he now in a position to tell the House whether that company has obtained federal assistance?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I have had inquiries made in the department. No application was made by this company with regard to Cabano. I believe an application was made on December 18, 1969 for the establishment of a cardboard factory at Sacré-Coeur, in the Lac Saint-Jean region, but no application to that effect was made with regard to Cabano.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, related to the one put by the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

Am I justified in thinking that the minister, when he receives an official application from the Société populaire de Cabano, will grant it his usual sympathetic attention and will make a special effort in favour of the request?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): As far as sympathy is concerned, that is sure, Mr. Speaker. As for money, we shall see, it will all depend on the request.

* * *

[English]

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT ON INTEREST RATES AND CONSUMER CREDIT

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): My question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In light of increasing evidence and expectations that interest rates will rise significantly, even to record levels, and that money supply will tighten, will the government make a clear policy statement with regard to government policy on interest rates and consumer credit in order to allay increasing consumer and investor uncertainty?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I believe that we have the lowest short-term interest rates in the western world in Canada—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Hees: Watch out, you are spraining your wrist, Ben, congratulating yourself.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Like father, like son.

An hon. Member: Tweedledum and Tweedledee.

An hon. Member: He looks like the yellow rose of Texas.

Mr. Thompson: Not having received an answer to that question, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister another. I remind the minister that everything we read from financial observers points to higher interest rates—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask the supplementary?

Mr. Thompson: It would be easier to ask a supplementary if the minister would answer my first question. In order to stimulate consumer and investor activity and relieve the upward pressure on the dollar, will the government consider initiating a strong low interest rate policy for the rest of this year and for 1972?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what we have been doing. If my friend will look at the expansion of the monetary supply in Canada he will find it has been the highest in many years.

* * *

MANPOWER

AVAILABILITY OF CONSULTATIVE SERVICES TO LAID-OFF ALUMINUM COMPANY EMPLOYEES

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I normally would direct to the Prime Minister but I would like to get a thoughtful and reasonable answer so I will direct it to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration instead. With respect to the announcement by the Aluminum Company of Canada of a cutback of one additional smelter at Arvida involving the lay-off of an additional 300 men and the prospect that the next such move by ALCAN will take place at Kitimat in British Columbia, are the minister's manpower consultative services, which are supposed to be able to assist laid-off workers, in operation at Arvida and does he contemplate using the same mechanism for potential lay-offs elsewhere?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to speculate with the hon. member about what may happen in other places. We ordinarily respond immediately to any notice of lay-offs, offering consultative services and attempting to go into discussions with management and labour. I would want to check the exact state of the item to which the hon. member referred.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF YUKON MINERALS BILL TO RESTORE CONFIDENCE IN EXPLORATION INDUSTRY

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development but before asking it I should like to welcome him back to the House and hope that he was successful in his hunting in the Yukon. The question concerns Bill C-187 which the minister announced in Whitehorse last Saturday will not be brought forward this session. In view of the 72 per cent decrease in investment capital flow in the Yukon last year in the mineral exploration field, will the minister restore confidence in that industry for next year's program by telling the House that it is not his intention to proceed with Bill C-187 but to withdraw it from the order paper and from the committee?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I was in the Yukon and I made a statement. The press in the Yukon responded in an editorial by saying it is responsible government at its best. The other day the hon. member said I was enjoying the outdoors. I worked on Saturday and I took a holiday on Monday. Yesterday I was in Calgary doing my work. I would like him to correct the record in that regard. I must say that the economy of the Yukon is very good. There is almost no unemployment there and the people did not complain. They like—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: For you fellows to work one day out of three is pretty good.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Calgary North is rising on a question of privilege I shall recognize him, but I think I should point out to hon. members that we are running behind the regular schedule this afternoon. Unless we limit supplementaries a number of hon. members will not have an opportunity to ask their questions.

Mr. Woolliams: I yield the floor to the hon. member for Yukon, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nielsen: The reply of the minister displayed a rather astonishing sensitivity which seems to be shared by the treasury benches generally. May I ask in a very nice way whether the minister would restore confidence in the mineral industry in contemplating next year's exploration program by doing as they have asked and stating in the House that Bill C-187 will be withdrawn from the order paper and the committee. In this way we might get some restoration of investment.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I said in Whitehorse that this bill will not be proceeded with at this session. The committee was in the Yukon and received representations. I have decided that I want to study them and make changes if any need to be made. In terms of the prospects for investment in the Yukon, I must say it looks very good. Production of minerals in the Yukon this year was greater than the year before and I think it will be better next year.

• (2:40 p.m.)

MANPOWER

MEASURES TO ASSIST GENERAL MOTORS EMPLOYEES TO BE LAID OFF AT STE. THÉRÈSE, QUEBEC

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): My question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the announcement yesterday that all the facilities of the minister's department will be brought to bear in terms of manpower retraining assistance to the workers about to be laid off at Ste. Thérèse, Quebec, and in view of the fact that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce acknowledged that the government had two or three months notice of this action, can the minister inform the House what specific measures have been taken by the government to alleviate the situation of the workers who are about to be laid off?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Again, in any of these individual cases the work being done is very comprehensive indeed, and I would like to get a full report to make to the House.

* * *

[Translation]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO EMPLOYEES TO BE LAID OFF BY CHEMCELL LIMITED, MONTMAGNY

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, to pull the Minister of Labour out of unemployment in the House, I should like to put a question to him.

In view of the fact that hundreds of employees will be laid off when the Chemcell textile plant closes down in Montmagny early in October, will civil servants from his department be sent to Montmagny to help the employees concerned to benefit from the regulation providing financial assistance for the readaptation of employees in the textile and clothing industry, because there will then be a large number of requests and—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The member put his question. He could perhaps give the minister the opportunity to answer it.

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I think the idea advanced by the hon. gentleman is a very good one and I will instruct the unemployment insurance officials to get into immediate contact with the company and the employees of the company who may be laid off in the near future.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

May I also ask the minister whether the regulations of the board responsible for the implementation of the legislation providing for retirement pensions to workers who will become unemployed might not be amended so as to cover people at 54, because many will be affected at that particular age?

[English]

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. gentleman is suggesting that I change the law, which I cannot do, but he has pointed out to the House the very beneficial—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman, as I understood the question, is suggesting that we modify the rules under the law which permit early retirement of people affected by the rationalization of the textile industry. I think it is a beneficial piece of legislation which permits retirement as early as the age of 54 under certain conditions which I believe are very generous. This legislation has been accepted by the House, and it would be impossible for any minister unilaterally to change the law that has been adopted.

* * *

CIGARETTE PRODUCTS BILL

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL IN LIGHT OF ACTION BY TOBACCO COMPANIES RESPECTING ADVERTISING

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): My question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the announcement yesterday by the Canadian Tobacco Manufacturers Council that their advertising code has been amended to include the major provisions contained in the cigarette products bill, for example, the removal of all radio and television cigarette advertising as of January 1, 1972, is the minister now prepared to abandon the cigarette products bill, so damaging to tobacco growers and so unenforceable?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Without at all agreeing with the conclusions and opinions of the hon. member I would indicate that the government is pleased with the reaction of the tobacco industry generally, but this does not affect the government's intention as expressed in the bill when we have the legislative time necessary to deal with it.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): May I ask the minister then what are the objectionable features that are lacking in the proposal of the Canadian Tobacco Manufacturers Council?

Mr. Munro: I think that is obvious if one compares the steps they have taken with the provisions of the bill.

* * *

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ADOPTION OF NEW PROCEDURES TO ENSURE PROMPT PAYMENT OF CLAIMS

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): My question is for the Minister of Labour and it arises from the increasing number of welfare applications being made while applicants are awaiting payment of unemployment insurance benefits. Is the Unemployment Insurance Commission adopting any new procedures for prompter payment of claims?

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I thank the hon. gentleman for his usual courtesy in serving notice of his question. Under the new act which is now in effect there are provisions which permit the assignment of unemployment insurance payments by claimants to welfare officers when financial assistance is needed from the first day of the lay-off period. In so far as the speeding up of claims is concerned, at the hon. member's suggestion I have asked for an investigation of the evidence of the rate at which claims are processed.

Mr. Aiken: The minister mentioned that there was provision in the new act for assignment. May I ask him whether these provisions in the act have now been implemented by regulations or departmental procedures?

Mr. Mackasey: Discussions are now going on at the provincial level between officials of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the various appropriate departments of the provinces. Meetings are also going on at the local level between local unemployment insurance officers and local welfare officers across Canada.

[Translation]

DELAY IN PAYMENT OF BENEFITS—SUGGESTED DECENTRALIZATION OF SERVICES

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Labour.

Since in my part of the country and in many others also there are many undue delays in handling unemployment benefit claims, does the minister intend providing for decentralization in the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act so that its provisions may be carried out more quickly and effectively?

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): This question keeps reoccurring, as it should. The monthly survey of outstanding claims indicates that for the month of August 98.1 per cent of claims were paid on or before time. The approximately 2 per cent of claims which are delayed are delayed for a variety of reasons, one of which is sometimes inefficiency in the department, with which we can deal, but more often because of the fact that claimants do not fill in the forms properly or omit to mail them in some cases and just do not register their claims at all.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to hon. members that if we spend too much time on supplementaries, we will be running out of time very shortly.

SUGGESTED PUBLICITY CAMPAIGN TO INFORM PUBLIC

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

As the public is confused regarding the application of the new Unemployment Insurance Act, does the department intend to use information media such as newspapers and television in order to enlighten the public and thus facilitate the application of this act?

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, publications which give a simplified version of the new act are available in all unemployment insurance offices. In addition, there have been weekly advertisements, as has already been mentioned in the House, and more are contemplated between now and the beginning

* * *

INDIAN AFFAIRS

WITHDRAWAL OF CHILDREN FROM SCHOOL BY PARENTS BECAUSE OF ALLEGED LACK OF FACILITIES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In light of actions taken by many Indian parents in northeastern Alberta to withhold their children from attending school and the prospect that by the end of this week the number being withheld will reach approximately 2,000, the reason for this action being to back up demands for better classroom facilities and other necessities, can the minister indicate to the House what steps are being taken to give adequate assurances that meaningful action will be taken to fulfil their requests?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I received a report on this matter, just a few minutes ago, and I am informed that the Regional Director, Mr. Greyeyes, is in contact with parents about this problem. We are trying to make parents realize that it is impossible to provide all the facilities which they would like to have immediately. However, we have assured them that we shall do all in our power to clarify this situation as soon as possible, and it is hoped that students will immediately resume their studies.

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: In view of the fact that Indian officials have indicated that only a personal commitment from the minister will stop the tide of this development, is the minister prepared to make that commitment and in effect grant the requests that are being made?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: I can hardly make a specific commitment, because the matter is too comprehensive. It concerns not only the facilities but also the type of education those pupils must get, and since they attend a provincial school, the provincial government must also be involved. Therefore I cannot give a final answer today.

* * *

[English]

SHIPPING

VANCOUVER HARBOUR—ALLEGED PRIORITY TO MOVEMENT OF GOODS DESTINED TO OR EMANATING FROM UNITED STATES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is for the Minister of Transport. Last week I asked the minister whether he would investigate the congestion in Vancouver harbour and the alleged low priority given to Canadian shipments. He told us at that time that he would report within a few days. Is he in a position to say anything more today?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have a written report which I will be glad to make available to the hon. member. The gist of it is that in so far as is humanly possible preference is being given to Canadian cargoes. That is not always possible because of the mixed nature of some cargoes. The decisions with regard to the sequence in which ships are unloaded are being made largely by what I believe is known as a wharf committee, or a committee of the most concerned people. As for the question of a possible embargo, this is generally regarded as being an unwise step even if it were possible for us to introduce it, and there are some very big reservations about that. I believe that is the basis of the report. I will send it to the hon. member.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Thank you.

*

DRUGS

INQUIRY AS TO FINAL REPORT OF LE DAIN COMMISSION

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister received the final report of the Le Dain Commission? If so, when does he expect to table it? If not, when does he expect to receive it?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker. I can advise the hon. member that I have not received it. In the latest conversation I had with the chairman of the Le Dain Commission he indicated that possibly it will be ready by the end of the year.

* * *

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CLOSING OF ACADIA FISHERIES PLANTS AT CANSO AND MULGRAVE, N.S.—MEASURES TO ASSIST UNEMPLOYED

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Knowing of his great interest in creating jobs throughout the country, I am sure that he must be aware of the problem I am about to raise. In light of the fact that Acadia Fisheries closed their processing plant at Canso two months ago, resulting in the unemployment of 500 people, and since some months prior to that their Mulgrave plant was also closed, thereby putting another 300 workers on the unemployment rolls, may I ask the hon. gentleman what steps have been taken by his department to alleviate this serious problem?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the hon. member did not give me notice of his question one hour before the opening of the House because I would have been in a position to make a full report. I will do that tomorrow.

* * *

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO COMMENCEMENT OF FERRY SERVICE BETWEEN MAGDALEN AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLANDS

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the roll-on, roll-off service between the Magdalen Islands and Prince Edward Island was scheduled to commence on August 1 and has not yet begun, can the minister tell the House how soon we can expect the service and the reason for the delay?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the reason for the delay is well known. Upon examination the vessel concerned had more difficulties of an engineering nature than had been known prior to inspection. These have now been corrected and I would hope the service could begin in the very near future.

* * *

MANPOWER

SUGGESTED INVOLVEMENT OF YOUTH IN BUSINESS TO EFFECT CHANGES FROM INSIDE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the recent statement by the Prime Minister in Ste Adele that our youth should go into business and try to change it from the inside, can he say whether he was stating government policy? If so, can he inform us of any measures the government is contemplating to employ youth in this manner?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a suggestion like that obviously is not government policy. It is an indication of the way I think the business world should be developing in Quebec in particular. There is no particular measure the government can take that I can see to force young people and business people together. Therefore it was in the nature of a suggestion.

RETRAINING GRANTS—REMOVAL OF REQUIREMENT OF THREE YEARS IN WORK FORCE IN ORDER TO QUALIFY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In light of manpower regulations that now prevent the availability of manpower grants for training and retraining until a person has been in the work force for three years, will the minister consider amending the act so that all unemployed can qualify for those grants?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as has been indicated to the House many times, the question of the three-year rule is under constant review and discussion with provincial authorities. The basic position has been one of providing training for those people who have been in the labour force and not to those who are basically in the main educational stream and are up to 18 or 19 years of age. This, of course, must be reviewed in light of the numbers of people now seeking training and the availability of training places. We are looking at the matter.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE AMONG THOSE UNDER 24—NATURE OF STUDIES—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Last week the Prime Minister indicated that the government was both alarmed and concerned about the high rate of unemployment among those in the 14 to 24 age group. He indicated as well that special study and attention would be given to this matter. Can he indicate the nature of any studies or investigations which have been put into effect and also when we may expect some report on this very serious matter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Manpower and Immigration just gave an example of the consideration we are giving to this aspect of the question.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are four minutes left before the end of the question period. I wonder whether supplementaries could not wait until tomorrow. I am anxious to recognize the hon. member for St. John's West.

* * *

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

NEW LEGISLATION RESPECTING BENEFITS FOR FISHERMEN

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Can the minister tell the House when he is going to introduce legislation dealing with unemployment insurance benefits for fishermen?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the unemployment insurance benefits that came into effect on July 1 are applicable to fishermen as well as to other members of the work force in the same manner as when the old act applied. There was an inference at one time that another plan might be developed through the Minister of the Environment, to be aimed specifically at the fishing industry. In the interval all self-employed fishermen coming under the old definition will be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits.

Mr. Carter: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Minister of the Environment who is responsible for fisheries tell us when he is going to introduce his new plan dealing with unemployment insurance benefits for fishermen?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, a new plan is under active consideration. However, it is not likely to be introduced until next year.

* * *

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

POSSIBLE DOWNGRADING OF FREIGHT SERVICE BETWEEN STRATFORD AND SARNIA

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. Would the minister inquire of Canadian National Railways whether or not any changes are being contemplated in the upcoming fall timetable which would further downgrade service in western Ontario, particularly freight service between Stratford and Sarnia? As such a move would undoubtedly cause further lay-offs in the area, would the minister use his persuasive powers to try to prevent any further deterioration of such services?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take note of the question and to get an answer for the hon. member.

PROGRESS IN DETERMINATION OF CASE INVOLVING REFUSAL TO PAY FEDERAL MINIMUM WAGE

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Since the minimum wage is still not being paid in Canadian National hotels across the nation, can the minister say what progress has been made in reaching a final determination of the case involving Jasper Park Lodge and as to the certification of a group of employees under federal legislation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that there is a certiorari action against the board before the Alberta Supreme Court. I have asked, through counsel, for this case to be accelerated.

* * *

JUDGES ACT

RESUMPTION OF DEBATE ON AMENDING BILL— SUGGESTED AMENDMENT CONCERNING SUPERNUMERARY JUDGES FOR SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. I think I can ask it succinctly. When will the Judges Act come before the House again? Will he include in the Judges Act an amendment to cover supernumerary judges of the Supreme Court because of the large backlog before the Supreme Court of Canada and the overworking of the judges?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have had some conversations with the House leader and with other leaders of the House. I understand there is a possibility that the bill may come forward on Friday afternoon. As for the point about the Supreme Court, the question of supernumerary judges as they affect the Supreme Court was dealt with fully in committee. I gave reasons why I did not feel we could contemplate that amendment. As for the work load of the Supreme Court of Canada, the hon. member will recall that when we were last talking about the Supreme Court Act in the House I suggested that it was inevitable that the court would have to be given the means to control its own roll through the introduction of an amendment to the Supreme Court Act whereby all cases would go before the Supreme Court of Canada by way of leave only.

* * *

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN ACTION TO ACHIEVE REPRESENTATION FOR MAINLAND CHINA AND TAIWAN

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the subject of universality of membership in the United Nations in which he is a believer. Can he advise if our delegation is making efforts in the General Assembly to bring about a situation whereby the people of Mainland China and Taiwan will both be represented in that body by delegates of their de facto governments?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, Canada has a one-China policy. We consider that there is only one question immediately before the United Nations and that is who speaks for China, who occupies the China seat? The question of the future of Taiwan is a matter for the future to decide.

CANADIAN ACTION TO ACHIEVE FORMULA FOR PROVISION OF ASSISTANCE TO VICTIMS OF WAR OR CIVIL STRIFE

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will the Canadian delegation to the General Assembly keep pushing as a matter of the highest priority the acceptance of a formula by that body for providing food, medicine and other assistance to the innocent victims of war or civil strife?

• (3:00 p.m.)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is the government's policy. In so far as these items come before the United Nations or if we can take the initiative, I can assure hon. members that the Canadian government will be supporting them strongly.

* * *

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

PRESENTATION OF AMENDMENTS THIS SESSION IN LIGHT OF COMMITTEE REPORT

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Privy Council in his capacity as government House leader. Eight days ago I asked the minister if consideration was being given by him to the report of the Special Committee on Election Expenses and whether new legislation was being prepared. He has had eight days to ruminate on the matter. Can he now advise the House if legislation is being prepared and whether it will be presented in this or the next session?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as a government we are concerned about the question of election expenses. We did refer the matter to a committee for study and its report was received toward the close of the earlier part of the session. We are now considering that report. We will advance the matter as quickly as we can but, as the hon. member will appreciate from looking at the present list of legislation on the order paper, it is improbable that we can deal with it in this session. It is even more improbable that we would have time to deal with election expenses in this session. I can hardly make a firm statement at the moment as to what will happen in the next session.

Mr. Benjamin: In view of the fact that the report has been in the hands of the minister since June 3, almost four months, and in view of the position taken not only by him but by the Prime Minister and members of all parties in the House on this matter, can he assure us he will make representations to the Prime Minister and his colleagues that legislation be brought forward during this Parliament?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we are all at one in our interest in promoting this matter. I hope we can have that legislation during this Parliament. That is our objective.

* * *

FISHERIES

DATE OF ATLANTIC AREA CONSERVATION CONFERENCE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Is the Minister of Fisheries now in a position to give the time and date of the conference on conservation of our fisheries resources in the Atlantic area and does he propose to extend an invitation to Members of Parliament from the Atlantic provinces to attend and participate?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, 10:30 a.m. on October 8 in the West Block. The hon. member will be invited.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I would have raised this matter a moment or two earlier except for Your Honour's interjection with regard to the length of the question period. In any event, I have risen at the earliest opportunity.

My question of privilege relates to the answer of the Prime Minister a moment ago on the question of youth employment. Either Hansard for last week is inaccurate or the Prime Minister's story has been completely altered since that time. Last week the Prime Minister informed the House that the government was going to look very seriously into the high proportion of youth unemployment. This afternoon the Prime Minister indicated that they were doing nothing whatsoever except continuing the usual program that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration indicated in his answer to the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville. Possibly the Prime Minister could take this opportunity to correct the record.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to hon. members. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege relates to the general business of the question period. Although I am not in a position to offer wise commentary such as my esteemed colleagues did who took part in the debate yesterday, I would like hon. members to listen for a few minutes while I present a position which should be of assistance to all hon. members.

My question of privilege does not arise out of any personal frustration with regard to the question period. It is about the only vehicle left for members of the opposition to hold the government accountable for its behaviour and actions from day to day, bearing in mind what has happened to the estimates and the redirection of the legislative process in recent years.

Despite the wisdom and great competency of Your Honour in being able to recognize members, when looking to my left a few minutes ago I counted 20 members who were unable to ask questions. I know there were many members who, like myself, did not seek the floor today because they felt it would be imposing on the rights of other members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lundrigan: The hon. member for Vegreville could not pursue the matter he raised by asking supplementaries even though the minister who would answer was in the House for the first time in many days. The fact that he could not develop his urgent point will lead to frustration on the part of 2,000 native people in his constituency.

The general state of the economy occupies a good part of the question period. I did a good deal of research on the question period from the opening of the House on September 7 until yesterday. I discovered that 197 questions had been asked about the economy. This is an indication of the great concern which the opposition feels about unemployment and various other matters of this type and importance. Because of the discretion which must be exercised by the Chair in determining questions that can be asked and the 40 minute time limit, frequently opposition members are not permitted to pursue very important supplementaries, especially supplementaries that pertain to the critical state of affairs in the country today.

On this basis House leaders, in co-operation with the Chair, must reassess the length of the question period which is now of 40 minutes duration. It must be reassessed because the matters which the country will be facing this winter will be of great importance and the country will be robbed of the right to have these matters pursued in depth and detail and the government held accountable for its behaviour. The question period is one of the few vehicles left. I am sure hon. members will be in agreement with extending the sitting day for a period of 15 minutes, 20 minutes or half an hour in order that the question period might be lengthened.

The roster system must be re-examined. Day after day members of the House of Commons are frustrated because they cannot ask questions on very urgent matters. This is also frustrating to their constituents. Members are not able to pursue matters through the ministerial heads of the various departments. The Prime Minister continues to pass the burden and responsibility for responding to the various ministers, even though they may not be in the House at that time.

I suggest that either a committee or the House leaders question the type of responses that members are getting from government ministers who answer for various departments. Despite the fact that members try to save time during the question period, out of frustration or because they are not as forward as they might be, I challenge any member to look through the 197 questions asked and show that the government has made a legitimate effort to respond to the needs of the people through their elected representatives. The hon. member for Egmont expressed frustration today. Other members are frustrated because we are not getting any indication of government responsibility from responses to questions asked during the question period by the elected representatives. This whole process has to be re-examined.

For Your Honour to be able to carry on in your usual competent fashion, and for members elected to represent their constituents to pursue matters as important and urgent as the economic affairs facing this country as well as local matters such as the one raised today by the hon. member for Vegreville, there has to be an early reassessment of the whole matter of the question period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (3:10 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Joliette rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, it has just been mentioned that it might be possible to reconsider the business of the question period. In the interest of Parliament, I think it might be important if the meeting is going to take place—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair has heard the representations made by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan); they are directed to the party leaders who might hold a meeting to consider this suggestion in order to improve the daily work of the House of Commons.

[English]

Mr. Muir: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. It deals specifically with the replies, or lack of replies, received from the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I stated when I posed a question earlier today that I had not given notice because of the fact I was quite sure this hon. gentleman was well aware of what was taking place in this case, 800 people having been laid off from their place of employment. When the minister attempts to reply to questions we get "nothing" answers or we are told he will inquire. The other day someone used the phrase "Trudeau the shrugger". He is becoming Marchand the shrugger. He shrugs his shoulders and gives no answer.

Earlier this week my hon. friend from Central Nova posed a question about other lay-offs, having given the minister ample notice, some days notice. Again the minister said he would inquire. He had no answer. We face this situation time and time again. In fact, the minister informed me after that effort, following the question asked by my hon. friend from Central Nova, that if he were given notice answers would be forthcoming. This is untrue. It does not happen that way. My hon. friend from Central Nova gave notice several days before asking his question. It was not necessary to do that today.

We face a situation where 800 people have been placed on the unemployment rolls. They must suffer the degradation, as able-bodied men and women, of having to seek welfare. I agree with the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate. Despite our best efforts it has become impossible for us to ask questions in the House and get answers or, at least, honest efforts to reply. The Minister of Labour, the Minister of Justice, a few of those who sit on the treasury benches, are quite willing and happy to do the best they can and you know you are at least getting a sincere attempt to give a helpful answer. But I must lodge a strong protest with you, Mr. Speaker, and with the government, as to the activities which are taking place. Unemployment is rolling up into the hundreds of thousands, yet the government sits idly by and does nothing about it and will not even answer legitimate questions.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in connection with questions which were raised during the question period concerning the intention of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to hold a press conference at 3:30 this afternoon on the subject of his conversations with senior officials of General Motors Corporation. If there is unanimous agreement in the House, and I am sure there would be, I wonder whether the leader of the House would approach the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and ask him, in light of what took place during the question period, to reconsider his original intention and make his statement here before the House.

An hon. Member: Revert to motions.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PRAIRIE GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

PROVISION FOR PAYMENTS TO WESTERN CANADA PRODUCERS IN YEARS WHEN RECEIPTS BELOW FIVE-YEAR AVERAGE

The House resumed, from Tuesday, September 21, consideration of Bill C-244, respecting the stablization of prairie grain sale proceeds and to repeal or amend certain related statutes, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture, and motions Nos. 1 and 2 of Mr. Gleave (page 7252).

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in opening my remarks this afternoon on the amendments to Bill C-244, which is now before the House, I should like to remind hon. members of the statement made by the House leader of our party early last summer when this bill was introduced, to the effect that if the government would agree to make a distribution of the amount provided for in the bill by way of a transitional payment, and deal with the matter by way of a supplementary estimate, the party to which I belong would be prepared to pass it within half an hour and get the money into the hands of the farmers.

With respect to the two amendments which are before us in connection with this very controversial and questionable bill, may I say I support them because any amendment introduced by the Official Opposition or by other parties in the Commons would, no doubt, if accepted by the government, make this legislation more palatable and more effective as far as western agriculture is concerned. I should like to ask the minister responsible for the Wheat Board what motivated the government in bringing the bill back to the House at this particular time, despite the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has been telling all and sundry that his tax bill was to have complete priority? Was it because during the summer recess, when the minister had the opportunity to check more closely on public opinion in the west, he finally realized the seriousness of the economic plight which our farmers are facing? Or was it because the government has at least become aware of the outrageous and deeply questionable position in which they have placed themselves by failing to meet the requirements of the law through their decision to withold payment of some $87.6 million presently owing to the Wheat Board under the terms of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act? Or is it because the dark shadow of the Assiniboia by-election, perhaps even of a general election, is casting a pall of gloom over the Liberal party in western Canada? Whatever the reason, I am more than surprised that the minister should not have learned his lesson, if not during the summer recess, then in recent days in the Commons. I had hoped he would return ready to present us with realistic amendments to the bill which would make the bill more acceptable to the western farmers.

In order to refresh our memories, let us read the title of the bill and the text of the two amendments we are debating. The bill is described as "An Act respecting the Stabilization of Prairie Grain Sale Proceeds" and to repeal or amend certain related statutes. The two amendments we are considering read as follows:

1. That Bill C-244 . . . be amended by adding the following to paragrah (c) of subclause (1) of clause 2 after the word "producer" in line 18 at page one: "and after the deduction of the increased costs of production and including stabilization payments, if any;"

2. That Bill C-244... be amended by deleting the words "amount that is 90 per cent of the" (a) from paragraph (a) of subclause (1) of clause 3 at lines 31 and 32 at page 2 (b) from paragraph (b) of subclause (1) of clause 3 at lines 4 and 5 at page 3.

[Mr. Speaker.]

This sounds complicated, Mr. Speaker, but it is pertinent to the economic welfare of western Canada. With regard to the word "stabilization" in the title of the bill, I wish to emphasize that this should mean an economically viable agriculture industry. This is the point around which a lot of the contentious debate revolves. Farmers ought not to be offered stabilization at poverty level as the bill in its present form would bring about. It is with this objective that the hon. member to my left has brought in these amendments and this is why I, as a member of the agriculture committee, feel duty bound to rise and support them.

I was amused by the remark of the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle), who is also a member of the Agriculture Committee, when he noted that farmers think. I wonder when he realized that farmers think. Sure, farmers think. They take plenty of time to think and that is why they are so unhappy about this bill. They have had time to think about it and about what it would mean to them in its present form.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Not only have the farmers been thinking about this, but all of the major farm organizations have been to Ottawa to appear before our standing committee to present farmers' views on this piece of legislation. These organizations included the three prairie wheat pools, the Federation of Agriculture, the National Farmers Union, the United Grain Growers, the Canada Grains Council, Unifarm, and even the minister of agriculture from Manitoba who attended in person. Besides this, each member of the standing committee, made up of 30 members, received over 3,000 letters, each protesting the bill in general and, more specifically, the very area that we are debating in these two motions. Just think, Mr. Speaker, some 90,000 letters were received. Think of the widespread ramifications of these protests as far as this bill is concerned. People have taken the time to write 90,000 letters to Members of Parliament about this bill.

Let me just quote briefly from several of these briefs. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the points they make are very relevant to this debate. I am holding in my hand the brief presented by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture under date of May 7, 1971. On the first page of the brief two very valid points are made, and they are as follows:

1. The vitally necessary payments to be made to prairie producers as so-called "Special Transitional Payments" in the amount of $100 million. These are urgently required.

I underline that, Mr. Speaker. Indeed the federation itself emphasized it.

2. The long term stabilization and storage policies contained in the Bill. These require much improvement... They should not be, and need not be, conditional.

Let me repeat that, Mr. Speaker.

They should not be, and need not be, conditional.

The brief continues:

We cannot accept the assumption, as a ground rule set by the government, that to get the immediate payment the long term policy must be accepted. It would be highly improper for us to temper our criticism of the long term grains policy in this bill—and we do have criticisms and very serious ones—out of a feeling of fear and urgency respecting possibly delay of these essential

"transitional" payments. It is clearly and unmistakably the federal government's responsibility to ensure that the special payment is made and made soon, while also ensuring that adequate opportunity is given for the consideration, modification and improvement of the long term proposals contained in the bill.

Let me sum up the two recommendations made in the brief which are pertinent to this legislation:

1. The "transitional" payment must be made immediately and not be made conditional either upon acceptance of the rest of the bill as it stands or upon its rapid passage.

2. Aside from the "transitional" payment, the bill is not acceptable as it now stands. While supporting the principle of a stabilization policy, the Federation position is that the following minimum modifications to the policy are required to make it acceptable.

I could go on to read at some length, but what is said is incorporated in the two motions now before the House.

The Alberta Wheat Pool also made several points in its brief, and I want to quote from it briefly to substantiate the emphasis that has been put on these amendments. On page 2, the following appears:

Attractive as a principle stability may be, the first concern shown by our members at the current time is that of income itself. They have expressed coolness bordering on disinterest in any plan of stability which does not have as its first objective, stability at a remunerative level. Within this context, our association has some serious reservations about the proposals of Bill C-244.

Then, on page 5 of their brief this statement is made:

The provisions of the bill for stability relative to this situation are unattractive. Were we heading into a period of deflation we could of course view the proposals in a different light. We are inclined, however, to accept that inflation will continue more or less along the pattern of recent times. Should this turn out to be the case, then the stabilization plan as proposed seems entirely inadequate to be of real benefit.

We have recently had debates in the House on the government's tax bill as well as the latest unemployment and inflation figures, so the worst fears expressed on June 1 have now been realized.

May I make another short quotation from the brief presented by another organization representing western farmers in order to bolster my argument in this debate. On page 10 of the National Farmers Union submission to the Standing Committee on Agriculture under date of June 3, which deals with Bill C-244, this statement appears:

The illustration serves to indicate that the shotgun approach for calculating the basis for grain stabilization payments over the total designated area on a weighted average is discriminatory and can deprive a specific region or even areas within a region itself from receiving payments or result in an unjustified transfer of income from one region to other regions or between farmers within a region itself.

This is another of the basic complaints that we have received about this legislation and the motions now before the House have particular relation thereto. The National Farmers Union goes on to say this:

Not surprisingly, farmers in a region heavily dependent on grain income contribute a greater percentage of total realized net income toward the stabilization fund than do farmers in less dependent regions. Although not based on the 90 per cent concept, the point is nevertheless illustrated in Table II.

A further very real shortcoming in the Bill C-244 concept of stabilization is the absence of any price mechanism to compensate for rising costs of production.

Let me read that again, Mr. Speaker:

A further very real shortcoming in the Bill C-244 concept of stabilization is the absence of any price mechanism to compensate for rising costs of production.

This last statement refers to what the hon. member who moved these motions was trying to emphasize. The second motion seeks to repeal or amend certain related statutes and is very pertinent to this whole discussion. In effect, it relates to the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act and the PFAA deductions, among other things. These measures have always provided some reasonable assistance to farmers by way of stabilizing their income, and had the $87 million now owing the Canadian wheat farmers been paid to them when due, it certainly would have been of great help in keeping their industry on an even keel.

Here I have to make a point that I think is very relevant and which has been overlooked so far in this debate. I refer to the fact that under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act it was only the wheat farmers and not the growers of oats, barley, flax, rye or rapeseed who were benefitting from this particular measure. In the present bill, the particular clause that we are debating provides that the $87 million now due and owing to our wheat farmers who have been so seriously affected by lagging wheat sales over the past four years be cancelled, and that this same amount be included in the present proposed $100 million transitional payments. This would mean that the federal government would provide some $13 million only over and above what is owing the western wheat farmers. This, Mr. Speaker, is indeed a clear case of robbing Peter to pay Paul and underlines the raw deal that western farmers who have specialized in wheat growing only get from this bill.

In view of the situation facing the farmers today, and in view of the serious readjustment period through which they are passing, I suggest we must examine the proposal to base the plan on the record of returns over the past five years. This, Mr. Speaker, is the crux of the debate. The record over the past five years is so bad that we cannot be satisfied, looking into the future, that use of the past five year average as the criterion for stabilizing farm incomes is appropriate. Had these five years been good years, or had a longer period been taken into the formula, the story would be different. In the past five years we have had falling sales, lower prices, increased income costs such as interest rates, taxes, cost of machinery and repairs, inflation and fuel, with the highest cost of living in history. So this legislation does not take into consideration the continued increases in the cost of production the farmer has to pay.

• (3:30 p.m.)

In conclusion, before this bill is satisfactory it will have to have built into it a formula which takes into consideration this inflationary factor referred to in these amendments, otherwise I must advise the government it will not be acceptable to our western farmers.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, we have before us today Bill C-244, the grain stabilization bill. We are dealing with amendments to that bill introduced in this House on June 22 by my seatmate, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave). The amendments before us are very important and relate to the most essential parts of this bill. As the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) said, they really get down to the core of the bill, or what you might call the more controversial parts of this legislation.

We are not just dealing with a short-term measure or something that will have an effect for a few months or a year or two. It is something that will have many long-term ramifications, not only for the farmer but for the people who live in small towns, villages and even small cities in constituencies such as mine. Cities of the size of Yorkton, with 15,000 people, are directly influenced in almost every way by what happens to the farm economy. People in constituencies such as mine are very interested in what happens to a bill such as this. They are interested in the amendments we propose in an attempt to make the bill as realistic as possible.

This bill was referred to perhaps more often than anything else during the six or seven weeks I spent in my constituency during the summer recess. Nearly everyone in that area is concerned about it. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang), the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, has suggested that we stop filibustering and pass the bill so the farmers can get the $100 million. I wish this bill were that simple, and I am sure the farmers share that wish. They all want and need their share of the $100 million.

Almost all the farm organizations are suggesting that we split this bill and pass the clause dealing with the $100 million immediately. I think everyone in the House is unanimously agreed in that regard. However, when we study the rest of the bill clause by clause and consider its most crucial points, we find that in the opinion of most farmers it will do more to hinder them than to help them. Most farmers believe that if this bill is passed in its present form it will stabilize their income at the poverty level rather than augment their income as it should be doing. Most farmers, regardless of their standing on the political ideological scale, are opposed to this bill. Most of them have asked us to do everything we can to get the minister to listen to their representations and make basic changes such as those suggested in motions Nos. 1 and 2.

Many people feel that factors such as the cost of production should be taken into consideration in the stabilization bill. Many farm leaders and agricultural economists, who know more about agriculture than most of us here in the House, say this bill does not take into account factors such as the cost of production. This is probably difficult for those in the House who are not familiar with farming operations to comprehend. The cost of operating a farm goes up and down like a yo-yo each year because of the many indeterminable factors. In many parts of Saskatchewan this year there was an invasion of the Bertha army worm. This, in itself, has cost the people of that province many hundreds of thousands of dollars. Things of this kind have to be taken into account when we are discussing a bill of this sort.

Another thing that is directly involved, as most people see it, is the fact that this may mean a first step toward introducing the recommendations of the task force on agriculture. If we stabilize farm income, as this bill attempts to do, we will be expediting the exodus of many people from the rural areas. This measure is certainly not going to help the low, average or middle income farmer, those people who are just eking out an existence on the farm.

In essence, this bill presents a test to this minister in that the government has been saying for a long time it believes in participatory democracy. If there were participatory democracy and the government listened to the representations of farmers and their organizations it would change this bill immediately. It could do so by accepting the two amendments proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. This would take into account the cost of production.

It is not often that farm organizations are unanimous. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the Farmers Union, the wheat pools and others are basically different in ideology, and most have different interpretations in respect of major farm issues before the country. Most of them have different suggestions as to how to solve farm problems. All of these organizations, the Farmers Union, the Federation of Agriculture and the wheat pools in Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, as well as the United Grain Growers, are unanimous in their feeling that this bill is not good enough, and that it should be studied and changed. There was a conference two days ago of the ministers of agriculture from the three prairie provinces. Even though they come from different political backgrounds, they were unanimous in their opposition to this bill as it stands. This is another reason for the government to change the form of this bill as it stands before the House today.

We are not opposed to the stabilization of farm income as a result of a measure that takes into account the cost of production and net income rather than gross income. This would benefit the producer. Such a measure would be of assistance to farmers and would allow them to stay on the farm. We are not opposed to the principle, but we do oppose a bill such as this which will probably hinder rather than help the majority of farmers.

The debate on this bill provides us with an opportunity of deciding whether this minister and his government really mean what they say about participatory democracy. Democracy is more than just an odd election, and it is more than just listening to people occasionally. A real democracy is one in which the people are involved. It means accepting ideas and putting them into legislation and into practice. In this way the people can play a real part in making decisions that affect their own lives. The farmers are unanimous in this regard and they have expressed a consensus through their farm organization representatives.

When we go back home to our constituencies we are constantly reminded that this bill contains an element of blackmail. The government has $100 million that the farmers want and need, and it says that once the stabilization bill is passed the farmers will get that $100 million. Regardless of politics, is it not time that this type of tactic was abandoned in Canada? We should stop holding out bribes to entice people to accept the things they do not want. This is a genuine and sincere feeling being expressed by the people on the farms back home in Saskatchewan.

• (3:40 p.m.)

To add insult to injury, we have the controversy of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. I am told that there is now something in the order of $80 million which should be paid to the Canadian Wheat Board and then to the farmers. Let us not continue with the old style of politics in which there is an attempt to bribe and blackmail the people with little gifts, and then ask them to accept something which they do not want at all. This is contempt for the people themselves. I speak not as a politician trying to make points but as someone who grew up on a small farm, and whose family is still on a very small farm. Everytime I see my family and friends, I understand the difficulty they are facing and the fear they have that the government no longer listens to them or really cares about them, but wishes to implement some things in the task force report which would mean that eventually two-thirds of the farms would be threatened or destroyed. That does not have to be the case. We could bring in some genuine amendments to this bill so that it would be a good bill and one which would be accepted by the farmers in the prairie provinces. So, I appeal to the minister, through you Mr. Speaker, to seriously consider postponing or adjourning this debate at some time and really listening sincerely to the voice of the farmers in western Canada or at least to the three prairie governments which represent them.

This bill was first introduced into this House several months ago. It was debated for a considerable length of time in the committee. A number of people appeared before that committee as witnesses. Then, the bill came back to the House and was debated again on June 22. As I said before, the minister has accused us of being political and of filibustering the bill because there was a Saskatchewan election. This is not the case. I do not think we should concern ourselves with political points of this type. We could be as equally suspicious that the minister has introduced the bill just before a by-election as he has been that we are filibustering. Let us stop playing games, let us get down to business and do something really meaningful for the farmers of western Canada.

Mr. Osler: Mr. Speaker, would the member allow a question?

Mr. Nystrom: I think I will allow a question from the farmer from Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Osler: I am the first one to admit I am certainly not a farmer, but even labouring under that handicap—

An hon. Member: It is not a handicap.

Mr. Osler: I was referring to the handicap of not being a farmer. Is the member saying that with these amendments this bill is a reasonable bill or is he suggesting that the whole thing should be tossed out? Is he seriously discussing the merits of the bill with or without the amendments or is he saying the whole thing is so wide of the mark that we are wasting our time discussing it? I am confused about what he has been saying.

Mr. Nystrom: I say that we should divide the bill and send out the $100 million right away. I think all this is understood. The minister asked about the bills as well as the amendments. To answer the first part of the question, we suggest the bill should be divided and that the $100 million should be sent out. Just try us on that. I am sure we are all in agreement on that point. Second, I think we should really study the entire concept of stabilization. Let suggestions come from the farmers, from the grassroots, to the people who actually draft the bill. Let suggestions come from the farm organizations to the government rather than from the top to the people below. In the event the minister will not listen to us and will not withdraw the bill, we have suggested a series of amendments which we think will improve the bill as it stands on the order paper today. These are amendments which would take into account the cost of production, which would take into consideration factors which would increase the total income of the farmers and that would take into consideration 100 per cent of farm income instead of 90 per cent, and so on. If we cannot have the whole bill studied, we would at least like to have some of these amendments considered very seriously.

There are a number of other things I could say about this bill which concern the farmers back home. However, one thing which seems to be of very great concern to western farmers is the fact that this bill will stabilize their income on the basis of an average over the past five years. Most people say that if you did this you would be basically stabilizing farm income in western Canada at the poverty level. Many people fail to realize that the net farm income—and this again indicates the difference between net and gross—has fallen drastically in western Canada over the last few years. I have some statistics from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics which I believe are very relevant and which should help members of this House in comprehending what is happening out there. These statistics are from the May edition of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and show that the net farm income in the province of Saskatchewan fell from $462,348,000 in 1968 to $202,718,000 in 1970, a drop of about 56 per cent over a two year period.

An hon. Member: That is why we want the gross.

Mr. Nystrom: One reason we should change this bill is to really help the average farmer instead of hindering him. Why stabilize his income at such a low level? Why not do something to put some cash into the farmer's pockets? The minister and members say, look at the sales. If we were receiving a decent price for wheat we would not mind looking at the sales. We get less for a bushel of wheat now than we did in 1969, despite the fact that the cost of bread and so on has gone up drastically and despite the fact that there is no guarantee that the cost of these other commodities will not go up in the next year. These are some of the real factors the farmer faces and which he cannot control. If the farmer had the say, maybe we would not be as adamant now about some of the things we say but the farmer cannot control these factors and that is why he needs a better stabilization bill than he is getting now. In respect of farm income, the same situation applies in Alberta and Manitoba as in Saskatchewan.

Farm income in Manitoba fell from about $162 million in 1968 to about $79 million in 1970, and in Alberta farm income fell from about $364 million to about $226 million. So, this trend is uniform right across the board in the prairie provinces. We must do something to guarantee in a real way the stabilization of farm income in the future so that the farmers can plan and make decisions themselves in order that their farms may be more efficiently operated. Farmers are efficient. Farming, as an industry, is perhaps the most efficient industry in this country. What the farmers need is the right to participate in decisions affecting their own lives. All they are really asking for is a say in these decisions, that they not be made by the bureaucrats for them but by them in their own interest. I do not think the farmers are overly greedy. They are just asking for a fair deal.

There are many other aspects of this bill towards which these amendments are directed and with which we must be concerned. One thing which has been mentioned is that the bill is to be applicable right across the Prairies in a uniform way and would not take into account what may be special circumstances in certain areas. There might be a crop failure around Yorkton, in the Peace River country or in the north because of drought or because of the Bertha army worm or some such thing. The income of the farmers in these areas may be well below the average, but because conditions have been very good across the rest of the Prairies they do not qualify to receive funds from the stabilization plan. This is the type of thing that has to be changed if this plan is to be meaningful to most of the farmers in western Canada.

• (3:50 p.m.)

